

Bhagavad gita

The Global Dharma
for the Third Millennium

(complete edition)

Translation and commentaries compiled by Mataji Parama Karuna Devi

published by Jagannatha Vallabha Vedic Research Center

Copyright © 2016 Parama Karuna Devi
All rights reserved.

ISBN-13: 978-1532896750

ISBN-10: 1532896751

For queries, suggestions, or further information, please contact
Mataji Parama Karuna Devi
Jagannatha Vallabha Vedic Research Center

phone: +91 94373 00906
E-mail: paramakaruna@aol.in Website: www.jagannathavallabha.com

Correspondence address:
PAVAN House
Siddha Mahavira patana, Puri 752002 Orissa

Preface

Bhagavad gita is the first and foremost of the prasthana traya, "the 3 starting points" from which one should begin to study Vedic knowledge - the other 2 are the Upanishads and Vedanta sutra or Brahma sutra.

To further assist the beginner student, Vedavyasa offered excellent support in the form of the Mahabharata and Puranas, also compiled in the same period as all the fundamental Vedic scriptures.

Bhagavad gita is the shortest, easiest and clearest text, yet the most complete and self-sufficient. It is set in the Mahabharata like a jewel in a crown, and offers a beautiful synthesis of the science of yoga.

To obtain the desired results in the shortest time, Vedic knowledge should be approached in the specific scientific method of learning that is explained in its texts, following the required protocols and procedures.

It is recommended to study the text for at least 3 times: the first time one should just read the translations, to grasp the thread of the discussion, the second time one should read the translation together with the devanagari text and the dictionary meanings of the Sanskrit words,, and the third reading should include the commentaries and try to understand the general meaning.

The Vedic scriptures and the Sanskrit language are very dense with several layers of meaning, some of which can be penetrated only through a substantial paradigm shift called "realization". Therefore the student should not worry too much if there are some passages that seem to be difficult to understand: the best course is to just accept the statements hypothetically, as there will be opportunities for verification and for further readings. After completing the 3 initial readings, one can and should continue to study the text as a practice of sadhana, and at each new reading, the student will be blessed with new understanding and realizations.

We have tried to keep the technical terminology in the commentaries to the minimum required, and to offer a faithful translation and explanation of all the terms and definitions. To offer extra support to the students, we are planning to prepare a Glossary and a comprehensive Index with cross-references, that will be published separately as an Appendix and independent study instrument.

To facilitate the students especially in their first reading of Bhagavad gita, we have also prepared an abridged edition (original text and translation only) and a 18 volume edition (one for each chapter). The 19th volume, already published, is an Appendix containing Adi Shankara's Gita mahatmya, a brief summary of the Mahabharata offering the context of the dialog between Krishna and Arjuna, and the story of Krishna from the Bhagavata purana. With the Glossary and Index, there will be more volumes published in time.

We also recommend our sincere students to study the Bhagavata Purana and the 108 most prominent Upanishads, as well as our Introduction to Vedic Knowledge, in 4 volumes, and our other publications, that will fill any gap in the information and understanding required to receive the best benefit from the scriptural study. We also remain available for personal interaction, in the form of questions, suggestions, elaborations and cooperation for the important work of preserving and propagating Vedic knowledge.

CONTENTS

Introduction	1
Chapter 1	2
Arjuna visada yoga : the yoga of Arjuna's grief
Chapter 2	28
Sankhya yoga : the yoga of analysis and enumeration
Chapter 3	78
Karma yoga : the yoga of action
Chapter 4	108
Jnana yoga : the yoga of knowledge
Chapter 5	139
Samnyasa yoga : the yoga of renunciation
Chapter 6	160
Dhyana yoga : the yoga of meditation
Chapter 7	191
Vijnana yoga : the yoga of applied knowledge
Chapter 8	221
Taraka brahma yoga : the yoga of liberating spiritual existence
Chapter 9	251
Raja guhya yoga : the yoga of the supreme secret
Chapter 10	288
Vibhuti yoga : the yoga of powers
Chapter 11	320
Visva rupa darsana yoga : the yoga of contemplation of the universal form
Chapter 12	369
Bhakti yoga : the yoga of devotion
Chapter 13	387
Prakriti-purusha-viveka yoga : the yoga of understanding nature as distinct from the personal principle
Chapter 14	425
Guna traya vibhaga yoga : the yoga of differentiating between the gunas
Chapter 15	449
Purushottama yoga : the yoga of the Supreme Person
Chapter 16	470
Daivasura sampad vibhaga yoga : the yoga of differentiating between the characteristics of the divine and the demoniac personalities
Chapter 17	499
Sraddha traya vibhaga yoga : the yoga of differentiating between the three forms of faith
Chapter 18	530
Moksha yoga : the yoga of liberation

Introduction

satyam eva jayate

This edition of Srimad Bhagavad gita is aimed at washing off centuries of confusing cultural superimpositions that have been enforced in a systematic way over the original Vedic knowledge by the influence of invading hostile cultures.

It is compiled at a particular time in history when Hindustan (India) and its original culture (Hinduism) are facing the unique opportunity of regaining their legitimate cultural and spiritual leadership role at global level, after a very long period of oblivion and impotence. For the first time since the early invasions of Arab Muslim marauders into the Greater Indian territory not long after Islam was founded, and over 50 years after the British Raj left India, Hinduism does not need to modify and adapt its culture and knowledge in order to please the foreign invaders and thus enable its survival, because at global level there is a growing interest and support specifically for those very ideals and ideas that characterized India's original culture and knowledge in the purest form.

It is the time of the Hindu Awakening movement.

True Hinduism has the intrinsic power to be the Global Dharma for the new Millennium, because it is open, inclusive, tolerant, and incredibly deep in meaning and knowledge, capable of reconciling all theoretical differences and absorbing many different perspectives in a most harmonious non-dualistic way, into a complete, consistent and logical wider picture, favoring cultural diversity and a great variety in iconography and hagiography, and thus allowing the greatest possible freedom of religion. It offers a personalized access and progressive programs, addressing and accommodating each degree of personal development and field of interest for each individual. It is the most suitable ideology for today's world because it teaches a healthy wholistic approach to life, sustainable development, respect for women and children, respect for animals and nature, and true social cooperation. Its modernity and the scientific value of its scriptures have been recognized with awe and admiration by the greatest scientists and researchers of this contemporary age and have made it extremely popular among the intellectual elites of Western countries.

Unfortunately, the invasion and domination by foreign cultures that were explicitly hostile to the original Hindu tradition have greatly damaged the cultural and spiritual infrastructure of Indian society, even infiltrating deeply into the collective subconscious and creating serious and dangerous misconceptions that unfortunately have come to be considered as an integral part of the Hindu/Indian tradition and culture. Practically all the problems lamented in Hindu society are in fact due to the cultural superimposition of alien concepts and beliefs, and can be solved automatically by returning to the original knowledge presented by the genuine Vedic literature, and separating it from the detrimental and incompatible foreign ideas that have accumulated in the centuries, hiding the true radiance of Sanatana Dharma.

Because although Hinduism welcomes into its fold all good and auspicious ideas irrespective of their provenance (aa no bhadrah kratavo yantu visvatah, Rig Veda 1.1.89), these need to be compatible with the universal and eternal principles of dharma - truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness, self-control, tolerance, personal progress, cooperation, and so on. All these principles are described in Gita as sat ("good") as opposed to asat ("bad"). The original compilers of Vedic literature had very clear ideas about what is good and what is bad, and expressed their direct vision in a great wealth of texts that are all perfectly compatible to each other, and with any other text or teaching that expresses the universal and eternal principles of good.

Thus the choice should not be between desi ("national") and videsi ("foreign"), but between good and bad - sat and asat. To become able to make this choice, we need first of all to understand the difference between sat and asat: this is precisely the subject discussed in Bhagavad gita, also called the sadbhava prasthana, the most practical of the prasthana traya - the three most important reference authorities on Sanatana Dharma.

When we are able to recognize asat concepts, thanks to the precise descriptions and explanations of Gita, we can localize them in the general beliefs of the people (laukika sraddha), explore their origin and trace the history of how they became superimposed to the sat concepts, to be able to make the proper choices in life.

This process is called viveka, the work of discriminating intelligence.

The commentaries of this edition of the Bhagavad gita is characterized by a comparative study of religions on the particular concepts expressed in the text. The original Vedic approach expressed in Gita is thus compared to the general beliefs created over a long period of abrahamic influence either directly or indirectly - that is, either according to the abrahamic dogma enforced on society or as a reaction against them, but working on the same faulty paradigms. The ideologies directly in pursuance of the abrahamic dogma are (in historical order) Zionism, the various Christian churches, and the Islamist movements. They are called abrahamic because they all recognize Abraham as their founder, and share the same basic concepts and beliefs: exclusive political and clerical monotheism, special privileges for a chosen people against all others, domination over nature and resources, patriarchalism, and so on. The ideologies that developed as a reaction against the three abrahamic sects are Communism, Atheism, Scientism, Consumerism, etc. Although apparently opposite to the abrahamic system of beliefs, they are based on the same fundamental assumptions and therefore their approach is also similarly flawed. As it is said, it is not possible to solve a problem by applying the same concepts that caused the problem in the first place.

We immediately need to clarify that our purpose is not to create bad sentiments against the people who are considered Christians, Muslims or Jews. Rather, we want to make a distinction in order to properly understand the different ideologies, their absolute and universal value in terms of the ethical principles of sat and asat, and their compatibility with the Vedic approach.

Strict adherence to ideologies in theory and practice is called fundamentalism, but strict adherence to one's principles is not a bad thing, provided the principles are not contrary to ethics. Should a honest person be afraid to be considered a "honesty fundamentalist" if he stands on his principles by refusing to steal, bribe, cheat or tell lies? And even more important, will the choices of such individual be favorable or unfavorable to social harmony and progress?

On the other hand, will social harmony be favored by the "political correct" silence on the negative results of the choices of individuals following an opposite ideology - an ideology based on asat ideals? These are the questions that each one of us needs to ponder on. Our proposition is that the problem with fundamentalism is when the ideology is unethical, so the more one is faithful to it, the more dangerous he becomes for society.

The majority of the people that are considered Christians, Muslims and Jews are "moderate" or we should rather say, non-politicized. They identify with these definitions mainly because they were born in those communities, but they simply concern themselves with the maintenance of their families and their honest professional occupation, and have no problems in getting along well with their neighbors - irrespective of their creed, caste, color etc.

Some may even be good and sincere people that honestly try to improve their own character and life by developing love for their fellow human beings and for God as the creator of everything and everybody. These people often believe that their duty is to help others out of selfless charity, and they painstakingly work to make a world a better place. From the teachings of their religion, they pick only what is compatible with their good conscience and natural sense of ethics, and they do not care about the rest - or believe it's somehow "symbolic" and it should not be interpreted literally.

So what's the problem with the abrahamic ideology?

Unfortunately, such moderate Christians, Muslims and Jews are not the ones that become recognized as the official authorities and spokespersons for the religion they belong to, and are generally considered "non-practicing" members or "laymen". It is the fundamentalists that naturally take power within these religious structures by their determination and aggressiveness, by manipulating and exploiting the good sentiments of more lukewarm members who supply funds and votes in elections, as well as a general support to the faulty basic concepts they have been educated to consider valid, true and normal. Any progressive or ethical movement in the opinion of such moderate abrahamics is actually irrelevant in regard to the dogma and policies, of which they are usually more or less unaware or uninformed. For example, the concept of reincarnation is today embraced by a majority of the population in western countries - traditionally influenced by Christianity - yet the official position of Christian theology has always been very contrary to it, to the point of persecuting it very actively as a blasphemy with the capital punishment when the Church had sufficient power on the State.

But while a majority of people in the abrahamic-influenced countries are now taking their distance from the official religious dogma thanks to the development of literacy and higher ideals of free thinking, the religious hierarchies and their fundamentalist followers are becoming more determined to enforce their ideologies by all means, even against basic ethical consideration. There are many examples we could quote from the public declarations of officially recognized religious authorities in the abrahamic traditions, and even from their canonic (i.e. officially recognized) scriptures, but that is not the purpose of this book. The purpose of this book is to study and understand what Bhagavad gita really says, and to help its student to put its teachings into practice: the need of the hour.

Chapter 1: Arjuna vishada yoga

The yoga of Arjuna's grief

Usually the first chapter of Gita is rather overlooked by scholars, who consider it a mere introduction to the actual teachings explained by Krishna in the subsequent chapters. Sometimes the title of the chapter is even changed into something less "depressing", such as "Observing the armies on the battlefield". However, an attentive reading of this chapter will help us to understand the crucial difference between material compassion and spiritual compassion, and to facilitate the application of Gita to our personal life - thus going from philosophy to experience, from theory to practice, from speculation to experience.

Frustration in materialistic life is not a bad thing; rather it is a symptom of intelligence, because material possessions, positions and identifications cannot really give full happiness and satisfaction. Materialists are typically always trying to get more possessions, and as soon as they obtain an object they coveted, they lose interest in it and start desiring something else. Of course there is a minimum level of material facilities that we all need in order to maintain our bodies and minds in a healthy and functional state, and Vedic society normally guarantees this level to all members, but people are trained to get their happiness and satisfaction in life from the proper performance of their duties rather than from the amount of sense gratification or material properties or control over others.

In the Vedic system, one's duty is called both karma and dharma, because it unites the individual effort and willpower that performs the proper action with one's natural function in the greater order of things - one's true and perfect place in the universe. An individual who has the natural talents and tendencies to protect society will only feel happy and satisfied when he can work in that capacity, and so will a teacher, an entrepreneur, an artisan, and an artist. If an individual is in the proper varna and ashrama, he will be happy with just doing his job, and he will need no other motivations to such as profit, fame, adoration, etc. The gradual accomplishment of duties in one's life culminates with the highest duty, that is the realization of one's eternal nature of Atman/ Brahman, and the service to the Transcendental Supreme, of which one is part and parcel. Just like our temporary material identification can find satisfaction in functioning in the service of society, our eternal transcendental identity will find satisfaction at the transcendental level, in the spiritual service to God.

This material world, like a school, has been specifically and perfectly engineered to help each individual progress and develop along higher and wider levels of awareness, up to the greatest possible realization: God realization. A particular position in school is not meant to be one's permanent residence, and this is why students constantly get new teachings and tests by which they can advance to higher levels, and ultimately graduate from the school altogether. For this reason, life in the material world has been made difficult and unstable (duḥkhalayam āsāvṛtam, Gita, 8.15), so that we do not get ourselves too comfortable in it, but keep striving to seek something that can fulfill our aspiration to perfect sat (eternity, permanence), cit (knowledge, awareness) and ananda (happiness), the basic characteristics of spiritual or transcendental existence.

So, one who understands that in this material world it is not possible to find the perfection of sat, cit and ananda, and out of this virtuous frustration tries to understand what else exists beyond this level of imperfection and impermanence, is taking the first step in the journey of Self realization. Unevolved people just tread on in life like animals do - only concerning themselves about eating, sleeping, mating, defending themselves and their families, procuring comforts, possessions and social power. They experience joys and sorrows but they are unable to rise above them. The transcendental presence and guidance of Krishna transforms grief and frustration into a powerful vehicle to seek and obtain the proper knowledge of Reality that will liberate us from the cycle of births and deaths. Everyone of us stands on the battlefield of life, inside the chariot constituted by our body, and like Arjuna we should turn to our dearest friend, the Antaryami Paramatman, for instruction and guidance.

The Kauravas represent the bad tendencies of human beings (our own and those of the people around us), centered around material identification and attachments - the arrogant and selfish Duryodhana - and always try to usurp our good understanding and motivations, represented by the Pandavas.

धृतराष्ट्र उवाच ।

dhṛtarāṣṭra uvāca ।

धर्मक्षेत्रे कुरुक्षेत्रे समवेता युयुत्सवः ।

ममकाः पाण्डवाश्चैव किमकुर्वत सञ्जय ॥ १-१ ॥

dharmakṣetre kurukṣetre samavetā yuyutsavaḥ । māmakāḥ pāṇḍavāścaiva kimakurvata sañjaya ॥ 1-1 ॥

dhritarashtra: Dhritarastra; uvaca: said; dharma-kṣetre: in the place/ field of dharma; kuru-kṣetre: in the place/ field of Kuru (Kurukshetra); samaveta: assembled; yuyutsavaḥ: desiring to fight; mamakāḥ: mine (my people); pandavah: the Pandavas (the people of Pandu); ca: and; eva: certainly; kim: what; akurvata: did; sañjaya: o Sanjaya.

Dhritarastra said: "O Sanjaya, what did my sons and Pandu's sons (my people/ supporters and the people/ supporters of Pandu) do, after they assembled in the sacred place of Dharma, the battlefield of Kurukshetra, ready to fight?"

Dhritarastra is the old regent king of Hastinapura, father of Duryodhana; he is sitting in his palace and asks Sanjaya to describe to him what is happening on the battlefield. Thus Bhagavad gita is narrated by Sanjaya to Dhritarastra in the form of a dialog. Sanjaya, son of the charioteer Gavalgama, is Dhritarastra's mantri just like Vidura, who is Dhritarastra's blood brother. The definition of mantri as usually translated as "minister", but actually refers to a secondary position in the government, not occupied by kṣatriyas or rulers. The job description usually includes a mixture of secretary, advisor, charioteer and messenger, and in the Vedic system of government a mantri is the trusted supporter, assistant or servant of a kṣatriya of the royal order. There are different levels of mantris because there are different functions in the service of the king: sudras or servants can execute some of them, such as driving a chariot or delivering an ordinary message, and brahmanas are more suited to advisory functions, especially on ethics, religion and spirituality. In the present context of political democracies, the ministers are the assistants to the elected representatives of the people (democracy literally means "governed by the people"), who take the place of the king, often without honoring the responsibilities that come with the position.

Dharma kṣetra is not only a place of pilgrimage but also a place where one performs one's religious duty (dharma). For a kṣatriya, a battlefield is the dharma kṣetra because it is his religious duty to protect the kingdom and its inhabitants (praja, including also the animals) from those who can harm them. Kṣetra means "field" or "land" and specifically applies to the territory protected by a kṣatriya or kṣetra-pa, a definition from which the ancient Persian word "Satrap" derived.

Mamakāḥ pandavah caiva: already in the first verse we clearly see the reason why the battle needs to be fought. Dhritarastra is seriously afflicted by a fundamental dualistic delusion that he has transmitted to his sons. For him and his "evil-minded"

(durbuddheb, 1.23) son Duryodhana, who deliberately caused the conflict, it's all about aham mama, "me and mine", or the abankara and mamatva, the root causes of ignorance and suffering. For Dhritarastra the throne is just a personal possession, the instrument of his selfishness and egotism, by which he and "his own people" can best exploit the subjects and the resources of the kingdom for their own gratification and vainglory, without any consideration for the welfare of the people. This mentality is clearly described as asuric (demoniac) in Gita (16.13-15). No king has the right to consider the kingdom as his own property, to do whatever he wants with it. Actually, a king should sacrifice everything he has - including his own personal family - for the benefit of the kingdom and the prajas.

The events narrated in the Mahabharata show that Dhritarastra is blind not only physically, but also ethically and spiritually, and it is clear from this verse that because of the intrinsic dharmic influence of the place where the armies are assembled, Dhritarastra is afraid that his son Duryodhana might become inclined to relent from his evil schemes and agree to share the kingdom with the Pandavas. On a symbolic level in the story of the Mahabharata, Dhritarastra represents the material calculation for selfish benefits that is blind to *dharm*a and spiritual identity; after losing everything he finally understands that material attachment is illusion and dies away. Dhritarastra's wife, Gandhari, represents the material attachment to family and society that makes itself blind, too, because it becomes subservient to the pursuance of selfish benefits.

Duryodhana (the name meaning is "cruel in fighting") is considered a partial incarnation of the age of Kali, and symbolically represents quarrel. His younger brothers represent the various defects and bad tendencies of the conditioned soul, especially Duhsasana, who represents lust. In the war of Kurukshetra, Bhima (who is an amsa of Shiva Mahadeva like the other Pandavas, and represents Kala Bhairava) kills Duhsasana and drinks his blood, signifying that lust can be channeled, sanctified and made harmless through the tantric path. The sister of Duryodhana, Duhsala, symbolizes bad advice; she married Jayadratha the king of Sindhu and became the mother of Suradha, who got a heart attack when he heard that Arjuna had come for the Rajasuya with the sacrificial horse entering his kingdom. At another level of a symbolic interpretation of the story, Duryodhana is the conditioned soul (the king of the city of the nine gates) who, observing the variety of arrangements exemplified by the Pandavas (symbolizing the religious persons and spiritual traditions in this world), directly approaches a teacher for guidance. Although Vedic scriptures have various levels of interpretation (including very subtle ones), the literal meaning also remains valid.

सञ्जय उवाच ।

sañjaya uvāca ।

दृष्ट्वा तु पाण्डवानीकं व्यूढं दुर्योधनस्तदा ।

आचार्यमुपसंगम्य राजा वचनमब्रवीत् ॥ १-२ ॥

dr̥ṣṭvā tu pāṇḍavānikam व्यूढam duryodhanastadā । ācāryamupasaṅgamyā rājā vacanamabravīt ।। 1-2 ।।

sanjaya: Sanjaya; uvaca: said; drishta: seeing; tu: but; pandavanikam: of the Pandavas; vyudham: the deployment of troops; duryodhanah: Duryodhana; tada: then; acaryam: the teacher; upasangamya: approaching; raja: the king; vacanam: speech; abravit: spoke.

Sanjaya said: After observing the Pandava army arranged in a strategic position for the battle, the king (Duryodhana) approached the acharya (Drona, the teacher of military arts) and spoke to him as follows:

Duryodhana is the eldest son of Dhritarastra, appointed by his father as the king of the Kuru dynasty. The word raja ("king") used here indicates that Duryodhana has already advanced his claim to the throne; however Yudhisthira and Dhritarastra are called raja, too.

Drona was appointed by Bhishma as the teacher of weaponry who trained all the Kuru princes, not only the sons of Dhritarastra but also the five sons of Pandu. He was a student of Parasurama, like Bhishma. Drona means "water pot" (or "test tube" if we like): this refers to the fact that Drona was born from the sperm of Bharadvaja Rishi, that was collected in a pot. During his childhood days Drona had become friends with Drupada, the heir to the throne of Panchala. Later, after his marriage with Kripa and the birth of their son Asvatthama, Drona found himself in financial difficulties and went to see his old friend to ask for his help. However, Drupada had recently become king and was still inebriated by his new position, so he treated him offensively. Drona swore to take revenge and decided to train one extraordinary student who would humiliate Drupada - and for this, he first needed to become the military Guru of the most powerful royal family of his times, the Kuru dynasty. Pleased by his favorite pupil's progress, Drona asked Arjuna to repay him for the teachings he had received, and as guru dakshina he ordered him to defeat king Drupada and bring him to his presence as a prisoner. Brooding revenge against Drona, Drupada returned home and started a sacrifice ritual for the birth of Dhristadyumna and Draupadi.

Acharya: this title is given to the best teachers, who oversee the other brahmanas; with time and the degradation of the varnas into castes, this title came to be passed on like a family name without consideration for actual qualifications, just like Gosvami, Pandita or Panda, Vairagi, Dvivedi, Trivedi, Chaturvedi, etc. It is interesting to note that still today, the family name is called "title" by most Indians. We should not become confused by the application of the terms acharya, guru and brahmana to a person who shows traits that are opposite to the character of a brahmana. Gita (18.42) states: samo damas tapah saucam ksantir arjavam eva ca, jnanam vijnanam astikyam brahma-karma svabhava-jam, "Peacefulness, self-control, austerity, purity, tolerance, honesty, knowledge, wisdom and religiousness - these are the natural qualities determining the duties of the brahmana." Again in the Mahabharata (Vana Parva chapter 180) we find: satyam danam ksama-silam anrīyamsam tapo ghr̥ṇa, dryante yatra nagendra sa brahmana iti smrtah, "A persons who is truthful, charitable, forgiving, sober, kind, austere and free from hatred is called brahmana."

It sometimes happens that the unqualified descendent of brahmanas is also called a brahmana out of respect for his family and as a form of encouragement (positive affirmations often inspire people to actually live up to the expressed expectations of others), unless of course he goes too far into adharmic behaviors; in such case he will be called brahma bandhu ("relative of brahmanas) or brahma atma-ja ("son of a brahmana") as demonstrated by Krishna in the Bhagavata Purana to refer to Asvatthama the son of Drona (1.7.19, 1.7.35)

पश्यैतां पाण्डुपुत्राणामाचार्य महतीं चमूम् । व्यूढां द्रुपदपुत्रेण तव शिष्येण धीमता ॥ १-३ ॥

paśyaitāṁ pāṇḍuputrāṇāmācārya mahatīm camūm | vyūḍhāṁ drupadaputreṇa tava śiṣyeṇa dhīmataḥ || 1-3 ||

paśya: look; etam: this; pandu-putranam: of the sons of Pandu; acharya: o teacher; mahatim: great; chamum: army; vyudham: strategic arrangement; drupada-putrena: by the son of Drupada; tava: your; sishyena: (by) disciple; dhimata: intelligent/ wise.

"O acharya, look at this strategic arrangement of the great army of the sons of Pandu, organized by your very intelligent and wise disciple, the son of Drupada."

The intelligent disciple of Drona mentioned in this verse is Dhristadyumna, brother in law and ally of Arjuna. We may remember here that Dhristadyumna, like his sister Draupadi, was born from the sacrificial fire of king Drupada, who wanted to obtain a progeny that would bring about the destruction of his enemy Drona. From Duryodhana's words we can see that he is actually scared and angry about the impressive arrangement of the Pandavas' army, and he blames Drona for it, subtly accusing him of having lavished his best teachings on Dhristadyumna, who is now turning his knowledge and expertise against him. In the eyes of a politician like Duryodhana, this is an unforgivable mistake, but in the eyes of a brahmana it is a commendable choice of selflessness and straightforwardness, that might even have been an indirect act of atonement for his own rash and arrogant behavior that originally antagonized Drupada, or a hidden message about his deep motivations for it. By favoring Drupada's son with his teachings, Drona was showing that his decision to humiliate Drupada was not a personal vendetta, but an important teaching to the royal class about the unwise choice of disrespecting brahmanas and betraying their trust.

A vyuha is a strategic arrangement of troops used in kshatriya warfare; many *vyuh*s of different shapes are recorded in the Vedic literature. Specifically, the vyuha chosen by Dhristadyumna for the beginning of the battle is the one called Vajra, "the lightning", in response to the Garuda or "eagle" formation of the Kauravas. In the Vajra vyuha, where swiftness of attack is paramount, the front line is armed with short-range weapons while the archers come in the second line. In the Garuda vyuha, the kings marched at the head, the horsemen protected the wings, and the elephants formed the outer line of the body. Bhishma rode his chariot in the middle of the formation, as if seated on the eagle. This verse suggests that the proper use of intelligence/ intellect and foresight has a paramount importance in the understanding of life - both material and spiritual levels - because without the proper application of dhi (thinking), everything becomes difficult. There are three basic principles in practical life and work: 1. information, 2. communication, 3. strategy (or planning). These apply to all enterprises, from daily household chores to professional and business ventures, to the highest level of exchanges with the spiritual teacher about transcendental realizations.

अत्र शूरा महेष्वासा भीमार्जुनसमा युधि । युयुधानो विराटश्च द्रुपदश्च महारथः ॥ १-४ ॥

atra śūrā maheṣvāsā bhīmārjunasamā yudhi | yuyudhāno virāṭascha drupadaśca mahārathaḥ || 1-4 ||

atra: there; sura: hero; maha ishu asa: very great archers; bhima arjuna-sama: equal to Bhima and Arjuna; yudhi: in the battle; yuyudhanab: Yuyudhana; viratab: Virata; ca: also; drupadab: Drupada; ca: and; maha-rathab: the great maharatha warrior.

"There are great warriors (maha-ratha) who are extremely skilled bowmen (maheshvasa), of the same valor in battle as Bhima and Arjuna, such as Yuyudhana, Virata, and Drupada."

Bhima and Arjuna are the two most powerful among the five sons of Pandu; Arjuna is the friend of Krishna, the protagonist of the Bhagavad gita. Yuyudhana, also called Satyaki, is a member of Krishna's family; in Dvaraka he is Krishna's charioteer and a very famous archer and warrior, who learned archery from Arjuna. King Virata is Arjuna's ally and the father of Uttara, the wife of Abhimanyu, Arjuna's son. He brought an entire akshauhini of warriors and was killed by Drona during the battle. Drupada is the king of Panchala, sometimes called Yajnasena. He had a quarrel with his old childhood friend Drona, so he performed a homa with the purpose of getting progeny that could avenge the offenses he had received from Drona. From the sacrificial fire both Draupadi and Dhristadyumna were born, and both were instrumental in the destruction of Drona and the Kurus.

Maha-ratha is a particular title of honor conferred on kshatriya warriors, meaning they are so proficient and valiant in battle that they can engage or direct 10,000 ordinary warriors, or their valor is 10,000 times greater than ordinary warriors. The name of the ancient Maratha or Maratta kingdom, that was defeated in rather recent times by the British army, derives from such title. Similarly, an atiratha is a warrior that can fight alone against an unlimited number of warriors. On the opposite side of the scale, a yoddha is an ordinary warrior, and an ardharathi is a less skilled warrior who can only assist others but is unable to tackle an opponent on his own.

धृष्टकेतुश्चेकितानः काशिराजश्च वीर्यवान् । पुरुजित्कुन्तिभोजश्च शैब्यश्च नरपुंगवः ॥ १-५ ॥

dhṛṣṭaketuśchekitānaḥ kāsīrājaśca vīryavān | purujitkuntibhojaśca śaibyaśca narapuṅgavaḥ || 1-5 ||

dhristaketuh: Dhristaketu; cekitanah: Chekitana; kasirajah: the king of Kashi; ca: and; virjavan: great heroes; purujit: Purujit; kuntibhojah: Kuntibhoja; ca: and; saibyah: the king of Sibi; ca: and; nara-pungavah: great leaders of men.

"There are also other great heroes and great leaders of men such as Dhristaketu, Chekitana, the king of Kashi, Purujit, Kuntibhoja and the king of Sibi."

Duryodhana has already mentioned most of the generals that command the 7 akschaubhinis of the Pandava army: Drupada, Virata, Dhristadyumna, Shikhandi, Satyaki (Yuyudhana), Chekitana and Bhima. He now names some of the other great warriors in the Pandava alliance. Dhristaketu is son of Dhristadyumna, nephew of Draupadi and Arjuna, grandson of Drupada. He will be killed by Drona. Another Dhristaketu was also present on the battlefield, the son of Sisupala king of the Chedis and friend of the Pandavas, who brought an akschaubhini battalion to Kurukshetra; after the war his sister married Nakula. Chekitana is a member of Krishna's family, a famous archer in the Yadus' army.

The king of Kashi: Kashi is another name of Varanasi or Benares. This king must have been the successor of Sudakshina, who had been killed in his war against Dvaraka, Krishna's kingdom. The enmity of Sudakshina against Krishna had originated when Sudakshina's father had taken sides with Paundraka, the king of Karusha, when Paundraka had challenged Krishna to battle claiming that he, and not Krishna, was an avatara of Vishnu. In the battle that had ensued, both Paundraka and Sudakshina's father had been killed. Kuntibhoja is the foster father of Kunti and maternal grandfather of the Pandavas, he was fighting on their side. Purujit is Kuntibhoja's brother. Saibya (the king of Sibi), is king Govasana, the father of Devika, second wife of Yudhishthira. The kingdom of Sibi or Sivi was the present Baluchistan, north of river Kabul, known until recently as Sivistan. Its inhabitants were described by Alexander's historians as fierce warriors fighting with clubs, wearing animal skins and shaved heads, worshipers of Shiva, much similar to the people of the Kamboja kingdom.

युधामन्युश्च विक्रान्त उत्तमौजाश्च वीर्यवान् । सौभद्रो द्रौपदेयाश्च सर्व एव महारथाः ॥ १-६ ॥

yudhāmanyuśca vikrānta uttamaujāśca vīryavān | saubhadro draupadeyāśca sarva eva mahārathāḥ || 1-6 ||

yudhamanyuh: Yudhamanyu; ca: and; vikrantah: mighty; uttamaujah: Uttamauja; ca: and; virjavan: heroic; saubhadrah: the son of Subhadra; draupadeyah: the sons of Draupadi; ca: and; sarva: all; eva: maha-rathah: great chariot warriors.

"There are also the mighty Yudhamanyu, the heroic Uttamauja, the son of Subhadra and the sons of Draupadi. All these are maharatha warriors (fighting from their own personal chariots)."

Yudhamanyu and Uttamauja are both sons of Drupada and famous generals in his army. The entire family of Draupadi participated in the war: Drupada the king of Panchala and his sons Dhristadyumna, Shikhandi(ni) who had been adopted, and Dhristaketu, Yudhamanyu, Satyajit and Uttamauja. Saubhadra ("son of Subhadra") is Abhimanyu. Subhadra is wife to Arjuna, sister to Krishna and foster daughter to Vasudeva. She is actually the daughter of Yasoda and Nanda in Gokula, and Vasudeva carried her back to Mathura into Kamsa's prison when he exchanged baby Krishna, leaving him in Gokula in her place. As Rohini, another wife of Vasudeva, was in Gokula at that time in the house of Nanda for shelter and protection, it is sometimes said that Subhadra was actually born from Rohini like Balarama, and not from Yasoda. Subhadra was married by Arjuna with Krishna's help and against the will of Balarama, who had arranged her marriage with Sisupala. Arjuna kidnapped Subhadra while she was visiting a temple before proceeding to her marriage. Actually Subhadra had fallen in love with Arjuna already when for four months Arjuna had stayed incognito in the Yadus' palace disguised as a sannyasi, and he had long and affectionate interactions with Subhadra, to whom he had disclosed his real identity.

The Draupadeyas are the sons of Draupadi, one from each of the five Pandavas: Prativindhya, Srutakirti, Srutasoma, Satanika and Srutasena. All the five sons of Draupadi were killed by Asvatthama in their sleep after the end of the Kurukshetra war; for this dastardly act Krishna proclaimed him to be a non-brahmana but merely a brahma-bandhu (relative of a brahmana) and sentenced him to be disgraced for eternity – it is said Asvatthama is still alive. Draupadi is also a very symbolic character, whose story contains a lot of esoteric meanings. She is worshiped in many places of India as Durga, because she marries Shiva taking a particular form to suit each of the various forms of Shiva; in the court of Virata she is the maidservant of the queen, symbolizing the various secondary forms of the Mother Goddess represented by the Yoginis. In the Mahabharata, Draupadi is described as the daughter of king Drupada of Panchala, and therefore she is also called Panchali. While they were in exile incognito, Arjuna went to the svayamvara of Draupadi and was the one who came up winner in the very difficult archery test. When he returned home with Draupadi, his mother Kunti thought that the "wonderful jewel" Arjuna had brought home was some golden ornament, and told him he had to share that treasure with his brothers. So it was that Draupadi became the wife of all five Pandavas.

The expression sarva eva includes "all these others" and hints that Duryodhana might even be slightly panicking after contemplating the many powerful warriors of the Pandavas' army.

अस्माकं तु विशिष्टा ये तान्निबोध द्विजोत्तम नायका मम सैन्यस्य संज्ञार्थं तान्ब्रवीमि ते ॥ १-७ ॥

asmākaṁ tu viśiṣṭā ye tānnibodha dvijottama | nāyakā mama saīnyasya sañjñārtham tānbravīmi te || 1-7 ||

asmakam: our; tu: but; visishtah: various; ye: those; tan: them; nibodha: please know/ understand; dvijottama: o high among the twice born; nayakah: captains; mama: my; sainyasya: of the army; samjñartham: to perfectly understand; tan: them; bravimi: I explain; te: to you.

"O illustrious twice-born, I am now going to tell you about the various great generals that lead the warriors in our army."

The title of "twice born" (dvija) refers to a person who has been recognized as specifically trained and sufficiently qualified to belong to one of the three higher varnas, i.e. brahmana, kshatriya or vaishya. The "second birth" is given by Guru and Vedic knowledge, while the "first birth" is given by one's seminal parents. The "first birth" by itself is not sufficient in regard to one's qualifications to belong to a particular varna, therefore a "second birth" is required; without such "second birth" one simply remains a sudra, or a non-qualified laborer at the service of more qualified members of society.

Vedic scriptures quote this universally recognized and very clear statement by Atri Rishi: janmana jayate sudra, "by birth, everyone is born a sudra", samskarad dvijah ucyate, "through samskara (ritual purification) one becomes a twice born", veda-pathad bhaved viprah, "by reading the Vedas one becomes a vipra (scholar)", and brahma janati iti brahmanah, "brahmana is one who knows Brahman".

भवान्भीष्मश्च कर्णश्च कृपश्च समितिञ्जयः । अश्वत्थामा विकर्णश्च सौमदत्तिस्तथैव च ॥ १-८ ॥

bhavānbhīṣmaśca karnaśca kṛpaśca samitinjayah । aśvatthāmā vikarnaśca saumadattistathaiva ca ॥ 1-8 ॥

bhavan: your grace; bhishmah: Bhishma; ca: and; karnah: Karna; ca: and; kripah: Kripa; ca: and; samitinjayah: unvanquished; asvatthama: Ashvatthama; vikarnah: Vikarna; ca: and; saumadattih: the son of Somadatta; tatha: also; eva: certainly; ca: and.

"Besides your grace there are Bhishma, Karna and Kripa, never vanquished in battle, as well as Ashvatthama, Vikarna and the son of Somadatta."

Bhishma, originally called Devavrata, was the only surviving son of Santanu and Ganga. The name Bhishma means "terrible" and refers to the vow he took to facilitate his father's second marriage. When Ganga left Santanu, the king fell in love with Satyawati, the daughter of a fisherman, who agreed to the marriage only on the condition that the eldest son of the king would never claim the throne for himself or for his own descendants. Still the greedy fisherman was not happy with such a promise, and he suggested that maybe Devavrata's descendants would not accept to honor such agreement, so Devavrata vowed never to marry and never to have children. For a powerful kshatriya of Devavrata's caliber this was a terrible vow not only for his own personal life, but for the benefit of the kingdom as well - and in fact it had terrible consequences. Although Bhishma never married nor had any child, he is considered the Grandsire of the Kurus due to the care and affection he gave to all the descendants of his brothers, to the point of showing undue leniency for the mischievous plans and activities of Duryodhana and his brothers.

Karna, the greatest warrior on the battlefield and the staunchest ally of Duryodhana, is the great tragic hero of the Mahabharata. At the symbolic level, the five Pandavas represent the five main aspects of Shiva as Mahakala (Yudhisthira, who is a manifestation of Dharma or Yama), Bhairava or Bhimashankara (Bhima, a manifestation of Vayu/ Agni), Lokanatha or Mallikarjuna (Arjuna, a manifestation of Indra), and Vaidyanatha (Nakula and Sahadeva, manifestations of the Asvini kumaras). In this context, Karna (a manifestation of Surya) can be connected to the Hari-Hara or Surya Narayana form that is half Vishnu and half Shiva. In the holy city of Jagannatha Puri, the five main Shiva temples - Yamesvara, Markandesvara, Lokanatha, Nilakantha and Kapalamochana - are called "the five Pandavas", while just outside the city we find the famous Konarak temple, dedicated to Surya Narayana. Unlike the other main elements of the universe - death, wind, the Devas and healing - the Sun is sometimes visible and sometimes not visible to the eyes of the people, and similarly Karna is the "secret" Pandava. Karna was born from the Sun God Surya and Kunti before her marriage and his mother abandoned him, keeping the secret about his birth. He was raised by a chariot maker and his wife, Adiratha and Radha, who took him for their own son, but in spite of his affection for them, Karna was like a young royal eagle raised in a family of ordinary chickens. Duryodhana was the only one who offered him help and consideration, raising him to the rank of kshatriya royalty by appointing him as the king of Anga (a territory including Bengal, Orissa, Madras) when during the svayamvara of Draupadi Karna was declared ineligible to participate because of his family background. This determined the direction of his life, making him the loyal supporter of Duryodhana and the sworn enemy of the Pandavas, and also had a strong influence on the general events, as without Karna's support, Duryodhana might not have had the guts to declare open war against the Pandavas.

Kripa was the "test-tube" son of Saradvana Rishi and the Apsara Janapadi. His twin sister Kripa married Drona, who was also born in a similar way. Kripa survived Kurukshetra and became the preceptor of Parikshit. Ashvatthama is the son of Drona and Kripa. Duryodhana cleverly mentions Kripa and Ashvatthama, close relatives of Drona, in a place of pride within his list of the warriors, hoping to bank on Drona's material attachments. Vikarna is one of the sons of Dhritarastra. He was the only one who spoke in defense of Draupadi when she was insulted in the assembly of the Kurus; however, when it was time to get into battle, he stood by his brother's side. Soumadatti is Bhurisrava, the son of Somadatta. Somadatta was a relative of the Kurus (being the son of Bahlika, brother of Santanu) and took the side of Duryodhana in the war, while his son took the side of the Pandavas. King Pratipa, the descendant of Kuru, had three sons: Devapi (who could not ascend the throne because of a serious skin disease; he went on to become a Rishi), Bahlika (who renounced the throne and went to his maternal grandfather's kingdom) and Santanu (who became king). The several kingdoms of Bahlika ("external provinces") were famous for their horses and because their inhabitants did not follow the Vedic rules. Several non-Vedic kingdoms participated to the war of Kurukshetra, such as the Nishadas, Pulindas, Andhakas, Khasas, Sakas, Tanganas, Kambhojas, Yavanas, Paradas, Kalingas, Amvasthas, Pishachas, Barbaras, Mlecchas, Trigartas, Sauviras, Daradas, Malavas and Salvas. Within the Bahlika regions were the two non-Vedic kingdoms of Madra and Anga. Shalya (brother of Madri the second wife of Pandu) was the king of Madra and Karna was made king of Anga by Duryodhana.

अन्ये च बहवः शूरा मदर्थे त्यक्तजीविताः । नानाशस्त्रप्रहरणाः सर्वे युद्धविशारदाः ॥ १-९ ॥

anye ca bahavaḥ śūrā madarthe tyaktajīvitāḥ । nānāśāstrapraharaṇāḥ sarve yuddhaviśāradaḥ ॥ 1-9 ॥

anye: others; ca: and; bahavaḥ: many; suraḥ: heroes; mad: of me; arthe: for my gain; tyakta: have left; jivitāḥ: lives; nana: various; sastra: weapons; praharaṇaḥ: equipped; sarve: all; yuddha: in battle; viśaradaḥ: experienced.

"Many other heroes are here, all ready to sacrifice their life in battle for my sake. They are well equipped with many different weapons and they are all expert in combat."

Here Duryodhana clearly expresses his ideas about the reasons why he and his allies entered the war - as well as the ideals on which his entire life is built. Mad arthe means "for my gain": there is no doubt that Duryodhana is only motivated by his personal gain, by selfish considerations of aham mama ("I and mine") or ahankara (false material identification) and mamatra (material attachment), that are the very roots of ignorance and delusion. The same mentality was expressed by Dhritarastra in the very beginning of the chapter, so that now we know where Duryodhana learned it. Duryodhana does not fight for the benefit of the kingdom, to defend and protect the prajas. He has no concern about dharma. He only fights for his own sake, to obtain more power and advantages for himself, and similarly he surmises that all the heroes who are fighting on his side are only interested to help him getting more personal power by eliminating the virtuous Pandavas. Such action will be performed by the sheer use of material force, weaponry and military skills.

The expression tyakta jivitāḥ indicates that all warriors enter the battlefield with the clear awareness of the possibility of their death and totally concentrate their attention on the imminent fight, putting aside all other duties as well as concerns and attachments. Only by focusing exclusively and intensely on the task ahead it is possible to achieve success: it is said that a good archer only sees the target and nothing else. However, in this particular context Duryodhana's words could be considered as a bad omen, as in his fear and anger he seems to contemplate the total destruction of his army, as if it had already happened. But Duryodhana is not concerned for their lives and does not feel any compassion or remorse: he is only worried that the destruction of his army may bring about his own defeat. The fact that all these great heroes have prepared themselves to lay down their own lives for his sake only makes him even more arrogant. He sees them as mere instruments for his lust for power, to be gambled and carelessly sacrificed on the battlefield in pursuance of his personal victory.

अप्याप्तं तदस्माकं बलं भीष्माभिरक्षितम् । पर्याप्तं त्विदमेतेषां बलं भीमाभिरक्षितम् ॥ १-१० ॥

aparyāptam tadasmākaṁ balaṁ bhīṣmābhirakṣitam । paryāptam tvīdameteṣāṁ balaṁ bhīmābhirakṣitam ॥ 1-10 ॥ aparyāptam: without measure/ not fully qualified; tad: that; asmākaṁ: our; balaṁ: forces; bhīṣma: by Bhishma; abhirakṣitam: well protected; paryāptam: limited/ competent; tvī: but; idam: this; eteṣāṁ: of these; balaṁ: forces; bhīma: by Bhīma; abhirakṣitam: well protected.

"Our forces are immensely numerous and perfectly protected by Bhishma, while the army of these others (the Pandavas) are limited and well protected by Bhīma."

Bhīma (not to be confused with Bhishma) is the second of the five Pandava brothers, born from Vayu and Kuntī; in the Mahabharata he talks to Hanuman who calls him "brother". Bhīma married Draupadī like his other brothers, but he also married the rakṣasī called Hidimbī and Sīsupalā's sister Kālī. These two marriages are an interesting feature because they connect Bhīma with a fierce and savage aspect that reminds us of the terrifying all-devouring aspect of Shiva (Kālā Bhairava) worshiped by various non-āryan populations. Rakṣasas are certainly non-āryans, but also the people of the kingdom of Chedi are non-āryans following tribal traditions. Hidimbī's son Ghatotkacha used his rakṣasa powers to support the Pandava army at Kurukṣetra, and Kālī's son Sarabha later became the king of Chedi. Duryodhana's army is described as consisting of 11 akṣhaubhinis, while the Pandavas had only 7 akṣhaubhinis. Each of such akṣhaubhinis is said to consist of 21,870 chariots carrying mabaratha, atiratha and ratha warriors, plus the same number of war elephants, 65,610 horsemen and 109,350 foot soldiers. It is calculated that the total number of the combatants at Kurukṣetra was around 4 millions. There is a certain disagreement among commentators about the meaning of paryāptam; pary means "full, complete, counted, perfect", and therefore the compound word could mean both "perfect", "full" or "limited" (as by counting). We know that Duryodhana's army was greater than the Pandavas', but his fear suggests that he might be thinking about the competence of the single generals, too.

अयनेषु च सर्वेषु यथाभागमवस्थिताः । भीष्ममेवाभिरक्षन्तु भवन्तः सर्व एव हि ॥ १-११ ॥

ayaneṣu ca sarveṣu yathābhāgamavasthitaḥ । bhīṣmamevābhirakṣantu bhavantaḥ sarva eva hi ॥ 1-11 ॥

ayaneṣu: in the various strategic positions; ca: and; sarveṣu: all; yathā-bhāgam: as assigned; avasthitaḥ: positioned; bhīṣmam: Bhishma; evābhirakṣantu: should protect; bhavantaḥ: your good selves; sarva: all; eva: certainly; hi: however.

"Now all of you, from your respective strategic positions, should certainly give protection and support to Bhishma, from all sides."

In a battle formation, the general in command is always supposed to remain in the center, while the other generals are positioned in the various relative directions called ayanas, such as east, west, south, north, from which they support the center.

Duryodhana's diplomatic and political abilities are evident in this verse. He is always trying to manipulate people, banking on their emotions, weaknesses and attachments, pitting one against the other, flattering and stinging them in turn, all the time calculating how he could use everyone for his own selfish advantage. This is the clearest evidence that he is not at all fit to sit on the throne and therefore he should not have power over the kingdom. The protection of dharma requires his elimination. Sometimes foolish misinformed people say that the war of Kurukshetra was not different from the Islamic "holy war" or the Christian crusades because it was a dharma yuddha, a "war fought for the sake of dharma". Such people have no idea what dharma really is about.

On a symbolic level, this verse highlights the need to properly understand one's priorities in life, and to center all other concerns around the primary duty of self realization.

तस्य सञ्जनयन्हर्षं कुरुवृद्धः पितामहः ।

सिंहनादं विनद्योच्चैः शङ्खं दध्मौ प्रतापवान् ॥ १-१२ ॥

tasya sañjanayanharṣam kuruvṛddhaḥ pitāmahah | siṃhanādaṁ vinadyoccaiḥ śaṅkhaṁ dadhmau pratāpavān || 1-12 ||

tasya: his; sañjayanam: increasing; harṣam: the emotion; kuru: of the Kurus; vṛddhabh: the eldest; pitamahab: grandfather; simba: lion (like); nadam: sound; vinadya: vibrating; uccaiḥ: loudly; śaṅkham: the conchshell; dadhmau: blew; pratāpavan: the powerful.

The elder of the Kurus, the valiant grandfather (Bhishma), blew his conchshell that vibrated very loudly like the roaring of a lion, giving joy to Duryodhana.

The blowing of conchshells invokes Sri (auspiciousness and beauty), as well as Vijaya (victory), Bhuti (power), Dhruva (determination) and Niti (morality), while it drives away all bad things and bad influences. For a śhatrīya, his śaṅkha-nada, the sound of his war conch, announces the beginning of his sacred duty of standing up in battle to defend dharma. Blowing conchshells in Vedic culture is considered an announcement of some important event, such as the beginning of an arati or ritual ceremony or worship in the temple, etc. This same tradition was found in other non-Abrahamic cultures having access to seas or oceans; in fact the conch can be considered the simplest and most natural form of musical instrument, mystically uniting the various elements of the universe - water from its origin, earth because of its hardness and weight, air and ether because of its penetrating sound, whose echo seems to remain permanently inside its fold. Conches are also used to contain consecrated water for the bathing of the Deities, especially Vishnu. However, the conchshell is not used to bathe Shiva. The conch in itself, and more specifically the type found in the Indian ocean, called Turbinella pyrum, is considered a very auspicious symbol representing Lakshmi or Sri, the Mother Goddess of beauty, wealth, and good fortune - due to its beauty, natural luster, purity, strength and inalterability, and to its association with water. It is said that Lakshmi was born from the ocean, like the conchshell.

The term harṣam indicates excitement, as in roma harṣana, the standing of the hair on the body when some strong emotion is felt. Bhishma blows his war conch to reassure his grandson of his support, as he could understand from Duryodhana's speech to Drona that the prince was uncertain about the result of the war and therefore he was trying to use all its diplomacy to goad his supporters into battle. Bhishma wants Duryodhana to know that he is not offended by what he said, because Drona's silence in front of Duryodhana's increasingly arrogant speech does not bode well. Bhishma is also concerned that the other generals in their army might become offended or doubtful about the battle, so he blows his conchshell to bring back everyone's mind on the task at hand. The blowing of the conchshells is the signal for battle: by initiating the attack, Bhishma takes upon himself the responsibility of the aggression against the Pandavas.

ततः शङ्खाश्च भेर्यश्च पणवानकगोमुखाः ।

सहसैवाभ्यहन्यन्त स शब्दस्तुमुलोऽभवत् ॥ १-१३ ॥

tataḥ śaṅkhāśca bheryaśca paṇavānakagomukhāḥ | sahasaivābhyahanyanta sa śabdastumulo'bhavat || 1-13 ||

tataḥ: then; śaṅkhabh: conchshells; ca: and; bheryab: large drums; ca: and; paṇava: smaller drums; anaka: smaller drums; go-mukhabh: large trumpets; sahasa: together; eva: certainly; abhyahanyanta: were sounded; śab: that; śabdab: sound; tumulab: tumultuous; abhavat: became.

Then there was a tumultuous sound from the simultaneous playing of śaṅkha (conchshells), bherya (large drums), paṇava anaka (smaller drums) and go-mukha (trumpets).

Besides the conchshells, various other musical instruments were adding to the tumultuous sound announcing the imminent battle. A bherya is a very large one-sided drum, with an iron body on which a buffalo skin is stretched. A paṇava is a smaller drum, double-sided; it has a body made of iron or wood, and goat or sheep skin at both ends. The anaka (also called mridanga) is still smaller, barrel-shaped and double-sided (one side is smaller than the other); the body is made of baked clay or wood (preferably jackfruit wood), with multiple layers of goat skin at both ends, with a rim of stronger buffalo skin. A go-mukha is a kind of trumpet/ horn shaped like the face of a cow, resembling a kind of short funnel; at present its use has become very rare.

ततः श्वेतैर्हयैर्युक्ते महति स्यन्दने स्थितौ ।

माधवः पाण्डवश्चैव दिव्यौ शङ्खौ प्रदध्मतुः ॥ १-१४ ॥

tataḥ śvetairhayairyukte mahati syandane sthitau | madhavaḥ pāṇḍavaścaiva divyau śaṅkhau pradadhmau || 1-14 ||

tataḥ: then; śvetaiḥ: white; hayaiḥ: horses; yukte: yoked; mahati: great; syandane: chariot; sthitau: situated; madhavaḥ: Krishna; paṇḍavaḥ: Arjuna; ca: and; eva: certainly; divyau: divine; śaṅkhaḥ: conchshells; pradadhmau: sounded.

At that time Madhava (Krishna, the husband of the Mother Goddess) and Pandava (Arjuna, the son of Pandu) also sounded their divine conchshells, from their great chariot pulled by white horses.

Madhava is one of the names of Krishna, meaning "the husband of Mother", intended as the Mother Goddess. Pandava is one of the names of Arjuna, meaning "the son of Pandu".

This great chariot described in the verse was given to Arjuna by Agni. The Mahabharata explains that as Duryodhana was not willing to give up the capital of the kingdom Indraprastha, the Pandavas decided to make a capital of their own and were allotted Khandava, a wild forest at a certain distance from the populated region. Arjuna dedicated the forest to Agni, the personification of fire, and pleased by this act of devotion, Agni presented him with the wonderful chariot and with special horses that would never become tired or be wounded by ordinary weapons. The color of the horses (white) symbolizes sattva. These four white horses are called Balahak, Megha, Shaibya and Sugriva. On the same occasion, Agni personally asked Varuna for the Gandiva bow and presented this, too, to Arjuna. On the cleared land of Khandavaprastha, the Pandavas built a magnificent city with the help of Maya Danava and with the wealth donated by the many kings who accepted Yudhisthira as the lawful emperor and supported the Pandavas. Crazy with envy, Duryodhana plotted the famous dice game in such a way that Yudhisthira could not refuse to participate, and by treachery he caused the Pandavas to lose everything. Sometimes people criticize Yudhisthira for gambling his capital city and even his own freedom and the freedom of his wife and brothers, saying that it was immoral to gamble his wife like chattel. Thus they compare him to the ordinary degraded sudra gamblers who are ready to stake everything for the mere excitement of the game because they are addicted to the adrenaline rush and to the illusion of easy money. Such foolish and superficial critics, being sudras themselves, are unable to understand the mind of a genuine kshatriya - who only lives for the protection of the prajas.

A kshatriya is constantly ready to stake his own life and indirectly his family in every battle, every day of his life, and his family know this very well. Yudhisthira, the son of Dharmaraja, chose to stake his own person first, and then his own family, in the bloodless attempt to eliminate the danger posed by Duryodhana to the entire kingdom. If Yudhisthira had won the match, Duryodhana would have been forced to back down and acknowledge defeat, just like in an ordinary clash on the battlefield - only with less traumatic consequences for the kingdom. The kshatriya spirit is manifested as bravery in the face of a challenge. Arjuna and the other Pandavas had tried everything to avoid this war, but the determination of Duryodhana and his father Dhritarashtra thwarted all their efforts. Duryodhana even had the audacity to try to make Krishna a prisoner when he volunteered to go to Indraprastha to negotiate a peace agreement. To the request of the Pandavas to have at least one village where the citizens could take shelter in their protection, Duryodhana scornfully replied that he would not allow them even the land sufficient to plant a needle. Now that the military encounter has become inevitable, Arjuna and Krishna blow in their conchshells to show that they are not scared by the tumultuous noise made by the Kaurava army. But there is a difference: the conchshells of Arjuna and Krishna are called divine, whereas Bhishma's conchshell is an ordinary one, and so are the other conchshells of the Kauravas. Some unfortunate people believe that the Pandavas are the villains of the Mahabharata or at least ordinary individuals, but with such judgment these critics demonstrate their total lack of understanding for dharma, as well as their ignorance of what Vyasa wrote in this very text.

पाञ्चजन्यं हृषीकेशो देवदत्तं धनञ्जयः ।

पौण्ड्रं दध्मौ महाशङ्खं भीमकर्मा वृकोदरः ॥ १-१५ ॥

pāñcājanyaṁ hṛṣīkeśo devadattam dhananjayaḥ | paundram dadhmau mahāśaṅkhaṁ bhīmakarmā vṛkodarah || 1-15 ||

pancājanyaṁ: Panchajanya; hṛṣīkeśaḥ: Hrishikesha; devadattam: Devadatta; dhananjayaḥ: Dhananjaya; paundram: Paundram; dadhmau: blew; maha: great; śaṅkhaṁ: conchshell; bhīma: fierce; karma: activities; vṛka: wolf; udarah: belied.

Hrishikesha (Krishna) blew into (his conchshell) Panchajanya, Dhananjaya (Arjuna) (blew) into (his conchshell) Devadatta, and the wolf-bellied (Bhimasena) the hero of formidable deeds (blew), into the huge (conchshell) Paundram.

Hrishikesha is one of the names of Krishna, meaning "the Lord of the senses". Not to be confused with Rishikesha, of "the Lord of the female Rishis", that is one of the names of Shiva Mahadeva, after whom the city of Rishikesha, in the Himalayan foothills, is named. Dhananjaya is one of the names of Arjuna, meaning "conqueror of wealth"; the name refers to the campaign by which Arjuna traveled in various regions to collect funds from allies in order to build their new capital Khandavaprastha and perform the Rajasuya yajna. The description bhīma-karma vṛkodarah refers to Bhīma or Bhīmasena the son of Pandu, who was famous for his insatiable hunger, his powerfully built body and his formidable deeds. The word bhīma means "fierce, terrible, powerful, formidable". Among the five Pandavas, Bhīmasena is considered the wildest and is associated with non-aryan traditions.

The Panchajanya conchshell has a very interesting story. According to Hari vamsa (89:15-17) Krishna killed an asura named Panchajanya who had taken the form of a whale, and from the bones of this asura all the conchshells were created: pancha-jane daitya-risishṇe bhavah pancha-janyah, pancha-jano nama daityah samudre timira-rupa asit. It seems that this lila was performed by Krishna at the completion of his education in the Gurukula; when it was time to offer the guru dakṣiṇa to Sandipani, the Muni asked for the return of his son, who had disappeared into the ocean. Varuna (the Deva of the ocean) informed Krishna that the boy had been devoured by the asura, and therefore Krishna killed it; afterwards Krishna went to reclaim the boy from Yama, and returned him to his parents. Panchajanya is also a name given to a particular type of conchshell that naturally contains a smaller one; the one worshiped in the Chamundesvari temple in Mysore contains two more. According to the Skanda-purana the best conchshells are found in Kusa-sthalis such as Rameshvaram, Sri Lanka, Chennai, and Jagannatha Puri. The other conchshells mentioned in connection to the Pandavas are also characteristically found in holy pilgrimage places: the Deva datta is found near the Tamraparni river (Sangamesvara temple), the Paundra is found where the river Kaveri joins the sea, the Ananta vijaya near Dvaraka (Somanatha temple), the Su ghosha in the Sankha tirtha on the banks of the Yamuna (Vrajamandala), and the Mani pushpa in Agni tirtha in south India (Ramesvaram). These are all sacred conchshells, worthy of being worshiped.

अनन्तविजयं राजा कुन्तीपुत्रो युधिष्ठिरः । नकुलः सहदेवश्च सुघोषमणिपुष्पकौ ॥ १-१६ ॥

anantavijayaṁ rājā kuntīputro yudhiṣṭhiraḥ । nakulaḥ sahadēvaśca sughoṣamaṇipuṣpakau ॥ 1-16 ॥

ananta: endless; vijayam: victories; rajab: the king; kuntī: of Kunti; putrah: son; yudhishtirah: Yudhisthira; nakulah: Nakula; sahadevah: Sahadeva; ca: and; su: good; ghosha: sound; mani: jewel; pushpakau: blossoming.

King Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti, (sounded his conchshell) Anantavijaya, and Nakula and Sahadeva (sounded their conchshells) Sughosha and Manipushpaka.

Yudhisthira means "one who remains firm in battle". Yudhisthira is the eldest of the five Pandava brothers, born from Kunti and Dharmaraja (Yamaraja). In Vedic civilization, seminal birth is not considered more valid than adoption - both the material type and the spiritual type. The spiritual type of adoption is discipleship, by which a person chooses to enter the kula ("family") of a Guru. In India there is still a legal option in court and identity documents for one to use his/her spiritual name as legitimate legal identity and to state "disciple of" instead of "son of". Kunti, too, was an adopted child. Her father Surasena (who was also father of Vasudeva, the husband of Devaki and father of Krishna) gave her in adoption to his dear friend Kuntibhoja who was childless. So she became known as Kunti, although she is also treated by Krishna as his respected aunt; Krishna often addresses Arjuna as Kunti-putra, "son of Kunti". The name putra means "son" and is said to refer to the traditional duty of sons (and daughters, hence putri) to offer oblations to their departed ancestors so that their souls can obtain benefits. Sometimes the comparison is made with a similar word, mutra, that means "urine". The shastras say that there is a great difference between putra and mutra, although they appear to come from one's body in a similar way. To be a real putra one must be worthy of such definition.

Yudhisthira is called raja, "king", because he successfully performed the Rajasuya yajna and was recognized as such by a great number of people, not only by the kings and other great kshatriyas who became allies and paid him tribute, but also by great numbers of subjects who flocked to Khandavaprastha abandoning Indraprastha because of the bad governance of Duryodhana.

काश्यश्च परमेष्वासः शिखण्डी च महारथः । धृष्टद्युम्नो विराटश्च सात्यकिश्चापराजितः ॥ १-१७ ॥

kāśyaśca paramēśvāsaḥ śikhandī ca mahārathaḥ । dhṛṣṭadyumno virāṭaśca sātyakiścāparājitaḥ ॥ 1-17 ॥

kasyah: (king) of Kashi; ca: and; parama: great; ishu asah: archer; sikhandi: Sikhandi; ca: and; maha: great; rathah: chariot; dhristadyumnah: Drishtadyumna; viratah: Virata; ca: and; satyaki: Satyaki; ca: and; apara: by no others; jitah: vanquished.

The great archer the king of Kashi, Maharatha Sikhandi, Drishtadyumna, Virata and Satyaki who was never vanquished in battle, Maharatha Sikhandi is the adopted son/ daughter of Drupada. The story of Sikhandi is very interesting. Originally called Amba, she was the daughter of the king of Kashi and sister of Ambika and Ambalika, who became the wives of Vicitravirya, the brother of Bhishma. When Bhishma took the terrible vow renouncing the kshatriya duty of marrying and having heirs who could take care of the kingdom, neither his step mother Satyawati nor his father Santanu expected that the future children born of the new marriage would be unable to give a descendant to the dynasty. Chitrangada (also called Chitraratha) was killed when he was still very young and Vichitravirya also died young, soon after his marriage and before being able to beget sons. It is said he was afflicted by tuberculosis and a weak heart, so it is possible he was impotent, too. As Vicitravirya was not fit to win himself a wife through the traditional svayamvara system, intended to test the valor and strength of the aspirant, it was decided that Bhishma would go in his stead to represent the dynasty. The powerful and radiant Bhishma won all the three daughters of the king of Varanasi (Kashi), but during the journey to Indraprastha the princesses came to know that they were not going to marry their hero Bhishma, but his weakling brother Vicitravirya. Ambika and Ambalika somehow digested the news as there was no other option but accepting their fate, but Amba had previously been attracted to Salva, one of the kshatriya kings that had participated to the svayamvara and had been defeated by Bhishma.

With Bhishma's permission, Amba ran off to marry Salva, but the proud kshatriya could not bear the idea of being "second choice" or forget having been defeated by Bhishma in public, so he sent Amba back to the hero who had won her. Amba then pleaded with Bhishma to marry her and save her from the shame of having to return unmarried to her father's house, but Bhishma had taken the terrible vow. Amba went to Bhishma's teacher Parasurama begging for help and Parasurama instructed Bhishma to marry Amba, as a kshatriya's dharma demands that he gives shelter to anyone who asks for it. Bhishma chose to honor truthfulness over all other considerations, and Amba started on a desperate revenge mission, going to each and every kshatriya of the land, begging them to avenge her honor by killing Bhishma, but nobody dared to challenge the powerful hero. Finally, Amba approached Shiva Mahadeva. After a long and severe penance, she obtained the boon of becoming a great warrior herself, able to personally kill Bhishma to avenge herself. Shiva instructed her to become the son of king Drupada, and she did.

It is likely that she did not take another seminal birth but she was rather accepted in adoption by Drupada and started to dress, behave and train like a man, because when she finally faces Bhishma in the battle, Bhishma will refuse to fight against her "because she is a woman". Not that women warriors could not fight on battlefields at those times - but certainly Bhishma remembered the anguish of young Amba and the circumstances where her hatred had developed. He felt a deep sense of compassion and sympathy for her and personal guilt for having caused so much pain, so the idea of hurting or even killing her in a fight was intolerable for him.

Dhristadyumna is the son of Drupada and brother of Draupadi; both were born from the sacrificial fire in the ritual performed by Drupada to get a descendant that could destroy Drona. Virata is the father in law of Arjuna's son Abhimanyu. The Pandavas remained incognito at his court for one year, during which Arjuna taught dance and other arts to princess Uttara, the young daughter of Virata, developing a deep relationship of friendship and trust with her. At the end of the incognito period, Arjuna resumed his normal identity as a powerful kshatriya warrior and Virata asked him to marry his daughter, but as Arjuna had a parental and friendly relationship with the very young Uttara, Arjuna suggested that she married his own son, Abhimanyu. Satyaki, also called Yuyudhana, is a famous warrior from the family of Krishna. He accompanied Krishna in the fight against Banasura and also on the occasion when Krishna went to Indraloka to get a Parijata plant for his wife Satyabhama.

A-para-jitab means "not vanquished by others".

द्रुपदो द्रौपदेयाश्च सर्वशः पृथिवीपते । सौभद्रश्च महाबाहुः शङ्खान्दध्मुः पृथक्पृथक् ॥ १-१८ ॥

drupado draupadeyāśca sarvaśaḥ pṛthivīpate । saubhadraśca mahābāhuḥ śaṅkhāndadhmuh pṛthakpṛthak ।। 1-18 ।।

drupadab: Drupada; draupadeyah: the sons of Draupadi; ca: and; sarvasah: all; pṛthivi: of the earth; pate: protector; saubhadrah: the son of Subhadra; ca: and; maha: great; babuh: armed; sankhan: conchshells; dadhmub: blew; pṛthak: separately; pṛthak: separately.

Drupada and the sons of Draupadi, and the mighty-armed son of Subhadra – all of them, o Lord of the Earth, blew into their own conchshells.

Also the other great warriors of the Pandava army proceed to announce their presence on the battlefield and their willingness to stand by the side of their allies. Three generations of warriors are present on the battlefield - from king Drupada to his grandsons, the sons of his daughter Draupadi. The sons of Draupadi are the direct heirs to the throne, as Draupadi is the queen recognized by the rajasuya yajna. Subhadra is Krishna's sister. Abhimanyu, the son of Subhadra and Arjuna, is mentioned together with the highest ranks of royalty on the Pandavas' side. In fact, the son of Abhimanyu, Parikshit, will ascend the throne when the Pandavas retire. The expression pṛthivi pate means "o protector of the Earth", and is meant to remind Dhritarastra that a king's only concern should be the protection of the kingdom and the Earth in general.

स घोषो धार्तराष्ट्राणां हृदयानि व्यदारयत् । नभश्च पृथिवीं चैव तुमुलोऽभ्यनुनादयन् ॥ १-१९ ॥

sa ghoṣo dhārtaraṣṭrāṇāṃ hṛdayāni vyadārayat । nabhaśca pṛthivīm caiva tumulo'bhyanunādayan ।। 1-19 ।।

sah: that; ghoshah: sound; dhartarashtranam: of the (sons/ supporters/ allies) of Dhritarashtra; hridayani: the hearts; vyadarayat: shook; nabhah: the sky; ca: and; pṛthivim: the earth; ca: and; eva: certainly; tumulah: tumultuous; abhyannunadayan: resounded.

That tumultuous vibration shook the hearts of the sons of Dhritarashtra, reverberating into the sky and upon the earth.

Here we see that only Dhritarastra's supporters are affected by the mighty sounds of the conchshells and other musical instruments. In spite of their superior numerical strength, they are clearly afraid because their cause is wrong. Gita will explain how freedom from the fear related to material identification and attachments and from karmic bondage can be attained only by those who act out of duty only, to serve *dharm*a by supporting the progress of the universe - protecting good people, destroying evil doers, and establishing the ethical principles that constitute the eternal norm of the universe.

From Sanjaya's description in these verses, it is evident that he too disapproves Dhritarastra's and Duryodhana's plans that led to the war, and that all his respect and admiration go to the divine personalities of Sri Krishna and Arjuna, and the virtuous Pandavas. Those ignorant fools who believe that the Pandavas are the villains of the Mahabharata have lost all their intelligence and common sense because of offenses they have committed.

अथ व्यवस्थितान्दृष्ट्वा धार्तराष्ट्रान् कपिध्वजः । प्रवृत्ते शस्त्रसम्पाते धनुरुद्यम्य पाण्डवः ॥ १-२० ॥

atha vyavasthitāṇḍṛṣṭvā dhārtaraṣṭrāṇ kapidhvajaḥ । pravṛtte śastraśampāte dhanurudyamya pāṇḍavaḥ ।। 1-20 ।।

atha: then; vyavasthitan: positioned; drishṭva: seeing; dhartarashtran: the (supporters) of Dhritarashtra; kapi: the ape; dhvajah: the flag; pravritte: getting ready; sastra: weapon; sampate: to launch; dhanuh: the bow; udyamya: taking up; pandavah: the son of Pandu.

O king, positioned in his chariot bearing the flag of Hanuman, the son of Pandu (Arjuna) saw the sons and supporters of Dhritarastra. He readied his weapons for battle and picked up his bow, then he spoke these words to Hrishikesha (Krishna).

Kapi-dhvaja is one of Arjuna's many names, as his banner bears the effigy of Hanuman, the great Vanara warrior that fought at Rama's service. There is a story about this fact: just like Bhima, Arjuna too met Hanuman (who is also a manifestation of Shiva). On that occasion, Arjuna mentioned that Rama could have built a bridge made of arrows instead of stones, and demonstrated his skills by creating an arrow bridge across the river, invoking the support of Krishna. When Hanuman tested the strength of the construction, he was surprised to find his Lord Rama under the bridge, supporting it personally. Recognizing the identity of Rama and Krishna, Hanuman pledged his help to Arjuna during the upcoming battle.

It is important to understand that the definition of "monkey" here does not refer here to an ordinary monkey, because Hanuman is not an ordinary monkey, just like Garuda is not an ordinary bird and Sesha is not an ordinary snake. The greatest warriors carried a flag with their personal emblem, so that they could be easily recognizable and only people who were on the same level of skills and strength, or were well aware about the possible outcome of the clash, would face them in the fight. This ethical sense of warfare is the characteristic of the dharmic kshatriyas, who only fight against willing and suitable opponents.

Hrishikesha, the particular name by which Krishna is called in this verse, means "he who can control the senses", and at a more symbolic level refers to the Paramatma, the "soul of the soul", whose direction should drive the white horses of our purified senses to pull the chariot of our body on the battlefield of life. The chariot itself is a powerful symbol, with the horses, the wheels, and its various parts, representing the vehicle constituted by our material body, of which Krishna will speak in the next chapter.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

हृषीकेशं तदा वाक्यमिदमाह महीपते । सेनयोरुभयोर्मध्ये रथं स्थापय मेऽच्युत ॥ १-२१ ॥

hr̥ṣīkeśaṁ tādā vākyaṁidamāha mahīpate । senayorubhayormadhye ratham sthāpaya me'cyuta ॥ 1-21 ॥

hrishikesam: to Hrishikesha; tada: then; vakyam: speech; idam: this; aha: said; mahi: of the Earth; pate: o Lord; arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; senayoh: the armies; ubhayoh: the two; madhye: in the middle; ratham: chariot; sthapaya: position; me: for me; acyuta: Achyuta.

then he spoke these words to Hrishikesha (Krishna). Arjuna said: "O Achyuta (Krishna), please station the chariot (in the middle of the battlefield) between the two armies,"

Achyuta literally means "infallible", or "one who does not fall down", "one who is not affected by time, space and circumstance" and refers to the Lord, who never falls into illusion and ignorance even when he appears in this world to execute his mission. Similarly, all those who take shelter in the Lord, accepting him as their all in all, become achyuta, part of the transcendental "family" or gotra of the Lord, beyond all material identifications of birth or social position. One who treats the members of the "Acyuta gotra" with disrespect actually becomes an offender to the lotus feet of the Lord and loses all his own punya.

Arjuna is asking Krishna to take the chariot in front of the two armies in order to assess the situation and face the inevitable clash. Krishna accepted the position of Arjuna's charioteer to help his friend when the war was declared. On that day both Duryodhana and Arjuna had gone to see Krishna to ask for his assistance; Duryodhana had reached first and as Krishna was sleeping, he had sat at his bed head. More humbly, Arjuna chose to sit at the feet of Krishna's bed, so when Krishna opened his eyes, he saw Arjuna first and asked him what he wished to get from him for the upcoming war - either the powerful army of Dvaraka or Krishna himself, who would not be carrying weapons or engaging in the fight. Duryodhana was worried because the first choice was offered to Arjuna, but with immense relief he saw that Arjuna chose Krishna, so Duryodhana could secure Krishna's mighty army for himself. Thus Krishna became Partha-sa-rathi, the charioteer of Arjuna.

यावदेतान्निरीक्षेऽहं योद्धुकामानवस्थितान् । कैर्मया सह योद्धव्यमस्मिन् रणसमुद्यमे ॥ १-२२ ॥

yāvadetanirīkṣe'haṁ yoddhukāmānavasthitān । kairmayā saha yoddhavyamasmin raṇasamudyame ॥ 1-22 ॥

yavad: as far as; etan: these; nirīkṣe: I will look at; aham: I; yoddhu: to fight; kaman: desiring; avasthitān: gathered/ arrayed; kair: with whom; maya: me; saha: with; yoddhavyam: I am to fight; asmin: in this; raṇa: battle; samyudame: in the strife.

"so that I can see these people who have taken position here desiring the war, the persons against whom I will have to fight in this battle."

The word yavad means "up to", "as far as", "as long as", both in terms of space and time. Arjuna is clearly specifying in his request the purpose of the move, so that the chariot can be directed in the most precise way. Arjuna's request expresses a lingering disbelief at the idea that so many people had openly taken the side of adharma in the impending war, to the point of desiring to fight against him and the Pandavas on the battlefield. So he wants to look in their eyes to find out for himself how determined they are, and how much passionate they are for a fight that has the only purpose of serving the selfish and arrogant schemes of Duryodhana. Good people always expect others to have the same ethical mentality, especially when they think of their own family members, friends and teachers. When we find out that they have actually chosen adharma - for one reason or another - it is a great shock.

The word kaman, "desirous", is plural, and hints at the great number of the fighters. According to the ethical code of the kshatriya warriors, a battle can be engaged only with eager combatants, who are of similar valor and strength and carry similar weapons and are on the same situation - both fighters should be on chariots, or on horses, on elephants, or on foot.

A victory obtained by attacking an enemy that is in an inferior position, who is distracted, unprepared to fight, would be as disgraceful as losing the fight. With this quick inspection of the armies, Arjuna is thus mentally preparing a list of the people he will have to face in the battle, to kill them or to be killed by them.

योत्स्यमानानवेक्षेऽहं य एतेऽत्र समागताः । धार्तराष्ट्रस्य दुर्बुद्धेर्युद्धे प्रियचिकीर्षवः ॥ १-२३ ॥

yotsyamānānavekṣe'haṁ ya ete'tra samāgatāḥ । dhārtarāṣṭrasya durbuddheryuddhe priyacikīrṣavaḥ ॥ 1-23 ॥

yotsyamanan: those who will fight; avekṣhe: I see; aham: I; ye: them; ete: these; atra: here; samagataḥ: gathered; dhartarasthra-sya: of Dhritarastra; durbuddheb: the evil-minded; yuddhe: in the fight; priya: affection/ pleasure; cikīrṣavaḥ: who wish.

"I understand that those who have assembled here are determined to participate to this war and will fight to please the evil-minded son of Dhritarastra."

Dhritarastra was Pandu's elder brother, but as he was born blind he was considered unable to take care of the kingdom, so Pandu ascended the throne. Physical blindness does not automatically disqualify one completely from all activities; one can have eyesight problems or other physical handicaps and yet be knowledgeable, wise, and capable of performing some kind of useful work to earn a livelihood instead of relying on charitable assistance from others. But a king's job requires the full functionality of all senses and a bodily strength and dexterity that is greater than the average, in order to successfully counteract all internal and external threats to the well being, safety and progress of the prajas. If it is unwise to grant a car driving license to a blind person, just imagine how much more dangerous it would be to have a blind person driving an entire government, an entire country. Unfortunately, shortly after he ascended the throne, Pandu had a hunting accident in which he involuntarily killed a Rishi, and he was cursed to die without being able to generate an heir. Therefore he retired to the forest with his two wives Kunti and Madri, determined to engage in severe austerities to expiate his crime, hoping that in such a way he might be able to counteract the curse. Pandu's absence certainly gave Dhritarastra the chance to get some power, with the help of Bhishma and others, who initially must have been mostly concerned about keeping the kingdom in working order until a really qualified heir was produced. Pandu's hopes rose again as Kunti was able to have five good sons by a powerful mantra that called great Devas (Yama, Vayu, Indra, and the Asvini Kumaras) to father children for her husband. Dhritarastra's wife Gandhari also became pregnant at the same time of Kunti. Gandhari's brother Shakuni was probably the one who most encouraged Dhritarastra's hopes of getting his own son on the throne, especially if he could be born before Pandu's first son. When Kunti gave birth first, Gandhari's dream of attaining the prestigious and powerful position of the Emperor's mother vanished. In terrible frustration and anger, she beat her own belly so hard that she had a miscarriage and the fetus came out prematurely as a shapeless lump of flesh. This was certainly not a good sign - the mother evidently had some psychological problems and the general atmosphere in the household was not exactly dharmic and conducive for the proper training of a selfless protector of the kingdom.

Family attachments came into play again and Vyasa was called in to save the poor aborted baby and to fulfill a prophecy by which Gandhari would have 100 sons. So the lump of flesh was expertly divided into several containers and 100 test-tube babies were born. The great patience and leniency of their elders led Dhritarastra and Gandhari to think that it was fully legitimate for them to cut all kinds of corners and even go against the laws of nature and ethics in order to fulfill all their selfish ambitions. It was at that time that Dhritarastra decided that his eldest son Duryodhana would become the king, no matter what it would take. Dhritarastra had hoped that the sons of Pandu would remain in the forest and out of Duryodhana's way, so when Pandu died and the boys came to Indraprastha with their mother Kunti, a long series of evil schemes was hatched to kill the young Pandavas before they became adults. All assassination attempts failed, but the only person who helped the Pandavas at that time was Vidura, and even so he had to do it secretly, because the entire court was expected to support Dhritarastra's schemes.

It is not difficult to believe that the main plotters remained devoid of any sense of justice or compassion towards the innocent young Pandavas, but not even Bhishma raised a finger to stop the mischief, simply because he was too materially affectionate to the poor blind Dhritarastra and his very spoiled son. There was no consideration for the benefit of the kingdom in the entire story, just material affection based on bodily identification and ties, as well as sentimental favoritism. This tendency is also visible today in many people and even in governments that sentimentally choose to give preference and priority to disabled persons or persons of backward origin just because of their handicaps, rather than helping capable, dedicated and qualified candidates that would deserve a better opportunity on consideration of actual merit and for the greatest benefit for society at large.

सञ्जय उवाच ।

sañjaya uvāca ।

एवमुक्तो हृषीकेशो गुडाकेशेन भारत । सेनयोरुभयोर्मध्ये स्थापयित्वा रथोत्तमम् ॥ १-२४ ॥

evamukto hrṣīkeśo guḍākeśena bhārata । senayorubhayormadhye sthāpayitvā rathottamam ॥ 1-24 ॥

sanjayah: Sanjaya; uvaca: said; evam: thus; uktah: spoken; hrishikesah: Hrishikesha; gudakesena: by Gudakesa; bharata: o descendant of Bharata; senayoh: the armies; ubhayoh: the two; madhye: in the middle; sthāpayitva: placing; ratha: chariot; uttamam: excellent.

Sanjaya said: O descendant of Bharata, hearing those words from Gudakesha (Arjuna), Hrishikesha (Krishna) took the wonderful chariot between the two armies.

In this verse Sanjaya addresses Dhritarastra as "descendant of Bharata", hinting that in order to be worthy of his illustrious ancestor, Dhritarastra should have behaved much better. Bharata was a great king, after whom ancient India was named. Arjuna and Krishna are eternal companions and always travel together - just like they are now sitting on the same beautiful chariot. They are the Supreme Guru and the Supreme Personality of Godhead, also known as Nara and Narayana. One is called Gudakesha ("master of sleep") and the other is called Hrishiksha ("master of the senses"), to illustrate the importance of conquering laziness and inertia in the process of attaining control over the senses. Many people think that in order to control the senses and to eliminate material identifications and attachments, one should stop working altogether, give up all activities and duties, as in a sort of endless vacation where the valuable opportunity of human life is wasted without any material or spiritual benefit. Krishna will clearly and abundantly explain that this is not the proper way to perfection.

Material sattva guna that is not supported by active and selfless work and by a truly transcendental consciousness will inevitably slide into tamas. Therefore mere abstention from work just makes one a parasite of society and leads to conscious or subconscious engagement in detrimental activities, such as gossiping, talking about irrelevant topics, meddling into other people's affairs and lives, playing politics and power games at various levels, and pursuing subtle or not-so-subtle sense gratification.

A mendicant sadhu, a sannyasi, does not engage in ritual worship or other ordinary duties, but this does not mean that he is free from all responsibilities. On the contrary, one should renounce ordinary duties only to be able to engage fully and selflessly in the active service to the Supreme and Universal Good.

भीष्मद्रोणप्रमुखतः सर्वेषां च महीक्षिताम् ।

उवाच पार्थ पश्यैतान्समवेतान्कुरुनिति ॥ १-२५ ॥

bhīṣmadroṇapramukhataḥ sarveṣāṃ ca mahīkṣitām | uvāca pārtha paśyaitānsamavetaṅkurūniti || 1-25 ||

bhishmah: Bhishma; dronah: Drona; pramukhatah in front of; sarvesham: all; ca: and; mahi: of the Earth; kshitam: chieftains; uvaca: said; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); paśyaitan: observed; samavetan: gathered; kurun: the Kurus; iti: thus.

In front of Bhishma, Drona and all the chieftains of the Earth, he said, "O son of Pritha (Arjuna), all the Kurus that you have observed are assembled here".

The wonderful conversation between Krishna and Arjuna that constitutes Bhagavad gita is purposefully spoken in the middle of the two armies so that not only Arjuna, but also Bhishma, Drona and all the chieftains who were assembled there will be able to hear Krishna's meaningful instructions. Arjuna and the Pandavas consider Bhishma and Drona are their most respectable elders, worthy of worship. Such is the respect commanded by Bhishma, that at the beginning of the battle Yudhishthira will calmly remove his own weapons and armor and walk fearlessly to the opposite front with folded hands to offer his homage to the Grandsire and ask his permission to engage in the battle. Bhishma is the eldest member of the dynasty, the Grandsire that has single-handedly taken care both of the family and of the kingdom without ever attempting to enjoy the privileges of kingship for himself. He has clearly shown that he is extremely renounced, as well as immensely powerful in personal strength and valor. Bhishma is also not an ordinary person, even if he plays that part in the particular lila of the Mahabharata. In fact he is one of the 12 mahajanas, the greatest spiritual authorities in the history of the universe, together with Brahma, Narada, Shiva, Yama, Kumara, Kapila, Svayambhuva Manu, Prahlada, Janaka, Bali and Vyasa (Bhagavata Purana, 6.3.20).

Drona is the Guru who taught martial arts to all the royal princes - both the Pandavas and the sons of Dhritarastra - therefore Arjuna owes him total obedience and respect. According to etiquette, in the presence of such elders one is expected to be submissive and humble, accepting whatever order they may decide to give, but here both Bhishma and Drona are standing between Arjuna and Dharma, defending the evil schemes of Duryodhana and his father. Krishna already knows what bothers Arjuna, and does not hesitate to take the position of the teacher even in front of such great personalities that apparently are his elders, too. So he calls Arjuna "son of Pritha" (Kuntī) to remind him that they are cousins, close relatives and not just friends of the same age, and that Arjuna should make his mother proud by behaving bravely and in accordance to dharma.

By choosing to use the expression "the Kurus" to refer to the supporters of Dhritarastra and Duryodhana, Krishna is making an ironic remark. Both the sons of Pandu and the sons of Dhritarastra are descendants of the famous king Kuru, but Dhritarastra has chosen to claim such great ancestry exclusively for himself and his sons, on the false pretext that Pandu was not the "real father" of the Pandavas, although in Vedic society there is absolutely no difference between a seminally generated child and an adopted one. With this verbal jugglery Dhritarastra was attempting to deny the legitimate rights of the Pandavas to the throne, but Krishna turns the joke back against him. Dhritarastra's sons may be descendants of Kuru, but the Pandavas are much more than that: they are the valiant sons of whom Pandu was extremely proud, but they are also manifestations of the most powerful Devas of the universe.

तत्रापश्यत्स्थितान्पार्थः पितृनथ पितामहान् । आचार्यान्मातुलान्भ्रातृपुत्रान्पौत्रान्सखींस्तथा ॥ १-२६ ॥

tatrāpaśyatsthitānpārthaḥ pitṛnatha pitāmahān | ācāryānmatulanbhrātr̥putrānpautrānsakhīm̐stathā || 1-26 ||

tatra: there; apasyat: he saw; sthitān: standing; parthab: the son of Pritha (Arjuna); pitṛin: fathers; atha: as well as; pitamahān: grandfathers; acaryan: teachers; matulan: maternal uncles; bhrātrin: brothers; putran: sons; pautran: grandsons; sakhin: friends; tatha: as well.

The son of Pritha (Arjuna), saw there standing (on the battlefield) fathers, as well as grandfathers, teachers, uncles, brothers, sons, nephews, friends,

Vedic civilization gives great importance to family as the building block of society, because it is in the family that a child is nurtured with love and affection, constant care, and the emotional feelings that will determine his/her future perspective on him/herself, others, the world and life itself. The first period of one's childhood, starting with conception and pregnancy, is usually the most influential - both in a positive and negative sense - for absorbing the basic foundations of ethical behavior, personal motivations, the general understanding of knowledge and reality, and the life example of those who live around us and become our role models.

Matulab is the maternal uncle. Contrarily to what some people think, traditionally mother's family members and especially mother's brothers, have a great importance in the life of a child. The relationship between brothers and sisters used to be very strong, and it is still celebrated in the popular festival called raksha-bandhan, by which the brother solemnly takes the responsibility to protect his sister from all dangers. Bhratrin or "brothers" also includes cousins, as the Vedic family mentality tends to have all children living together without discriminations about who is the father or mother of each single child. On the other hand, seniority is considered extremely important; so a first born has more responsibilities towards his/her siblings, and therefore is entitled to more respect. Arjuna's concern is not just about his own relationship with the people he sees, because in that case he would not mention "fathers" or "grandfathers", as neither Pandu nor Vasudeva or Surasena (or even Vidura or Dhritarastra) were present. Therefore we cannot say that Arjuna's sadness comes from his own material identification and attachments: what horrifies him is not the imminent loss of his dear kith and kin, but the extent of the madness and damage for the entire kingdom and for the entire planet that Duryodhana has brought about because of his stubborn selfishness and arrogance.

All the warriors positioned on the battlefield in both armies for that fratricidal war were related to each other by friendship or family ties, and Arjuna understands that their hostility is due not to personal reasons or incompatibility of interests, but is simply caused by the determination of Dhritarastra's son, who has manipulated them in a way or another to force them into such a deadly predicament. All those people were just instruments that would have to clash against each other because of someone else's choices, and they were not really responsible for the disaster they will cause and suffer. The worst thing that one can do is taking action without understanding the import of the future consequences of such action, for oneself and for others, and for the entire world as well. Foolish people think that their responsibility ends with the completion of the action they have decided to take - getting the job done, whether it is securing an income for their family, putting food on the table, cleaning up their own house, taking a vacation, or purchasing some consumers' goods. They prefer not to think about the exploitation and destruction of resources or the various other types of damages caused by the company that employs them, for the sufferings of the innocent animals that are killed in the process, for the pollution and degradation of the environment, for the destruction of cultures, or any other disaster that will be triggered by the consequences of consequences - such as global warming, widespread psychological imbalances, and a general rise of Adharma. But the price will have to be paid, sooner or later.

In this verse and in the next, Arjuna is called "son of Pritha" and "son of Kunti" to emphasize the fact that he considers himself one of the many children of Mother Earth (Pritihvi), who is affectionate to all her progeny. Just like the Lord is the father of all creatures, Earth/ Nature is their mother.

श्वशुरान्सुहृदश्चैव सेनयोरुभयोरपि । तान्समीक्ष्य स कौन्तेयः सर्वान्वन्धूनवस्थितान् ॥ १-२७ ॥

śvaśurānsuhṛdaścaiva senayorubhayorapi | tānsamīkṣya sa kaunteyaḥ sarvānbandhūnavasthitān || 1-27 ||

svasuran: fathers in law; subridah: well wishers; ca: and; eva: certainly; senayob: the armies; ubhayob: the two; api: also; tan: them; samīkṣhya: seeing; sab: he; kaunteyah: the son of Kunti (Arjuna); sarvan: all; bandhun: tied to each other; avasthitan: placed.

fathers in law and well-wishers (facing each other) in the two armies. The son of Kunti (Arjuna) saw all those people tied to one another by ties of affection, positioned there (for the battle).

The word subridah is usually translated as "well wisher", in its most literal sense, because it refers to a person who has very good sentiments for us in his/her heart and wants us to be blessed with all good things, even if s/he is not our relative or friend in the ordinary sense. The word bandhu refers to loving ties, to a close relationship that unites people intimately, either on the level of friendship or on the level of family relations. In either case, there is a strong and sincere affection involved, and not just some superficial kinship based on social obligations and conventions. Not all family relationships can be categorized as such. Sharing the same blood is not a guarantee that two people will have true affection for each other, or even just understand or like each other. History and stories from all cultures witness to that, and in addition, the bad influence of Kali yuga, the age of quarrel and falsity, can only make things worse.

Of course we can still have affection and care for a friend or relative that has different qualities and inclinations from us, even considerably. Love and affection depend on emotions, and can be shared between people who are very different from each other. Husband and wife, for example, may not be able or inclined to engage in the same type of activities, but they find happiness in each other's company anyway just because they love and care for each other. Similarly, a parent will love his or her children, even when they are babies and they have not manifested any qualities yet. However, these emotional ties can somehow be missing, especially in case of persons who have a bad nature and are incapable of loving - persons who prefer to hate, envy, despise or fear others, or are so selfish that they have no concern for others and see everyone just as an instrument to be manipulated and exploited in order to get some personal benefit and gratification for oneself. This can be found even in the most intimate relationships - parents towards children, children towards parents, husband towards wife, wife towards husband, and a sibling towards another, and even more so among general relatives and kinsmen. In this case, according to the Vedic tradition, we are not expected to remain faithful to such relationships if they lead us away from dharma and into a state of degradation and misuse of the opportunity of human life. Of course everybody has defects and everybody can make mistakes, so we should allow ample opportunities to our next of kin so that they can understand things better and reform themselves. We should not abandon a person who depends on us just because of some disagreement or even some occasional fighting, and especially we should not blame others for not being what we imagined and expected them to be.

कृपया पर्याविष्टो विषीदन्निदमब्रवीत् ।
kṛpayā parayāviṣṭo viṣīdannidamabravit ।

अर्जुन उवाच ।
arjuna uvāca ।

दृष्ट्वेमं स्वजनं कृष्ण युयुत्सुं समुपस्थितम् ॥ १-२८ ॥

dr̥ṣṭvemaṁ svajanaṁ kṛṣṇa yuyutsuṁ samupasthitam ॥ 1-28 ॥

kṛipaya: by compassion; para: supreme/ transcendental; ayavishtab: pervaded; vishidan: lamenting; idam: this; abravit: said; arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; drishṭva: seeing; imam: these; sva: own; janam: people; krishna: o Krishna; yuyutsum: in a fighting spirit; samupasthitam: present.

was overwhelmed by a great compassion, and spoke these pained words. Arjuna said: "O Krishna, after seeing all these kinsmen, assembled here ready to fight against each other (in this fratricidal war),"

Arjuna's compassion is called kṛipā para, "a transcendental compassion", because he is aware of all the results of the impending disaster, not only in this life but also in future lives. His compassion is not merely material, but spiritual as well. Also, he is not only concerned about the fate of the warriors that are present on the battlefield, but about the future of their families, of society and the kingdom, and the world in general, too. Vishada, or lamentation, gives the name to the first chapter of Bhagavad gita: Arjuna vishada yoga. Some commentators dislike this title, arguing that "lamentation" has nothing to do with yoga - otherwise all the people in the world, including the less evolved and uncultured, would have to be considered very advanced yogis. Such reasoning shows a serious lack of understanding, not to speak of the lack of respect demonstrated towards the shastra. A truly intelligent person is humble and always questions his/her own understanding first, whenever contradictions or irrelevant points seem to appear in the genuine shastra.

The first step in the journey of spiritual realization starts with the understanding of the reality of sorrow in life: this material world has been designed to be temporary, plagued by ignorance and sufferings, so that the frustration generated by the friction between its characteristic nature and the soul's aspirations for eternity, knowledge and bliss can cause a crisis of consciousness. This is why suffering has been engineered as the main ingredient of this world - as caused by one's own body and mind (adhyatmika klesa), by other living entities (adhibhautika klesa) and by the natural forces controlled by the archetypal personifications (adhidainvika klesa). There is no escaping these threefold sufferings, no matter how hard one tries, because they are inherent in material nature.

Evolution is always triggered by a crisis. When everything is well, people tend to slack down and become complacent and lazy, while challenges and tests help us to learn and improve ourselves. Some students hate and dread the time when exams come, but the crisis of the impending trial spurs them to put an extra effort in their studies, especially in the earliest stages of one's education, when the spontaneous taste for knowledge has not developed yet. In his compassion, Arjuna is teaching us by playing the role of the conditioned soul who is overwhelmed by lamentation and confusion, but we should not think that he is really under the power of ignorance. Whenever a great transcendental personality descends in this world, a drama is organized to illustrate the teachings that need to be imparted on mankind. Another famous avatara, the Buddha, centered his entire teaching plan on the understanding of suffering, by explaining the Four Noble Truths: 1. the Truth of suffering: the world is full of sufferings; life that is not free from passion and desire is always heavy with sufferings because in this world everything is temporary and imperfect, 2. the Truth of the cause of suffering: undoubtedly the cause of suffering is found in the desires of the body and in the illusions of the mind, 3. the Truth of cessation of suffering: if we can eliminate the attachment to desires and passions, suffering automatically ceases, 4. the Truth of the cessation of the cause of suffering: in order to attain this level of detachment from desires and passion, one must follow the Noble Eightfold Path: Right vision, Right thinking, Right speaking, Right behavior, Right livelihood, Right effort, Right awareness, Right dedication. Which, in other words, means serving dharma as taught in Gita.

सीदन्ति मम गात्राणि मुखं च परिशुष्यति । वेपथुश्च शरीरे मे रोमहर्षश्च जायते ॥ १-२९ ॥

sīdanti mama gātrāṇi mukhaṁ ca pariśuṣyati । vepathuśca śarīre me romaharṣaśca jāyate ॥ 1-29 ॥

sīdanti: faint; mama: my; gaṭrani: limbs; mukham: mouth; ca: and; parishushyati: is drying completely; vepathus: trembling; ca: and; sarire: body; me: my; roma harshab: hair standing on end; ca: and; jayate: becomes.

"I feel my limbs losing their strength and my mouth drying up. My body is trembling and my hair is standing on end."

In this verse we find the clear description of a very powerful emotion that causes visible physical symptoms. There are many negative and positive emotions that have such an effect, both on the material and the spiritual level - including the highest level of transcendental ecstasy known as mahabhava. An apparently pitiable condition in devotional service may appear to be distressing to the inexperienced student, but the feelings of the devotee in this condition are actually ecstatic. Because of the agitation of the pranas in the body, normal breathing is disrupted (temporarily suspended, slowed down, or fastened considerably), the energy drains from the limbs sometimes to the point of losing external consciousness, hairs stand on end and the skin can get goose pimples or rashes and eruptions, the eyes and/or the mouth widen uncontrollably, the muscles contract to the point of partially retracting limbs into the body, the voice falters or babbles or disappears altogether. There can be a sudden fever, cold or hot tears (respectively for joy or anger/sorrow), hot or cold perspiration (respectively for relief or fear), a change in the color of the face and sometimes even of the body and hair, reddening and itching sensation in the eyes, and in some cases, foam at the mouth. These are expressed in 31 emotions as disappointment, lamentation, humility, guilt, fatigue, intoxication, pride, doubt, apprehension or fear, intense feelings of attraction, madness, forgetfulness, disease, confusion, death, laziness, inertness,

गाण्डीवं संसते हस्तात्त्वक्चैव परिदह्यते । न च शक्नोम्यवस्थातुं भ्रमतीव च मे मनः ॥ १-३० ॥

gāṇḍīvaṁ sraṁsate hastāttvakcaiva paridāhyate । na ca śaknomyavasthātum bhramatīva ca me manaḥ ।। 1-30 ।।

bashfulness, concealment, remembrance, argumentativeness, anxiety, thoughtfulness or moroseness, endurance, happiness or jubilation, eagerness, haughtiness, envy, impudence, dizziness and alertness. The feelings of disappointment are caused by inner conflict when one is forced to behave in a way that is contrary to one's desires and expectations - specifically, to perform an action that is perceived as unethical, detestable, forbidden, or dishonorable. Lamentation (as in Arjuna's case) is a stronger feeling and is experienced in a very difficult situation, especially when one's purpose of life is questioned or endangered, when there is no way out of an impending disaster, or when one feels guilty in some way. Fear is certainly one of the emotions that can cause such symptoms, but in Arjuna's case it is not fear for himself, but rather fear for the far-reaching consequences of the war for the kingdom and the entire world. It is fear for the global disaster, a virtuous fear born from the compassion for the immense amount of sufferings that could have been avoided if Duryodhana had been more reasonable. There is not one single word, in the original text of Gita, from which we can draw the conclusion that Arjuna's mind is disturbed by the fear of losing his own life. The previous verses have clearly expressed his horror for a very unjust situation where people were forced to fight against their dearest friends and relatives, and no mention was made about Arjuna's own personal danger. The next verses will repeat the same concerns. Arjuna does not see any good coming from this war, where people who are supposed to be affectionate to each other and to cooperate for the progress of society, will instead kill each other. In fact, Arjuna clearly and repeatedly states that he prefers to sacrifice his own life, to die without even trying to defend himself, rather than becoming responsible for such a disastrous massacre. Verses 37 and 38 of this chapter clearly say that Arjuna knows that the assembled warriors are not aware of the consequences of the battle for their own families and for society in general. Some commentators offensively argue that Arjuna has sunk so deeply in his hysterical fears and delusion that he is saying exactly the opposite of what he really thinks. If this were true, Krishna at least would have detected the lie and corrected Arjuna, telling him very clearly that he was actually just fearing for his own life. On the contrary, in verses 35 and 36 of the second chapter Krishna clearly states that only superficial and envious people would think or insinuate that Arjuna is a coward. Showing fear for one's own life while facing a battle is the greatest disgrace for a kshatriya and demonstrates his total lack of qualification, and this is obviously not Arjuna's case. The subsequent instructions offered by Krishna to Arjuna are also in accordance with the nature of Arjuna's feelings as clearly expressed by him.

gandivam: Gandiva (the bow); sraṁsate: slips; hastat: from the hand; tvak: the skin; ca: and; eva: certainly; paridāhyate: is burning; na: not; ca: and; śaknomy: I am able; avasthātum: to remain; bhramatī: is confused; eva: certainly; ca: and; me: my; manaḥ: mind.

(my bow) Gandiva slips from my hand and (I feel) my skin burning. I cannot keep my stand any more and my mind is confused."

Gandiva is the name of Arjuna's famous bow. It is said it was made by Brahma himself and gifted to Arjuna by Agni the Deva of fire, as a token of gratitude when Arjuna offered him the Khandava forest, full of medicinal herbs. On that occasion, Agni also offered the famous Chakra to Krishna.

In this verse, Arjuna mentions some more of the physical symptoms of his strong emotions. The burning sensation of the skin seems to be particularly important, because it shows that the temperature of his body has risen - more likely a result of anguish and anger than of fear, that usually tends to lower the body's temperature, as raja heats the body while tamas creates coldness.

Arjuna is not ashamed to confess that his mind is confused and doubtful, and that the inner conflict is sapping his energies. Confusion is generated when the mind is contemplating a choice between two possible courses of action but is unable to decide which way to go. Both options appear to be equally unfeasible or painful, or leading to very similar consequences. In this situation, simultaneous impulses pull the will power in opposite directions, creating a tension that can become unbearable; the stress can be much more exhausting than any hard work, even if nothing is accomplished in the process.

निमित्तानि च पश्यामि विपरीतानि केशव । न च श्रेयोऽनुपश्यामि हत्वा स्वजनमाहवे ॥ १-३१ ॥

nimitāni ca paśyāmi viparītāni keśava । na ca śreyo'nupaśyāmi hatvā svajanamāhave ।। 1-31 ।।

nimitāni: cause (of suffering)/ instrument; ca: and; paśyāmi: I see; viparītāni: opposite; keśava: O Keshava; na: not; ca: and; śreyah: good result; anupaśyāmi: I see; hatva: by killing; sva-janam: one's own (family and friends); ahave: in battle.

"O Keshava (Arjuna), I see (great) cause of sufferings in front (of us) /mere instruments turned one against the other. I do not foresee any good coming from killing one's own (friends and relatives) in a war."

In this verse Krishna is called Keshava, "the killer of the Keshi demon", to indicate that he can destroy the demons of doubt and confusion. Keshi was one of the asuras who became allies of Kamsa and went to Gokula Vrindavana to try to kill Krishna in his childhood. Another meaning of Keshava is given as follows: Ka refers to Brahma, Isa refers to Shiva, and van or vati means "that gives power to", indicating that Krishna is none other than Vishnu himself. Depending on the context, the name Ka is sometimes used also to indicate Vishnu, Yama, Garuda, or the Atman (which, incidentally, reminds us of the ka of the ancient Egyptian religion). In this way, the name Keshava can come to convey a great number of meanings.

The words nimitani viparitani may be interpreted in two different ways: a) cause of suffering and b) instruments turned against each other. In this verse the two meanings reinforce each other beautifully, creating a double-entendre. What really troubles Arjuna is the fact that the warriors on the battlefield are forced to fight against each other, forgetting their mutual affection. In the kshatriya code of honor, fighting is a religious duty when it is aimed at protecting oneself and one's dependents from the attack of evil aggressors. It is said that, after death, the warriors killed in a righteous battle attain the same exalted position of the sannyasis who engaged in yoga. However, the act of killing does not give the same result of being killed: even the righteous killing of aggressors in a fair battle involves a sinful reaction, therefore the kshatriyas must perform purification rituals and distribute charity and do other good deeds. If killing a criminal that is engaged in a violent act and a hostile invader is a sin, how more serious will be the karmic consequences of killing people who are fundamentally good, and have been forced to gather on the battlefield in a way or another, against their will and interest.

Svajanam or "one's own people" indicates the natural hesitation that a good person feels about fighting against his own people – members of one's family, one's lineage, one's community, one's country, one's culture, one's ideology, one's religious tradition. In ordinary circumstances, loyalty to these forms of kinship is advisable because it fosters mutual support, encouragement and cooperation, but such considerations are relative and not absolute. We should never forget our real nature and purpose of life, because when we forget them, we become prisoners of the temporary material perception. Identification and attachment with such groups are considered expanded forms of selfishness and delusion and one should not hesitate to give them up for the defense of dharma. Krishna calls this hesitation and material identification as "weakness of the heart".

न काङ्क्षे विजयं कृष्ण न च राज्यं सुखानि च । किं नो राज्येन गोविन्द किं भोगैर्जीवितेन वा ॥ १-३२ ॥

na kāṅkṣe vijayaṁ kṛṣṇa na ca rājyaṁ sukhāni ca । kiṁ no rājyena govinda kiṁ bhogairjīvitena vā ॥ 1-32 ॥

na: not; kāṅkṣe: I desire; vijayaṁ: victory; kṛṣṇa: o Krishna; na: not; ca: and; rājyaṁ: the kingdom; sukhani: the joys; ca: and; kim: what; no: to us; rājyena: with a kingdom; govinda: o Govinda; kim: what; bhogair: with the pleasures; jīvitena: with life; va: even.

"O Krishna, I do not desire victory, nor the joys of/or a kingdom. O Govinda (Krishna), what is a kingdom to us, what are the pleasures of/or life itself,

The name Krishna is explained as having different meanings. One is "black", and refers to the dark complexion of Krishna's body, compared to a blue lotus. Another is "attractive", as deriving from the root karsh. In the previous verses, Krishna has been addressed with a series of meaningful names:

- * Madhava (14, 37), to mean that he is the consort of the Mother Goddess
- * Hrishikesha (15, 21, 24), to mean that he perfectly controls the senses
- * Acyuta (21), to mean that he is never diminished by any position
- * Keshava (31), to mean that he can destroy the demon of doubt

In this verse Krishna is called Govinda, "he who knows and protects earth, the cows and the senses of the living beings" - as the word go has all these meanings. This name refers to the healthy and dharmic enjoyment of the pleasures of this world, as opposed to the greedy and adharmic lust for possession and domination that leads man to commit heinous crimes and cause the degradation of society and unnecessary sufferings to everyone. Similarly, in verses 36, 39 and 44 Krishna will be called Janardana, "he who animates the people", to associate the healthy pleasures of life with life itself and the pursuit of happiness. Another implication of the use of this name consists in remembering that Krishna is he who inspires people into action. The name Madhava, used in verse 14 and again in verse 37, implies that being the husband of the Mother Goddess, Krishna is the father of all living beings and therefore he cares for their happiness and protection, because they are his family. The name Madhusudana, used in verse 35, means "the slayer of demon Madhu", and also implies the idea that Krishna can destroy all inauspiciousness.

In this verse, Arjuna clearly states that he is not interested in any personal benefit that may come from victory in the battle - not even in victory itself. So many times he has already demonstrated that he is fully renounced, although he is faithfully committed to performing all his duties - to the family, to the kingdom, to society at large. He has come to the battlefield because that his duty is to protect the kingdom and the people - but what will the benefit be, if everybody gets killed?

येषामर्थे काङ्क्षितं नो राज्यं भोगाः सुखानि च । त इमेऽवस्थिता युद्धे प्राणांस्त्यक्त्वा धनानि च ॥ १-३३ ॥

yeṣāmarthe kāṅkṣitaṁ no rājyaṁ bhogāḥ sukhāni ca । ta ime'vasthita yuddhe prāṇāṁstyaktvā dhanāni ca ॥ 1-33 ॥

yesam: of them; arthe: for the sake; kāṅkṣitam: is desired; nab: by us; rājyaṁ: kingdom; bhogah: pleasure; sukhani: joys; ca: and; te: them; ime: these; avasthita: situated; yuddhe: in battle; pranan: the life; tyaktva: giving up; dhanani: the riches; ca: and.

when those for whose sake we desire (such good things as) kingdom, pleasures and happiness, all these (people) who are positioned here are going to sacrifice their life and possessions, the teachers, the fathers, the sons, as well as grandfathers,

Vedic civilization is organized according to the principle of para upakara, or "living/ working for the benefit of others". In this way all individuals work to sustain one another, generating a positive sense of cooperation, affection and support - the fundamental principle that is also called dharmā.

The natural tendency of the soul is to serve, to do something for others - either as a social occupation, or in one's personal dealings especially with family, friends, etc. The underlying principle is reciprocity - the recognition of the care and affection that other people have lavished upon us since birth, and of our debt towards them and our duty towards the next generations. This ensures that each individual is very well taken care of, because all the members of society and family can do much more for each individual much more than what s/he would be able to do for him/herself. For this purpose, a role in society is assigned according to the guna and karma of the individual's body and mind. However, excessive identification with one's material body and mind (abhikāra) creates self-centeredness and selfishness - where the "self" is mistakenly perceived as the material body and mind. Then the natural tendency to serve is transferred to what is perceived as the benefit of one's material body and mind, with the endless pursuit of one's own sense gratification at the gross and subtle levels. In this way all individuals work against one another, generating a negative sense of competition, envy and hostility - that are the opposite of the fundamental principle called Dharma, and are therefore called Adharma. A folkloristic story of rather recent origin within the New Age movement gives a similar message by offering an explanation about the difference of "heaven" and "hell". A man is visiting both, and he notices that in both cases there are lots of people sitting at a banquet, with a great table filled with all types of wonderful foods. And in both cases, people have very long spoons that it is impossible to use to feed oneself. The difference is that in heaven people enjoy by feeding each other across the table, while in hell people insist in trying to get the spoon each into their own mouth and they quarrel among them, snatching one another's spoon to try and see if the neighbor's spoon will work better than one's own. Now, we need to go one step beyond this, because this image of heaven and hell is nothing more than the conditions of human society in this universe, because of the different perception of the meaning of "self".

In a hellish society, the "self" is believed to be the material body and mind. In a heavenly society, the "self" is perceived as a healthy and active worker (karmachari) in the system of varnashrama dharma, who performs his/her duties without concern for one's personal advantage but as a natural service to the Virat Purusha, the Universal Form of God described in the Purusha sukta, and whose bodily limbs constitute the different members of society. At the transcendental level, the "self" is realized as the Supreme Brahman, of whom all the jivatmas are parts and parcels. This vision raises us beyond the duality of this world and integrates our vision of all existences in the greater understanding of things, both material and spiritual. For the practical purposes of living in this universe, we need to move from the hellish mentality to the heavenly mentality in order to support the maintenance of the universe, but in order to attain liberation we need to situate ourselves on the level of transcendental awareness.

The term tyakta, "giving up" as referred to the life and possessions of the warriors gathered on the battlefield, obviously does not mean that they are already dead or fallen into extreme poverty. However, it is a fact that a true kshatriya must go into the battle in a spirit of total renunciation, giving up all attachments to one's wealth and even to one's life, otherwise the thoughts about these will create the fear of losing them, and fear is the last thing that a kshatriya can entertain while on the battlefield, and not only out of considerations of personal honor. Fear distracts, paralyzes and robs one of all intelligence, strength and wisdom, and triggers foolish actions that will seriously endanger not only the success of the battle but even one's very own life for which one fears.

आचार्याः पितरः पुत्रास्तथैव च पितामहाः । मातुलाः श्वशुराः पौत्राः श्यालाः सम्बन्धिनस्तथा ॥ १-३४ ॥

ācāryāḥ pitarāḥ putrāstathaiva ca pitāmahāḥ । mātulāḥ śvaśurāḥ pautrāḥ śyālāḥ sambandhinastathā ॥ 1-34 ॥

acaryah: teachers; pitarah: fathers; putrah: sons; tatha: also; eva: certainly; ca: and; pitamahab: grandfathers; matulab: maternal uncles; svasurah: fathers in law; pautrah: grandchildren; syalah: brothers in law; sambandhinab: bound by ties (of affection); tatha: also.

teachers, fathers, sons, as well as grandfathers, uncles, fathers in law, nephews, brothers in law, relatives and friends bound by reciprocal relationships,

Family is certainly very important for the progressive development of the individual and of society as well. The school of life is all about relationships, how we deal with each other, how we relate with each other, and how we love and support each other, how we learn to sacrifice ourselves for the greater good and to give up our selfish attachments. However, this applies to the ideal family life, that is governed by dharmic principles. On the other hand, the materialistic tendency towards adharma that is found in conditioned souls can easily transform family life into a dark hellish hole (andha kupa), as explained by Prahlada in Bhagavata Purana (7.5.5). The sense of bodily identification and material attachment grows from the physical attraction between man and woman - called brida, the "knot of the heart" (pumsab striya mithuni-bhavam etam tayo mitho brida-granthib abub, 5.5.8).

As explained by many great souls, including Kapila (3.26.2) and Rishabhadeva (5.5.14), this knot must be cut by applying knowledge. In the absence of proper knowledge, ignorance thrives, and ignorance causes people to mistake dharmā for adharma, and adharma for dharmā (18.32). Thus, instead of becoming a support for the progress of the individual and society, family can become the cause for disaster.

Many people seem to believe that the highest religious principle in Hinduism consists in being attached to family relationships and social conventions beyond all other considerations. For these people, even the basic principles of religion - truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness, justice, etc and the teachings of the genuine shastra - are expected to take a back seat to favor blind obedience and respect for one's family elders and for teachers or social authorities, no matter how senile, ignorant or degraded they are. Gita certainly does not support such a vision. Rather Krishna will scold Arjuna for contemplating this very idea. The same reasoning applies to the "family of the guru", or gurukula - loyalty to one's spiritual lineage is certainly good, but it should never become more important than loyalty to dharma and the proper cultivation of knowledge.

Another important point is that we should realize that our affinities for relatives are... "relative" and only pertain to the gross body. Physical DNA has no relevance in the matter of intellectual, moral, cultural, or spiritual affinity, and although it is true that the environment and the stimulation received within the family can greatly influence a mind, we can easily verify that sometimes people from a same family are really too different from one another, and there is nothing that can be done to bridge the gap even between different children of the same two parents.

एतान्न हन्तुमिच्छामि घ्नतोऽपि मधुसूदन । अपि त्रैलोक्यराज्यस्य हेतोः किं नु महीकृते ॥ १-३५ ॥

etānna hantumicchāmi ghnato'pi madhusūdana | api trailokyarājyasya hetoḥ kiṁ nu mahīkṛte || 1-35 ||

etan: these; na: not; hantum: to kill; icchami: I desire; ghnataḥ: being killed; api: even; madhusudana: o killer of Madhu; api: even; trailokya: the three worlds; rajyasya: of the kingdom; hetoḥ: cause; kim nu: what (to speak of); mahi kṛite: for the earth.

"O Madhusudana (Krishna), for all of them I can never wish the fate of killing or being killed, even for the purpose of the crown of all the three worlds, what to speak of this planet only."

Madhusudana means "killer of Madhu". Madhu was an asura (a demoniac personality) that appeared at the beginning of creation and attacked Brahma, thus threatening to disrupt the proper development and progress of the universe. Awakened by Brahma from his creative sleep, Vishnu solved the problem by killing the asura. In this verse, Arjuna mentions the name of Madhusudana to express his mixed feelings. It is true that Vishnu, the supreme Dharma, killed the asura that constituted an obstacle to the path of progress of the universe - but the warriors gathered on the battlefield at Kurukshetra are not asuras or demons: they are just confused and misguided family people. On the other hand, the asura Madhu is considered a personification of the negative influence of doubt and confusion, therefore indirectly Arjuna is already asking Krishna to kill his doubts and confusion.

Ichhami means "I desire/ wish". Arjuna is clearly saying that, if he could have it his way, he would like everyone to live peacefully and progressively, cooperating and working for the benefit of the kingdom, without any need to kill or be killed. The incredibly valuable opportunity of the human form of life is not meant to be thrown away because of some stupid attachment to things that are very temporary anyway - properties, position, power to control, and so on. The purpose of human life is to progress from ignorance to knowledge - from the material to the spiritual, from the temporary to the permanent, from the illusory to the real, from darkness to light, from death to immortality: asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mṛtyor ma amṛtam gamaya (Bṛhad aranyaka Upanishad, 1.3.28). This can be done by seeking the knowledge of Brahman: athato brahma jijñasa (Vedanta sutras, 1). When we have such an important and urgent task in front of us, why should we waste our greatest opportunity by playing war and trying to control kingdoms? Even worse than that, the warriors supporting Duryodhana and Dhritarashtra are fighting against dharma, therefore they are not only making the huge mistake of throwing away their own valuable lives, but they are also accumulating bad karma, and this will certainly jeopardize or delay their future progress. Some foolish people think that Arjuna was scared about losing his own life or losing the battle to a numerically superior enemy, but the situation is much more serious. He clearly said - and he will say again - that he is ready to die at any time, but his heart is heavy with the compassion of seeing all these people who have forgotten the real purpose of life.

निहत्य धार्तराष्ट्रान्नः का प्रीतिः स्याज्जनार्दन । पापमेवाश्रयेदस्मान्हत्वैतानाततायिनः ॥ १-३६ ॥

nihatya dhārtaraṣṭrāṇṇaḥ kā prītiḥ syājjanārdana | pāpamevāśrayedasmānhatvaitānātātāyinaḥ || 1-36 ||

nihatya: killing; dhartarastran: the (supporters of) Dhritarastra; nah: our; ka: what; prītiḥ: benefit/ pleasure; syat: (there) will be; janardana: o Janardana; pāpam: sin; eva: certainly; asrayet: will accept; asman: us; hatva: killing; etan: these; atātāyinaḥ: aggressors.

"O Janardana (Krishna), the killing of the sons of Dhritarastra would not give us any pleasure or benefit/ if the sons of Dhritarastra are killed, we would not find any pleasure in the world any more. We will be stained by sin if we accept the killing of these (people, although they are) aggressors,

Arjuna's words in this verse can be interpreted at two different levels. The most immediate meaning is that Arjuna has no resentment or hatred towards the people fighting to support Dhritarastra, and therefore he will not be happy to see them killed. He has already clarified that he is not interested in winning the kingdom, so there would not be any benefit from such deaths either. Another level of meaning lays in Arjuna's deep compassion and sense of responsibility - that makes him think that the death of all these people will devastate his sensitive consciousness so much that he would never be able to find pleasure in anything again. Atātāyina means "aggressor". The Artha shastra teaches: agnido garadas caiva sastra-panir dhanapahab, kshetra darapahari ca shadete atātāyinaḥ, "One who attacks with fire, with poison, or holding weapons in hands, one who takes away (someone else's) wealth/ possessions, land or wife: these are the six types of criminal aggressors."

In Vedic society everyone is implicitly authorized to defend himself and his family, subordinates and property from such aggressors. Therefore there is no need for jails, lawyers or even judges or police like in the present faulty system that is very prone to judicial mistakes and abuses, unable to prevent aggressions, and likely to produce even more degradation and violence as convicts are locked up in a very unhealthy and non-progressive situation - because the idea of the sentence is "punishment" by deprivation and mistreatment. The people who work in jails also develop a very unhealthy mentality. On the other hand, we know that prevention is the best cure, and most cases of violent aggressions are easily avoided when the criminal fears that the intended victim could be able to fight back effectively. The principle of non-violence teaches that one should not attack others for one's own greed or lust or hatred, but makes provisions for legitimate defense that include not only one's self but also one's family and subordinates, home, possessions and land. Legitimate defense must be proportionate in the use of force, but anyone who attacks with dangerous weapons deserves to be killed in combat. Also, one who attacks others with poison or fire should be stopped at all costs even if this means killing the culprit caught in the act. A thief, a kidnapper or a rapist is also an aggressor and the use of force - even lethal force - against such criminals is implicitly approved by Vedic dharma.

Contemporary non-Vedic societies try to defend the "human rights" of criminals by limiting the provisions for individual self-defense and giving more powers to "professional police", but the system can easily be manipulated by clever, ruthless and cynical people and end up punishing the victims instead of the aggressors. Kshatriyas have the duty to help those people who do not have sufficient strength or skill to defend themselves. Ideally, this is supposed to be the job of policemen, but according to the Vedic system a kshatriya is directly responsible for the protection and well being of the prajas of the land he surveys, and is also entitled to directly enjoy the service and respect of such prajas. The centralized system of police-judges-courts-government officers inevitably becomes overcomplicated, politicized, impersonal and unjust, favoring corrupt and manipulative people rather than honest, responsible and brave people. And in extreme situations, it favors the development of "alternative government organizations" such as the various kinds of mafia, where the "boss" replaces the king. According to the Vedic system, every village or neighborhood should have a king that is capable of protecting the prajas. A king needs to constantly patrol the kingdom and to be readily accessible to all the subjects who have any complaints. This becomes possible when there is a sufficient number of local kings, as it was the norm in Vedic times. The role of the emperor, or "king of kings" was to help the local rajās or kings who accepted his protection, not to appoint or demote them or interfere with local governments in any way, unless of course a local king would become adharmic and his subjects approached the emperor for protection.

The word papam is translated as "sin", but it does not have the exact same meaning of the English word, that is influenced by Christian semantics. The Vedic meaning is more about feelings of responsibility for a bad action, expecting bad consequences, and contamination of the consciousness.

तस्मान्नाहं वयं हन्तुं धार्तराष्ट्रान्स्वबान्धवान् । स्वजनं हि कथं हत्वा सुखिनः स्याम माधव ॥ १-३७ ॥

tasmānnāhā vayam hantum dhārtarāṣṭrānsvabāndhavan | svajanam hi katham hatva sukhinah syama madhava || 1-37 ||

tasmat: therefore; na: not; arha: is befitting; vayam: to us; hantum: to kill; dhartarashtran: the (supporters) of Dhritarashtra; sa-bandhavan: together with their (dear) relatives; sva-janam: one's own people; hi: certainly; katham: how; hatva: by killing; sukhinah: happy; syama: we will be; madhava: o husband of the Mother.

Therefore it is not befitting for us (to cause) the killing of the supporters of Dhritarashtra along with their friends and relatives. O Krishna, how it is possible to find happiness when friends and relatives are killed?"

The word arha, "befitting", conveys a meaning of honor and nobility, moral superiority, compassion and benevolence, and is often used in prayers when addressing a divine personality to beg for forgiveness or help. People who have a saintly character and a compassionate heart are always ready to forgive and sometimes even to forget, or even tolerate the bad behavior of others without taking offense. After all, each and every person in this world is a child of the Mother Goddess, and children are easily forgiven because they do not easily understand the bad consequences of their actions. Sometimes parents have to be a little hard with their children when circumstances require it, but they are never happy about that, and before thinking about a punishment, they should extensively try all other options. As always, prevention is better than cure. Arjuna is still hoping against hope that the supporters of Dhritarashtra could be made to see reason and convinced to change their minds on their disastrous decision to fight.

The expression sva-janam does not refer only to Arjuna's relatives, but also to the relatives of Dhritarashtra's supporters, who will kill their own people or be killed by their own people - such a horrible act, that the mighty warrior Arjuna, who faced so many battles and bravely stared in death's face so many times, cannot tolerate the very idea.

यद्यप्येते न पश्यन्ति लोभोपहतचेतसः । कुलक्षयकृतं दोषं मित्रद्रोहे च पातकम् ॥ १-३८ ॥

yadyapyete na pasyanti lobhopahatacetasah | kulakṣayakṛtaṁ doṣaṁ mitradrohe ca pātakam || 1-38 ||

yadi: if; api: even; ete: these; na: not; pasyanti: see; lobha: by greed; apahata: stolen; cetasah: consciousness; kula: family; kṣaya: destroying; kṛtam: action; dosham: fault; mitra: friends; drohe: becoming hostile; ca: and; patakam: sin.

"Even if these (people) cannot see (such fault) because their mind is confused by greed, it is (still) a grave mistake to destroy one's own family, is a sin to turn against one's friends."

Arjuna knows that the supporters of Dhritarashtra are temporarily blinded by greed (their own greed or the greed of their lieges) and therefore remain unable to realize the extent of their disastrous mistake. More explanation about this mechanism will be given by Krishna later (2.62-64) and again (3.36-43) on the request of Arjuna: "what compels a person to commit sins, even without desiring it?"

The key factors for sin is described by Krishna as kama and krodha: dhyayato visayan pumsah sangas tesupajayate sagat sanjayate kamah, kamah krodho bhijayate. Kama is desire for possession and enjoyment of the objects of the senses, while lobha is the addiction to such desire, that creates an increasing insatiable need for this feeling of possession and enjoyment. Since it is insatiable, frustration naturally ensues, and from frustration, a blinding anger arises. Arjuna is a good-natured, sensible and self-disciplined person, who has been well trained to honor dharma, and knows how to regulate himself in the matter of kama and krodha. Therefore he can objectively observe the behavior of Dhritarastra and his sons, and correctly put the finger on the root of the problem. Realizing that these people are blinded by greed and lust, he rejoices in the fact that he is not suffering from the same disease, and he reasons that those who have a clear vision should not commit the same mistake of those who are blind.

The term droha, "turning against", is used to describe the ungrateful behavior of one who becomes unjustly hostile towards persons who have benefited him in the past - such as loving parents, benevolent relatives, expert and sincere teachers, and so on. Arjuna is mostly thinking about Bhishma and Drona, who have been affectionate and benevolent to him as a child, and that, by their aggressive attitude on the battlefield, seem to have totally forgotten about dharma and common sense. By forcing him to fight against them, Bhishma and Drona are implicitly stating that they approve Arjuna's fighting against them and even killing them in battle - something that is against ethics as well as against the sacred bond of gratefulness. Again, it is important to understand that the concept of "sin" mentioned here (patakam) is very different from the Christian concept.

कथं न ज्ञेयमस्माभिः पापादस्मान्निवर्तितुम् । कुलक्षयकृतं दोषं प्रपश्यद्भिर्जनार्दन ॥ १-३९ ॥

katham na jñeyamasmābhiḥ pāpādasmanñivartitum | kulakṣayakṛtaṁ doṣaṁ prapaśyadbhirjanārdana || 1-39 ||

katham: how; na: not; jñeyam: known; asmābhiḥ: by us; papat: from crime; asmat: these; nivartitum: to stop; kula: family; kṣaya: destruction; kṛitam: action; dosham: faulty; prapaśyadbhiḥ: by those who see; janardana: o Janardana.

"O Janardana (Krishna), how could we, who see (things as they are), not know how to stop these (people) from (committing) the horrible action of destroying their families?"

Arjuna's despair goes very deep, and takes him to questioning Krishna himself and his mission. The word asmābhiḥ, "by us", in fact includes Krishna who is sitting with him on the chariot, also ready for the battle.

Many intelligent people become atheists or agnostics after observing all the injustice and sufferings that characterize life in this world, and argue that, if God is there, and he is omnipotent and benevolent to his creatures, he should not allow such things to happen. This, however, is mainly due to the incorrect idea of God that has been presented by the abrahamic faiths on the basis of the texts they consider their sacred scriptures and of the direct and consistent example of their religious leaders in history. Contrarily to the abrahamic system, questioning the existence of God or God's ways is not considered as blasphemy or offense in the Vedic mentality. In the Vedic vision, clearly expressed in Gita, God does not judge anyone and does not punish anyone, does not favor anyone and does not expect any sectarian allegiance from anyone. The same opportunities are offered to all living beings, who are responsible for their own evolution along a great number of reincarnations, in which they can learn how to deal with the basic rules of the game - action and reaction, dharma and adharma, progress and degradation. Believing or not believing in God does not make any difference for the effect of one's actions. One can become free from karma not by "believing in God" but by becoming selfless and dutiful, and by observing the fundamental and universal principles of dharma: truthfulness/ honesty/ sincerity, compassion/ benevolence, cleanliness/ purity of heart/ detachment, and self-discipline. So what is God's role in the universe? Why does the Divine incarnate and descend into this world? Later on (4.8) Krishna will explain that the Divine mission in this world is to protect good people, destroy evil doers, and establish the correct information about the universal principles of dharma. Arjuna already knows that, because he is an eternal companion/ emanation of God, and therefore he wants Krishna to explain why such a mission could not be accomplished without causing so much suffering to people who are fundamentally good or innocent, like the children of the families that are going to be destroyed in this war. Why couldn't Krishna stop the war in some other way? Why didn't he change the minds of Dhritarastra and Duryodhana, making them see sense?

कुलक्षये प्रणश्यन्ति कुलधर्माः सनातनाः । धर्मे नष्टे कुलं कृत्स्नमधर्मोऽभिभवत्युत ॥ १-४० ॥

kulakṣaye praṇaśyanti kuladharmāḥ sanātanaḥ | dharme naṣṭe kulaṁ kṛtsnamadharmo'bbibhavatyuta || 1-40 ||

kula: family; kṣaye: in the destruction; pranaśyanti: become destroyed; kula: the family; dharmah: the (traditions of) ethical principles; sanatanah: eternal; dharme: in the dharma; naste: destroyed; kulam: the family; kṛtsnam: completed; adharma: adharma; abbibhavati: becomes; uta: it is said.

"When a family is destroyed, the eternal religious principles of the family are destroyed (too), and when dharma is destroyed, the entire tradition goes lost and turns into adharma."

The sanatana dharma of the kula or family does not refer to the occupational duties in society (that are always called sva-dharma) but to the eternal, universal and fundamental religious principles such as truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness and self-control. It also refers to those religious and ritualistic duties - such as samskaras and karmas - that help all the family members to keep their consciousness on the sattvic level, and that must be performed continuously. Such activities require the direct and indirect cooperation of all family members, and especially of the bread-winners of the house who must collect the required materials for the rituals as well as the necessities for the entire family so that they can continue to live in a virtuous way.

A fratricidal war like the one that is going to start at Kurukshetra will deprive many families of all active males, leaving their women and children unprotected to fend and care for themselves. This creates a very awkward situation because women are forced to carry a very heavy burden - the demanding duties of motherhood and the basic chores of daily life - materially and spiritually, as they also must take care of the daily house rituals - plus the responsibility of earning a livelihood for themselves and their children and ensuring protection from external threats as well, which ordinarily should fall on the males in the family. Such burden can become intolerable especially for those women called sadhya vadhu, i.e. ordinary girls who simply aspired to marry and settle as housewives and mothers.

When the task of following the universal and eternal principles of dharma becomes problematic due to very difficult circumstances and unfortunate compromises are forced on people who must resort to questionable actions just to survive, adharma gradually becomes prominent until it is considered the norm in the family and then in society. This particularly applies to women, who in normal times are protected and cared for, without being required to fend for themselves or to face hardships. Women are the guardians of dharma in the family just like the brahmanas are the guardians of dharma in society, precisely because and when they are respected and protected, and all their needs are taken care of. Brahmanas, too, can easily fall and become degraded when they are not properly protected and supported, and when they are forced to fend and care for themselves and to protect themselves.

Women by nature are very inclined to religion and dharma, as well as to religious rituals and celebrations as social functions, and they are the first natural teachers for all human beings in society. All teachings – spiritual and religious as well as ethical and practical – received in early childhood are critical for a person's subsequent education and training, therefore women should also be facilitated in the study of scriptures and philosophy as much as they are able and willing to learn, also with the aid of the stories (Puranas and Itihasas) that were specifically compiled to facilitate this learning.

अधर्माभिभवात्कृष्ण प्रदुष्यन्ति कुलस्त्रियः । स्त्रीषु दुष्टासु वार्ष्णेय जायते वर्णसङ्करः ॥ १-४१ ॥

adharmābhibhavātkṛṣṇa praduṣyanti kulastriyaḥ । strīṣu duṣṭāsu vārṣṇeya jāyate varṇasaṅkaraḥ ॥ 1-41 ॥

adharma: adharma; abhibhavat: becomes; krishna: o Krishna; praduṣyanti: become faulty; kula: family; striyaḥ: the women; strisu: in the women; duṣṭasu: bad; varṣṇeya: o descendant of Vrishni; jāyate: is born; varna: varna; sankarah: confused.

"O Krishna, when adharma becomes predominant, the women of the family become compromised, and when the women become bad, O descendant of Vrishni (Krishna), an unqualified progeny is born."

When the eternal and universal principles of religion become weaker and compromised in a family or tradition because of the disappearance of the protectors and providers, women (like brahmanas in society) become the easiest target for exploitation and their degradation and sufferings can create a new generation that is not capable, willing or ready to uphold dharma. The definition duṣṭa stri or "bad woman" is often misunderstood in a society that does not respect women, to mean a woman who does not submissively accept the adharmic behaviors, teachings or orders of degraded males. In a male-dominated society, women become mere objects of exploitation or possession, and are denied all authority and space for action about dharma, although by nature they are more inclined to dharma, religion and spirituality than men. When religious/ spiritual knowledge and all the religious rituals are properly taught and observed, the women of the family do not become corrupt or "bad".

The definition varna sankara does not refer to illegitimate children begotten outside the conventional marriage or in "mixed caste" marriages, but includes all children who take birth in an unfavorable environment where women are not protected, respected and supported appropriately, and who therefore grow up insecure, scared and confused. In the early stages of life – from conception to adolescence – children consider themselves and are considered by others as an expansion of their mothers. If their mothers suffer from low self-esteem, ignorance, meanness or a narrow mentality, the children will inevitably develop similar subconscious characteristics. Such psychological problems may aggregate to cause serious inferiority complexes that may also manifest as false superiority complexes, as in the case of the smallest dogs who feel the need to bark the loudest. Individual psychological imbalances also spread into the community and society at large, creating a hellish way of life. When women suffer anxiety, doubt, and concern for their safety and the safety of their children, they can become ruthless and forget the principles or religion in order to ensure their personal survival and benefit at the cost of the sufferings of others. Children born from such mothers are more vulnerable in their ethical and spiritual principles, and when they become ruthless, too, they turn family and society into a hellish place where adharma feeds itself in a vicious circle. Arjuna calls Krishna "descendant of Vrishni" to highlight the fact that Krishna himself honored the ancestors and dharmic tradition of his family.

सङ्करो नरकायैव कुलघ्नानां कुलस्य च । पतन्ति पितरो ह्येषां लुप्तपिण्डोदकक्रियाः ॥ १-४२ ॥

saṅkaro narakāyaiva kulaghñānāṃ kulasya ca । patanti pitaro hyeṣāṃ lupṭapīṇḍodakakriyāḥ ॥ 1-42 ॥

sankarah: confused (progeny); narakaya: hellish; eva: certainly; kula: family; ghnanam: the killers; kulasya: of the family; ca: and; patanti: fall down; pitarah: the ancestors; hi: certainly; esham: of them; lupṭah: abandoned; pinda: pinda; udaka: water; kriyah: the duty.

"These confused (descendants) create a hellish situation both for the family and for those who have destroyed the family. Also the forefathers suffer, because the offerings of food and water are neglected."

According to the karma kanda of the smṛiti, the descendants of a family have the duty to remember their ancestors during their daily rituals and to offer them oblations of consecrated food and water so that they can remain in the higher planets called Pitrloka to enjoy a heavenly life, or at least obtain a good reincarnation. Pinda means "lump/ ball" and is a type of food consisting in balls of cooked rice that must be prepared by the wife of the head of the family or obtained from a Vishnu temple. This traditional ritual is called Sraddha and it is performed on three occasions: 1. in the period immediately after the death of the family member, and specifically on the 10th, 11th and 12th day after death; 2. every year on the anniversary day of death, and 3. every year during the Pitri paksha, especially the 13th and the 14th day called Mahalaya.

Some commentators believe that this verse disqualifies "illegitimate children" born of mixed caste marriages from offering oblations to the ancestors, but they forget that in Vedic culture there is no such thing as "illegitimate child", as there are several types of marriage and they are all considered lawful. The distinction usually made about anuloma and pratiloma marriages, by which the union of a man of a lower varna with a woman of a higher varna is considered inauspicious, is also only a relative indication and it should not be taken as an iron rule. It is a fact that a woman who is more qualified than her husband can feel frustrated and diminished in performing duties and living in an environment that are below her level, but it is also said that women are a category to themselves, and do not belong to any specific varna.

Another observation is that traditionally oblations can be legitimately offered also by adopted children and by other family members such as nephews or grandchildren. Also, the idea of "mixed caste" does not make much sense because it confuses caste (a false racist concept introduced by adharmic invaders of India) with varna, the actual Vedic concept. What is more important, such classification into castes gives no consideration to guna (personal qualities), karma (performance of duties, both social/ occupational and religious) and samskara, but is simply based on birth in a particular genetic line. Even more important, such commentators disregard the meaning of the word luptah in the present verse, that is not compatible with their explanations. Luptah means that the oblations (pinda and udaka) are neglected or stopped, not that they are performed by unqualified persons: this means that the family members do not care any more for the traditional rituals, because the new generations are confused about sanatana dharma and neglect or totally give up the samskaras and karmas. The reason of such neglect is directly connected to the destruction of the family, or the absence of capable and responsible men who care for, provide for and protect the women and children of the family through a dharmic occupation. In such circumstances, the traditional and prescribed rituals are neglected because of the pressing needs of mere survival. This unfortunate situation can actually be observed even within the so-called high castes of traditional Hindus, who have no knowledge of the shastra, do not perform the traditional rituals as prescribed, and hardly remember the names of their ancestors for whom they are expected to offer oblations. They may even have become "nastika hindus", literally "agnostic/ atheistic people of Indian religion" (if anyone can admit such an oxymoron) who consider themselves as Hindu only because they have taken birth in an Indian family, but have no faith in the knowledge of Vedic scriptures and have rejected the purpose and the values of dharma.

दोषैरेतैः कुलग्नानां वर्णसङ्करकारकैः ।

उत्साद्यन्ते जातिधर्माः कुलधर्माश्च शाश्वताः ॥ १-४३ ॥

doṣairetaiḥ kulaghnānāṃ varṇasaṅkarakākārikaiḥ । utsādyante jātīdharmāḥ kuladharmāśca śāśvatāḥ ॥ 1-43 ॥

doṣaiḥ: by faults; etaiḥ: by these; kula: family; ghnanam: killer; varṇa-sankara: generation of unqualified children; karakaiḥ: those who make; utsadyante: are devastated; jāti-dharmāḥ: the dharma of birth; kula-dharmas: the dharma of the family; ca: and; śasvatāḥ: always.

"The wrong actions of those who kill the family create a generation of confused/ unqualified persons, and this devastates the continuity of the family dharma, inherited by birth and tradition."

The adult males of a family are expected to provide and protect, and to offer by their example a direct living reference for the proper execution of the duties of the family and of the community - and this applies to all professional occupations. The training of an individual for his duties and responsibilities, as well as for the general understanding of the purpose of his activities, starts from early childhood. Each individual naturally has particular tendencies and capabilities, but much can be improved by training and education, and especially with the emotional motivation that comes from the encouragement and support from family members.

The expression varna sankara means "confusion of varnas". Contrarily to the opinion of some commentators, it does not refer to the "intermingling of castes". In fact, all the varnas are meant to be very much united, just like the various parts of one's body, and closely cooperating and interacting with one another. When there is no unity and proper cooperation between the various parts of one's body, there can be no life. Hack a body to pieces, and see how perfectly it can work and function and facilitate social prosperity and happiness. There can be no segregation of varnas in a civilized society. Segregation can only apply to those groups of people who do not accept to live in a civilized society and do not follow the prescribed rules for the general population, so by their unclean or aggressive way of living they can become a nuisance or a danger to civilized persons. These particular groups of people are called chandalas and mlecchas, and they are considered to be outside the varna system because they eat everything and anything without any consideration of cleanliness or compassion, do not take bath or clean their clothes and houses regularly, produce foul smells due to their life habits, get up and sleep at improper times, make excessive noise and disturbances without caring for the peace of others, and have other unpleasant, aggressive and unhealthy habits. Such persons are not expected to work for the benefit of the social body, and therefore are considered "foreign objects" in the body. The concept of foreign does not refer to the geographical place where one was born, but to the lack of cooperation and harmony with the social body in general because of the difference in values and interests.

On the other hand, the four varnas - sudras, vaisyas, kshatriyas and brahmanas - need to live side by side and work together constantly - something that we could certainly call "intermingling". The head cannot function without being closely connected to the arms, the stomach and the legs. In fact, the brahmanas are expected to be the guides, teachers and purifiers of all the other varnas - if they do not "intermingle" with them, how will this guiding, teaching and purification take place?

When ignorance creates confusion, one becomes unable to understand the difference between the functions of the head and the functions of the arms, the functions of the belly and the functions of the legs. Then, for example, we will have arrogant, ignorant and foolish "brahmanas" who have no idea of what Brahman is - they rather believe that bodily identification is the highest principle of religion, and see no problem in compromising on ethical principles for the sake of a salary or income. Or "kshatriyas" who never expose themselves to any danger on the battlefield, but rather drop bombs on innocent civilians by pushing a button, take pleasure in torturing and exploiting defenseless people, and have no idea of how to tell innocent people from criminals.

This happens because the correct understanding of the duties, characteristics and qualifications of each varna has become confused, and because the samskaras and karmas are neglected. Then the entire society inevitably becomes populated by sudras - unqualified and irresponsible people who always try to work as little as possible but want more money - higher salaries, pensions etc - as well as special benefits, name, fame, and social position. Sudras can easily be recognized because they need to be constantly told what to do and be taken care of by employers, otherwise they will only be able to make a mess of everything. It is particularly interesting to note the explicit distinction presented in this verse between jati dharma and kula dharma, indicating respectively the duties of a person born in a particular family and the duties of a person who joins a particular family (in the sense of tradition). These two are specifically defined as different from the varna dharma.

In the Vedic logic there is not much difference between a child generated seminally and a child or adult that is adopted into the family, or even a disciple who is accepted in the family of the Guru (guru kula). The only difference is that a child seminally born in a good family has received more benefits from the samskaras that begin even before birth, and therefore he has more duties/responsibilities towards the kula. Of course, this consideration comes to naught when the traditional purification rituals of the life cycle (samskaras) and the other regular religious karmas (Deity worship, observance of festivals, boma, study of scriptures, charity, purification of the food, offerings to the ancestors, honest and productive work within one's occupational duties, etc) are not performed properly, regularly and with the required understanding and consciousness. This is why it is said that in Kali yuga everybody is born a sudra. Even among the staunchest defenders of the orthodox karma kanda tradition, it is very difficult to find someone who is actually following the system as they should. In conclusion, as Arjuna says, the key to a happy and progressive family life is the proper level of consciousness of the women. When women are properly respected and protected, and all the religious rituals are properly observed, very good souls will be attracted to take birth in the family and even ordinarily good souls who may take birth there will be educated and purified according to the scientific process of psychological imprinting (samskara). These qualified children are a real asset to society, whether they were physically born in the family or they were adopted later, or spontaneously joined the family later out of natural attraction to the good qualities and values manifested by the family members.

उत्सन्नकुलधर्माणां मनुष्याणां जनार्दन । नरके नियतं वासो भवतीत्यनुश्रुम ॥ १-४४ ॥

utsannakuladharmāṇāṃ manuṣyāṇāṃ janārdana । narake niyataṃ vāso bhavatītyanuśrūma ॥ 1-44 ॥

utsanna: spoiled; kula-dharmanam: the dharma of the family; manuṣyanam: of the human beings; janardana: o Janardana; narake: in hell; niyatam: always; vasah: reside; bhavati: becomes; iti: thus; anu: always; susruma: we have heard.

"O Janardana (Krishna), we have always been told that those men who cause the degradation of the family values end up living in hellish conditions forever."

The expression anu susruma is a reinforced form of susruma ("we have heard") and conveys the concept of a repetition of an important teaching.

We need to understand that the concept of naraka, usually translated as "hell", is quite different from the apparently similar concept in the abrahamic perspective. Abrahams believe that God takes pleasure in punishing those who fail to blindly obey his orders and the orders of his priests, and that such punishment must be as painful, cruel and humiliating as possible, and extended forever in time. Such eternal hell is pictured as situated in a particular place in space, although nobody seems to know exactly where. Some believe it is deep underground within this planet, others believe it could be in some other dimension, but in any case they all agree that it is a place where "sinners" are tortured mercilessly. In our daily experience we see that sometimes mild physical punishment may be useful in correcting a bad habit that has proved impervious to all other solutions, when an individual (animal or human) is too stupid, stubborn or degraded to understand reason, but since in the abrahamic concept there is no second chance and no possibility of eventually getting out of hell, such tortures do not have any usefulness because they are not aimed at teaching or reforming and there is no hope of improvement or redemption. So it's just endless torture for the mere sake of inflicting pain - sadistic cruelty. On the contrary, according to the Vedic system the idea of naraka is not eternal and does not involve any deliberate torture as punishment - it simply refers to a very unpleasant condition of life, that can indeed be experienced on this planet itself and in this lifetime. The purpose of such difficult life conditions is to help the individual to understand the sufferings he has inflicted on others so that he will not repeat the same mistake. Ultimately the goal is to become detached from material identification and from the idea of possession and enjoyment on the material level, so that it becomes possible to turn one's mind and aspirations towards the sattvic and then the transcendental level.

Similarly, the Vedic concept of prayascitta is originally different from the abrahamic idea of penance in atonement for one's sins. While abrahamic believe in the intrinsic value of suffering in itself, and prescribe the mortification of the human nature, Vedic culture considers suffering as something bad to be avoided, and celebrates the human body as a gift and a temple of the divine. Therefore prayascitta is all about positive actions of purification, charity, and personal evolution that can counteract the mistakes committed in the past. Unfortunately, during abrahamic dominations and invasions of India in the last few centuries, many non-Vedic ideas have percolated into the collective Indian mind and now may even be considered by some as original Hindu beliefs. In some cases even the scriptural texts may have been tampered with and manipulated, usually by non-Hindu scholars who were deliberately trying to destroy Vedic culture. The teaching of "Indology" in Europe was originally established with the precise purpose to preach Christianity "among the pagans". William Carey (1761-1834), the founder of the Baptist Missionary Society, was the pioneer of the Christian missionary scholarship in oriental studies. Max Mueller was commissioned by the East India Company to translate the Rig Veda into English by misinterpreting the Vedic literatures. He wrote: "India has been conquered once, but India must be conquered again and that second conquest should be a conquest by education."

Sir Monier Monier-Williams (1819-1899), author of a Sanskrit-English dictionary that is still extremely popular, stated in his address at Oxford University where he was Boden Professor of Sanskrit: "so as ...to proceed in the conversion of the natives of India to the Christian religion... Brahmanism must die out. When the walls of the mighty fortress of Brahmanism are encircled, undermined, and finally stormed by the soldiers of the cross, the victory of Christianity must be signal and complete."

It is now up to us to undo all this damage and restore the proper understanding of Vedic knowledge and civilization.

अहो बत महत्पापं कर्तुं व्यवसिता वयम् । यद्राज्यसुखलोभेन हन्तुं स्वजनमुद्यताः ॥ १-४५ ॥

aho bata mahatpāpam kartum vyavasitā vayam | yadrājasukhalobhena hantum svajanamudyatāḥ || 1-45 ||

aho: alas; bata: how weird; mahat: great; papam: sin; kartum: to do; vyavasitah: are determined; vayam: us; yad: due to; rajya: kingdom; sukha: happiness; lobhena: greed; hantum: to kill; sva-janam: one's own people; udyatah: trying.

"Alas, how shocking! We are going to commit such a great sin ourselves, trying to kill our own friends and relatives, out of greed for the happiness of the kingdom."

Sukha means "happiness" as well as "well being". Arjuna has already stated very clearly that he has no desire to gain the kingdom, so this new statement can seem contradictory. In fact it is not, because there are two levels of meanings in this verse. The happiness of the kingdom, rajya suka, is not simply the happiness and well-being one gets from ruling over the kingdom, but it is the happiness and well-being of the subjects as well. Certainly Dhritarastra and his supporters are motivated by the gross and selfish greed for owning and controlling the kingdom to derive personal gratification from it, and they demonstrate the ordinary meaning of the statement of this verse. However, Arjuna's mind is much deeper and the perception of the future sufferings is pushing him to a more critical and extensive examination of the action and its consequences. So even the second and deeper meaning of rajya suka, referring to the happiness of the subjects in the kingdom, carries negative consequences in front of the death of so many family men. Procuring happiness and well-being to a group of living entities by creating sufferings for another group of living entities is considered an uncivilized way of life, comparable to the lifestyle of hunters and dacoits. The more society is able to work on a win-win situation for all the living entities concerned, the more civilized and advanced it is considered. A good example is a non-violent agricultural society where the diet of the general people consists of fruits, leaves, milk (obtained through non-violent methods) and grains/ seeds dropped by the plants after attaining maturity. Even so, Vedic civilization is so deeply ethical and considerate that it recognizes all levels of responsibility, including the mild and unavoidable violence that is inherent even in a vegan and raw food diet and in the simple acts of walking and cleaning and lighting a fire, because all these basic requirements for life involve a certain degree of suffering for plants and insects, and even for other living entities who will be left without the food that we consume. Rather than choosing a denial of life, like those who believe that it is meritorious to starve oneself to death or pluck out one's hair to keep lice from harm, Vedic civilization teaches that by accepting one's rightful share of the good things of life one contracts a debt towards the universe, and such debt must be repaid by actively and selflessly working for the benefit of all creatures. This is the basis of the concept of dharma: active cooperation in "supporting" society, the community of all living entities, the planet and the universe at large.

यदि मामप्रतीकारमशस्त्रं शस्त्रपाणयः । धार्तराष्ट्रा रणे हन्युस्तन्मे क्षेमतरं भवेत् ॥ १-४६ ॥

yadi māmapratīkāramasāstram śāstrapāṇayaḥ | dhārtarāṣṭrā raṇe hanyustanme kṣemataram bhavet || 1-46 ||

yadi: if; mam: me; apratikaram: without opposing; asastram: without weapons; sastra-panayah: holding weapons in hand; dhartarashtra: the (sons/ supporters) of Dhritarastra; rane: in the battle; hanyus: they may kill; tan: they; me: me; kshemataram: better; bhavet: it will be.

"If I was going to die unarmed and without fighting back, killed in battle by the (sons/ supporters) of Dhritarastra who yield weapons, that would be better for me."

Arjuna's despair in front of the imminent disaster of the war has reached the deepest possible point. He is ready to offer himself as a willing victim to the blood lust of Dhritarastra and his supporters, if this could somehow satisfy them and convince them to call off the battle. An important factor in the determination of Dhritarastra and his supporters in pursuing the war is the personal hatred of Duryodhana for the Pandavas and especially for Arjuna. Such hatred has no legitimate or justifiable reason, but it is just due to envy and frustration because in spite of all the assassination attempts and the other forms of persecution that Duryodhana tried to destroy the Pandavas, they still lived and prospered because of their personal qualities and character. Therefore Arjuna hopes that by offering himself as the sacrificial victim to such hatred, the determination of Duryodhana and his supporters may weaken and he may feel happy enough to let everybody else go. Again, this verse is the evidence that Arjuna is not scared at all by the impending battle and he does not fear for his life - on the contrary, he is ready to have himself slaughtered and humiliated in public, if this can save so many lives.

सञ्जय उवाच ।

sañjaya uvāca ।

एवमुक्तवार्जुनः सङ्ख्ये रथोपस्थ उपाविशत् । विसृज्य सशरं चापं शोकसंविग्नमानसः ॥ १-४७ ॥

evamuktivārjunaḥ saṅkhye rathopastha upāviśat । visrjya saśaram cāpam śokasaṁvignamānasah ॥ 1-47 ॥

sanjayah: Sanjaya; uvaca: said; evam: like this; uktva: said; arjunah: Arjuna; saṅkhye: on the battlefield; ratha: the chariot; upastha: the seat; upaviśat: sat back; visrjya: abandoning; sa-saram: with the arrows; cāpam: the bow; soka: lamentation; samvigna: distressed; manasah: mind.

Sanjaya said: After speaking these words, Arjuna who was on his chariot on the battlefield fell back on his seat abandoning his bow and arrows, his mind overwhelmed by anxiety and sorrow.

Soka samvigna manasah refers to the lamentation and distress of the manas, the conscious mind that constitutes the lower self, and with which most people identify. A self-realized person like Arjuna knows that the mind and the body are just instruments that we use to perform our duties in this world, yet he feels the suffering and anxiety of the mind. It is not that a liberated person does not feel any more pain or anxiety: he is simply not vanquished by them, and because he does not yield to the temptation of solving a problem by applying some unethical remedy (that would create more bad consequences for the future) his sufferings will soon come to an end. Therefore Krishna will say later (2.14) that sufferings are temporary and that one should face them by applying tolerance. This does not mean that we should stop trying to solve problems - it means that a dharmic solution should be applied, and that boils down to doing one's duty. For example, the protection and care of one's body according to ethical principles constitutes one of the basic duties of the living entity, but such protection might become contrary to the ethical principles, as in the case of a kṣatriya who neglects the protection of the prajas in order to save his own skin. Of course, people who identify with the mind and the body perceive the sufferings of body and mind in a much overwhelming way, because they do not see anything else, and their suffering also creates a great fear.

The word visada (depression) is another synonym, that gives the title to the first chapter of Gita. Actually a crisis like the depression faced by Arjuna before the battle of Kurukshetra constitutes a very good opportunity and an inspiration to seek the answers to the great questions in life, therefore visada is actually a part of the process of yoga. A crisis may be necessary to push a person to enter a process of re-evaluation of his/her life and values. We know that when everything goes well, people are not inclined to think about the purpose of life, as they automatically surmise that life is meant to enjoy, be happy, and just forget about everything else. On the other hand when things get tough, when there is imminent danger, loss or suffering, people start questioning themselves about the purpose of life, real priorities, right choices and the best thing to do. One starts to think about the future, life after death, and the higher realities, and can find the determination to make the required changes in his habits and behaviors. We do not need to create a crisis in order to progress in life and self realization: such crisis will come by itself.

Chapter 2: Sankhya yoga

The yoga of analysis and enumeration

The second chapter of Gita constitutes a brief summary of the entire discourse between Krishna and Arjuna, and enumerates a number of approaches for the purpose of showing that they are actually all parts of the great science of yoga. Specifically, Krishna connects the idea of action with the ideas of devotion and renunciation, offering the key to the proper understanding of *dharm*a and yoga. The indologists' view, heavily influenced by the western academic mentality, presents a relativistic scenario of different schools of thought as if they were in competition to each other and not aimed at integrating each other in the Greater Picture. So we sometimes see people claiming they are following "Raja yoga" or "Kriya yoga", or "Bhakti yoga", as if they were different products on the market vying for the endorsement of the consumers, or different political parties demanding exclusive ideological allegiance from their members. A student of Philosophy in mainstream western academia is presented with a so-called objective history of "the evolution of human thought", or we should say, of human speculation, as opposed to the dogma enforced by Christianity for several centuries on the entire western society. Inevitably, the student develops a cynical vision and the belief that Reality does not exist or at least it cannot be known. This cannot satisfy a sincere seeker, who aspires to actually understand Reality as it is.

Sankhya is the analysis of Reality to establish the various categories or factors, such as atman, brahman, shakti, maya, etc. Without this basic power of discrimination (viveka) it is very difficult to understand what dharma is. We can overcome duality only after we have understood what duality is... For example, before learning in algebra that you can actually subtract 5 from 1, you need to learn in elementary arithmetic that it is not possible to subtract 5 from 1. Similarly, before learning how to see beyond good and bad on the level of Transcendence, we need to learn to distinguish between sat and asat.

In connection to Sankhya, Buddhi Yoga constitutes the "second step" by which we begin to transcend the categories and duality itself. To the knowledge and experience offered by Sankhya, we add the memory or the natural awareness of our real Self, that does not need to be acquired from outside.

सञ्जय उवाच ।

sañjaya uvāca ।

तं तथा कृपयाविष्टमश्रुपूर्णाकुलेक्षणम् । विषीदन्तमिदं वाक्यमुवाच मधुसूदनः ॥ २-१ ॥

taṁ tathā kṛpayāviṣṭamaśrūpūrṇākulekṣaṇam । viśīdantamidaṁ vākyaṁuvāca madhusūdanaḥ ।। 2-1 ।।

sañjaya: Sanjaya; uvāca: said; taṁ: to him; tatha: then; kṛpayā: by compassion; aviṣṭam: overwhelmed; asru: tears; pūrṇa: full; akula: swelling; ikṣhanam: eyes; viśīdantam: lamenting; idam: this; vākyaṁ: speech; uvāca: said; madhu: Madhu; sudanaḥ: the killer.

Sanjaya said: Madhusudana (Krishna) thus spoke to him (Arjuna), who was overwhelmed by compassion, depressed and with eyes filled with tears.

As we have seen in first chapter (1.29), depression is usually caused by a sense of horror, fear or guilt in front of a very difficult situation, especially when one is not sure about the course of action to be chosen. Arjuna has amply explained that he is unable to see a good solution to the crisis. He has come to the battlefield to do his duty and defend the kingdom from the evil government of Dhritarashtra and Duryodhana, but the price to pay seems too high. Even considering that only willing fighters will be involved in the war - unlike modern conflicts, nothing outside the battlefield will be touched, no civilians will be harmed, no properties and no resources will be destroyed - still the extent of the loss of valuable lives and its consequences on society is devastating, and Arjuna's compassion is taking away all his energy. In such a dilemma, when no clear path is visible, it is natural to feel confused and to refrain from action until a proper solution is found.

Madhusudana: this name of Krishna, "killer of Madhu", refers to the destruction of doubts that create confusion and prevent from the proper performance of one's duties. On another level of meaning, Sanjaya chooses to refer to Krishna with this name because it indicates the divine and righteous action of killing the asuric and adharmic elements that constitute an obstacle to the happiness and progress of the entire society. In this way Sanjaya is reminding Dhritarashtra that he should not keep his hopes too high: Arjuna is a compassionate and reasonable person and he does not wish to fight for his own egotistic advantage (like Duryodhana does) but nevertheless Krishna will convince him to fight to eliminate the causes of disruption in the kingdom and to protect the prajās. Here Krishna responds to Arjuna's sorrow and starts to clear his mind.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

कुतस्त्वा कश्मलमिदं विषमे समुपस्थितम् । अनार्यजुष्टमस्वर्ग्यमकीर्तिकरमर्जुन ॥ २-२ ॥

kutastvā kaśmalamidaṁ viṣame samupasthitaṁ । anāryajuṣṭamasvargyamakīrtikaramarjuna ।। 2-2 ।।

sri: divine; bhagavan: Lord; uvāca: said; kutaḥ: from where; tva: you; kaśmalam: impurity; idam: this; viṣame: in (this) dangerous (time); samupasthitaṁ: arrived; anārya: non civilized; juṣṭam: followed; asvargyam: not leading to Svarga; akīrti: infamy; karam: making; arjuna: o Arjuna.

The Lord said: "O Arjuna, from where such contamination is coming to cover your consciousness at this critical time? It is unworthy of an arya: it does not lead to the higher planets but is the cause of infamy."

The correct definition of "arya" is fundamental for a proper understanding of the teachings of Gita. It means "civilized person" and refers to any person who has the proper knowledge of the rules of dharmic society and follows them loyally.

The misleading Aryan Invasion Theory, formulated by the colonial regime ideologue Max Muller, distorted the actual Vedic concept of arya by giving it a completely artificial racial meaning to justify the colonial oppressive and exploitative domination and the intrinsic racial superiority of white people over people of darker complexion, and hoping to create a new half-breed Indian-born middle class who would support the white domination. This absurd theory claimed that a race of nomadic marauders with "Caucasian" racial features like white skin, blue eyes and blond hair, descended from the Caucasus into India massacring and enslaving the original and primitive black populations and "civilizing" India. According to this theory, the white invaders introduced Sanskrit and the Vedas, iron and horses, as well as the birth caste system based on various genetic mixtures, where a proportionally higher percentage of the aryan DNA was found in the higher castes, while the sudras were the enslaved black dravidian natives of India.

Writing for the Anthropological Review in 1870, Mueller classified the human species into seven categories on an ascending scale - with the black Aborigines on the lowest rung and the "Aryan" race type supreme. He also fixed the date of the Aryan invasion and subsequent "civilization" of India in 1500 BCE, using the Christian Bible references that stated that the entire universe had been created precisely on 23 October 4004 BCE. This theory, later utilized by the German Nazi regime to justify "racial cleansing", has long since been proven wrong. Vedic culture was not brought to India by the so-called "Aryan invasion", as the colonialist scholars affirmed. In fact by reading Vedic literature we can easily see that the Aryan peoples of Vedic civilization had never been "nomadic" at all. Vedic peoples had great cities filled with palaces and temples, permanent villages and hermitages, a very prosperous system of permanent agriculture, and a very refined way of life. Something that better fits the picture of the Sarasvati and Sindhu civilization. The mainstream academic establishment has at least partially recognized the historical findings at Mohenjo Daro, Harappa and many other archaeological sites in the Sarasvati and Sindhu valleys, that reveal an extremely rich, advanced and refined culture that flourished over 5000 years ago. These were large cities with a complex sewage system that ran under the streets and served all houses with private bathrooms, rounded street corners to facilitate the turning of fast vehicles, systematic street lighting, swimming pools, and so forth. Among the seals found in Harappa, one features an image of the earth globe, with lines that clearly represent latitude and longitude lines on the planet. Vedic literatures also speak of airplanes, nuclear weapons and other weapons that still remain mysterious (based on the properties of sound, on weather control etc), electricity, calculation of atomic time, biotechnology, and especially of the immense potential of the human mind and body... and a careful and honest translation by open minded scholars will reveal many more wonders that are now becoming understandable to modern people thanks to the simultaneous progress of mainstream science. Apart from this gross manipulation of history, we need to debunk the pseudo-scientific myth of the white race as being more "genetically evolved" than races with a different skin color. There cannot be an "Aryan race" because the genetic patrimony of the human race only refers to physiological traits and can never determine an individual's development on the ethical, social, spiritual or professional level. Of course there are limitations caused by diseases or malformations impairing the physiological functions of the brain and nervous system, but this is found in individuals of all different races and it depends more on environmental and dietetic factors than on the skin color. All human beings become civilized by education and training only.

In this verse Sanjaya reports the words of Krishna that will definitely crush Dhritarastra's hopes for an easy victory due to Arjuna's compassion and detachment. In fact, Krishna is not speaking only for the benefit of Arjuna, but he has made sure his speech can be heard by the other warriors on the battlefield, by Dhritarastra, and by us as well.

क्लैब्यं मा स्म गमः पार्थ नैतत्त्वय्युपपद्यते ।

क्षुद्रं हृदयदौर्बल्यं त्यक्तवोत्तिष्ठ परन्तप ॥ २-३ ॥

klaibyam mā sma gamah pārtha naitattvayyupapadyate | kṣudraṁ hṛdayadaurbalyam tyaktvottiṣṭha parantapa || 2-3 ||

klaibyam: impotence; ma: not; asma: there be; gamah: taken; pārtha: o son of Pritha; na: not; etat: this; tvayi: to you; upapadyate: is befitting; kṣudram: petty; hṛdaya: heart; daurbalyam: weakness; tyakta: giving up; uttishtha: rise; parantapa: o scorcher of the enemy.

"O son of Pritha (Arjuna), do not allow yourself to fall into (such as state of ) impotence, because such state is not befitting you. Give up such petty weakness of heart and get up, o Parantapa."

Krishna is surprised to see Arjuna's behavior because Arjuna has always demonstrated a very strong and brave mind in front of all the personal difficulties that he and his family had to face. In the previous verse, Krishna already dismissed Arjuna's confusion as kashmalam, an "impurity" that would only bring him infamy, something that is unworthy of a wise person who knows the purpose of life. The first point in Krishna's analysis is that the time for second thoughts and for seeking alternatives is over. The battle has already started, and there is no way to go back: Arjuna cannot think about making other choices now, because Duryodhana has already chosen for him and for everyone else, and that's final. The critical time is the moment when the battle is going to start: making the wrong choice at this time can have disastrous consequences for the kingdom. Arjuna cannot afford to become distracted or confused, especially at this time. This is a time when extreme measures are called for. The usual requirements of respect for the elders and support for family members become secondary in front of their criminal aggression against the kingdom.

The Dharma sutras explain that there is a provision for "emergency dharma" (apat kal dharma) that overrules the "ordinary dharma". In times of great danger, distress or calamity, the usual concerns become secondary and the wisdom of the lesser evil remains the only reference. This is why we need wise people (the genuine brahmanas) to guide society in understanding the science of dharma in all its different levels. For example, truthfulness and honesty are the basic principle of dharma, but they can be temporarily overruled in a situation of emergency, as when a small lie to a wicked criminal who has violent plans can enable us to save the life of a good and innocent person, or to avert a major disaster for the entire society.

The second consideration offered by Krishna is that we need to widen our perspective on life and include the next world as well: human beings who are faithful supporters of dharma in this world become qualified to enter the exclusive group of the powerful beings who are in charge of governing the universe - the denizens of Svargaloka. It is said, yatobhyudaya nisreyas siddhibiḥ sa dharmah: "Dharma is that from which you progress in life both materially and spiritually and not only now but also lifetime after lifetime."

If Arjuna leaves the battlefield now, the supporters of Dhritarashtra will continue to create great sufferings for the innocent subjects, thereby accumulating bad karmic reactions they will have to suffer in a next life; by stopping them now Arjuna will actually protect them from a disastrous situation in the future.

The third point raised by Krishna is akirti, "infamy", that is the opposite of kirti or "glory". The so-called non-violence that allows criminals to continue undisturbed in their degrading and disastrous activities is certainly not glorious. When the situation so requires, one should be ready to save a family by giving up a family member that is opposed to dharmā, and similarly one should be ready to expel one bad family in order to save a village, or to lose a village when the safety of the entire kingdom is at stake.

Now Krishna continues this sharp analysis, clearly telling Arjuna that a kshatriya's duty is to stand firm and fight to protect the kingdom. He cannot fail such duty out of compassion for the families of the criminals, because that would be weakness of heart only. Arjuna is not going to kill, harm or persecute such families, and he is not touched by the consequences of the bad choices of the criminals: they are actually responsible for the maintenance and protection of their own families, and they have chosen to put their women and children at risk with their own adharmic choices. So the kshatriya's duty is just to fight the criminals on the battlefield, not to bask in his own compassionate feelings about their wives and children. Such compassion would be misinterpreted as sentimentalistic weakness by society and by the criminals as well, who would certainly take advantage of it to increase their bad activities - in this way we will become responsible for the sufferings of their victims.

Parantapa, the name by which Krishna calls Arjuna, suggests that a certain amount of violence and suffering is inevitable when we face aggressors in battle.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

कथं भीष्ममहं सङ्ख्ये द्रोणं च मधुसूदन ।

इषुभिः प्रतियोत्स्यामि पूजार्हावरिसूदन ॥ २-४ ॥

katham bhīṣmamahaṁ saṅkhye droṇaṁ ca madhusūdana । iṣubhiḥ pratiyotsyāmi pūjārḥavarisūdana ॥ 2-4 ॥

arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; katham: how; bhishmam: Bhishma; aham: I; sankhye: in the fight; dronam: Drona; ca: and; madhusudana: o Madhusudana; ishubhih: by arrows; pratiyotsyami: I will counterattack; pūja: of worship; arḥau: worthy; ari: enemy; sudana: killer.

Arjuna said: "O Madhusudana, o Arisudana, how will I engage in fighting against Bhishma and Drona, throwing arrows against them, who are rather to be worshiped by me?"

Apart from the compassion that he feels for all the families and subjects of those warriors who are about to die on the battlefield in this fratricidal war, Arjuna is concerned about the sinful action of physically attacking those very personalities that he has come to deeply revere for their greatness. Bhishma and Drona are not simply Arjuna's elders, but they have demonstrated extraordinary generosity, compassion, selflessness, wisdom and goodness, besides their immense knowledge, skill and expertise in the matters of governance. He has always considered them as his benefactors and protectors, and they have taught him everything he knows. Arjuna is not only compassionate, but grateful too - and this is another trait that dramatically distinguishes him from Duryodhana, who keeps accusing these same great personalities of not being partial enough to his own cause.

The action called guru droha, "becoming the enemy of one's guru", is considered a very serious sin, and a symptom of a demonic mentality. Even Indra had to suffer greatly because of his disrespect towards Brihaspati and even more so for his violent action against Visvarupa, who had taught him the Narayana kavacha. Even if one detaches him/ herself from his/ her guru because of the guru's faults, one should always try to avoid directly attacking him/ her or becoming his/ her enemy, because that amount to treason and betrayal against the principle of gratefulness. The legitimacy of abandoning a "fallen guru" is described in the Mahabharata (Udyoga parva 179.25) as guror apy avaliptasya karyakaryam ajanatah utpatha-pratipannasya parityago vidhiyate. "One should know that it is proper to abandon a teacher that is engaging in immoral activities, who does not understand or know what should be done and what should not be done, and who is going against what has been established by the scriptures."

However, this does not mean that one is entitled to turn against one's guru or superiors and commit violence against them. One should always remember the good things s/he has received from such guru and be grateful for them: this is a basic moral value. But this particular situation is different and it does not leave Arjuna any choice. Arjuna is not attacking Bhishma and Drona out of envy or resentment, or to usurp their position: he is defending the kingdom from their attack, because they have come to the battlefield to fight in support of the evil Duryodhana. Both Bhishma and Drona will later recognize their mistake and repent for it, and all along the battle they will continue to respect the fact that Arjuna is fighting to defend dharmā and has no ill feelings against them, even if he is opposing them with weapons on the battlefield.

Sometimes stupid and arrogant people say that because we are fighting against adharma - against ignorance, injustice and falsity - we are doing so because of some resentment, personal grudge or frustration, or envy. Sometimes these manipulative people even come to the point of saying that we are "mentally imbalanced". But Truth has no agenda, and it does not need one.

The name Madhusudana, "killer of Madhu", refers to the destruction of demons, whose nefarious activities will be clearly described later in Gita (16.7-19): "Taking shelter of insatiable lust and greed, deluded by arrogance, pride and false prestige, they are attached to what is impermanent, and sworn to dirty actions. They are always full of schemes and fears and prone to destruction. They consider greed and sense gratification to be the supreme goal of life. They are always making endless plans based on lust and anger, and accumulating wealth illegally for the purpose of their own enjoyment. A demonic person thinks, 'I have so much wealth today, and I will get more according to my planning. All this belongs to me now, and my possessions will increase always. I have killed that enemy of mine, and I will also kill others. I am the controller, I am the enjoyer. I am perfect, I am powerful, I am happy, I am wealthy and I have many followers. Who can be compared to me? I shall perform rituals and I shall distribute charity for my own pleasure and benefit.'"

From this description we find that, in the Vedic perspective, a demon is not characterized by horns, protruding fangs, different body color or race, or other strange physical features or tribal apparel; in fact he may even make a show of religious and charitable activities to foster his own plans aimed at expanding his power, possessions and control over others. A very important point here is that the asura is eager to kill his "enemies", i.e. those who might obstruct his arrogant plans of domination and power games, so in his perspective they are somehow standing in his way. Arisudana: this name of Krishna means "killer of the enemy". It is extremely important to understand this verse correctly, because foolish and ignorant people can easily be misled by clever manipulators who present demons as good people or even as saints, criminals as victims, friends as enemies, and the other way around. For those who are afflicted by a materialistic vision, the enemy is simply someone who seems not to belong to their camp: "he who is not with us, is against us." This perspective gives no space for consideration of dharma, justice, or even decency or common sense. For example, for a hardened rapist, the "enemy" will be a child who finds the courage to subtract him/ herself from his predatory clutches, and who might expose his violent habits - therefore in the distorted mind of the criminal, the child "should be eliminated". Anyone else who may protect the child from him will also become his "enemy".

Similarly, a witness to a heinous crime will be considered as an enemy by a mafia boss, and in totalitarian regimes anyone who does not subscribe to the government dogma becomes an "enemy of the State" by that very reason, even if he does not take any aggressive action. Can the mere fact of existing independently be considered an aggressive crime punishable by death? Can asking questions about obviously incorrect actions and conclusions be considered an aggressive crime? Can the mere fact of having different religious/ spiritual beliefs be considered a crime punishable by death? Or in other words, is freedom of thought a crime?

According to the demoniac mentality, it is. According to the divine mentality, it is not. An opinion is dangerous only when it presents violent aggression as a legitimate (or the only legitimate) way of life. Bad actions must be counteracted by prevention and forceful opposition, but bad opinions must be counteracted by opinions only - by discussion and debate, preferably public.

This is the Vedic system. In this regard, out of humility one could feel hesitant in entering such a debate against great personalities - heads of famous religious institutions, teachers with many followers, or powerful social figures. But if these people are taking an adharmic position, no matter what their reasons are, they must be fearlessly challenged and opposed in debate.

गुरून्हतवा हि महानुभावान् श्रेयो भोक्तुं भैक्ष्यमपीह लोके ।

gurūnahatvā hi mahānubhāvān śreyo bhoktum bhaikṣyamapīha lōke ।

हत्वार्थकामांस्तु गुरूनिहैव भुञ्जीय भोगान् रुधिरप्रदिग्धान् ॥ २-५ ॥ hatvārthakāmānstu gurūnihaiva bhuñjīya bhogān rudhirapradigdhān ॥ 2-5 ॥

gurun: teachers; ahatva: not killing; hi: certainly; maha: great; anubhavan: personalities; śreyah: better; bhoktum: to eat; bhaikṣyam: by begging; api: even; iha: this; loke: in the world; hatva: by killing; artha: benefit; kaman: desired (things); tu: but; gurun: teachers; iha: here; eva: certainly; bhuñjīya: it should be enjoyed; bhogan: pleasures; rudhira: by blood; pradigdhan: tainted.

"Killing teachers, who are such great personalities! It would be better to maintain myself by becoming a mendicant in this world. Even if they are victims of blood lust/ they are ready to kill to get what they want, they are still my teachers, and any benefit or pleasure from this (killing) will be tainted with blood."

Guru means "teacher". The definition generally applies to all those who have learned or realized something and are able to pass it to others - it could be music or dance, or mathematics, yoga or any other subject, in the material and in the spiritual fields. There are many levels of teachers, but all of them are extremely important for the progress of human society, and they should all be respected for their role and their knowledge and skills. The qualification for a genuine guru is explained as, adbigata tattvab, sisya hitaya ndyatab satatam, "One who has personally realized the goal/ truth, and who is always acting for the benefit of the disciple". So even if the teacher's knowledge and understanding are limited, if s/he is honest and sincerely transmits whatever s/he has actually learned and realized (without pretending to be what he is not), and is always motivated only by the benefit of the disciple (not by selfish desire for personal benefits of any kind or by political/institutional motivations), s/he is worthy of respect and gratitude. A Sat Guru, however, is something more than an ordinary guru. Sat means "spiritual, eternal" and refers to a teacher who has attained the level of liberation (moksha) while still in a body (jivan mukta) and is able to take his/her students to the same level (brahma bhuta). The parameters to recognize a liberated person are clearly described in the scriptures, and have nothing to do with institutional certification or number of followers, or with similar considerations. A Sat Guru does not need to be a brahmana by occupation. The position of a brahmana requires a particular set of official ritualistic activities and a number of duties towards family and society, some of which are performed daily and others on special occasions. A brahmana is not just a teacher (of whatever subject he chooses to teach, even in the material field such as martial arts etc), but a priest as well. On the other hand, a Sat Guru could be a sannyasi (who has no duties to family or society), an avadhuta (who has no duties or rules to follow) or even be engaged in a more modest social occupation, down to the position of sudra. The only true necessary qualification is having realized what s/he is supposed to teach - i.e. that we are Atman/ Brahman and not the material body we live in, and its relations in this world. In other words, s/he must be completely free from ahankara and mamata. He considers himself simply the servant of the Supreme Guru Tattva, Antaryami. Anyone, even a teacher, may commit mistakes or temporarily fall into illusion or confusion: we should not allow one of such mistakes committed by a great personality to make us forget all the good things he has done for society, and the good things he can still do if he improves his act and reforms himself. A teacher or a brahmana, or even a relative of a brahmana who is not (yet) qualified, should not be killed if that can be avoided. Of course if he commits some disgraceful action or spreads false or immoral teachings he should be stopped and exposed, so that he will not be able to confuse and mislead the general public with wrong conclusions and a bad example, but he should never be sentenced to death or corporal punishment. He can only be faced with the appropriate weapons in self defense if he becomes a violent aggressor as per previous description. This particularly applies to one's teachers, one's elders and superiors, who should be respected for the sincere help and support they have given us so that we could progress in life. Even if their understanding and behavior are not perfect, or if they make mistakes or fall into delusion or degradation, they can still reform themselves and they are entitled to our gratitude as Arjuna is explaining in this verse. Ungratefulness towards those who have selflessly and lovingly worked for our benefit is a very great sin.

However, protecting the kingdom from criminals has nothing to do with one's personal relationships or the benefits we personally received in the past or we could receive in the future from a particular person. We should be ready to oppose even our own teachers, friends and family members if they become criminals and their actions endanger the peace, progress and prosperity of the prajas, the persons entrusted to us.

न चैतद्विद्मः कतरन्नो गरीयो यद्वा जयेम यदि वा नो जयेयुः ।

na ca itadvidmaḥ kataranno gariyo yadvā jayema yadi vā no jayeyuḥ ।

यानेव हत्वा न जिजीविषामः तेऽवस्थिताः प्रमुखे धार्तराष्ट्राः ॥ २-६ ॥ yāneva hatvā na jijīviṣāmaḥ te'vasthitāḥ pramukhe dhārtaraṣṭrāḥ ॥ 2-6 ॥

na: not; ca: and; etaḥ: this; vidmaḥ: we know; katarat: which; nah: for us; gariyah: better; yat va: or rather; jayema: we should win; yadi: if; va: or; nah: us; jayeyuḥ: they will win; yan: they; eva: certainly; hatva: killing; na: not; jijivishamah: we will desire to live; te: they; avasthitah: are situated; pramukhe: in front (of us); dhartarashtra: the (supporters) of Dhritarastra.

"We do not know which is better, whether to win over them or to let them win over us. We should not desire to live after killing these followers of Dhritarastra, who are standing in front of us."

Arjuna's mind is attacked by depression, and doubts creep and grow and expand at various levels, so he is even starting to feel uncertain about the possible outcome of the battle. What if, after a fierce battle where so many people will be killed - with the consequences that he has already contemplated? Dhritarastra's side will win anyway, and the kingdom will continue to be oppressed by his bad governance. It would be a total loss. It is true that a kshatriya should not flee from the battlefield out of fear, but it is also true that he should be wise and only engage in battles that offer a reasonable chance for success. Desperate battles are justified only as a last stand, when there is no hope for another opportunity in the future, otherwise it is advisable to withdraw strategically and live to fight another day. The two armies are not of equal force, and Arjuna is now starting to think that maybe the battle could have been postponed until the chances for success were better. Maybe in the meantime things would change and more lives could be spared. Arjuna wants to be reasonable and to analyze all the possibilities before venturing into an action from which he will not be able to get out, once started. A kshatriya is a very responsible and wise person, not a war mongering gangster, a violent and mindless hooligan, a fanatic marauder fueled by sectarian hatred or anger, or a trigger-happy madman who just likes to kill people. For a genuine kshatriya, war is not a mercenary business career with pleasurable perks, an exciting game, or an opportunity to vent his personal emotional imbalance, frustrations and unresolved inner conflicts, or to get some adrenaline stimulation. In order to create kshatriyas it is not sufficient to give weapons to immature or psychotic people, or to indoctrinate them with inflammatory rhetoric on the greatness of a religious or cultural tradition, or fuel their fear and prejudice against those who are perceived as different.

In the traditional gurukula, a kshatriya boy needs to study and train just a little less than a brahmana, learning to use his brain properly, acquiring the proper self-control and discipline, exploring the subtleties of strategy and politics, and especially understanding the science of dharma and its applications. Unless he has truly become proficient in all this, as well as in physical training, he must not be endorsed as a qualified kshatriya by the Guru.

कार्पण्यदोषोपहतस्वभावः पृच्छामि त्वां धर्मसम्मूढचेताः ।

kārpanyadoṣopahatasvabhāvaḥ pr̥cchāmi tvāṁ dharmasammūḍhacetāḥ ।

यच्छ्रेयः स्यान्निश्चितं ब्रूहि तन्मे शिष्यस्तेऽहं शाधि मां त्वां प्रपन्नम् ॥ २-७ ॥

yacchreyaḥ syānniścitaṁ brūhi tanme śiṣyaste'haṁ śādhi mām tvāṁ prapannam ॥ 2-7 ॥

karpanya: of pettiness; dosha: defect; upahata: afflicted; svabhavaḥ: natural inclination; pricchami: I am asking; tvam: you; dharma: dharma; sammudha: confused; etah: consciousness; yat: that; sreyah: (real) good; syat: would be; niscitam: without any doubt; brubi: tell; tat: that; me: to me; sisyah: disciple; te: to you; aham: I; sadhi: instruct; mam: me; tvam: you; prapannam: surrendered.

"My nature is now afflicted by weakness. (Therefore) I am asking you (to clarify) the confusion of my mind about dharma, to tell me without a doubt what is the best thing to do. I am your disciple and I take shelter in you: (please) instruct me."

A kripana is a narrow-minded person who identifies with the body. The Bhagavata Purana (1.13.25) says, debo 'yam krpanasya jijivishoh, "desiring to continue life in this body", (4.28.6) kripanah vishaya-atmakah, "attached/ identified to the objects of sense gratification" (6.9.49), na veda kripanah sreyah, "he does not know the real benefit (of human life)" (7.9.45), yan maithunadi grihamedhi-sukham ... kripanah, "(attached) to all types of family pleasures, starting from sex life" (11.21.27).

This does not refer to the selfless love and dutiful service that one should give to the members of one's family: it's about the attachment to the idea of getting pleasure from them. Ignorant people who are attached to the lust of sense gratification, exploitation, possession and domination usually condemn genuine love and affection relationships, mistaking dharma for adharma, and adharma for dharma. In fact Gita (9.49) pinpoints the description of the kṛpāna by saying that he acts selfishly, with the purpose of getting a personal benefit: phala-betavah. Another famous quote about the meaning of kṛpāna comes from Brhad aranyaka Upanishad (3.8.10): yo va etad aksaram gargy aviditvasmal lokat praiti sa kṛpanah, "O Gargi, a kṛpāna is one who leaves this world without knowing Brahman ('that which never changes')". Svabhava means "natural inclination", and more specifically it refers to the natural guna and karma of each individual by which he is instinctively attracted to some activity as he has the natural talent to perform it. Arjuna is a kṣatriya by nature, therefore his svabhava is to protect the kingdom and the subject from adharma. But what is dharmic in a circumstance can be adharmic in another, so things are not so easy.

Arjuna recognizes that his previous arguments were faulty, poor and narrow minded, and he wants Krishna to dispel his doubts for him, and explain the actual meaning of dharma. The concept of dharma is often translated as "religion", but this can be misleading because the mainstream western concept of religion is shaped on the abrahamic mentality, where blind allegiance to an exclusive system of belief is the only thing that matters. Abrahamic religions do not give any importance to objective ethical considerations, individual responsibility, personal evolution, or reconciliation of apparent differences or opposites into a greater picture of Reality. The word dharma comes from the root dhr, meaning "to support", and it refers to the intrinsic, characteristic and positive quality of being that supports existence. So just like the fire's intrinsic quality is to radiate heat and light, the kṣatriya's intrinsic quality is to defend society from aggressors and support its progress. In this way, each human being directly participates to the divine activities of creation, maintenance and dissolution of the world, and constitutes a cell in the body of the Universal Person, the Virat Purusha. However, sometimes the consciousness of the human being can become confused due to various factors, and therefore his natural duty can be covered by other considerations.

Niscitam means "beyond all doubts". It is true that doubt is a function of intelligence, but they are only meant to make us think thoroughly and verify things before making a choice. They are never intended to keep us from doing what is right and necessary, therefore after clarifying them we need to move on. The word śiṣya means "disciple": here Arjuna recognizes that Krishna knows better than him, and he surrenders himself as a humble disciple, ready to accept instructions and to follow orders. The word śreya ("best thing to do") is the opposite of preya ("pleasurable thing to do"). They could be defined also as the "hard but right thing" and the "easy but wrong thing" to do.

न हि प्रपश्यामि ममापनुद्याद् यच्छोकमुच्छोषणमिन्द्रियाणाम् ।

na hi prapaśyāmi mamāpanudyād yacchokamucchoṣaṇamindriyāṇām ।

अवाप्य भूमावसपत्नमृद्धं राज्यं सुराणामपि चाधिपत्यम् ॥ २-८ ॥

avāpya bhūmāvasapatnamṛddham rājyaṁ surāṇāmapī cādhipatyam ॥ 2-8 ॥

na: not; hi: certainly; prapaśyami: I can see; mama: my; apanudyat: can send away; yat: that; sokam: depression; ucchoṣaṇam: that dries up; indriyaṇam: the senses; avāpya: obtaining; bhūman: on earth; asapatnam: without equal; riddham: prosperous; rājyaṁ: kingdom; suranam: of the Devas; api: even; ca: and; adhipatyam: supreme control.

"I do not see how I could dispel this sadness that is drying up my senses, even if I achieved, on this earth itself, the unchallenged position of a prosperous ruler over the heavenly planets."

The word sokam indicates the feeling of depression, that is expressed as sadness and lamentation, and that takes away any interest, happiness and enthusiasm in life. Arjuna has come to the point where one is fed up with the complications and difficulties of life, with the uncertainty of the outcome of his activities, no matter what choices he makes. In a previous verse (2.2) Krishna mentioned that weakness and sentimentalism that distract from the duty of defending society from criminals will not take one to Svarga, the heavenly planets that are the residence of the virtuous and godly administrators of the universe. In this verse, Arjuna is clearly replying that he is not interested to go there - not even if he could obtain such heavenly position without having to leave his present body, while continuing to live on this planet. Abrahamic faiths teach that the highest possible destination for a human being is paradise or heaven, a place characterized by prolonged and lavish sensual pleasures that belong to the same materialistic category of the pleasures of this world - food, drink, sex, beautiful clothing and ornaments, nice housing, gardens, flowers, music and dance, etc. However, such position is still material. Even the heavenly beings who live in paradise (Svarga) have a material body, and although it is a beautiful and very powerful body, and will continue to exist for a very long time (making them almost immortal), still at the time of the dissolution of the universe, at the end of the cycle of the cosmic manifestation, such position will be destroyed. The suras are constantly fighting against the asuras: the entire universe is their kingdom and they are also responsible for the protection and progress of their prajas that are periodically threatened by evil aggressors who have a demoniac mentality. Even Brahma, the highest and most powerful living entity of this universe, is subject to such harassment. Besides, he only lives for 100 of his years, and at the end of his life the entire universe (including heavens) is withdrawn into the non-manifested state. Here Arjuna says that he will not find happiness in such a condition, because true happiness can be found only on another and higher level of reality, that is truly eternal, and he wants Krishna to talk about that.

The transcendental level of Brahman, called akṣhara ("not subject to change") is the real eternal existence. Such level is also called Vaikuntha, "free from anxiety", and it is described as the spiritual world where Sadashiva Vishnu exists eternally. Anyone who attains the liberated stage, the Self realization of Atman, Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan, will instantly be established on that transcendental level - that will not be disturbed or touched at the time of the dissolution of this universe. Krishna will therefore explain Gita to clarify this all-important knowledge of Atman, Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. By this knowledge, one will attain a level that is much higher, permanent and happier than paradise.

सञ्जय उवाच ।

sañjaya uvāca ।

एवमुक्त्वा हृषीकेशं गुडाकेशः परन्तपः । न योत्स्य इति गोविन्दमुक्त्वा तूष्णीं बभूव ह ॥ २-९ ॥

evamuktva hrīṣīkeśaṁ guḍākeśaḥ parantapaḥ । na yotsya iti govindamuktva tūṣṇīm babhūva ha ॥ 2-9 ॥

sanjaya: Sanjaya; uvaca: said; evam: like this; uktva: having said; hrishikesam: to Hrishikesha, "the master of the senses"; gudakesah: Gudakesha, "the master of sleep"; parantapah: Parantapa, "who burns his opponents"; na: not; yotsya: I will fight; iti: this; govindam: Govinda, "who gives pleasure to the senses, the earth and cows"; uktva: having said; tushnim: silent; babhuva: became; ha: certainly.

Sanjaya said: After thus speaking to Hrishikesha (Krishna), Gudakesha Parantapa (Arjuna) said, "O Govinda, I will not engage in battle", and then became silent.

Arjuna has already presented himself to Krishna as an obedient disciple, ready to be instructed. This, however, does not mean he should stop thinking, or presenting his views or problems. The first duty of the Guru is to listen to the disciple, so that s/he can get a clear picture of the actual position of the disciple and offer the appropriate and personalized instructions. Although everyone is on the same path, each individual has a different story, different qualities and tendencies, different problems, different realizations, and different capabilities. Such differences do not pertain only to the material level, but also extend to the spiritual sphere, creating a wonderful variety of rasas or transcendental sentiments and service moods, that multiplied into the great number of different Personalities of Godhead - who have unlimited names, forms, qualities and activities - constitute the amazingly immense and varied world of bhakti.

Some foolish people, in the name of being "personalists", totally disregard the actual guna and karma of the individual as well as his/ her particular sentiment (rasa) that awaits to be developed, his/ her attraction towards a particular form of the Godhead, and the specific potential s/he can develop in the area of devotional service. All their followers are therefore expected to become blank slates, washed clean of all previous individuality and personality, rejecting all their memories and capabilities including the spiritual realizations or aspirations they may have had before "being initiated". They are told that all such previous things are maya, "illusion" or material lies: anything that existed before the moment of "joining the movement" is unreal and intrinsically bad and dangerous. Even later, communication remains one-way only for these people: the "Guru" speaks, and the disciple can only listen. The disciple is expected to turn into an impersonal lump to be shaped into the only type of standardized personality that is acceptable for the institution. Everyone is expected to develop the same type of rasa for the same form of the Personality of Godhead, to follow exactly the same process, to develop the same abilities, tastes, and mannerism in speaking, walking, moving, etc. Thinking and questioning are strongly discouraged, and the result is some kind of trance-like sleep in which one remains unable to see the facts as they are. Sometimes this process is described as "brainwashing". On the contrary, in this verse Arjuna is called Gudakesha: one who has vanquished sleep and therefore is very alert. He is speaking to Hrishikesha, whose mastership over the senses leaves ample space to the exercise of the individual's free will and personal evolution. Another meaning of the name Gudakesha is "who has knotted hair", referring to the practical way of tying up one's hair when preparing for battle.

The two names Parantapa and Govinda are also poetically juxtaposed in the verse: Arjuna's nature, or svabhava, is to fight adharma with great determination, skill and power, opposing even the greatest enemies on the battlefield, while Govinda is the source of pleasure and progress for the senses of all beings and for the Earth, too. These two apparently opposite necessities perfectly summarize Arjuna's dilemma. It is to be noted, however, that after presenting all the proper information and discussion with the teacher, the student should become silent and listen carefully at the teacher. This is precisely what Arjuna is doing here: after fully expressing what he had to say, he becomes silent and ready to listen to what Krishna has to say.

तमुवाच हृषीकेशः प्रहसन्निव भारत । सेनयोरुभयोर्मध्ये विषीदन्तमिदं वचः ॥ २-१० ॥

tamuvāca hrīṣīkeśaḥ prahasanniva bhārata । senayorubhayormadhye viśīdantamidaṁ vacaḥ ॥ 2-10 ॥

tam: him; uvaca: said; hrishikesah: Hrishikesha; prahasan: smiling; iva: like; bharata: o descendant of Bharata; senayoh: the two armies; ubhayoh: both; madhye: in the middle; vishidantam: to him who was depressed; idam: this; vach: speech.

"O Bharata, Hrishikesha smiled and spoke these words to him, the depressed (Arjuna), while they were between the two armies."

The word hasan, "smiling", shows that Krishna is not worried by Arjuna's display of despair and dejection. Krishna has all the right answers, and he is soon going to present them for the benefit of all those who will hear the wonderful conversation between the two friends on the battlefield. This also includes us, of course. The second chapter of Gita is called Sankhya or Samkhya Yoga. Sometimes the term sankhya is translated as "enumeration", or "analysis" of the various components of Reality. However, sankhya or samyak also refers to the correct understanding of the Knowledge that reveals (kyayate) Reality.

This second chapter is a general overview on the contents of the entire Gita, including Jnana (11-46), Karma (47-60), Bhakti (61-70) and Sannyasa (71-72). These are all integral parts of the process of Self realization, that is aimed at understanding and living our real nature of spiritual souls, temporarily encased within a material body. Of course when we have fully realized our real identity and nature we can still engage in playing the roles that are required in society and to fulfill our duties, but with a huge difference - we will not be confused and afflicted by illusion and suffering. This is precisely the definition of "lila": like God, all truly self-realized souls engage in a dramatized story, playing a role required by the plot, but they never become attached to it, and they never really suffer or become confused. Arjuna is only pretending to be confused, and that's why Krishna is smiling: he is greatly enjoying the play. Of course, we can also interpret Krishna's smile at many other levels: it is first of all a smile of love and compassion, as Arjuna is offering him the opportunity to benefit all the confused conditioned souls and help them out of their sufferings. So Krishna feels love and affection for Arjuna, who is his eternal friend and companion and as such is cooperating with him in this great mission. Krishna also feels love and affection for all those who will benefit from such teachings. Another reason why Krishna is smiling is that he wants to show to Arjuna, and to us as well, that he does not disapprove of Arjuna's arguments, and he is not upset because of his statements.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

अशोच्यानन्वशोचस्त्वं प्रज्ञावादांश्च भाषसे । गतासूनगतासूंश्च नानुशोचन्ति पण्डिताः ॥ २-११ ॥

asocyānanvashocastvaṁ prajāvādāṁśca bhāṣase । gatāsūnagatāsūṁśca nānuśocanti paṇḍitāḥ ॥ 2-11 ॥

sri: glorious; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; asocyan: not worthy of lamentation; anvasocah: you are lamenting; tvaṁ: you; prajna: wise; vadan: words; ca: and; bhashase: you speak; gatasun: those who have gone; agatasun: those who have not gone; ca: and; na: not; anusocanti: they lament; paṇḍitah: the learned (persons).

The glorious Lord said: "Although you speak wisely, you are lamenting for something that should not make you sad. Those who really know the truth do not grieve for the dead or for the living."

This is the first verse that opens Krishna's teachings to Arjuna and all of us, and it is dense with meaning and worthy of being learned by heart. It would be very nice to memorize all the verses of the entire Gita, but since not many people are able to do so, it is advisable to memorize at least a collection of the most famous verses.

As we focus our attention on the glorious Lord Krishna, we may spend some time on meditating on the word "srī" that always accompanies his name. Sri is the Mother Goddess, the personification of glory, beauty, opulence, and perfection. There is no "Bhagavan" without "Sri", as Bhagavan means "one who has bhaga", where bhaga specifically means "opulence" or "fortune" - and all forms of opulence or fortune are personified in Sri, or Lakshmi, the Mother Goddess. Traditionally, such opulences are listed as six: beauty, wealth, strength, fame, knowledge and detachment. The theological meaning of the name Bhagavan thus implies a form and attributes, and a personality including sentiments, feelings, thoughts, desires and intentions. Therefore it is said that Bhagavan is the "personal" aspect of the Godhead, while Paramatma is the "localized" aspect of the Godhead that is present within the heart of all living beings (and within each atom of the creation as well) and Brahman is the "impersonal" aspect of the Godhead, that is all pervading.

Bhagavata purana (1.2.11) clearly explains that these three aspects of the Godhead are one and the same: vadanti tat tattva vīdas tattvam yaj jñānam advayam, brāhmetī paramatmetī bhagavan iti saḍyate. However, one can really understand Bhagavan only after realizing Brahman and Paramatma - otherwise one's bhakti would just be materialistic devotion, a sentimentalistic affection that can only encourage the devotee towards a preliminary attraction for the Lord. Such realization of Brahman and Paramatma, of course, is not subject to the official approval or certification by some institution or religious lineage. Brahman realization simply consists in actually realizing the spiritual nature that is the true identity of God and of the individual soul as well. As long as we remain deeply convinced that we are the material body/ mind and we are defined by its attributes - in terms of race, nationality, gender, caste, etc - we will only be able to see God as a statue made of material elements, or as a historical figure born in a particular period. Paramatma realization simply consists in actually feeling the presence of God in our heart, and realizing that we are nothing but emanations of the Godhead, therefore our only function is to relate to the Godhead in a positive sentiment. Without this realization, our actions will remain disconnected from the universal plan and plagued by selfishness - even if such selfishness expands beyond the limits of the single individual to identify one with one's family, one's community, one's nation, or one's particular cultural or religious tradition, and therefore make him exclusively attached to them. Thus, paṇḍita or "knowledgeable and wise", is a person who has overcome the bodily identification and attachments. We will see more of this definition later in the text. On the other hand, prajna means "aware, conscious, conscientious".

Krishna observes that Arjuna is speaking sagely about the protection of dharma within the family, and the effects that family degradation can have on society, and he praises him for that. This clarifies that Krishna does not reject Arjuna's previous arguments per se: they were perfectly dharmic and appropriate, but they only constituted a level of dharma that is intended to be followed in normal circumstances. Another interesting point is that Krishna says that knowledgeable persons do not "grieve either for the dead or for the living", implying that often carrying on with life in certain circumstances can be more difficult than dying. Bhishma, Drona and the other great personalities are not to be pitied because they will simply obtain the result of their own choices and activities, just like everybody else.

न त्वेवाहं जातु नासं न त्वं नेमे जनाधिपाः । न चैव न भविष्यामः सर्वे वयमतः परम् ॥ २-१२ ॥

na tvevāhaṁ jatū nāsaṁ na tvaṁ neme janādhipāḥ । na caiva na bhaviṣyāmaḥ sarve vayamataḥ param ॥ 2-12 ॥

na: not; tu: but; eva: certainly; aham: I; jatu: at any time; na: not; asam: exist; na: not/neither; tvam: you; na: not; ime: these; jana: of people; adhipah: leaders; na: not; ca: and; eva: certainly; na: not; bhaviṣyamah: we will be; sarve: all; vayam: us; atah: now; param: after.

"Certainly there was never a time when I did not exist, and you and all these chieftains of men have always existed as well. Also, none of us will cease to exist in the future."

In the previous verse Krishna has stated that there is no need to grieve for those who are dead, and in this verse he explains why: because we never actually die. We disappear from the eyes of the people around us because we leave the body, and after that the material form that we manifested is no longer visible, as the atoms composing it will disperse. All material bodies are composed of atoms of matter that aggregate and disaggregate constantly, so much that every 7 years all the cells/ atoms of our body have been replaced by new ones. During one lifetime the "magnet" of the material consciousness called ahankara keeps attracting material atoms and the disaggregation is a slow process by which fresh atoms are attracted through food etc and old atoms are lost through the biological functions. At the time of death the disaggregation process becomes more dramatic as the ahankara "magnet" becomes completely detached from that particular body and this does not attract any fresh atoms - so only the decay and dispersion of the old atoms is visible. In subsequent verses Krishna will explain this process more specifically.

In this verse Krishna includes himself (aham), as well as Arjuna (tvam) and the other warriors (jana adhipah), in the eternal and transcendental category of spirit. This verse states the inconceivable individual nature of Brahman, the Atman, that is simultaneously One and Many. The aham and tvam, the individual nature and consciousness, continues also after liberation from material identification, just like each molecule of water continues to exist individually with a precise shape and nature even after the droplet has dissolved into the ocean. What disappears is just the temporary shape of the drop, not the inherent nature of water (H<sub>2</sub>O).

Some commentators state that this verse refers only to the bodies and not to the Atman, but such an idea is clearly rejected in the subsequent verses of Gita, where Krishna explains how the body is never eternal, while the soul is. So when Krishna says that "none of us will ever cease to be" he cannot possibly be speaking about the bodies. The misunderstanding is probably caused by the intermediate level of identification of the embodied soul - the subtle body or mind, that is also material - that continues to exist from one lifetime to the next, carrying the karmic seeds and the root of material identification (the ahankara). But that is not eternal, either, because it will dissolve at the time of liberation. If we consider that Krishna is on a transcendental, liberated level, we cannot think that he is talking about the subtle material body - the material mind characterized by material bodily identification. The eternal individuality of which Krishna is speaking refers to the Atman/ Brahman, and is therefore on the pure transcendental level. It is a fact that in the process of spiritual evolution in this world, the material mind is gradually substituted by spiritual intelligence, as the spiritual body (siddha deha, or sva-rupa) grows and manifests more and more in our personality. Such spiritual body or spiritual form is the natural expansion of the anu-atman, and is developed in the association of the spiritual form of the Godhead and everything that is divine in nature - the transcendental names, qualities, activities, teachings, companions, abodes, etc of the Godhead. The living entity emanates from the Godhead as a seed (bija), an atomic (anu atman) spark of the Fire, as a minuscule cell of the body of the Parama Purusha, but it contains the "spiritual DNA" (so to speak) by which he will be able to perfectly develop into a fully fledged spiritual form and personality like Bhagavan. This is also called sarupya mukti, the liberation that consists in developing the same form of the Lord. When we recognize that Vishnu is transcendental and not material, then his names, qualities, activities, teachings, companions, abodes, etc must also be transcendental. And in order to be able to approach Vishnu for worship and service, we also need to develop a transcendental body, that will gradually manifest in this world in the course of our sadhana and will be perfectly self-sufficient at the time at death when we leave our material body.

देहिनोऽस्मिन्यथा देहे कौमारं यौवनं जरा । तथा देहान्तरप्राप्तिर्धिरस्तत्र न मुह्यति ॥ २-१३ ॥

dehino'sminyathā dehe kaumāraṁ yauvanam jarā । tathā dehāntaraprāptirdhīrastatra na muhyati ॥ 2-13 ॥

dehinah: one has a (material) body; asmin: in this (world); yatha: as is; dehe: in the body; kaumaram: in childhood; yauvanam: in youth; jara: in old age; tatha: like that; deha: of the body; antara: end; praptih: attained; dhirah: one who is sober; tatra: there; na: not; muhyati: is confused.

"The embodied soul who lives in this body (passes from one form to the other) as from childhood to youth to old age, and similarly at the end of this body (he passes on). A wise person is not confused by this (passage)."

Each person knows there is a continuity of individual existence through childhood, youth and old age, although the body undergoes great changes, to the point we could say those are totally different bodies. To understand this point, it is sufficient to see a number of photos of the same person taken at 7 to 10 years intervals from each other. It is said that almost all the cells of our body are naturally replaced in a cycle of 7 years. We can compare the spirit soul to a magnet that can modulate its power of attraction according to the particular identification. When the Atman identifies with the transcendental nature he becomes instantly attracted to it, but when he identifies with the material existence he remains stuck there. The magnetic power continues to exist, but the attraction mode changes.

The material elements can be compared to iron dust that becomes attracted and sticks to the magnet. Due to the inherent nature of iron, the particles of iron will oxidize and become rusty, thus losing the power to stick to the magnet. As they fall off, fresh iron particles are attracted and replace the old ones, although the fresh iron becomes oxidized more quickly because of the presence of already rusting particles around the magnet: this is called old age. Eventually the entire crust of variously rusted iron particles can be broken apart easily, especially because of some strong shock, and then the magnet rolls away towards a more suitable stock of fresh material and again starts attracting particles to form a new body. However, there is continuity of consciousness for the owner of the body. The abam ("I") has no doubt about his own progressive identity. But material identification plays tricks and creates confusion. Who am I? Am I a child, a young man or woman, or a "senior citizen"? So as soon as he becomes convinced of the new specific material identification pertaining to that present material form, the embodied soul forgets his previous specific material identification - a young man or woman will say "I am not a child (any more)", and an old man or woman will say "I am not young (any more)". In this confusion, the embodied soul tends to attach itself more anxiously to other identifications that appear to be more permanent - such as the gender (male/ female), the race, the caste, the social position, the religious affiliation, the political views, the job/ occupation, personal interests or even liking and disliking such as wearing a particular type of clothes and ornaments, a passion for gourmet food, for camping or hiking, for practicing a sport, health and fitness practices, and so on.

Some of such identifications may seem more reliable and other flimsier and more subject to change due to external circumstances (such as the loss of a job, a reverse of fortunes that destroys one's social position, an accident that leaves us handicapped, etc), but the more one is afraid of evolving, the more s/he will be attached to such definitions of one's identity. This is why many people feel threatened in their own self-identification by seeing others who change religious affiliation, gender identification, nationality, social identification, or other conventions based on external appearances such as the way of dressing etc. These attached people will be the ones who suffer most when the inevitable changes of material nature will force them to let go of their attachments - for example, when they become old, or when they die. These people are not sober as they are plagued by endless anxieties and fears, that manifest as greed and lust and anger, but they pretend to be the only sober or "normal" people around because they think of themselves as the "defenders of the permanent" since they desperately try to oppose change. But as change is the nature of the world, they can only be defeated. Old age and death are the greatest fears for these so-called "guardians of normality". Thus they try to create an artificial world where old age and death are not visible and therefore they can delude themselves into thinking they have prevailed over change. Death becomes a taboo topic, a disgrace to be avoided at all costs, or at least to be hidden and forgotten, something unjust and cruel that does not make any sense. Society conventions also condemn old age and all the bodily modifications that generally accompany it - such as wrinkles, white hair, reduced sexual activity, changes of shape in the body, complexion irregularities, slower metabolism, etc. People who do not "keep fit" are treated with contempt or victimized, made the subject of spiteful jokes, or forced out of sight. If they want to go around freely they must lose or gain weight, go to a gym, follow a diet, undergo plastic surgery, dye their hair, dress in a flattering way, and even take medication against menopause and other normal symptoms of aging. All this is intended to defend the "last stand" of bodily identification against the inevitable changes of nature that harbingers death, the final and irreversible change.

मात्रास्पर्शास्तु कौन्तेय शीतोष्णसुखदुःखदाः । आगमापयिनोऽनित्यास्तांस्तितिक्षस्व भारत ॥ २-१४ ॥

mātrāsparsāstu kaunteya śītoṣṇasukhaduḥkhaḍāḥ | āgamāpayino'nityāstāṁstitikṣasva bhārata || 2-14 ||

matra: instrument; sparsah: touch; tu: but; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); śita: winter; uṣṇa: summer; sukha: joy; duḥkha: distress; dah: that give; agama: coming; apayinah: disappearing; anityah: temporary; tan: them; itikṣasva: you should tolerate; bharata: o descendant of Bharata (Arjuna).

"O son of Kunti, the contact of the senses (with the sense objects) causes joy and distress just like (cold in) winter and (heat in) summer. Such feelings are temporary: they come and go, o descendant of Bharata, and you should just try to tolerate them (without being confused and distracted from your duty)."

It is always important to study a concept within its proper context, and Krishna's teachings to Arjuna should also be considered as a discussion that follows a logical thread, and not as a random collection of aphorisms that have no connection with each other. In the previous verses Krishna answered Arjuna's doubts, saying that one should not be distracted from his duty by the idea of death, because the Atman is eternal. Each jīvatma exists eternally, passing from one body to another in the course of one lifetime and also from one life to another. Now Krishna is saying that such passages or changes are part of the natural cycle of life, like the seasons of the year, and they are just as temporary. Birth, life in a material body and death are temporary conditions, and it is this impermanence that disturbs the attached mind. But how do we notice such changes? Through the information that is supplied to our mind by the five senses of knowledge acquisition.

How can we ascertain whether a man is dead or alive? By looking at him, by listening to his breathing or other sounds he may produce, by touching his body, and so on. Our senses enable us to carry on the desired interactions with the people we are attached to, and when we cannot perceive the face or the voice or the touch of a loved person, we feel something is missing: we miss his/ her presence. The contact between our senses of perception and the tanmatra relative to the bodies of a person we are attached to produces pleasure, while the lack of such contact produces suffering. The example offered by Krishna is thus particularly appropriate: the pleasure of the presence of a person we are attached to "warms" our heart, while his/ her absence produces a sense of coldness and solitude.

When the attachment is strong enough, the presence or absence of such tanmatra can produce respectively a fire of passion that is as hot as any torrid summer, and a freezing despair that is as cold as any Himalayan winter. However, it is impossible to remain always in the physical presence of our near and dear ones, because we have duties to perform. A child will have to leave his mother to go to school, a husband will have to leave his wife to go to work, a parent will have leave his grown-up children and grandchildren in order to embrace the renounced order of life, and ultimately we all have to leave each other when life or death forces separation on us.

Matra is "something that can be measured". The sense objects are measured by the senses to evaluate the various types and levels of pleasure or suffering that the contact with such objects can give. There is a difference between matra and vishaya: both terms apply to the "objects of the senses", but matra is the subtle matrix of sense perception that remains within the subtle body of the perceiver, while the vishaya are the objects that are perceived externally. Thus the pancha tanmatra are the modes of sense perception, or the matrices of the five objects of the senses: the śabda tanmatra is the sound vibration, the sparsa tanmatra is the touch, the rūpa tanmatra is the form, the rasa tanmatra is the flavor, and the gandha tanmatra is the smell. We should be careful not to confuse the matra or vishaya with the actual person whose body's form, sound, or touch we contemplate as matra or vishaya. Foolish people are in the habit of blaming the sense objects for their own lust or disappointment, but that is only due to ignorance. The word sparsa can refer to the contact or to the object that is contacted. The meaning of the verse is that the contact between the organs and the objects produces the feelings we know as heat and cold, joy and sorrow, etc in their various measures. Sometimes cold produces pleasure and sometimes it produces suffering, depending on various factors, and even within the same category of feeling, heat and cold, joy and sorrow can be milder or stronger depending on various factors. For example: people pay top money to get a sauna treatment in the winter, but during the summer they can hardly tolerate the same temperature and humidity in their bedroom when they are trying to sleep. Naturally all the changes of the material body - birth, growth during childhood, the passage through adolescence, the process of aging, and death itself - cause a various mixture of joy and sorrow, because they imply the association or separation between bodies and between the bodies and the material things and surroundings. The real cause of such joys and sorrows is the contact or lack of contact between the senses and the objects of the senses. Normally the embodied being runs after joys and away from sorrows, but no matter how far we try to run, we will always meet with joys and sorrows, because we are carrying them around in our subtle body as matra. So the real solution to the problems of existence is to perform our proper duty: doing the right thing without being confused or deterred by selfish considerations. Both joy and sorrow need to be tolerated in the discharge of our duty. Krishna does not say that one should not experience joy or sorrow, but simply that we need to tolerate them as mere temporary disturbances, like excessive cold in winter and excessive heat in summer. As long as we have a material body we will feel them.

The names Kaunteya and Bharata are significant here. Krishna wants to remind Arjuna that he is the descendant of great personalities, who tolerated much in their lives without ever neglecting their duties.

यं हि न व्यथयन्त्येते पुरुषं पुरुषर्षभ । समदुःखसुखं धीरं सोऽमृतत्वाय कल्पते ॥ २-१५ ॥

yaṁ hi na vyathayantyete puruṣaṁ puruṣarṣabha | samaduhkhasukhaṁ dhīraṁ so'mṛtatvāya kalpate || 2-15 ||

yaṁ: one who; hi: certainly; na: not; vyathayantyē: are causing disturbance; ete: these; puruṣaṁ: a person; puruṣa-rṣabha: o best among persons; sama: equal; duhkha: suffering; sukhaṁ: joy; dhīraṁ: sober; saḥ: he; amṛitatvāya: for immortality; kalpate: thinks about.

"O best among men, one who is not distracted by all these (feelings) and is always equally balanced in suffering and in joy, is a sober person and he can aspire to immortality."

Krishna has been speaking about the death of the body and the immortality of the soul, and how the joys and sorrows connected to the changes of the material body are due to the contact with the objects of the senses. The attachment to the joys and sorrows originating from the contact with the sense objects is the real cause of death and rebirth. What is death? It is the force that separates us from the sense objects to which we are attached. Since we are still attached to the sense objects, rebirth is inevitable because we need another material body to contact them again. As death only refers to the material body, it must only apply to what is pertaining to the material body - precisely the joys and sorrows created by the contact of the material senses with the material objects of the senses. Once a person overcomes the identification with the material senses and the attachment to the material objects of the senses, death disappears. In fact, death does not really exist because, as Krishna has already explained, the embodied being constantly passes from one body to another but remains always the same in spite of all such passages.

Amṛitatra means "immortality" and is a synonym for moksha or liberation. Many people have strange and confused ideas about liberation: they tend to believe that moksha is some kind of ticket for a journey from a particular place (the "material world") to another particular place (the "spiritual world"), that can be won in a lottery, purchased or received as a gift, or through bribery.

This idea mostly comes from the abrahamic concept of "salvation" (a word that is sometimes incorrectly used to translate the Sanskrit term moksha), in which allegiance to a particular religious affiliation gives the immediate and automatic right to "go to heaven" even to the most unevolved and gross materialist. But such an idea is very foolish, and those who entertain it are in the terrible danger of wasting the valuable opportunity of the human birth, because they will refuse to make any effort in personal development, believing that they are already "saved".

The true facts are very different. As Gita (8.6) clearly explains, at the time of death we will only be able to attain whatever level of consciousness we have actually developed during this lifetime. If we do not live the realization that we are already in the spiritual world now, in this very body, there will be no divine airplane coming to take us to Vaikuntha at the time of death.

We cannot pay or bribe, beg, trick or sneak our way to liberation, because liberation is just about our own consciousness – our being able to remain on the transcendental level without being deluded and confused by material identification, attachment and conditions of life. This is only possible if we become truly dhira, or “sober”. The word kalpana means “desire, intention, determination”, and as such it is used during rituals to describe the declaration of intents for the ceremony. By using the word kalpate in this verse, Krishna is saying that liberation can be achieved by a sober (unattached) person who is steady in determination: this makes him/ her fit or eligible for immortality. Some commentators link this verse with the need for the formal acceptance of the order of sannyasa, by which one officially detaches himself/ herself from the pursuance of sense enjoyment. This is all very good when the sannyasi or sannyasini has already attained the level of self realization and utilizes the position to give a good example to the society in general, but it can be disastrous when the candidate is not ready and follows the very adharmic and stupid principle of “fake it till you make it”. In later chapters (3.6, 6.1) Krishna will very clearly explain that a person who simply restrains his senses but has still some attachment for the senses objects in his mind is a fool and a cheater, and that real sannyasa is not about rules and regulations but about performing one's duties selflessly. In Kali yuga there is no need to take formal sannyasa. Brahma vaivarta purana says, asvamedham gavallambham sannyasam pala patrkam devarena sutotpattim kalau pancha vivarjayet: “In the age of Kali five acts should be avoided: the asvamedha yajna, the gomedha yajna, the acceptance of the order of sannyasa, the offering of oblations to the forefathers, and a man's begetting children in his brother's wife.” Later on Krishna will clearly explain that the real sannyasa is about renouncing the selfish attachment and identification with the actions, not renouncing action itself.

नासतो विद्यते भावो नाभावो विद्यते सतः । उभयोरपि दृष्टोऽन्तस्त्वनयोस्तत्त्वदर्शिभिः ॥ २-१६ ॥

nāsato vidyate bhāvo nābhāvo vidyate sataḥ । ubhayorapi dr̥ṣṭo'ntastvanayostattvadarśibhiḥ ।। 2-16 ।।

na: not; asatah: of what is asat; vidyate: is known; bhavaḥ: existence; na: not; abhavaḥ: non-existence; vidyate: is known; satah: of what is sat; ubhayor: of the two; api: certainly; drishtaḥ: seen; antaḥ: the conclusion; tu: but; anayor: either of them; tattva: of tattva (truth); darśibhiḥ: those who see.

"Those who see the truth know that what is illusory/ temporary/ bad will not (continue to) be, while what is real/ eternal/ good will never be destroyed. They have carefully observed both things and reached this conclusion."

Krishna is still speaking about the constant changing of the body and the impermanent nature of the contact of the senses with the sense objects. Sat and its contrary asat are extremely important concepts in the philosophy of Gita. Sat means "existence, reality, goodness, permanence, spirit", or in its adjective form means "actual, real, true, good, right, eternal, spiritual, transcendental". Its opposite asat therefore means "non-existent, illusory, false, wrong, impermanent or temporary, material".

All these definitions can be applied to this verse to expand its layers of meanings. The general picture we get from the combination of all such meanings is that even the material world is a manifestation of the compassion of God, and everything "bad" is simply a temporary and illusory experience, similar to a vivid dream or virtual reality, meant to help us in our learning and development. Anxiety (kuntā) dissipates when we actually realize that illusion cannot last long, while what is real is never subject to change as it exists beyond transformation. However, we need to carefully understand that asat as "non-existent" or "false" is a relative meaning, as it refers to the transformation and not to the void. There is no void or sunya anywhere in this universe. What appears to be void is actually full of invisible particles... molecules of various gases in the air or of cosmic dust in space, atoms of elements, photons of light and other radiations, and especially the omnipresent existence of the energy of Brahman.

The example is often given of water. On our planet water is everywhere, even in the deserts: there is no place on earth where there is 0% moisture in the air. The percentage may be very low, but still it is not absolute zero. Invisible to our eyes, this moisture rises up in the atmosphere and condensates in clouds, that are more or less visible, then it precipitates as rain or snow, that is very much visible. Rain and snow feed streams and rivers, that are even more permanently visible than rain, and rivers flow down to the oceans, that are even more permanently visible than rivers, although even oceans are not eternally manifested and can disappear, too. From there, molecules of water evaporate again and are carried around by the air in a constant cycle. Clouds and rain are the most temporary form of water, yet their temporary manifestation enables the growth of the bodies of plants and animals and human beings as well. And the human body affords the priceless opportunity of striving for liberation or immortality. Contemporary science is now helping our understanding by showing that solid matter is actually nothing but vibrating energy - matter does not exist... in the sense that it is not what it seems. However, a ton of bricks falling on your head certainly have the tangible and real effect to destroy your human opportunity, although the contact between your senses and the bricks as objects of your senses will be very temporary.

A tattva darshi is "one who sees Reality", a person who has the direct and real perception and experience of truth - not because he "heard" about it or because he "chose to believe" it. A darshana is a perspective or vision of Reality - both in knowledge (as in the Sat darshana - Vedanta, Karma, Yoga, Sankhya, Nyaya, Vaisheshika) and in worship (as in the darshana of the Deities in the temple). The concept of darshana is different from "opinion", because an opinion is simply a mental elaboration that may be right or wrong and therefore it needs verification, while a darshana is the genuine, true and clear experience of a consistent vision. Between the two there is the same difference that separates hearing the description of an elephant and actually seeing the elephant in the flesh. The word Tat is a sarvanama or pronoun, meaning "that", the same Tat of the mahavakyas such as Tat tvam asi, Om Tat sat, etc. There is also a grammatical explanation of the absolute meaning of the word, as sarvanama ("pronoun") is "a name that applies to everyone" (or everything), and that is precisely what Brahman or Reality is: everything and everyone.

अविनाशि तु तद्विद्धि येन सर्वमिदं ततम् । विनाशमव्ययस्यास्य न कश्चित्कर्तुमर्हति ॥ २-१७ ॥

avināśi tu tadviddhi yena sarvamidaṁ tatam । vināśamavyayasyāśya na kaścitkartumarhati ॥ 2-17 ॥

avināśi: that cannot be destroyed; tu: but; tat: that; viddhi: know; yena: by him; sarvam: all; idam: this; tatam: pervaded; vināśam: destruction; avyayasyāśya: of what is imperishable; na: not; kaścit: any; kartum: to do; arhati: can.

"Know that it is an imperishable (spirit) that pervades all this (universe of bodies). And no one will be able to destroy what is imperishable."

Krishna has been speaking about Tat, or Tattva, the Reality that is always existing (Brahman/ Atman) as opposed to the temporary and illusory relative non-existence of the material body. The word viddhi, "know", is particularly important in the verse, indicating that the purpose of knowledge is the experience of the imperishable Brahman. This is also the open invitation of the Vedānta sūtra (1.1.1): athato brahma jijñāsa, "now is the time to search the knowledge of Brahman". Brahman is eternal and imperishable, but our human form of life is not, so we should take full opportunity of this small window of time. Now, without any further hesitation or delay. Here spirit is stated to be present in all bodies and in the entire universe, as the expression sarvam idam tatam ("pervading all this") can be applied at various levels - the body, the sum total of all prāṇa, the universe, the entire reality. Even bodies that may appear dead are actually teeming with life in the form of micro-organisms that break down the organic matter by eating and digesting it. Microscopic living entities are found in water, in air and in earth, and there are also souls that carry a body made of subtler material elements that can be seen or perceived only through subtle senses. As cutting-edge contemporary science has already shown, the parameters of life on this planet among the species we know may become stretched by different conditions where life can develop in completely different ways that may appear alien to our daily experience and may even not be easily recognized as such.

Krishna is speaking of the "āham", or individual consciousness, and therefore the description specifically applies to the individual aspect of Brahman called Atman. The simultaneous oneness and individuality of the Brahman and Atman is said to be inconceivable, therefore when we hear people speaking about different perspectives - called monism, dualism, etc - we need to understand that they are just indicative suggestions of the One Reality and not sectarian dogmas that are competing against each other. Trying to ascertain which perspective is "the correct one" over the others is foolish and just demonstrates that one is not a tattva-darśhi. One who can directly see the Great Picture of Reality immediately understands how apparent opposites are reconciled: this is called prākāśha, or "illumination".

Also indicative are the "dimensions of the soul" mentioned in the Svetasvatara Upanishad (5.9) as "one ten-thousandth of the tip of a hair". The spiritual soul has no material limitations in time or space, and the indication of its atomic "size" is only intended to give us the idea that souls are everywhere, even in the tiniest bodies of microbes. Yet, the power of the soul expands and pervades even huge bodies, such as those of whales. It is also said that the soul is situated in the heart of the body of a living entity: this is also an indication only, as the spirit soul is transcendental to the gross matter and is not tied to an internal organ. For example, in the case of heart transplant, we should not think that the soul of the donor passes into the body of the person who receives the organ. The Mundaka Upanishad also explains that the presence of Brahman/ Atman is carried in this world by prāṇa: in the human body prāṇa takes the 5 forms of prāṇa, āpāna, vyāna, samāna, udāna - the five heads of the Kundalini snake. But prāṇa does not exist only within the human body: it exists in water, in air, in the sunshine, even in the apparently empty space. What is prāṇa? Prāṇa is simply "energy", therefore applies both to Atman and Brahman. Another definition of prāṇa is prabha or "power". Just like the sunshine particles or rays are the prabha of the Sun, the prāṇa in our body is the prabha of the Atman manifested at the material level.

अन्तवन्त इमे देहा नित्यस्योक्ताः शरीरिणः । अनाशिनोऽप्रमेयस्य तस्माद्युध्यस्व भारत ॥ २-१८ ॥

antavanta ime dehā nityasyuktāḥ śarīriṇaḥ । anāśino'prameyasya tasmādyudhyasva bhārata ॥ 2-18 ॥

antavanta: that will have an end; ime: all these; dehah: bodies; nityasya: of the eternal; uktah: said; śarīrinah: of he who owns the bodies; anāśinah: that will not be destroyed; aprameyasya: that cannot be measured; tasmāt: therefore; yudhyasva: engage in battle; bhārata: o descendant of Bharata.

"All these (material) bodies are destined to end, while he who is in these bodies is said to be eternal, because he cannot be destroyed or measured (materially). Therefore, o descendant of Bharata, you should fight."

The logic here is crystal clear: all bodies are temporary, so they should be used in the best possible way, for the progress of the eternal soul. Sacrificing or utilizing one's body for the benefit of the soul is actually a good bargain, the proper purpose for which it was created in the first place. The apparent contradiction of the need for progress and evolution for the soul, that is described as unchangeable and untouched by temporary conditions, can be reconciled when we understand that the individual soul is anu atma (atomic soul) at the beginning of its evolution. It already contains all the "spiritual DNA" for its full perfection because it is an amsa, or "part" ("cell") in the spiritual body of God - a spiritual blueprint comparable, on the material level, to the "stem cells" of the human body that will eventually differentiate and grow into the different limbs of a fully developed body.

The anu atma is already sat-cit-ananda, or "made of" eternal existence, conscious knowledge and perfect happiness, but it is very small and as such it can be blown around by the mighty wind of Mahamaya. When covered by the āhamkāra or identification with matter it is called conditioned, while it becomes liberated when such covering is dissolved. Although unchangeable in nature, and eternally made of knowledge and bliss, the soul grows, evolves and develops through learning, experience and realization towards a perfect form called siddha deha, a spiritual body that is not subject to the limitations of gross or subtle matter. During this process of evolution the soul retains its subtle body through the repeated passages from birth to death to rebirth in many lifetimes, with a continuity of conscious existence that gradually expands into all the layers of the mind, including the superficial level. At that point, with the full realization of one's eternal and transcendental nature, the subtle body also dissolves and only the spiritual body remains. The support for the growth of the sapling becomes unnecessary when the plant is strong enough.

Another interesting thought about the concept of anyaya or avinasi ("imperishable, indestructible") is that the imperishable does not always and necessarily continue to exist in a visible form for the practical purposes of people who have a material body. The Sanatana Dharma will never cease to exist, but it is very much possible that its correct understanding and practice will become lost or invisible in human society, and even that it will be made illegal and persecuted by adharmic governments and powers. It is even possible that the temples and sacred places in the world will be destroyed and/or covered by other buildings, or even by garbage dumps. In this universe, the manifestation, preservation and dissolution continue to follow each other, and this also applies to the visible manifestations of Sanatana Dharma in human society. The Devas are those who constantly work to protect Dharma, while the Asuras are those who constantly oppose it. At times the Devas win, at other times the Asuras win, albeit for a relatively short time...

य एनं वेत्ति हन्तारं यश्चैनं मन्यते हतम् उभौ तौ न विजानीतो नायं हन्ति न हन्यते ॥ २-१९ ॥

ya enam veti hantāraṁ yaścainaṁ manyate hatam ubhau tau na vijānīto nāyaṁ hanti na hanyate || 2-19 ||

yah: s/he; enam: this; veti: knows; hantaram: one who kills; yah: s/he; ca: and; enam: this; manyate: thinks; hatam: killed; ubhau: both; tau: they; na: do not; vijānīta: knower; na: not; ayam: this; hanti: kills; na: not; hanyate: is killed.

"One who knows this (Atman/Brahman) does not consider himself to be killing or being killed, in both (positions) he knows that one does neither truly kill nor is truly killed."

The words enam/ ayam in this verse refer to Atman/ Brahman, that in previous verses was described as Tat ("that"). On another level, enam/ ayam also refer to the knowledge of Atman/ Brahman, to the spiritual consciousness and identification.

In fact, Knowledge/ Consciousness is non-different from Atman/ Brahman, because awareness is the fundamental symptom of the spirit soul as opposed to the material bodies. When the body is inhabited by the Atman, there is awareness - knowledge, perception, consciousness - and when the Atman moves out, awareness disappears. The pointless controversy of the "personalists" against the "impersonalists" aims at demonstrating that Atman is eternally individual, but it is misguided because there is no contradiction in Atman and Brahman being simultaneously one and distinct (bheda-abbheda tattva). So when we speak of Tat (or enam/ ayam as in this verse) we refer to Brahman as the Soul of all individual souls. Aggressive "personalists" may end up embarrassing themselves in trying to demonstrate that God's spiritual body (constituted by the jīvas, who are parts and parcel of God) is different from God - precisely the offensive mentality they ascribe to the "impersonalists". In reality there is never separation between Atman and Brahman: the variations of consciousness/ awareness are only due to the particular variation of the power of consciousness - Shakti, also called Maya. Aggressive "personalists" offensively use the term "Mayavadi" to refer to Advaitins, but they forget they are also expected to worship Maya/ Shakti in the form of Yogamaya.

Some might misinterpret these verses to mean that one could indiscriminately kill anyone else legitimately without any consequence, claiming that in any case all bodies are illusory (or "vanity") and people would eventually have to die. This is not a good conclusion. All actions have consequences. It is true that all bodies are ultimately meant to die, but in the course of their manifestation they are meant to offer the opportunity for the evolution of the Jivatman, just like rainclouds and rain are temporary but their action on the land and on the bodies of plants, animals and human beings is instrumental for the perpetuation of the cycle of life. All actions, omissions, words and thoughts have consequences that reach far beyond the time and space where they manifest, and we have, through our actions, the power to increase or decrease the joys and sorrows we will have to experience in the future. Since joys and sorrows are the inevitable consequence of our past good and bad deeds, by increasing our good deeds (punya) and decreasing our bad deeds (papa) today we are building a better future for ourselves and for everybody else, even if we need to sacrifice bodies for it. Generally living entities maintain their bodies by consuming the bodies of other living entities - carnivores kill animals, while vegetarians and herbivores kill plants. Even someone who chooses to eat animals or plants that had already died of natural causes, will have to recognize that there are living micro-organisms and living cells in such bodies, although the level of their awareness is extremely low, and they suffer almost no pain.

Any life that we take for the survival of our own body is a debt we contract and that we will have to pay eventually, so we should move around in this world with the least possible negative impact, creating as much positive impact as possible. The ideal diet, observed generally during the fasting periods, consists of the less violent foods, such as filtered water, leaves fallen from plants, the flesh of fruits fallen from plants, and the surplus milk of a cow treated affectionately like a grateful child treats a mother. Very advanced yogis are able to subsist on air, sunlight, or just on the prana that pervades the entire universe, without even breathing. However, it is unlikely that all the members of human society will be able or willing to restrict their diet to the above mentioned totally non-violent foods, therefore for more ordinary people there is a license to kill a reasonable number of vegetal living entities, either in the form of seeds or as entire plants. In ordinary circumstances, a vegetarian diet is more acceptable than a non-vegetarian diet for several reasons: first of all, for health reasons, because it is the most suitable for the human body and mind. There is ample scientific literature that shows how the digestive system, teeth, and general bodily structure and functions of human beings are engineered for a "fuel" consisting of fruits, vegetables and grains. The mind - that is, the subtle body of the human being - also finds greater benefits from fresh, clean, luscious, sweet-smelling, pure and attractive vegetarian foods. On the other hand, non-vegetarian foods are nothing but corpses and therefore they need to be disguised by a lot of cooking and other ingredients in order to become attractive, and even so they become quickly putrefied and toxic for the body and mind of those who consume them.

However, it is important to understand that even plants have life, and life should be taken only when strictly necessary and without selfish motivations. We have the right and duty to maintain our bodies with the share that has been allotted to us, as long as we pay back our debt by working with selflessness and dedication for the benefit of the entire universe. This dutiful consciousness in playing one's allotted role in the administration of the universe elevates the human being to a level of affinity with the Devas, but if we want to achieve liberation - that is even more elevated than the heavenly planets - we need to situate ourselves on the level of Brahman consciousness. According to Krishna (18.54) attaining such brahma bhuta is the platform from which one can develop true bhakti rather than the delusional and childish sentimentalism based on mental fantasies that is sometimes passed for genuine devotion to the Supreme Lord. This means that we should always remember our true nature and remain above the material level of nature - where a body requires food and kills another body to procure it, as confirmed by Bhagavata purana (1.13.47). Later in Gita (5.8-9), Krishna will clearly confirm that a self realized soul remains untouched by these natural activities of the body, because the consciousness is always fixed on the pure spiritual nature.

न जायते म्रियते वा कदाचिन् नायं भूत्वा भविता वा न भूयः ।

na jāyate mriyate vā kadācin nāyaṁ bhūtvā bhavitā vā na bhūyaḥ ।

अजो नित्यः शाश्वतोऽयं पुराणो न हन्यते हन्यमाने शरीरे ॥ २-२० ॥

ajo nityaḥ śāśvato'yaṁ purāṇo na hanyate hanyamāne śarīre ।। 2-20 ।।

na: not; jāyate: takes birth; mriyate: dies; va: or; kadācit: any time; na: not; ayam: this; bhūtvā: once having been; bhavitā: will become; va: or; na: not; bhūyaḥ: again to become; ajah: unborn; nityaḥ: eternal; śāśvato: permanent; ayam: this; purāṇaḥ: ancient; na: not; hanyate: kills; hanyamāne: is killed; śarīre: in the body.

"(The soul) never takes birth and never dies at any time. It eternally exists, without beginning or end. This (soul) that is in the body is unborn, eternal, imperishable, immensely ancient, and cannot kill or be killed."

Krishna is still talking about the soul - jīvatma, atman, brahman. These three concepts are inconceivably one and different from each other, as we have already mentioned, and they are defined by the term ayam or "this" as in this verse, or tat or "that" as in the famous mahavakya "tat tvam asi". This verse specifically refers to the six changes of the body - that takes birth, grows, lives for some time, produces offshoots (offspring or byproducts), dwindles and dies. The soul is not really affected by such changes, although in its conditioned state it certainly goes through all of them and identifies with them because of ignorance and illusion. So when Krishna says that the soul does not take birth, this means that the soul exists before the birth of the body. Saying that it never dies means that it continues to exist after the death of the body. However, we know that the anu atma becomes manifested (bhūtvā) at the beginning of its evolutionary journey. Bhūtvā means "having once been". Here the apparent beginning of the existence of the jīva is simply its manifestation from the spiritual body of God, where it exists eternally. When we speak of something that is eternal and beginningless, and yet has a beginning, logic and words become insufficient as instruments: this will be clearly confirmed by Krishna later (2.29). However, this is not a justification for avoiding all efforts to understand and help others to understand Reality, as much as intellect and words can grasp it.

Another level of explanation that can help us understand the subject is the distinction between anu atma and vibhu atma: they are both atma, but the anu is "atomic", while the vibhu is "powerful". Of course a jīvatma will never be able to become the Supreme Lord Narayana - no matter how much effort or realization he can muster - but even among jīvatmas there are differences depending on the degree of evolution or development that the atma has attained. The word śāśvato means "not decaying and not subject to change", while purāṇa means "ancient" - not new or recent. Yet, the soul has no past, present or future, because it is not limited by time and space. The issue of the eternity of the individual soul as inconceivably compatible with its beginning in existence, when it is generated by Sadashiva Mahavishnu, has been debated rather hotly in some groups, so for those who wish to analyze it in greater depth, it is advisable to refer to those writings.

वेदाविनाशिनं नित्यं य एनमजमव्ययम् । कथं स पुरुषः पार्थ कं घातयति हन्ति कम् ॥ २-२१ ॥

vedāvināśinam nityaṁ ya enamajamavyayam । katham sa puruṣaḥ pārtha kaṁ ghātayati hanti kam ।। 2-21 ।।

veda: knows; avināsinam: of the indestructible; nityaṁ: eternal; yah: s/he; enam: this; ajam: unborn; avyayam: imperishable; katham: how; sah: s/he; puruṣaḥ: a person; pārtha: o son of Pritha; kaṁ: whom; ghātayati: causes to be killed; hanti: kills; kam: who.

"O son of Pritha, when one knows that this (soul) is imperishable and eternal, unborn and unchangeable, how (one can kill another) and who will kill whom?"

The description of enam ("this") continues. This verse introduces the concept of puruṣa, "a person", meaning the active principle of Atman/ Brahman - in a sense, the "masculine" side of Being. Later in Gita (15.7) Krishna will say that the jīvatmas are eternal particles of the Parama Puruṣa that are situated within Prakṛiti. But in 7.5, Krishna also says that the jīvas are Prakṛiti - a form of Prakriti that is superior to the manifestation of the inert matter of the bodies. Is there a contradiction? Is the jivatman purusha or prakriti, male or female? In fact it is both, and continues to be, irrespective of the material body it is wearing... so even "women" in this world are actually purushas, and even "men" in this world are actually prakriti.

The nature of the jiva as "child of God", includes both the nature of prakriti and the nature of purusha. We may give the example of the "genes" a child receives from both parents and that remain within the DNA even if only one of the characteristics, either male or female, will be apparent externally. In fact each human being has both a male and female side, not only on the subtle level of the mind (characterized respectively by logic and intuition, or practicality and emotionality etc) but also at a physical level. The question posed by this verse is also interesting and it can be studied at several levels. For example, the use of the name Partha, "son of Pritha", reminds us that as children of Mother Earth (Prithvi) we should understand the way she deals with all her children - sometimes even killing them when it is necessary for the greater good. The use of force, even up to lethal levels, should never be confused with violence, exactly like a necessary surgical operation properly performed by a skilled and ethically motivated doctor cannot be described as a crime. Another level of meaning of this verse goes beyond the act of killing, and includes all kinds of actions. Later on Krishna will extensively speak about Karma yoga, or the union with the Absolute through the art of Action, but this verse already introduces the topic. The crux of the discussion is the apparent difference between the path of ritualistic duties on one side, and the path of renunciation on the opposite side. But if we carefully examine both we find out they are actually not opposed: this will be clearly revealed later in Gita (6.1). This particular issue has been subject to many debates and questioning. Some have even suggested that the verse refers to a dead person, i.e. one who does not have a material body, or that the inconceivable position of the soul is beyond the scope of knowledge. Such ideas have been amply refuted by the traditional commentators.

वासंसि जीर्णानि यथा विहाय नवानि गृह्णाति नरोऽपराणि ।

vāsāmsi jīrṇāni yathā vihāya navāni grhṇāti naro'parāṇi ।

तथा शरीराणि विहाय जीर्णान्यन्यानि संयाति नवानि देही ॥ २-२२ ॥

tathā śarīrāṇi vihāya jīrṇā- nyanyāni saṁyāti navāni dehī ॥ 2-22 ॥

vasamsi: clothes; jirnani: torn/ worn out; yatha: just like; vihaya: after leaving; navani: new; grhṇati: accepts/ takes; narah: a man; aparani: other; tatha: similarly; śarirani: bodies; vihaya: giving up; jirnani: torn/ worn out; anyani: different; saṁyati: unites; navani: new; dehi: the embodied (living entity).

"Just like a man abandons clothes that have become torn or worn out and acquires other and new clothes, in the same way one leaves a damaged body and accepts another new body."

This metaphor is particularly suitable as the embodied soul is covered by a number of layers of identification, just like a person can wear various layers of garments. The anandamaya core is covered by jnanamaya or intellect, manomaya or mind, pranamaya or energy body, and annamaya or gross physical body. In this verse the word jirnani is particularly important. Death occurs because the material body is torn or worn out, or in other words either because of a violent injury or because of old age. In certain cases and by certain practices we can delay the death of the body but we cannot avoid it completely, because the body itself is engineered in such a way that it must decay, in order to push the conditioned soul in the direction of evolution.

Another important word in the verse is saṁyati, "unites", indicating a connection that is stronger than the mere "wearing" of a dress: it seems more appropriate to some kind of prosthetic limb, or an interactive device as in virtual reality computer games. In fact the material body of the human being is infinitely more complex and wonderful than any dress we may have seen in ordinary life. It grows and diversifies according to the need, has a limited ability to fix itself, and interacts with the identification of its owner through the complex "software" that comes together with it. We can compare the gross material body to the hardware of a computer, while the mind is comparable to a very advanced software system that can be programmed and reprogrammed if we learn to. The Atman is the computer operator: the more knowledgeable and skilled he is, the better the system will work. This example can help us to better understand the idea of "uniting" with the body: a computer must be properly "connected" in order to function. In fact, the comparison of the body/ mind with a computer could go even further beyond the present technological complexity and functionality of computers as we know them, into a field that many could see as science fiction.

The word dehi is used in this verse to specifically qualify the jiva that "unites" with the material body/ mind: it is a conditioned living entity, one that identifies with a body and therefore needs to get a new one when he loses the old one. A computer operator cannot remain without a machine as long as he identifies himself with the activity of working on a computer. Sometimes we get so accustomed to using machines that we become unable to make simple additions without using the electronic calculator. Similarly, an "embodied living entity" cannot remain without a material body for a long time, even when he is forced out by death.

नैनं छिन्दन्ति शस्त्राणि नैनं दहति पावकः । न चैनं क्लेदयन्त्यापो न शोषयति मारुतः ॥ २-२३ ॥

nainam chindanti śāstrāṇi nainam dahati pāvakah । na cainam kledayantyāpo na śoṣayati mārutaḥ ॥ 2-23 ॥

na: not; enam: this; chindanti: cut; śastrani: weapons; na: not; enam: this; dahati: burns; pavakah: fire; na: not; enam: this; kledayanti: moisten/ soak; apah: the waters; na: not; śoṣayati: dries; marutah: the wind.

"This (soul who is in the body) cannot be cut by any weapon, or burned by fire, moistened/ soaked by liquids or dried by the wind."

The nature of the soul is spiritual and transcendental, therefore it cannot be killed or even affected in its essence by anything material. In this world, we have the constant experience of things being dissolved by water, burned by fire and dried or ripped apart by the wind. Actually the inherent power in these elements can also be channeled and used in very sophisticated weapons, according to an ancient knowledge that was taught to the ksatriyas of the Vedic times. For example, today the great majority of the people have heard about the laser, that is a very concentrated form of light capable of cutting through hard and dense materials. Similarly, sound can be modulated and concentrated in order to modify matter in dramatic ways. All the ancient Vedic weapons were based on mantras, that are sound vibrations combined with the magnetic field created by the mind. In particular circumstances such specific mantras acted on fire, water or wind, creating exceptional weaponry that could destroy the bodies of the enemies. But they were never able to destroy the soul.

Water (in the sense of liquidity) has the power of dissolving earth and therefore also all the solid elements that are derivations of the earth element. The ancient art of alchemy was based on dissolving materials into liquid, heating them with fire, purifying/ evaporating through air by distillation etc. The process was not only practical for the discovery of many important and useful chemical products, such as gunpowder, solvents, extracts, etc, but it was also highly symbolical because it trained the mind in the search of the "quintessence" that could not be dissolved in water, burned by fire, or dried by air - the representation of the soul itself. At a more symbolical level, water is separation or detachment, air is knowledge or inspiration, and fire is the passion that can both condensate and expand. All these elements of sadhana are utilized to purify the soul from the material contamination.

The topic of the soul that cannot be cut to pieces has also been discussed with reference to the separation or non-separation of the individual soul from the Supreme Soul. The debate again leads to the dvaita/ advaita controversy, and it should be solved in the same light we have explained before. Vedic scriptures offer the example of a spark that emanates from fire, or a drop of water from the ocean. Now on the material level a spark can be separated from the fire, although it will become extinguished or create another fire if it falls on suitable materials, and a drop of water can remain very far from the ocean for an extremely long time - possibly, even forever. This is because the fire and the ocean have a precise and limited position in space. A fire or an ocean are not everywhere. However, we know that God is omnipresent and eternally residing within the heart of the living entity as well. How can the soul ever be separated from God then? It is not possible.

The Atman is separated from the Brahman only in the confused perception of the jiva. Such confusion can be material - as due to Mahamaya - or spiritual - as due to Yogamaya. In the first instance, it helps the living entity to forget God and the divine reality to become immersed in material identification and attachment, while in the second instance it helps the living entity to better connect with God through a more intimate and deeper feeling and relationship. Such separation it is not factual. Yet, at the same time each individual soul remains an individual eternally, as Krishna has already clearly established in 2.12. In this way each individual soul can offer a personal relationship of love and devotion to the Supreme and interact with other individual souls on the transcendental platform. In fact, individuality even exists among the Personalities of Godhead that are direct emanations or svamsas, such as the different forms of Vishnu. If there were no spiritual individuality, the entire concept of lila would be meaningless, and so would the concept of bhakti.

अच्छेद्योऽयमदाह्योऽयमक्लेद्योऽशोष्य एव च । नित्यः सर्वगतः स्थाणुरचलोऽयं सनातनः ॥ २-२४ ॥

acchedyo'yamadāhyo'yamakledyo'soṣya eva ca । nityaḥ sarvagataḥ sthāṇuracalo'yaṁ sanātanaḥ ॥ 2-24 ॥

acchedyah: that cannot be broken or cut; ayam: this; adāhyah: that cannot be burned; ayam: this; akledyo: that cannot be dissolved; asoṣyah: that cannot be dried; eva: certainly; ca: and; nityaḥ: eternal; sarva-gataḥ: omnipresent; sthanur: fixed; acalah: that does not move; ayam: this; sanatanah: eternal.

"This (spirit) cannot be hacked to pieces or burned, or desiccated. Actually it is eternal, omnipresent, permanent, and does not go away. It is everlasting."

In Vedic culture the repetition of a concept indicates its great importance, so instead of skipping the verses that seem boringly repetitive, we should take the opportunity to exercise some humility and put greater attention in their study. Krishna is talking of the weapons that will be used on the battlefield, but the same considerations apply to the basic elements that we can encounter in daily life and at the dissolution of the universe as well. At the time of the cyclic destruction of the world, the planets are consumed by fire, submerged by a cosmic flood and battered by violent winds. Still the individual souls are not destroyed, rather they are re-absorbed into the transcendental body of Sadashiva Mahavishnu, where they remain inactive, immersed in a blissful state of sleep called brahmananda, until the next cycle of manifestation. We have already mentioned that Atman/ Brahman is omnipresent, beyond time and space. Here the concept is confirmed and expanded, with the addition of new information: the Atman/ Brahman does not move, because it is already everywhere and thus there is no "other place" to go. This also applies to the time of dissolution and to the time of liberation or moksha. The body of Mahavishnu and the spiritual world Vaikuntha are not "places" or in a place, because they are transcendental to time and space. They are states of consciousness, and as such they can be instantly attained anywhere and at any time, without having to "go somewhere".

Another meaning of the expression sarva-gataḥ indicates that living entities can survive in all conditions within the universe, even in places where mainstream scientists believe that life is not possible. Actually modern science has only a limited understanding of life, and its beliefs are shaken again and again by unexpected discoveries. Living entities can survive and prosper in air, in water, in earth and even in fire. Some microbes and viruses are killed by high temperatures, but that does not mean that all micro-organisms will. Absence of proof is not proof of absence. It is very much possible that the serious limitations of the present instruments of research make it impossible for modern scientists to perceive what is beyond them. After all, even the most sophisticated and advanced instruments of science - electronic microscopes and telescopes, etc - are nothing but powerful extensions of the fundamental senses of human beings, and have the same conceptual flaws.

For example, human beings do not have a sense that enables them to deeply investigate what is in fire, except seeing the light and heat that it emanates, so modern scientists have only been able to find out the existence of infrared rays within the spectrum of light and measure the intensity of heat. Even so, the present instruments to observe infrared radiations are very primitive as they are used generally to detect moderate temperatures such as the body warmth of human beings and animals. Above a certain temperature, infrared goggles and cameras only see a "bright light".

अव्यक्तोऽयमचिन्त्योऽयमविकार्योऽयमुच्यते । तस्मादेवं विदित्वैनं नानुशोचितुमर्हसि ॥ २-२५ ॥

avyakta'yamacintyo'yamavikāryo'yamucyate | tasmādevaṁ viditvainaṁ nānuśocitumarhasi || 2-25 ||

avyakta: non-manifested; ayam: this; acintyah: inconceivable; ayam: this; avikaryah: unchangeable; ayam: this; ucyate: is said (to be); tasmāt: therefore; evam: like this; viditva: knowing well; enam: this; na: not; anusocitum: to worry; arhasi: you should.

"It is said that this (soul) is invisible to material eyes, inconceivable to material intellect, and not affected by change. Therefore, knowing this (soul), you should not worry."

Krishna has already stated these characteristics of the soul, but the repetition highlights their importance. The definition avyakta means "non-manifest" or "invisible". The technically advanced microscopes of modern science are able to see atoms, yet they are not able to see the soul because by its nature, the soul is not manifest to the material eyes. It is not merely a matter of size. The Upanishads compare the "atomic size" of the soul to 1/10,000 of tip of a hair, but considering an average thickness of hair (about 100 microns, or 1/10 of a millimeter), the size of the soul should be about 1/100,000 of a millimeter. Modern scanning tunneling and atomic force microscopes allow scientists to see atomic particles that are measured in picometers (1/1,000,000,000 of a millimeter), and that are used in nanotechnology. If the calculation of the Upanishads were to be taken literally, such objects would be 100 million times smaller than the soul, but still they are visible to material microscopes.

This apparent imprecision should not discourage our faith in the knowledge offered by the shastra: we just need to make some extra effort to understand its meaning and purpose. In this particular case, the measurement offered by the Upanishads is merely an indicative example, just like the statement (11.12) that says that the radiance of the universal Form, the Virat Rupa, is comparable to hundreds of thousands of suns. Similarly, the radiance of the jiva is compared to a similar number of suns. Observing even one single sun for a brief period with a naked eye is sufficient to damage our retina, what to speak of a light that is hundreds of thousands of times stronger. If the soul could be observed through the material senses of perception and their extensions, the instruments of perception used by modern scientists, we would be blinded constantly because souls are everywhere - and many of them moving around as ghosts are not even shielded by a thick covering of gross matter. Yet, with so many wandering disembodied souls going around in the night, we still need street lighting and flashlights...

In fact, Krishna confirms that our material eyes will never be able to see spirit: for that, we need divine eyes (11.8) because such souls are in another dimension, the spiritual dimension. Each individual soul is capable of such divine or transcendental eyesight: it only requires the proper consciousness disposition. At times, this may happen in particular circumstances, such as in NDE or Near Death Experiences, or during some types of meditation, in which bright "lights" are seen.

अथ चैनं नित्यजातं नित्यं वा मन्यसे मृतम् । तथापि त्वं महाबाहो नैवं शोचितुमर्हसि ॥ २-२६ ॥

atha cainaṁ nityajātaṁ nityaṁ vā manyase mṛtam | tathāpi tvam mahābāho naivaṁ śocitumarhasi || 2-26 ||

atha: if; ca: and; enam: this; nitya: eternally; jatam: born; nityam: eternally; va: or; manyase: you think; mṛtam: dead; tatha: then; api: even; tvam: you; maha-baho: o mighty armed; na: not; enam: this; socitum: to worry; arhasi: you should.

"Even if you think that this (soul) always continues to take birth and to die, in any case you still should not be aggrieved, o mighty-armed (Arjuna)."

One may object that, although the soul is always untouched by material circumstances, the body and the mind still suffer, so we should avoid creating such sufferings. This is a very good point, but we need to understand that the only true way to avoid creating sufferings is to act in accordance to Dharma, even if it seems that such action will cause sufferings. The fact is that birth and death are inevitable due to the inherent temporary nature of the material world, and all joys and sorrows come to us as a consequence of our own past actions. We should not allow these temporary considerations to stop us from doing the right thing.

The expression maha-baho, "o mighty armed", is offered jokingly, as the inevitability of death and rebirth cannot be kept at distance by the strength of bodily arms - in fact it is actually the opposite: the more focused we are on the material body, the more likely we are to remain tied in the cycle of births and deaths. This verse demonstrates one of the main differences between the ideology of Gita and the abrahamic ideological system. Krishna has very clearly and repeatedly stated the facts, and illustrated them with examples and other logical processes, but in the end, the matter of believing or not believing is something that is totally left to the individual. God does not get upset if we do not believe him, if we do not love or respect him, or even if we do not listen to him. God is not revengeful and jealous: those are very bad qualities that characterize a demoniac mentality, not a godly mentality. God does not send people to hell because they are atheists and materialists, and does not punish them for their "offenses". Actually God is happy to allow everybody to have their own beliefs. There is no mention of "crimes of opinion" in God's law books.

Each living entity reaps the good and bad results of his own good and bad actions, but that refers to the benefits and damages that he has caused to other living entities, not to his faith in God or in some particular dogma. In fact in this verse Krishna even uses the arguments of atheists and materialists to console Arjuna, saying that even if we consider that the soul is actually subject to birth and death (at each body's birth and death or in a greater cycle of manifestation and final dissolution of the individuality), or even if there is no soul and life is simply a combination of chemicals, there is still no cause for sorrow or worries, because it is an inevitable cycle just the life and death of plants and the passing of seasons. It's the nature of life.

जातस्य हि ध्रुवो मृत्युर्ध्रुवं जन्म मृतस्य च । तस्मादपरिहार्येऽर्थे न त्वं शोचितुमर्हसि ॥ २-२७ ॥

jatasya hi dhruvo mṛtyurdhruvaṁ janma mṛtasya ca | tasmādaparihārye'rthe na tvam śocitumarhasi || 2-27 ||

jatasya: of (one) who has taken birth; hi: certainly; dhruvab: established/ determined; mṛityub: death; dhruvam: established/ determined; janma: birth; mṛitasya: of one who has died; ca: and; tasmāt: therefore; aparihārye: in what is unavoidable; arthe: for the purpose; na: not; tvam: you; socitum: to worry; arhasi: you should.

"Because one who has taken birth must necessarily die, and one who has died will again be reborn. There is no point in despairing over something that is inevitable."

Not many people have the correct information or vision on the mechanism of death and rebirth. Some people believe that only a few "special" people get the opportunity to reincarnate, or that one can become the receptacle for another person altogether (thus losing one's own identity or "soul"), or that when we take a new birth we become a totally different person. Actually, the basic principle is very simple. As Krishna has already explained very clearly, all the embodied souls constantly reincarnate through childhood, maturity and old age. The key to understanding this mechanism is identification. When we identify with a material body - any material body - we need to have one. The natural tendency of the body is to grow old and decay, so the conditioned soul gradually identifies as a child, a young person, and then as an old person. There is a trauma at the passage into a totally different body through death and rebirth, because for a relatively short time the conditioned soul remains in a disembodied state, and this causes a serious disorientation, leaving a relatively "blank slate" on the conscious level of identification.

The sum total of the karmic results and mental impressions, desires, attachments, and unfulfilled tasks determines the circumstances of the next birth of the conditioned soul, and from the time of birth one starts building again his/ her material identification at the conscious level. However, all the previous identifications and memories remain at the subconscious level to be accessed, consulted and utilized to foster one's evolutionary progress. So we can see how death and rebirth are actually a very important and useful part of the process, because they create a hiatus where material identification can be modified in the learning and evolution process of the soul. If there were no death and rebirth, one's material identification with a particular body (or apparently uninterrupted growth of one body) would become sclerotic and stop the evolutionary progress of the soul. As a result, the individual would become unable to learn new things, to change his self-perception - only getting more and more tired and cynical and desperate because of the feeling of being trapped as if in a prison cell.

Probably the greatest disservice that abrahamic faiths have done to the global culture was outlawing the concept of evolutionary reincarnation, which was previously normally accepted as a fact of life by all cultures. Active persecution against this knowledge, carried on by the church for centuries, was sided by the enforcement of the nonsensical dogma of an eternal paradise/ hell earned during the very short time allotted to human life, generally in very unequal and unjust conditions. For example, a hopeless child born in a destitute family of thieves and robbers, who had no other option but resorting to the same activities, if killed at a young age after a few miserable years of degraded life would be condemned to eternal torture in hell, while a truly evil person born in a rich and powerful family would take advantage of plenty of opportunities to cause sufferings and damage to countless innocent and helpless people, indulge in extravagant and selfish sense gratification, and still "go to heaven" by the paid blessings of a greedy priest. The purpose of the dogma enforcement was clear: taking away the individuals' personal power and putting them at the mercy of the church, that presented itself as the sole representative of God, "legally authorized" by the government to change the sentence at their convenience. Contrarily to what one may think, the knowledge of the cycle of death and rebirth does not support unnecessary murder, slaughter and war. In fact, it gives the utmost importance to life because every moment is considered a valuable opportunity for evolution, through self-improvement and dharmic choices in properly performing one's duty. On the other hand, rejection/ banning of such knowledge has historically created unnecessary murder, slaughter and war in unprecedented measure, because human life on this earth came to be considered a trifle compared to the eternal existence in paradise promised to anyone who is willing to sacrifice his own life and the life of others for the aggrandizement of the religious hierarchy itself. We can still observe this mechanism in the mentality of the suicide bombers who call themselves martyrs.

अव्यक्तादीनि भूतानि व्यक्तमध्यानि भारत । अव्यक्तनिधनान्येव तत्र का परिदेवना ॥ २-२८ ॥

avyaktādinī bhūtāni vyaktamadhyāni bhārata | avyaktanidhanānyeva tatra kā paridevanā || 2-28 ||

avyakta: non manifested; adīni: originally; bhūtāni: the (living) beings; vyakta: manifested; madhyāni: in their intermediate stage; bhārata: o descendant of Bharata; avyakta: non-manifested; nidhanāni: at destruction; eva: therefore; tatra: in that; ka: what; paridevana: lamentation.

"O descendant of Bharata, all the living entities/ states of being are initially non-manifested, then they become visible in an intermediate stage and then again disappear in the end. What is the point of lamenting about that?"

Krishna has already clearly and definitively established that the Atman is eternal, while the bodies are destined to die. The word bhuta literally means "being", and thus applies both to the individual living entities in their conditioned state of life, as well as to the "state of being" that defines the conditions of his life. Such circumstances constantly change too, like the seasons of the years that follow each other (2.14), and are detected only through the contact of the senses with the sense objects. The human condition is defined by a particular set of senses and objects that are perceived by the senses, and the same applies to the conditions of life in the various other species - each of the many different animal bodies, the plant species, as well as the superhuman species such as the Devas, Rakshasas, Gandharvas etc.

The sense objects that are suitable for a human form of life are governed by a mixture of sattva (goodness) and rajas (passion). This applies to food, clothing, living environment, life habits, interactions with other individuals, way of earning a livelihood and so on. These are different, for example, from the sense objects of a dog or a pig, who have different tastes, habits and different dietary needs. The degrading influence of the age in which we live tends to drag the human beings towards lower states of being, and therefore it is possible that during their lifetime, men can develop tastes and habits that are more suitable to animals or plants. In that case, at the time of death the conditioned soul will be naturally attracted to the particular situation where he will be able to create a body that is best suited for the tastes and habits in which he previously indulged.

For example, a human body can have only a moderate number of sexual intercourses, due to natural biological limitations. Such limitations can be artificially stretched through medication or other methods, but that is not suitable for a good psycho-physical balance and health. If a human being becomes overly attached or addicted to sex, in order to better enjoy such tendency he should develop the body of a rabbit or a rat, who can have sex almost continuously in a natural way. If a human being becomes overly attached to an irresponsible behavior he can develop a dog's body, that is better equipped for a wandering life, with a keener sense of smell, a sense of hearing that can even perceive ultrasounds, and a spontaneous tendency for social interactions.

Similarly, if a human being becomes overly attached to eating all sorts of foods, with a preference for tamasic tastes, he will have the opportunity to develop a pig's body, whose ability to perceive and enjoy these is much greater than a human being's. After fully enjoying such pleasures without the heavy responsibilities that come with the human body "package", the soul will have the opportunity to resume his evolution, because in any case all states of being are temporary. This particular perspective is confirmed by an alternative reading to the original text, karya-karana-sanghata, "due to association/ contact with the cause/ origin of the duties to be performed".

आश्चर्यवत्पश्यति कश्चिदेनम् आश्चर्यवद्वदति तथैव चान्यः ।

āścaryavatpaśyati kaścidenam iścaryavadvadati tathaiiva cānyaḥ ।

आश्चर्यवच्चैनमन्यः शृणोति श्रुत्वाप्येनं वेद न चैव कश्चित् ॥ २-२९ ॥ āścaryavaccainamanyaḥ śṛṇoti śrutvāpyenam veda na caiva kaścit ।। 2-29 ।।

ascarya-vat: amazing; paśyati: sees; kaścit: someone; enam: this; ascarya-vat: amazing; vadati: speaks; tatha: also; eva: certainly; ca: and; anyaḥ: another/ someone else; ascarya-vat: amazing; ca: and; enam: this; anyaḥ: another; śṛṇoti: hears/ listens; śrutva: having heard; api: even; enam: this; veda: knows; na: not; ca: and; eva: certainly; kaścit: someone.

"Some see this (Atman) as amazing, some others describe it as amazing. Some hear (of it) as amazing, and some remain unable to understand it even after hearing about it."

This verse is also very famous and should be memorized. The search for the knowledge and realization of the Atman/ Brahman is the most important pursuit in life, because it puts everything else into perspective, clarifying our priorities and the meaning of our existence. In Vedic civilization, this study was central to the education of the individual, while in contemporary global academia it is sorely neglected, or even worse, when it is studied through the history of philosophy, it is presented as a hopeless series of theoretical mental speculations on something that cannot even to be proven to exist. As an alternative, contemporary academia offers theological "divinity" studies, presenting the dogma of Christianity as indisputable yet constantly changing according to the political needs of the Church. And in the end, such doctorates still remain unable to explain how an all-merciful, all-loving, omniscient and omnipotent God needs to have his only son tortured and killed to pay for the mindless sins of countless generations of his creatures who can therefore continue with their meaningless lives.

Catechism taught to children in Sunday schools is not much better, as it consists of a series of definitions that students are discouraged to probe through open discussion. Difficult questions are liquidated with the "mystery of faith" label, or with overt or covert persecution of the "heretic tendencies" of the students who dare to express them. On contrary, the study of the divine science in Vedic civilization is based on a process of open and free discussion, and questions are considered not only legitimate, but are encouraged as well. It is also important to understand that the real qualification to understand the Atman/ Brahman is not academic study. It is not about a curriculum requirement with a credit value calculated on quiz-type exams in which the student only needs to please the personal or institutional beliefs of the teachers. It is not a theoretical pastime for armchair philosophers. It is a deep personal quest for one's true identity, and success is measured by the individual's change of priorities in life.

Another danger in the exploration of the spiritual science is the tendency to sensationalism, that transforms self realization and religion into some form of entertainment. Of course the entertainment component is important when trying to attract the interest of the simple-minded masses who can't handle deep philosophical concepts, but that's just the sugar coating on the pill: it should not be the only ingredient in the medication. Traditionally people gather to hear stories from the Itihasas and Puranas - especially the Bhagavata Purana, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata - but at these gatherings very few people actually listen, follow or understand what is being narrated. The general idea is that the mere superficial recitation will do, because the mahatmya or phalasruti (glorification of the results of the act of listening) promise great benefits. However, mere mechanical recitation and hearing can be compared to eating only the sugar from the pills coating and throwing away the actual medicinal principle. We need to become sincere enough to let our misconceptions go, to renounce our material identifications and attachments. This is the real difference between the beautiful and inspiring stories of Ramayana and Mahabharata or Puranas on one side, and equally beautiful and inspiring stories created by the fantasy of fictional writers - for example, the adventures of Harry Potter, Luke Skywalker, or Frodo Baggins the Hobbit.

देही नित्यमवध्योऽयं देहे सर्वस्य भारत । तस्मात्सर्वाणि भूतानि न त्वं शोचितुमर्हसि ॥ २-३० ॥

dehī nityamavadhyo'yaṁ dehe sarvasya bhārata | tasmātsarvāṇi bhūtāni na tvam śocitumarhasi || 2-30 ||

dehī: the (soul that lives in the) body; nityam: eternal; avadhyo: immortal; ayaṁ: this; dehe: in the body; sarvasya: of all/ everyone; bharata: o descendent of Bharata; tasmāt: therefore; sarvāṇi: all; bhūtāni: beings; na: not; tvam: you; śocitum: to worry; arhasi: should.

"O descendant of Bharata, this eternal (soul) that lives in the body can not be killed and is present in all bodies. Therefore you should not be aggrieved for all these living beings."

In the previous verse Krishna stated that the Atman/ Brahman is a wonderful topic for discussion, very important and also very difficult to penetrate. Here the oneness of Atman and Brahman, present in all bodies, is highlighted by the use of the singular pronoun ayaṁ ("this"), equivalent to the tat ("that") that is used more often in Vedic literature. Each jīvatma or individual soul cannot be present simultaneously in all bodies, although he can tap into the collective consciousness and God's consciousness to perceive the other jīvatmas. However, the jīvatma or Atman is part and parcel of the Brahman, the transcendental spiritual Reality that is present everywhere, in all bodies and in all atoms. This is the meaning of omnipresent.

Another interpretation of the expression "dehe sarvasya" is that there is a jīvatma in each one of all the bodies of the innumerable living entities in the universe. Another interpretation is that the Brahman, or the sum total of the individual souls present in the universe, constitutes the spiritual component of the universe, as jagat is a synonym of "sarva" referred to the Virat Rupa, the universal or cosmic form. At all these levels, the fundamental meaning remains the same: the bodies are subject to change and dissolution, while the spiritual presence within them is immortal. Therefore there is nothing to worry about. We, as spirit souls, can never be killed (nityam avadhyah) in any circumstance. Therefore there is nothing that can really stop us from properly performing our dharmic duties or from progressing towards perfection. They can be difficulties and delays, there can be adjustments of plans, but the journey will continue. One of man's greatest fears is the idea of total dissolution and nothingness, that implies the futility of life and action. This fear prompts people to do many stupid things that in their minds are intended to "leave a mark" on this world, even if it means to do something very bad, or pushes them into the depths of hopelessness and ignorance through intoxication, cynical materialism or existential nihilism. Bhagavad gita radiates like a beacon of light in the darkness, assuring us that we will all continue to exist, and that loss is only a temporary change that makes space for better things to come.

स्वधर्ममपि चावेक्ष्य न विकम्पितुमर्हसि । धर्म्याद्धि युद्धाच्छ्रेयोऽन्यत्क्षत्रियस्य न विद्यते ॥ २-३१ ॥

svadharmamapi cāvekṣya na vikampitumarhasi | dharmyaddhi yuddhacchreyo'nyatkṣatriyasya na vidyate || 2-31 ||

sva: one's own; dharmam: duty; api: also; ca: and; avekṣya: considering; na: not; vikampitum: to hesitate; arhasi: you should; dharmyat: according to dharma; hi: indeed; yuddhat: in the battle; śreyah: better; anyat: other; kṣatriyasya: of a kṣatriya; na: not; vidyate: is known.

"Considering your own dharmic duty, you should not hesitate, because for a kṣatriya there is nothing better than fighting a dharmic battle."

Often dharma is translated as "religion" and thus mistakenly assimilated to the concept of exclusivist theocratic monotheism, characteristic of the Abrahamic faiths. But dharma has nothing to do with personal beliefs, faith, devotions and religious practices, or with the choice of the name and form or non-form of the Divine that one worships. One's personal beliefs and religious/spiritual practices are a private matter, of course as long as the choices made in one's personal lives do not violate the freedom or dignity of someone else. Dharma is not about any racial or ethnic identification or family tradition, nationality, or any other sectarian allegiance that opposes a group of persons against the rest of the world. Dharma is not even about professionalism, social requirements or conventions. Dharma is about the universal principles of religion and ethics – truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness, justice, goodness, enlightenment and cooperation among all to support society and the universe. Thus one's specific dharmā, or sva-dharma, consists in doing one's duty in the best possible way according to one's abilities and particular position in time and space.

The definition of kṣatriya dharma is the protection of the prajas and the kingdom to guarantee the proper environment for material and spiritual progress. When there is a need to fight to ensure this protection, the kṣatriya has the opportunity to fully utilize his particular skills, qualities and tendencies: he is like a perfectly honed instrument that finally engages in a highly specialized task. His fighting aggressors - external or internal enemies - is the climax of all his existence, his proper place in the order of things, not unlike a planet that is properly running within its right orbit. We could really say that he has all reasons to be happy, because he has attained the perfection of his particular nature.

It may be useful to remember here that Arjuna is not on the battlefield to conquer a kingdom for himself or for his family or kinsmen or race, to convert people to a particular faith/ ideology or way of life, or to eliminate rivals or opponents. Like any other kshatriya, Arjuna needs to sacrifice himself to his duty in protecting the people from a bad ruler (Duryodhana) who has repeatedly demonstrated his disrespect for ethical principles and his callousness to the subjects' well being and to the benefit of the kingdom. A dharma yuddha is a battle conducted according to strict ethical rules of engagement and with the purpose to protect the good, harmless and innocent people from the attack of aggressors and evil doers. It is purely defensive, never offensive or imperialistic, colonialistic or exploitative in any other way. Therefore it should never be confused with the idea of "holy war" or "crusade" intended to subjugate people or nations in order to impose a particular type of belief, religious tradition, mode of worship, culture, values, legislation, or to acquire the control of resources for selfish purposes, by taking them away from other people.

यदृच्छया चोपपन्नं स्वर्गद्वारमपावृतम् ।

सुखिनः क्षत्रियाः पार्थ लभन्ते युद्धमीदृशम् ॥ २-३२ ॥

yadṛcchayā copapannam svargadvāramapāvṛtam | sukhināḥ kṣatriyāḥ pārtha labhante yuddhamīdṛśam || 2-32 ||

yadricchaya: by its own accord; ca: and; upapannam: obtained; svarga-dvaram: the door to the heavenly planets; apavritam: opened; sukhinah: happy; kshatriyah: the kshatriyas; partha: o son of Pritha; labhante: attain; yuddham: battle; idrisam: like this.

"O son of Pritha, happy are the kshatriyas to whom such opportunity comes unsought. For a warrior, engaging in such a battle is like having the doors of heaven open in front of him."

The word yadricchaya ("that has come by itself") further clarifies that a dharma yuddha is never a war of aggression, invasion or occupation. A kshatriya is not a war-mongering brawler eagerly searching for the opportunity to pick a fight or even creating such opportunity by attacking innocent and harmless people who are just engaged in their own honest and harmless business. A kshatriya is called to defend his land (kshetra) and the creatures of his land (prajas) from all attacks: this is the dharmic fight.

The rules of engagement for a dharmic warrior are clear: only aggressors can be targeted, and even an enemy must be spared if he surrenders and renounces his aggressive ways. In a dharmic society there are no jails or corporal punishments of unharmed prisoners, no courts, judges or lawyers and no judicial errors. The genuine kshatriyas are capable and active enough to catch a criminal red-handed and either kill him in battle or see him out of the kingdom to be banished forever if he does not accept to reform himself sincerely, atone and repay his victims suitably. The only other dharmic opportunity for a fight is a challenge coming from another kshatriya warrior, to establish who is stronger and more skilled in battle, and therefore more capable of defending the prajas from potential aggressors.

In this regard, we need to understand the tradition of the Rajasuya/ Asvamedha yajna celebrated by a king who wishes to rise to the level of "emperor". The concept of empire in the Vedic tradition has only administrative purposes, aimed at strengthening communication and cooperation between regions through building roads, encouraging trade, creating a common front against outside invaders and aggressors, and providing emergency support to tributary kingdoms in case of need – famine, natural disasters, etc. The aspiring emperor celebrated the Rajasuya yajna to verify the qualifications of the local kings and rulers; if they accepted his superiority, they would offer some gifts as tribute. A local ruler admitting defeat was not killed or replaced by the emperor or by the emperor's men, and did not have to change his personal or tribal/ social beliefs or way of life. He would continue to rule his own prajas as always, but he knew that there was a man greater and more powerful than him, to whom he could turn for help in times of need.

This verse states that a good kshatriya will attain the heavenly planets. Such a statement may appear to be similar to the promise of the pleasures of paradise for those abrahamic men who engage in the "holy war" of eliminating or subduing those who are considered "infidels", but there is a radical difference. The concept of svarga is substantially different from the idea of paradise. The Devas who live in svarga may also have great opportunities to enjoy life, but their main occupation is to manage the universe and ensure that all living beings are properly taken care of. The Devas are the equivalent of the kshatriyas on Earth, only on a cosmic scale. Whenever the balance and the progress of the universe are threatened by the Asuras, the Devas do not hesitate to leave their beautiful residences to get into battle to protect their prajas. Therefore a good and honest kshatriya that properly executes his duty in fighting against aggressors who endanger the prajas is automatically qualified to become a Deva. He does not get paradise as a reward for his loyalty or faith, for his allegiance to a particular sectarianism, or because he has destroyed the holy places and scriptures of other peoples: he gets paradise because he has demonstrated he is a good ruler.

अथ चेत्त्वमिमं धर्म्यं संग्रामं न करिष्यसि ।

ततः स्वधर्मं कीर्तिं च हित्वा पापमवाप्स्यसि ॥ २-३३ ॥

atha cettvamimam dharmyam saṅgrāmaṁ na kariṣyasi | tataḥ svadharmaṁ kīrtiṁ ca hitvā pāpamavāpsyasi || 2-33 ||

atha: therefore; cet: if; tvam: you; imam: this; dharmyam: duty to support the universe; sangramam: engaged; na: not; kariṣyasi: you will do; tatbah: then; sva-dharma: the particular duty (based on guna and karma); kīrtim: good reputation; ca: and; hitva: giving up; pāpam: sinfulness; avāpsyasi: you will get.

"Therefore, if you do not engage in this dharmic (action), you will lose your good name of kshatriya. (What) you will obtain (is) papam (the stain of sin)."

The word papa is often translated as "sin" but its meaning is quite different from its counterpart in the Abrahamic religions, that do not accept the idea of reincarnation. Rather than a transgression against God's orders (that constitutes sin in the Abrahamic faiths), papa is the karmic burden of a selfish choice that goes against the basic ethical principles (dharma) that support the universe. It is a failure, a symptom of imperfection, a stain on one's character, a contamination, but it does not condemn the individual to eternal hell. Sometimes in Puranic literature we find some mention of paradise and hell, and those who do not have a deep understanding of the Vedic civilization may remain confused and superimpose similar concepts they have acquired from the abrahamic stories, that developed many centuries after the compilation of the Vedic literature and its corresponding versions in other pre-abrahamic civilizations. Abrahamic mythology picked some elements here and there, and added the particular Jewish and Christian or Islamic dogma, producing descriptions that had the specific objective of emotionally controlling the masses and subjugating them to the institutional authority. In the Vedic perspective, hell - like heaven - is a temporary condition of life where a conditioned soul may remain in his/her evolutionary journey, in order to learn some specific lessons. However, each individual is expected to learn and progress in a personal path of development or evolution, where committing mistakes is part of the process, so papa can be purified and counteracted.

In this verse the word kirtim, "fame, reputation, good name" refers to Arjuna's immaculate record in performing his dharmic duties as a kshatriya and to his personal behavior as a human being, but also to the extraordinary recognition and blessings he received from great personalities, such as Shiva Mahadeva and Indra. Fame and good reputation are considered useful assets, because they are needed in order to properly perform one's duty in society. Losing one's good name - because of actually committing some misdeeds or just being defamed by envious people - may even disrupt one's occupational duties in a very serious way, thus causing distress and damage to the entire society that becomes deprived of our good service.

There is a clear line between such legitimate desire for a good name and the vainglory of false identification with a material position - also called "false ego". It is called "false" in opposition to the real ego, that is self-realization of Atman/ Brahman in a sentiment of service to the Supreme. We should not think that this verse of Gita is encouraging abankara and abhimana. Gita's teachings, just like the teachings of all other Vedic scriptures, focus on giving up one's material identification and attachments and attain the level of Brahman realization. Later on Krishna will clearly say that only fools are caught in the trap of abankara.

अकीर्तिं चापि भूतानि कथयिष्यन्ति तेऽव्ययम् । सम्भावितस्य चाकीर्तिर्मरणादतिरिच्यते ॥ २-३४ ॥

akīrtiṁ cāpi bhūtāni kathayiṣyanti te'vyayam । sambhāvitasya cākīrtirmaraṇādātiricyate ॥ 2-34 ॥

akīrtim: bad reputation; ca: and; api: also; bhutan: all people (living entities); kathayishyanti: will speak; te: of you; avyayam: eternally; sambhavitasya: of a respectable person; ca: and; akīrtir: bad name; maranat: than death; atiricyate: is more.

"Everybody will speak of your infamy forever. For a respectable person, a bad name is worse than death."

This verse further elaborates on the problems caused by a bad reputation, especially when it is not based on factual reality. The next two verses will clearly bring up the issue of slandering, both as the bad reputation created by uninformed people who foolishly misinterpreted our actions, as well as by the deliberate calumny and rumors circulated by enemies.

Krishna is clearly telling Arjuna that for a kshatriya it is better to die on the battlefield, on the line of duty of protecting society from evil doers, than to take the dubious path of so-called non-violence or passive resistance, often presented in the name of "being positive", "being a better person", and "opposing love to hatred". Such abstentionism is an incorrect understanding of the principle of non-violence. Ahimsa means "absence of hatred", and applies to the level of self-realized consciousness in which we see all beings as non-different from our own selves. This means that we should work for the benefit of all beings as a whole, compared to a body: when an infection appears in the body, refusing to take the appropriate action in the name of non-violence and love is simply stupid. However, action must be appropriate and intelligent, aiming at achieving a specific and precise purpose, and performed according to the required dharmic /ethical modalities. This means that we must engage in battle only against combatants, and not against innocent and non-harmful people, even if these are easier to target. The purpose of fighting is not about retaliation or revenge or venting one's own anger, but about stopping an attack and protecting the innocent and good people. If our application of the dharmic principles of protective fight is not sufficient to carry us to victory, it is better for us to die on the battlefield, serving society through our death, because we will get another, and better, opportunity in a next life. When we sacrifice ourselves to a greater good, we obtain a greater reward, in this life or in the next.

A respectable person is a person who one who has earned the respect of people through impeccable performance of his/ her duties, good character and qualifications. Such a person is naturally playing an important role in society, because of the example s/he sets for the rest of the people, and the support s/he can rally for good causes.

भयाद्राणदुपरतं मंस्यन्ते त्वां महारथाः । येषां च त्वं बहुमतो भूत्वा यास्यसि लाघवम् ॥ २-३५ ॥

bhāyādraṇādūparatam maṁsyante tvāṁ mahārathāḥ । yeṣāṁ ca tvam bahumatō bhūtvā yāsyasi lāghavam ॥ 2-35 ॥

bhayad: out of fear; raṇad: from the battle; uparatam: given up; maṁsyante: they will think; tvam: you; maha-rathah: the great generals; yesham: them; ca: and; tvam: you; bahu-mato: highly respected; bhutra: having been; yasyasi: you will become; laghavam: of much less weight.

"The great generals will think that you have left the battlefield out of fear; those who used to keep you in such a high esteem will not take you seriously any more."

Arjuna has always been deeply respected and loved by many great personalities and by the general people as well. Many times he has demonstrated his great valor, courage, spirit of self-sacrifice, loyalty, and endurance, so naturally he is held in great esteem by all the elders, starting with Shiva Mahadeva who personally wrestled with him to test his valor, and king Indra of the heavenly planets, who honored him as his worthy son. He is Drona's favorite disciple. Bhishma, at the end of the fight, will declare that for him it is an honor to die by the hand of Arjuna. Draupadi's father honors Arjuna above all the Pandavas, and everybody feels that King Yudhisthira owes his glory and power to Arjuna only, because it was Arjuna who followed the horse of the rajasuya sacrifice as his champion and gained vassals and tributes to the King. It was Arjuna who, helped by Bhima, rescued Duryodhana from the hands of the Gandharvas, and it was Arjuna who defended Virata's palace from the attack of all the Kauravas, as he was the only one present at that time. Yet, if Arjuna leaves the battlefield now, some people may still think that he has become weak and fearful due to some mysterious reason, and that his days as a famous warrior are over, and might even be forgotten and doubted. Arjuna's spiritual realization may have carried him to the level where he does not identify with his social role as a kshatriya, but that does not mean that he can refuse to fight a dharmic battle. Krishna will explain very clearly that we should renounce the enjoyment of the fruits of the action, not the action itself, because proper action is our duty.

Some people may question whether we should care about what other people say, since we are supposed to be situated on a transcendental level, and we should always be humble and tolerant. However, there is a difference between being personally humble and tolerant (which is good) and allowing humiliation towards one's duty or service (which is bad). Actually our duty or service is not about ourselves, but about society and to Supreme, so when an offense is made against our duty or service, it is not done to us and therefore there is no scope in being humble about it. Showing one's "personal humility and tolerance" in front of offenses made against society - against *dharm*a, against the service to the Supreme - is merely cowardice.

अवाच्यवादांश्च बहून्वदिष्यन्ति तवाहिताः । निन्दन्तस्तव सामर्थ्यं ततो दुःखतरं नु किम् ॥ २-३६ ॥

avacyavadāṁśca bahūnvadiṣyanti tavāhiṭaḥ । nindantastava sāmārthyam tato duḥkhataram nu kim ।। 2-36 ।।

avacya: indecent; vadam: speeches; ca: and; bahun: many; vadiṣyanti: they will tell; tava: your; hiṭaḥ: enemies; nindantaḥ: offensive; tava: your; sāmārthyam: value; tataḥ: than that; duḥkhataram: more painful; nu: surely; kim: what (can there be).

"Your enemies will circulate many bad rumors about you, offensively demeaning your valor. What could be more painful for you?"

Avacya means "something that should not be said", and plainly refers to gross insults, falsities and vulgar allusions, stuff that decent people should never utter or repeat. It is regularly observed that low-class and unqualified people, who do not care for *dharm*a, easily become envious of the success and good reputation earned by more qualified persons, and being unable to prove their greater value through positive and constructive action, resort to gross and vulgar or even obscene slandering, venting their own frustration and anger in the only way they can. Unfortunately, there are many who will listen to them, as they are hungry for garbage and eager to find a target for their own personal frustrations, too. This type of behavior is very widespread among politicians, for example. Instead of focusing on the real issues of policies, ideologies, and legislation, they try to cast aspersions on their enemies' birth or private lives - in matters that have absolutely nothing to do with governance.

However, when dharmic or even just decent people come across vulgar slandering about a person, they will neither utter nor listen to such garbage. If someone has actually committed some crime or bad action, let it be properly investigated and ascertained, and let the repercussions on society be evaluated objectively and counteracted with appropriate measures. Vulgar gossiping is unworthy of decent people. Hiṭaḥ, or "enemy", literally means "one who hates", and comes from the same root of himsa. A hateful person breeds intentions of unnecessary and unprovoked violence, and schemes on how to cause sufferings to others. It is important to make a distinction between the application of force (necessary) and violence (unnecessary), as the first is motivated by an objective defensive purpose and the second by negative subjective sentiments such as selfishness, greed, lust, envy and hatred.

हतो वा प्राप्स्यसि स्वर्गं जित्वा वा भोक्ष्यसे महीम् । तस्मादुत्तिष्ठ कौन्तेय युद्धाय कृतनिश्चयः ॥ २-३७ ॥

hato vā prāpsyasi svargam jitvā vā bhokṣyase mahīm । tasmāduत्तिṣṭha kaunteya yuddhaya kṛtaniścayaḥ ।। 2-37 ।।

hataḥ: being killed; va: or; prāpsyasi: you will obtain; svargam: Svargaloka; jitvā: being victorious; va: or; bhokṣyase: you will enjoy; mahim: the Earth; tasmad: therefore; uttistha: rise; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; yuddhaya: in the battle; kṛtani: determined; niścayaḥ: without doubts.

"If you are killed (in battle) you will attain the higher planets, and if you win the battle you will enjoy the pleasures of this world. Therefore get up, o son of Kunti, and abandoning all doubts, fix your mind on the battle."

The higher planetary system in this universe, called Svarga or Svargaloka, is sometimes defined as "heaven" or "paradise", but the Vedic concept is quite different from the Abrahamic concept, and the two should not be superimposed as such artificial identification would create confusion and misunderstanding.

Svarga is still within this immanent universe although the residents there live much longer and enjoy a much higher quality of life and pleasure than the people of the earthly planets. But it is not the final destination of the liberated soul, it is not the spiritual world. Even in Svarga, bodies are temporary and eventually they have to die. Paradise is therefore not "eternal", just like hell.

Both are simply temporary positions where individual souls can obtain joys and sufferings that exceed the range of the human condition. Svarga will eventually be destroyed at the time of the annihilation of the universe, and it will become manifested again at the beginning of a new cycle.

सुखदुःखे समे कृत्वा लाभालाभौ जयाजयौ । ततो युद्धाय युज्यस्व नैवं पापमवाप्स्यसि ॥ २-३८ ॥

sukhaduḥkhe same kṛtvā lābhālābhau jayājayau | tato yuddhāya yujyasva naivam pāpamavāpsyasi || 2-38 ||

sukha: in happiness; duḥkhe: in sorrow; same: equally (balanced); kṛtvā: making; labha: in obtaining, alabhan: in not obtaining; jaya: in winning; ajayau: in not winning; tataḥ: there; yuddhaya: in the battle; yujyasva: engage; na: not; evam: (like) this; pāpam: sinful result; avāpsyasi: you will get.

"If you fight this battle while remaining equally disposed (unattached and prepared) to joy and sadness, gain and loss, victory and defeat, you will never be touched by sin."

This is one of the most important verses in Gita, where Krishna starts explaining the new topic of karma yoga, or proper action. In fact, this is the logical development of the discourse: after explaining that we are all eternal spirit souls and not the material body, it is logical to understand that we should not identify with our specific position in society (determined by the qualities, tendencies, skills and abilities afforded by our body-mind). So an intelligent student would certainly ask what the meaning of duty in such context is, considering that Krishna is goading Arjuna into battle by appealing to his sense of duty as a śhatrīya.

The great commentator of Gita, Adi Shankara Acharya, explained that this is an "incidental instruction", and in fact it makes perfect sense. "Incidental" refers to the particular external situation in which a person finds himself at a given time, and "incidental instruction" brilliantly conveys the idea of a temporary duty that does not apply to the inner identity but to one's temporary position in society, that is also very important. This concept is repeated innumerable times all along the Gita, expressed from all possible angles of perspective. We have also seen Krishna very clearly encouraging Arjuna to perform his duty as śhatrīya faithfully and without hesitation: such idea will be repeated again and again in the subsequent chapters in unequivocal terms. Some foolish people, however, have misinterpreted this idea of "incidental instruction" and stated that Krishna's instruction in this verse is not about combining spiritual knowledge with active work in the world. In their illusory contemplation of illusion, they claim that Krishna is not really encouraging Arjuna to properly perform his duty, but he is just talking about "the realization of the Supreme Reality"... something that in their clouded mind implies that such pursuit has nothing to do with properly performing one's duty in society under the guidance of spiritual and material knowledge. These people may truly be called "mayavadis" because they claim that everything is illusory and therefore unworthy of our attention, so that as soon as a person attains the proper spiritual knowledge and realization, he should stop all actions in this world. Such an idea is openly and clearly condemned by Krishna in many passages of Gita, but these foolish people claim that Krishna means to say exactly the opposite of what he is clearly and repeatedly stating. Unfortunately such faulty interpretation has created generations of useless, lazy and irresponsible people who falsely pass themselves off as religious or spiritual teachers and leaders, causing social disasters at many levels. It is because of these people's delusional ramblings encouraging pathological withdrawal, that India was invaded and conquered - while those who were supposed to act as the teachers and guides of the entire society kept repeating that everything is illusory, and that Knowledge is necessarily opposed to Action. They believe and preach that "those who know, do not speak, and those who speak, do not know"... and yet they all keep speaking and writing volumes, and more recently cluttering bandwidth on the Net, too. They should show some consistency with their own ideology: if they believe that speaking is useless, they should stop speaking altogether and spare us their nonsense. If they want people to withdraw from action, they should give the example and get out of the way instead of trying to manipulate others for their own aggrandizement, fame, position, profit and material power. It is true that intellect and speech are not sufficient to understand Transcendence, but these should not be dismissed or underestimated, otherwise there would be no meaning and no use for the vast expanse of the Vedic literature and the extensive preaching of the genuine self-realized acharyas, from Vyasa to Adi Shankara.

Another trend of commentaries, mainly Vaishnavas, focus on "God's order" as the basis for the instruction given in this verse; according to this logic, whatever we do "in the name of God" does not entail any bad reaction and cannot be considered a sin. The devotee is expected to submit completely and surrender everything - including his intelligence, ethical sense, common sense, duties to society and to family - and this will free him from all obligations or responsibilities. This is all well when one is actually following God's direct instructions through the medium of a genuine spiritual guide, because most people may have misconceptions or some confusion about the actual meaning of intelligence, ethical sense, common sense and duties to society and to family, so in spite of their best intentions, their judgment might be faulty.

However, this "total surrender" approach can also be misinterpreted by unqualified and unrealized people to support deviations into adharma similar to those applied by the abrahamic ideologies, when sincere but clueless people who want to engage in genuine selfless service to God become manipulated by ruthless and cynical cheaters who claim to be the sole representatives of God, empowered to speak in God's name and give instructions to his devotees. Bhagavad gita is the best guidance in this dilemma, because Krishna is explaining everything very, very clearly and thoroughly.

In this verse Krishna does not say that one who has knowledge should not act, or that one should act only on God's orders: he says that one should act selflessly, out of duty. We should listen to Krishna first, and only by keeping his actual words very clear in our mind, we can expand our study by reading commentaries. Guru is not 100% God: a Guru who wants you to worship him only, neglecting the worship to God, is a fake and a cheater.

एषा तेऽभिहिता साङ्ख्ये बुद्धिर्योगे त्विमां शृणु बुद्ध्या युक्तो यया पार्थ कर्मबन्धं प्रहास्यसि ॥ २-३९ ॥

eṣā te'bhihitā sāṅkhye buddhiryoge tvimāṁ śṛṇu | buddhyā yukto yayā pārtha karmabandham prahāsyasi || 2-39||

esha: this; te: to you; abhibita: explained; sankhye: by analysis; buddhib: intelligence/ wisdom; yoge: by engagement; tu: but; imam: this; srinu: listen; buddhya: by intelligence; yuktab: engaged; yaya: by which; partha: o Partha (son of Pritha); karma: of action; bandham: bondage; prahasyasi: you will be liberated.

"I have explained this (point) to you by the (analytical method of examination called) Sankhya. Now listen to this (concept) as (observed from the perspective of) (the practice of intelligence, called) Buddhi Yoga. O Partha, through this Buddhi Yoga (application of intelligence and correct understanding) you will be released from the bondage of karma (actions and reactions)."

In this verse Krishna introduces the distinction between Sankhya and Buddhi Yoga. The divisive mentality of westernized academia presents the various "philosophies" as relative truths facing each other in a sort of competition to be "right" instead of "wrong", and in the process it gets so confused that students end up concluding that there is no real truth, or that the real truth is whatever one believes, or whatever the majority of the people believe. The implicit conclusion is that all truths are only hypothetical theories devoid of intrinsic value. This is called "relativism" and is considered the height of free thinking, because it is opposed to the dogmatic approach of abrahamic ideologies, according to which the only acceptable truth is whatever the religious authority officially says from time to time. Such dogma are, by definition, not subject to questioning or discussion, and whoever cannot in good conscience believe they represent the absolute truth, is punished or persecuted. The "faithful" are required to pledge blind allegiance to the dogma in order to be "right" and "saved", or "in good standing".

Both approaches are faulty because of their partiality. They cannot integrate a healthy and working vision of Reality and enable different people to communicate and understand each other, and cooperate for the benefit of the entire society. The solution to the dilemma is extremely simple, but it requires a broad mind (mahatma) to understand it, because it is about becoming able to see the Great Picture, in a multi-dimensional vision that goes beyond the dualistic and sectarian approach. For example, we may travel around a great mountain and take pictures of its beautiful slopes and valleys from various localities. All the pictures are portraying the same mountain, but they appear to be "different" from each other. Which photo is the "right" image of the mountain? Usually the one we like best. Are all the other photos "wrong"? Certainly not. Should we try to get a "complete picture" of the mountain, by superimposing transparencies of all the pictures, we will just get a confused mess, because we keep thinking in two dimensions, while the mountain has three dimensions. What we need is a paradigm shift that will enable us to see Reality in a much better way. Similarly, the various approaches presented in Gita - sankhya, karma, jnana, bhakti, buddhi, dhyana, etc - are not theories opposed to each other, but distinct dimensions or perspectives from which we can contemplate the same Absolute Truth. They complement each other, they are all required to understand Truth. Bhakti (devotion) without jnana (knowledge) and karma (action) is empty and foolish sentimentalism. Jnana without karma and bhakti is useless, dry theoretical academicism. Karma without jnana and bhakti is a waste of time, energy and resources. One who wants to be exclusive and rigid in following a particular yoga cult as opposed to other limbs of yoga is as stupid as a man trying to use only his hands, or head, or feet in daily life to perform his activities. No wonder they remain impotent in attaining the results of Yoga, and they only make a mockery of it. The dimension mentioned by Krishna most often is Buddhi Yoga: the engagement of intelligence and wisdom.

This Yoga is not very popular with institutional "religious authorities" because it helps people to see Reality from a place of wisdom that is already within the heart of each human being. The other perspectives can somehow be controlled by external agents, but Buddhi Yoga is a natural, spontaneous and independent function, that enables each one of us to actually see the facts beyond the trumped up appearances and the political propaganda. As the definition of Buddhi Yoga itself is rarely reflected in the various translations of Gita, it appears that many "masters" are not interested to talk about Buddhi, as they might feel that it may be a hindrance to the exclusiveness in the practice of their school of thought (names, labels, paths and organizations)... yet this is the definition used most frequently by Krishna, and the conclusive teaching in the text of Gita. Sankhya ("counting, enumerating") scientifically describes the categories of Reality, distinguishing the characteristics of matter and spirit, darkness and light, ignorance and knowledge. By exclusively following this approach, one may fall into the illusion of ontological dualism, and therefore Krishna brilliantly introduces the next perspective to broaden our vision. The word karma applies simultaneously to action and reaction, and to the connection between action and reaction. Some people may conclude that the purpose of Knowledge is to become free from action, in the sense that they may stop performing their duties, but this is a mistake.

नेहाभिक्रमनाशोऽस्ति प्रत्यवायो न विद्यते । स्वल्पमप्यस्य धर्मस्य त्रायते महतो भयात् ॥ २-४० ॥

nehābhikramanāśo'sti pratyavāyo na vidyate | svalpamapyasya dharmasya trāyate mahato bhayāt || 2-40||

na: not; iba: here; abhikrama: effort; nasab: loss; asti: there is; pratyavayab: diminution/ harm/ bad effects/ opposition; na: not; vidyate: is known; *su-*alpam: very little; api: although; asya: of this; dharmasya: of dharma; trayate: liberates/ protects; mahatab: great; bhayat: from the fear.

"On this (path) no effort goes to loss and there is no failure/ harm. Even a little (effort) in the direction of this dharma liberates one from the greatest fear."

The path of Buddhi Yoga, the Yoga of action enlightened by intelligence and wisdom, is perfect. Even a small effort in this direction is eternally valuable, because it stimulates the personal growth of the individual on a deeper level. The journey of self realization is transcendental, and continues on a subconscious level when our conscious mind is not ready to follow it through properly. As Krishna will explain later in the text, whatever progress one has made on this path will remain to his credit, even if he falls from the practice of Yoga: whenever he will be ready to resume the journey, in this or in a next lifetime, the fallen Yogi will bank on the results of his previous work, obtaining better facilities and breezing through the lessons that he had already learned. The work done in self-realization is always beneficial. There are no bad side-effects. Some other ventures may require one to sacrifice and renounce one's family life, health, resources, social position, or other valuable assets, but Buddhi Yoga is about engaging one's intelligence and wisdom in the performance of proper action, so it can be applied to all aspects of life and in all circumstances. Arjuna does not have to renounce his duties as a kshatriya, husband or father: he just needs to act with wisdom, supported by the knowledge and consciousness of the true transcendental nature of Brahman, and detached from the fruits of his actions. Another level of meaning is that through intelligence and wisdom engaged in the search for self realization, even loss and failure become opportunities and pillars of future success. It is said that experience is always worth the price we pay, even if it was very expensive. The actual purpose of Buddhi Yoga is the individual's spiritual growth, so even if from the material perspective one's efforts have not produced much visible result, the learning process will create a higher level of consciousness and a wider view of the purpose of life. The entire text of the Gita will explain how.

The word pratyanyah has many layers of meaning, and each of these meanings offers the basis for a different angle in meditating on the extraordinary characteristics of Buddhi Yoga. Here Krishna equates Buddhi Yoga with dharma: this is a very important concept, because intelligence without ethical principles can be extremely dangerous. Even a small step in support of dharma is eternally valuable, because it will follow us lifetime after lifetime and create even more and better opportunities, while temporary material things such as money, property, relations, and social position, will inevitably be lost - if not during this lifetime, at its end. What is the greatest fear? Having misused and wasted the valuable opportunity of a human life.

व्यवसायात्मिका बुद्धिरेकेह कुरुनन्दन । बहुशाखा ह्यनन्ताश्च बुद्धयोऽव्यवसायिनाम् ॥ २-४१ ॥

vyavasāyātmikā buddhirekeha kurunandana । bahusākhā hyanantāśca buddhayo'vyavasāyinām ॥ 2-41 ॥

vyavasaya: determined; atmika: with the self; buddhi: intelligence; eka: one; iba: here; kuru nandana: o son/ descendant of Kuru; bahu: many; sakha: branches; hi: certainly; ananta: endless; ca: and; buddhayah: of the intelligence; avyavasayinam: of those who are not determined.

"O beloved descendant of Kuru, the intelligence/ understanding that is constantly focused on the Atman is the only true one in this (world). Those who do not concentrate (on the soul) disperse their intelligence in innumerable minor ramifications."

Like other passages of Gita, this verse offers many layers of meanings. The most immediate meaning is that, in order to be able to achieve a goal, one needs to seriously concentrate on it and follow through with determination, enthusiasm and patience, and making the necessary sacrifices of time and energy. The search for Self realization is not a hobby, something that one does in leisure time, to enjoy a sense of personal value, or to kill time after retirement. It is not a practice to improve relaxation and digestion, to become fit and trim to better enjoy material pleasures. And neither is it an academic pursuit to get a doctorate, a teaching job, social prestige, or some mental stimulation, like one does with a crossword puzzle. This path must be walked with both feet, with all one's heart and soul, controlling one's mind to keep everything else in the back seat or better, properly engaged in the main mission of life. Otherwise, the process will stretch in time and the desired results will be delayed, possibly to a next lifetime. Of course, as Krishna just said in the previous verse, there is no loss even if one does not succeed as quickly as expected, but why should we linger in ignorance and suffering?

Another level of meaning is that we must accept the idea that our understanding of Reality could need improvement. Many people are very attached to their own theories and opinions, which are endless. An old proverb says, "so many heads, so many opinions"... innumerable branches, endless ramifications. This happens because of the attachment to one's false ego - ahankara and abhimana. We "like" an idea and we become attached to it, as if it were the truth, and we fight over it with other people who are similarly attached to their ideas, or the second-hand ideas (originally formulated by someone else) they have decided to espouse for some reason. Such an approach is encouraged by the westernized mainstream academic system, that aims to divide "schools of thought" as mere theories on an abstract object of speculation.

But Knowledge and Reality are not relative, they do not depend on anyone's opinion.

There is a famous story in this regard, involving an elephant and a number of men who were born blind - and therefore had never had a direct visual experience of the animal. The blind men were brought to the presence of the elephant and asked to describe it. Of course they could only touch the body of the animal, and as they did not expect it to be very large, each one of them groped a particular part of the body, getting a different impression. So the one who grasped the tail said the elephant was "something like a big rope", while the one who found a leg said the elephant was "like a tree trunk". Different opinions were given by those who had touched the belly, or the ear, or the tusk... and they were so engrossed in their personal opinions that they started to fight and beat each other over who "was right" and who "was wrong". So our intelligence or understanding must be "single", strongly focused on Reality itself and not on our attachment to theories. There is no place for sectarianism here, no place for institutional loyalty or political allegiances. As long as we fail to put Reality and the Supreme Self in the focus of our entire life, we will not achieve the goal. This is why we need to get Knowledge from the proper source - the original scriptures, the genuinely Self realized acharya who does not see real differences between the various genuine paths.

It is only from the peak of the mountain, when we have reached our goal, that we can all get the same view of the slopes and valleys below. Only a person who has a direct vision of the Absolute (tattva darshi) can instruct us on how to get up there.

यामिमां पुष्पितां वाचं प्रवदन्त्यविपश्चितः । वेदवाद्दरताः पार्थ नान्यदस्तीति वादिनः ॥ २-४२ ॥

yāmimāṃ puṣpītāṃ vācaṃ pravadantyavipaśchitāḥ । vedavādaratāḥ pārtha nānyadastīti vādināḥ ॥ 2-42 ॥

yam: that; imam: this; puspitam: flowery; vacam: speeches; pravadanty: preach/ recite; avipaśchitāḥ: those who have less understanding; veda: the Knowledge of Vedas; vada: followers/ reciters; rataḥ: attached; partha: o Partha (son of Pritha); na: not; anyad: other; asti: there is; iti: like this; vadināḥ: those who follow/ recite.

"O son of Pritha, those who do not have a full understanding preach/ recite about these things with many flowery words, and those who are attached to the letter of the Vedas are unable to recognize anything else."

Vedic scriptures present Knowledge in a well-designed way, with a deep sense of poetry and symbolism that is meant to attract the minds of educated people and give full intellectual satisfaction. We need to remember, though, that education and intellectual power do not equate with Self realization: they are just a preliminary platform from which one must further progress.

According to the texts themselves and to the universally accepted tradition, the present version of the Vedas was compiled about 5,000 years ago - around the time of Krishna's appearance - to be utilized by the people of Kali yuga, the present age that is characterized by a decrease in mental power, longevity, and good fortune. This miserable age started gradually and became more and more degraded to an intolerable level, developing just like the seasons on Earth. In India, summer starts with slightly warmer days and nights after the pleasant spring weather, then the heat increases gradually, sometimes in waves, and finally there is no respite even during the coolest hours of the night. When the situation has become extreme, the natural cycle of life moves the masses of air of different temperatures and rain clouds are formed. A cyclonic storm breaks out, with lightning and thunder and strong winds, and the summer heat is broken. The dust and the garbage are swept away by sudden floods, and while most of the small plants are killed and rot in the fields, the great trees with deepest roots survive for the next season. Similarly, when the Kali yuga becomes intolerable and there is no more place for dharma, destruction will come to sweep away the debris. Then a new compilation of Vedic knowledge will be in order, to suit the understanding and the requirements of the renewed human kind.

For the time being, however, the present compilation is our basis of reference and we should use it. Vedic scriptures are meant to train human beings to become aryas, "civilized people", and this is done by scientifically cultivating and regulating the useful and progressive natural talents and inclinations (guna) of each individual. Intellectuals, warriors, entrepreneurs and unskilled laborers exist in all societies, but in Vedic society they are carefully trained to understand and practice their respective rights and duties (karma). The three most intelligent categories of society (intellectuals, warriors and entrepreneurs) are also trained in personal life requirements, so that they can become perfect and progressive human beings, achieving full success in the four goals of human life: dharma (ethical living), artha (acquisition of valuable assets), kama (satisfaction of sense gratification) and moksha (liberation from conditioned attachments and identifications). In this verse Krishna explains that the Knowledge he has been speaking about - the spiritual nature of the living entity as Atman (rather than the temporary material body) and the science of action guided by intelligence and awareness - is contained in Vedic scriptures, but in a very elaborated, symbolic and poetic way (pushpita vacah).

This corpus of elaborated knowledge is sometimes called karma kanda, or "section about action", and comprises the four Vedas - Rig, Yajus, Sama and Atharva (called Sambitas or "collections") as well as their Brahmanas or ritualistic commentaries, explaining the meditation that goes with the mantras, the story of the ritualistic version of the knowledge and the reason to perform the sacrifices, and the requirements for the priests who conduct the sacrifice. Other extremely important parts of the core Vedic scriptures (called sruti) are the Aranyakas and Upanishads, explaining the innermost meaning of Vedic instructions. Later in the text of Gita, Krishna will explain the meaning of sacrifice (yajna), that is certainly not limited to the ritualistic offerings to the fire - the agnibotra being just a symbol for the sacrifices ("sacred actions") that a civilized human being is expected to perform. However, those who study, apply and especially teach Vedic knowledge need to be highly intelligent and evolved human beings - the brahmanas, those who "know Brahman" and "live as Brahman".

Less intelligent and less educated human beings, who are not brahmanas but brahma bandhus or even mlecchas (those who do not follow the Vedic rules), are doomed to remain "outside the door" of the actual meaning of Vedic literature. These unqualified persons are described by Krishna as avipaśchitāḥ, "devoid of sufficient understanding", and therefore unable to actually grasp the meaning and purpose of the Vedic system. Like a person who is incapable of opening the lid of a honey jar and can merely lick the glass outside, these incapable people remain attached to the mere superficial recitation of Vedic mantras, "as if there were nothing else" to get from them. In Kali yuga, such recitation is often done with very little understanding, sometimes even without the basic meaning of the verses or without recognizing the names of the Deities invoked. Of course less qualified people become attached to such a practice, because it gives them some appearance of nobility. In fact they do not know any better, and when trying to pass themselves off as genuine brahmanas they may even preach that there is nothing else to be gained by Vedic shastra except for the habit of muttering a litany nobody can understand and burning some ghi and grains in the fire.

Some commentators, presenting themselves as followers of Adi Shankara, argue that this verse wholly condemns the ritualistic aspects of Vedic knowledge, and teaches to renounce its worldly karmic pursuits in favor of the theoretical cultivation of philosophy, but this is not the real point. It is true that Adi Shankara criticized the degraded brahmins of his times, but he never dismissed the authority of Vedic scriptures - quite the contrary, he came to restore the authority of the Vedas. The reform brought about by Adi Shankara was meant to bring back the original and deeper meaning of Vedic knowledge, as explained in this verse by Krishna: to shift from the attachment (rati) of the mere external recitation (vada) of Vedas and come to the platform of real understanding of their inner meaning.

कामात्मानः स्वर्गपरा जन्मकर्मफलप्रदाम् ।

क्रियाविशेषबहुलां भोगैश्वर्यगतिं प्रति ॥ २-४३ ॥

kāmātmānaḥ svargaparā janmakarmaphalaprādām | kriyāviśeṣabahulāṁ bhogaiśvarya-gatiṁ prati || 2-43 ||

kama: lust; atmanah: self (mind/ identification); svarga: heaven; para: aspiring/ focusing; janma: birth; karma: action; phala: fruits; pradam: giving; kriya: duties/ procedures/ rituals; visesa: different; bahulam: many; bhoga: sense gratification; aisvarya: domination; gati: destination/ goal; prati: towards.

"They aspire to the pleasures of the higher planets (considering them as the most desirable purpose) and to the fruits of their actions to be reaped in a next lifetime, therefore they perform a great variety of complicated rituals to achieve the purpose of a high position and sense gratification."

In the previous verse Krishna criticized those who remain attached to the mere recitation of the Vedic mantras, thus forgetting their true purpose, i.e. the realization of the true spiritual nature of the Self and the science of action guided by intelligence.

The flowery words that accompany such supreme Knowledge are the bait to attract people, and the most attractive part of all is known as the phala sruti, the final stanzas that accompany most important stutis, and that promise all sorts of material benefits to the reciter, including fulfillment of desires in this world, absolution from the consequences of bad actions, acquisition of good qualities, a better birth for the next life, and even liberation (moksha). For this reason, some people get the impression that moksha is a kind of valuable asset offered as a blessing by God to "good people", or that it can be automatically achieved through the celebration of some ritual, or for the intercession (or blessing) of some saint, without any extra effort from the part of the candidate. In fact, liberation is the most valuable goal of human life, but it is not something that can be acquired like a property or a title. It is a personal and intimate realization of one's real spiritual nature, and the detachment from all material identifications, desires and attachments. Therefore people who still have a lusty mentality (kama-atma) remain totally unable to even start to understand what it is, just like people who insist to remain in a dark cave instead of going out in the daylight cannot even begin to understand what the Sun looks like. No amounts of pious acts or good wishes or rituals or blessings will show the Sun to these people: they just have to get up and walk out of the cave into the sunlight, leaving behind all the rest.

Vedic knowledge has a universal character, therefore it describes different planetary systems, especially those called Svarga, or heaven, where life is much pleasurable than on this planet. It comes to no surprise that among the goals desired by materialists, access to Svarga constitutes the highest and the most popular. Most of the rituals described in the sruti and in their commentaries, the smriti, are meant to form a personal relation between the worshiper and the Devas, thus developing a strong affinity and familiarity that will take him to the abode of the Devas at the time of death. In that position, the worshiper will have a greater dominion (aisvarya) over sense gratification (bhoga) - exactly the opposite of what we need when we are seeking for liberation. In a sense, it is true that we can achieve liberation also through the path of sense gratification, exhausting the desires and realizing that the satisfaction of material senses does not really give that happiness we were looking for. But this is possible only for intelligent people, for those who have been thoroughly trained in healthy sense gratification. Unhealthy sense gratification, that does not follow the dharmic principles, is so dangerous that it can eat away our intelligence, good qualities and intentions, and throw us into a hellish existence, to the level of demoniac beings, animals and plants. Certainly this is not the kama described by the Vedas as a major goal of human life.

Smriti scriptures were compiled by great personalities such as Yajnavalkya, Parasara, Brihaspati, Daksha, Gautama, Kanada, Bharata, Yama, Angira, Pracheta, Yogeshvara, Atri, Jaimini, Panini, Kautiliya, Nandi etc, and include instructions about the correct pronunciation of mantras, the intonation and metrics, and the practical proceedings of the rituals both for public and private purposes. This accounts for the kriya visesa bahulam, or "many different procedures" mentioned in this verse, all described for the same purpose of achieving some material benefit. The trick here is that in order to properly perform all these different and complicated procedures, a human being needs to constantly exercise his intellect and understanding, self-discipline (and therefore detachment from sense gratification and laziness), cleanliness (and therefore purity of mind), determination in following through a difficult task, and so on - elevating him to the enlightened platform of sattva guna. These qualities will gradually take him to a platform, called visuddha sattva ("pure sattva") where he will become able to understand the transcendental Knowledge for its actual meaning and purpose.

The drinking of the soma rasa is probably the most famous ritual practice for the worshiper to gain a place among the residents of the higher planets. Unfortunately, due to bad biased translations produced by anti-Hindu propagandists during the British colonial period, many people have come to believe that soma rasa is nothing more than an alcoholic fermented beverage similar to wine or beer, and they use this idea to justify their lust for ordinary booze - intoxicating beverages that are connected to the degrading lower gunas of rajas and tamas and are definitely not conducive to the basic ability to drive a vehicle or walk straight, what to speak of an increased longevity or the contemplation of the highest and subtlest truths of the transcendental science. This interpretation of soma rasa goes against the very purpose of the Vedic system. In fact, the soma rasa was not a fermented alcoholic beverage but a fresh herbal juice that boosted brain power and general health: an ancient version of the endless range of "health drinks" that people buy and consume to keep themselves going today in "civilized" societies. Otherwise it would not be associated with "immortality", a definition that should at least imply some good health and longer life expectancy. The texts of Ayurvedic medicine have never stopped identifying the Soma Lata with the ubiquitous genus Ephedra, known not only in India (in its variety Ephedra gerardiana) but also in Asia and Europe as well as in America, where it is called Mormon Tea or Squaw Tea. Ephedra is also used as an extract for a number of food supplements and tonic preparations because it contains a mildly stimulant alkaloid called Ephedrine, comparable to the "good caffeine" contained in the south American plants known as Guaranà and Yerba Matè. Ephedra has been used all over the world for thousands of years to treat headaches, asthma, hay fever, rashes of allergic origin, and rheumatism. It is described as stomachic and diuretic, and useful to counteract hypotension associated with anesthesia. It is also famous for its properties as energy booster at mental, physical and even sexual levels, and therefore has been cataloged by FDA in the USA as enhancer of athletic performances, as a concentration help for students under exams and even as stimulant of metabolism for those who want to lose excess weight. Such qualities and uses clearly set Soma very much apart from all sorts of alcoholic beverages that are universally known to have precisely the opposite effects, just like poison compared to nectar.

भोगैश्वर्यप्रसक्तानां तयापहृतचेतसाम् ।

व्यवसायात्मिका बुद्धिः समाधौ न विधीयते ॥ २-४४ ॥

bhogaishvarya-prasaktānām tayāpahṛta-cetasām | vyavasāyātmikā buddhiḥ samādhau na vidhīyate || 2-44 ||

bhoga: sense pleasure; aisvarya: domination; prasaktānam: those who are attached to; taya: by these; apahṛta: covered; cetasam: consciousness; vyavasaya: focused; atmika: mind/ self; buddhiḥ: intelligence; samādhau: in the samādhi; na: not; vidhīyate: becomes.

"Because they are attached to pleasure and a high position (of power and opulence), and their minds are confused by such things, they remain unable to focus their understanding on the Self and to attain samādhi (balanced consciousness)."

This verse clarifies that sense gratification and control are not bad in themselves: it is the attachment to them that confuses the mind, and distracts one from the actual mission of human life. These two causes of confusion - bhoga and aisvarya - can be transformed into valuable instruments for one's true progress by applying Krishna's instructions on Sankhya and Buddhi Yoga, that is, constantly remembering one's true spiritual transcendental nature, and working sincerely in a selfless service spirit.

Bhoga, or sense gratification, is necessary for the body and mind to function properly, but should not be pursued as the goal of life, to satisfy the innermost craving for true happiness - because such deep happiness is not found in the body or in the mind. Only the strictly necessary amount of sense gratification, obtained through dharmic means, should be applied to keep the body and mind functioning properly. It is said that sense gratification is like salt: a small pinch is required for health and to give a good taste to food, but if we start to increase the quantity because we like the taste, it creates addiction and we end up using too much, to the point that we become sick. Similarly, aisvarya, the sense of control and domination, can be properly used to get things done properly in the rightful performance of our duties. We need to keep our body and mind under control, and survey the extensions of our body and mind - our working instruments, our personal effects such as clothing and eating utensils, and our living quarters. We must be responsible for their proper upkeep and orderly functioning, and this is done through the principle of aisvarya - control and domination. When required and legitimate for our occupational duties, this control can extend to plants, animals and human beings who need to be directed and supervised in their work in order to function properly: for example, young children and unskilled laborers. Again, such control must be strictly limited to what is required for the smooth performance of one's occupational responsibilities, and not pursued for the sake of its taste, otherwise it will create addiction and we end up trying to control too much, to the point that we become sick with power hunger. In both cases, when we become attached to bhoga and aisvarya, we lose sight of their actual purpose and especially of the mission of human life, that is attaining Self realization. The word samādhi appears many times in Bhagavad gita and is a very important concept in the practice of all types of yoga. It means "balanced consciousness", "constant intelligence", and "constant meditation". Such level is the purpose of Yoga and can be attained through any genuine Yoga method under the guidance of a person, or persons, who must have already achieved that level. Another meaning of the word samādhi in this context is applied to the constant preoccupation of the conditioned soul to procure sense pleasure and dominion over things or others, thus changing the translation of the verse into "Because they are attached to pleasure and a high position (of power and opulence), and their minds are confused by such things, constantly thinking of them, they remain unable to focus their understanding on the Self."

त्रैगुण्यविषया वेदा निस्त्रैगुण्यो भवार्जुन ।

निर्द्वन्द्वो नित्यसत्त्वस्थो निर्योगक्षेम आत्मवान् ॥ २-४५ ॥

traiguṇyaviṣayā vedā nistraiguṇyo bhavārjuna | nirdvandvo nityasattva-stho niryogakṣema ātmavān || 2-45 ||

traiguṇya: of the three gunas (qualities) (of the material world); nishaya: in the matter; vedah: the Vedas; nistraiguṇyah: without the three gunas; bhava: become; arjuna: o Arjuna; nirdvandvah: without duality; nitya: constantly; sattva: in sattva; sthab: situated; niryoga: free from connection; kṣema: and protection; ātmavan: one who is (focused on) the Self."

"The Vedas (books of knowledge) deal with the various manifestations of the three gunas. O Arjuna, you should rather become detached from (all) these three gunas, and situate yourself in that pure goodness that is not subject to changes. One who knows the Atman becomes free from all dualities and finds protection in detachment."

The four main Vedas deal mainly with the knowledge of this universe, its archetypal principles, its cosmology, and the proper way to live and work in it, establishing a mutually beneficial relationship of cooperation among the residents of the various planets. This is the realm of the three gunas: all of them interact together to produce results to cyclically create, maintain and destroy the material manifestation. Rajas brings about creation, sattva preserves and maintains, and tamas dissolves. Although the Devas are situated in sattva, as long as one remains in the material identification and attachment, sattva can not remain pure and is therefore subject to become mixed with the other two gunas - rajas and tamas. For example, we can see that the influence of sattva brings peace and contentment, but our bodies and minds regularly need food and care, thereby pushing us out of peace and contentment, either into the rajas (the active search for the food and care we need) or even worse, into tamas, the lazy oblivion of starvation, inertia and uncleanness leading to destruction. Sometimes tamas is mistaken for sattva, because the two opposites may look similar to the eyes of a person who does not have the proper knowledge.

We see that even the residents of the heavenly planets sometimes become confused by rajas and tamas - arrogance, anger, lust, delusion, fear, loss, lamentation - and eventually die, losing their position and having to take another birth. The mission of human life is to rise above the play of the gunas and to become situated in nitya sattva or suddha sattva, the level of goodness that remains constantly pure because it does not see any separation or duality between the Self and Reality, and it does not depend on anything external. In this context, yoga refers to the union or connection between persons, and is mentioned together with kshema, "protection". The need for connection, company or love and protection is a natural feeling for the conditioned soul that still sees oneself and the world in terms of duality. Connection or relationship and protection make sense only when there is a distinction between persons, when there is something to seek "outside the Self". Similarly, in this context yoga can also mean "acquisition", to indicate the natural impulse to acquire and achieve, to leave one's mark on the world, to give a meaning of fulfillment to one's life. At various levels, this can be as basic as the animal needs of eating, sleeping, protection, pleasure and perpetuation of the species, as distorted as the endless accumulation of material possessions, or as lofty as the highest intellectual and scholarly pursuits. The Self realized soul finds all its necessities, including achievement, protection (both to protect oneself and protect his possessions and relationships), love and company within the Self (atma). But such Self is not about the lower material identification, that is illusory and can only create a delusional sense of egotistic arrogance and selfishness.

A healthy amount of self-reliance and self-esteem is required to perform our duties in society, but these remain healthy only when they are used as instruments and do not become a goal in themselves, just like sense gratification and the sense of control. The teachings of Sankhya and Buddhi Yoga explained by Krishna show that there is a big difference between the Self and the ego,

Another level of meaning of the expression niryo-ga-kshema is that detachment itself, or lack of selfish attachment, is the best protection. Everything in this world is temporary, and bound to be lost sooner or later, therefore attachment is foolish and hopeless in any case. This does not mean that one should reject everything or abstain from all relationships and activities; rather it means that in all relationships and activities we should be acting out of duty and not for our personal bhoga and aisvarya, or sense gratification and sense of dominion and ownership. The most wonderful thing is that this approach is also the most conducive to a healthy life of good relationships and a successful career, because attachment to one's selfish pleasure and power hunger inevitably create havoc in our lives, dooming all our attempts to failure.

यावानर्थ उदपाने सर्वतः सम्प्लुतोदके । तावान्सर्वेषु वेदेषु ब्राह्मणस्य विजानतः ॥ २-४६ ॥
yāvānārtha udapāne sarvataḥ samplutodake । tāvānsarveṣu vedeṣu brāhmaṇasya vijānataḥ ।। 2-46 ।।

yavan: whatever; artha: value/ benefit/ purpose; udapane: in a small water reservoir; sarvataḥ: everywhere; samplutodake: a large expanse of water; tavan: that same (value/ purpose); sarveshu: in all; vedeshu: Vedas; brahmanasya: of the (genuine) brahmana; vijanataḥ: who has the complete/ realized knowledge (of Brahman).

"Whatever value is found in a pond is also found, for all purposes, also in a large lake, and similarly whatever is contained in the all the Vedas can be found in a person who has realized the knowledge of Brahman."

In this verse Krishna continues to explain that Vedic knowledge is meant to lead us to fully realize the Supreme Reality, Brahman. All the elaborate rituals aim at attracting us towards the level of sattva, from which we become able to understand Transcendence. A good birth, good intelligence, wealth, health, and whatever we need to live happily in this world, are simply instruments that help us to attain Self realization. It is very difficult to engage in transcendental studies and practices when we struggle with the basic necessities of life for ourselves and our family, therefore all the material blessings offered by the Vedic rituals are special facilities to help us in the task.

There is no need to give up the basic comforts of life to pursue Self realization: the only thing we need to give up is attachment to them, and this is done by training ourselves in dharma. Therefore the Vedic system starts the training and education of the individual even before his birth, with the samskaras performed by the responsible men of society. When a child is ready, he is sent to the Gurukula to be trained in dharma first and foremost, and also in all the duties and principles, practices and skills that he will need in his adult life as a member of the varna for which he has manifested a natural talent and inclination. A rigorous dharmic training, both in the family of origin and in the family of the Guru, ensures that the individual becomes able to pursue artha, or the acquisition of valuable assets, in an ethical way and without becoming a victim of material attachment and identification. With the proper acquisition of artha, it becomes possible to pursue dharmic kama, or sense gratification. After a regulated life of healthy and ethical sense gratification, the individual enters the phase of old age, when the senses become more peaceful and it is easier to let go of everything that belongs to the mundane platform. At this point the individual is able to totally devote himself to moksha, or liberation from material conditionings. This is the beneficial and stress-free path traced by Vedic scriptures for the conditioned soul that takes birth in this world under the strong desire of enjoying and controlling it. Unfortunately, in Kali yuga there is a strong tendency to mess up with everything. Unqualified people can fail to understand the civilized - i.e. intelligent, scientific, comfortable and pleasurable - Vedic system and misuse it, creating unnecessary sufferings and confusion at the individual and collective level. Krishna knows that Kali yuga is going to start soon, and therefore he is clearly stating the purpose of the entire system, to help us remain focused on what is really important. We can make the example of a train station or airport, where you can find so many useful facilities - from comfortable sitting lounges to bathrooms to snack bars and restaurants, to a number of shops that sell items that may make your journey more comfortable... reading material, mosquito repellent creams, inflatable pillows, etc. Some may even have private rooms for sleeping, public TV screens, post office counters, bank counters, internet centers, specialized bookshops, apparel shops, gift shops, souvenir shops, and so many other things to entertain the transiting travelers while they are waiting between one train and another, or one flight and another, to continue their journey to destination.

However, the entire purpose of all these facilities and even of the train station or airport, is for you to catch the train or airplane you need to go from this place to the next. If you forget the actual reason why you have come to the railway station or airport in the first place, you may have a lot of fun for some time but you will not attain your actual destination - something that will actually cause you a lot of problems. A truly realized brahmana is a sober person who is able to remain focused on the actual purpose of the various facilities offered by the Vedic system, and has the all-important duty to guide the other travelers. By definition, "brahmana" is one who actually knows Brahman, who has realized Brahman and acts as Brahman (transcendental spiritual consciousness). A person who does not fulfill such requisites cannot be called brahmana; attempting to present an unqualified person as a brahmana is as disastrous as presenting an unqualified person as a surgeon. This has absolutely nothing to do with DNA: the foolish son of a great surgeon cannot be allowed to operate if he has not undergone the proper training and does not possess the proper knowledge of anatomy and medicine. His favorable birth is just an opportunity, not a qualification in itself. To foolish people, the work of a surgeon can seem easy: get a scalpel and cut through the skin and flesh of a patient to extract something that hurts. Similarly, to foolish people the work of a brahmana can seem easy: sit and eat, mumble some litany and burn some clarified butter and grains in the fire. But don't expect any good results from the procedures!

The key word in this verse is artha: it means valuable asset, valuable result. A superficial imitation of the real thing will have no real value, because it will not give the desired results. Superficial and ignorant people will think that you just need to go through the external moves, like a simpleton will believe that switching the computer on like a TV set is all you need to do to get the full operating value of a very sophisticated machine. Another important word in this verse is vijana, that belongs to the same root of vijnana. Theoretical knowledge, or jnana, is merely a preliminary step towards applied knowledge or vijnana.

कर्मण्येवाधिकारस्ते मा फलेषु कदाचन । मा कर्मफलहेतुर्भूर्मा ते सङ्गोऽस्त्वकर्मणि ॥ २-४७ ॥

karmaṇyevādhikāraṣte mā phaleṣu kadācana । mā karmaphalaheturbhūrmā te saṅgo'stvakarmaṇi ।। 2-47 ।।

karmaṇi: in the actions; eva: certainly; adhikarab: legitimate (legal/ moral) right; te: of you; ma: not; phaleṣu: in the fruits; kadācana: never; ma: not; karma: (of the) action; phala: result; hetu: cause; bhū: become; ma: not; te: of you; sangab: attachment; astu: there should be; akarmani: abstaining from action.

"You certainly have the right to perform actions but never (the right) to enjoy the fruits of your actions. Do not (try to) become the cause of the fruits of the action, but do not become attached to inaction."

This is one of the most famous verses of Gita, summarizing its entire message.

In the previous verse Krishna explained that one should remain fully aware of the ultimate purpose of all the various teachings of Vedic scriptures, in order to achieve their artha, or the valuable asset that constitutes their aim and objective. Here Krishna further defines the subtle balance between action and non-action: we need to keep in mind the result, but out of duty only, not because we want to enjoy the fruits of our work. The natural tendency of uncivilized people is to act only when they see a personal benefit coming from the action - money, possession, sense gratification, or even just a sense of pride and accomplishment. The Vedic system is quite different: the observance of dharma requires totally selfless action performed out of duty only. Each member of society works to benefit the entire social body, just like the limbs of our body work selflessly to benefit the entire system. The most wonderful thing is that this is the only working way to ensure that everyone is properly taken care of. Granted, the Vedic system is designed for progressive people and in Kali yuga it is difficult to follow it in the proper way, to the point that it can become a very degraded and disastrous mockery of itself. However, its principles remain most effective and progressive, when they are followed properly. Such responsibility lies squarely on the shoulders of the leaders of society - as Krishna will declare later (3.21, etc) - who must teach and practice the genuine method, and organize society in that direction.

By applying the instruction of this verse, we will ensure that each position in society will be occupied only by a genuinely qualified person. Contrarily to what ignorant people believe, the higher one is in a social position, the less rights and the more duties he has. In uncivilized societies, those who are in the higher classes do not hesitate to take personal advantage of their influence on society, and accumulate money and properties and other benefits for themselves and their associates, neglecting their actual duties and responsibilities. In the genuine Vedic system the highest varnas are trained in the utmost selflessness and nobody can amass material wealth beyond their strict functional/ occupational needs. A brahmana lives in a very modest and simple manner, without any luxury and ostentation, and without saving wealth "for the future", because he knows (and needs to show others by his personal example) that the real value of life is not about materialism and sense enjoyment. He does not charge for his teaching or consultancy, either, because he is just performing his duty - rather, he takes the maintenance of his students as his responsibility. When a student enters the Gurukula, he factually becomes a son in the family of the Guru, and is treated exactly as such. A brahmana can enjoy a comfortable livelihood that will keep his body and mind fit for his work by using the spontaneous gifts of kshatriyas and vaiśyas who appreciate his good work. In case of need, he can even approach them to ask for donations to support himself and his family, but he must always remain independent and detached.

A kshatriya can amass wealth by accepting tributes from vassal kings and taxes from the vaiśyas who prosper under his good administration, but he knows he is only a fiduciary for the people: he must distribute this wealth in charity to the needy and meritorious (who can easily approach him directly every day) and sacrifice his own comfort and even his own life in the line of duty. He can enjoy a comfortable livelihood that will keep his body and mind fit for his work, but he must at all times be ready to leave everything behind or even give everything up, whenever his protection and help are required by the prajas.

A vaiśya's job requires him to pay taxes to the kshatriyas and finance the religious and educational work of the brahmanas. He must also take care to properly feed all his dependents - family and workers, household animals as well as beggars and even stray animals - before he sits at his meals. The task of the vaiśya is to generate wealth, not to accumulate it or freeze it in a non-productive way. He can enjoy a comfortable livelihood that will keep his body and mind fit for his work by utilizing a reasonable portion of the wealth he produces, but he should never try to gain power in society, influence kshatriyas or brahmanas with his gifts, or directly usurp their position in society, because that is considered sinful.

Of course, in Kali yuga it is difficult to find a qualified and capable vaiśya, what to speak of qualified and capable kshatriyas and brahmanas, so we are in a permanent state of social emergency and anyone, from any background, should try to fulfill such higher duties in society if he is willing to work in that capacity, even without being fully qualified. In Vedic society a sudra has no duties or responsibilities other than sincerely and honestly executing the work he is asked to do by his dharmic employer. In exchange, he has the absolute and lifelong right to get everything he needs to live a comfortable life for himself and his own family - abundance of good food, clothing and ornaments, free decent housing, medical care, opportunities for education and social mobility for his children, and is regularly entertained in the religious and cultural festivals financed by vaiśyas and kshatriyas and conducted by brahmanas on the numerous holiday occasions afforded by the calendar. In short, he gets whatever the present-day mass of people would love to get from a job - and he cannot be fired, as he is considered a member of the family that employs him. Even when he becomes unable to work due to sickness or old age, he is still taken care of in the same way. In Vedic society there are no homeless people - nobody starves, nobody goes without proper medical assistance, nobody is neglected, especially the sudras. This system was difficult to understand for the early indologists, that confused the position of a sudra with the apparently similar position of a slave, who had no rights whatsoever and could not leave the family or establishment where he was working. In Vedic society a sudra is free to leave at any time if he wants to find a different employer and he can certainly take his family with him to the new place, although he should not whimsically desert his employer and suddenly leave him in difficult times without help. A sudra certainly has more rights than duties: he can eat and drink whatever he likes and whenever he likes, while brahmanas must follow a very strict diet and lifestyle rules, kshatriyas must keep fit and trim, and vaiśyas must take care of all others first. A sudra can happily spend or waste whatever money or valuable property he gets, to enjoy whatever sense gratification he wants and to live carefree from day to day. He pays no taxes and does not need to "save money" for his future, because he knows he will be properly taken care of, no matter what happens.

योगस्थः कुरु कर्माणि सङ्गं त्यक्त्वा धनञ्जय । सिद्धयसिद्धयोः समो भूत्वा समत्वं योग उच्यते ॥ २-४८ ॥

yogasthaḥ kuru karmāṇi saṅgaṁ tyaktvā dhanañjaya । siddhyasiddhyoḥ samo bhūtvā samatvaṁ yoga ucyate ।। 2-48।।

yoga: in Yoga; sthaḥ: situated; kuru: do; karmāṇi: in the actions; saṅgaḥ: attachment; tyaktvā: giving up; dhanañjaya: o Dhananjaya ("conqueror of wealth"); siddhi: in perfection/ success; asiddhyoḥ: in imperfection/ failure; samaḥ: equally (balanced); bhūtvā: becoming; samatvaṁ: equanimity; yoga: Yoga; ucyate: is called.

"Firmly situated in Yoga, perform the (required) activities giving up the attachment/ connection to them. This equanimity in success and failure is called Yoga."

It is very difficult to achieve actual perfection in one's actions in this world. In fact, this should not even be our purpose. Contrarily to what most people believe, our purpose in life is not to become the perfect king or teacher or entrepreneur, husband/ wife or son/ daughter or parent, or achieve excellence in whatever we do. The purpose of life in this world is to attain Self realization, to understand Reality and to progress to the next level. Life is a school: the purpose of a school is not to get high marks, but to learn and become able to properly understand things, so that we can progress to the next stage - real life. Yoga is here described as the Buddhi, the knowledge, wisdom and intelligence that enable us to remain equally balanced in all circumstances, because we constantly remain aware of our duty. And what is this duty? It is the service to the Supreme, the action performed for pleasing God in all the various forms and manifestations, from the Virat puruṣa embodying the social structure (see Puruṣa sukta) to God's representatives as the king and the teacher, to the Antaryami Paramatma that resides in everybody's heart and guides us with the voice of our conscience, to the Isvara form of the Supreme Brahman that offers us guidance through the shastra and is the actual proprietor and beneficiary of the entire universe (5.29).

The word karmāṇi includes all activities and actions, but it particularly refers to the duties towards society and ritual performances, because these are the prescribed actions. The definition of karma applies to prescribed, useful and beneficial actions, while vikarma refers to prohibited, destructive and negative actions in general. The word siddhi has several meanings, including perfection, success, powers, benefits, results, even proper understanding. Each of these meanings gives a fresh perspective on the overall significance of the verse. Thus, we learn that the purpose of Yoga is not about achieving the mystic siddhis, and the purpose of embarking into an enterprise is not to acquire money or benefits, or even to successfully complete it. And, most intriguing of all, that we should try our best to perform our duties, even if we do not have a complete understanding of the procedure and purpose of it all. This is exactly what happens in a school: a student learning the multiplication table does not need to question its purpose, value or origin in order to be able to apply it properly, and the problems he faces in his studies are just intended as a practice. A student's solving (or not solving) a particular mathematical problem is not likely to affect society, and similarly the success or failure of a particular enterprise - a factory, a service organization, the building of a house, or even the building of an empire - will not have a permanent effect on Life. It will be important only if, through its success or failure, it will change the consciousness of people, thereby helping them in the true mission of existence.

Another interesting definition used in this verse is sanga, that includes the meanings of attachment, proprietorship, identification, as well as the basic meaning of "association". Sanga can be of two types - sat and asat. Sat sanga is the "eternal, true, good, virtuous" association that is characterized by the quality of sattva, or even better, visuddha sattva, or transcendental goodness. Sat sanga liberates us from the narrow-minded material attachment and identification, because it offers us a higher taste and attachment to our spiritual and eternal identification. Asat sanga is whatever temporary and material association takes us away from sat; usually it is divisive, selfish, and concerned about pursuing delusional temporary objectives.

It is also important to understand the meaning of samatva - equanimity or balance. This definition does not imply indifference or neglect in the performance of one's duties; it is about being equally ready to face any situation, good or bad, with the same good will, sincere work, ethical behavior, loyalty, and honesty. Even if success in a very difficult but necessary enterprise seems unlikely, we should do our duty anyway: some battles deserve to be fought even if there is no hope for victory, because the results of our sacrifice will build the foundations for our successors to complete the task.

Krishna here calls Arjuna by the name Dhananjaya, "conqueror of wealth": a title that had brought Arjuna glory and fame when he had conducted the Rajasuya campaign collecting tributes for his brother Yudhisthira. This is not intended as sarcasm: Krishna is Arjuna's dear friend and he is just teasing him a little bit, to help him understand that no matter how successful one may have been in his efforts, still the purpose of the action is higher than mere material acquirement. Also, on a more serious level, Krishna is confirming to Arjuna that the success of an enterprise is indeed a good thing, and should still be pursued - not for selfish reasons, but for the benefit of the entire society. There is nothing wrong in becoming successful.

दूरेण ह्यवरं कर्म बुद्धियोगाद्धनञ्जय ।

बुद्धौ शरणमन्विच्छ कृपणाः फलहेतवः ॥ २-४९ ॥

dūreṇa hyavarāṁ karma buddhiyogāddhanañjaya । buddhau śaraṇamanviccha kṛpaṇāḥ phalāhetavaḥ ॥ 2-49 ॥

durena: far distance; bi: therefore; avaram: inferior/ abominable; karma: actions; buddhi-yogat: from the engagement of intelligence; dhananjaya: o Dhananjaya (Arjuna); buddhan: in (this) intelligence; saranam: shelter; amviccha: reaching for; kripāṇaḥ: pitiable people; phala: the fruits; hetavaḥ: because of.

"Therefore, o Dhananjaya, keep far away from all bad activities by engaging in Buddhi Yoga. (Always) take shelter in this intelligence. Those who work because they are interested in the fruits of the action are pitiable."

The expression avaram karma includes all bad actions, the low and mean or abominable activities as well as those that do not have real value or importance. All such actions constitute a waste of valuable time and energy that should rather be utilized for the proper purpose of life. Further light on the parameters to evaluate actions is offered by the second part of the verse, that clarifies that all actions performed for the sake of one's profit (personal or collective) should be considered bad actions. Selfishness or miserliness may be restricted to one's immediate personal advantage or extended to the advantage of a particular group of beings with whom we personally identify – family, community, nation etc. But no matter how much we expand the concept of selfishness, as long as it is based on dualistic/ divisive considerations, it remains a symptom of miserliness. An inferior or abominable action is any action that is contrary to the principles of dharma, i.e. truthfulness or honesty, compassion, cleanliness and self-control, and similar ethical principles. Such an action is not truly beneficial to society, and although it may appear to bring some material advantage to its performer, it creates bad reactions that will ultimately outweigh any short term gain. Narrow-minded people will perform such bad action anyway, because they are only interested in their immediate and selfish benefit, even if it damages others and society in general, and certainly does not enable them to progress spiritually towards the realization of the true Self. A kripāṇa is a miserable and ignorant person who should be pitied. It does not matter if he has amassed fabulous wealth or possessions in this life: he will have to leave all such properties behind at the time of death, but he will have to pay for what he has illegally taken for himself, and for his bad actions and choices. It may seem that he pulled off the trick and evaded the punishment in this world, but he is not really going anywhere: death is the gate that everyone has to face, just like the cashier's counter at a supermarket, where shop lifters are stopped by the security guards. Another meaning of the word kripāṇa is "miser", one who does not know the actual value and purpose of what he has, and therefore misuses it or fails to use it in the proper way. Such a person can only be pitied, because in spite of possessing great wealth, he lives in very poor conditions, often suffering unnecessarily. Again, here Arjuna is called Dhananjaya to reaffirm the validity of work intended to procure wealth for the proper functioning of society, especially if such wealth is collected by acting within the parameters of dharma. In a deeper sense, kripāṇa refers to ignorant materialistic people, who see nothing but the objects of the senses - na veda karpanah sreya atmano guna vastu drik: a kripāna is one who does not know anything better than the material objects composed by the gunas (Bhagavata Purana 6.9.49), and therefore does not see any reason why he should control his senses (kripāno ya ajitendriyah, Bhagavata purana 11.19.44). Such people miss the real meaning of life and waste the valuable opportunity of the human birth: yo va etad aksharam gargy avidtvasmal lokat praiti sa kripānah, "O Gargi, a kripāna is one who leaves this world without knowing Transcendence (Bṛihad Aranyaka Upanishad 3.8.10).

The expression buddhau saranam anviccha, "strive to take shelter in this intelligence", suggest that sometimes this is a difficult or painful choice to make. Rarely the right thing to do is the easiest thing to do. Nonetheless, we need to stick to what is right and beneficial for everyone, and find consolation and shelter in the proper vision of things. It is said that dharma will protect those who protect it, and destroy those who are bent on destroying it. This is because dharma is the universal and eternal law of the universe, that goes beyond the immediate circumstances. Any action that goes against dharma creates a reaction, a ripple in the smooth functioning of the universe that will eventually come back with its negative results, even if it is not immediately visible in the apparent field of time and space.

बुद्धियुक्तो जहातीह उभे सुकृतदुष्कृते । तस्माद्योगाय युज्यस्व योगः कर्मसु कौशलम् ॥ २-५० ॥

buddhiyukto jahātiha ubhe sukṛtaduṣkṛte । tasmādyogāya yujyasva yogaḥ karmasu kauśalam ॥ 2-50 ॥

buddhi: intelligence; yuktaḥ: engaged through; jahati: becomes free; iha: here; ubhe: in both; sukṛta: good action; dushkṛite: bad action; tasmāt: therefore; yogaya: in the Yoga; yujyasva: become engaged; yogaḥ: Yoga; karmasu: in actions; kauśalam: the most beneficial way.

"Through Buddhi Yoga one can become free already in this life from both bad and good (actions/ reactions). Therefore you should engage in yoga, which is the best way to deal with actions."

The word kauśala includes a variety of meanings, such as "well-being, welfare, good fortune, prosperity, skillfulness, cleverness, experience, respectful salutation". When the verse explains that yoga is the kauśala in all activities, it implies all these intrinsic benefits and good qualities.

In this verse, Krishna introduces another and subtler point: sometimes in the performance of one's selfless duty it may be necessary to do things that superficially can appear to be bad. For example, a kṣatriya needs to use physical force to stop aggressors, something that can cause pain and even death. Also, the aggressor may not have been totally responsible for the attack - for example, a tiger is compelled by hunger to attack its prey, and a human being that is endangering the life or possessions of others may not be in good mental health or aware of the results of his actions, so we may say that killing these living entities is a bad action. However, the kṣatriya's primary duty is to stop the aggression, no matter what circumstances motivated it. When the immediate danger has been averted, the kṣatriya can investigate into the matter and redress any wrongdoing that may have originally caused the problem, but order and security must be addressed first. When this duty is performed without personal attachment or selfish motivation, there is no karmic involvement and one becomes free from the bondage to the action itself and its reactions.

This, however, does not mean that in the course of one's life one will not get joys or sorrows, happiness or distress, because these are inevitable. Simply, it means that one will remain detached from such joys and sorrows, and experience them merely as temporary distractions related to the body and mind, and not to the real self - the platform from which the dutiful decision is made. So at the time of death one is not bound to take another birth to follow such reactions and the consequent actions and reactions in the endless cycle of samsara. It is foolish to presume that at the time of death we will automatically attain liberation and be transferred to the "spiritual world" if we have not attained liberation and the spiritual world of transcendental consciousness and identification already in this lifetime. If we still maintain material attachments and identifications, these will inevitably pull us back to take another birth in this world, no matter what sādhana we have practiced, what rituals we have performed, what pilgrimages or pious actions we have executed, or what assurances we have obtained from religious institutions or leaders. Death is a crucial moment: it is the time when the door opens to a new stage of our journey of existence. If we are ready and determined to proceed, and we are qualified to access the destination we aspire to, all is good. But if have not qualified ourselves suitably during life in this body, we will simply not be able to enter the proper gate and will have to content ourselves with something that is more accessible from our particular position.

कर्मजं बुद्धियुक्ता हि फलं त्यक्त्वा मनीषिणः । जन्मबन्धविनिर्मुक्ताः पदं गच्छन्त्यनामयम् ॥ २-५१ ॥

karmajam buddhiyuktā hi phalam tyaktvā manīṣiṇaḥ । janmabandhavinirmukṭaḥ padaṁ gacchantyanāmayam ॥ 2-51 ॥ karma: from the action; jam: born; buddhi-yuktaḥ: engaged through intelligence; hi: therefore; phalam: fruits; tyaktva: giving up; manīṣiṇaḥ: thoughtful/ wise personalities; janma: birth; bandha: bondage; vinirmuktaḥ: completely liberated; padam: position; gacchanti: go; anāmayam: without misery.

"The wise people give up the fruit born from their actions by engaging in this Buddhi Yoga and thus become free from the bondage of rebirth, attaining a position that is free from all sufferings."

In this verse the word tyaktva is particularly significant. As we have mentioned, joys and sorrows, or the results of actions, continue to present themselves in our daily life as long as we have a material body, and in turn become the cause of our future developing a next material body if we have some identification and attachment with them. The body itself is the incarnation of the karma-phala, the fruits of actions, both desirable and undesirable. It is not possible to avoid such results by abstaining from action, because the avoidance of a particular action is also a karmic choice that will give its good or bad results in due time.

A Self-realized person, who is engaged in Buddhi Yoga, does not expect to live a perfect life full of joys and success, free from any cloud of sorrow or disappointment, because this is not possible as long as we have a material body and we live in the material world. Rather, such a liberated person remains neutral - neither attracted nor repulsed - in front of such events, and faces them like one tolerates the various weather conditions, such as storms and sunny days, the heat of summer and the cold of winter (2.14). We naturally understand that the seasons change and there is nothing we can do about it, even if we wanted.

Of course we can create small environments such as buildings and gardens where to take shelter from the excessive temperatures and meteorological precipitations, and adjust our clothing to make it more suitable to the season, but we cannot stop the rain from falling, or the wind from blowing, or the sun from heating up the atmosphere. We know that all such manifestations are temporary. Similarly, a wise person knows that all joys and sorrows are temporary in nature, and if we let them go without remaining attached to them, their effects will fade away. Deluded people always try to run after joys and escape from sorrows by artificial means, sometimes even by adharmic means, but this attempt is futile and often brings exactly the opposite of what one wants to obtain. The fact is that, from the highest to the lowest planet (Gita 8.16), this universe is subject to the temporary nature of all acquisitions and joys because of the endless cycle of births and deaths. There is no position in this world, even on the higher planets, that is really and completely safe and free from danger and sufferings, as even Brahma eventually dies when the cosmic manifestation is dissolved. This very temporary nature of material bodies creates the condition for illusion and misery; we can attain the platform of anamayam, "without illusion or misery" only when we are free from such conditions. This eternal position of unclouded bliss is called paramam padam, the supreme position, and is identified as the abode of Vishnu, the transcendental Lord. Another meaning of the verse indicates that Buddhi Yoga gives freedom from the results of the action, and at the same time it is an achievement that results from the proper actions, performed out of duty and without attachment. From the liberated level afforded by Buddhi Yoga, one can realize the supreme Position (Gita 18.54).

यदा ते मोहकलिलं बुद्धिर्व्यतितरिष्यति । तदा गन्तासि निर्वेदं श्रोतव्यस्य श्रुतस्य च ॥ २-५२ ॥

yadā te mohakalilam buddhirvyatitarishyati | tadā gantāsi nirvedam śrotavyasya śrutasya ca || 2-52 ||

yada: when; te: your; moha: illusion; kalilam: muddy waters; buddhih: intelligence / wisdom; vyatitarishyati: surpasses / overcomes; tada: then; ganta asi: you will acquire; nirvedam: lack of care; śrotavyasya: what remains to be heard; śrutasya: what has been heard; ca: and.

"When (this) intelligence/ wisdom will lead you out of the dense swamp of illusion, you will come to a point where you will be indifferent to whatever has been heard or will remain to be heard."

The definition nirvedam could be translated as "not-knowledge", and here it refers to the dispassion and detachment towards theoretical discussions, opposed to Buddhi as the direct and clear perception of reality (prakasa or darshana) that surpasses whatever theoretical information we may acquire from other sources. The teachings of Krishna in Gita on the science of Yoga are not a dogmatic ideology, and they do not constitute a body of beliefs or observances to be followed in order to be accepted as faithful members of a community or a tradition. Rather they encourage us to become Self-realized individuals, capable of seeing things as they are, without being confused by temporary and relative conditions. It is the same difference that we can observe between slavery and freedom, between blindness and clear vision, between mindlessness and wisdom - and it rises from the deeply constructive and positive approach towards the inherent nature of the individual, as a spiritual being made of eternity, awareness and bliss, rather than a miserable sinner in need of being rescued as we find in the approaches influenced by abrahamic ideologies.

Here we are not asked to simply have faith and believe on the word of some authority: rather we are encouraged to develop a maturity of discrimination and a direct experience that is more valuable than any amount of theory. Scriptures, the instructions of the Guru, and the consensus among the learned traditionally constitute the system of cross-references recommended in order to better understand the deep and complex corpus of Vedic knowledge. However, these remain as simply indications of the path that each one of us has to walk in the journey of Self realization. They should not be considered as absolute, because in this world there is always the danger that they may have been contaminated by the muddy waters of illusion - either by our own illusion and by the limitations of our own senses and intelligence, or by the illusion and limitations of other people who transmit such information. This does not apply merely to the ritualistic ceremonies, but to all fields of knowledge and understanding.

Westernized academy enforces a vision based on a linear evolution and progress of thought in the history of humanity, thereby assigning different time frames for the original composition of the various scriptures, but this is a faulty and incomplete perspective, supported by a dishonest and biased presentation of archeology, anthropology and paleontology. During the 20th century, on this planet we simultaneously had nuclear and space scientists as well as tribals that lived on a level of technology that is usually described as characteristic of the Paleolithic age, as well as a number of groups in intermediate positions on the apparent ladder of human progress - for example, subsistence farmers that used the same methods and tools for many hundreds or thousands of years. All levels of human evolution and progress can exist simultaneously, and therefore we need all types and levels of instructions from sacred scriptures to suit the needs of each and every individual. The historical dating of a particular copy of a text is not a proof of the progressive development of a particular philosophical perspective, because there might very well have been earlier compilations that have been destroyed, by accident or by deliberate plan. Absence of evidence is not evidence of absence. This is confirmed by the Vedic tradition, clearly stating that the present version of the Vedas was simply compiled at the beginning of this particular Kali yuga, but existed previously and was mostly transmitted aurally from teacher to disciple. Curiously, quite contrarily to the opinion of mainstream academics, this passage from aural transmission to the written compilation of scriptures is considered as a symptom of degradation and not of progress, since in previous times human beings had better memory and did not need to write a lot of stuff down.

श्रुतिविप्रतिपन्ना ते यदा स्थास्यति निश्चला । समाधावचला बुद्धिस्तदा योगमवाप्स्यसि ॥ २-५३ ॥

śrutivipratipannā te yadā sthāsyati niścalā । samādhāvachalā buddhistadā yogamavāpsyasi ॥ 2-53 ॥

śruti: of heard knowledge (in the Vedic scriptures); vipratipanna: confused by apparent contradictions; te: your; yadā: when; sthāsyati: remains situated; niścala: without moving; samādhau: in samādhi (constant meditation); achala: unflinching; buddhi: intelligence/ wisdom; tadā: then; yogam: Yoga; avāpsyasi: you will attain.

"When you are stable in your consciousness without being confused by what has been heard, then you will achieve the yoga where the intelligence does not waver from samādhi."

The expression śruti-vipratipanna ("confused/ agitated by what has been heard") also applies to a literal reference to the scriptures (traditionally called śruti because they are spoken to the student by the teacher), where people lacking in direct self-realization can see apparent contradictions, because different scriptures observe Reality from different perspectives and are meant for people at different degrees of evolution. For example, it is said that the Supreme has no qualities, and at the same time it is also said that the Supreme has unlimited qualities. Also, it is said that Spirit has no personality, and at the same time it is also said that the Supreme has many personalities - or that it is very small and very big, or very near and very far. By rising above the limited understanding of material experience, we can understand that there is no real contradiction between these concepts - just like after reaching the peak of a mountain we are able to see that actually all the different paths that lead there are going in the same right direction, although at the foot of the mountain they seemed totally opposite to each other. One who has crossed over the difficult region of illusion and duality is not confused by these apparent contradictions but is able to see the Big Picture where everything is perfectly reconciled – including the knowledge that we do not have yet, but will be revealed in the future. In this sense, a truly realized soul always remains open and able to integrate everything further from different perspectives, constantly remaining in a balanced consciousness.

The definitions of samādhi and sthita-prajna are found many times in Gita as the indication of the purpose to be attained through Yoga. Both words carry the meaning of "constant intelligence/ understanding", a sober level of consciousness where one is not confused by the constantly turbulent stream of contrasting impressions created by the environment, by others and by one's own mind. It is important to understand that the definitions niścala and achala ("not moving") do not refer to the stubbornness of those who choose to remain in ignorance, attached to their own prejudice or to the second-hand prejudices they received from others. It is rather the firmness and determination, the steadfastness that holds the helm of our boat to keep it on the proper course while we travel through life. It is a sort of dynamic immobility, like finding a permanent center of balance that will sustain us even when we are walking or running, enabling us to make sense of everything at all times.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

स्थितप्रज्ञस्य का भाषा समाधिस्थस्य केशव । स्थितधीः किं प्रभाषेत किमासीत् ब्रजेत किम् ॥ २-५४ ॥

sthitaprajñasya kā bhāṣā samādhisthasya keśava । sthitadhīḥ kiṁ prabhāṣeta kimāsīt vrajeta kim ॥ 2-54 ॥

arjuna: Arjuna; uvāca: said; sthita: established; prajñasya: of one who really knows; ka: what; bhāṣa: language/ description; samādhisthasya: of one who is fixed in samādhi; keśava: o Keshava (killer of the Keshi demon); sthita-dhī: firm intelligence/ meditation; kim: how; prabhāṣeta: speaks; kim: how; asīta: remains sitting/ still; vrajeta: goes about; kim: how.

Arjuna said: "O Keshava, a person who is firmly established in the consciousness of meditation is said to be in samādhi. How does he speak, and what does he say? How does he move, and how does he stay?"

In the previous verses, Krishna has emphasized the importance of direct, personal realization of the Self over the second-hand information one can derive from hearing. Such firm vision has been described as the purpose of Yoga, the intelligence that enables us to act adequately in this world without remaining entangled in the results of action.

This concept is further highlighted here, by explicitly assimilating the expressions sthita-prajna, samādhi and sthita-dhī. Arjuna calls Krishna by the name of Keshava, indicating that he can kill the demon of doubt, that like the asuric horse Keshi carries the mind impetuously here and there, following various ideas and interpretations. Doubt is a function of intelligence, because when we are faced with some new information or concept it is a good idea to explore it deeply, raising doubts and questions on its meaning and expanse so that we can make sure we have actually understood it correctly. Asking questions is a very important part of the process of learning (Gita 4.34): when a teacher does not accept questions, it is definitely not a good sign. The student asks questions from his/ her particular perspective, and this offers the double benefit to allow the teacher to evaluate the actual position or level of progress of the student, and to dynamically contemplate the complete picture of Reality by temporarily moving to that particular perspective and describing its view. When a teacher refuses to work in this way, it is either because of lack of personal realization (he simply can't see the multidimensional picture and therefore is unable to describe the object from a different perspective) or because of a lack of sincerity in caring for the student's needs. In either case, such teacher is not qualified to take the student to the desired goal, and he is just a pretender and a cheater.

Since so much depends on actual personal realization, on the effective guidance of a genuine teacher, we must equip ourselves with the instruments that are necessary to recognize such a genuine teacher and thus avoid the double trap of following a cheater and committing offenses towards a great soul. What are these instruments? Since a student is, by definition, not sufficiently qualified to verify the theoretical validity of the teachings he receives by mere exposition, s/he needs to learn how to ask questions first. The answers you receive are only as good as the questions you make. Besides the extensive questioning about the knowledge itself, a student needs to conduct a critical observation and analysis of what the teacher talks about and how s/he behaves in daily life, what moves him/her and what are his/her interests. By definition, a person who has a direct and integrated multi-dimensional perception/vision of Reality sees beyond dualities and is able to connect all aspects of his/ her life to the service of Reality. Separating theoretical knowledge from its practical application leads to the disaster well illustrated by the saying, "those who can, do, and those who can't, teach". Who wants to be guided in the performance of surgical operations by a person who is not a skilled surgeon himself? Only a fool. A teacher is not supposed to have much of a private life, and although it is disrespectful to intrude into all details of a teacher's personal intimate life, by living in the family of the Guru (gurukula) a student gets plenty of legitimate opportunities to observe the symptoms described in the verse - what the teacher likes to talk about, and how s/he is able to connect everything to the "unified field of consciousness" and explain how to reconcile apparent contradictions. Also, it is very instructive to observe how the teacher chooses to invest his/her own personal energy, by pursuing or not pursuing activities or interests - in other words, going or not going to places, i.e. sitting or moving.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

प्रजहाति यदा कामान्सर्वान्पार्थ मनोगतान् । आत्मन्येवात्मना तुष्टः स्थितप्रज्ञस्तदोच्यते ॥ २-५५ ॥

prajāhāti yadā kāmānsarvānpārtha manogatān । ātmanyevātmanā tuṣṭaḥ sthita-prajñastadocyate ॥ 2-55 ॥

sri: the glorious; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; prajāhāti: gives up; yada: when; kaman: the desires; sarvan: all; pārtha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); mano: of the mind; gatan: entered; atmani: in the atman; eva: certainly; atmana: with the self; tuṣṭaḥ: satisfied; sthita-prajñah: of firm understanding; tada: then; ucyate: is said.

The Lord said: "O Partha, when someone gives up all the desires that flow into the mind, and remains satisfied in the atman, he is said to be firmly situated in the (correct) understanding."

The word atman is the basis for the concept of "self-realization". Atman means "self" in the sense of spiritual self, but sometimes according to the context it also applies to the mind or the senses, so the meaning can be expanded accordingly.

Kama, or desire, is an external impression that enters our mind. It is not something that comes from our own self... not from the soul, not from the mind, and not even from our body. It is a suggestion that attracts us outside, to run after so many things and ideas. There is a basic difference between need and desire. A need is a factual requirement, while a desire is a fantasy for pleasure and happiness. For example: when we are hungry we need some food, but we may desire to eat a particular dish rather than another, although our nutritional requirements could be equally met by a simple preparation or by an elaborate one.

We cannot give up our genuine needs, but we can learn to recognize whether an impulse contemplated by the mind is worthy of being fulfilled, and in which way. When we repress a genuine need, it will pop up again, stronger and stronger, while when we let a desire slide away, it will be substituted by others in the constant flow of distractions that enter the mind. Also, we should not seek our real happiness in what others expect from us, or what others say or do about us. Projecting or blaming our shortcomings, failures, or difficulties on others or on the environment is not going to help us at all, either.

Fulfilling a need is a very basic action, by which we can obtain some natural pleasure; however, we can never find true happiness by continuing to indulge in the same action even after our real need was met. For example, if we are hungry we may eat a nice bowl of rice and vegetables, but if our mind is not satisfied we may be tempted by the desire to eat more even if we have had enough food. Sometimes we eat not because we are really hungry, but because we feel consciously or subconsciously that the pleasure we derive from the taste of the foods will make us happy. This is a fine line, because our mind has needs, too, and they are as real as the needs of our body. So the best course of action consists in soberly recognizing the actual and reasonable needs of our body and mind, and allowing the extravagant whimsical desires to flow out unattended just like they had flown in unsolicited. The key to solve the problem lies in understanding what is the nature of the happiness that we still crave even when the genuine and reasonable needs of our body and mind have been fulfilled. Such intimate happiness belongs to a different level and can be attained only in Self realization - by focusing on the atman/ brahman, the source of everything, because it is the only Reality that never changes. Only spiritual Reality remains unchanged, constantly filled with happiness, awareness and eternity/truth, while everything in the material manifestation comes and goes in cycles and therefore distracts our mind with the absence of what we like and the presence of what we do not like.

दुःखेष्वनुद्विग्नमनाः सुखेषु विगतस्पृहः ।

वीतरागभयक्रोधः स्थितधीर्मुनिरुच्यते ॥ २-५६ ॥

duḥkheṣvanudvigna-manāḥ sukheṣu vigata-sprhaḥ । vītarāga-bhaya-krodhaḥ sthita-dhīr-munirucyate ॥ 2-56 ॥

dubkheshu: in the sufferings; anudvigna: not destroyed/ disturbed; manah: the mind; sukheshu: in joys; vigata: not attracted; sprihab: touched; vita: without; raga: attachment; bhaya: fear; krodhab: anger; sthita: steadfast; dhīḥ: understanding; munib: a muni (wise/ thoughtful person); ucyate: is said.

"A person whose mind is not distracted by sufferings or joys and remains detached, free from attraction, fear and anger, is called a Muni who is able to maintain a steadfast meditation."

The word muni means "thoughtful person", someone who does not talk unnecessarily because he is focused in contemplation of Reality. From the same root, we have the word mauna, meaning "silence" and referring to a very popular practice in a beginner's sadhana, when the student learns to remain quiet and let the useless chatter of the mind fade away. Superficial people usually have a lot of trouble observing the vow of silence, and tend to cheat by engaging in almost mute conversations by signs, writing, and other means of communication, like dumb or deaf people usually do. When there is nobody else around to engage, they may watch TV or listen to the radio, but this is not a real mauna vrata. The genuine practice of mauna is aimed at attaining inner quiet, where the mind becomes like the clear water of an undisturbed pond. Then we become able to see what is at the bottom of the pond. When the external chattering stops, we can become aware of the internal chattering of the mind. When we succeed in stopping the internal chattering of the mind, only the blissful awareness of the soul remains, and the voice of the conscience - the Paramatma, the Supreme and Original Guru - can be heard without interference. This divine voice has the characteristic of stillness or eternity. It flows from a place of stability and comfort, where we can take shelter without fear of ever losing that protection. This is what can give us real stability in a world that is constantly changing, and make us able to go through sorrows and joys without being distracted by them, and without deviating from our purpose and duty. Again, this verse confirms that sorrow and joys will always come and go, but when our mind is firmly standing on a center of balance that is not shifting, we become able to see each sorrow and joy at its face value, without being touched deeply by them.

When we are able to let go of each temporary joy or sorrow, we do not develop attachment for objects or conditions, and therefore we are not afraid to lose what we want or to get what we do not want. Fear generates anger, which can manifest in one way or another, depending on the character of the individual and the environment conditions. The worst type of anger is repressed anger, that festers in the mind and in the heart and creates a lot of negative feelings and thoughts, poisoning our existence and obstructing our progress because we may even convince ourselves that we are not "angry" persons. It is very important to properly understand the meaning of krodha, "anger", because just like himsa, "violence", it can be interpreted in a misleading way to confuse the superficial people.

A qualified kshatriya warrior fights and kills the aggressors without being touched by krodha and himsa, because his actions are not dictated by personal motivations. He is not venting his personal problems and frustrations, and he is not seeking any personal advantage in the fight - revenge, elimination of rivals, acquisition of a better status. He is just stopping the aggression and protecting the prajas. Thus a dharmic fight always remains on the level of sattva or visuddha sattva even if it becomes "violent" or "angry". Shouting, throwing weapons, or even cutting bodies to pieces are not necessarily a proof of anger or violence, and they should certainly be employed when the circumstances require it for the protection of the good and the innocent.

Sometimes, a nice smile and gentle words are sufficient; sometimes they are not, and could even be interpreted as weakness and uncertainty. There is nothing commendable in hypocritically hiding one's anger and envy, in putting up a false face and pretending to be very advanced persons, while in truth we are nurturing hatred and making clever plans to cause trouble and sufferings to others. In Kali yuga hypocrisy becomes a social virtue, and many believe that one should keep a meek and gentle attitude externally, to better achieve success in the most devious and cruel plans. For such people, a criminal is only one who gets caught and punished - even if he has not done anything wrong. This view is contrary to the basic dharmic principle of truthfulness: in fact, it is better to straightforwardly express our opinion and protest and take action when something is wrong, because through communication and proactive interaction we can solve problems.

यः सर्वत्रानभिस्नेहस्तत्तत्प्राप्य शुभाशुभम् । नाभिनन्दति न द्वेष्टि तस्य प्रज्ञा प्रतिष्ठिता ॥ २-५७ ॥

yaḥ sarvatrānabhisnehas tattatprāpya śubhāśubham । nābhinandati na dveṣṭi tasya prajñā pratiṣṭhitā ॥ 2-57 ॥

yah: one who; sarvatra: everywhere; anabhi snehab: without affection/ attachment; tat tat: that that/ whatever; prāpya: attaining; subha: auspicious /good; asubham: inauspicious/ bad; na: not; abhinandati: praises/ welcomes; na: not; dveshti: recriminates/ rejects; tasya: of this; prajna: full knowledge; pratiṣṭhita: established.

"A person who is detached from all situations/ places, who does not become elated in favorable circumstances or spiteful in unfavorable circumstances, is firmly situated in wisdom."

Again, Krishna confirms that a person who is sthita prajna, or prajna sthita, is free from attachment to temporary things, such as a particular place or a particular type of circumstances - to anything anywhere. This is because he has no material identification to begin with. A sthita prajna has no problem moving to different places, because he has no attachment to his birthplace or to the place of his ancestors - all considerations based only on the material body. He does not become elated or dejected when during his journey in life he reaches or crosses over (prāpya) good or bad circumstances. Of course, he takes advantage of the good circumstances to perform his work, and he tolerates bad circumstances that slow him down or obstruct his work. Some people believe that a detached and renounced person abstains from all actions, but this has already been clarified in verse 2.47, that states that one should not become attached to inaction, either. The two extremes of raga and dvesha are both defined as attachments: one is about liking and the other about disliking, but they are not different from each other. When you hear someone who keeps harping against something that is neutral in nature, it means that he has a negative attachment against it.

Again, there is a fine line between the proper discrimination born from intelligence, that helps us to choose sat rather than asat, and the unjustified discrimination born from prejudice and attachment. To better understand where the line is, we need the expert guidance of a Self-realized and dharmic person.

यदा संहरते चायं कूर्मोऽङ्गानीव सर्वशः । इन्द्रियाणीन्द्रियार्थेभ्यस्तस्य प्रज्ञा प्रतिष्ठिता ॥ २-५८ ॥

yadā saṁharate cāyaṁ kūrmo'ṅgānīva sarvaśaḥ । indriyāṇīndriyārthebhyastasya prajñā pratiṣṭhitā ॥ 2-58 ॥

yada: when; saṁharate: withdraws; ca: and; ayam: this; kurmah: tortoise/ turtle; angani: the limbs; iva: like; sarvasah: all; indriyani: the senses; indriya: of the senses; arthebhyah: from the pursuit; tasya: of him; prajna: perfect knowledge; pratiṣṭhita: established.

"A person who completely withdraws the senses from the sense objects, like a tortoise/ turtle withdraws all its limbs (inside the shell), is firmly situated in wisdom."

Krishna obviously considers this point as so important that he keeps explaining from all possible perspectives. He is not simply wasting his time and ours, so we should give each of these verses our full attention and respect. The key word in this verse is artha, here used in a slightly different meaning. We have seen that artha means "value, asset, purpose, aim, pursuit", generally with a positive sense. Besides, Krishna has already explained that one should engage in the proper prescribed action in the best possible way, but without attachment to the fruits of action, and we know that action requires the utilization of the senses, as well as of the mind. A tortoise stretches his limbs out of the shell when it is required for the proper activities, and withdraws them again when he perceives a danger, or when it is time to preserve energies. It would be foolish or even impossible for the tortoise to keep his limbs inside the shell at all times, because each living entity has to act or work (Gita 3.4, 5, 6) to keep the body alive and functioning. Therefore the senses should be used dutifully in the performance of one's duty. What we need to withdraw from, is the faulty belief that the objects of the senses are the actual artha, or the purpose of life. We have already mentioned that a dharmic training makes the individual able to acquire artha, and then to satisfy kama, on the road to moksha. In fact, the artha we acquire is not a purpose in itself, but only a means to an end, an instrument that must be used and then discarded.

विषया विनिवर्तन्ते निराहारस्य देहिनः । रसवर्जं रसोऽप्यस्य परं दृष्ट्वा निवर्तते ॥ २-५९ ॥

viśaya vinivartante nirahārasya dehinaḥ । rasavarjaṁ raso'pyasya paraṁ dṛṣṭvā nivartate ॥ 2-59 ॥

viśaya: objects of senses; vinivartante: go away from; niraharasya: of one who does not consume; dehinah: one who is embodied; rasa: taste; varjam: giving up; rasah: taste; api: although; asya: of him; param: much better; dṛṣṭva: by seeing; nivartate: gives up.

"The embodied soul may keep the sense objects at a distance and reject them, but he can give up the taste (for such objects) when he sees/ finds the Supreme/ something that has a higher/ better taste."

The word viśaya refers to the objects of the senses; not to the objects in themselves, but to the sensual projection that we perceive of them in our mind. For example, we can abstain from the object of taste even while we are eating food, if we are just consuming the food without noticing how it tastes. Usually this happens when our mind is occupied with something that we consider more important or more attractive - for example, a thrilling film we are watching, or the prospect of an important meeting, or something similar. The word nirahara means "not accepting, not eating, not tasting" and here it specifically applies to abstention or abstinence from a particular object of sense gratification. This can be practiced successfully to a certain measure, because the body and the mind can adapt to almost every condition. One can survive on very little sense gratification, even for long periods of time, either voluntary or forcibly, by choice or by the strength of circumstances. However, mere external abstinence does not mean that the desire for the sense object has died away. In fact, in some cases, abstinence can aggravate the desire to the point of damaging the mental balance, like the steam trapped in a pressure cooker builds up and can explode dangerously. As long as we have a body (dehinah), we have senses, and our senses must be engaged somehow for the survival and functioning of the body. So, is sense gratification good or bad? Can it be avoided, can we really withdraw from it, like a tortoise withdraws his limbs? Only when it is dangerous, when it is detrimental, or in other words, when it is pursued for its own sake, when we are trying to get from it the deep and permanent happiness we all aspire to.

The need for rasa, or "taste" is an intrinsic quality of the soul and cannot be eliminated or removed. When artificially suppressed, it will find its way and surface again usually in distorted and more dangerous forms, such as the obsession for power, fame, or even masochistic, sadistic or otherwise psychotic practices. The verse warns us about artificial renunciation, that may create serious psychological problems especially in Kali yuga, when the influences of passion and ignorance are stronger than in other periods. What is the solution? Finding a higher taste, a param rasa, that can engage our minds and senses in a pursuit that is worthy of being entertained. This higher taste is spiritual realization and the union in selfless service to the Supreme.

यततो ह्यपि कौन्तेय पुरुषस्य विपश्चितः । इन्द्रियाणि प्रमाथीनि हरन्ति प्रसभं मनः ॥ २-६० ॥

yatato hyapi kaunteya puruṣasya vipaścitaḥ । indriyāṇi pramāthīni haranti prasabhaṁ manaḥ ॥ 2-60 ॥

yatato: trying; hi: certainly; api: although; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); puruṣasya: of the puruṣa; vipascitah: with discriminating knowledge; indriyani: the senses; pramathini: agitating; haranti: take away; prasabham: forcibly; manah: the mind.

"O son of Kunti, the senses are so troublesome that they can forcibly carry away the mind even of a man who is wise and strives to control them."

The word purusha is usually considered as meaning "man" as in "male", but in the transcendental science it refers to the "enjoyer", to the active and affirmative principle in the soul that seeks pleasure and happiness. Thus, it naturally includes both men and women, because the conditioned souls that have taken a female body also seek and pursue pleasure and happiness. Some even say that women are "many times lustier" than men. The purusha principle is a characteristic of the spirit, and finds its purest manifestation in the Parama Purusha, Isvara or Param Atman - the Supreme Lord. The English definition, too, expresses this principle, the tendency to "lord it over", or to enjoy, possess and dominate. It is not a bad tendency in itself, provided the purusha is capable and willing to perform the duties of such position, and not just try to claim the rights. The Supreme Lord is perfectly able to give shelter to anyone and everyone, to fulfill all desires and needs of all living entities, and living in their hearts he is also always perfectly aware of their feelings and thought processes. In this way he reciprocates with every living entity, at the same time allowing them full freedom to choose whatever action they want, and without ever exploiting or mistreating them. On the other hand, the individual soul (jivatma) is much less powerful and therefore he needs to subordinate his enjoyment to the enjoyment of the Supreme, just like a cell in our body can only subordinate its individual enjoyment to the enjoyment of the entire body. When all the cells or the limbs of a body cooperate properly to nourish the body and to keep it in good health, they can automatically obtain the enjoyment and well being they naturally aspire to.

The key to understanding the nature of the jivatma is the fact that it is constituted by both the purusha principle and the prakriti principle: each individual living being is both male and female at the same time. The perfect balance of these two principles, that enjoy and support each other within the individual soul, mind and body, is the secret of the batba yoga and of all the similar sciences that existed in the world, such as alchemy, or the Mysteries of ancient Egypt and Greece, the Divine Marriage, and other secret doctrines and practices that were revealed only to a small group of initiates. This elitarian approach is required because it can only be understood by persons who have attained a subtler level of consciousness, overcoming the immediate identification with the gross material body. When the awareness of the individual has been refined to the point that s/he can perceive and act at the level of energies (prana maya kosha), it becomes possible to unite the purusha and the prakriti principles within the Self, and attain the perfect balance and happiness. Men and women seek each other to "find their better half", in an exchange of energy that makes them feel complete. This is because the purusha principle in each one of them is reaching out to enjoy the prakriti through his senses. Such attraction is not found only between two bodies of different gender, but also between the purusha principle in a living entity and the prakriti in inanimate sense objects, such as the prakriti energy of foods, etc. It is the most primeval force in the universe, found in all the living beings including animals and plants, but in human beings it attains a platform where it can be sublimated and trigger higher realizations. Krishna confirms here that such a powerful primeval force should not be underestimated or neglected, because it can sweep us away even if we realize that we are headed towards disaster.

तानि सर्वाणि संयम्य युक्त आसीत मत्परः । वशे हि यस्येन्द्रियाणि तस्य प्रज्ञा प्रतिष्ठिता ॥ २-६१ ॥

tāni sarvaṇi saṁyamya yukta āsita mat-parah | vaśe hi yasyendriyaṇi tasya prajñā pratiṣṭhita || 2-61 ||

tani: those; sarvani: all; samyamya: controlling; yukta: engaged; asita: should remain fixed; mat-parah: focused on me; vase: in full control; hi: certainly; yasya: of him; indriyani: the senses; tasya: of him; prajna: perfect knowledge; pratiṣṭhita: firmly situated.

"A person who keeps all these (senses) properly controlled/ regulated and engaged in a constant consciousness of me, has certainly mastered them and is firmly situated in wisdom."

Although it is extremely difficult to control the senses, it is still possible to achieve this extraordinary success by focusing on the Supreme, through the multi-dimensional approach of Yoga. Krishna has already explained the principle of Yoga as the equanimity in front of joys and sorrows, and the action that is performed dutifully and selflessly without attachment to the personal enjoyment of the results. In this verse Krishna starts to introduce the basic techniques of Yoga, the practices that will enable us to attain the proper results in our daily life. All the genuine branches of Yoga - batba, kriya, bhakti, jnana, karma etc - are constituted by eight basic steps that support our progress. These are: yama (abstentions), niyama (prescriptions), asana (control of the body), pranayama (control of the breathing and body energy), pratyahara (disconnecting the senses from the external sense objects), dharana (focusing the attention), dhyana (meditation) and samadhi (constant awareness). The word samyamya in this verse stresses the observance of the basic regulatory process known in yoga as yama and niyama. The system of rules and regulations prescribed in the practice of yoga is meant to facilitate the sadbaka in training his mind and senses in the proper direction and creating positive impressions and habits in the subtle body. Yama includes ahimsa (absence of hostility), satya (truthfulness), asteya (honesty), brahmacharya (sexual abstinence) and aparigraha (simplicity). Niyama includes saucha (cleanliness), santosha (inner satisfaction), tapas (austerity), svadhyaya (study of the scriptures) and isvara pranidhana (devotion/ surrender to God). All these principles need to be applied on the levels of body (saririka), speech (vachika) and mind (bandhika).

At the level of the body - the easiest and first step for beginners - this naturally involves some control on one's diet, as eating is the most elementary way we relate to the environment and to other living entities. So ahimsa, saucha and tapas suggest a pure vegetarian diet consisting of clean, fresh and healthy ingredients, such as grains, fruits, and vegetables: foods belonging to the influence of sattva. Besides, it is wise to abstain from the so-called recreational substances that have a negative influence on the consciousness. Brahmacharya also suggests avoiding the contemplation of sexual materials, as well as the unnecessary association with potential sexual partners, the excessive care for one's body, down to the basic tendency to see people as the material bodies they wear. In fact, brahma acharya means "behaving as Brahman", on the platform where we identify ourselves and other people as spirit souls, without giving undue importance to bodily features such as gender etc. It is also interesting to note that all the forms of Yoga require the study of the scriptures and devotion/ surrender to God, highlighted here specifically by the expression mat-parah. Many people and groups have been trying to separate Yoga from its spiritual identity, to turn it into some type of physical exercise, gymnastics or competitive sport. All such groups and individuals carefully keep silent about yama and niyama and just focus their practice on asana or at most on pranayama, because they know that by presenting the entire picture truthfully, they would lose a lot of customers who are simply interested in some trendy fitness practice, to get slim and trim to better engage in sense gratification, or to cope with stress in their frantic lives. Of course the practice of yoga is an integrated approach and does not neglect the health of the body and mind, teaching excellent exercises that are effective on such levels even when used separately from the pursuance of the actual purpose of Yoga. But this is comparable to ripping apart a rare painting of immense value in order to take the nice frame and use it as a toilet seat.

ध्यायतो विषयान्पुंसः सङ्गस्तेषूपजायते । सङ्गात्सञ्जायते कामः कामात्क्रोधोऽभिजायते ॥ २-६२ ॥

dhyāyato viṣayānpuṁsaḥ saṅgasteṣūpajāyate | saṅgātsañjāyate kāmaḥ kāmātkrodho'bhijāyate || 2-62 ||

dhyayata: contemplated/ meditated on; viṣayan: the sense objects; puṁsaḥ: a purusha; sangah: association/ attachment; teshu: in them; upajayate: appears; sangat: from the attachment; sanjayate: grows; kamah: lust; kamat: from lust; krodhab: anger; abhijayate: is born.

"By thinking about the objects of the senses, a person associates with them, by association desire develops, and from (unfulfilled) desire anger arises."

This verse and the next, usually quoted together, describe the consequences of the bad choice of contemplating the sense objects instead of letting them flow away withdrawing our senses from them. The power of pleasure is so strong that our senses can even engage in enjoying the simple mental perception of the sense object, without coming in physical contact with it. Dhyana means "meditation", and dhyayate means "meditates". Meditation is the ability to concentrate on a subject, consider it, channel energy into it, and bring it from the subtle platform (non-manifested) to the visible and perceivable platform (manifested). It is actually a natural practice and tendency of the mind: everyone is capable of doing it. Without this faculty, it would not be possible to perform even the most fundamental tasks of life: working, studying, solving practical problems, making choices. Physically, the mental activity in our brain is performed by low voltage electrical currents which are carried through the nerve cells. The brain is a quite large mass of nervous cells, where electrical impulses circulate by specific paths which are created by habit. So by thinking about a particular thing for a sufficient time, we create preferential paths that are then followed automatically even without a conscious effort. This mechanism of meditation is an instrument that can be used to elevate our consciousness or to degrade it - depending on the object we are contemplating.

As we have mentioned, contemplation/ meditation is an effective method to associate with the object of our meditation on the subtle level. In fact, when the meditation is strong enough, the actual object of our meditation will feel the energy of our attraction and a physical connection will be established, first on the subtle level and then gradually on the gross level, too. This mechanism is utilized in the various methods of "positive affirmation", by which it is possible to attract good things, good people and good opportunities into our life by regularly meditating on them through visualization. This association or contact (sanga) through contemplation or meditation produces a type of familiarity, and through identification, this produces attachment. It is important here to remember that purusha does not refer merely to a human being with a male body, but is used to indicate the living entity in general, in its capacity of "enjoyer". Due to the natural tendency of the purusha, the senses will be attracted to enjoy such sense object and to possess it on the subtle level and eventually on the gross level, too: this is called lust (kama). Unfortunately, this lusty desire to enjoy and possess material sense objects of gratification is doomed to disappoint us, because as individual souls we do not really have any control over the sense objects. As all situations are temporary, sometimes we may get contact with a sense object, and sometimes it will elude us; this uncertainty produces fear, and fear in turn produces frustration and anger.

क्रोधाद्भवति सम्मोहः सम्मोहात्स्मृतिविभ्रमः । स्मृतिभ्रंशाद् बुद्धिनाशो बुद्धिनाशात्प्रणश्यति ॥ २-६३ ॥

krodhādbhavati sammohah sammohātsmṛtīvibhramah | smṛtibhramśād buddhinaśo buddhinaśātpṛaṇasyati || 2-63 ||

krodhat: from anger; bhavati: becomes; sammohah: confusion; sammohat: from confusion; smṛti: memory; vibhramah: error; smṛtibhramśad: from the loss of memory; buddhi: of the intelligence; nasah: destruction; buddhi-nasat: from the destruction of intelligence/ understanding; pranasyati: one falls down.

"Anger becomes confusion, and confusion (becomes) failing memory. Because of the loss of memory, intelligence is lost, and when intelligence is lost, one falls from his position."

The anger produced by fear and frustration in the absence of the enjoyment of the sense objects is a blinding emotion that soon turns into confusion. We have seen that such development is inevitable because we have no real control over the sense objects and their enjoyment, that appear and disappear in their due course independently from our will. In the previous verses, Krishna had recommended that we should engage in work without being attached to the enjoyment of the fruits of the action: now he is graphically illustrating what happens to those who decide otherwise. Contrarily to what many people think, God is not concerned with punishing those who disobey his orders, and his instructions are not whimsical and based on exacting some kind of allegiance from us. Like the most affectionate parent, God is simply explaining in a clear, reasonable and scientific way what is the result of each action, and then leaving us the freedom to choose according to our intelligence.

God wants us to use our power of understanding to get a clear picture of all the causes and effects in this world, so that we can better manage ourselves and achieve our desired goals. If we insist to make the wrong choice, he is not going to stop us: it is our privilege to try to make things work in a different way from what they were designed for. We also learn by falling down and picking ourselves up again to continue our journey. The system is planned perfectly: nothing is ever really lost in this learning process, and no bad experience is so bad that we cannot recover from it - in the same lifetime or in a next one. Even pain is useful to soften our understanding without crushing our spirit; if we want to avoid it, we just need to learn how to handle the knife by holding the handle instead of the blade.

रागद्वेषविमुक्तैस्तु विषयानिन्द्रियैश्चरन् आत्मवश्यैर्विधेयात्मा प्रसादमधिगच्छति ॥ २-६४ ॥

rāgadveṣavimuktaistu viṣayānindriyaisṅcaran ātmavaśyairvidheyātmā prasādamadhiḡacchati ।। 2-64 ।।

raga: attraction; dvesha: repulsion; vimuktaibh: completely free; tu: but; viṣayan: the sense objects; indriyāibh: by the senses; caran: going; atma: self; vasyaibh: controlled; vidheya: regulated; atma: self; prasadam: mercy; adhiḡacchati: attains.

"A person who has become free from the attraction and repulsion for the objects of the senses, maintains the control of himself in his actions and regulates himself (in body, mind and senses) obtains satisfaction/ the blessing (of the Lord)."

Not only God does not want to punish us for pursuing sense gratification against his instructions, he is showing us special mercy by offering this same sense gratification on the condition that we enjoy it in a regulated way. The word prasadam, "blessing" or "mercy", means that a yogi accepts as prasadam, or blessing, whatever s/he receives from the Lord as a manifestation of the divine kindness. Enjoying such divine gifts is perfectly legitimate and gives the senses their proper engagement, without guilt or attachment, and trains the mind to surrender more and more to the unlimited blessings of the Divine.

In practice, this concept of prasadam is applied by consuming the food that has been offered to the Deity. According to tradition, the system of worship of the Deity in the temple or in one's home requires the presentation of a number of items to the installed image of the Deity, of which the most important is the offering of food (naivedya). The basic worship ritual includes, beside the food, also a lamp (dipa), flowers (pushpa), perfume (gandha) and incense (dhupa). A more complex version of the pūja ritual also adds offering a seat of honor (asana), water to bathe (snana) and wash hands and feet (achamana and padya), a refreshing drink made with yogurt and honey (madhuparka), fresh clothing consisting of a lower (vastra) and an upper garment (uttariya), sandalwood paste (chandana), a sacred thread (upavita), nice ornaments (alankara or abharana), flower garlands (mala), prayers (stuti), and even entertainment consisting of songs and dances (gita and nṛtiya), fanning with chamara and decorated fans (ryajana), shoes (paduka), a mirror (darpana) and a ceremonial umbrella (chatra), a royal bed for resting (beharana), a symbolic sum of money (pranami), etc. However, the offering of food remains the most important part of the ritual. It can be as simple as a fruit and some water, or as elaborate as thousands of different preparations.

By regularly consuming this consecrated food, the yogi easily and happily learns to control his/her senses, because s/he does not know what the cook has prepared to offer to the Deity, and since prasadam is not ordinary food, it cannot be disrespected according to material considerations of liking and disliking. Also, it is a fact that the food consecrated by a ritual offering takes a special wonderful taste that a sensitive person can immediately recognize. Another important advantage is that only purely sattvic foods can be offered to the Deities: this automatically protects us from the temptation to eat the wrong and unhealthy types of foods. Sattvic foods - grains, seeds, vegetables, fruits, etc - are the healthiest sources of nutrients, on which our body is designed to function, from the shape of our teeth to the length of our intestine, to the ability of our system to get rid of toxins. Such natural fresh food is best suited for our proper maintenance and enjoyment, and even more important, it is easy to find/ collect without too much work, and without creating too much suffering to other living entities, something that definitely weighs on the efficiency balance. Further, the distribution of prasadam is done in a regulated way according to a precise schedule; every day at established times, a particular number and type of preparations. This is hinted by the word vidheya, that comes from vidhi, "regulated process".

Later in Gita, Krishna will repeat this concept, recommending to consume the yajna sisa or the "leftovers of the sacrifice" (3.13) and to offer to God whatever we eat (yad asnati) (9.27). The tradition of prasadam distribution is extremely ancient and universal in all genuine religious traditions; in fact Gita (17.13) says that a yajna, or sacrifice, that does not include the distribution of asbrista annam, the food grains remaining after the completion of the ceremony, is to be considered as ignorant (tamasam). Anything offered to the Lord becomes prasadam, and anything received from the Lord is prasadam as well - the ritual is not strictly necessary, but it is useful to help our consciousness focus in that direction.

प्रसादे सर्वदुःखानां हानिरस्योपजायते । प्रसन्नचेतसो ह्याशु बुद्धिः पर्यवतिष्ठते ॥ २-६५ ॥

prasāde sarvaduḥkhānāṃ hānirasyopajāyate । prasannacetaso hyāśu buddhiḥ paryavatiṣṭhate ।। 2-65 ।।

prasade: in (this) prasadam; sarva: all; dubkhanam: sufferings; hanibh: are destroyed; asya: of him; upajayate: appears; prasanna: satisfied; cetasah: consciousness; hi: certainly; asu: very soon; buddhibh: intelligence; pari: completely; avatiṣṭhate: becomes firmly established.

"This prasadam (blessing) brings about the destruction of all sufferings, gives satisfaction to the mind, and (by it) the proper intelligence/ understanding is quickly established."

The word prasadam includes the meanings of blessing, favor, mercy, satisfaction, contentment, serenity, peace, and pleasure. From the same root we have the word prasada, an invocation often used to address a Deity in prayer, invoking his/her benevolence towards the worshiper. We have then at least two meanings in this verse: one is focused on the contentment attained by the yogi who has genuinely come to control his senses by giving up both attraction and repulsion, and therefore only accepts what comes spontaneously for the proper maintenance of the body. The other meaning - of prasadam as the sacred food that has been offered to the Deity - is more focused on bhakti, on the personal relationship between the bhakta or devotee and the ista devata, the Divine Personality that the devotee worships. This meaning is much sweeter and very attractive, constituting the easiest and quickest path to attain the higher taste that our soul is always seeking. Later in Gita and especially as its conclusion, Krishna will confirm that bhakti, or the loving relationship between the devotee and the Personality of Godhead, is the supreme modality of Yoga (Gita 6.47, 18.55, 9.34, 18.65 etc.). However, it would be foolish to believe that one of these two interpretations is right and the other is wrong, or that the two are incompatible and meant to be followed separately by different factions of religionists. We need to integrate the two visions in order to get the actual picture.

Bhakti is the supreme form of Yoga only when it is firmly established in spiritual realization (Gita 18.54), otherwise it cannot take us very far. Without the proper knowledge and detachment, and without the realization of the transcendental identity of the Atman/ Brahman, devotion remains a sentimentalistic attitude that can only grow materially into bigotry and fanaticism. The devotional attitude must become free from material identifications and attachments (upadhi), from duality, from sentimentalism, from ignorance and misconceptions, and even from the desire to receive reciprocation from God. This is called suddha bhakti, pure devotion, described beautifully in the eight verses of the Sikshastaka, personally composed by Chaitanya to summarize his teachings. It is very interesting to see how Chaitanya's preaching mission was focused on the recitation of the names, qualities and activities of the Lord, as well as on the distribution of consecrated spiritual food that had been offered to the Lord. Chaitanya chose to spend the greatest and last part of his life in the holy dhama of Jagannatha Puri, where the offering of foods to the Deity in the temple is considered the most characteristic aspect of the rituals, and the consecrated food, called mahaprasadam, is considered a direct manifestation of God.

नास्ति बुद्धिरयुक्तस्य न चायुक्तस्य भावना । न चाभावयतः शान्तिरशान्तस्य कुतः सुखम् ॥ २-६६ ॥

nāsti buddhirayuktasya na cāyuktasya bhāvanā । na cābhāvayataḥ śāntiraśāntasya kutaḥ sukham ॥ 2-66 ॥

na: not; asti: there is; buddhib: intelligence; ayuktasya: of one who is not connected/ engaged; na: not; ca: and; ayuktasya: of one who is not connected/ engaged; bhavana: focused mind; na: not; ca: and; abhavayataḥ: one who is not established; śāntiḥ: peace; asāntasya: of one who is not peaceful; kutaḥ: where; sukham: happiness.

"A person who is not connected/ engaged (in Yoga) cannot have the (proper) intelligence/ understanding. A person who is not engaged (in Yoga) cannot get any good results, or be able to attain peace. And how can there be happiness without peace?"

This verse continues to elaborate on the practical way to become established in the constant higher awareness called samadhi, where the consciousness is not distracted by joys or sorrows, and we act out of selfless duty only, constantly remembering our true nature as atman, the transcendental and universal spirit that inhabits the body. Krishna has already explained that this intelligence is called Yoga, and in this verse he highlights the fundamental meaning of the definition as "connection", that gives contentment, peace and happiness to the individual in its proper place within the greater Reality. This is also the fundamental meaning of the word "religion", that derives from the Latin religare, or "to connect". Religion is what connects the individual to God - to his/ her purpose in life, to the environment where s/he lives, to the others, to the Self. Knowing one's place in the universe and being properly engaged in a functional service to the higher good is the key to a feeling of contentment, peace and happiness. In this sense, the definition can be applied to practically all ideologies that regulate the behavior of the human beings in connection to a greater reality, as each human being can have a particular concept of God according to many factors. For example, a communist atheist also has a religion: he worships the State (an idea that is not much different from the concept expressed in the Puruṣa sukta) and the communist ideology as the greater reality he is connected to. His behavior, choices and priorities are all dictated by such ideology, and when he is properly situated within the community, working sincerely and selflessly and being adequately taken care of, he feels at peace and happy.

Ironically, in its institutionalized and totalitarian (fundamentalist) form, the communist ideology is rather similarly to the ideology it was born to fight - it even has its saints and apostles, its priests and priestly hierarchy, its worship rituals, holy places and shrines, festival observances, sacred books, dogma, and even a kind of inquisition or "ideological police" that is meant to subdue, punish or persecute ideological dissidents - i.e. anyone who questions the dogma, even in terms of ethics or morality or basic human rights. On the other hand, there are some ideologies that are generally considered as religions but allow plenty of freedom to their followers, both in regard to beliefs and in daily life choices. Not only Hinduism (in its original form), but all the non-exclusivist ideologies known as Animism, Shamanism, Taoism, Jainism and Buddhism are also officially considered religions, although radically different from the abrahamic model that is generally used as a reference pattern by academia. For example, Buddhism does not concern itself with God and has no hierarchical religious institutions or even a fixed doctrine except for the four Basic Truths of the sufferings of this world and the Eightfold Path of right behavior, that is basically about ethics.

Buddhism does not focus on a next world - in fact it considers it an illusion just like this one - and it speaks of karma as a scientific law of physics: every action has a reaction. Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism worships Buddha as the embodiment of Divinity, but this idea of Divinity is vague, something like the idea of Jesus in Christianity, but minus its personal character (everybody can be Buddha - just realize your "buddhahood" and you are there), and especially without God, the church, the bible, heaven or hell, salvation, baptism, etc, that have no equivalent in Buddhism. In a sense, Buddhism is an upgrade of ordinary human ethics, that through detachment takes one to the peace of "nothingness", but deeply and intrinsically values ethical conduct in this world as a visible and natural symptom of such detachment.

In abrahamic religions the only real point of ideology is faith - the need to believe in God's word (orders) and ideally secure absolute political power for the religious leaders, to convert or subjugate everyone and wipe out all other ideologies/ faiths. The information about God, the soul, etc, is very scarce, often contradictory, and must be applied according to the dictates of the religious leaders that constitute the ultimate and undisputable authority on God's orders. Those who consider themselves as Christians, Muslims or Jews but do not recognize themselves in such ideology are considered as "not very religious" or even "heretics" by their own religious authorities. The science of Yoga described in Gita, on the other hand, can be applied universally. It is perfectly compatible with any ethical ideology, because it accommodates both personal and impersonal views about Divinity, as well as any of the innumerable forms and names of God. We could say that Yoga is the foundation for all forms of religion, as well as for all the progressive ideologies that aim at improving the balanced and happy functioning of the individual and the society. According to the Yoga taught by Krishna in Gita, we need to connect everything to the purpose of life, Self realization, and the service to the Supreme Reality. This connection to the Supreme requires the engagement of our senses, mind and intelligence in the performance of dutiful and selfless service, that will give us peacefulness and ultimately that very happiness that everybody is seeking. Another meaning of this verse is stressing the importance of pacifying the mind and withdrawing/ controlling the senses in order to achieve a level of clarity of vision that is called buddhi or intelligence. Buddhi (intelligence), shanti (peacefulness) and sukha (happiness) are here strictly connected, just like previously (62, 63) dhyana (contemplation) was strictly connected to sanga (association/ attachment), kama (desire), etc. While the previous chain reaction was a vicious circle, this verse presents a virtuous circle by which one can become liberated from all sufferings and delusions. In this case, too, Krishna is explaining the simple scientific facts of life, so that we can better understand the choice that lies in front of us.

The word bhavana can also be translated as "desire, longing", but is radically different from the lusty desire of enjoyment, possession and exploitation that is kama.

इन्द्रियाणां हि चरतां यन्मनोऽनुविधीयते । तदस्य हरति प्रज्ञां वायुर्नावमिवाम्भसि ॥ २-६७ ॥

indriyāṇāṃ hi caratāṃ yaṇmano'nuvidhiyate | tadasya harati prajñāṃ vāyurnāvamivāmbhasi || 2-67 |

indriyanam: of the senses; hi: certainly; caratam: roaming around; yan: those; manah: the mind; anuvīdhīyate: is constantly engaged; tad: that; asya: of him; harati: takes away; prajnam: wisdom/ understanding; vayub: the wind; navam: a boat; iva: like; ambhasi: on the water.

"A mind that follows the senses becomes subservient to them, and takes away the wisdom of that (person) like the wind sweeps a boat on water."

In all ethical ideologies, the individual needs to control his senses and mind in order to execute his duties selflessly, for the greater benefit of the supreme Reality to which he belongs and which he is supposed to serve. Yoga gives the perfect scientific approach to this need, detailing all the mechanisms of cause and effect, the steps in the process, the pitfalls and the best way to avoid them.

This verse is directly connected to verse 60 of this same chapter - but while verse 60 stated that the senses are so turbulent that they can drag away the mind of a person who is trying to control them, this verse speaks about a person who decides to actually follow the senses. Like the word vipascitah in verse 60, the word prajnam used in the verse suggests that even those who had already attained the level of proper understanding/ realization/ wisdom can fall in this trap, and get swept away in the storm of uncontrolled mind just like anybody else. There is no room for complacency: as long as one has a material body and senses, the danger is present. It is all a question of engagement. Either we engage ourselves in Yoga - the science of selfless action that utilizes our senses and mind for the service to the higher good - or we follow an uncontrolled mind that is engaged in the service of the senses. People who claim that they do not want to follow Yoga or any ethical ideology because it limits their freedom - by telling them what they should or should not eat etc - are actually deluded by illusion, because they are never free. They are actually following the orders of their senses and mind - such ruthless masters that they do not care at all for the bad consequences of our actions on our well-being, health, or other important aspects of our life. They do not even care for our actual physical and mental needs: in fact they often go against the natural instinct that is meant to safeguard our health and well-being, as we can see for example in the pathological eating disorders.

A mind that is dedicated to following the requests of the senses can get us in a lot of troubles and it can even kill us, destroy our relationships, send us bankrupt, or land us in serious legal difficulties... all situations where we will be forced to remain without the very same sense gratification that led us to that troubled condition in the first place.

We could ask ourselves how free is a man who subordinates all his choices to the whimsical requests of his own senses and mind, or to the whimsical requests of the senses and mind of his family or friends, to the expectations of people in general (as society or community, nation, cultural tradition etc), or to the need of working at a job he does not like but offers money to pursue his sense gratification or pay for his credit card debts. At some point he is just slaving on just to pay the bills, the rent and the basic food supplies - whose cost is manipulated by the System to keep him constantly under pressure.

The System holds him a prisoner through the commercial advertisements, the opinion-making media, peer pressure, and the myth of sense gratification itself. He cannot take time for himself even when his body and mind are getting near to collapse, so he has to buy medication to "keep going" in his absurdly demanding engagements, and when he gets a vacation he usually wastes it away in a sense gratification tour de force, running from an expensive and exhausting "fun activity" to the other. Sometimes such "fun activities" effectively short-circuit his chances for well-being and happiness with sports accidents, traffic wrecks, terrorist attacks or other unexpected disasters, such as being cheated by some scam travel agency, mugged in a foreign city, etc. What to speak of ordinary small troubles such as mosquito bites, ants in the park meadow, sunburns, blisters on the feet, hangovers, or some minor gastro-enteric infection. Eventually, the so-called free man becomes totally confused and frustrated, deeply dissatisfied, trapped in the consequences of his own foolish actions, and yet he cannot see any way out, because he keeps looking in the wrong direction.

तस्माद्यस्य महाबाहो निगृहीतानि सर्वशः । इन्द्रियाणीन्द्रियार्थेभ्यस्तस्य प्रज्ञा प्रतिष्ठिता ॥ २-६८ ॥

tas mādyasya mahābāho nigṛhītāni sarvaśaḥ | indriyāṇīndriyārthebhyastasya prajñā pratiṣṭhitā || 2-68 ||

tasmad: therefore; yasya: of him/ her; maha-baho: o mighty armed (Arjuna); nigrihitani: dominated; sarvasah: everywhere; indriyani: the senses; indriya: of the senses; arthebhyah: in the purpose; tasya: of him/ her; prajna: wisdom; pratishtita: firmly situated.

"Therefore, o mighty armed (hero), one who practices restraint in all activities while engaging the senses in the objects of the senses, is firmly situated in wisdom."

The prescription offered by Gita is simple and amounts to good old common sense: just use restraint. There is no need to stop engaging the senses and the mind, as some people try to do in their frustration. What is common sense, if not natural, logical wisdom? It is the intrinsic intelligence of the soul, the voice of conscience, that is promptly and freely available to anyone who is willing to sincerely listen to it. It does not need to be acquired externally, because this voice speaks from within our own heart: what greater freedom could we wish for?

In this verse, Krishna half-jokingly calls Arjuna by the epithet maha-baho, "mighty armed", implying that the greatest battle is the daily engagement in controlling one's mind and senses, something that requires strength, skills, and intelligence. In the Vedic system, children were trained in these combat skills starting from an early age. The first training is through the good example of his/ her elders and family members, who are the natural role models for all children. The good example of parents who act selflessly to perform their duties and live honestly in observance with the principles of dharma is the single greatest blessing that one can receive in life, because it establishes a fundamental imprint on which all other gathered knowledge and experiences are grafted. A bad example from one's parents is comparable to weak foundations in the building of a house, something that makes higher construction rather dangerous. When a child reaches a certain age, he begins to speak and understand the language, so s/he is also offered important teachings in the form of precepts, stories, answers and explanations to his/her questions.

Eventually, when the child starts to develop social skills, s/he is required to observe some degree of discipline or self control, in preparation for the training s/he will receive at school. Of course there are exceptions - souls that have already evolved to a certain level but need to further strengthen themselves by sticking to their principles and realizations even when exposed to negative influences from the earliest childhood, or, on the opposite side, degraded souls that take birth in a good family to test their patience and discrimination or to exact the payment of some ancient karmic debt. However, in both situations there is a clear sense of incompatibility that soon causes a healthy separation from the family of origin. In fact, the earlier this separation occurs, the better it is for everyone. The second environment where children are supposed to be trained by example and precept is the school. In the Vedic system school teachers are expected to be very qualified not only in regard to theoretical knowledge, but also in personal behavior and ethical principles, and especially in the science of Self realization. A brahmana, by definition, has deeply realized Brahman and acts from that platform only. In the genuine system, all the examples and precepts that a child receives from family, elders and school resonate on the same principles and knowledge that every individual obtains from the natural wisdom that speaks from his heart with the voice of the conscience.

या निशा सर्वभूतानां तस्यां जागर्ति संयमी । यस्यां जाग्रति भूतानि सा निशा पश्यतो मुनेः ॥ २-६९ ॥

yā niśā sarvabhūtānām tasyām jāgarti samyamī | yasyām jāgrati bhūtāni sā niśā paśyato muneh | || 2-69 ||

yah: s/he; nisah: night; sarva: all; bhutanam: of the living entities; tasyam: him/ her; jagarti: remains awake; samyami: one who is self-controlled; yasyam: in which; jagrati: keeps awake; bhutani: all living entities; sah: s/he; nisah: the night; paśyatah: who sees; muneh: the wise.

"For such a wise person, what is night for all creatures becomes the opportunity for regulated awakening, and the time when the creatures remain awake is night for him."

There are various levels of meanings for this verse – from the most literal, recommending that the yogi takes proper advantage of the quiet hours of very early morning when everybody else is sleeping, to the most symbolic, implying that the needs, interests, pursuits and logic of materialistic people are totally unnecessary for a yogi. The time for waking and sleeping is one of the basic lifestyle habits that need to be regulated by the sincere and dedicated student of Yoga. We have seen that food habits, and especially the choice of sattvic food offered to God, can greatly help one's progress in Self realization, because they help the senses and the mind to engage in pleasure in a healthily regulated way. A similar consideration applies to the sleep pattern.

In all ashrams, temples and in the homes of civilized people in the Vedic tradition, the day starts very early. Rising early is a good habit based on a scientifically verified fact: about one hour before sunrise, the movement of liquids on our planet changes in what we can macroscopically observe in the ocean tides. In the microcosm of the human body, this change of movement in the liquid substances stimulates the elimination of urine and stool, as well as mucus in the respiratory passages. If we get up early in the morning, we can easily go to the bathroom and get rid of these materials, that are loaded with toxins and other substances that need to be expelled from our body.

If we miss this early morning opportunity because we are still sleeping deeply, the toxins and other rejected substances remain blocked in the system and risk being slowly re-absorbed into the blood stream. So the healthiest thing is to get up, go to the bathroom, brush our teeth, clean our tongue and clear our throat, then finally take a full shower and put on fresh clothes. In cold climates and during the winter, the pre-dawn hour can be too cold to afford a full bath and it may be possible to postpone the shower a few hours, but still it is always recommendable to get up early and clean up as much as we can.

In the magic and powerful hour that precedes sunrise, nature stirs and its basic energies meet, creating a moment of balance. This is called sandhya, the union between the night and the day, and it is similar to the other two sandhyas in the day, i.e. midday and sunset. At these times, the play between the masculine and the feminine energies attains a moment of balance, in which both the brain hemispheres work together and the consciousness can find exceptional realizations. Just make a simple experiment: check the activity of both nostrils during the different times of the day. You will notice that around sunrise, midday and sunset both nostrils are working simultaneously, while at other times only one nostril is active. In advanced yogis, the balance between the two brain hemispheres becomes more common and steady, so the breathing occurs naturally through both nostrils more often, or even all the time. Pranayama is one of the basic steps of yoga, because through breathing we can greatly help our work in controlling the senses and the mind, and in regulating the physical functions of the body. Performing pranayama at sandhya, with a clean body, and at the auspicious time of the tide change, is extremely effective.

What about going to sleep? Different creatures have different habits, and some predators are most active in the night, but in general the daytime sunlight is needed to normally perform the basic activities of life. The various periods of the day and night are subject to the influence of the three gunas. It is said that sattva guna predominates from the brahma muburta - about one hour before sunrise - to midday. This is the best time to study, plan, and organize our work for the rest of the day, and get most of our duties completed. When we get up early in the morning we have a lot more hours for our productive pursuits. After midday rajas guna, the influence of passion, becomes predominant and we become restless for food and other sense gratification, such as private phone calls, social interactions etc. Usually the afternoon hours are less productive at work, unless we had previously planned our actions carefully. At some point, around sunset, we become tired even if we did not work much during the daytime, and the need for entertainment and gratification gets stronger. We have dinner, and we feel that we are entitled to have some fun; unfortunately the tendency is to engage in tamasic activities such as drinking alcohol or taking recreational drugs, passively sliding into a stupor at the movies or in front of the TV screen, or engaging in similar activities that put intelligence and wisdom to sleep.

On a deeper level of interpretation, the wise sadhaka stays awake in the dark night of ignorance, because that is the time of strictly following the regulations and disciplined duties that keep us on track. After the sun of realization has risen, there is less need for rules and regulations because one is spontaneously attracted by what is transcendental and real, so the wise sadhaka can let go of the strict control of the mind and let the natural feelings of the soul take over. This is called raganuga bhakti. Its powerful emotions can absorb our consciousness in such a total way that we may lose the awareness of the external world, just like a person who is sleeping. Others call this blissful ecstasy with the names of nirvana ("cessation of the wind" of the mind) or turiya, the fourth state of consciousness where the mind is totally silent, in deep awe for the contemplation of Reality.

Some commentators argue that the night of the wise sadhaka, or sannyasi, indicates that his consciousness is not encumbered by the multitude of ritualistic performances and social duties that keep ordinary people awake during the day. So in this sense he just sleeps in regard to such duties, and wakes up only in the subtle contemplation of abstract things, that for some people may seem to be dreams. In fact, we see that sannyasis are not required to perform the usual ceremonies or to engage in a social occupation or job, because he needs to be free to perform whatever preaching activity is required by his mission. However, we must be careful because sattva always need to be engaged in itself by utilizing rajas. When such engagement is suspended, sattva may become tainted with tamas or ignorance, and it drags the sadhaka lower and lower into a delusion of higher realization, while in fact the so called sannyasi remains in a lazy idleness or starts pursuing sense gratification, material power, a social position etc.

आपूर्यमाणमचलप्रतिष्ठं	समुद्रमापः प्रविशन्ति यद्वत् ।
āpūryamāṇamacalapratiṣṭhaṁ	samudramāpaḥ praviśanti yadvat ।
तद्वत्कामा यं प्रविशन्ति सर्वे	स शान्तिमाप्नोति न कामकामी ॥ २-७० ॥
tadvatkāmā yaṁ praviśanti sarve	sa śāntimāpnoti na kāmakāmī ।। 2-70 ।।

apuryamanam: constantly filled; acala: without moving; pratiṣṭham: steady; samudram: the ocean; apah: waters; praviśanti: enter; yadvat: similarly; tadvat: in the same way; kāmāḥ: the desires; yaṁ: him/ her; praviśanti: enter; sarve: all; sab: that person; santim: peacefulness; apnoti: achieves; na: not; kama-kami: one who desires (to have) desires.

"The ocean does not move from its position, no matter how much water enters to fill it. A person who similarly (withstands the flow) of desires entering (his mind) achieves a peace that is not (achieved) by one who wants (to cultivate) desires."

This beautiful image of the ocean, constantly filled by hundreds of rivers and streams and yet remaining within its boundaries, contains a number of levels of meanings. The most immediate meaning is that the ocean is so great that it cannot be disturbed by the waters that keep flowing into it. The mind of the mahatma is also so great and boundless that it is not agitated like the small and narrow minds of the materialists. A realized spiritualist does not give much importance to the myriad of desires, thoughts, and other pieces of information that rain down and flow like rivers into the mind of everyone. It is not that the spiritualist does not get any input from the world. Trying to solve the problem by artificially separating oneself from the world is not a very good idea. True, in the beginning stages of the yoga practice a sadbaka needs to have a quiet environment to start the training. However, when the willpower has become a little stronger and the mind is relatively subdued, it is better to learn the practice of dynamic meditation, by which one is able to face the external world and still remain undisturbed and focused. It is impossible to remain forever isolated from the external world, and even if one has not had any experience of sense gratification in his entire life, still the natural tendency of the senses remains. There is a famous story about a yogi who, to better control his senses, went to meditate under the water in a cool lake, where nobody could go to disturb him. Unfortunately there were fish in the lake, and one day the yogi opened his eyes and was offered the "indecent" spectacle of two small aquatic creatures dancing in the joy of mating. The bottled up desires for sense gratification exploded in the mind of the poor man, and he had to hasten out of the water and among ordinary people to find himself a wife - and quickly. In Kali yuga things are even more difficult, because we are running short of undisturbed locations on top of mountains or in the middle of forests where a yogi can withdraw from the world. The Himalayas have become a popular tourist destination and are littered with empty drink cans and other stuff left by visitors, and the jungles have been auctioned to the mining industry or are being cut down for coal, or thinned down to accommodate the demographic expansion, with the blasting loudspeakers entertaining the sparse villagers with Bollywood music. The method offered by Krishna in Gita is rather less dramatic and much more effective: just engage the senses properly, in selfless activities for the benefit of all, and patiently tolerate the inflow of desires without remaining attached to them or running after them. This will be sufficient. The expression kama kami is particularly interesting, as it indicates a person who is eager to have desires: this vividly illustrates the tendency of contemporary society to push people towards extreme consumerism and sense gratification even in their advanced age, when the senses become more quiet and the body does not demand much any more. By deeply studying the example of the ocean, we can find out a lot of other interesting and beautiful concepts. For example, we know that the ocean can remain within its boundaries because of the evaporation of the water under the sun rays. Similarly, the heat of our passion for the service of the Supreme can evaporate all desires in the offering of a sacrifice that will be beneficial to everyone, since the fruits of such service like clouds will bring rain to the parched lands and enable the healthy growth of all creatures.

विहाय कामान्यः सर्वान्पुमांश्चरति निःस्पृहः । निर्ममो निरहङ्कारः स शान्तिमधिगच्छति ॥ २-७१ ॥

vihāya kāmānyaḥ sarvānpumāṁścarati niḥspṛhaḥ । nirmamo nirahaṅkāraḥ sa śāntimadhi-gacchati ॥ 2-71 ॥

vihaya: giving up/ letting go; kaman: desires; yah: s/he; sarvan: all; puman: a person (purusha); carati: walks around; niḥsprihaḥ: untouched; nirmamah: without sense of proprietorship/ belonging/ affinity; nirahankarah: without material identification; sah: s/he; santim: peace; adhigacchati: really attains.

"By abandoning all desires, a person moves freely without attachments and because he does not consider himself the owner or doer of anything, he attains peace."

When we let go of desires, they flow away without too much trouble because of their temporary nature. Desires only remain stuck to our mind if we grasp at them and nurture them in our mind, carrying them around as luggage even from one lifetime to the other. All this luggage makes our journey very difficult and longer than actually required, and restricts our freedom to move around. Besides the whimsical desires that are fancied by the mind, there are two other huge pieces of luggage that make our life difficult and prevent us from breaking free from material conditioned existence: they are technically called mamatva and ahankara.

Mamatva is the "mine-ness", or sense of proprietorship, belonging, or affinity that creates a bondage for the individual; it can apply to inert objects such as clothes, ornaments, vehicles, buildings, homes, relationships, countries, to living entities, or even to concepts as in the case of political parties, ideologies etc. This feeling of possession turns both into the desire for exploitation and the need of servitude towards the object of our possession, and conditions our happiness to the flimsy satisfaction we can derive from such temporary objects.

Ahankara is a composite word, from aham, "I", and kara, "do". This concept is sometimes translated as "material identification" or "false ego", or more literally but rather incomprehensibly, "doership" or "authorship". To properly understand the definition we need to connect it with the previous instruction of remaining detached from the fruits of the action. When one performs an activity, it is logical to expect the fruits of the action if we believe we are the doer, the author of the action that has full responsibility for it. By introducing this concept of ahankara in his speech, Krishna is taking us deeper into the science of action, Karma Yoga, that will be the subject of the next chapter.

As Krishna will clearly explain later in the text, the individual is not supposed to be fully responsible for his actions, because he is not supposed to act independently. If he does so, he will be accountable for the good or bad results and will have to accept the consequences, binding him to the cycle of karma and samsara.

Let's make an example: a bank employee works handling money on behalf of the bank and its customers. Every day huge amounts of money pass through his hands, as he moves the funds from one account to the other, but he is not acting independently and therefore he is not responsible for the results of such actions, and he is not expecting to gain or lose any money personally in the transactions. He just needs to do his work properly, in the best possible way, and remain detached from the money he works with.

If by any chance the bank employee starts to develop a sense of mamatva and abankara towards his actions, he immediately gets into troubles because he will try to appropriate and enjoy the money he handles. As a consequence, automatically he will be held responsible for the missing funds and he will have to pay for that. Of course, if he independently takes money from the bank and invests it gainfully on his personal responsibility, he will also have to accept the fruits of his action and become attached to the wealth he has accumulated. However, since bank employees are not supposed to conduct this kind of activities independently, he will have to pay back the initial capital to the bank and he will lose his job, thus finding himself in a difficult position in spite of his extra income. Now, if the bank employee has a talent for investments and development of assets, and wants to take a leading position, he does not really need to independently siphon off funds for his risky ventures without the sanction of the higher authorities.

There is a better way to engage his tendencies and qualities: he can work more closely with the general manager, learning more about the market and whatever other information may be required or useful, and then he can work in a more responsible capacity within the bank organization. In this way he will still be protected and taken care of, he will have his expenses covered by the bank with a better salary, and he will not break any law or regulation. If the investment goes wrong, he will not have to pay from his own pocket.

In the greater organization of the universe, God is the real owner of everything and has a very good plan for all of us. Such divine plan also includes equipping each individual with a certain amount of intelligence, talents, instruments and opportunities, so we should not have the impression we are just cogs in a machine or puppets on strings. But we need to learn the importance of cooperation and service to the greater good, because every time we are trying to "take care of our own business" without considering our duties, we are going for unnecessary trouble. By connecting ourselves to the greater Reality, finding our progressive place in the universe, and working sincerely in selfless and dutiful service, we can actually achieve the peacefulness that is the basis for happiness. In this verse, peacefulness is called shanti; one of its synonyms is nirvana, as the cessation of the agitating winds of desires in the mind.

एषा ब्राह्मी स्थितिः पार्थ नैनां प्राप्य विमुह्यति । स्थित्वास्यामन्तकालेऽपि ब्रह्मनिर्वाणमृच्छति ॥ २-७२ ॥

eṣā brāhmī sthitiḥ pārtha naināṃ prāpya vimuhyati । sthityāsyāmantakāle'pi brahmanirvāṇamṛcchati ।। 2-72 ।।

eṣa: this; brahmi: spiritual/ transcendental; sthitih: position; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); na: not; enam: this; prāpya: obtaining; vimuhyati: becomes confused; sthitva: being situated; asyam: in this; anta-kale: in the final moment; api: even; brahma: spiritual; nirvanam: cessation of agitation; ṛcchati: attains.

"O son of Pritha, this is the spiritual level. A person who has attained this level never becomes confused, and by remaining in that position, he attains spiritual liberation at the end of his time."

The last verse of the chapter presents detachment and freedom from desires, mamatva and abankara as the transcendental position of Brahman, the natural and permanent identity of the soul or Atman. When the jiva atman, the individual soul, attains this transcendental consciousness he finds his original freedom (moksha) from all ties and karmic consequences, and is not conditioned by attraction and repulsion any more. Thus, at the final moment - the death of this material body or the destruction of the universe or both - he will not suffer the crisis of confusion caused by the disappearance of the objects of material identification and possession, and he will be really free.

Nirvana is a word that has become famous through the Buddhist preaching, but it is not characteristic of Buddhism only. Unfortunately, some prejudiced and sectarian people who consider themselves Vaishnavas or devotees of Krishna express a negative or even hostile attitude towards this concept of nirvana, considering it "impersonalistic" or "nichilistic". This is because they have not read Bhagavad gita, and therefore they have not noticed how many times Krishna (the supreme authority they claim to worship, follow or even represent) clearly and explicitly mentions nirvana as the level of transcendental realization that we are expected to attain. We sincerely hope that our humble efforts in this translation and commentary will help to fill up the gaps in their understanding of Krishna and his teachings.

Brahmi sthitiḥ, or the "position related to Brahman" is brahma nirvanam, in the sense that the consciousness/ awareness of our real nature is permanent, stable, and it is not disturbed by external circumstances - it does not waver like a flame that moves in a gush of wind. This is the meaning of "nirvana", a composite word constituted by the negative prefix nir and the word vata, "wind". Later in Bhagavad gita Krishna will also associate the transcendental level with the definition nitya sattva, or suddha sattva, the eternal and pure form of goodness (sattva) that characterizes spiritual existence/ reality (sat). This level is the genuine realization of our true nature/ identity, and it is above the material gunas. We can come close to it by following a sattvic lifestyle, yet eventually we will have to go beyond sattva, too, by overcoming the identification and attachment to the benefits that one can get from sattva.

Nitya sattva is thus equated with brahma nirvana, because as long as sattva remain material, it will soon drag the individual back into tamas and rajas - therefore it cannot be called nitya. And what is eternal and pure existence if not the spirit - atman, brahman?

Chapter 3: Karma yoga

The yoga of action

After explaining the difference between matter and spirit, and the overall concept of Yoga as the balance given by intelligence, Krishna will now elaborate about the science of action or Karma. The first and foremost meaning of karma in Hindu tradition refers to the ritualistic ceremonies that constitute the duty of the brahmanas. A fiery controversy has raged for centuries on the two apparent positions, i.e. the smarta brahmanism based on karma kanda, the ritualistic path presented by the Vedas, and the sannyasi "monasticism" based on renunciation and a more philosophical interpretation of Vedic knowledge. Such controversy, we need to state, is totally unnecessary and was not the purpose of the original expounders of the two apparently contradicting systems of Purva mimamsa and Uttara mimamsa. Adi Shankara established the system of Mathas, founded temples for the worship of the Deities and radically reformed the institution of sannyasa as a necessary step to counteract the degradation of the brahmanic tradition, that had been hijacked by unqualified people motivated by arrogance, greed and an unbridled lust for sense gratification.

Before Adi Shankara's appearance, there had already been a reaction against this sad state of things, through the successful spreading of Buddhism and Jainism - two doctrines that denied the authority of Vedic scriptures, the need for worship to appease the various gods and goddesses and for all ritualistic ceremonies as well, including the fire sacrifice. Buddhism demolished all social barriers, giving no importance to the difference between occupations, family of origin and gender, accepting anyone and everyone to live together in monasteries, to study the sacred texts and write commentaries, to preach and teach to the greater mass of people, and to accept disciples into its active fold. On the other hand, early Buddhism offered a sterling example of selflessness, seriousness and honesty, demanding total renunciation to sense gratification and an exemplary moral behavior from all its monks, as well as the greatest compassion towards all living entities (including the animals) and a friendly and accommodating approach to all groups of people and needs. Buddhism was not rigid at all, and easily adapted to very different mentalities, leaving everyone free to pursue their previous beliefs and practices - just adding a strictly dharmic behavior, detachment, truthfulness, nonviolence and compassion.

However, in the period when Adi Shankara appeared, the Buddhist tradition, too, had become degraded in various ways. Those who had taken up Buddhism as a reaction against the abuse perpetrated by the brahmins (we use the word "brahmin" to indicate a non-qualified person who has usurped the position of brahmana in society) were sometimes carried away by their personal grudges to the detriment of the very same basic Buddhist principles of nonviolence and friendliness to everyone, so they actively attacked Hinduism and Hindus - more or less like it has been happening in Sri Lanka for the past several decades.

Many people believe that Hinduism was hostile to Buddhism and therefore Buddhists had to escape out of India, but the diaspora of Buddhism towards the periphery of Akhanda Bharata or "greater India" (that in ancient times extended as far as Singapore) was in fact caused by the Muslim invasions that plagued India since the earliest waves of invading marauders. It was the Muslims who destroyed the famous Buddhism universities, centers of knowledge in all its branches attracting hundreds of thousands of students from the entire ancient world - universities that had stood and prospered immensely under the benevolent rule of Hindu kings and the cooperation of Hindu communities. In fact, by the time Adi Shankara appeared, Buddhism had become much more powerful than brahmanism, and the faith of people in Vedic tradition had dwindled almost to zero. Adi Shankara revived that faith in the Vedic way - not by persecuting the Buddhists and kicking them out of India, but by introducing suitable reforms into Hinduism itself to bring it back to its pure purpose, at the same time making it much stronger and more attractive for the masses. However, Adi Shankara was not afraid of going against the "age-old tradition": he introduced new traditions that were totally unprecedented and appeared to be directly at odds with the previous interpretation.

The institution of Mathas, or "monasteries", designed on the Buddhist model, was certainly the most revolutionary action, with its corollaries of sannyasis living together in a fixed residence and teaching brahmacharis, installing and worshiping Deities that could be visited by the general public, collecting and managing funds for the maintenance of the Matha and temple, organizing preaching functions to the public etc - all occupations that had been the natural and undisputed rights of grihastha brahmanas, including the highly transcendental ones such as the Rishis living in their remote ashramas in the forests.

The concept of sannyasa had been there all along, but at an individual level only, as by the old definition a sannyasi gives up all social interactions and responsibilities and even social relevance. Jabala Upanishad (4.1) explains that brahmacharya is followed by grihastha, vanaprastha and sannyasa, but that one can also accept the order of sannyasa directly from the brahmacharya position or from any other subsequent position. Taking sannyasa had never been obligatory, but it had been recommended for brahmanas. However, it was totally against the aspirations of the later generations of degraded brahmins because it actually required total renunciation (sannyasa precisely means "renunciation") and a materialistic person cannot give up the attachment to family or society. A sannyasi cannot have any possession, any fixed residence, or any opportunity for self gratification. He cannot accept disciples, he cannot teach or even mix with other people except for the brief time a householder needs to milk a cow to feed a beggar. A sannyasi would not be invited for meals into the house, but was just given alms in his kamandalu or uttariya, (water pot and upper cloth respectively) generally in the form of rice, fruits, vegetables, and especially milk - considered the most appropriate food for them. A sannyasi was not supposed to cook his food, but he was expected to eat raw unseasoned food just to keep the body barely alive, without any concession to taste. To avoid the possibility of the sannyasi becoming too complacent with his means of living, a precise and explicit rule stated that sannyasis could never come near women or wealthy or powerful people in society. This observance was also helped by the fact that sannyasis were expected to totally disregard the care of their own bodies and clothing, even roaming around naked or scantily covered by rags. They could not use shoes, umbrellas, or vehicles of any kind, and in general they were expected to do nothing else but just prepare themselves to death through total detachment from all material identification and belongings. Adi Shankara and his followers changed all that, to the point that a sannyasi became a much respected member of society, and was able to use all material facilities to accept great numbers of disciples.

Unfortunately, because as Krishna explains in Gita time destroys everything included the genuine religious traditions (4.2), the followers of Adi Shankara messed up, too, and the original purpose of the great acharya was lost, leaving both baffled camps engaged in the foolish attempt to prove their rivals wrong. This embarrassing situation confused and weakened Indian society, causing the degradation of the other varnas, starting from the royal kshatriya order, who became unable to defend their kingdoms.

Several centuries later, the reform process was resumed by the great Vaishnava acharyas such as Madhva and Ramanuja, who also appropriated the Matha system with its reformed sannyasa rules, establishing temples and Deity worship for the masses, and creating the idea that a Vaishnava, just like a sannyasi, was above the system of varnas, that was already transforming into the prejudiced birth caste system. Specifically, fighting against this caste prejudice problem and the arrogant elitism of brahmins was Ramananda's main reason to break away from the Ramanuja sect, and created the next great wave of reform in Sanatana dharma - the bhakti revolution - with famous exponents such as Chaitanya, Mirabai, the Alvars, Tukaram, Namadeva, Kabir, Sura Das, Jnanesvara, and so on.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

ज्यायसी चेत्कर्मणस्ते मता बुद्धिर्जनार्दन । तत्किं कर्मणि घोरे मां नियोजयसि केशव ॥ ३-१ ॥

jyāyasī cetkarmaṇaste matā buddhirjanārdana tatkiṁ karmaṇi ghore māṁ niyojayasi keśava ॥ 3-1 ॥

arjuna: Arjuna; uvaca: said; jyasasi: is better; cet: if; karmaṇah: actions; te: your; matā: opinion; buddhiḥ: intelligence; janardana: o Janardana (Krishna); tat: that; kim: why; karmaṇi: actions; ghore: in horrible; mam: me; niyojayasi: are engaging; kesava: o Keshava (Krishna).

Arjuna said: "O Janardana, O Keshava, if in your opinion Buddhi (intelligence) is superior to Karma (work), why do you (want to) engage me in this horrible action?"

Krishna has already explained about the nature of the soul as distinct from the material body, and about Yoga as the proper intelligent way to act without being enmeshed in the results of the action. In this chapter, named Karma Yoga, he will explain more about the science of action. Here Arjuna calls Krishna "Janardana" ("he who animates/ inspires people into action") as he had done in the first chapter, to strengthen his question as why Krishna is pushing him towards the ghastly fighting that will ensue in the battle. Arjuna has followed Krishna's speech attentively, and has understood that Yoga is the science of acting with intelligence, detached from the results. Now he is arguing that the action awaiting him does not look like a very intelligent action at all: only a madman would want to cause such a wholesale slaughtering of so many active and qualified members of society, who in their death will not be able to continue to perform their proper duties or even pursue the transcendental knowledge by which they could attain liberation. The teachings of this chapter have been at the center of a bitter controversy between the exponents of smṛta brahmanism, based on the ritualistic karma kanda path, and the shankarite sannyasis who follow the path of renunciation and a more philosophical interpretation of Vedic knowledge. By carefully studying Gita, we will find the end of the unnecessary and confusing controversies about the superiority of one method over the other, because we will see that all paths are perfectly compatible and actually they complement each other.

व्यामिश्रेणेव वाक्येन बुद्धिं मोहयसीव मे । तदेकं वद निश्चित्य येन श्रेयोऽहमाप्नुयाम् ॥ ३-२ ॥

vyāmiśreṇeva vākyaena buddhiṁ mohayasīva me । tadekaṁ vada niścitya yena śreyaḥamāpnuyām ॥ 3-2 ॥

vyamisrena: contradictory; iva: certainly; vakyena: by words; buddhiḥ: intelligence; mohayasī: you are confusing; iva: certainly; me: to me; tad: that; ekam: one only; vada: conclusion (to be followed); niścitya: without any doubts; yena: by which; śreyah: the highest good; aham: I; apnuyam: can achieve.

"My intelligence is confused by your (apparently) contradicting words. (Please give me) one instruction only, that will not create doubts, and by which I will obtain the best result."

When we see some contradictions, we should never hesitate to question and discuss them, as Arjuna is demonstrating with his very good example here in this verse. Arjuna had already questioned Krishna's order at the beginning of the second chapter (4, 5, 6, 7, 8), when he had been clearly told that it was his duty to engage in the battle. Later in Gita (4.34) Krishna will recommend that a student should not hesitate in asking all necessary questions (pariprasnena) from the teacher in order to properly understand the subject. With all the false teachers and cheaters that mushroom everywhere in Kali yuga, one can never be careful enough.

Contradictions appear because of the dualistic nature of this world, and the limited range of the human senses, mind and intellect. We are not able to see the sun in the night, therefore we make distinctions between light and darkness. However, the sun always exists and radiates light all the time: it is only our particular position that makes it impossible for our defective eyes to see it. Similarly, Reality contains all relative truths and a multi-dimensional vision can comprehend them all, including the lack of vision that we call ignorance. We must not confuse the phenomenon of apparent contradictions between relative visions with the actual order of things that requires discrimination between the various levels of Reality. Absolute Reality is the core existence we call Brahman - the omnipresent, eternal, unchangeable, and unlimited awareness. Brahman manifests all other realities, starting from the divine couple that creates motion by a temporary dualism male/ female, two halves of the same One, that engage in the blissful play of union. This is the transcendental level where bhava or emotion produces rasas or tastes. To enhance the taste, the male and female principles produce a transcendental offspring in the form of the jīvatmas, the infinitesimal living souls that enter the divine play, either on the transcendental level or on the material level. The material dimension is then created by the divine couple through the manifestation of the gunas and the products of their interactions. The material play of the gunas creates a ladder network on which we can either ascend or descend by choosing sat or asat, the eternal or the temporary, knowledge or ignorance, light or darkness. The concept of simultaneous duality and non-duality might be confusing, and this is the reason why we need a strong clear guidance from a realized soul that is able to directly see the greater picture.

The word śreya means "better, best" and refers to the proper choice to attain the real benefit. The definition is often mentioned with its opposite preya, meaning "what is pleasurable". It is not difficult to see that people who are attached to the fruits of their actions prefer to choose an action that looks pleasurable rather than another that may bring benefits in some distant future. However, generally this is not a wise choice.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

लोकेऽस्मिन् द्विविधा निष्ठा पुरा प्रोक्ता मयानघ । ज्ञानयोगेन साङ्ख्येन कर्मयोगेन योगिनाम् ॥ ३-३ ॥

loke'smin dvividhā niṣṭhā purā proktā mayānagha । jñānayogena sāṅkhyānāṁ karmayogena yoginām ॥ 3-3 ॥

sri bhagavan: the Lord; uvaca: said; loke: world/ people; asmin: this; dvi: two; vidha: types; niṣṭha: faith/ belief/ chosen path; पुरा: before; prokta: said; maya: by me; anagha: o sinless/ spotless; jñana: knowledge; yogena: by the engagement; sāṅkhyānam: of the followers of Sankhya; karma: action; yogena: by the engagement; yoginām: of the followers of yoga.

The Lord said: "O sinless (Arjuna), as I have already explained to you, in this world there are two types of beliefs: those who follow Sankhya are connected through knowledge, while yogis are connected through action."

In this verse Krishna begins by emphasizing the apparent contradiction mentioned by Arjuna. It is interesting to see, however, that he equates the definition of Buddhi (Yoga) with Karma (Yoga). This reinforces the concept that a yoga sadhaka should not be a schizophrenic fool that chooses devotion and throws away intelligence, knowledge, and the sense of responsibility in the performance of one's duty. Those who preach a separation and rejection of these integral parts of the path of Yoga can only be ignorant fools or dangerous cheaters, because they propagate the idea that a devotee of God can legitimately be a fanatical blind and brainless follower that gives no value to ethical sense, common sense, intelligence, decency, and duties to family and society. Things get even worse when "pure and exclusive bhakti" is presented as "far superior" to intelligence and ethical sense, and that in order to achieve spiritual perfection, or any results at all in one's spiritual progress, one needs to abandon intelligence and ethical sense, and simply "take shelter" in devotional bigotry and blind allegiance to a particular sect, that breeds offensive intolerance towards any other opinion. Of course, this mentality has been hammered into the global population for the last 2000 years, so it's difficult to overcome it. Arjuna is here called anagha, that means "sinless" or "spotless". Just like its synonym papa, the word agha does not correspond exactly to the English "sin", because it is not based on the same abrahamic ideology. In the Vedic logic, agha or papa is a black spot on one's character caused by a bad choice, a mistake, an act of weakness, selfishness or ignorance that needs to be counteracted and purified by positive actions. The word loka means "world" in the sense of "people", as a world is mainly made by its inhabitants. It refers eminently to the material world, where people have opinions and relative visions determined by their particular approach and position of perspective. Another translation of this verse goes as follows: "O sinless (Arjuna), in ancient times I have expounded this (object of) faith/ belief in two different ways - the Sankhya yoga to those who are attracted to the analytical method of philosophy, and the Karma yoga to those who are more favorable to engaging in action." This is, in a nutshell, how the famous controversy between karma kanda brahmanas and the sannyasi philosophers started. Krishna clearly explains here that both approaches are aimed at describing the same Reality to two different categories of people who are attached to their relative mentalities.

Here the word yoga is associated with three main concepts: niṣṭha (faith, belief, chosen path), jñana (knowledge) of Sankhya, and karma (action) in yoga. Of the three concepts, karma is presented as the very essence of yoga, as the method through which "the yogis proper" connect to the purpose, as opposed to the followers of Sankhya. This implies a superiority of karma in relation to jñana - which after all is still just theoretical knowledge, not having attained the higher level called vijnana, or applied knowledge. Jñana or knowledge is the preliminary step to buddhi or understanding; buddhi becomes relevant when it turns into practical application or action - karma. Jñana without karma is arid speculation; karma without jñana is a foolish waste of energy.

However, we should not lose sight of the importance of niṣṭha. One should study Gita seriously and apply its teachings faithfully, even if only experimentally, otherwise it will be impossible to obtain the true benefits of this path. This requirement does not require blind and fanatical following, but the reasonable measure of trust and faith, that is invested in all the serious and valuable activities everyone performs. For example, if you want to travel by airplane from Delhi to Bangalore, you need to trust your travel agent and airline company enough to pay for your ticket before reaching your destination, and even before boarding the plane. This requires a good deal of faith: you must implicitly trust the travel agent to have actually booked a seat for you on the proper day and paid the airlines, and trust the airlines to know where the airplane is going and at what time it is taking off and landing, and so on. If you don't invest this reasonable amount of faith in the proceedings, you will never reach your destination. Similarly, agnostics and atheists who pride themselves in choosing not to believe in anything, remain totally unable to understand the meaning of Gita, Yoga, or Vedic scriptures, therefore they reduce the Hindu religion to a superficial folkloristic and ethnic (i.e. racist) concern, that has no actual meaning, but to which anyone can give any meaning they like.

न कर्मणामनारम्भान्नैष्कर्म्यं पुरुषोऽश्नुते ।

न च संन्यसनादेव सिद्धिं समधिगच्छति ॥ ३-४ ॥

na karmāṇāmanārambhānnaiṣkarmyaṁ puruṣo'śnute | na ca sanṇyasanādeva siddhiṁ samadhiḡacchati || 3-4 ||

na: not; karmānam: of the (prescribed) actions; anārambhan: not starting; naiṣkarmyam: non-action; puruṣab: a person; asnute: achieves; na: not; ca: and; sanṇyasanat: from renunciation; eva: only; siddhim: perfection; samadhi: samadhi; gacchati: attains.

"A person cannot achieve freedom from karma by abstaining from the (prescribed) action, just like perfection cannot be achieved simply through sannyasa (renunciation)."

Krishna now moves on to demolishing the walls that divide the two perspectives of Reality and create the illusion of contradiction. The word arambha is very appropriately mentioned here to refer specifically to the ritualistic action, as it is used at the beginning of the ceremonies in the invocation of auspiciousness. However, it is a definition that can be applied to all types of prescribed action. This verse contains a few interesting expressions that require a little more explanation: naiskarmya, karmānam arambha, siddhi, sannyasa. The word karma has entered the vocabulary of many languages. In English it is generally interpreted as "fate", "the force generated by a person's actions to perpetuate transmigration and in its ethical consequences to determine his destiny in his next existence". However, a more technical meaning of the word (usually escaping Western analysts) concerns the "prescribed actions" or "duty" that each individual is required to perform within the varṇashrama dharma system, and includes both one's occupational job in society and the religious observances of a particular tradition.

Naiskarmya implies the freedom from the consequences of action, and is the essential requisite to become liberated from the cycle of repeated births and deaths. However, such freedom can not be achieved by abstaining from action as some people believe. Siddhi means "perfection" and defines the goal of Yoga – and the goal of life. There are various levels of siddhi, from the extraordinary powers of control over matter, to the liberation from all material conditionings. Used together with the word samadhi, it reinforces the concept of the perfection of life, acquiring a permanent quality of stable consciousness.

Sannyasa is the renounced order of life, where one prepares for death through austerities and detachment from everything – family, social position, comforts, financial security, material pleasures – begging alms for his basic necessities. According to the traditional rules, a sannyasi cannot engage in politics, trade, business or any material activity to maintain himself. He has no house or permanent residence, no assets, no bank account, no pride and no expectations, no personal servant, no personal vehicle, no good clothes (being allowed only a cheap loincloth) or shoes, no personal properties except a walking stick and a small water pot. He even gives up his name and fame as a great scholar or spiritualist. But this renunciation alone is not sufficient: without the proper knowledge and spiritual realization, a so-called sannyasi is no better than any impoverished drunkard, madman or lazy bum. Foolish people are impressed by the externals and therefore can be easily cheated because they do not care about verifying the actual realization of a so-called sadhu or sannyasi.

We may here mention the case of Jada Bharata, who had chosen a life of total renunciation and neglect (as avadhuta) to avoid developing any material attachment and identification, and therefore externally appeared as a madman or lazy bum. This is why the servants of king Rahugana employed him to carry the palanquin of the Maharaja. However, when questioned about the reason of his irregular walking, Jada Bharata manifested his true depth of realization by expounding the science of the transcendental Self, and immediately the king accepted him as his Sat Guru, as a respectable elder. A superficial evaluation based on external appearances should never be considered as factual evidence.

न हि कश्चित्क्षणमपि जातु तिष्ठत्यकर्मकृत् । कार्यते ह्यवशः कर्म सर्वः प्रकृतिजैर्गुणैः ॥ ३-५ ॥

na hi kaścitkṣaṇamapi jātu tiṣṭhatyakarmakṛt | kāryate hyavaśaḥ karma sarvaḥ prakṛtijairguṇaiḥ || 3-5 ||

na: not; hi: certainly; kaścit: any; kṣaṇam: one moment; api: also; jātu: at any time; tiṣṭhati: remains; akarma: non-action; kṛit: doing; kāryate: he does; hi: certainly; avaśaḥ: helpless; karma: action; sarvaḥ: all; prakṛiti: of nature; jaiḥ: created; guṇaiḥ: by the gunas (qualities).

"Never, at any time, can (a person) remain without acting even for one moment, because (s/he) is forced to into action by all the gunas (tendencies) born from prakṛiti (nature)."

Krishna continues to explain why action is superior to mere theoretical knowledge: here he states the simple fact that nobody can abstain from action even for one moment, so there can be action without knowledge, but never knowledge without action. It is important to understand the meaning of the definition of karma, action. It does not merely refer to ritualistic performances or activities intended to obtain some gain, but it also applies to the different types of sacrifice (Gita 4.23-33) and even to the transcendental actions in divine devotional service to the Supreme.

Guna means “quality” as well as “tendency” and prakriti is “nature” or “energy”. The three gunas are sattva (goodness), rajas (passion) and tamas (ignorance), but the word can be applied to spiritual qualities as well, both referred to the Lord and to the individual soul. Similarly, “nature” can be considered apara (material) or para (spiritual) depending on the level of consciousness it manifests. This means that action is a fundamental characteristic of quality and nature, both at the material and at the spiritual levels. At the spiritual level, both the individual souls and the different manifestations or personalities of Godhead are characterized by particular qualities that create opportunities for loving exchanges and service. In both cases, such particular characteristics are manifested or created by prakriti or shakti. However, in the case of the personality of Godhead and the relationship with the devotee, Prakriti or Shakti acts in the spiritual or transcendental capacity of Yoga Maya, while in the case of the individual soul acting on the material level with the purpose to enjoy his senses and exploit matter, Prakriti or Shakti acts in the material or delusional capacity of Maha Maya. In both cases, the individual soul is helpless (avasah), because it can only engage in action under the control of Prakriti or Shakti.

कर्मैन्द्रियाणि संयम्य य आस्ते मनसा स्मरन् । इन्द्रियार्थान्विमूढात्मा मिथ्याचारः स उच्यते ॥ ३-६ ॥

karmendriyāṇi saṁyamya ya āste manasā smaran | indriyārthānvimūḍhātmā mithyācārah sa ucyate || 3-6 ||

karma: action; indriyani: senses; saṁyamya: by controlling; yah: s/he; aste: remains; manasa: by the mind; smaran: remembering; indriya: senses; arthan: objects/ purposes; vimudha: foolish; atma: self; mithya: false; acarah: who has a behavior; sah: s/he; ucyate: is said.

"One who controls the senses of action but continues to remain attached to the memory of the sense objects, is called a fool and a hypocrite."

Why such a person is a fool and a liar? Because he thinks about himself as the enjoyer, and that out of his great renunciation he is abstaining from enjoying what is supposed to be his rightful pleasure. It is not sufficient to abstain from engaging our action senses in pleasure: we must realize that we are not the rightful enjoyers. It is not sufficient to decide not to enjoy women: we must come to the platform of seeing women as spirit souls and servants of the Lord.

The word smaran does not indicate simply remembering, but also thinking. It is a thinking pattern. A man who is thinking of women as bodies, as objects of enjoyment (even if unfavorably, with scorn, hate or cruelty) will naturally take a new birth as a woman in the material world. It is inevitable, even for those who delude themselves into thinking that they are on the level of "transcendental realization" due to so-called exclusive pure bhakti or to a political position in some religious organization.

This verse continues the logical thread from the previous ones: action is superior to mere theoretical knowledge because everybody must act. Abstaining from action in the name of renunciation or knowledge is not only foolish: it is downright impossible. Some people believe that simply accepting the order of sannyasa or any other religious dress, one can automatically become qualified and transcendental, but this is a dangerous delusion. "Fake it till you make it" is a sure recipe for disaster, because it is based on a cheating adharmic logic, that Krishna calls stupid. By "faking it" long enough, the only result you attain is to fool yourself into the delusional belief that you have actually "made it". If you only listen to people who agree with you, and accuse everybody else of being offensive and an enemy of God, your delusion can only become more and more serious.

Vimudhatma is literally "a very stupid person" (mudha means "stupid"), who can even fool himself into rationalizing the "legitimacy" of his attachments and desires into some type of excuse or pretext.

Mithyachara is one who "acts falsely", indulging in sensual pleasures under some pretext or excuse, while externally condemning sense gratification. Usually the more ardently and viciously he rants against such pleasures, the more secretly attached he is. As we can see, Krishna is not trimming words or making the pill any sweeter. It is said, satyam bruyat priyam bruyat, "one should tell the truth in a palatable manner", but obviously there are some limits to the application of a delicately courteous approach. It is never an offense to call spade a spade. People may become upset because they are attached to a particular identification or perception of themselves and their actions, but ultimately all illusions must come to an end - the sooner, the better. Especially when an illusion is very dangerous, and failing to realize and solve the problem can cost us dearly, as in the famous example of a man who is sleeping in a house that is on fire. In such a case, there is not sufficient time to embellish the facts or to take a slow and soft approach.

We should actually be grateful when a person points out a real and serious problem for us, as it is usually easier to see things from the outside, because there is no self-identification. Of course, there is also the possibility that our critic is the one who is under some measure of illusion or delusion and is just projecting his or her own prejudice or mentality, so the final decision about our life and choices lies in the hands of each and every one of us. Nobody can be held responsible for the actions of another individual.

The karma indriya are the "senses of action" or the sense organs – tongue, eyes, nose, ears, and skin – that seek the contact with the sense objects in order to experience pleasure. It is important to understand that the indriya arthan, or sense objects, are not responsible for one's attachments or desires, as sometimes people believe. The actions that constitute our prescribed duties are performed through one's senses, mind and body, so when we are planning to perform our duties, including the ritualistic ceremonies, we need to manage our senses and engage them properly. This automatically produces a certain amount of pleasure or suffering, according to the circumstances we are facing. As we have seen in the previous chapter, we should continue to act in our prescribed duties in both cases, not allowing the pleasures or sufferings to distract our attention.

Another important observation is that according to this verse, the simple memory of the sense object is sufficient to confuse the consciousness, even if there is no expression of lust for possession and enjoyment even on the subtle level in the thought process. Such memory is a problem even when the sense object is remembered in a negative feeling - loathing, hatred, repulsion, etc. There is a famous story about two sannyasis who were traveling together; on the way they met a young lady who needed to cross a river in spite to get back home, but was unable to negotiate the strong current. The younger sannyasi kindly helped her through, actually carrying her, to the scandalized surprise of the other. The young lady took leave from the two sadhus and they proceeded on their own way. After a few hours of walking silently and brooding over his unexpressed thoughts, the elder sannyasi finally blurted out his criticism against his companion, accusing him of having violated the sannyasa rules according to which they were not supposed to associate with women. "My dear brother," replied the younger sannyasi, "I have carried that woman briefly and for the compassionate purpose of helping her get back home safely, but you have been carrying her all these hours, and with no honorable purpose."

यस्त्विन्द्रियाणि मनसा नियम्यारभतेऽर्जुन । कर्मेन्द्रियैः कर्मयोगमसक्तः स विशिष्यते ॥ ३-७ ॥

yastvindriyāṇi manasā niyamārabhate'arjuna । karmendriyaiḥ karmayogamasaktah sa viśiṣyate ॥ 3-7 ॥

yab: s/he; tu: but; indriyani: the senses; manasa: by the mind; niyamya: regulating through (yama and) niyama; arambhate: begins (the action); arjuna: o Arjuna; karma: action; indriyaiḥ: senses; karma-yogam; the yoga of action; asaktah: detached; sa: s/he; viśiṣyate: is much better.

"But one who regulates the senses through the mind, engaging the senses of action through karma yoga without attachment, is much better, o Arjuna."

Another nail in the coffin of the theory that theoretical knowledge is superior to, and not compatible with, action: here Krishna squarely condemns the fake sannyasis and states that a person who lives honestly and unassumingly in family and society but performs the prescribed duties without attachment for his/her own sense gratification, is much better positioned.

An important factor in the process is the sense of responsibility, to which every individual should be trained from childhood itself. Taking sannyasa or any other type of religious order or dress is not a free ticket out of a difficult material situation that we have created by making wrong choices. We can't use it to bail out from some situation we are unable to make work, to avoid paying the required maintenance to one's wife and children, to escape from creditors, to be pardoned by the judiciary system or to dodge some other basic responsibility. It is also unhealthy to take sannyasa out of sheer frustration towards material life, because "the grapes were too sour anyway". If one takes the vows of renunciation for this reason, it is very likely that he will fall down or at least suffer a lot when the first real opportunity for sense gratification naturally presents itself, and he risks making fools of himself by ultimately renounce renunciation and become a vantasi, one who "eats his own vomit".

In fact, it is said that in Kali yuga the acceptance of sannyasa is not recommended if not directly forbidden: asvamedham gavalambham sannyasam pala paitrakam, devarena sutotpattim kalau panca vivarjayet, "In this age of Kali, five acts are forbidden: the offering of a horse in sacrifice, the offering of a cow in sacrifice, the acceptance of the order of sannyasa, the offering of oblations of flesh to the forefathers, and a man's begetting children in his brother's wife." This verse is quoted from Brahma vaivarta Purana.

The problem with the false renunciate is that he cannot conceive action without attachment or relationship without lust and exploitation, because he has a material vision and considers himself the actual purusha (enjoyer) of the action. By simply abstaining from what he values as pleasures through the temporary performance of penance, the false renunciate imagines himself to be the supreme Lord in his perfection of renunciation, and thus he falls victim to the last snare of illusion.

The sense gratification the sannyasi formally renounces revolves around sex, the greatest energy and pleasure in the material world. Sexual attraction and attachment are a natural instinct found in all living beings, and in civilized human society this instinct is regulated by rules and prescriptions, samskaras and duties, involving both the family and society to earn a proper livelihood. Obviously all these responsibilities are a burden, but they are required to maintain the proper selfless consciousness in all the members of the family and society at large, so that the life of each human being can be progressive. A lazy bum who chooses to artificially accept the order of sannyasa in order to escape such responsibilities is actually making a very serious mistake, because the enjoyment propensity does not disappear automatically just because we want it to. Rather, it either becomes secretive and leads to illicit and hypocritical sexual relationships or casual encounters, it creates a distorted psychotic need for sadistic or masochistic practices (usually passed off as "austerities") or it turns into the subtle sex forms of name, fame, power, adoration, prestige, profit and position, usually dragging the sannyasi into politics of various types and transforming a Godman or a Godbrother into a mafia-style Godfather. Sadhus in the renounced order of life (belonging to any religious or spiritual tradition) should be real saints, persons who have attained the platform of brahma bhuta, and whose association is the most valuable, blessed and pure treasure any human being can find in this world. Such persons do not see other people as males or females, but simply as spirit souls, parts and parcels of the Supreme and spiritual servants of the only true Purusha, the Personality of Godhead. These great souls are perfectly satisfied in themselves and do not need, expect or ask anything for themselves; they need no sense gratification because they are already situated in the unlimited happiness of Self realization.

नियतं कुरु कर्म त्वं कर्म ज्यायो ह्यकर्मणः । शरीरयात्रापि च ते न प्रसिद्ध्येदकर्मणः ॥ ३-८ ॥

niyataṁ kuru karma tvaṁ karma jyāyo hyakarmaṇaḥ । śarīrayātrāpi ca te na prasiddhyedakarmaṇaḥ ॥ 3-8 ॥

niyatam: prescribed; kuru: do; karma: action; tvam: you; karma: work/ duty; jyāya: better; hi: certainly; akarmaṇaḥ: than not working; śarīra: the body; yatra: maintenance; api: even; ca: and; te: your; na: not; prasiddhyet: for the perfection; akarmaṇaḥ: without action/ work.

"You (should) perform the dutiful actions, because action is better than non-action. Without performing one's duties, it is even impossible to maintain the body, that is the vehicle (of the Self)."

Krishna states very clearly, here and in many other passages of Gita, including its conclusion (18.5) that prescribed actions should never be stopped or given up. What is prescribed action? It is a dharmic activity that is supported by proper knowledge and that supports the universe, performed selflessly and in a spirit of loving service to the Supreme. Incidentally, according to Krishna, this selfless action is the real symptom of a true sannyasi (6.1). The entire 5th chapter of Gita will be dedicated to the discussion on sannyasa or renunciation. In this verse Krishna exposes and shames the false spiritualists and religionists who would try to make us believe that they are free from all obligations simply because they refuse to get a job and honestly earn their livelihood, and by being "free" they automatically get the right to be maintained by others. However, this is not an automatic right. There is no such thing as a free meal in this material world, and everybody needs to earn their maintenance by making themselves useful to the social body in some way or other.

Like wild and stray animals, beggars receive leftovers or rely on what Mother Nature sends on their way in the form of forest fruits they pick directly from spontaneous trees that are not cultivated by anyone. Any other food is the product of the work of someone - and by taking it without reciprocating in some way constitutes a theft. In fact, even a tapasvi who lives only on wild fruits and leaves should thank Mother Earth and the Devas for such gifts, and offer some prayers and gratefulness in return. A responsible human being understands that he has many debts to repay - to the Devas that provide the basic facilities of life like fire, water, etc, to his parents and ancestors that created a safe and loving environment to take care of him/ her in childhood, to human society and the good administrators of society that protect him/ her from aggressions and dangers and afford him/ her to work and live in prosperity, to the ancient sages that compiled collections of knowledge s/he can benefit from, etc. We even become indebted to animals, because we inevitably harm or kill some of them in the course of our daily activities for our maintenance, through ordinary agricultural work, cooking, grinding grains into flour, cleaning house, starting a fire, taking water from a well or pond, cutting wood etc. Repaying such debts is not difficult: one simply needs to protect the gifts we have received and do his/her part to contribute to the prosperity and progress of society. This also entitles him/ her to a decent maintenance in accordance to his/ her particular needs, as it is also confirmed by Sri Isopanishad (1.1).

The celebration of yajnas perfectly responds to this requirement, because during such ceremonies the performer distributes food and gifts to everyone, as well as offering the opportunity for spiritual progress to all the participants through the worship to the Personality of Godhead and the recitation of the shastra. It is also important to notice that the food and other resources engaged in this sacrifice must be earned legitimately through one's occupational duties. If someone offers worship or sacrifice by using stolen wealth (flowers, food etc) or by creating problems to others (obstructing a passageway, etc), such worship will become totally useless. It is better to offer even one grain of rice, or an ordinary leaf freely available to the public, rather than trying to make a grand offering to God with stolen or ill-acquired goods.

In this verse Krishna also recognizes the true and great importance of the body as the vehicle of the Self. Mistreating the body is not a genuine practice of austerity. Several groups that developed since the beginning of Kali yuga believe and preach that this body should be "punished", "mortified", or even given up as a bad thing. On the opposite side, there are those who strongly identify with the body and believe that a healthy, strong and fit body is the symptom of a healthy mind and an evolved soul, and that a person who has a body that is below their standard ideal cannot be spiritually advanced or mentally healthy. Of course both groups are totally off the mark. The body is a valuable vehicle - a wonderful vehicle - but just a vehicle nonetheless.

यज्ञार्थात्कर्मणोऽन्यत्र लोकोऽयं कर्मबन्धनः । तदर्थं कर्म कौन्तेय मुक्तसङ्गः समाचर ॥ ३-९ ॥

yajñārthātkarmaṇo'nyatra loko'yaṁ karmabandhanaḥ । tadarthaṁ karma kaunteya muktasaṅgaḥ samācara ॥ 3-9 ॥

yajña: sacrifice; artha: for the purpose; karmaṇaḥ: actions/ duties; anyatra: otherwise; lokaḥ: world/ society; ayaṁ: this; karma: action; bandhanaḥ: bondage; tad: that; arthaṁ: purpose; karma: action; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); mukta: liberated; saṅgaḥ: from association/ affiliation; samācara: perform.

"Actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage (and further) actions. Therefore, o son of Kunti, you should perform your activities for that (purpose of sacrifice), remaining free from (material) association."

In this famous verse, Krishna introduces another important concept: yajna, or "sacrifice". This definition is normally used to refer to the traditional ritualistic ceremonies, and particularly to the fire sacrifice, also called homa. "Sacrifice" literally means "making sacred". By offering something to the Divine or to a higher purpose, we make it sacred and we purify it from any fault, transforming it into a beneficial factor of progress at both individual and collective levels. As we will see later in the text, there are many layers of meaning in the concept of sacrifice and Krishna will elaborate on several of them. Keeping in mind the previous explanations offered by Krishna on selfless action as Buddhi Yoga and Karma Yoga, we should add that knowledge to the concept of sacrifice, too. Yajna is also a name of Vishnu as the personification of Sacred Action. As Vishnu or Narayana is the transcendental One from whom every other reality emanates, worship to Vishnu is required in all religious ceremonies and auspicious activities, even for those who are attracted to a different Personality of Godhead as their ista deva. It is important to understand that the nature of Vishnu is totally transcendental to the material concept of duality; he is not in competition or even separated from any other Personality of Godhead.

Mukta sanga literally means "free from association" or also "in the association of the liberated", where mukta, "liberated", applies to everything that is not identified or attached to the material platform. Sanga refers to the position of one's body (anga) in relationship with other bodies/ persons, activities or environments, but even more so to being part (anga) of something, as in "affiliation" or "membership" of a group, an organization or an institution, community, lineage or tradition. All such denominations (upadhi) must be "liberated" (i.e. free from material identification, duality, or sectarianism) otherwise one must become "liberated" from them. Another translation of the verse gives loka the singular meaning of "one individual"; therefore ayam ("this") becomes applied to the person who was described in the previous verses as one who refuses to work in the name of fake renunciation but, compelled by nature, is forced to act. Such action is under the influence of ignorance, therefore this individual becomes bound by actions because he does not offer his actions to the Supreme, Vishnu, here indicated by the name Yajna. Here is the consequent rendition of the verse: "This person becomes bound by actions that are not meant to (worship/ serve) Yajna. O son of Kunti, engage in work without attachment, to attain him (Yajna)."

सहयज्ञाः प्रजाः सृष्ट्वा पुरोवाच प्रजापतिः । अनेन प्रसविष्यध्वमेष वोऽस्त्विष्टकामधुक् ॥ ३-१० ॥

sahayajñāḥ prajāḥ sṛṣṭvā purovāca prajāpatiḥ । anena prasaviṣyadhvamēṣa vo'stviṣṭakāmadhuk ॥ 3-10 ॥

saha: together with; yajnah: sacrifice/ sacred action; prajah: generations; sṛṣṭva: creating; pura: in ancient times; uvaca: said; prajāpatiḥ: the Lord of creatures; anena: by this; prasaviṣyadhvam: grow and prosper; esha: this; vah: your (plural); astu: let it be; ishṭa: desired; kama: pleasure; dhuk: giver.

"The Prajapati originally manifested the prajas (creatures) together with the yajna (the sacred action), and said, 'By these (sacred actions) you will become more and more prosperous; these (sacred actions) will supply you with whatever you desire.'"

Prajapati means "the lord/ protector of the creatures" and usually refers to Brahma, who manifests this particular universe and the bodies for all living entities taking birth in it, but can also be applied to all the other great personalities who generate creatures or become their protectors. Of course it refers to Vishnu, too, who is the root cause of creation and manifests again and again in this world to offer his valuable instructions to the human beings. Praja means "one who has been generated"; by the simple fact of being born, all living entities become part of the "family" of the pati or "protector" of a particular ṣṣhetra or land. It is interesting to see that here the creator offers the gift of yajna to all the prajas as his descendants. Some people afflicted by casteist prejudice try to make us believe that they are the only progeny of Brahma and the great personalities such as Manu, Kardama etc, and they have "their blood in their veins". This is quite funny, because according to the scriptures' version all human beings and even the non-human beings descend directly from Brahma as his children through the generations from his various sons. But then again, these casteist people do not care much for what is actually written in the shastra, as they believe that their own blood is the highest authority and entitles them to believe and teach whatever they want.

The word prasava has the meaning of "growing, prospering" and includes the idea of multiplication, because in the beginning of creation the first generations had a lot of resources they could utilize and space to expand. The material world is created precisely for the purpose of accommodating the jivatmas who need to evolve through the various levels of life and ultimately qualify for liberation. So the idea "go forth and multiply" is not a wrong concept in itself - it's only when such multiplying generations breed and spread destructively, without a dharmic conscience, that they become a burden on Mother Earth. It is said that our planet could easily carry more than seven billion peaceful vegetarians in a sustainable development lifestyle, recycling resources and utilizing renewable energy; on the other hand even smaller numbers of war-mongering exploiters who have no respect for nature soon become a cancer that creates immense sufferings for themselves, for others and for Mother Earth. As we have already mentioned, the civilized and comfortable path of progress described in the Vedic scriptures and tradition starts from *dharm*a then develops through dharmic artha to dharmic kama and then to moksha.

The expression kama dhuk implies that kama or sense gratification is a legitimate benefit – one of the four above mentioned arthas of human life and a divine blessing as well. However, later on (3.37) Gita also describes kama (together with krōdha) as the greatest enemy: how to reconcile these two apparently opposite meanings? The answer is given by Gita (7.11): the kama that is not contrary to *dharm*a, to the principles of religion (that support society and the cosmic order), and is received as prasada or gift from God is not only perfectly acceptable but divine in nature, while the kama that is deliberately and systematically pursued on the behest of ahankara and mamatva is the door to a hellish existence. We can see the example of the Kamadhenu, Mother Cow who is supplying all necessities as per our desires and taste: we can enjoy the healthy pleasures of cow's milk as long as we accept it as a gift in a moderate amount, without trying to impose our artificial domination and selfish profit at the cost of the sufferings of innocent creatures.

देवान्भावयतानेन ते देवा भावयन्तु वः । परस्परं भावयन्तः श्रेयः परमवाप्स्यथ ॥ ३-११ ॥

devānbhāvayatānena te devā bhāvayantu vaḥ । parasparam bhāvayantaḥ śreyah paramavāpsyatha ॥ 3-11 ॥

devan: the devas; bhāvayata: having been fed/ pleased; anena: by this; te: your; deva: the Devas; bhāvayantu: will feed/ please; vaḥ: you (plural); parasparam: each other; bhāvayantaḥ: will become nourished/ pleased; śreyah: ultimate benefit; param: supreme; avāpsyatha: will obtain.

"The Devas will be pleased/ fed by you through these (sacred actions), and they (the Devas) will bless/ feed you (in return); in this way both sides will reciprocate in a positive way and you all will attain the highest benefit."

The particular process mentioned in this verse is reflected precisely by the ritual of fire sacrifice still performed in present days by brahmanas. A sacred fire is kindled in a sanctified place (altar) with pure firewood and clarified butter, then it is worshiped as the personification of Agni, who carries the offerings to the various personalities of Godhead. Then all such personalities are called, one after the other, and to each one of them the oblation of clarified butter and food grains is poured with the appropriate mantras. In this way, the performer of the sacrifice becomes directly acquainted, and develops a personal relationship, with the Devas or higher entities that manage the universe. If you are thrilled at the idea of having the President of your nation for lunch, just imagine how wonderful it is to offer lunch to the President of the universe and all his staff. This creates a personal bond between the performer of the sacrifice and the Devas, as the gift of food is the most basic and intimate exchange, on which all personal relationships are built, beginning from the mother-child bond. The fire sacrifice is an authentic method to offer food to the Devas through the intermediary of Agni, the fire energy, who delivers the offerings to each one of them. This tradition has been present in many cultures since the very beginning of time - as confirmed in this verse - and it is still valid today just like many thousands of years ago. The word devas mentioned in this verse refers to all the higher personalities who represent the supreme Personality of Godhead in the administration of the universe, and certainly includes Vishnu himself because we know that the fire sacrifice is not complete without the offerings (ahuti) poured directly to Vishnu.

Some commentators translate deva with the word "demigod", introduced by the Macaulayan education imposed on Indians with the purpose of demeaning the Hindu tradition and the Vedic knowledge as opposed to the "true religion" of Christianity that worshiped the "only real God" with a capital G. In the definition of the western academia a demigod (деми meaning "half" in French) was actually a half-god, or the product of the sexual union of a god (with a small "g") with a mortal, like the great heroes of the sacred stories of ancient Greece (such as Heracles, or Achilles etc) and even the "giants" mentioned in the Bible as the progeny of the "sons of God" and the "daughters of men". According to this understanding, the "demigods" in Vedic tradition would be somebody like the Pandavas - sons of Kunti conceived with divine personalities such as Surya, Yama, Vayu, Indra and the Asvini kumaras. Now we see that no oblations are offered in the fire sacrifice for the Pandavas, so we can rest assured that the Devas mentioned in this and the following verses are not "demigods". Rather, the Devas worshiped in the yajna are Vishnu first and foremost, then his manifestation in this material world known as Shiva Mahadeva, Vishnu's guna avatara Brahma (the creator of this particular universe), Surya (also known as Surya Narayana), and the various archetypal personifications of the powers in the universe - from Agni (Fire) to Bhumi (Mother Earth) to Vayu, Indra, etc, all intimate associates of the transcendental Lord Vishnu. And certainly not "demigods". Rather, the scriptures describe them as "limbs" or "arms" of the Personality of Godhead: bahavo loka-palanam (Bhagavata Purana 1.11.26), indrayo bahava abur usrah (Bhagavata Purana 2.1.29)

We should be extremely careful not to disrespect any of such great personalities of Godhead, because it would be a terrible mistake - such offense would break the positive and constructive cooperation that brings all blessings on human society, the basic necessities for human life and progress, and ultimately the purification of all activities and the consciousness of all the participants towards the supreme goal of liberation, the real ultimate benefit - śreyah.

इष्टान्भोगान् हि वो देवा दास्यन्ते यज्ञभाविताः । तैर्दत्तानप्रदायैभ्यो यो भुङ्क्ते स्तेन एव सः ॥ ३-१२ ॥

iṣṭānbhogān hi vo devā dāsyante yajñabhāvitāḥ । tairdattānapradāyāibhyo yo bhukṣte stena eva saḥ ॥ 3-12 ॥

iṣtan: desired; bhogan: pleasures/ necessities; hi: certainly; vo: for you all; devaḥ: the Devas; dāsyante: will give; yajna: by the sacrifice; bhavitāḥ: pleased/ nourished; taiḥ: by them; dattan: given; apradaya: without giving; ebhyah: to these; yah: he who; bhukṣte: enjoys/ eats; stenaḥ: thief; eva: certainly; saḥ: he.

"Satisfied by yajna (sacred action), the Devas will give you whatever pleasures you desire. One who eats what is given by them without offering anything in return is just a thief."

Without the blessings of the Personalities of Godhead, we would not be able to achieve success in our enterprises or even obtain the basic necessities in life. Even if we put in a lot of hard work, we would never be able to create food without depending on the archetypal energies of the universe - like the sun, earth, rain, fire, and so on. Recognizing this debt towards these powers in the universe is the first step towards sanity, because a human being who understands this basic fact and is grateful and respectful towards the powers of nature will work constructively rather than destructively as we have seen from the results of the non-sustainable model, born from the abrahamic misconception of nature as a lowly and sinful thing to be exploited and dominated like a slave that is considered just as a property, devoid of any personal rights.

Of course sometimes we hear or see people from such abrahamic beliefs appreciating nature as the creation of God and wishing to preserve it instead of sacrificing its resources to the greed of consumerism and corporate profit, but still their purpose is to enjoy nature, not to worship and serve it respectfully and gratefully. Non-abrahamic cultures, especially those who remained more closely connected to the original respect for nature, often remain(ed) very perplexed when faced with the disrespectful and exploitative mentality of the "colonizers": how can someone possess land or water to the point of claiming the right to destroy and kill them? These native cultures are most environment-friendly, often matriarchal, sometimes with open marriages, and affording full freedom and respect to all their members along the line of natural ethics and behaviors, by which everyone is intrinsically entitled to take whatever they need but not more than that. Even their relationships with animals and plants are based with a deep respect that does not interfere with the natural needs of the human beings such as eating vegetable or animal foods. In the Vedic tradition, these peoples are known as vanavasis, "forest dwellers".

Vedic culture is more urbanized and relies on a more complex and regulated system, where the ethical norms are more demanding because of a greater amount of responsibilities for each member of society. In a sense, we could say that while the vanavasis live happily like children who are cared for and protected by Mother Nature, the members of Vedic society are more like dutiful adult sons who take charge of caring for, nurturing and protecting Mother Nature according to the specific orders they have been given, in close cooperation with the higher managerial staff of the universe - the Devas.

Small children feel love and respect for Mother, but adult sons develop a deeper understanding, they are grateful and eager to reciprocate and help. They feel it is wrong to just accept the bountiful gifts of nature without offering anything in return. If Hindus were able and willing to actually put such wonderful knowledge and ideals into practice, they would be the greatest asset for the planet. Unfortunately, for the great majority of Hindus, it's all about theory and nothing about practice. In this verse the word bhogan refers to the healthy pleasure that fulfills a real need - such as food.

This same definition is normally used for the food offerings presented to the Deities in the temple.

यज्ञशिष्टाशिनः सन्तो मुच्यन्ते सर्वकिल्बिषैः । भुञ्जते ते त्वघं पापा ये पचन्त्यात्मकारणात् ॥ ३-१३ ॥

yajñaśiṣṭāśinaḥ santo mucyante sarvakilbiṣaiḥ । bhuñjate te tvaghaṁ pāpā ye pacantyātma-kāraṇāt ॥ 3-13 ॥

yajna: sacrifice; śiṣṭa: leftovers; asinaḥ: who eat; santaḥ: good people/ by being; mucyante: become liberated; sarva: from all; kilbiṣaiḥ: contamination/ sin; bhuñjate: enjoy/ eat; te: they; tu: but; aghaṁ: sin/ guilt; pāpā: sinful people/ criminals; ye: those; pacanty: cook; ātma-kāraṇāt: for themselves.

"The good people who subsist on the leftovers from the sacrifice/ sacred action are liberated from all consequences, while those who cook for selfish purposes are eating/ enjoying sinful (substances)."

Yajna śiṣṭa defines the leftovers or byproducts of yajna, the sacred action. On one level, they are the food grains and the other foodstuff that remain at the end of a ritual worship, that always includes a bhoga offering consisting of fruits and even cooked preparations, such as the spiceless boiled rice haviṣyanna ("the grains for the havi" or fire sacrifice), sweet rice and milk pudding, and so on. At another level, they are the rightful share of maintenance that we can accept after performing our social duty – the sudra is entitled to full maintenance from his employer/ master, the vaṣya is entitled to enjoying a part of the wealth he produces, the kṣatriya is entitled to the facilities required to perform his work (both at the muscular/ physical level and at the mental and social levels), the brahmana is entitled to a share or dakṣhina in the celebration of religious rituals and activities and as a gesture of gratitude from the students. On yet another level, the appropriate food that we take to sustain our body and mind in our progressive life aimed at Self realization is considered yajna śiṣṭa, as such pursuit is also considered yajna or sacred action.

The dharmic diet is vegetarian – a means of livelihood that causes the least amount of unnecessary sufferings and complications, and even more important, it perfectly fulfills our nutritional requirements. Chandogya Upanishad (7.26.2) states: ahara suddhau sattva suddhib, sattva suddhau dhrūva smṛitib, smṛiti lambhe sarva grantihinam vipramokṣah, "By eating pure food, the mind becomes pure. When the mind is pure, one develops a good understanding. When understanding and memory are strong, all the knots of the heart become dissolved." However, plants, too, are living entities and killing them also entails a karmic consequence that we should not take lightly. We are entitled to our adequate share of maintenance but only as long as we work sincerely for the benefit of the entire universe, as long as we do not simply live for our own sake and to enjoy sense gratification. Again, it is important to understand that this verse does not condemn the natural need for wholesome and pleasurable supplies to the proper maintenance of our body and mind. Sometimes people come to believe that sense gratification is the greatest enemy, and therefore suffering or deprivation must be good things in themselves, so they should be pursued for the sake of one's spiritual progress. This idea is generally connected to the idea of austerity or tapasya, and often extends to other painful or self-damaging or generally repulsive practices that are believed to earn merits and blessings to those who follow them, sometimes in blind imitation of famous ascetics of the past.

The proper understanding of the issue requires the consideration of some important factors. First of all, the focus of the Vedic system, and especially of the Gita, is not about condemning sense gratification but about becoming self-controlled so that we will not become distracted from our proper performance of duties by the pleasure caused by sense gratification or by the sorrow caused by its absence. Secondly, the search for sense gratification is a natural instinct in all living entities, and it is aimed at the survival of the individual and the collectivity. At the human level, the living entity learns to find pleasure and happiness not only at the physical and mental levels (as plants and animals are able to do) but at the spiritual level as well, so the focus should shift to a progressive direction, and the individual should become able to renounce some sense gratification in order to achieve a greater purpose. Another very important point is the "demonstration mission".

Sometimes, unevolved people have difficulties in believing that there can be something beyond immediate sense gratification, so it might be necessary to shock them out of that complacency by offering an example of extreme renunciation, as in the case of the Aghoris, a particular group of ascetics. However, these practices are only intended as a wake up call for the sleeping souls, and not as the very purpose of spiritual life. Insisting on extreme and shocking renunciation in the practice of austerities is actually condemned by Gita (17.14-19). Particularly, verse 19 declares that penance performed through self-torture belongs to ignorance and does not bring good results in the long run. From the stories told in the Vedic literature we find that such extreme penances are characteristic of asuras who are determined to acquire a greater material power, usually to dominate and oppress others, or even to fight against God and dharmā. While it is a fact that such practices can help the individual develop their personal charisma and power in this world, out of a sort of "bank balancing" of karma, they are not recommended for those who want to progress spiritually or even obtain a long lasting material benefit. Asuras are usually slain by an incarnation of God after a relatively short career. Ideologies based on asuric ideals have made a cult out of suffering and torture - both self-torture and inflicting pain on others. We should be very careful not to fall into this misconception.

अन्नाद्भवन्ति भूतानि पर्जन्यादन्नसम्भवः ।

यज्ञाद्भवति पर्जन्यो यज्ञः कर्मसमुद्भवः ॥ ३-१४ ॥

annādbhavanti bhūtāni parjanyaḍannasambhavaḥ | yajñādbhavati parjanya yajñah karmasamudbhavaḥ || 3-14 ||

annat: from the food/ grains; bhavanti: come to existence; bhūtani: all living entities/ types of life; parjanyat: from the rains; anna-sambhavaḥ: all the foods; yajnat: from the sacrifice; bhavati: comes to existence; parjanya: rain; yajnat: from sacrifice; karma: from action/ work; samudbhavaḥ: born.

"(All) creatures come to being thanks to (food) grains, and (food) grains come into being thanks to rain. Rain comes thanks to the performance of sacrifice, and sacrifice comes to being through work."

This verse carries much more meaning than it would seem at first sight. Everybody can see that all living entities subsist on food, and cannot even start to develop their new bodies without food, from the very beginning of their existence. This applies not only to human beings but to all animals and even to plants - each seed being naturally equipped with a sufficient supply of nutrients that will enable it to sprout and grow until it can get its food from the external world. Anna is often translated as "food grains" or "rice" but it is a general term that we can apply to all substantial vegetarian foods. Actually even non-vegetarian foods derive from plant foods, because meat is the flesh of an animal that grew up and lived on such vegetable nutrients. The next fundamental ingredient for life is rain, or water. Plant food can be grown only with the help of rains - we see that in desert regions, where rainfall is very scarce, growing food is extremely difficult. Again, even water extracted from deep wells in places where it hardly even rains, ultimately ended up there in the aquifer because it was collected from the rains that blessed other regions.

The next link of the chain of life - rains coming from sacrifice - may be a little less evident than the previous two (food and water), but it is nonetheless true and important, as all ancient cultures believed. Still in the collective subconscious western cultures carry the idea of the King who is the consort of Earth and makes it prosper by his self-sacrifice, causing adequate rains and timely good weather so that abundant food can be produced for all. The Vedic approach to this concept is more complex and even more glorious, as each and every civilized human being becomes, through the performance of his sacred professional duty, a working link in the chain of life that supports the entire universe, in close cooperation with his colleagues and superiors, the Devas that work in the highest jobs of universal administration and maintenance.

In this verse, the last causal link of the mechanism that sustains life consists in the close connection between yajna and karma, sacrifice and work according to one's social duties. Karma, or prescribed action, is not limited to mere ritualistic ceremonies, but must include the performance of one's occupational duties within society as described for the various varnas. Celebrating a homa - no matter how grandiose or complicated - with resources stolen from others, obtained without working adequately, or gathered through other illicit means, can never be considered a true sacrifice or yajna, and it will not have the desired results. The Devas will not even accept the offerings: they are not bound to.

The Smṛiti explains that the oblations poured into the fire and accepted by the Devas reach the sun and sustain its work in evaporating the clouds and causing them to fall down again on the land as rain. It may seem childish to think that our small fire can give energy to the sun, but yet again, it is the sentiment that counts, and we are indeed like small children compared to God. When a small child offers some food to his mother or father, nobody will think that such small offering is required to sustain the parents' life and livelihood; it is rather the other way around, as by definition, the child is fed and sustained by the parents, who take care of his needs. But when a parent accepts such loving gift, there is an inspiration and a bonding created in the parents' minds that go much beyond the actual nutritional value of the food offered. Exclusive devotees of a particular Personality of Godhead - usually devotees of Vishnu or Krishna - sometimes have problems in accepting the idea of offering something to the Devas, because they feel that all their energy should be focused on Vishnu or Krishna only, and that by seeking such exclusive relationship they will not need to care about anything anybody else, including the Devas. Such an idea is valid in principle, as Vishnu is the original source of all other Personalities of Godhead that manifest in this world, and therefore a devotee situated on the transcendental platform does not need to concern himself about anything else. He knows that Vishnu - or Krishna, the most intimate form among the many forms of Vishnu - will take care of him under all aspects. However, we need to warn superficial people against trying to apply this principle with the wrong motivations and without having actually attained the transcendental level, because the effects will be disastrous. Piloting a high-speed airplane is all good and wonderful if you are actually able and qualified to do that, if you do it for the proper purpose (as a useful job that benefits the community) and if you do it in the air - totally detached from the earth. If you try to drive an airplane around the city streets at high speed for the purpose of feeling superior to others (who can merely drive a car) or to impress others, but without being able or willing to let go of the earthly surface and its comforts, you become a serious danger to yourself and to society.

A pure exclusive devotee of Krishna, who refuses to care about the Devas or anybody else, should not try to take anything from the Devas or from anybody else. He should just wait until Krishna sends him food unsolicited. If he claims that only Krishna exists for him, let him show that nice theory in practice and retire from all other engagements in the acquisition of material power and exploitation of the resources that are supplied by the Devas and other people. Otherwise, he remains a vulgar thief, even if he is claiming he is "stealing for Krishna", because Krishna's instructions are very different, as we can see from this verse.

कर्म ब्रह्मोद्भवं विद्धि ब्रह्माक्षरसमुद्भवम् ।

तस्मात्सर्वगतं ब्रह्म नित्यं यज्ञे प्रतिष्ठितम् ॥ ३-१५ ॥

karma brahmodbhavaṁ viddhi brahmākṣarasamudbhavam | tasmātsarvagataṁ brahma nityaṁ yajñe pratiṣṭhitam || 3-15 ||

karma: work; brahma: from Brahma; udbhavam: born (from); viddhi: know (that); brahma: spirit/ Brahma the creator; akṣara: Imperishable; samudbhavam: born (from); tasmāt: therefore; sarva-gataṁ: omnipresent; brahma: Brahman; nityaṁ: eternal; yajñe: in the yajna; pratiṣṭhitam: is residing/ based.

"Know that work comes from Brahma, and Brahma comes from the Imperishable, therefore the all-pervading Brahman eternally resides in sacred action."

One of the most peculiar characteristics of the Sanskrit language is a greater number of letters as compared to the Latin-based alphabet; this makes transliteration a difficult job unless special diacritic marks are used to distinguish for example a "short a" from a "long a" as in this case. As the word brahma in this verse is twice entwined in a sandhi that could carry either a short a or a long a, we must conclude that both meanings can be applicable, at different levels of understanding... and even the first brahma mentioned should be considered as a representative of the brahma mentioned second in the verse.

The word brahma ending with a "short a" means is synonym with Brahman, and refers to the spiritual principle, that unchangeable, eternal, and transcendental existence that continues on the non-manifested level. The same word with a "long a" is the name of that subordinate personality of Godhead who is known as the guṇa avatara for passion and the creator/ demiurge of each particular universe. This Brahma (with "long a") is born from the lotus flower sprouting from the navel of Garbhodakashayi Vishnu at the beginning of each cycle of creation; he lives 100 of his years (equivalent to one entire cycle of the universe) on the highest planet of this universe, called Brahmaloka or Satyaloka, and then becomes reabsorbed into the body of Vishnu at the time of dissolution. As he is the first created being, he receives from Vishnu the knowledge required to develop and manage this particular universe, and a head for each of its dimensions. Our universe has four dimensions, so our Brahma is portrayed as having four heads; other universes may have more dimensions and therefore their respective Brahmas may have an adequate number of heads (symbolically speaking). Accordingly, Brahma proceeds to speak the Vedas - the eternal and universal knowledge both material and spiritual, that will guide all on the path of progress. In this sense, Brahma is identified as the personified form of the Vedas themselves. From the sound vibration, Brahma manifests all the various aspects of the universe and the species of life. From his mind he generates a number of children, including a sequence of Manus and their respective wives/ feminine counterparts. In turn, these prajāpatis produce all the generations of living entities that populate all the planets in the universe. Being the ancestor, teacher, creator and administrator of all the living entities in the universe, this Brahma can very well be described as the one who spells the duties and work activities for all. However, Brahma is a mere administrator, a representative for the real owner of the establishment - the Imperishable, the Brahman, or Vishnu/ Narayana. The word Brahman in this verse indicates the supreme and all-pervading existence and consciousness of which we are all parts. As cells of the immense body of the virat puruṣa (Param Brahman) we have the duty to properly perform our functions – work, duty, or karma. This Param Brahman or Personality of Godhead is called akṣara, "imperishable", or in other words, transcendental and unchangeable, but from this akṣara the entire reality of the spiritual and material universes is emanated through constant activity. As part of the Brahman, the Atman or individual soul is also active and by performing his proper duty he participates of the active divinity of God. From this verse, we get yet another confirmation about the fact that one's prescribed duty is non-different from worship when it is performed in a spirit of service to the Supreme.

एवं प्रवर्तितं चक्रं नानुवर्तयतीह यः ।

अघायुरिन्द्रियारामो मोघं पार्थ स जीवति ॥ ३-१६ ॥

evaṁ pravartitaṁ cakram nānuvartayatīha yaḥ | aghāyurindriyārāmo moghaṁ pārtha sa jīvati || 3-16 ||

evaṁ: thus; pravartitam: established; cakram: wheel/ cycle; na: not; nuvartayati: takes up; ihā: in this world/ life; yaḥ: one who; agha: sin/ crime; ayub: duration of life; indriya: the senses; aramaḥ: seeking happiness; moghaṁ: without benefit; pārtha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); sah: he (this person); jīvati: lives.

"O son of Pritha, one who does not accept to follow this established cycle (of action) is enjoying his senses through a sinful longevity, and his life is useless."

The word chakram means "wheel". A wheel, a circle, is a cycle that has no beginning or end, like the orbit of a planet around its star. The entire universe revolves in cycles, as this is the nature of the material manifestation - always existing, always changing. Each cycle affords opportunities for progress and action, as well as for liberation: it is the best possible plan.

As Krishna has explained in the previous verses, according to the universal law, the human beings and the Devas sustain and nurture one another in a constant cycle that produces sacred activities, preserves the natural order of nature through the seasons and rains, creates resources and especially food supplies, and enables the progressive life for all living entities.

Life is a cycle. It can be meaningful and supportive for the universe when we perform our duty selflessly, or it can be meaningless if we keep uselessly wheeling around without going anywhere when we are just seeking our selfish pleasure. In a non-progressive society, at a certain level of personal evolution one starts feeling that he is "living for nothing" – surviving to keep a job so that he can work to pay the bills to keep himself in a position to be able to keep the job. Usually such jobs appear totally meaningless as industrialized societies have broken occupational duties down to tiny bits of over-specialization, transforming the human being into a mere insignificant cog in a huge machinery and thus killing the sense of purpose, the sense of completion in the activity, the pride for one's work, intellectual stimulation, as well as creativity, imagination, intelligence and personal progress. The result is a deep sense of dissatisfaction and unhappiness that is engineered by the advertisement industry to create false "substitution" needs through compulsive consumerism based on real or imagined sense gratification, sense of possession, material identification and attachment. We can escape this vicious circle that binds us to an endless repetition of births and deaths by offering our actions in the virtuous cycle of reciprocal support with the entire creation through dharmic action. Ayur means "life, health, energy, longevity". The food and the other pleasures we obtain to maintain our life and health should be engaged in the higher mission of working for dharma. If they are not, then our duration of life, our good health, the energies and resources that we enjoy and consume are not properly paid for, so life becomes useless and pointless, and even a culpable waste of resources and opportunities.

यस्त्वात्मरतिरेव स्यादात्मतृप्तश्च मानवः । आत्मन्येव च सन्तुष्टस्तस्य कार्यं न विद्यते ॥ ३-१७ ॥

yaśtvātmaratireva syādātmatṛptaśca mānavaḥ । ātmanyeva ca santuṣṭastasya kāryaṁ na vidyate ॥ 3-17 ॥

yah: one who; tu: but; atma: in the atman (the Self); ratih: attachment/ love; eva: only; syat: remains; atma: in the atman; triptah: satisfied; ca: and; manavah: a human being; atmani: in the atman (Self); eva: only; ca: and; santushtah: contented; tasya: of him; karyam: duty; na: not; vidyate: is known/ there is.

"A human being who loves the Self certainly becomes satisfied in the Self and peaceful within the Self: for such a person there is no need to perform any action."

As we were mentioning previously, a person who is fully situated on the transcendental level of consciousness, in the constant contemplation of the One Reality (called Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan) does not have any duties to perform because he is not interested in obtaining sense gratification or any other achievement. He is simply happy and satisfied whatever happens. However, it is very important to understand that this verse does not approve inaction, as it will become evident in the next verses. The person who is situated on the transcendental level does not have any duties to perform because he is already fully engaged in working in transcendental service out of a spontaneous desire to assist the plan of the Supreme Personality of Godhead.

We could say that he is not engaged in a job any more because he has graduated from the position of an employee to that of a son of the owner of the enterprise. For him there is no question of salary or holidays, working hours verification or similar concerns, because his life has become totally devoted to the enterprise. He does not need a salary because all his needs are automatically met by living in the wealthiest family, and he does not need vacations because he simply rests when he is tired and when circumstances afford it, but he is ready to perform the required actions whenever it is necessary.

What is the difference between a job and a hobby? Many people like cooking or gardening as a hobby. Others work as carpenters or weavers or potters in their leisure time, others write novels or teach as a voluntary community service after their working hours at their day job. On the other hand, some people have apparently unusual jobs, such as those who test videogames, or taste ice cream, or travel in wonderful locations and luxury hotels to rate them, or watch movies to write critiques. Where is the line between hard work and enjoyment? Usually the difference is that you must work at your job even when you do not feel like engaging in that activity, while a hobby is only a pleasure pursuit - but then again, what to speak of those who choose martial arts or sports as hobbies? If they train only when they like, they will never become good at what they do. Voluntary social workers who offer their leisure time for the care of the underprivileged will easily find out that such engagement is not always pleasurable and easy, but also requires a lot of spirit of self sacrifice. Even a hobby like carpentry requires some effort and sacrifice, otherwise one will remain unable to finish any project. So basically the point is that a job is a mentality - a level of consciousness - where our work is characterized by the desire to obtain some personal benefits that would not be available to us if we did not put sufficient hard work in the deal. It is not a matter of love and passion, of finding contentment and happiness in the action itself. The job mentality is the characteristic of the unqualified sudra, who is lazy, greedy and exploitative, trying to get as much as possible while giving as little as possible. Therefore he needs to be pushed around and watched constantly even to accomplish very little, because he does not like to work. He does not work out of passion or love.

On the other hand, an evolved human being - even a good sudra who is preparing to evolve into a vaisya - finds satisfaction in his work and acts more out of a service spirit than to get something for himself. We can make the examples of painters, musicians, craftspeople and other artists, barbers and hairdressers, tailors, or even personal servants who take pride and satisfaction in serving their masters well. As sudras, they need patrons or employers who tell them what to do and regularly take care of their needs, because they are unable to develop some fruitful enterprise on their own and manage their wealth. They simply work with their own hands and not with their brains, but still they can attain perfection and become very useful members of society if they find contentment and pride in performing their duties well. From that level, another small step, consisting in a greater sense of responsibility, will enable them to graduate as vaiśyas or entrepreneurs, who are able to market their work successfully and sell a good finished product without depending on the instructions of others.

The three definitions of rati, tripti and santosha apply to different types of satisfaction. Rati indicates attachment or love, tripti is the happiness derived from the contact with the object of one's attachment or love, and santosha is the happiness and contentment that is perceived in oneself.

नैव तस्य कृतेनार्थो नाकृतेनेह कश्चन । न चास्य सर्वभूतेषु कश्चिदर्थव्यपाश्रयः ॥ ३-१८ ॥
 naiva tasya kṛtenārtho nākṛteneha kaścana । na cāśya sarvabhūteṣu kaścīdarthavyapāśrayaḥ ॥ 3-18 ॥

na: not; eva: certainly; tasya: of him; kṛtena: by performing a duty; arthab: a purpose/ value; na: not; akṛtena: by not performing a duty; iba: in this world/ life/ body; kaścana: whatever; na: not; ca: and; asya: of him; sarva-bhuteshu: in all the living beings; kaścid: anything; artha: purpose; vyapasrayaḥ: taking shelter of/ depending on.

"This (person) does not have any reason to abstain from activities/ from the prescribed duty, just like he does not have any reason to perform any duty. In this world he does not depend on any other creature/ situation/ object for any purpose."

When a person is truly detached, such renunciation applies not only to the selfish action but also to the selfish abstention from action. Krishna has already stated very clearly that in this world (iba) one constantly needs to act, even if only to procure one's basic bodily maintenance. This concept is repeated and confirmed in this verse by the word iba. A person who just takes benefits from others without giving adequate and useful reciprocation is just a parasite - a position that is unworthy of the dignity of a human being. It is foolish and dishonest to claim that we do not have any duties to perform because we are on the transcendental level of pure Krishna bhakti - and then demand or expect maintenance from other people. On the other hand, when the host gets some benefit from the presence of the guest, we can speak of a mutual cooperation and symbiosis: the reciprocation in the "wheel" that Krishna was talking about in the previous verses. Therefore in this verse Krishna clarifies that a person who is situated on the transcendental level does not live at the expenses of any other being, either Devas or human beings or animals or plants. A parasite takes shelter in the body of the host in order to find its food and enjoyment, but it does not contribute anything positive and rather it can create diseases and other problems, therefore it should be avoided and eliminated.

A sannyasi can only beg alms for his food. He cannot demand anything, and certainly not luxuries such as first class flight seats, status symbol gadgets, or any other special material facility. Contrarily to what many people believe, the sannyasa vows impose even greater duties and sacrifices than those connected to married life. If one wishes not to marry and engage in family duties because he does not need the opportunities for sense gratification afforded by family life, it is possible to remain unmarried even without formally taking the order of sannyasa. The followers of Chaitanya, for example, traditionally did not take sannyasa until the reform introduced by Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati and the creation of the Gaudiya Matha. Even without being sannyasis, those babajis could fully dedicate themselves to spiritual realization and pure devotion, and they often gave a great example of renunciation and simplicity of lifestyle. On the other hand, those who take sannyasa simply to escape responsibilities and duties and to live a free independent life of sense gratification based on selfish considerations should certainly not be respected as great advanced personalities. According to the Vedic tradition, one needs to pay one's debts to the ancestors by marrying and generating at least one child - this is considered a precise duty for each man. Furthermore, marriage can be very beneficial and practical: one's social occupation often requires a considerable amount of time and effort to give the proper results, so marriage affords a synergy of mutual support between husband and wife, where the wife takes care of the daily home maintenance chores such as cooking etc. and often assists the husband in his occupation according to the particular varna he belongs to, but with the possibility of taking all the necessary time to care for the children and for herself. In a balanced marriage of two responsible and proactive persons, there is still sufficient freedom and certainly there are many opportunities to practice renunciation and simplicity in lifestyle, as well as spiritual and devotional progress. As the word bhūta also applies to a state of being - a condition of life or situation - we can easily understand that a person who is situated in Transcendence is not taking shelter in any particular state of being, or in other words he does not identify with any position or condition, and remains detached from the pleasures and sufferings afforded by the various situations. Such a person does not see an intrinsic value in any particular situation, because he knows that they will all come and go as temporary phenomena.

तस्मादसक्तः सततं कार्यं कर्म समाचर । असक्तो ह्याचरन्कर्म परमाप्नोति पूरुषः ॥ ३-१९ ॥
 tasmādasaktaḥ satatam kāryam karma samācara । asaktaḥ hyācarankarma paramāpnoti pūruṣaḥ ॥ 3-19 ॥

tasmāt: therefore; asaktaḥ: without attachment; satatam: always; kāryam: duties; karma: action/ work; samācara: perform; asaktaḥ: detached; hi: certainly; acaran: acting /putting in practice; karma: work/ action; param: better/ supreme; apnoti: obtains; puruṣaḥ: a person.

"Therefore you should always perform your activities in the proper way but without attachment, because by performing selfless work a man achieves the Supreme."

Krishna has already stated several times that action should be performed out of selfless duty only, without personal attachment. He is again repeating this concept here, because it is an extremely important concept. In Vedic tradition, repetition is a sign of great importance and should not be underestimated as boring or redundant. One should perform one's duty even when it requires difficult or painful actions, or it brings us losses or problems of some type. A kshatriya has the duty to confront the aggressor without being attached to the idea of being a good compassionate or nonviolent man, and similarly each human being faces similar difficulties in the proper performance of one's duties. The feeling of cleanliness is a good thing and helps us become situated on the level of sattva, but we should not remain attached to it to the point that we cannot engage in cleaning our dirty clothes or in other similar duties. A brahmana who refuses to do his normal cleaning work because of his "sattvic position" only becomes a dirty person, just like someone who claims that he never needs to take a bath or wash up because he is "clean by nature" or "genetically clean". In this verse the word param means "superior", and it can be applied to the Supreme Reality - Brahman or the direct service to the Supreme Personality of Godhead - or simply to something better, more beneficial, more valuable. Even at this ordinary level, the instruction contained in the verse makes perfect sense - without giving up the inferior object, it is very difficult to obtain a superior one. We need to make space in our lives for better things by letting go of the inferior things that cannot really help us in our progress. Many people like to accumulate objects and end up cluttering their homes and their lives with a lot of useless things, sometimes even useless relationships or engagements or situations. The natural cycle of life requires us to clear up the space in our existence, so that we can welcome better things.

Of course this consideration should not be used as a cheap pretext to escape one's responsibilities - trying to get rid of a burdensome relationship when we have finished exploiting it. A relationship has not exhausted itself unless we have paid our karmic debts in full. If we try to take a "shortcut" we will simply find ourselves in exactly the same situation in the future, in this or in other lifetimes, and we will have to pay until our debts are settled. It is not very difficult to see when a relationship or a situation has come to the end line: usually the other person who is the object of the relationship wants to leave, or to change the terms of the connection. From our side, we gradually develop the feeling that the relationship is unbalanced or it is not going anywhere, it is not helping us to grow and to improve ourselves. We may also have the feeling that we have "given enough" without getting appropriate appreciation or reciprocation, or that the situation is suffocating us like a prison cell. In such situations, we need to move on. We will certainly find better things.

कर्मणैव हि संसिद्धिमास्थिता जनकादयः । लोकसंग्रहमेवापि सम्पश्यन्कर्तुमर्हसि ॥ ३-२० ॥

karmaṇaiva hi saṁsiddhimāsthitā janakādayaḥ । lokasaṅgrahamevāpi sampasyānkartumarhasi ॥ 3-20 ॥

karmana: by working; eva: also; hi: certainly; samsiddhim: full perfection; asthitah: situated; janaka: Janaka; adayah: and others; loka: world/ people; sangraham: in general; eva: also; api: even; sampasyan: considering; kartum: to do; arhasi: you should.

"Janaka and others (like him) became situated in perfection through the performance of activities. Also, you should consider the benefit of the general people."

This verse introduces the concept of teaching and inspiring society by our good example, by continuing to work sincerely in this world for the benefit of all, even if we really do not have any duty to perform because we are perfectly satisfied in the Self and we do not wish to obtain anything for ourselves or our associates. Teaching by example is the best way of teaching, and should always support the presentation of precepts. If you have a bad habit - for example smoking - you can never be effective in telling people that smoking is bad and they should not smoke, because your credibility will be very scarce. When you resort to material forceful means to make sure that you remain the only authority in spite of such serious shortcomings, the general people will be confused and will lose the sense of truthfulness and reality, and you will be the cause of disaster in society. However, even when you are behaving consistently with what you teach, it is always better to avoid situations where the general people may not be able to correctly understand your actions, because ignorant people have the tendency to observe superficially, misinterpret and utilize such wrong interpretation to justify their own misconduct even when controversial actions were totally uncalled for.

It does not take much to convince lazy bums to follow the example of someone who is apparently not doing anything, even if they just observe their "role model" for the only 10 minutes in the day when he is having a break from an extremely active and tiresome day, even if he has just completed a 100 km running marathon. The lazy bums will take those 10 minutes and stretch them into hours and days and weeks and months and years, showing you the photo of their "role model" lying down asleep on a sofa, and justifying their own bad habit of regularly sleeping 14 to 16 hours a day, without doing any work even in the remaining hours. There is a famous story about a very expert veterinarian, who was approached by a young man that wished to become his apprentice. The young man watched the veterinarian and saw him giving some white powder to a cow. Then the vet was called to treat a horse: he just took a mallet and smashed the lump in his throat; the horse was instantly cured. The young apprentice decided he had seen enough: he stole the medicine bag from his mentor, ran away and started advertising himself as a great veterinarian.

First he was called to help a difficult calf delivery: he gave the cow the white powder in the bag, not knowing that it was a medicine to prevent miscarriage and premature birth, so instead of facilitating the delivery he effectively prevented it, and both the cow and the calf died. Next he was called by a farmer whose horse had developed a tumor in his throat: the young man took the mallet and tried to smash the lump, effectively killing the poor animal. He did not know that the horse originally treated by the real doctor had simply swallowed an entire watermelon that had become stuck in his throat creating breathing difficulties, so when the watermelon was skillfully shattered, its pieces were dislodged and moved to the stomach, clearing his windpipes. The ignorant apprentice had no idea that there is a big difference between a small watermelon and a large encysted tumor, because he was convinced that only the external action was significant: he was just an imitator. We need to remember that the world is full of similarly ignorant people.

The Janaka mentioned in the verse is considered to be king Janaka, the father of Sita and father in law of Sri Ramachandra. He is listed as one of the twelve mahajanas, or great authorities on dharma, together with Shiva Mahadeva, Yamaraja, Brahma, Narada, the Kumaras (considered as one), Kapila, Manu, Prahlada, Bali Maharaja and Sukadeva the son of Vyasa. Janaka was recognized as rajarishi, a saintly king who was very expert in all sorts of knowledge, both material and spiritual. At his court great rishis and sages such as Yajnavalkya, Astavakra etc assembled for profound discussions about many subjects; such discussions are narrated in authoritative texts such as Mahabharata, Brihad aranyaka upanishad, Maha upanishad, and Astavakra gita.

There is a famous story about king Janaka. It is said that one day Narada was visiting Narayana and they were discussing about the perfection of human life, whether it could be attained from any stage of life in the varnashrama system. Narayana declared that it was certainly possible, and he mentioned the example of king Janaka, suggesting Narada to go and see him. When Narada arrived at the court of Janaka, he found the king apparently immersed in sense gratification - surrounded by beautiful objects and people, in a very luxurious palace, enjoying the best in food and drinks and entertainment. Suddenly a palace servant rushed into the hall, informing the king about an emergency to be addressed in the kingdom, and Janaka leapt instantly to his feet, completely lucid and alert, running to his duties without the least hesitation, totally forgetting about his own pleasure or well being. This kind of consciousness is what is required from each and everyone of us. Whatever attachment one can develop in any particular condition of life - not only those damaging and degrading attachments influenced by ignorance and passion, but also the sattvic attachment to peaceful and quiet life, simplicity, renunciation, cleanliness, etc - must be instantly dropped, without a moment of hesitation, when duty calls. This requires a very sharp, alert and stable consciousness, and the constant vision and remembrance of what is really important. If we remain on this level of consciousness, at the time of death we will be able to leave the entire material manifestation behind and attain the supreme destination without any extra effort.

यद्यदाचरति श्रेष्ठस्तत्तदेवेतरो जनः । स यत्प्रमाणं कुरुते लोकस्तदनुवर्तते ॥ ३-२१ ॥

yadyadācarati śreṣṭhastattadevetaro janah | sa yatpramāṇam kurute lokastadanuvartate || 3-21 ||

yat yat: whatever; acharati: he does/ shows by example; śreṣṭhah: a leader/ a superior; tat tat: that same (thing); eva: certainly; itarah: another (common); janah: the world/ the people/ a person; sah: he/ she; yat: what; pramanam: proof/ evidence/ authority; kurute: does; lokah: the world/ the people/ a person; tat: that; anuvartate: follows.

"Whatever the best (person) does, the general common people follow (the example) as his activities are (implicitly) accepted as the (authoritative) standard by the public."

In the previous verse Krishna explained that a liberated person should continue to work in this world by properly performing the duties connected to the particular position he occupies, just to give a good example to the general population. Here the instruction is expanded to encourage Arjuna (and all of us who are reading the Gita) to become leaders of society by giving the good example of working hard and selflessly. All societies need leaders. Such leaders do not need to occupy a particular professional position or to have enforcing powers in order to have a positive influence on people: anyone can become a leader just by inspiring others with good deeds, consistency, compassion, wisdom, knowledge, and a dharmic behavior in general. However, the proper functioning of the social order absolutely requires that the individuals that occupy a position of authority must incarnate a perfect example by their personal behavior in private life as well as by the performance of their administrative or teaching duties. It is not a matter of "can", but a matter of "must". An ignorant and superficial teacher will be the public evidence that schooling is not about acquiring knowledge or understanding. A priest who does not have devotion for God, knowledge of the scriptures or personal spiritual realizations will become the proof that all religion is a farce. A corrupt magistrate will be the living demonstration that justice and good governance are nothing but illusions. Thus the devastating effect of their crimes will be much deeper. The need for good dharmic leadership starts from the highest position of authority in society - the brahmana class of intellectuals, teachers (whatever subject they teach, in the fields of science or religion or history etc), counselors, advisors, consultants, preachers, scholars, researchers, scientists, writers and all those who contribute to shape the public opinion about the values and the ideals to be pursued by the mass of people.

The kshatriya ruling class leads a very public life, too, and to the eyes of the simple-minded, government people seem to have even greater authority than the wise souls who have realized Brahman and possess the full spiritual and material knowledge. Therefore all government servants and representatives, from the king to the last tax officer, are naturally considered the leaders and authorities of society and their personal example determines the manner in which the general mass of people judge and follow legality, legitimacy, success and ethical ideals, as well as small everyday actions and choices. The mass of people always tends to make role models out of those who are considered leaders or successful individuals, not only in their professional activities but also in their personal lifestyle and even in apparently irrelevant details, such as walking gait, facial expressions, and so on. Such imitation is often done blindly and foolishly, especially by ignorant people that do not have access to the proper and relevant information or do not have the discrimination to understand the many factors of a choice - such time, place and circumstance, as we have already mentioned. Even worse, if the imitation is done by those who have a personal selfish agenda to pursue. Thus, a bad man who wants to abandon his faithful wife may bring the example of Sri Rama who sent Sita away even if she was innocent. Or a cowardly and weak man who is unable to effectively fight the actual enemy will justify a campaign of secret assassinations of dissenters by bringing the example of Sri Rama who killed Vali from hiding behind a tree. A chronic liar who totally disregards truthfulness will justify himself by saying that Krishna ordered Yudhisthira to tell a lie during the battle of Kurukshetra. It does not matter to them that Rama and Krishna taught and demonstrated strict adherence to dharmic behavior in millions of other instances: bad people will pick one single event that could be misunderstood, they will take it out of context, misrepresent it to prove their faulty theory right, and use it to justify their very wrong behavior.

Two words are particularly important in this verse: acharati and pramanam. The word acharati stems from the same root of acharya, "one who teaches by example", normally used to describe the highest level of religious authority. In the ritualistic tradition of karma kanda, the acharya is the most expert and realized brahmana that is meant to verify the proper work of the other three officiating priests, as well as the general performance of the sacrifice. Since the times of Adi Shankara, the title of acharya has been used to address founders of religious/ philosophical movements, great innovative preachers of the Knowledge contained in the scriptures, and those who are educating the masses. The word pramana is normally used to refer to the authority of the scriptures or any authoritative evidence, including the direct perception of facts.

The words janah and lokah are both used in the singular to refer to a group of people or even to a single individual. In this verse, either interpretation may be used to get a correct understanding. This verse demonstrates that Krishna does not support at all those so-called bhaktas who make a show of being transcendental and detached because of their exclusive and pure "rasika" devotion, as a pretext for not properly performing their duties and attending to their responsibilities. If they really were such great devotees of Krishna, they would follow his very clear instructions instead of putting up some false pretense of sentimentalistic sainthood for the sake of gaining followers, fame, adoration and profit.

न मे पार्थास्ति कर्तव्यं त्रिषु लोकेषु किञ्चन । नानवाप्तमवाप्तव्यं वर्त एव च कर्मणि ॥ ३-२२ ॥

na me pārthāsti kartavyam triṣu lokeṣu kiñcana । nānavāptamavāptavyam varta eva ca karmaṇi ।। 3-22 ।।

na: not; me: of me; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); asti: there is; kartavyam: (action to be performed out of) duty; trishu: in the three; lokeshu: worlds; kinchana: any; na: not; anavāptam: that has not been obtained; avāptavyam: that should be obtained; varte: I am engaged; eva: certainly; ca: and (yet); karmaṇi: in work.

"O son of Pritha, in all the three worlds there is (absolutely) nothing that I need to do or that I want to obtain, yet I also engage in (proper) activities."

The word kartavya means "duty", or "action that should be performed (out of duty)". Krishna offers himself as a direct example of liberated soul still directly engaged in working in the world: the perfect demonstration of acharya - just to make sure that the false bhaktas do not try to claim their "higher level of realization" to wriggle out of the tight spot in which the previous verse nailed them. Should they be considered as more highly realized than Krishna? The words anavāptam and avāptavyam are also interesting - meaning respectively "something that has not been obtained (yet)" or the residual karmic consequences of previous activities, and "something that is to be obtained", indicating a further desire that will generate fruitive action and future karmic consequences. In other words, Krishna has no handicap to overcome and no aspirations to be fulfilled.

Different groups of people who read the Gita have different perceptions of Krishna, according to the ideal they personally aspire to attain - but in all cases, whoever recognizes the authority of Krishna's teachings in this famous scripture is worshiping him with their intelligence (Gita 18.70). This is the common platform we should focus on. What difference does it really make, if someone sees Krishna just as a genuinely great teacher that has given up all material identifications, rather than the Supreme Lord himself, as long as Krishna's instructions are understood and followed sincerely?

In fact, there is no contradiction between all these various perspectives because the Supreme Lord is the greatest teacher, and has no material identification. There is nothing that an ordinary jiva can do, that the Supreme Lord is unable to do, because even if there is an "excess of qualification" in the case of the Lord, among his perfections we also find the perfect renunciation and humility, so he has no problem in taking an apparently humble role. This exercise will help us in the all-important task of becoming free from the material limitations that condition our way of thinking. Whatever limitation we try to impose on the Personality of Godhead is illusory, even if it is dictated by our affection and respect, by the projection of our own ideals and aspirations - because the Lord is way beyond that. He has no limits.

The expression tri-loka is the best demonstration of the collective meaning of the word loka as "world" or "people". Traditionally, Vedic cosmology considers three planetary systems or groups of worlds in our universe: the lower planets from Patala to Atala (influenced by ignorance), then the middle planets around Mahatala or Mahitala or Earth (influenced by passion), and then the higher planets up to Satyaloka, the abode of Brahma (influenced by goodness). We do not need to grab our telescope to identify each of these planetary systems with the physical celestial bodies that are visible from Earth, because some of them are not visible to our eyes or instruments, and some do not appear to be suitable to sustain life as we know it on this planet - their inhabitants don't find this a problem at all, because they have bodies made of different elements, although they are classified among the 400,000 human species.

The Vedic perspective is not very concerned with the composition of the material body: it is focused on the level of consciousness, on the mentality, determined by a specific mixture of the three gunas. The three lokas mentioned in this verse are characterized by different levels of human consciousness, exemplified in the microcosm of the human body by the various chakras: besides the basic 7 chakras that go from the bottom of the spine to the crown of the head, there are 7 lower chakras from the thighs, the knees, the shanks, the calves, the ankles, the toes and the soles of the feet. Similarly, the subtle body that can be developed above the head level also contain 7 higher chakras, usually depicted by the tall conic crowns or "towering" hairstyle of Devas, Rishis, and the other great personalities of traditional iconography.

यदि ह्यहं न वर्तेयं जातु कर्मण्यतन्द्रितः । मम वर्तमानुवर्तन्ते मनुष्याः पार्थ सर्वशः ॥ ३-२३ ॥

yadi hyaham na varteyam jātu karmāṇyatandritaḥ | mama vartmānuvartante manuṣyāḥ pārtha sarvaśaḥ || 3-23 ||

yadi: if; hi: certainly; aham: I; na: not; varteyam: engaged dutifully; jatu: ever; karmani: in actions; atandritaḥ: very attentive; mama: my; vartma: manner of engagement; anuvartante: they follow; manusyah: human beings; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); sarvasah: all.

"O Partha, if I ever chose to abstain from the proper activity, all the human beings would follow my example."

Following the logical thread of the previous verses, Krishna explains that up to the highest level of consciousness in this world - including the divine avatars - everybody must engage heartily in working activities that are useful to society, especially those who wish to be recognized as teachers or leaders. It does not matter exactly what type of work it is: even meditation, when it is done properly, practically and with the right consciousness, actively contributes to the well-being and proper functioning of society, no more and no less than the careful and intelligent work that takes care of garbage disposal, for example.

Krishna's mission will be described early in the next chapter (Gita 4.8) as "protecting the good people, destroying the evil doers, and establishing the principles of dharma". We are all meant to follow Krishna's example, each one of us in their specific capacity: we should do our best to protect the good and the innocent, oppose and undo the schemes of the evil doers, and give the proper example of dharmic behavior. These three things must go together. We cannot take upon ourselves the task of destroying the evil doers if we are unable or unwilling to act according to dharma and to protect the good and the innocent - or even we are unable or unwilling to tell the difference between good people and evil doers.

Too many people have a wrong idea of "evil doers" - they usually identify them as "the others", or "the enemies", without actually bothering to examine whether such "evil doers" are actually engaged in detrimental and adharmic acts or not. The "good guys" and the "bad guys" are too often defined by biased considerations dictated by politics and sectarianism, which are definitely not the parameters taught by Krishna in Gita or anywhere else. "Kill them all: God will know his own" is a typically cynical and mindless approach of abrahamic imperialism and tyranny, that we should never try to imitate. Bhagavad gita contains all the necessary knowledge to understand how to work at our mission in this world, assisting God's mission in whatever capacity we are able to fill. Logically following the thread of the discussion, it ensues that Krishna's giving a personal example of active engagement means that he also performed yajnas and ritual ceremonies as well as the duties connected to a professional occupation. This is confirmed by the Puranas and Itihasas.

The idea of God and his mode of intervention in the administration of the universe has always been a core issue in the study of theology. Abrahamic faiths present God as an enlarged figure of father/ master/ king, who is preeminently interested in enforcing his arbitrary will over the human beings through rewards and punishments, which include the normal activities of nature such as earthquakes, cyclones etc. Although, strangely enough, that seems to apply only in a one-way street: when such disasters strike "the faithful" (and they do at least as often as they strike all others), it's not a punishment but a "test". This mentality stretches further to include war and other disasters brought about by the activities of man, especially of men who claim to be representatives of God and therefore "authorized" to enforce punishment on "the unfaithful".

The Vedic view is very different. Creation and destructions are not seen as arbitrary acts of reward or punishment, but as totally natural and neutral events that are engineered in the physical laws of the universe themselves. Just like all bodies are born and die, all the material manifestations we see are created and destroyed in the course of time, and there is no question of considering such destruction as a punishment. There is no space for fearful superstition when science understands and explains the laws of nature, including the law of karma.

उत्सीदेयुरिमे लोका न कुर्या कर्म चेदहम् । सङ्करस्य च कर्ता स्यामुपहन्यामिमाः प्रजाः ॥ ३-२४ ॥

utsīdeyurime lokā na kuryāṁ karma cedaham | saṅkarasya ca kartā syāmuṣpahanāyāmimāḥ prajāḥ || 3-24 ||

utsīdeyuh: would become ruined; ime: these; lokah: worlds/ peoples; na: not; kuryam: I do not perform; karma: work/ duty; cet: if; aham: I; sankarasya: of confused population; ca: and; karta: the doer/ responsible; syam: I would be; upahanyam: destroyed; imah: these; prajah: living entities.

"If I did not engage in my work, these people/ worlds would suffer a disaster, I would be the cause of degradation in society and of the destruction of these creatures."

This verse mentions the same sankara or "confused population" that was described previously (1.41, 42, 43). Some commentators insist that the definition applies to the "intermingling of castes", but in this verse such interpretation appears even more absurd than it did in the first chapter.

How is Krishna's lack of dutiful engagement in actions in his incarnation supposed to cause the "intermingling of castes"? By mixed caste marriages? By extra-marital sexual relationships? Certainly not. Krishna is not engaged in "morality police raids" or shaadi (arranged marriages) organization, or even in caste segregation. He has never been, either in his incarnation 5,000 years ago or even in his capacity as the Supreme Lord. The idea of "caste" segregation to avoid varna sankara is totally bogus, and it is never found in any scripture or in the teachings of any genuine acharya. It is not even reasonable in the least.

According to such logic, to better avoid such "intermingling" we should have separate cities and regions exclusively inhabited by brahmanas, others exclusively inhabited by kshatriyas, others exclusively inhabited by vaishyas, and others exclusively inhabited by sudras. This would be the only way to safely be "segregated" without any chance of ever meeting and interacting. So the only place where you can find food would be the regions inhabited by vaishyas (who produce it), while in all the other regions people would have to quickly starve to death because they are not meant to "intermingle" with merchants and agricultural entrepreneurs... Should the brahmanas only teach to brahmanas? Should the kshatriyas only engage in interaction with kshatriyas - never coming in contact with brahmanas, vaishyas, sudras or even external aggressors? Certainly not. And how would the "intermingling of castes" cause the destruction of the prajas?

It is like saying that having the feet, the hands, the stomach and the head communicating and cooperating together as one functional body is the cause of the destruction of the body itself - while strict segregation of these limbs by separating them from each other is the proper way to have society working and all creatures protected and prospering. This "bad mix-up" is actually more in the mind of these deluded commentators than anywhere else, and the evidence of such confusion is in the pitiable conditions of the followers of such commentators in the present Hindu society, characterized by utter lack of clarity even on the most basic concepts, desperate denial of the actual facts, ignorance of shastra (and everything else) to the point of elevating ignorance to the position of ideal to be followed and enforced, stubborn blind prejudice, gross material bodily identification, cruel mistreatment of women and children, neglect towards Mother Earth and Mother Cow, pollution of sacred rivers and tirthas, and horrible public image all around.

It is high time to wash away all such stupid misconceptions and return to the genuine and original understanding of the vedic system. As the father of all living beings, Krishna sees them all as prajas, "creatures"; he does not make artificial discriminations based on prejudice. What is Krishna's work, in which he says he is constantly engaged for the benefit of all living entities and the preservation of all the worlds? Protecting the good people (including the innocent animals), undoing the evil doers, and teaching (establishing) the principles of ethics such as correct knowledge, social cooperation, selflessness, progressive life aiming at Self realization, etc. Of course there are aspects of the work of the avatars that make it impossible to imitate, such as being able to drink poison like Shiva or to lift Govardhana like Krishna, but if we understand the motivation behind such actions we can follow in their footsteps, each according to our actual individual capacity.

This verse responds to Arjuna's objections in 1.41, referred to the fact that the battle would mean death for a great number of men who were responsible for the protection and support of their families, societies and kingdoms. Such deaths would cause great problems to their subordinates and therefore create confusion and degradation in society. Here Krishna objects, stating that family and society actually become degraded and a confused population is created when individuals choose not to perform their dharmic duty, thus establishing a very bad example for their successors and subordinates.

If the man of the family dies for a higher cause, his wife and children will have to face some difficulties in life but they will be inspired by his sacrifice, but if the man abandons his duties due to fear or lack of responsibility, his family member will become bitter and cynical. And if such duties and responsibilities are dumped in the name of a superficial and sentimentalistic "transcendental devotion to God", the results on society will be even worse.

सक्ताः कर्मण्यविद्वानसो यथा कुर्वन्ति भारत । कुर्याद्विद्वान्स्थानसक्तश्चिकीर्षुर्लोकसंग्रहम् ॥ ३-२५ ॥

saktāḥ karmaṇyavidvāṁso yathā kurvanti bhārata । kuryādvidvāṁstathāsaktaścikīrṣurlokasaṅgraham ॥ 3-25 ॥

saktah: attached; karmani: to the actions; avidvamsah: those who are without knowledge; yatha: like; kurvanti: they do; bharata: o descendant of Bharata (Arjuna); kuryat: should do; vidvan: one who has knowledge; tatha: like; asaktah: free from attachments; cikīrṣuh: that wants to lead; loka: the people; sangraham: the mass.

"O Bharata (Arjuna), just like the ignorant people who are attached to (the results of) actions engage in work, a person who has knowledge should work (conscientiously) but without attachment, for the (benefit of) people in general."

This verse offers another confirmation that action and knowledge are supposed to be united and not separated in the life and precepts of the enlightened and liberated soul who is free from material attachments. Those who fail to follow this path are flatly called by Krishna "ignorant people". So, there is no excuse possible for those who try to escape from their duties by claiming that they are "renounced" or "transcendental". Even more than that, we find that not only the person of knowledge (who is detached from the enjoyment of the results) should engage in work, but s/he should work with the same determination, enthusiasm and patience that are shown by people who are very attached to enjoying the fruits of their labor. Again, this verse presents the gist of the social ethos of genuine Hinduism: working selflessly for the collective benefit. This simple precept is the most effective method to ensure perfect harmony, progress and prosperity in any society. When extended beyond the limits of sectarianism and even beyond the circle of human society, this ethical principle is the answer to the present crisis of the planet. We do not need to squeeze our tiny brains to find "new" complicated solutions besides this golden teaching, because anything that goes against this ethical principle will simply delay or shift the problem, or even aggravate it.

न बुद्धिभेदं जनयेदज्ञानां कर्मसङ्गिनाम् ।

जोषयेत्सर्वकर्माणि विद्वान्युक्तः समाचरन् ॥ ३-२६ ॥

na buddhibhedam janayedajñānāṁ karmasaṅginām | joṣayetsarvakarmāṇi vidvānyuktaḥ samācaran || 3-26 ||

na: not; buddhi: intelligence/ understanding; bhedam: difference; janayet: he should cause; ajnanam: of those who are ignorant/ foolish; karma-saṅginam: of those who attached to the (results of) actions; joṣayet: he should engage; sarva-karmani: in all actions; vidvan: one who has knowledge; yuktaḥ: engaged; samācaran: showing by practice.

"A person who has knowledge should not confuse the understanding of the ignorant who are attached to their actions, but should rather (help them to) engage in all activities in a spirit of cooperation, giving a good example personally."

It is a human tendency to try to convince others about the better value of our own opinion and ideals. However, this course of action rarely brings good results, and rather it can become a terrible waste of time and energy. Even worse, when the concept of democracy is applied without ensuring the proper foundations of knowledge and ethics, it is very likely that the wrong conclusions will be enforced, because the majority of the people is not necessarily constituted by the most intelligent and wisest individuals. Here Krishna gives us the solution: rather than trying to convince others that they are not situated on the "highest platform", it is much better to help them progress gradually according to their personal inclinations. Of course, this does not apply to the basic distinction between dharma and adharma, that must be clearly established from the very beginning of everybody's training. The proper discrimination between sat and asat is not a matter of opinion - actually Gita (18.29-32) will explain that the understanding that cannot discriminate between what should be done and what should not be done (such as saying that all opinions are equally valid) is influenced by ignorance, and the relativistic choice between one opinion and another based on one's personal convenience or material benefit is influenced by passion. The "difference of opinion" described in this verse is rather about the two paths of philosophical search and ritualistic action, and about the various approaches of yoga such as bhakti, karma, jñana, kriya, etc, or even about the choice of one's īśa devata - the particular form of God that one worships and loves. Discussing about which one of such paths is "the best" is foolish and futile, because different people have different qualities and inclinations, and the supreme goal can be attained by each path - because in the end, all such genuine paths ultimately become one.

The word yuktaḥ refers to this proper engagement in a genuine path that has been traced by the original scriptures and by the actual acharyas who are truly Self-realized souls. The history of Vedic tradition offers a great number of examples of such Self-realized souls, and at any particular moment in time there is always one of such Self-realized souls available on the planet. By following their personal behavior and precepts, we can gradually become Self-realized, too, and achieve perfection as described in Gita.

प्रकृतेः क्रियमाणानि गुणैः कर्माणि सर्वशः ।

अहङ्कारविमूढात्मा कर्ताहमिति मन्यते ॥ ३-२७ ॥

prakṛteḥ kriyamāṇāni guṇaiḥ karmāṇi sarvaśaḥ | ahaṅkāravimūḍhātmā kartāhamiti manyate || 3-27 ||

prakṛiteḥ: of nature; kriyamanani: are performed; gunaiḥ: by the qualities; karmani: actions; sarvasaḥ: all; ahankara: by the ahankara (false identification); vimudha: very foolish/ confused; atma: self; karta: the doer; aham: I (am); iti: like this; manyate: thinks/ believes.

"All activities are (actually) performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'."

As we have seen already, all genuine paths ultimately become one, just like the various paths that lead to a mountain peak will ultimately converge in one place. The differences between genuine paths are only apparent, and they are determined by the various possible mixtures of the fundamental qualities of nature. Such differences are inevitable at a certain neophyte stage, when we have not yet established ourselves on the transcendental level of visuddha sattva, where sattva (goodness) is free from all material attachments and identifications. But the mixture of the gunas can and should be changed. Here Krishna describes such attachments and identifications as foolish - vimudha. This is not the only time in Gita when Krishna calls spade a spade, as some behaviors can only be described by clear-cut words such as foolishness, ignorance, delusion, cheating, or demoniac activities and mentality. It is true that one should tell the truth by trying to choose palatable expressions (satyam bruyat priyam bruyat) but there is a limit to that. A delicate and soft speech will go totally wasted on those who are too thick to appreciate subtleties: you do not need a sledgehammer to break a thin sheet of paper or glass, but you will have to use it when there is a thick concrete wall to be torn down. The idiot mentioned in this verse is any individual who falls in the delusional trap of trying to put one's tiny material personality (and whatever identification is attached to it) in the center of the universe as opposed to all the other personalities or groups. In Kali yuga, the vast majority of people belong to this description (Bhagavata Purana 1.1.10).

The words ahankara (aham, "I" and kara, "do") and kartāham (karta, "the doer", aham, "I") have the exact same meaning: "I am the doer". This precisely describes the delusion of the conditioned soul that falsely identifies with its material position, and develops a vain pride and attachment for the results of action. As a consequence, the conditioned soul experiences both joys and sorrows.

On the other side, a person that performs his duty sincerely in the best possible way, but understanding his material limitations as due to the interaction of the gunas, remains sober and happy in all circumstances. Of course, we must be very careful to avoid the cheating mentality that tries to justify adharmic and damaging selfish activities by claiming "I am not the doer - my actions are performed by the gunas and Nature".

The gunas are always an important factor in every action, whether we want to get the credit and the fruits or not, but we are not meant to be helpless puppets in the hands of the gunas: we can and should learn how to work with them and utilize them properly in the performance of our duty. An entire chapter (14) of Gita will be dedicated precisely to this subject.

तत्त्ववित्तु महाबाहो गुणकर्मविभागयोः । गुणा गुणेषु वर्तन्त इति मत्वा न सज्जते ॥ ३-२८ ॥

tattvavittu mahābāho guṇakarmavibhāgayoḥ । guṇā guṇeṣu vartanta iti matvā na sajjate ।। 3-28 ।।

tattva: (factual) truth; vit: one who knows; tu: but; maha-baho: (you who have) mighty arms; guna-karma-vibhagayoh: the varieties of qualities and activities; gunah: the gunas; guneshu: in the gunas; vartanta: let them remain; iti: like this; matva: being aware; na: not; sajjate: becomes attached/ affected.

"O mighty-armed (Arjuna), one who knows things as they really are (is able to understand) the various qualities and activities, and therefore he engages the qualities/ tendencies in the interaction with the appropriate qualities/ tendencies: this awareness keeps him free from attachment."

Pradhana, or the total aggregate of the material Nature (prakriti), manifests the three modes called sattva, rajas and tamas. These are called gunas, or "qualities", and their characteristics and functions will be explained in detail later in the Gita. Here Krishna is simply indicating that the Self-realized soul, who knows the truth of Atman/ Brahman, should not identify with the play of the gunas that compose the material world, including our material body and mind. Rather, such knowledgeable person should allow the senses to engage in the sense activities but remaining detached from such actions, just like a grown-up and mentally mature baby sitter is able to direct and facilitate the childish playing of toddlers without getting attached to their games or toys.

Once we have become firmly established in the awareness of our true identity of Atman/ Brahman as opposed to the false identity of ahankara, we will become able to better work with the gunas without getting hopelessly tied up by them. As long as we identify with the body and mind it will be extremely difficult to control them, just like a person who identifies with the car he drives will not be able to utilize the vehicle in the proper way, or - even more important - to soberly extricate himself from the vehicle when it is no longer useful. Guna gunesu vartanta: engaging the gunas in the gunas is a very interesting expression. Like everything else in the universe, our body, senses and mind are composed of a mixture of gunas, the basic components of material nature. The activities in this world and the objects of the senses are also composed by a mixture of gunas, and so are the results of the actions. We naturally need to engage our senses with the sense objects in order to perform our duties and even to maintain our body, but we should always be aware of the mechanism, without getting caught up in the cogs of the wheels.

Some commentators translate this verse as meaning that one should not engage in sense gratification but only work in devotional service: this is fundamentally a good concept, although it is not precisely what Krishna is saying in the verse. It is an interpretation, not a translation. Furthermore, such a controversial idea can easily be misunderstood and distorted by people who have an abrahamic background to mean that we should abstain from all pleasures (including the legitimate, healthy and useful ones) and only engage in penance for the necessary purification of our inherently sinful nature. This misinterpretation can lead to extremely dangerous and delusional conclusions, by which suffering in itself (imposed on others or on one's self) comes to be considered an absolute and independent spiritual merit. In fact, in both cases (when imposed on others or on oneself) such penances become a very strong type of sense gratification - the worst kind because it is perverted and distorted - and lead to mental diseases such as sadism and masochism, as well as to the morbid obsession for material power and domination. Therefore it is better to stick to the text of Bhagavad gita as it really is, and "engage the gunas in the gunas" in the proper performance of one's duties, without remaining attached either to the pleasure or to the suffering. By learning to discriminate and to properly utilize each component of material nature, we can live in this world in the best possible way and ultimately become free from material conditionings. The important thing is to remember that we are spirit souls, Brahman, and therefore we are not directly involved in such activities, objects and qualities, just like a human being remains distinct from his car and never identifies with it, although he needs to learn about its functioning, take care of its maintenance and provide the proper fuel, and drive it in the proper direction through the suitable route.

In this verse Arjuna is called maha baho, "mighty armed" to indicate that physical strength and strenuous effort are not the only factor for success: we need to channel our energy with the utmost attention and awareness, and supported by very solid knowledge.

प्रकृतेर्गुणसम्मूढाः सज्जन्ते गुणकर्मसु । तानकृत्स्नविदो मन्दानकृत्स्नविन्न विचालयेत् ॥ ३-२९ ॥

prakṛteṛguṇasammūḍhāḥ sajjante guṇakarmasu । tānakṛtsnavido mandānakṛtsnavinna vicālayet ।। 3-29 ।।

prakṛteḥ: of nature; guna: by the qualities; sammudhab: delusional/ confused; sajjante: become attached; guna karmasu: to the qualities (and) to the actions/ to the activities of the qualities (gunas); tan: they; akṛitsna-vidah: those whose knowledge is insufficient; mandan: dull/ stupid; kṛitsna-vit: one who has sufficient knowledge; na: not; vicālayet: should unsettle/ dislodge/ agitate.

"Those who are confused by the qualities of nature remain attached to the qualities and the activities/ to the activities of the gunas. A person who has the clear knowledge of action should not unsettle the minds of the foolish people who do not have the same understanding."

Here Krishna repeats the instruction of verse 26, where he stated, na buddhi-bhedam janayed ajnanam karma-sanginam joshayet sarva-karmani vidvan yuktaḥ samacarān, "A person who has knowledge should not confuse the understanding of the ignorant who are attached to their actions, but should rather (help them to) engage in all activities in a spirit of cooperation, giving a good example personally."

Whenever we find a repetition in the scriptures, we should understand that it is meant to highlight the special importance of a teaching. It is not a literary weakness, or a boring waste of time and paper. There are no "inferior duties" or "superior duties". There are different duties that are prescribed for people who are in different situations and need to work with the gunas in different ways. Defining such different tasks as inferior or superior will easily confuse the conditioned soul in trying to perform a task for which he is not properly equipped, or in developing resentment for the task for which he is actually qualified: both situations are very detrimental for the individual and for society at large, on the material and on the spiritual level as well. On the other hand, the person who believes himself to be situated in a "superior duty" might become self-righteous, arrogant, and blind to the actual facts, causing himself to slide down into those very "inferior" gunas he is despising in others.

This verse takes us to a different platform. Just like a teacher carefully engages in the elementary exercises of writing the alphabets on the blackboard not because he wants to get good grades or a golden star, but in order to instruct and help his students, a self realized soul continues to perform the ordinary duties and activities of this world without attachment. Most students need to be inspired and even goaded forward by the idea of a reward, thinking about the enjoyment that will come from the result of the activity. If we take away this hope and interest, they will simply become lazy and neglectful, and that is not what we want. So we need to be patient and personalize the teaching according to the particular position and abilities of each individual, while at the same time we need to realize that performing one's duty properly should not be done out of desire for a reward, but it has an absolute and independent value in itself. This is even more important and true when we deal with people who are not our students, and will not be ready to actually listen to what we want to tell them, but will simply read our advice as an aggression to their own identifications and attachments even if we are simply stating the facts. The more they are attached and identified with their particular mixture of gunas, the more dangerous it will be to try to help them. So shouldn't we take some risk in the performance of our mission - assisting the Lord's mission in protecting the good people, destroying the evil doers and establishing the principles of dharma? Of course we should. Only we need to know how to do it.

मयि सर्वाणि कर्माणि संन्यस्याध्यात्मचेतसा । निराशीर्निर्ममो भूत्वा युध्यस्व विगतज्वरः ॥ ३-३० ॥

mayi sarvāṇi karmāṇi sannyasyādhyātmacetasā । nirāśīrṇirmamo bhūtvā yudhyasva vigatajvarah ॥ 3-30 ॥

mayi: to me; sarvāṇi: all; karmāṇi: actions; sannyasya: by renouncing; adhyatma: of the atman; chetasa: in the consciousness; nirāśīh: without desire; nirmamo: without sense of possession or belonging; bhūtvā: being; yudhyasva: you should fight; vigata: free from; jvarah: fever.

"You should fight (this battle) in the consciousness of surrendering all your actions to me, without selfish desires or sense of possessiveness, and without lethargy/ delirious delusions."

In this verse, Krishna introduces the concept of the personal relationship in devotional service, a powerful personal motivation that is more effective than logic, the sense of duty, and detached wisdom. It is common knowledge that emotion is much more powerful than intellect, and it surpasses all logic and all other considerations. Thus, just like the uncontrolled emotion of lust and attachment can sweep our mind and senses away from our duty and good understanding, we can reverse the process into a virtuous circle and channel our emotions towards love and devotion, so that our mind and senses will be irresistibly attracted to that same duty, but perceived as a loving service to our true Lord and Master. The propensity to service is present in all living entities. The more selfless it becomes, the more purely it manifests in our actions, from the smallest gestures to the greatest choices in life. This selflessness is also called love.

When we speak about relationships, there is a big difference between attachment and love. Attachment means that we want to get something from the person who is the object of our emotion - pleasure, benefits, satisfaction of some kind - while love means that we only want to give everything, including ourselves, to the person who is the object of our emotion. Attachment is selfish, love is selfless. Attachment imprisons, love liberates. This spontaneous tendency to love and service is the true nature of the soul, and constantly seeks engagement on various levels according to our particular identification and affinity. When we identify with our body, we tend to try to love and serve bodies. When we identify mostly with our mind, our love and service become channeled on a subtler level and open the doors to a wider awareness of the desires of the object of our sentiment. Ultimately, when our identification is established on the spiritual level, we become able to see and appreciate, to love and to serve, the spiritual essence/ identity of the person who is the object of our sentiment, including the Supreme Soul, the param atma, the soul of all souls. This is the highest and deepest meaning of adhyatma cetasa, "the consciousness of the soul", that becomes "the consciousness of God". On a more prosaic level, this verse also applies to the perception of Krishna as the authority, the director, or even the military commander. Arjuna has already presented himself as a disciple and student of Krishna (Gita 2.7), so it makes perfect sense for Krishna to ask him to simply follow his instructions and to act in his service, dedicating all activities to him.

The expression sannyasya, "renouncing", directly refers to the practical mechanism of selfless action: when we renounce something, we offer its enjoyment to someone else, or we make it available to someone else. Krishna does not tell Arjuna to renounce the kingdom by offering it to Duryodhana - he must renounce the kingdom by offering it to a higher purpose and principle: the service to God and society (described as God's body) through the performance of the proper duty. There is not much merit in renouncing something under the pressure of some bully or highway robber, simply because we find ourselves in a weaker position. True renunciation consists in continuing to take the best possible care of the object, but engaging it in the service of God rather than in our own service.

In this verse the word jvara (literally "fever") is sometimes translated as "lethargy", because fever takes away strength of mind and body and leaves the patient in a lethargic state. However, since the previous verses expressed the concepts of illusion, confusion, and foolishness, we should remember that fever also affects the perception of the world and the clarity of the mind and senses, creating hallucinations and a delirious attitude that are typical to the people attached to the fruits of the action. On the other side, a person who is attached to the selfish enjoyment of the fruits of the action will become lazy and lethargic when there is little or no personal benefit to be gained from work. Thus both the meanings are applicable.

ये मे मतमिदं नित्यमनुतिष्ठन्ति मानवाः । श्रद्धावन्तोऽनसूयन्तो मुच्यन्ते तेऽपि कर्मभिः ॥ ३-३१ ॥

ye me matamidam nityamanutiṣṭhanti mānavāḥ । śraddhāvanto'anasūyanto mucyante te'pi karmabhiḥ ।। 3-31 ।।

ye: those; me: my; matam: teaching; idam: this; nityam: always; anutiṣṭhanti: regularly follow/ situate (themselves) in; manavah: human beings; śraddhavantah: those who are faithful/ have faith; anasuyantah: those who are free from envy; mucyante: become free; te: they; api: even; karmabhiḥ: from the activities (and their consequences).

"Those human beings who always follow this teaching of mine, thanks to their faith and lack of envy, become free from the consequences of actions."

It will be useful to analyze the meaning of śraddha, "faith" and anasūyata, "freedom from envy". Faith means being willing to believe something. It does not need to be a blind faith, the determination to unquestioningly believe whatever we are told, something that is unreasonable and should not be demanded of anyone or by anyone. Reasonable faith is rather the opening of our minds and hearts to the possibility of acquiring something good. Everything requires a measure of faith, from the basic education we get in primary school to purchasing packed goods, or making a flight reservation. We are entitled to make thorough preliminary inquiries about the trustworthiness of the recipient of our faith, but ultimately there are things we need to believe without trying to verify them first, because verification can be done only by experiencing them. For example, when we purchase a packaged product, we can verify the quality of its contents only after having paid its price. When we make a reservation for a flight, we can verify if the travel agency was trustworthy only after we have actually completed our journey.

Envy means finding fault where there is none. It means being unable to appreciate the actual qualifications and merits of others, and desiring to have the same position or a higher/ more powerful position than them. A synonym of envy is malice, or the desire to denigrate and cause damage to others especially if more qualified or successful than us. A person who is envious will never be able to appreciate the objective value of others - including the good things done by others or the good teachings presented by others. The word matam in this verse literally means "opinion", but certainly Krishna's opinion is much more than an ordinary perspective as we find in common people, who can just speculate but do not have a clear and direct perception of Reality. Thus rather than wasting time discussing the personal opinions of this or that conditioned soul, we should get the "opinion" of those liberated souls who can directly see (darśhi) Reality (tattva). This will also be clearly stated in verse 4.34 and other passages.

In the previous verses (3.26, 29) Krishna clearly said that we should not try to oppose opinion to opinion or to change the minds of others by pulling them away from their particular attachments. In this verse he expands the previous explanation, stating that a person who is attached to his own opinion based on identification and possession will not listen with faith to another's opinion, but rather he will find reason to become envious and hostile - especially if the opinion of the other seems to be better than his own. It may be difficult for a conditioned soul to forgive people for having been wrong, but it is much more difficult to forgive people for having been right: this is the meaning of envy. Unfortunately this envy and lack of faith can also be directed towards liberated souls and even towards the Supreme Lord. For this reason, Krishna will tell Arjuna that this highest knowledge can only be appreciated by those who are free from envy (4.3, 18.64, 67, 71 etc). Even if in the beginning following Krishna's instructions in Gita could be difficult, if we have faith and become/ remain free from envy we will eventually succeed. Here this success is described as being liberated from the cycle of karma.

Some commentators interpret the word anasūya as "free from the tendency to fault-finding", and exploit this verse to claim legitimacy for their own adharmic conclusions and practices. In other words, in their opinion anyone who can see their inconsistencies and damaging conclusions and behaviors must be branded as a "fault-finder" and an "offender", that must be considered unqualified to understand and follow the teachings of Krishna in Bhagavad gita. The chances of misinterpretation grow exponentially when the students are induced to forget what is exactly the teaching that Krishna is talking about: that everyone - including the most transcendently realized and highly situated, including God himself - must perform their duties properly and behave according to the rules of dharma or ethical conduct in any case, so that the general mass of the people will be inspired by such good behavior. So, when we actually observe a really serious criminal and irresponsible behavior in someone who is passing off as a great transcendentalist, can we be considered unable to understand Krishna's teachings because we are envious as we have "found fault" with a cheater that is giving a very bad example to society at large?

ये त्वेतदभ्यसूयन्तो नानुतिष्ठन्ति मे मतम् । सर्वज्ञानविमूढास्तान्विद्धि नष्टानचेतसः ॥ ३-३२ ॥

ye tvetadabhyasūyanto nānutiṣṭhanti me matam । sarvajñānavimūḍhāstānvīddhi naṣṭānacetasaḥ ।। 3-32 ।।

ye: those who; tu: but; etat: this; abhyasīyantaḥ: (because they are) envious; na: not; anūśīṣṭhanti: follow; me: my; matam: teaching; sarva: all; jñāna: knowledge; vimudhaḥ: completely foolish/ confused; taḥ: they; viddhi: (you should) know; naṣṭaḥ: destroyed/ lost; acetasaḥ: without awareness.

"However, those who do not follow my teachings because of envy/ malice, are confused in whatever they know. Know that they will (ultimately) meet with destruction because they do not have the proper understanding."

So Krishna clarifies in this verse that the envious people are not those who can tell the difference between dharma and adharma, but those who do not follow his teachings to perform one's duty properly in order to give a good example to the general public. However, what will happen to the envious people who refuse to follow God's orders? They simply continue on their way until they develop a better understanding.

God is not interested in punishing us if we fail to follow his orders or to show loyalty to him: this idea of forced, exclusive and blind allegiance is typical of the abrahamic faiths, and if we do not remove it from our frame of reference, it will distort our perception of the teachings of the Gita. Here Krishna is not threatening the "non-believers", "unfaithful" or "heretics" with brimstone and hell fire, or with abject slavery and extermination. He is not a terrorist, he does not want to rule by fear. Rather, he is saying that envy and malice will prevent a person from actually understanding the reality of facts. Someone who lives in denial of reality will certainly have problems, but these are not enforced by a revengeful tyrant as a punishment: they are simply the universal effects of the neutral laws of Nature. Anyone who is envious will behave like a fool and fall prey to confusion, and ultimately cause damage to others and to himself: it does not matter whether he considers himself a faithful believer in the Supreme God or not. In fact, sometimes envious and foolish people (who see faults where there are none and cannot tolerate to see others live happily and peacefully) refuse to listen to very good teachings, claiming they cannot allow anything that is not authorized by their own religious tradition. They consider their own behavior as a demonstration of loyalty to God, while in fact it is exactly the opposite. God has given us intelligence, a conscience, a natural sense of ethics to help our understanding, and if we do not use them to understand good teachings, we are actually despising God's gifts.

Besides, it is very easy for clever manipulators to present their own faulty, absurd, cruel, destructive and even demonic conclusions and plans as if they were orders coming directly and personally from God. They just need a sufficient number of followers (procured through whatever means, moral or immoral) to enforce their orders materially. What is the proof that such orders have really come from God? To avoid this embarrassing question, they introduce the concept of blasphemy (i.e. dissent) and heresy (i.e. freedom of thought) as crimes that can and must be persecuted by law. Such an idea of religion is barbaric and totally contrary to the teachings of Gita.

सदृशं चेष्टते स्वस्याः प्रकृतेर्ज्ञानवानपि । प्रकृतिं यान्ति भूतानि निग्रहः किं करिष्यति ॥ ३-३३ ॥

sadṛśaṁ ceṣṭate svasyāḥ prakṛterjñānavānapi । prakṛtiṁ yānti bhūtāni nigrahaḥ kiṁ kariṣyati ॥ 3-33 ॥

sadrisam: in accordance; cestate: makes efforts; svasyāḥ: by his own; prakṛiteḥ: nature; jñānavan: one who has the knowledge; api: even; prakṛitiṁ: nature; yanti: go (following); bhūtāni: living beings/ situations in life; nigrahaḥ: restraint/ repression; kim: what; kariṣyati: one can do.

"Even a person who has the (proper) knowledge must engage in actions according to his own nature. All embodied beings must follow their nature: what can repression accomplish?"

In the previous verses, the definition of jñani, "a person of knowledge", has been used to indicate one who knows the difference between the temporary material objects and the eternal and transcendental nature of the spirit.

The word prakṛiti applies both to the material nature and to the spiritual nature of the jīva, because even after liberation each particular spark of the all-pervading Brahman retains an individual personality that will be expressed in the siddha deha or rasa of his relationship with God. Such individual taste of the jīva's personality is considered the center of the philosophical approach called "personalism" as opposed to the view called "impersonalism". Therefore, the supporters of the personalistic view should not limit the meaning of this verse to the conditioned level of life. Of course, theoretical knowledge alone is not sufficient: the proper knowledge needs to be applied in practice, through the proper performance of one's duties, free from selfish attachments and material identifications. Nobody should give up his duties to society and family, even if he considers himself (or is considered by others) as situated on the transcendental level of divine consciousness, because as Krishna has just said a few verses ago, even a perfectly liberated soul, even Krishna himself, continues to carefully perform the prescribed duties - in the very least, to give the good example to the mass of people. Such duties must continue to be assigned according to one's particular natural qualities (both material and spiritual) that are inherent to each individual, because repression and denial are at best useless and at worst very dangerous and damaging. What an irony, to see so-called personalist spiritualists stubbornly try to artificially enforce duties or renunciation to duties, or even spiritual bhakti rasas on the mass of people, with the pretext of transcendental consciousness!

Each individual jīva already has a natural personality that should be respected and carefully cultivated in a favorable way. It is absurd and hypocritical to attempt to impose a different spiritual sentiment or īśa devata on people, treating them as blank slates to be used to write anything on, or even trying to wipe them clean of their natural inclinations. The Guru gives the "second birth" to the disciple through initiation, but that does not mean that the disciple's soul (including his natural relationship with God) did not exist before that. Only people who do not really understand reincarnation and spirit (because of their material vision, identification and attachments) can fall in such a foolish trap.

इन्द्रियस्येन्द्रियस्यार्थे रागद्वेषौ व्यवस्थितौ । तयोर्न वशमागच्छेत्तौ ह्यस्य परिपन्थिनौ ॥ ३-३४ ॥

indriyasyendriyasyārthe rāgadveṣau vyavasthitaṭ | tayorna vaśamāgacchetau hyasya paripanthinau || 3-34 ||

indriyasya: of the senses; indriyasya: of the senses; arthe: in the purpose/ object (of the senses); rāga: attraction; dveṣau: aversion/ repulsion; vyavasthitaṭ: in the interaction/ as ordained; tayor: of them; na: not; vaśam: control; agacchet: should go; tau: both of them; bi: certainly; asya: of him; paripanthinau: obstacles/ adversaries.

"Attraction and aversion are ordained/ meant (to result) from the interaction of the senses with the objects of the senses; one should not fall under the control of either of them, because they are both (to be considered as) obstacles (on the path of the performance of duty)."

The senses and the sense objects were created for the purpose of mutual interaction, and this continues also after one has reached the level of liberation, as long as we have a material body. This process, however, continues even in the spiritual world in the spiritual body (siddha deha) with spiritual senses. Without utilizing the senses, how is it possible to perform one's duty, or to engage in devotional service to God? It is impossible. In fact, one of the most famous definitions of bhakti is: brisesheba brisikena sevnam bhaktir uyyate, "to engage the senses in the service of the Lord of the senses" (Narada Pancaratra, quoted in Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, 1.1.12). Senses, mind and body do not necessarily have to be material: they have a spiritual counterpart, too, as it is found in the manifestations of God and his direct associates.

It is true that especially in the beginning of the practice of yoga, one should train the senses to withdraw from the sense objects, just like a tortoise withdraws its limbs within the shell (Gita 2.58), but this is supposed to be a temporary stage. So just like the tortoise cannot even maintain its life if it constantly keeps its limbs within the shell, we need to work in this world - even just to maintain our body. All types of work require the utilization of one's senses, and consequently attraction and repulsion are sure to occur. However, we must continue our work performing our prescribed duties without allowing attraction and repulsion to obstruct our activity. Many people believe that renunciation and detachment should only be directed against the modality of attraction between the senses and the sense objects, while repulsion or aversion are a positive asset that facilitates proper renunciation. To make an example, some people believe that a man who hates women or talks about women in a despising or offensive way will be a good sannyasi. This is not a fact. Rather, this idea is extremely dangerous both for the individual and for society at large. A real sannyasi is a person who has realized the spiritual nature of all living entities, does not identify people with their bodies, and remains neutral towards all. This verse gives the key to the problem: we should not allow attraction or repulsion to control our choices. In other words, we should engage our senses not for our own personal pleasure, but for the proper performance of the action. It is certainly difficult, but it is possible, with constant practice and detachment, when the mind and senses are controlled. The practice of yoga is precisely the training that will enable us to control our mind and senses. It starts with the rules and regulations called yama and niyama, principles that must be followed in all the various disciplines of yoga.

However we need to remember that yama and niyama are just principles of engagement, not taboo laws like in some other traditions. Rules are not established whimsically under considerations of loyalty to a particular group, and must be applied carefully according to time, place, circumstances and person. Even rules and regulations can become obstacles on the path of progress, both because they may stop us from engaging in an activity that is actually favorable to dharma, and conversely because sometimes even sattvic legitimate gratification (allowed by the rules) can become an obstacle, when we become attached to material sattva or goodness. Therefore we need to cultivate intelligence.

श्रेयान्स्वधर्मो विगुणः परधर्मात्स्वनुष्ठितात् । स्वधर्मे निधनं श्रेयः परधर्मो भयावहः ॥ ३-३५ ॥

śreyānsvadharmo viguṇaḥ paradharmātsvanuṣṭhitāt | svadharme nidhanam śreyaḥ paradharmo bhayāvahaḥ || 3-35 ||

śreyaḥ: better; sva: one's own; dharmah: natural ethical engagement; viguṇaḥ: defective/ without (the proper) qualities; para: of others; dharmat: from the natural ethical engagement; su: very well; anuṣṭhitāt: well accomplished; sva-dharme: in one's dharma; nidhanam: destruction/ death; śreyah: better; para-dharmah: the dharma of others; bhaya: fear; avahah: bringing.

"It is better to perform one's own duty even with some imperfections or mistakes, or even if this means meeting with death or destruction, rather than successfully engaging in the duties of others – which is a dangerous choice."

The principle illustrated in this verse can be understood correctly only in the light of the constant process of progress and evolution inherent in human life, based on learning and becoming more qualified. The message of Gita and all the genuine Vedic teachings are aimed at leading each individual to develop and evolve - from the darkness to the light, from mortality to immortality, from material consciousness to spiritual consciousness.

It is difficult to perform one's actual duty, both at the material and at the spiritual level, because it requires us to make a progressive effort, while something that can be performed very easily is certainly below our real potential. By following this principle of striving for progress the individual and society are benefited. It is the same principle of a study course in school, where the students are faced with "difficult" tests and problems as soon as they have come to execute smoothly and perfectly the tests and problems of the previous school years. Thus, it is better to engage in the tasks specifically assigned to us by a competent authority, even if the result is poor, because it means that we are learning and progressing. On the other hand, engaging in a task that is below our potential will easily bring perfect results: every time that life becomes too easy, we know that we are not advancing. We are wasting time, something that constitutes the greatest possible fear: the valuable opportunity of a human birth is not something that we can afford to squander by leading a complacent and easy life.

Some people misinterpret this verse to mean that one should insist to engage in the job or social occupation (prescribed duties) of one's ancestors or family of birth even without possessing the actual qualities, tendencies or abilities, or at the cost of wasting one's real good potential and moral integrity, and without caring about the disastrous results of such artificial engagement.

Such interpretation can only bring degradation both for the individual and for the society, because it is based on the cultivation of ignorance and inertia, a quality that confuses the intelligence of people, causing them to mistake dharmā for adharma and vice versa (Gita 18.32). The commentators propounding such disastrous interpretation sometimes even go as far as referring to bhaya ("fear") in this verse as the fear of hell, or God's punishment for "breaking the social order" of caste prejudice. This misinterpretation is obviously dictated by their heavy abrahamic cultural superimposition, as many of such scholars were educated in Christian mission schools. When a similar misunderstanding is applied to the word dharmā (often mistranslated as "religion", as in loyalty or affiliation to a particular faith or belief) the results become even more destructive, because people develop the idea that they should remain faithful to the beliefs practiced by their fathers, even if such beliefs are faulty and nonsensical. This idea is offensive because it implies that dharmā can in fact be something that is faulty, unethical, damaging to society and nonsensical - not just because we perceive it as such, due to our limited understanding, but because it was so ordained by God. Of course this interpretation ends up completely distorting the meaning of dharmā, because many beliefs, practices and occupations that can be found in the world have very little to do with ethics or they may even be totally unethical. Can there be a criminal dharmā? Should the son of a thief, a rapist, a fraudster, a bank robber, consider himself bound by divine laws to continue in the degrading, destructive, demoniac occupations of his father? The casteist interpreters practically claim he should. By following such a faulty logic, for example, Prahlada the son of the demoniac king Hiranyakasipu would have violated dharmā by becoming a devotee of Vishnu and a mahajana, a great authority on transcendental knowledge.

On the opposite side, the "transcendentalist" commentators try to openly disprove Krishna's clear statements by saying that the instruction contained in this verse only applies to the material platform, but when one is declared (or declares himself) a "transcendentally liberated soul", he is free to do whatever he wants, so a brahmana can act as a kshatriya, or a kshatriya can act as a brahmana etc. This could be seriously misinterpreted, too, causing great disasters both at individual and at social level. It is true that a liberated soul does not identify with any particular position and will be ready to take up any ethical activity when required for assisting the mission of the Lord. But then there is no more question of brahmanas and kshatriyas, or vaisyas or sudras or mlecchas - one is merely the servant of God. When there is still some material identification, the idea of pretending to be "transcendental" can easily appear very convenient, because it can be used as a justification for accepting all the rights of all positions in society and escaping all the relevant duties, often jumping from one position to another and back again, to escape responsibilities, duties and consequences, and run after material benefits and advantages. The examples of Visvamitra and Parasurama are ill chosen to prove this faulty conclusion, because Visvamitra deliberately left his kshatriya identification, position and activities to progress to the natural next stage of brahmana, through a very intense self-training, so much that he actually became a qualified brahmana - recognized even by the great authority Vasistha. He was not a kshatriya "transcendentally" acting as a brahmana. On the other hand, Parasurama never left the position and duties of a brahmana even when he engaged in his 21 military campaigns to exterminate the degraded kshatriyas, because it is a precise duty of the brahmanas to directly remove the bad kings when there is no other option. And it is interesting to notice that Parasurama never claimed any throne or governing position for himself, as any kshatriya would and should have done, because his task was not about the military protection of the prajas. We need to understand that traditionally the brahmanas are responsible for the behavior of the kshatriyas and have the right and the power to remove them if they become really damaging for the kingdom. Parasurama was truly a brahmana.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

अथ केन प्रयुक्तोऽयं पापं चरति पूरुषः । अनिच्छन्नपि वार्ष्णेय बलादिव नियोजितः ॥ ३-३६ ॥

atha kena prayukto'yaṁ pāpaṁ carati pūruṣaḥ । anicchannapi vārṣṇeya balādīva niyojitaḥ ॥ 3-36 ॥

arjuna: Arjuna; uvāca: said; atha: then; kena: by what; prayuktaḥ: impelled; ayaṁ: this; pāpaṁ: sin/ guilty action; carati: does; pūruṣaḥ: a puruṣa (enjoyer); anicchan: without desiring; api: even; vārṣṇeya: o (scion) of Vrishni; balat: by force; iva: like; niyojitaḥ: constrained.

Arjuna said: "O scion of Vrishni (Krishna), what (power) then pushes a man to perform sinful/ negative actions, even without his conscious choice, as if compelled by force?"

Even the best people may commit a mistake. In one moment of weakness or distraction, an ordinarily good person can destroy his entire life, and afterwards bitterly wonder why on earth he has done such a stupid thing. This happens because the individual soul (jīva atman) has the propensity to enjoy (puruṣa - both with male and female bodies) but only possesses a very small amount of power compared to the Supreme, so when he tries to dominate Maya he inevitably falls under Maya's strict control.

This also applies to those hopefuls who want to "declare war to Maya" by castigating all expressions of healthy pleasures and freedom of thought, and consider themselves as the "stalwart generals" of a war they cannot possibly win - comparable to the war waged by moths against a roaring fire. In spite of the glorious vision they have of themselves, they are nothing but upstart little children who are trying to rebel against Mother to impose their own will against hers.

In their patriarchal arrogance and foolishness, they believe that, by fighting against Mother, they are actually doing Father a favor. They project on God their own defects and failures in the field of relationships and conclude that when a woman has power, the man must be "henpecked" and in a disgraceful position. So they take upon themselves the task of "emancipating themselves" from Mother's control and "making things right" in the balance of power in the universe, by exclusively worshipping the Father and attacking Mother in all her forms. Mother may humor them for a short time, but only to keep them even more strictly under her control. Later in Gita (7.14) Krishna will give very clear instructions on this subject, describing Maya as "his divine power", and recommending that one simply surrenders to him (rather than stupidly trying to fight against Maya). Arjuna's question should be examined from the perspective created by the previous verses in a logical thread. Krishna has explained that one should engage the senses, mind and body in the proper activities that constitute one's prescribed duty, and such prescribed duty is determined by one's natural inclinations. These actions will not only be effective for maintaining one's body and ensuring one's livelihood, but they will also serve as a training for one's personal progress and evolution, up to the point of liberation.

Is it therefore natural to wonder why so many people fail to proceed on this beneficial path and stray far from it, even causing great sufferings to themselves, and even without really choosing to pursue degradation. With all these facilities and this perfect plan, how can someone fail, and slide down into disgrace? Krishna will reply in the next verses.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

काम एष क्रोध एष रजोगुणसमुद्भवः । महाशनो महापाप्मा विद्ध्येनमिह वैरिणम् ॥ ३-३७ ॥

kāma eṣa krodha eṣa rajoguṇasamudbhavaḥ । mahāśano mahāpāpmā viddhyenamiha vairiṇam ॥ 3-37 ॥

sri: wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; kama: lust; esha: this; krodha: anger; esha: this; rajab: passion; guna: quality; samudbhavah: born of; maha: great; asanah: devourer; maha: great; papma: source of sin; viddhi: (you should) know; enam: this; iba: here; vairinam: enemy.

The Lord said: "This (power) is (constituted by) desire and anger, and it is born from the quality of passion. Know that it is all-devouring, the cause of great sins, and the (greatest) enemy in this world."

The fundamental power in this material world, as well as in the spiritual world, is Shakti, also called Maya. In the material world she is called Maha Maya and is the origin of the three material qualities or gunas known as sattva (goodness), rajas (passion), tamas (ignorance). In the spiritual world she is called Yoga Maya and is the origin of the three spiritual qualities known as sat (eternity), cit (consciousness) and ananda (happiness).

Power is not bad in itself, just like we cannot blame electricity if we get electrocuted by touching in our rashness and ignorance what we are not supposed to meddle with. Electricity itself can form a fail-safe circuit to protect us from such danger, if we properly follow the instructions. Also, electricity can manifest as heat or cold, movement or sound or even the ability to process data - for example in water heaters, refrigerators, electric motors, radios, TVs and computers. We can compare the three material gunas to three different frequencies or modes of power - sattva helps us to evolve and become better persons, rajas endlessly pushes us to pursue success, pleasure and control, and tamas dulls our consciousness down into laziness, delusion and madness. Later on Krishna will elaborate more on this specific topic of the gunas, because it is extremely important to understand it.

In this verse, Krishna specifies that the kama and krodha that impel the conditioned soul into bad actions are expressed by a specific mode: rajas or passion. Naturally rajas or passion excites material desires for enjoyment and possession, and when such selfish desire is not fulfilled, it turns into anger or rage. This process has already been explained in verses 2.62 and 2.63. This great enemy of progress is called "great devourer" because it is never satiated: the desire for enjoyment and possession has no limits, when it is followed for its own sake and not in the proper performance of one's ethical duties. One who possesses a bicycle will want a motorcycle, one who possesses a motorcycle will want a car, one who possesses a car will want two cars, and one who possesses two cars will want to get more expensive and luxury cars. Even a man who possesses hundreds of luxury cars, like some Arab sheiks do, is not satisfied and he keeps scheming to get more and more. Possessing hundreds of very expensive, stylish superfast cars is obviously not a real necessity, but rather an exercise of base lust. One single person can only use one car at the time, and the necessary speed for normal journeys can be achieved by any average decent vehicle; for longer journeys it is better to use more efficient public transportation. Now, kama and krodha can also manifest in the modes of sattva, when they are properly channeled in the performance of our duty and they do not violate the fundamental principles of dharma (truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness, self-control). This manifestation of kama and krodha is actually desirable because it helps us better perform our duties to family and society, and ultimately in devotional service to the Supreme.

Some commentators give the example of the difference between love and lust, and explain that the soul's original love for God (and all creatures as parts and parcels of God) is transformed into lust by the contact with material nature, like milk is transformed into cheese curds by an acid substance. So by engaging our senses in service or duty to the Supreme, we can transform lust and rage back into pure love. This is a very good explanation, but it is not sufficient.

A warrior cannot just work on transcendental love; he needs to feel some sattvic rage that is not born out of the frustration of his selfish personal desires but out of legitimate indignation against the aggressors of innocent and good people. Similarly, later in the text (7.11) Krishna will clearly say that lust in the mode of sattva or even in the transcendental mode is actually not an enemy, but a very good thing.

धूमेनाव्रियते वह्निर्यथादर्शो मलेन च ।

यथोल्बेनावृतो गर्भस्तथा तेनेदमावृतम् ॥ ३-३८ ॥

dhūmenāvriyate vahniriyathādarśo malena ca | yatholbenāvṛto garbhastathā tenedamāvṛtam || 3-38 ||

dhūmena: by smoke; avriyate: is covered; vahnir: fire; yatha: like; adarsah: a mirror; malena: by dust; ca: and; yatha: similarly; ulbena: by the womb; avritah: covered; garbbah: the embryo; tatha: similarly; tena: by them; idam: this; avritam: covered.

"Like fire is covered by smoke, like a mirror is covered by dirt and like the embryo is covered by the womb, similarly this (consciousness) is covered by these (anger and lust)."

The three examples in this verse refer to the various degrees of angry lust and their effects on the consciousness of the soul. It is said that the fire covered by smoke represents the human form of life, in which lust and rage can actually be easily manipulated to get the fire blazing even more brightly. Smoke is usually seen at the beginning of the development of fire, when it is kindled. The more the fire burns, the drier the firewood gets and the less smoke will be produced. Sometimes fire does not give any smoke at all. The mirror covered by dirt is compared to the condition of animal life, in which the soul's radiance is hidden by layers of immediate material concerns such as eating, sleeping, mating, protecting oneself and one's family, developing social relationships, and so on. The embryo covered by the womb is compared to the dull life of plants and more elementary organisms, such as microbes etc; in such a situation the living entity is totally blind and unable to do anything else but sucking nutrients and growing. The more lust and anger we develop in our search for sense gratification, the more dangerous and destructive we become, and the more we lose our freedom, ending up by concentrating only on the feeling of "acquisition", with no other concern. Animals are certainly more concentrated on acquisition than human beings: they usually spend all the waking hours trying to find some food, with only a limited time reserved for relationships and other concerns. Plants and microbes are even more obsessed, as they feed constantly, day and night, and in fact they do not do anything else.

Some commentators interpret all the three examples to refer to human life; the fire covered by smoke is then the person who has already progressed through the process of self realization and is almost free from material identification and attachments. Just a little breeze is sufficient to sweep away the smoke and let the fire shine fully. The example of the mirror indicates the ordinary human being, who is usually covered by different concerns in life besides lust and anger, while the foolish and degraded people who live in darkness, ignorance and selfishness are compared to the undeveloped embryo.

आवृतं ज्ञानमेतेन ज्ञानिनो नित्यवैरिणा । कामरूपेण कौन्तेय दुष्पूरेणानलेन च ॥ ३-३९ ॥

āvṛtaṁ jñānametena jñānino nityavairiṇā | kāmārūpeṇa kaunteya duṣpūreṇānalena ca || 3-39 || avritam: covered; jnanam: knowledge; etena: by these; jnaninah: of one who knows; nitya: constant; vairina: by the enemy; kama: lust; rupena: by the form of; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); dushpurena: never satisfied; analena: by the fire; ca: and.

"O son of Kunti (Arjuna), these (lust and anger) cover (even) the knowledge of the wise persons. These are a perpetual enemy, an all-consuming fire."

Here the insatiable desire of enjoyment for the sake of pleasure itself is called "the enemy of the wise", because the fools consider it a friend that will bestow all sorts of good things; they can understand its destructive power only after they have become wiser. Wisdom teaches us that it is not good to play with fire carelessly, allowing ourselves to be overcome by its fascination. Those who fall under the control of the desire to possess the fire lose their lives, just like moths become fatally attracted by the heat and light radiated by the fire and end up burning into it. Yet, fire is a very good thing. It is necessary to cook our foods, to heat our bodies and homes in the winter, to bring light in the dark hours, and even to carry our devotional offerings to God. As the firemen know, the wise application of fire (together with the deep knowledge of the wind and other factors) is even used to stop wild fires by counteracting them. There is a big difference between a genuine need and the whimsical lustful desires that are generated by an uncontrolled mind. The hunger for sense gratification and domination for their own sake can never be satisfied, just like it is not possible to quench a fire by regularly adding fuel. On the other hand, the genuine need for sense gratification can be satiated by a reasonable and healthy amount of the pleasures that are beneficial and required for the maintenance of the body and mind. Again, the real point here is not about shunning all sense gratification, but about not allowing it to devour our consciousness and become the most important thing in our life.

Another interpretation of this verse is that jnana, as theoretical knowledge, is not sufficient by itself to face the danger of passionate lust and anger: therefore we need to engage our emotions in bhakti, and our energies in karma yoga. This will harness rajas in the service of visuddha sattva and thus control it effectively, rather than letting it control the activities of the living entity and drag him into tamas. Raja guna, the mode of passion and activity, is a great force that, like all forces, is neutral in itself and can be used for the bad or the good.

इन्द्रियाणि मनो बुद्धिरस्याधिष्ठानमुच्यते ।

एतैर्विमोहयत्येष ज्ञानमावृत्य देहिनम् ॥ ३-४० ॥

indriyāṇi mano buddhirasyādhīṣṭhānamucyate | etairvimohayatyeṣa jñānamāvṛtya dehinam || 3-40 ||

indriyani: the senses; manah: the mind; buddhih: the intellect; asya: of this; adhishtanam: residence; ucyate: it is said; etaih: by (all) these; vimohayati: confuses (in many ways); esha: this; jnanam: the knowledge; avritya: covering; dehinam: of the embodied (soul).

"It is said that the senses, the mind and the intelligence are the seats of this (angry lust), as this (angry lust) confuses and covers the knowledge of the embodied beings."

All those who have a material body (dehinam) have senses, mind and intelligence, that are normally fueled by rajas or passion. This fuel is required to keep the body in action (out of the lethargy of tamas), but as with all combustible substances, its use inevitably exposes us to the dangers of uncontrolled fire. As we have seen, desire is not bad in itself, but it becomes noxious when it takes an angry quality, when it does not content itself with the prasadam, whatever is sent by the kindness of God. Then it becomes the unhealthy center and purpose of life rather than a healthy support to give us strength to continue in our duties. Angry lust pollutes the senses, the mind and the intelligence, distracting them from the real purpose of life and creating a sort of toxic addiction that requires more and more gratification just to keep going and stealing all energy. Again, the solution to the problem is to focus the consciousness in sattva or visuddha sattva, the pure transcendental quality of goodness, as it had already been recommended clearly in 2.45. The sober vision, clarity and enlightenment characteristic of sattva will certainly help us to engage rajas in a constructive and progressive way.

It is important to understand that lust is not only in the senses or in the physical body: it arises in the mind and keeps the intelligence engaged in the pursuit of sense gratification, possession and domination, and the rage that rises from their frustration. Castigating the body with severe and unhealthy penance is not the correct answer, because as Krishna has already stated, one who abstains from sense gratification but still retains the memory of the sense objects is a foolish cheater (3.7). The solution lies much deeper, in the greater power of the soul that can control the intellect and the mind, as Krishna will clearly state in the next verses.

तस्मात्त्वमिन्द्रियाण्यादौ नियम्य भरतर्षभ । पाप्मानं प्रजहि ह्येनं ज्ञानविज्ञाननाशनम् ॥ ३-४१ ॥

tasmāttvaminḍriyāṇyādaū niyamya bharatarṣabha । pāpmānaṁ prajāhi hyenaṁ jñānavijñānāśanam ॥ 3-41 ॥

tasmat: therefore; tvam: you; indriyani: the senses; adau: from the beginning; niyamya: by regulating (through yama and niyama); bharatarṣabha: o best of the descendants of Bharata (Arjuna); pāpmānam: the cause of sin; prajāhi: give up/ vanquish; hi: certainly; enam: this; jñana: theoretical knowledge; vijñana: applied knowledge; naśanam: the destroyer.

"Therefore, o best of the Bharatas (Arjuna), you (should) engage the senses in a regulated way first/ from the very beginning, and then totally abandon/ in order to vanquish this great cause of sinful actions, that can destroy knowledge and wisdom."

One meaning of this verse is that one should first (adau) practice control of the senses and the mind and then ultimately develop complete renunciation. Another meaning of the word adau in this verse is "from the beginning of one's life". As also confirmed by many passages of shastra, the training in dharma and yoga should start from an early age, directly from childhood, so that the individual does not have the opportunity to develop bad habits. This is why young children are sent to the Gurukula to become brahmachari students. The civilized system of Vedic society is also called varnashrama because it is composed by four varnas or occupational categories and by four ashramas or stages of life. The four varnas are brahmanas (intellectuals), kshatriyas (administrators), vaisyas (entrepreneurs) and sudra (laborers). The four ashramas are brahmacharya (student life), grihastha (family life), vanaprastha (retired life) and sannyasa (renunciation). The four ashramas are meant to be applied as follows: all the members of the four varnas should attend the Gurukula and receive some training as *brahmachari*s; those who are unable to complete the course of studies successfully because of insufficient qualities and inclination are categorized as sudras and they are not required to undertake any religious or material responsibility in society. They may marry and have a family, but they are not required to follow all the rules and regulations and perform all the rituals that are prescribed for grihasthas. They can participate to public functions and get the help of brahmanas if they want to have auspicious ceremonies in their homes, but this is not compulsory for them.

Students that qualify on the further level, either as vaisyas, kshatriyas or brahmanas receive the diksha (initiation) and the sacred thread (upavita) that symbolizes that they are competent to perform the ritual ceremonies. They undergo the marriage samskara and the subsequent samskaras for their children, but only the kshatriyas and brahmanas are duty-bound to enter the order of vanaprastha at the age of 50, to dedicate fully in the pursuit of religious activities. Vaisyas have the tendency to remain engaged in their family and even social occupation for as long as they are able to according their physical and mental health; when they become too old and invalid they retire from work but remain in family to be taken care by their adult children.

Kshatriyas and brahmanas, on the other hand, are required to leave their family and go to the forest (panchasonḍhvam vanam vrajet) to perform austerities, live very simply on fruits, roots and forest produce, and avoid social interactions. In alternative, they should travel frequently to pilgrimage places in order to purify themselves from attachments and material identifications. Some people believe that the vanaprastha ashram is meant to "accumulate wealth", but this is exactly the opposite of what the shastras teach. A brahmana or kshatriya is supposed to be more evolved and therefore detached from material possessions, so when old age approaches he leaves the house and professional occupation to his adult son and gets serious about preparing for death. The order of vanaprastha is open both to husband and wife, and they can continue to live together, but practicing self control and gradual renunciation.

However, only the brahmana has the duty to renounce everything and dedicate the last years of his life to great austerities with the purpose of teaching and inspiring society as a sannyasi. The order of complete renunciation (sannyasa) is generally taken by men at the age of 75, after spending 25 years (from 50 to 75) in the stage of vanaprastha. The wife can either become a sannyasini sadhvi and live alone just like male sannyasis do, or go back to live comfortably but modestly with her grown up children until she dies.

Women - like sudras - are not required to perform severe austerities, although there is no prohibition in that sense. This is the perfectly scientific way to practice control over sense gratification. However, it is never too late to start controlling the senses in a regulated way - "from the beginning" also means that one can do any time as soon as he realizes the need to do so.

इन्द्रियाणि पराण्याहुरिन्द्रियेभ्यः परं मनः । मनसस्तु परा बुद्धिर्यो बुद्धेः परतस्तु सः ॥ ३-४२ ॥

indriyāṇi parāṇyāhurindriyebhyaḥ param manah | manasastu parā buddhiryo buddheḥ paratastu saḥ || 3-42 ||

indriyani: the senses; parani: superior; abuh: are said; indriyebhyaḥ: than the senses; param: superior; manah: the mind; manasah: than the mind; tu: but; para: superior; buddhib: intelligence; yah: that; buddheḥ: than intelligence/ intellect; parataḥ: superior; tu: but; sah: he (the atman/ purusha).

"The senses are superior (to this angry lust/ to dull matter), and the mind is superior to the senses. Intelligence is superior to the mind, and he (the soul) is superior to the intellect."

Some commentators explain the first term of comparison in the verse as dull matter, but in the previous verses Krishna has been talking about the "enemy of the wise", the lust and anger born from the guna of passion. In both cases, the senses have the power to engage or not to engage both the material object and the desire, so they are superior to both.

The concept of superiority (para) expressed here is not artificial or arbitrary; it is not a mysterious dogma coming from some obscure theological categories that cannot be verified by practical experience. Vedic knowledge is deeply scientific. The atman is the pure identity of the individual, the "I" that remains the same in spite of the constant change of body and situations. Everything else disappears, but the true identity of the living being never changes. We say "my body" and "my mind", because we instinctively perceive a distinct difference between the subject (the "I") and the object (the "mine"). We, as atman, have the intrinsic power to control our mind and body, therefore we are superior to them. If we do not control them, it's just because of lack of training and practice. The atman can control the mind by using the intelligence or intellect. The difference between mind and intellect is that the intellect is able to discern between a bad idea and a good idea, while the mind elaborates on everything that is supplied by the senses or contained in its memory files. However, the mind is superior to the senses because it can think and doubt, accepting or rejecting the impressions supplied by the senses with the functions called sankalpa (volition, intention, thought, reflection, imagination) and vikalpa (doubt, indecision, error etc).

We can make the example of a computer: the atman is the operator, the intellect is the root system, the mind is composed by all the various software programs, the ten senses are the connections between the computer and the external world - monitor, keyboard, mouse, printer, modem etc - which have both software (subtle) and hardware (gross) components. The body is constituted by the hardware proper. The operator of the computer has the power to give commands to the entire machine. The root system accepts or rejects the software and runs it as required, and the software operates the various connections. The operator can exist without the machine, and similarly the basic system can exist without this or that software. The ten senses are the passive senses of perception (vision, hearing, taste, smell and touch) and the active organs of action (speech, hands, feet, anus and genitals).

एवं बुद्धेः परं बुद्ध्वा संस्तभ्यात्मानमात्मना । जहि शत्रुं महाबाहो कामरूपं दुरासदम् ॥ ३-४३ ॥

evam buddheḥ param buddhvā samstabhyātmānamātmanā | jahi śatruṁ mahābāho kāmārūpaṁ durāsadam || 3-43 ||

evam: thus; buddheḥ: than intellect; param: superior; buddhva: understanding; samstabhya: establishing firmly; atmanam: the self; atmana: with the self/ with the mind; jahi: vanquish; śatrum: the enemy; maha-baho: o mighty armed; kama-rupam: in the form of desire; durasadam: formidable.

"O mighty-armed (Arjuna), thus knowing that (you are/ which is) superior to the intelligence, make yourself stable by your own effort/ focus the mind on the self, and conquer that enemy (that is) the formidable lust."

After scientifically explaining the nature of uncontrolled desire and its negative effects on the consciousness, and offering the solution to the problem, Krishna encourages Arjuna to follow the best course of action, not because he demands obedience, but simply because it is the best thing to do. Similarly, at the conclusion of Gita (18.63), he will clearly tell Arjuna, "I have explained you this knowledge: think about it carefully, and then do what you wish". Krishna gives great importance to intelligence, encouraging Arjuna (and us as well) to engage it to win the battle of life against uncontrolled lust for enjoyment, possession and domination. Apart from the image of the battle, that is a familiar example to a kshatriya like Arjuna, Krishna often mentions the metaphor of the storm, comparing this enemy of uncontrolled desires to a strong wind that sweeps away the mind and senses. In both examples, we can attain success by firmly standing our ground or staying our course with intelligence, without allowing distractions to sweep us away. This obviously highlights the importance of strengthening our own determined intelligence so that it can control the mind and senses. The idea of focusing the Self on the Self (atmanam atmana), in its different hues of meanings, certainly gives a clear message in this direction.

This empowerment of the individual does not take anything away from the concept of surrendering to the Divine Plan and tolerating the constant changes of material nature such as joys and sorrows. Some people misinterpret the meaning of surrender and tolerance, presenting them a sort of passive fatalism, a blind and resigned acceptance of whatever destiny is dishing out. This kind of idea is wrong and creates a serious danger, because it can fool people into falling under the control of unscrupulous and ruthless exploiters who falsely present themselves as "God's representatives" and demand that we surrender to them, renouncing our God given intelligence and personal power.

Chapter 4: Jnana yoga The yoga of knowledge

After clarifying the difference between the temporary material body and the eternal Atman, Krishna continues to answer Arjuna's questions. In the last chapter he explained the concept of duty, and of actual renunciation that consists in performing one's prescribed duty selflessly, without being greedy to enjoy the results of one's actions. He introduced the concept of sacrifice, or the action of performing one's duties as a sacred offering to the Supreme, and explained how the various religious activities are meant for the progress of the individual and not only for the benefit of society and the universe at large.

In this chapter, Krishna explains that this knowledge of sacred action (jnana) is the first step towards the realization of Self and the transcendently conscious way of life called Yoga. The progressive way to act in this world is not just about "doing one's duty", but it is about the evolution of the consciousness: without the proper awareness, the action only carries a fraction of its value, and the individual will not develop his full potential. This is the reason why people feel frustrated and unhappy when they are engaged unwillingly in activities that they feel as mechanical and non-beneficial for their own evolution and for the welfare and progress of the universe. On the other hand, those who feel that their work is constructive and beneficial both for themselves and the community, are happier also in the other areas of their life. The more one grows, the larger is the horizon he becomes able to contemplate: at first he can see only his own benefit, then he expands that field to the people he loves - family, community, nation - and as he opens his mind to the greater reality, he starts to connect with all life and consciousness.

Selfishness is distempered into selflessness when the mind overcomes the illusion of duality, and sees that all life is one: at this level, the human being becomes an active player in the plan of God, a co-worker with the Devas that control, nurture and protect the universe, and his consciousness becomes divine. This was illustrated in the "wheel of reciprocation" of which Krishna spoke in verses 3.11 to 3.16. But there is more to this development of consciousness than simply becoming cooperative with the Divine: by engaging selflessly in sacred action, one approaches the Supreme Reality that is even above and beyond the level of the Devas, the Supreme Personality of Godhead that is called Krishna, the Supreme Consciousness, that is truly perfect in eternity, knowledge and happiness.

All those who can't make out the meaning of life and find only loss, pain and despair in the world, are suffering unnecessarily, and only because they are getting everything backwards, out of ignorance: they don't know how the world is supposed to function, and how they are supposed to function as persons. Thus they keep running in the wrong direction, after the projection of their basic needs - permanence, knowledge, bliss - distancing themselves further and further from the Reality they aspire to. The pursuit of happiness is a very legitimate quest, but what if we are going in the wrong direction? Do we know what happiness is? Would we be able to recognize it when we see it? This is why people need teachers: they need to get the proper directions from those who have already found the happiness that is accompanied by awareness and consciousness, and is not lost in the ups and downs of the ocean of material existence. A qualified teacher is one who has the direct and complete vision of Reality and can train us to attain the same level. This knowledge is eternal, and every time it becomes forgotten, God descends into the world to re-establish it. So we can find it in the Guru (the teacher and guide), in the Shastra (the genuine scriptures) and in the Sadhus (good people). The power of transcendental knowledge gives a deeper meaning to all activities - including the occupational duties of the traditional varnashrama system and to the performance of the different modalities of yajnas, that culminate with the development of knowledge and awareness. In this chapter, Krishna begins to reveal his supreme transcendental position, opening the path of Bhakti yoga, devotional service to God, as the genuine path to Self realization. By understanding the spiritual nature of God and his activities, one can achieve liberation from material conditionings and unite with God.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

इमं विवस्वते योगं प्रोक्तवानहमव्ययम् ।

विवस्वान्मनवे प्राह मनुरिक्ष्वाकवेऽब्रवीत् ॥ ४-१ ॥

imaṁ vivasvate yogaṁ proktavānahamavyayam । vivasvānmanave prāha manurikṣvākave'bravit ॥ 4-1 ॥

sri: wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; imam: this; vivasvate: to Vivasvan (Surya); yogam: Yoga; proktavan: instructed; aham: I; avyayam: eternal; vivasvan: Vivasvan; manave: to Manu; praha: told; manuh: Manu; ikṣvākave: to Ikshvaku; abravit: told.

The Lord said: "I have explained this eternal (science of) Yoga to Vivasvan, and Vivasvan taught it to Manu, and Manu told it to Ikshvaku."

In another passage of the Mahabharata (Santi parva, 348.51-52), it is said that at the beginning of the Treta yuga, Vivasvan instructed Manu, who in turn instructed his son Ikshvaku for the benefit of all the people. However, this knowledge (yogam) is eternal (anyayam) and did not originate at that particular time. Nobody "invented" Yoga: it is rather the original blue-print for life, therefore exists eternally even before the creation of the universe. Another meaning of anyayam, "imperishable", indicates that the practice of Yoga brings eternal and permanent results.

Vivasvan is another name for Surya. At the beginning of creation, Brahma generated from his mind the Rishi Marici, who generated Rishi Kashyapa from his wife Dakshayani. In turn, Kashyapa generated the 12 Adityas ("sons of Aditi"), including Surya. Surya is the father of Sraddha Manu (also called Vaivasvata or "son of Vivasvan", born from Surya's wife Samjna), the seventh Manu in the day of Brahma. This Vaivasvata Manu was formerly King Satyavrata, the ruler of Dravida, and had a central role in the story of the avatara of Vishnu called Matsya (fish) being saved by him from the Great Flood that saw the end of the reign of the previous Manu. The ten sons of Vaivasvata Manu were:

1. Ikshvaku: he had 100 sons, who populated and ruled the entire earth. The eldest were Vikukshi, Nimi and Dandaka. Vikukshi was banned from the kingdom because he violated the Vedic rules, but was readmitted after atoning. He performed many yajnas and had a long dynasty. His son Puranjaya was also called Indravaha because he convinced Indra to become his bull carrier while he fought against the Asuras on behalf of the Devas. His descendant Mandhata became the emperor of the entire planet consisting of the seven continents (sapta dvipa) and had 3 sons (including Purukutsa who married the Nagini Narmada, and Muchukunda) and 50 daughters, who all married Saubhari Muni. Among the descendants of Purukutsa, Trishanku (for whom Visvamitra performed the famous sacrifice), Sagara (whose asvamedha horse was stolen by Indra), Bhagiratha (who brought Ganga to earth), and Mitrasaha (who became a rakshasa). As he could not have children, Mitrasaha asked Vasistha to generate a son with his wife Madayanti, whose descendant Balika survived the slaughter of the kshatriyas by Parasurama. His descendant Khatvanga became the ancestor of Raghu, the ancestor of the avatara Ramachandra.
2. Nriga, who was transformed into a lizard due to a curse and was delivered by Krishna many yugas later.
3. Saryati, who was very expert in Vedic knowledge and gave instructions about the yajna performed by the Angirases (the sons of Angira). Saryati's daughter Sukanya became the wife of Chyavana Rishi, a descendant of Bhrigu Rishi, who defeated Indra to help the Asvini kumaras to get the somarasa during the yajna. Saryati had 3 sons: Uttanabarhi, Anarta and Bhurisen. Anarta's son Revata had 100 sons; the eldest, named Kakudmi, gave his daughter Revati to Baladeva as his wife.
4. Dishta, whose son Nabhaga had descendants who became vaisyas; however Khaninetra (one of their descendants in the line going through Nabhaga- Bhalandana- Vatsapriti- Pramsu- Pramati-Khanitra- Chakshusha- Vivimsati- Rambha) became a great kshatriya king. His descendant Marutta (in the line Khaninetra-Karandhama-Avikshit) became a great emperor, at whose yajna celebration Indra became intoxicated by drinking too much somarasa. Another great king in the dynasty was Trinabindu, who married the Apsara Alambusha, whose daughter Ilavila became the mother of Kuvera, the Deva of wealth.
5. Dhrista, whose kshatriyas sons the Dharshitas became brahmanas,
6. Karushaka, who became the founder of the northern Karusha dynasty,
7. Narishyanta, in whose descendance Agni appeared as Agnivehsya or Jatukarnya Rishi, founder of the brahmana dynasty called Agnivesyayana,
8. Prishadhra, who mistakenly killed a cow and retired into penance for the rest of his life as atonement,
9. Nabhaga, whose son Naabhaga obtained the blessings of Shiva Mahadeva and became the father of Maharaja Ambarisha, the great devotee who could not be touched by the curse of the great brahmana Durvasa.
10. Kavi, who became a naishtika brahmachari and therefore had no children.

All human beings are descendants of these sons. Vaivasvata Manu also had a daughter called Ila (the first born), who periodically changed into a male called Sudyumna. As a woman, Ila/ Sudyumna married Budha (Mercury), the son of Chandra (the Moon) and had four sons named Pururava, Utkala, Gaya and Vimala. The fourteen Manus in this day of Brahma are Yajna (Svayambhuva Manu, son of Brahma), Vibhu (Svarocisha Manu), Satyakshena (Uttama Manu), Hari (Tamas Manu), Vaikuntha (Raivata Manu), Ajita (Cakshusha Manu), Sraddhadeva (Vaivasvata Manu, the current one), Sarvabhauma (Savarni Manu), Rishabha (Daksha savarni Manu), Visvakshena (Brahma savarni Manu), Dharmasetu (Dharma savarni Manu), Sudhama (Rudra savarni Manu), Yogesvara (Deva savarni Manu), Brihadbhanu (Indra savarni Manu).

एवं परम्पराप्राप्तमिमं राजर्षयो विदुः । स कालेनेह महता योगो नष्टः परन्तप ॥ ४-२ ॥

evam paramparāprāptamimam rajarṣayo viduḥ | sa kāleneha mahatā yogo naṣṭaḥ parantapa || 4-2 ||

evam: thus; param para: from one to the next; prāptam: obtained; imam: this; rajarshayah: by the Raja Rishis; viduḥ: they understood; saḥ: this (knowledge of yoga); kāleneha: with time; mahata: a lot of; yogah: (the knowledge of) yoga; naṣṭah: destroyed/ lost; parantapa: o tormentor of the enemy.

"O Parantapa (Arjuna), in this way the Raja Rishis have learned this (knowledge) in a descending line, but after such a long time (this) Yoga has become lost."

This verse is quoted very often to stress the importance of the disciplic succession in the study of Gita and spiritual life in general, accusing those "scholars that are not in the authorized disciplic succession" to give faulty interpretations and to make a good business out of it without actually accepting its instructions.

This is a very good point, but it might be misinterpreted and exploited by other parties, who - in spite of claiming to be "the authorized disciplic succession" (if not "the only authorized" disciplic succession) - are also interested in making a good business out of it without actually accepting and following its genuine and original instructions. These unqualified followers present themselves as "authorized" not on the basis of their own transcendental realization, knowledge and behaviors, but on the basis of seminal rights (being the sexual descendants of a person who was realized and applied his knowledge into practice) or on the basis of legal or political rights (being the voted representatives of an Organization or having similar or equivalent certification by Government or court). Such credentials are not sufficient to prove their qualification to the position of teachers: one must actually know and understand the subject he wants to teach, and demonstrate such knowledge and understanding by applying them in his/ her daily life and choices. This is not guaranteed genetically or politically, and rather we should be wary of the very fact that a person who is supposed to teach us how to transcend material identifications and attachments is presenting his authority as built on the basis of material identifications and attachments. In fact, here in this verse we find a clear statement to the effect that disciplic successions regularly become lost because of the passing of time, and that when such unfortunate but inevitable thing happens, it is necessary to drop them and to revive the genuine knowledge of Yoga into society by presenting it anew, in the most suitable format of time, place and circumstances.

Some commentators observe that the knowledge of Yoga was lost because it was transmitted to weak and unqualified people who did not have sufficient understanding. This is certainly a good point, but it also needs a deeper examination: we should not content ourselves of some superficial verdict that shifts the blame on "unqualified people", because such lack of qualification is not at all uncommon, especially in Kali yuga. What to speak of the self-realized acharyas, even the spiritual lineages established by Personalities of Godhead such as the direct avatars of Vishnu or Shiva, who regularly descend to teach this knowledge to the sincere souls, end up losing their original spirit and intrinsic power: this is precisely the reason why the number of the avatars and acharyas needs to be unlimited. The actual factor is clearly explained in this verse: the loss of knowledge is inevitable, because of the time factor. The "great span" of time is relative to the particular season of the universe: in Satya yuga it may refer to thousands of years, while in Kali yuga it may refer to a few decades only, depending on how quickly time changes the circumstances in which people live. Transcendental knowledge is eternal and unchangeable, but every time it must be presented in a specific way according to the level of development and understanding of the interested people. When circumstances change, it becomes extremely difficult to properly understand the previous presentation, because the cultural references that we use in our daily life play a central role in the application of knowledge.

Each particular situation in time and space is defined by opportunities, problems, issues, limitations, and a course of action that is most suitable for the greatest number of people; sometimes these factors can change so dramatically and drastically that the only proper way to proceed is by reversing the previous direction. For example, about 5000 years ago Veda Vyasa compiled the scriptures for the people of Kali yuga, and after a relatively short time the situation had already become very degraded, so Buddha appeared to deflect the people's attention away from the Vedic scriptures and the ritualistic ceremonies and direct it to the basics of dharma: truthfulness, compassion, purity, self-control, detachment from material identification and enjoyment, simplicity, nonviolence, philosophical search etc - that is precisely the definition of Knowledge as per Gita (13.8-12). After an even shorter time, Buddha's particular presentation of Knowledge became outdated because the problems and issues to be solved in human society had changed considerably; from the position of spiritual revolutionaries, his disciplic succession had become reactionary and effectively obstructed the progress of people. Then Adi Shankara appeared, to re-establish the faith of people in Vedic scriptures and tradition, but in a format that was more suitable to the new circumstances.

Similarly, all the other subsequent acharyas from various perspectives (vaishnava, shaiva, etc) presented the very same eternal Knowledge, but from a particular point of view that was most suitable for the understanding to the people they were talking to. This does not mean that we should throw away the books written by ancient teachers, or that we should disrespect the genuine acharyas of the past: rather, we need to carefully study their teachings in their original form, and considering the particular historical circumstances when such teachings were expressed. Some people believe that we can or should continue to utilize the texts of the previous acharyas but do some "editing" - modifying or removing what is not relevant and adding whatever may be more relevant today than in the past. This is a big mistake. It is much better, more honest and truthful, to write a new book under one's own responsibility and name than to tamper with the books written by others and use their names to claim some authority for what has been actually written by us. In fact, here the questionable concept of the absolute value of the seminal or political disciplic succession stands as a serious stumbling block, because it seems to give the opportunity for personally unqualified people to teach and enforce defective conclusions and occupy positions from which they create a lot of damage to society. They claim that they are "official disciples, representatives and successors" of the actually qualified acharya and this automatically makes them genuine authorities - something that in their eyes includes the power to modify the teachings of the acharya himself.

In this verse we see that Krishna instructed Arjuna because according to him at that time the transmission of this knowledge had been lost and the purpose of the lineage had been defeated. The proof is given by the observation of how society has become degraded. However, the solution is simple. The Vedic tradition stands for the greatest freedom of thought and expression: at any time a new disciplic lineage can be started, and the value of such lineage depends on the value of the teachings that are transmitted.

The definition of Raja Rishi offered by this verse shows that not only brahmanas, but kshatriyas and any other member of society (9.32-33) can attain the perfection of Self realization and therefore become qualified to start a spiritual lineage.

स एवायं मया तेऽद्य योगः प्रोक्तः पुरातनः । भक्तोऽसि मे सखा चेति रहस्यं ह्येतदुत्तमम् ॥ ४-३ ॥

sa evāyaṁ mayā te'dya yogaḥ proktaḥ purātanah | bhakto'si me sakha ceti rahasyaṁ hyetaduttamam || 4-3 ||

sah: that (same); eva: certainly; ayam: this; mayā: by me; te: to you; adya: today; yogaḥ: yoga; proktaḥ: explained; puratanah: very ancient; bhaktah: devotee; asi: you are; me: to me; sakha: friend; ca: and; iti: thus; rahasyam: secret; hi: certainly; etat: this; uttamam: supreme/transcendental.

"Today I am (explaining) to you the same (knowledge of) Yoga that was discussed in the ancient times; (because) you are my devotee and friend (I give you) this supreme secret."

The expression bhakto 'si me sakha ceti highlights the fact that Arjuna has a personal relationship with Krishna in a sentiment of friendship (sakhya rasa), one of the various sentiments that a devotee (bhakta) can have towards God. Already in 3.31-32 Krishna clearly said that an envious person will not be able to accept the teachings of Gita. This is due to the fact that envy will make one blind to the actual value of the teaching, and therefore an envious person will not accept Krishna as an authority. Bhakti is exactly the opposite: when love and devotion are present, each and every small word is valued like a wonderful treasure, with the eager attention that enables us to see its deepest or "secret" meanings.

Bhakti, loving devotion, is a major requirement in the process of attaining self-realization and the divine platform – in fact, as Krishna repeats again and again in Gita, it is the crucial requirement. However, we need to make a distinction between genuine bhakti and the cheap superficial sentimental attraction of prakrita sahayas that is usually also called "devotion". Genuine bhakti is supported by deep and solid knowledge and renunciation – jnana and vairagya. Materialistic and superficial persons have a simplistic vision of the different rasas and personal relationships with God, so to please their material ego and pride they may artificially present themselves as devotees in the "highest rasa" – the parakiya madhurya rasa of the gopis of Vrindavana, who were the secret lovers of Krishna in Vrindavana and neglected their wedded husbands to join Krishna in the rasa lila. In spite of their strong identification with the material body and their numerous anarthas, gross behavioral problems and heavy attachments to material position, fame, name, profit and sense gratification, these deluded persons often project imaginative fantasies about their supposed ecstatic intimate service in "Goloka Vrindavana", in the illusion that such dreaming is sufficient to qualify them as the highest devotees and authorities in the field of devotion. Sometimes this delusional mentality can even confuse the minds of people to the point they believe that they are entitled to commit offenses towards great devotees "in lower rasas" (such as svakiya or legitimate conjugal sentiment, vatsalya or parental sentiment, sakhya or friendship, and dasya or service in respect and admiration) or even to the direct forms of the Lord who characteristically interact with devotees in such relationships.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca |

अपरं भवतो जन्म परं जन्म विवस्वतः । कथमेतद्विजानीयां त्वमादौ प्रोक्तवानिति ॥ ४-४ ॥

aparaṁ bhavato janma paraṁ janma vivasvataḥ | kathametadvijānīyāṁ tvamādaḥ proktavāniti || 4-4 ||

arjuna: Arjuna; uvāca: said; aparam: inferior/ junior; bhavataḥ: your; janma: birth; param: superior/ senior; janma: birth; vivasvataḥ: of Vivasvan; katham: how; etat: this; vijānīyam: I am to understand; tvam: you; adau: in the beginning; proktavan: instructor; iti: thus.

Arjuna said: "Vivasvan appeared long before you (appeared), (so) he is much older than you. How am I to understand that in the beginning (of creation) you instructed him?"

In this verse we see that although he is a devotee and a friend, and free from envy, Arjuna does not hesitate to question what Krishna is saying. As we have already mentioned a few times, questioning the authority cannot be considered an offensive behavior; rather, it is a basic and crucial part of the process of acquiring the proper knowledge, because it helps making sure that we have actually understood the teachings, both in theory and practice. This is why questions can and should cover both the teachings and the personal behavior of the teachers. Whenever a teacher constantly refuses to answer questions, or even worse, becomes incensed at questions and considers them offensive, we should understand that he is not a qualified teacher and should be immediately abandoned. Of course sometimes the student may not be able to understand answers that are above his level of knowledge, but a good teacher has the duty to find the best way to present the concepts - usually with examples, as we can see from all the scriptures and the recordings of the teachings of the acharyas.

Krishna is speaking to Arjuna on the battlefield of Kurukshetra, about 5000 years ago, and he had taken birth as the son of Vasudeva and Devaki only a relatively short time before that, while Vivasvan (Surya) had received this same Knowledge of Yoga at least several thousands of years earlier, in Treta Yuga, and was born from Kashyapa, son of Marici, son of Brahma at the beginning of creation. So from the historical point of view, Arjuna's question makes sense. Only, it is relative sense, because the historical perspective does not consider that the individual continues to exist lifetime after lifetime. At the beginning of his instructions (Gita 2.12) Krishna had already explained to Arjuna that everyone continues to exist even after death because of the process of reincarnation, although in different bodies the conditioned soul has difficulties in recovering the memories of his previous lifetimes. Individuals who are excessively identified with the present body – as man or woman, tall or short, white or black, young or old – and the social position – nationality, family of birth, caste, financial position, occupation etc. - cannot possibly recall memories of bodies that were quite different and/or occupied a very different social position.

All the ancient civilizations normally accepted the concept of reincarnation, although during the last 1500 years such concept was banned and persecuted in western culture. Now it has come out again with renovated energy and relevance to people's individual and collective life, inspired by the growing influence and diffusion of the teachings of yoga in western countries. Paradoxically, such knowledge of reincarnation and yoga has become much more influential in western countries, where it had been absent for a long time, than in India where it was preserved in an uninterrupted way for thousands of years. The knowledge of reincarnation is based on the fundamental point that we are not the material body we are presently having. Giving up the identification with the present temporary body and its characteristics, and being able to see oneself as the soul, not tied to any specific historical designation, is the necessary pre-requisite for anyone to be able to remember and integrate past lifetimes, because this requires to be able to see oneself in a different historical designation, and a different body, with sufficient openness of mind. The best philosophical and psychological environment that favors the useful and harmonic integration of the memories of previous lifetimes is Vedic knowledge, especially the science of yoga, that gives the most complete, detailed and precise knowledge of reincarnation. Some people state that it is not a good thing to try and remember one's previous lifetimes, and that we should concentrate on solving the problems of this life, but they do not understand that the lessons we failed to learn properly in our previous lifetimes, or we learned and forgot, are precisely the reason why we find it difficult to solve our problems in this lifetime. When our calculations prove wrong, and don't add up as we had expected, we may want to get our old books out and verify if we actually remember the multiplication table correctly, even if that was part of the school curriculum of a previous year.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

बहूनि मे व्यतीतानि जन्मानि तव चार्जुन । तान्यहं वेद सर्वाणि न त्वं वेत्थ परन्तप ॥ ४-५ ॥

bahūni me vyatītāni janmāni tava cārjuna । tānyaham veda sarvāṇi na tvam vettha parantapa ॥ 4-5 ॥

sri: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; bahuni: many; me: my; vyatītāni: have passed; janmāni: births; tava: your; ca: and; arjuna: Arjuna; tāni: those; aham: I; veda: I know; sarvāni: all; na: not; tvam: you; vettha: you know; parantapa: o scorcher of the enemy.

The Lord said: "O Arjuna, both you and I have known many lifetimes. I remember them all, while you do not, o Parantapa."

The name Sri Bhagavan is regularly used to refer to Krishna in Gita. We have already elaborated on its meaning in the commentary to verse 2.11, so we will not repeat the explanation here. Another interesting name that we find now and then in Gita refers to Arjuna: Parantapa is composed by param ("other") tapa ("scorching"), and indicates that Arjuna's enemies are scorched by the sun of his prowess. By addressing Arjuna with this name, Krishna is hinting that he is not an ordinary man and therefore he must already know the answer to the question.

It is perfectly possible to remember one's previous lifetimes, although certainly our limited material mind can contain only a limited amount of memories and thoughts at the conscious level. The subconscious level is much larger (although still limited) and it is used to store all the useful memories of all our past lifetimes, but it is not easily accessible by the conscious mind. Apart from the avatars that are direct manifestations of Vishnu or Shiva or Shakti, who have unlimited divine powers and perfect omniscience, even the individual jīvatmas can remember their previous lifetimes. Spontaneously remembering at the conscious level usually does not happen because most of such memories would be overwhelming and traumatic; the same thing happens with difficult memories of this life itself, that refer to denied values or needs, feelings or thoughts that our subconscious has come to consider improper or negative. However, the memories remain buried somewhere in the subterranean cells of the subconscious and can come out from time to time in the form of vague and distant impressions, dreams, feelings and emotions. Their presence is constantly manifested in the form of innate inclinations, qualities, fears, talents, ability to understand and learn a subject rather than another, attraction and repulsion, unexplained certainties etc. The subconscious is the guardian of all these memories and only lets them surface at the conscious level when it sincerely believes that such memories will be useful. Since the subconscious is generally programmed by habits, impressions, decisions made at conscious level or accepted from a figure of authority, our subconscious will not approve memories of previous lifetimes if it has been conditioned to think that we do not have previous lifetimes, or that remembering them is improper. The same thing happens with traumatic or difficult memories even of this life itself. Memories of previous lifetimes are more difficult to remember than the memories of this lifetime because the conscious mind has more difficulties in identifying with them, due to strong bodily identification (with a particular form, relationships, role, etc). The more one identifies with the present body (gender, race, nationality, age), the more difficult it is to remember things that are connected to a different body. It is not possible to remember everything about our previous lifetimes anyway, because our mind is limited. This is the difference between the supreme Consciousness and the individual consciousness of which Krishna is speaking in this verse. However, the fact that we cannot possibly know everything should not stop us from making an effort to gain a reasonable amount of important and relevant knowledge that will help us solve the problems we face every day.

अजोऽपि सन्नव्ययात्मा भूतानामीश्वरोऽपि सन् । प्रकृतिं स्वामधिष्ठाय सम्भवाम्यात्ममायया ॥ ४-६ ॥

ajo'pi sannavyayātmā bhūtānāmīśvaro'pi san । prakṛtiṁ svāmadhiṣṭhāya sambhavāmyātmamāyayā ॥ 4-6 ॥

ajah: unborn; api: although; san: being; aryaya-atma: imperishable Self; bhutanam: of the living entities/ conditions of life; isvarah: the Supreme Lord; api: although; san: being; prakritim: nature; svam: (my) own; adbisthaya: controlling/ situated; sambhavami: I take birth; atma-mayaya: through (my) own power.

"Although I am unborn and imperishable, and although I am the Supreme Lord of the creatures/ states of being, I am present in/ I control this prakriti that belongs to me, and I manifest myself out of my own power."

As we will also see later in Gita, Krishna is not an ordinary man, not even an ordinary liberated soul. The word Isvara makes this point very clear. There is only one Isvara: there cannot be two or more, as Isvara is the Supreme Lord by definition.

The nature (prakriti) of the Supreme Lord is characterized by the power of control (aisvarya) that includes omniscience and omnipotence. Therefore even when he takes birth, the Lord continues to maintain the perfect awareness - knowledge and memory - of his own nature and the events of his previous appearances, as well as the awareness of the nature and events regarding all other living entities and the universe itself. This is why he is the Lord of all living beings and all states of being.

The definition of aryaya is "imperishable", and in this case it applies not only to the eternal nature of spirit, but also to the awareness of Isvara. His power of knowledge and awareness is never diminished by the limitations of material nature or by circumstances, even when taking birth in this world. The ordinary living entities, on the other hand, are forced to die and take birth by the laws of material nature to which they are subject. The shock of birth knocks out all the memory and knowledge from them, so that they gradually need to learn everything again, including walking and talking. The jivatma can become liberated and progress to expand his individual consciousness by eliminating the limitations and barriers of material bodily identifications, but such progress is limited by the atomic size of the jiva that is called anu-atma ("atomic soul"). All jivatmas are simply cells in the body of the Supreme: it is impossible for one single cell to attain the expanse of consciousness of an entire body.

In these verses Krishna begins to reveal his true divine nature in response to Arjuna's doubts. It appears that previously the relationship between Krishna and Arjuna had been very familiar and affectionate, but based on the sentiments of friendship between equals (sakhya rasa), as it will be confirmed later in the text (11.41-42). The crisis of Arjuna's sadness at the onset of the battle has opened new doors to his perception, and he has already moved from the mood of friendship to the position of student and disciple accepting Krishna as his teacher or guru. But Krishna is not just any teacher. His authority comes from a depth of consciousness and knowledge that is not as limited as the human beings', and his awareness is never clouded or interrupted by the changes of the material mind and body. Rather than being the product of the circumstances offered by the level of evolution of the material body, the consciousness of Krishna is independent from all material conditions and actually produces the circumstances and the body or form he uses to perform his activities. It is the complete control of consciousness over the universal manifestation, the Yoga Maya: the highest and supreme power of Yoga, that is expressed in the relationship between Purusha and Prakriti, between Isvara and Shakti.

The individual living entities, being parts and parcels of Isvara (God), also carry a reflection of this purushatva, this power to control nature and matter and enjoy it, but because they are limited they become controlled by the Shakti instead of controlling her: therefore they experience her as Maha Maya, the great power of illusion, the manifestation of material nature. However, it is sufficient for them to overcome their material delusion (ahankara and mamata) to move to a different level of perspective, and become happily situated in the divine consciousness. This paradigm shift is like realizing that we have been swimming against the strong current of the river, and making the conscious and deliberate choice of swimming in the natural direction of the flow of things instead of struggling to impose our own will power. Instantly, as we surrender to the flow of reality, we become relieved of our fatigue and anxiety, and we find that we are traveling much faster towards our actual destination. We stop being hostile to the river and we become a part of the river itself, as our attention is directed towards the purpose and goal of the river: attaining the ocean. This supreme consciousness that we call Krishna Consciousness is the ocean of happiness, knowledge and eternity: the very purpose and goal that we have sought lifetime after lifetime in our pursuit of real happiness.

यदा यदा हि धर्मस्य ग्लानिर्भवति भारत । अभ्युत्थानमधर्मस्य तदात्मानं सृजाम्यहम् ॥ ४-७ ॥

yadā yadā hi dharmasya glānirbhavati bhārata । abhyutthānamadharmaṣya tadātmanam sṛjāmyaham ॥ 4-7 ॥

yada yada: whenever/ every time; hi: certainly; dharmasya: of the dharma; glaniḥ: decline; bhavati: becomes; bharata: o descendant of Bharata (Arjuna); abhyutthanam: rise; adharmaṣya: of the adharma; tada: at that time; atmanam: my self; srijami: I create/ manifest; aham: I.

"O descendant of Bharata (Arjuna), whenever dharma declines and adharma rises, at that time I manifest myself."

This is one of the most famous verses of Gita. Unfortunately, at present it is also one of the least understood, mostly because the influence of tamas has caused people to lose the knowledge and awareness of what is exactly dharma versus adharma. The same tendency to ignorance has always prevented ordinary people from actually recognizing a divine manifestation or a divine mission; usually the avatars and acharyas become universally acknowledged rather later in the course of their lives, or even after they have disappeared. So much that usually the avatars and acharyas are faced with opposition especially from those who consider themselves the guardians of the religious or social traditions among their contemporaries.

At present we can see the conditions for the appearance of the Divine Principle, and in fact such appearance might already have happened. When the society becomes degraded, and the good people who have knowledge become too attached to sattva and they "do not want troubles" so they do not speak up, the need for divine intervention is most urgent.

In Kali yuga it is not easy to recognize an avatara, because there are lots of people who try to make a career for themselves by claiming to be an incarnation of God, sometimes even trying to get recognized legally by courts. In fact, this should be considered a disqualification rather than a qualification, because in Kali yuga a real incarnation of God will present himself merely as a devotee of God, not as God himself. This means that God does not descend in this world with the purpose of being worshiped and recognized as God, but to work tirelessly to encourage people to become situated in genuine dharmā and to progress in transcendental Knowledge. Unfortunately, it is much easier to follow a personality cult, as we can see from the innumerable fan and groupie clubs that grow around movie actors, pop singers or musicians, or sports personalities. The behavior of such fans and groupies can easily be described as deep devotion, as they undoubtedly manifest extremely strong emotions of love and dedication, to the point of ecstasy - fainting, crying, raising of hairs, stuttering, etc. They also go through unbelievable hardships, sacrificing their own bodies and minds, as well as considerable amounts of money and time, just to literally worship their idols. They wear T-shirts and badges with the faces or names of their idols, constantly think about them and speak about them to anyone who will listen and preferably with other fellow fans - creating websites, magazines, and clubs specifically for this purpose. However, the divine mission is not aimed at channeling energies towards a mere personality cult, but at establishing the actual ethical principles of dharmā, protecting the good people and destroying the evil doers - as it is clearly stated in the next verse.

The Divine Principle manifests itself as the circumstances require. It can be carried by a simple devotee who preaches it, or may do so directly or indirectly as an avatara. The meaning of avatara is not very easy to understand, because it goes beyond the material body and elements and has no limitations of space, time or even individuality. Direct manifestations are called svamsa ("own parts") avataras while indirect manifestations are called vibhinnaṃsa ("separated parts") or śaktyaveśa ("invested with power") avataras. The direct manifestations are God, while the indirect manifestations are liberated individual souls, that may have been liberated before descending in this world for their particular mission, or became liberated while in the material world and received the power for the spiritual mission. Some ignorant people believe that God/ Krishna can only appear in India (bharate) and their low proficiency in grammar and spelling makes them conclude that bharata in this verse means "in India". This is ridiculous. Krishna is addressing Arjuna as "descendant of Bharata", just like he is doing in so many other verses in Gita, without any connection to geographical locations. God can appear wherever he likes, not only in any place on this planet and from any human community, but even on other planets or among other species of life.

परित्राणाय साधूनां विनाशाय च दुष्कृताम् । धर्मसंस्थापनार्थाय सम्भवामि युगे युगे ॥ ४-८ ॥

paritrāṇāya sādṛhūnām vināśāya ca duṣkṛtām । dharmasamsthāpanārthāya sambhavāmi yuge yuge ॥ 4-8 ॥

paritrāṇāya: for the protection/ deliverance; sādṛhūnām: of the good people; vināśāya: for the destruction; ca: and; duṣkṛtām: of the evil doers; dharmā: of dharmā; samsthāpana: the full establishment; arthāya: for the purpose of; sambhavāmi: I manifest; yuge yuge: from age to age.

"I manifest myself yuga after yuga, to protect the good people, destroy the evil doers and to establish dharmā."

This verse is also very famous and very often quoted, and misinterpreted according to the particular identifications and attachments of those who read it. The three key words are sādṛhu, duṣkṛta, and dharmā. Sādṛhu literally means "good" or "saintly", and for those who understand and practice the genuine ethics of the Vedic tradition it refers to the people who are dedicated to sincerely pursue the path of knowledge, truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness and self control, free from material identifications and attachments and ready to sacrifice themselves for the greater good. Such people always behave in accordance to the universal principles of ethical action, and they never commit any crime or selfish action.

Duṣkṛta literally means "evil doers", and obviously refers to the people who commit evil deeds. The word kṛta comes from the same root of karma, and clearly indicates action or activity. The persons that are destroyed by the avataras of God are not simply ignorant or foolish people deluded by false knowledge or beliefs, because the progressive system of life in this world will automatically and naturally take care of their individual evolution. Rather, these duṣkṛta are those who objectively constitute a major problem to the progress of others, because they behave aggressively against the progress of individuals and society. They are hostile to knowledge and worship ignorance, fight against truthfulness and compassion, and always try to control others to subdue them to their own domination. These people will be described later in chapter 16, entitled the daivāsura sampad vibhāga yoga: the yoga of differentiating between the characteristics of the divine and the demoniac personalities. Unfortunately, due to ignorance some people misinterpret the meaning of dharmā as a particular established/ institutionalized religion, self-righteous conventional moralism, ideological dogma, or even birth prejudice as "caste", and therefore the words sādṛhu and duṣkṛta become accordingly distorted. So sādṛhu is translated as a "pious man" or a "devotee" (in a very bigoted sense), and duṣkṛta is translated as "miscreant": a person who is automatically considered depraved and villainous simply because he is a "non-believer" or a "heretic" in the eyes of the politicized religious institutions. After pinning such distorted meanings to the definitions, it is easy to justify the "complete protection" of those who pledge allegiance to the political power disguised as religion, up to the point of covering up for their demoniac crimes, as well as the relentless persecution and "destruction" (by all means) of those cannot be subdued to the deviant policies or silenced.

The expressions paritrāṇāya and vināśāya are very interesting, too. Paritrā means "complete deliverance" and referred to the problems faced by the good and innocent people, it indicates protection. However, we need to understand what "protection" means. The good people are protected, but not because they never face problems or die. Of course anyone who has a material body will inevitably have to die, and any material possession will inevitably be lost. This material world is by nature fraught with three kinds of sufferings - those coming from one's own body and mind, those coming from other living entities, and those coming from the natural elements - so we cannot think that good people will always be free from all sufferings while living in this world. The protection Krishna is talking about consists in the personal attention and guidance that a good person receives so that s/he can progress in life materially and spiritually; a progressive person performs good actions for the benefit of all, and receives the good results of such actions which support his/ her life for the greater good. Good people, too, will have to face problems and difficulties - as exemplified by the story of the Pandavas - but they will be able to use every circumstance to further their service to the Divine plan and to raise the level of their consciousness. A good person, especially one who is on a higher level of consciousness, bravely faces all difficulties considering them as a test for their progress and a payment they need to make to set the balance straight for their own bad choices in the past. However, this does not mean that they remain passively inert in the process: they certainly work hard and do their best to improve the situation, but always by performing dharmic actions.

Vinaya means "for the destruction". Some people may feel that "destruction" is too strong a word, but that is generally because they project their personal split personality over the Personality of Godhead. They think that "good people" are never forceful, so they should never fight and never destroy. This truly applies in the sense they never hurt or attack innocent and good living entities and they do not rampage in blind destruction of resources. But the Personality of Godhead not only has a "sweet" and "benevolent" aspect (called saumya in Sanskrit), but also a "fierce" and "destructive" aspect (called ugra or asaumya) that is directed against the bad things that create obstacles and sufferings in the material world. A genuine devotee loves both, while sentimentalist bigots tend to prefer those forms of God that appear weaker and easier to handle - such as infancy and very early childhood - even when their depictions are inappropriate and misleading in regard to the actual qualities and mission manifested by that particular Personality of Godhead. For example, Ganesha was never a newborn in diapers: he was created by Parvati from the sandalwood paste covering her body, so that he would stand to guard her door while she was taking bath. Similarly, we should be wary of those who prefer images of Personalities of Godhead that show some defects or negative condition - such as Ganesha sporting reading glasses, or little Krishna crying, or Radha behaving foolishly, and so on.

Another important consideration is that already the laws of the universe, starting from the law of Karma, take care of the task of protecting and supporting the good people and destroying the evil doers. So why should God appear personally in this world? God descends to establish a new aspect of the eternal and universal dharma (dharmam tu saksad bhagavat pranitam, Bhagavata Purana 6.3.19) that is most suitable for the particular time, place and circumstances, and the highest principle of religion consists in becoming attracted to Godhead. This is the reason why each divine avatara displays so many extraordinary and endearing adventures or lilas: by hearing, narrating and remembering these adventures, any human being can progress in the divine consciousness and ultimately attain spiritual liberation and pure love for God, as we will see in the next verse.

जन्म कर्म च मे दिव्यमेवं यो वेत्ति तत्त्वतः । त्यक्त्वा देहं पुनर्जन्म नैति मामेति सोऽर्जुन ॥ ४-९ ॥

janma karma ca me divyamevaṁ yo veti tattvataḥ | tyaktvā dehaṁ punarjanma naiti māmēti so'rjuna || 4-9 ||

janma: birth; karma: activities; ca: and; me: my; divyam: divine; evam: thus; yah: s/he; veti: knows; tattvataḥ: in reality; tyaktva: by/ after leaving; deham: the body; punah: again; janma: birth; na: not; eti: attains; mam: me; eti: attains; sah: s/he; arjuna: o Arjuna.

"O Arjuna, one who truly knows the divine nature of my births and activities does not have to take another birth after leaving this body, but comes to me."

Continuing the logical thread from the previous verse, Krishna is saying that the highest principle of dharma consists in the evolution of consciousness that culminates in moksha, liberation, and prema, love and union with God. The births and activities of the Personality of Godhead are always perfectly engineered to set an example, deliver important teachings, attract the attention of people, and demonstrate the superiority of the Divine existence. The realization of a greater and higher purpose and consciousness is essential to direct the individual progress into the proper direction, that rises above the animal needs and propensities that human beings cannot find fully satisfying: this message was introduced in the first chapter of Gita with Arjuna's sadness and dissatisfaction, and is developed gradually through the text.

One of the most popular translations and commentaries of Bhagavad gita, written by A.C. Bhaktivedanta Swami, is entirely focused on the concept of Krishna Consciousness as the core message of this all-important text. But what is the meaning of "Krishna Consciousness" (krishna chaitanya)? Without a deep understanding of both words, of both concepts, one remains on the superficial level of political allegiance that has been hammered into the minds of the people at global level as the only possible meaning of "religion".

It is very true that the mere academic study of Gita is not sufficient, but simply accepting on faith that Krishna is God and pledging sectarian allegiance to him is not sufficient either. This is not the message of Gita. In this verse Krishna clearly says that in order to attain him, one needs to truly know the tattva of the divine mission. One needs to fully overcome the identification with the material body, and understand that the real person is spiritual: this is called Brahman realization. The first chapter clarifies that it is necessary to see things with a wider perspective than the daily selfish consciousness of materialistic people, and the second chapter makes a very clear distinction between the material body and the real identity of the Atman. The third chapter explains that the purpose of action and duty is to serve the Supreme and participate in supporting the universe, and the fourth chapter further explores the knowledge of the purpose of the action and duty. In the subsequent chapters, Krishna will supply all the knowledge required to actually understand what "Krishna Consciousness" means, and attain a level of devotion that is genuine and progressive (18.54) and based on dharma and knowledge, and not simply superficial and sentimental bigotry.

In fact it is very dangerous to believe that by a simple act of faith and submission one will instantly attain liberation or salvation. According to such logic, one does not need to reform his own bad behavior or correct his ignorant and delusional misconceptions, abandon material identification and attachments, properly study the scriptures, apply Krishna's teachings in practice, or attain Self-realization on the spiritual level. Just because one confesses of "accepting Krishna as his savior and God", at the time of death he will automatically be flown to paradise by some angels called Vishnudutas. This is a typical abrahamic concept and extremely dangerous because it gives the opportunity to ruthless and cynical individuals to hijack the divine mission and, falsely claiming to be the only authorized representatives of Krishna/ God, bring about the politicization of religion. Such politicians are particularly interested in presenting just "the stories" of Krishna, projecting their own personal fantasies for the purpose of entertainment of the "devotees", to keep them deeply engrossed into some golden dreams.

Actually we need to sincerely practice Krishna's teachings, including the instruction to worship and serve the Personality of Godhead and his true mission; we must understand them in their reality, in their deep significance in the context of the genuine Vedic knowledge and tradition - not in a superficial way, like people become fond of the adventures of some cartoon character or adventure movie hero. Already commercial cartoons have been created, showing Krishna and Balarama, Hanuman, and other divine Personalities, engaged in totally invented bogus stories and distorting the meaning of the divine mission - for example, presenting Arjuna as a coward, totally terrorized by the Kurus and blaming himself for having foolishly caused the battle, or Krishna in his childhood adventures in Vrindavana killing innocent ordinary animals or destroying robots, and so on. Another cartoon series shows Krishna and Kamsa reborn in our days and attending the same primary school together, where they keep bickering because they are "eternal enemies". Unfortunately the mass of people in Kali yuga are foolish and superficial, and especially misled by unqualified and often demoniac leaders that enforce the cult of ignorance.

We should not think that demoniac people can oppose the Personality of Godhead only in a direct way: very often, we find that they pretend to be his worshipers and even his representatives, because from that position they can easily hijack the divine mission and cause its failure. There is a famous saying, "if you can't defeat them, join them", meaning that it is much easier to destroy a genuine spiritual movement from the inside, leading the followers astray, commercializing and trivializing the teachings, causing people to waste a lot of time and other resources on irrelevant issues, introducing poisonous misconceptions and playing to the material identifications and attachments of the weakest members. These people are sometimes called kali-chelas, "disciples of the age of Kali", the age of quarrel and hypocrisy, because their specialty is to make a big show of great devotion and sainthood, while behind the scenes they keep scheming and trafficking to fight against truthfulness and the other genuine principles of dharmā.

वीतरागभयक्रोधा मन्मया मामुपाश्रिताः । बहवो ज्ञानतपसा पूता मद्भावमागताः ॥ ४-१० ॥

vītarāgabhayaḥkrodhā manmayā māmupāśritāḥ । bahavo jñānatapasā pūtā madbhāvamāgataḥ ॥ 4-10 ॥

vīta: free from; raga: attachment; bhaya: fear; krodha: anger; man-maya: absorbed in me; mam: in me; upāśrita: taking shelter; bahavah: many; jñāna tapasa: by knowledge and austerity/ by the austerity of knowledge; pūta: purified; mad-bhavam: my state; agataḥ: have come.

"Many who were free from attachment, fear and anger, fully taking shelter in me, have been purified by austerity and knowledge, and attained my realization."

Krishna clearly expresses here that Krishna Consciousness (mad-bhavam agataḥ) must be built on strong foundations: freedom from all attachments and material identifications in the Brahman realization, equanimity towards all living entities and perception of the Antaryami Paramatman, the Supreme Soul in all living beings, selflessness (either concentrated or expanded to "one's party"), the strict morality that comes from honestly following the rules called yama and niyama and the actual knowledge of the Vedas, both on the material and the spiritual fields. It is said, sruti smṛiti purāṇādi pancharatna-vidhim vina, aikāntiki harer bhaktir utpādayaiṇa kalpate, "So-called exclusive bhakti to Lord Hari (Vishnu) that is not in accordance to the sruti, the smṛiti, the Puranas and the other Vedic scriptures, as well as with the science of the Pancharatna, is simply a fantasy that will create a lot of trouble in society." (Bhakti rasamṛita sindhu 1.2.101, quoting from Brahma yamala Purana). The realization mentioned by Krishna in this verse with the expression mad-bhavam agataḥ can be applied at various levels. The most fundamental level of the meaning of bhava is "existence" or "nature": in this verse, this indicates a person who attains self-realization as the realization of the spiritual transcendental nature or identity that is Brahman. Another meaning is "feeling", implying that the individual soul develops a level of consciousness that is of the same nature of God, or in other words he overcomes the sense of duality and separation, and his mind and body become mere instruments to perform direct service to God.

Another particular meaning of bhava is "ecstasy of love" and is found in very elevated devotees who taste a deep loving personal relationship with God; there are specific symptoms characterizing this experience that must be accompanied by a consistent lifestyle, realizations and attitude. We must draw a clear line between genuine transcendental bhakti and materialistic sentimentalism, sometimes called prākṛita saṅgajism ("spontaneous simplism").

This verse summarizes all the crucial factors in genuine bhakti: first of all, a real devotee should have no attachment, especially to adharmic activities or ignorance. He should have no attachment for honors and social position, name, image, control over other people, control over money and resources, and similar forms of egotism and selfish sense gratification. A real devotee should also be free from fear. This is possible only when one has truly realized that we are not this body, and that death is just a normal stage of life, an inevitable passage for all. Another reason why the genuine devotee is not afraid is that he has a real direct relationship with the Paramatma, the Lord in the heart of all living entities. Whether he is going to be attacked by other beings or not, he knows that the Lord is aware of whatever is happening, and therefore every event is part of the plan of the Lord.

It is important to understand that the protection granted to the devotee by the Lord does not imply immortality or absolute freedom from all losses and problems and sufferings, because these are inevitable for all those who have a material body. The real protection consists in being guided through those experiences that are useful for our work. This realization automatically removes the cause for fear and anger. Fear and anger will only be used as an instrument for our work when it is really required, as we have already mentioned. The specific characteristics of devotion are the constant meditation and surrender of the devotee, who takes shelter in God, but they must be purified by knowledge and austerity, otherwise they remain on the material sentimental level.

ये यथा मां प्रपद्यन्ते तांस्तथैव भजाम्यहम् । मम वर्तमानुवर्तन्ते मनुष्याः पार्थ सर्वशः ॥ ४-११ ॥

ye yathā māṁ prapadyante tāṁstathaiva bhajāmyaham । mama vartmānuvartante manuṣyāḥ pārtha sarvaśaḥ ॥ 4-11 ॥

ye: those; yatha: like; mam: me; prapadyante: surrender/ approach; tan: they; tatha: like; eva: certainly; bhajami: I reciprocate; aham: I; mama: my; vartma: path; anuvartante: follow; manusyah: human beings; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); sarvasah: all.

"O Partha, as much as they surrender to me, in the same way I reciprocate with them. All human beings follow my path."

All human beings are on a progressive path that ultimately leads to the realization of the Divine. They may be searching consciously or unconsciously, but everybody is instinctively seeking the Supreme, just like all rivers naturally flow towards the ocean, although their course is rarely straight.

The idea of God is inherent in all human beings, including the atheists and agnostics, and it surfaces especially in the emotionally difficult moments, when one is faced with great tribulations or dangers. The concept itself may vary greatly from one individual to the other - some are more attracted to the patriarchal figure of a Father who is in heaven, some are more attracted to the figure of the Mother. Some do not believe in a personal form of God, but they still have a strong concept of a Higher Good and identify it with dharma, or the ethical principles that are instinctively perceived as legitimately ruling the lives of all, and to which one should sacrifice the lower tendencies of selfishness. Some see God in human society or in family values, in community, land or country. People who are even less evolved perceive God as Power - from the power of the natural phenomena such as earthquakes, tsunamis, waterfalls, ocean storms, cyclones, lightning, fire etc - to the power that some individual beings appear to have on others and on their environment, to the power that manifests through life itself. However, each individual proceeds at different speed, creating negative reactions, positive reactions or no reactions to their activities, and obtaining different results - all depending on how much each individual surrenders to God, follows the divine instructions and works in the world.

We have already said that the Vedic system is progressive and can accommodate all levels of development and needs, whether one is free from desires (akama), full of all kinds of desires (sarva kama) or desiring liberation (moksha kama), as clearly stated in the Bhagavata Purana (2.3.10). God has a plan for each one of us, whether we are able to understand it or not: a path already traced that we are already treading, as we are all children of God (14.4), without restrictions based on birth (such as caste, race, nationality etc) or culture. Even those who do not pledge allegiance to God are God's children and are taken care of in God's plan: God has no "chosen people", as Krishna repeatedly states in Gita. Some commentators, who have been educated in the nazi concept of the aryan race, state that the manusya sarvasah, "all the human beings", refers to the "qualified" or civilized human beings only, and that such qualification depends on birth. For such commentators, all other human beings are to be considered sub-humans, or untermenschen. These prejudiced people also fall in the category of the human beings of whom God takes care of, so for their benefit they will be awarded the blessing that will help them progress and become purified from their misconceptions: they will take birth in a similarly disadvantaged position, so that they will be able to experience it first-hand and understand the actual facts.

There are differences in the reciprocation that God gives to the devotee, but these are based on what the devotee wants from God. This is clearly stated in this verse by the word yatha: according to the purpose or the results they are seeking. Often the Divine is compared to a kalpa-vriksha, a "wish-fulfilling tree" that can give us anything we wish for, either consciously or subconsciously. In fact, our subconscious normally directs us towards the experiences that we need for our progress, even if such experiences appear to be unpleasant or even tragic. When the devotee's consciousness has been purified by knowledge and austerity, and he has become free from attachment, fear and anger, and is fully taking shelter in God, he will naturally desire nothing less than a personal relationship with the Lord, and this is precisely what he is going to get.

काङ्क्षन्तः कर्मणां सिद्धिं यजन्त इह देवताः । क्षिप्रं हि मानुषे लोके सिद्धिर्भवति कर्मजा ॥ ४-१२ ॥

kāṅkṣantaḥ karmaṇāṁ siddhiṁ yajanta iha devatāḥ । kṣipraṁ hi mānuṣe loke siddhirbhavati karmajā ॥ 4-12 ॥

kankshantah: desiring/ praying for; karmaṇam: of the activities; siddhim: perfection/ success; yajante: they sacrifice/ worship; iha: here; devatah: to the Devas; kshipram: very quickly; hi: certainly; manushe: human; loke: world/ society; siddhih: perfection/ success; bhavati: becomes; karma-ja: from the action.

"Those human beings who desire to achieve perfection in their actions worship the Devas in this world, because (in this way) perfection can quickly be attained through one's efforts."

Understanding the concept of Devas is not easy, because in our ordinary experience we develop relationships with different individuals, each one of them having specific qualities and characteristics, abilities and tendencies. When we want our hair cut we go to the barber, when we want bread we go to the baker, and when we want our vehicle repaired we go to the mechanic. So for a materialistically minded person there is not much difference between this ordinary experience and the Hindu tradition that says that one who wants good health should worship Surya (the Sun), one who wants to acquire knowledge should worship Sarasvati, one who wants to get wealth should worship Lakshmi, one who wants to progress without obstacles should worship Ganesha, and so on. But this is a mistaken conception.

Bṛihad Aranyaka Upanishad (1.4.10) states that one who worships the Devas by considering them different (from the Supreme, or from each other, or from Reality at large), does not have the (proper) knowledge and is like an animal to the Devas. So what does "different" mean? There are two levels of meaning here; one applies to the non-difference between Devas, and between the Devas and the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and the other applies to the non-difference between the Devas and the worshiper. Some people believe that Vishnu is God, while Shiva, Surya and Brahma are "demigods in sattva guna" and Bhairava, Chandi, Mahakali (and others) are "different demigods under tamas guna". This is a dangerous mistake, due to a limited understanding and a separatist mentality. It's like saying that the high court judge is nothing more than a criminal because he deals with violations of the law, or that the manager of a dairy farm is nothing but a cow because he concerns himself with the production of milk. The fact is that all the various Devas are simply different Personalities of the same Godhead, just like the various limbs of the body are non-different from the body itself. The perspective called acintya-bheda-abheda tattva, "inconceivably different and non-different" is the best explanation of this reality. This also applies to the simultaneous difference and non-difference between the Godhead and the individual soul, where the individual souls are differentiated limbs of the same body of the Godhead. Unity does not necessarily mean that there is no variety. In fact variety in the cells of the different organs and limbs of a body is a desirable feature, because it affords a greater range of activities and abilities. Another very important point in this verse is that worshipping the Devas (which includes Vishnu himself), should always be accompanied by sincere practical work; one should not think that worship is a quick and easy substitute for sincere hard work (karma ja). The divine blessings are supporting and helping us, but we also need to do our part. This verse does not condemn the worship of the Devas, as some people may think. It simply states that the divine blessings are essential in order to achieve success quickly. And who does not want to be successful in this world? Is there anyone who wants to fail? That would be very stupid.

The type of success that we wish to attain may be different from one person to another, as we have seen in the previous verse. A worshiper who has some material desires will ask for health, wealth, a good husband or wife, a son or a daughter etc, while a pure devotee will ask for the blessing of achieving an intimate personal relationship with God - like the gopis in Vrindavana did.

Someone who claims that he will not worship Mother Katyayani (Durga) because she is a "paltry demigod under the influence of tamas or rajas" is committing offenses on all levels - not least, he is trying to present himself as a greater devotee of Krishna than the gopis of Vrindavana themselves.

चातुर्वर्ण्यं मया सृष्टं गुणकर्मविभागशः । तस्य कर्तारमपि मां विद्वद्यकर्तारमव्ययम् ॥ ४-१३ ॥

cāturvarṇyam mayā sṛṣṭam guṇakarmavibhāgaśah | tasya kartāramapi mām viddhyakartāramavyayam || 4-13 ||

catuh: four; varṇyam: varnas; mayā: by me; sṛṣṭam: created; guṇa: qualities; karma: activities/ duties; vibhagasah: divided (in categories); tasya: of that; kartaram: the doer; api: although; mam: me; viddhi: (you should) know; akartaram: not the doer; avyayam: imperishable.

"The four varnas have been created by me in accordance to the different qualities and activities, but although I am their maker, know that I am unchangeable and detached from action."

The perfect system of the varnas created by God is based on the individual's personal natural qualities/ tendencies and on the activities/ duties specified in many texts, starting from Gita. Later, because of the degradation of Kali yuga and the influence of racist cultures, the system of varna decayed and became the degraded hereditary caste system that is still causing so much suffering and so many problems to Hindu society. Without the degradation of the caste system, there would have been no mass conversions to Buddhism and Jainism, and later to Islam and Christianity, socialism and communism, naxalism, and cynical materialism. Indian society would have remained strong and united, each varna cooperating strictly with the others just like the limbs in a living body, and especially qualified brahmanas and kshatriyas would have been competent and cooperative to protect the land from invaders. Still today, the absurdity of the degraded caste system, with its absolute birth prejudice, is alienating a large part of the Indian population and the almost totality of the global public opinion from Hinduism and Vedic culture.

To solve such problem it is sufficient to honestly return to the actual version of the genuine scriptures and to the prescriptions for the purification and progress of each member of society, both materially and spiritually, for the benefit of individuals, communities and society at large. The main concern of the Vedic system is indeed the benefit of the society as a whole, symbolized by the Virat purusha in the famous Purusha sukta (Rig Veda 10.90.12).

The commentators that are plagued by birth prejudices and confused by the racist idea of the hereditary caste system believe that the definition of guna in this verse means that varnas are different species of life with a different DNA - like one animal species is different from another. This was exactly the same ideology espoused and enforced by the Nazi German ideologues in the last century. Apart from the obvious error on the scientific level - animals of different species cannot generate a fertile offspring from their union, while different races both among animals and human beings are perfectly able to do that - the "different DNA" theory based on racism in the fields of spirituality, religion, ethics and professional capabilities is easily disproved by everyday reality. These higher functions of the human mind and spirit have nothing to do with the color of the skin or hair - in fact we find great differences within the same family, what to speak of race. Of course, the atmosphere, mentality and life habits of the environment where one is born can greatly contribute to the individual's development, and it is also true that each soul is attracted to take birth in an environment that is suitable to his/her tendencies and level of evolution. But there can also be other reasons for taking birth in a particular situation, and above all, if an individual is sufficiently determined, s/he can certainly change mentality and habits within one single lifetime and qualify for a different social position.

Vedic literature clearly teaches, janmana jayate sudra, "by birth everyone is born a sudra" and brahma janati iti brahmanah, "a brahmana is one who knows Brahman (spirit)". There is not one single verse, in the entire body of Vedic literature, where birth is considered a decisive qualification to belong to a particular varna or even to the aryan community. So where did this birth-based racist caste idea come from? It had started already with Kali yuga, but it became entrenched "scientifically" with the British colonial propagandists, who were aiming at gaining the support of the members of the "highest breeds" of India, by claiming a racial affinity with them.

The Aryan invasion theory, unfortunately still taught in Indian schools as if it was a proven historical fact, says that India had been civilized by hordes of nomadic warriors of "indoeuropean race" originating from the arid Caucasus region. These stronger, war-mongering and ruthless foreigners had white skin and auburn or blond hair, and, thanks to their superior iron weaponry, chariots and horses. They had massacred or enslaved the primitive and pacific native Dravidian populations (black of skin and hair), creating the four castes by diluting their "white DNA" through sexual unions with the slaves - the blacker the skin, the lower in the social ladder. The British credited this "aryan race" with the introduction of Sanskrit, Vedic rituals, Vedic "gods" etc and claimed that a group of arians had migrated to Europe to similarly become the dominant race and civilize the native tribal populations there.

This was a very convenient application of the pseudo-scientific ideas on racial anthropology that had been brewing in Europe from the times of Carl Linnaeus (1707–1778), the famous physician, botanist, and zoologist. In Systema Naturae (1767) he wrote of five human races: the white Europeanus of gentle character and inventive mind, the red Americanus of stubborn character and angered easily; the black Africanus relaxed and negligent; yellow Asiaticus avaricious and easily distracted; and the Monstrosus sub humans such as aborigines. Thinkers such as Friedrich Hegel, Immanuel Kant, and Auguste Comte believed that western European culture was the acme of human socio-cultural evolution in a linear process, and approved slavery of "inferior races". In their Indigenous Races of the Earth before Origin of Species (1850), Josiah Clark Nott and George Robins Gliddon implied that "negroes" were a creational rank between "Greeks" (considered the beginning of western European culture) and chimpanzees. Non-white people were kept in zoo cages during colonial exhibitions promoting the benefits of white colonialism to such colored peoples. A number of later writers, such as the French anthropologist Vacher de Lapouge in his book L'Aryen, argued that this superior human branch could be identified physically by using the cephalic index (a measure of head shape) and other indicators. He argued that the long-headed "dolichocephalic-blond" Europeans, characteristically found in northern Europe, were natural leaders, destined to rule over more "brachiocephalic" (short headed) peoples.

In the United States, scientific racism justified Black African slavery against the moral opposition to the Atlantic slave trade. Alexander Thomas and Samuel Sillen described black men as uniquely fitted for bondage because of their "primitive psychological organization". In 1851, in antebellum Louisiana, the physician Samuel A. Cartwright (1793–1863) diagnosed slave escape attempts as "drapetomania", a treatable mental illness, writing that "with proper medical advice, strictly followed, this troublesome practice that many Negroes have of running away can be almost entirely prevented". After the Civil War, Southern (Confederacy) physicians wrote textbooks of "scientific racism" based upon studies claiming that black freemen (ex-slaves) were becoming extinct because they were inadequate to the demands of being a free man, implying that black people actually benefited from enslavement. But this was just the pseudo-scientific attempt to rationalize a racist prejudice that has even older roots in a specific "theological" dogma from the Catholic church, officialized in the 1200s in Italy by Thomas Aquinas (who was made a saint for it). Thomas Aquinas' theory, which became the official theological position of the church and therefore the rationale of the colonial expansion ordered by the popes, was that black peoples had a kind of "second class" soul, therefore they could be killed, mistreated, exploited, robbed, enslaved and denied all power and dignity, even after being converted to Christianity.

The second part of the verse explains that the varna system does not apply to the Divine Principle or to the eligibility for spiritual realization - as Krishna will confirm again in 9.32.

न मां कर्माणि लिम्पन्ति न मे कर्मफले स्पृहा । इति मां योऽभिजानाति कर्मभिर्न स बध्यते ॥ ४-१४ ॥

na māṁ karmāṇi limpanti na me karmaphale sprhā | iti māṁ yo'bhijānāti karmabhirna sa badhyate || 4-14 ||

na: not; māṁ: me; karmāṇi: the activities; limpanti: taint/ affect; na: not; me: me; karmaphale: by the results of the actions; sprhā: touch; iti: thus; māṁ: me; yāh: one who; abhijānāti: knows; karmabhib: by the actions; na: not; sa: s/he; badhyate: is bound.

"I am not affected by action and I am not touched by the results of the action. One who really understands this (fact) is not bound by actions either."

In the previous verse Krishna said, tasya kartaram api mam viddhy akartaram anyayam: "although I am their maker, know that I am unchangeable and detached from action". This concept is repeated and expanded in this verse, and connects it with verse 4.10, that declared, bahavo jnana-tapasa puta mad-bhavam agatah, "Many who were purified by austerities and knowledge attained my realization". There is a certain cultural terrorism going on in some schools of thought, where members are anxious to show that they are situated on the highest possible level of realization - Bhagavan - and therefore they tend to slide in the unnecessary excess of despising the so-called "inferior levels" of Brahman and Paramatma. The fact is, that without attaining the Brahman and Paramatma realization (realizing in theory and practice that we are spirit souls and not the material body, and that God lives in the heart of each living being), the so-called "Bhagavan realization" will be simply be an arrogant and fraudulent mockery, a mental fantasy, a sentimental exercise, and, as clearly stated by the famous bhakti expert Rupa Gosvami, "an unnecessary disturbance to society".

There is no real contradiction between the so-called personalist and impersonalist views, because God is at the same time inconceivably personal and impersonal. If we think we are supposed to "take sides" to pledge allegiance to a "personal God" against the "impersonal Brahman" we are simply demonstrating our ignorance and illusion. Bhagavata Purana (1.2.11) clearly explains that Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan are one tatva (Reality) only. In fact, Gita (18.54) clearly says that the true bhakti can only be achieved from the level of Brahman and Paramatma realization. So, without the fear of "making offenses to Bhagavan" by accepting the level of Brahman realization, we can allow our intelligence to contemplate the idea that the realization of our true eternal spiritual nature of Atman/ Brahman enables us to enter the same nature (bhava) of the Personality of Godhead. From this position we will really be able to serve him with love and devotion, free from separatist considerations and independent desires. This realization, achieved in this same lifetime, in this world, will enable us to work at the proper performance of our duties without getting entangled in the results of the activities, as Krishna has already explained in previous verses.

With reference to the system of varnas, this means that by remaining free from the delusion of being the karta, or doer - in other words, giving up the ahankara or false identification with the material body - each member of society can function properly but without remaining tied to the particular position. Krishna does not feel diminished by such a comparison between himself and the ordinary human beings, since he has already declared that he willingly engages in work in the prescribed way just for the purpose of giving a good example to the people.

एवं ज्ञात्वा कृतं कर्म पूर्वैरपि मुमुक्षुभिः ।

कुरु कर्मैव तस्मात्त्वं पूर्वैः पूर्वतरं कृतम् ॥ ४-१५ ॥

evam jñātvā kṛtaṁ karma pūrvairapi mumukṣubhiḥ । kuru karmaiva tasmāttvaṁ pūrvaiḥ pūrvataraṁ kṛtam ॥ 4-15 ॥

evam: thus; jñatva: knowing; kṛitam: performed; karma: action/ work/ duties; pūrvaiḥ: previously; api: even; mumukṣubhiḥ: those who desired liberation; kuru: do; karma: work/ duty/ action; eva: certainly; tasmāt: therefore; tvam: you; pūrvaiḥ: by the ancient; pūrvataram: in ancient times; kṛitam: performed.

"Knowing this (fact), those who in the previous ages desired to attain liberation engaged in action. Therefore you should perform your duty just like the ancients did."

In this verse Krishna confirms once again that the path of yoga has been successfully practiced since very ancient times. He has already said that the proper knowledge of yoga had been lost since ancient times (4.2) and therefore there was a need to return to the original ancient ways. This is also the need of the hour today. There is no need to speculate and invent new religions or new methods; we simply need to rediscover the original source and follow it properly. We should learn at least the basics before we try to reinvent the wheel. The idea of history as a linear progress of mankind, taught in mainstream academia, is openly refuted in this verse. There is in fact a linear evolution, but it applies to each individual irrespective of the greater cycle of the universe and the other beings.

Mankind in a general collective sense proceeds in cycles, with a tendency towards degradation from one age to the other (from Satya to Kali) rather than towards progress, contrarily to what mainstream academia believes, and different levels of technology and lifestyles can remain simultaneously present even for very long periods of time. The so-called evolution of the species did not produce a biosphere composed only by human beings: the most elementary forms of life continued and continue to exist in spite of their "inferiority". Even different human species may have co-existed simultaneously in different regions, or even in the same region, just like up to recent times different human groups co-existed on the planet although with very different lifestyles that could be categorized from the Paleolithic to the nuclear and space age. Many forms of life may become extinct for some time, but that has nothing to do with evolution. The idea of the survival of the fittest works only if we understand that history does not have a linear progress. So at times even advanced forms of life or even advanced civilizations became extinct because the conditions on the planet changed - not necessarily producing better species or civilizations, as we can see in practice today. So it is very much possible that the "fittest" forms of life in a future degraded environment will be the most primitive and "unevolved", contrarily to what most "scientists" think today.

The present dominant civilization is certainly not the most advanced that has ever appeared on this planet - on the contrary, it is a blatant failure - a mess of sufferings, degradation, and genetic degeneration without ethical values or higher aspirations. Anthropologists object that there is no evidence of previous technologically advanced civilizations, but apart from the fact that absence of proof is not proof of absence, they are searching for the wrong relics. Large garbage disposals of artificial non-biodegradable consumers' goods, high percentages of pollutants and the multiplication of diseases and genetic degradation are hardly signs of a successful advanced civilization, and neither are huge buildings or burials of dead bodies.

An advanced civilization may choose to burn the dead and disperse the ashes, to build small, environment-friendly and biodegradable housing, or to develop the natural faculties of the human body and brain rather than depending on artificial surrogates consisting of mechanical machines.

Again, this verse confirms that Knowledge and Action are not incompatible; rather, a person who has the proper knowledge and aspires to liberation must continue to sincerely perform his duties. There is no excuse for trying to escape one's duties. The myth of the "lazy brahmana" needs to be exposed as an extremely dangerous delusion.

Foolish and ignorant persons consider themselves very intelligent and advanced because they always try to abstain from ordinary work, and demand extravagant luxury in their maintenance at the expenses of the general population, claiming that they are situated on the highest platform of human life through renunciation. Such parasites should be rejected and abandoned immediately. If they are truly renounced, they will content themselves of some leftovers begged from door to door. Liberation - moksha - consists in being equally disposed and happy in any condition of life, as opposed to the "conditioned souls" that can be happy only in some particular conditions where they get what they like and do not get what they do not like.

किं कर्म किमकर्मेति कवयोऽप्यत्र मोहिताः । तत्ते कर्म प्रवक्ष्यामि यज्ज्ञात्वा मोक्षयसेऽशुभात् ॥ ४-१६ ॥

kim karma kimakarmeti kavayo'pyatra mohitah | tatte karma pravakshyami yajñātvā mokṣayase'subhāt || 4-16 ||

kim: what; karma: action; kim: what; akarma: akarma; iti: thus; kavayah: the learned; api: even; atra: in this (matter); mohitah: are confused; tat: that; te: to you; karma: (about) karma; pravakshyami: I will tell; yat: which; jñatva: knowing; mokshyase: you will be liberated; asubhat: from inauspiciousness.

"Even scholars are (sometimes) confused about what is karma and what is akarma. I will (now) tell you this (knowledge of) karma, by knowing which you will become free from inauspiciousness."

The words karma, vikarma and akarma describe respectively the prescribed /positive action, the forbidden/ negative action and the selfless/ dutiful activity that does not generate binding reactions of any kind. It is not easy to recognize which is which, because sometimes a drastic action is required to safeguard a higher good, as for example when a kshatriya confronts a criminal in a fierce fight to defend innocent people. Also, it is difficult to judge when an action is performed in a totally selfless and enlightened consciousness, because some material selfish motivation may still be present in some altruistic activity, as for example when a person distributes charity to the needy in order to get religious merits and be admitted to heaven. And similarly, a person may appear to be very entangled in activities related to family and work and anxious to make money, but his consciousness may well be on a higher level of renunciation and selfless dedication to duty, without any attachment to his own personal benefit or gratification. A famous commentator argues that prescribed action is recognized by the approval or order of the authorities in a religious lineage, but simultaneously offers the example of Arjuna, who received direct instructions from the Lord. This apparent contradiction is resolved by understanding that such authorities should be genuinely self-realized; in which case their instructions are not different from the direct instructions of Krishna in Gita. It is perfectly true that we need to associate with expert and self-realized persons - the sadhus - in order to learn the practical applications of the spiritual knowledge, but we need to be very careful not to fall in the trap of cheaters. Besides the help we can get from the direct association with self-realized souls, that can explain theory and practice in details, we can also get our examples from the stories of the persons we find in the traditional shastra, especially the Puranas and Itihasas, and also in the Upanishads etc. In this way, extensive study of the original texts can take us beyond the theoretical academic level to the practical level, where we will be able to directly associate with those great personalities. The word kavi means "poet" and "scholar" and refers to a very learned person. As we have already seen, mere scholarship is not sufficient to realize Truth: we need to actually put knowledge in practice and behave consistently with it. The words subha and asubha respectively indicate the good/ favorable/ auspicious results/ reactions and the bad /unfavorable/ inauspicious results/ reactions.

कर्मणो ह्यपि बोद्धव्यं बोद्धव्यं च विकर्मणः । अकर्मणश्च बोद्धव्यं गहना कर्मणो गतिः ॥ ४-१७ ॥

karmanō hyapi buddhavyaṁ buddhavyaṁ ca vikarmanāḥ | akarmaṇaśca buddhavyaṁ gahanā karmanō gatiḥ || 4-17 ||

karmanah: of the (prescribed) actions; hi: certainly; api: also; boddhavyam: to be understood; boddhavyam: to be understood; ca: and; vikarmanah: of bad action; akarmanah: of non-action; ca: and; boddhavyam: to be understood; gahana: very difficult; karmanah: of the actions; gatiḥ: the purpose/ the true nature.

"It is important to understand (the meaning of) karma and (the meaning of) vikarma, and even more difficult, (the meaning of) akarma (within) the karma."

The word karma has entered the vocabulary of all the modern languages and has become a household word, but often its meaning is distorted due to cultural superimpositions and lack of proper information. It is generally used with the meaning of "destiny", and sometimes "retribution" or punishment. In abrahamic cultures, this destiny is the "lot in life" incomprehensibly assigned by a tyrannical God to each individual at birth, and that must be accepted without discussion and without attempting to improve one's situation. To this fatalistic interpretation of Destiny, the concept of reincarnation, and "karma from the past" adds the idea that the good or bad actions we performed in previous lifetimes come back to us in the form of reward or punishment, in a sort of "tit for tat" reaction that was also described in some versions of abrahamic hells. However, karma is not just an inevitable sentence we simply need to storm out in a passive and fatalistic way. Karma is constantly changing with each action (or inaction) of ours, and can even be neutralized or overcome completely by new and suitable actions, as people usually want to get rid of the "bad karma" (but don't mind getting some "good karma"). The Scriptures and Tradition recommend good activities such as executing sacred rituals of purification (prayaschitta), worshipping God, going to pilgrimage, bathing in sacred tirthas, distributing charity to deserving persons, selflessly performing deeds for the benefit of all and sacrificing one's possessions for good causes, engaging in austerities (such as fasting etc), or simply renouncing one's material identification and attachments.

In this verse Krishna continues to give us the transcendental knowledge that needs to support our devotion and surrender to God. If we are really surrendered devotees, we must make a serious effort to understand and practice these instructions. If we don't, we are just cheap pretenders and charlatans, or just deluded imaginative wannabes.

We have already seen in many verses that a soul pursuing liberation and even a liberated soul must continue to work sincerely by performing the prescribed dutiful actions: this is called karma. When we speak of "karmis", the actual meaning of the definition refers to the persons that perform their prescribed duties, as strongly recommended by Krishna all along the Gita. Of course some people will give a different interpretation to the word (usually "those who are attached to the results of the action"), but that does not change the actual facts and meaning of the word. To give a very prosaic example, traditionally in India people did not know oranges, so they called "oranges" the tangerines, a similar fruit that has always had a great diffusion there. With the greater variety of produce now available on markets in Indian metropolises, now people are starting to understand the difference. Similarly in Italy people had never seen corn before it was imported from the Americas, so they called it "Turkish wheat" although it had absolutely nothing to do with Turkey. Later with the development of literacy and proper information the misconception was cleared, so this wonderful grain came to be called with the more appropriate name of "maize".

Thus when we speak of karma, karmi or karma-kanda (the section of the Vedas that gives instructions on prescribed duties) we should be very careful not to load any negative meaning into the expression. Nobody is "above the karma kanda": not even a liberated soul. It is true that in the end of the Gita Krishna will say, sarva dharman parityajya mam ekam saranam vraja, "leave all dharmas behind and simply surrender to me", but this instruction must be understood after having properly assimilated all the previous instructions given by Krishna in the other 700 verses. Taking such instruction out of context and using it to rationalize our bad behavior and laziness is certainly not what Krishna is recommending.

कर्मण्यकर्म यः पश्येदकर्मणि च कर्म यः । स बुद्धिमान्मनुष्येषु स युक्तः कृत्स्नकर्मकृत् ॥ ४-१८ ॥

karmanyakarma yah pasyeda-karmaṇi ca karma yah | sa buddhimānmanuṣyeṣu sa yuktaḥ kṛtsnakarmakṛt || 4-18 ||

karmani: (in) the actions; akarma: non-action; yah: one who; pasyet: sees/ finds; akarmani: (in) non-actions; ca: and; karma: (as) action; yah: s/he; sah: s/he; buddhiman: intelligent; manuṣyeṣu: among human beings; sah: s/he; yuktaḥ: engaged (in Yoga); kṛtsna-karma-kṛit: who performs activities.

"One who can see akarma within the karma, and the karma within the akarma, is intelligent among the human beings, and is performing all dutiful activities by engaging in yoga."

In this verse Krishna gives further explanation on karma. The first thing we need to understand is that superficial appearances can be illusory. For example, when a boat is moving, the trees on the bank of the river appear to be moving although they are actually stationary, while when we observe a moving thing from a great distance, it appears as non-moving. When we see a person who is performing an action or abstaining from action, we need to examine the situation carefully to really understand what it is about, because it is the motivation and the identification that bring about the results at karmic level. It is important to understand that "the results of the action" become a matter of bondage only when we claim them for our selfish enjoyment: there is absolutely nothing wrong or enslaving in working properly in order to produce good results in a selfless consciousness, for the benefit of society or for the pleasure of God.

The key concept in this verse is that, in a selfish approach, both engagement and non-engagement in action are choices that cause bondage, while the selfless approach keeps us free from bondage both in engagement and non-engagement in action. We can therefore study the four possible choices in the same scenario:

1. selfish performance of an action, such as killing an innocent person to misappropriate his legitimate wealth, to which we have no title,
2. selfish non-performance of an action, such as failing to protect an innocent person from the aggression of a criminal that wants to kill him (obviously one wants to avoid getting hurt in the process),
3. selfless non-performance of an action, such as abstaining from attacking an innocent person that is carrying wealth, although personally we might be in a disadvantaged financial position (and would like to have that money),
4. selfless performance of an action, such as protecting an innocent person from the aggression of a criminal, without expecting any reward.

Abstaining from a prescribed action out of selfish considerations is actually a precise choice that will bring negative consequences, while performing a prescribed action without selfish motives does not entail karmic reactions and therefore it is called akarma.

Let us now introduce the "transcendental" factor into the equation.

Unfortunately, some people believe that by superficially wearing some "I am transcendental" badge, cap or T-shirt, or by carrying a "transcendental club" or "transcendental party" membership card - so to speak - they can afford to commit the most heinous crimes and merrily get away with it, much like a bad corrupt policeman may convince himself that his uniform will legitimately give him a free hand and protection from prosecution for any criminal activity. The disastrous results of such delusional mentality are there for all to see.

Working on the level of transcendental consciousness actually means that one is ready to equally face or tolerate joys and sorrows, gain and loss, success or failure; only in this way one becomes free from the results of the actions. On an even deeper level, one who knows the tattva of Atman/ Brahman understands that akarma, the true absence of action or inaction, is in the Self (unborn, unchangeable, omnipresent, eternally pure and characterized by perfect knowledge/ awareness and bliss), while karma is a superimposition due to the Self being embodied. At such an advanced level we do not even contemplate vikarma, because all sinful activities have long been left behind as the purified living entity has lost all traces of selfishness. One who understands this principle, being firmly situated in the realization of the Self (Atman/ Brahman) will see that he is actually not acting, as only the body, senses and mind are engaged in their prescribed duties, at the level of their capabilities. The conclusion of the verse is particularly important.

The expression kṛtsna karma kṛit further stresses Krishna's instruction as already repeated several times earlier: the soul that seeks liberation and even the liberated soul must continue to work selflessly performing the proper duties, but without a selfish sense of proprietorship, identification or attachment.

यस्य सर्वे समारम्भाः कामसङ्कल्पवर्जिताः । ज्ञानाग्निदग्धकर्माणं तमाहुः पण्डितं बुधाः ॥ ४-१९ ॥

yasya sarve samārambhāḥ kāmasaṅkalpavarjitāḥ | jñānāgnidagdhakarmāṇaṁ tamāhuḥ paṇḍitaṁ budhāḥ || 4-19 ||

yasya: of one who; sarve: all; samarambhah: attempts; kama: desire; sankalpa: intention; varjitah: given up; jnana: of knowledge; agni: by the fire; dagdba: burned; karmanam: the actions; tam: him/ her; ahuh: it is said; paṇḍitam: a pandita; budhah: intelligent.

"Those who are intelligent declare that a truly learned person is one who has left behind all ventures based on the determination for personal sense pleasure and has thus burned all his karma (to ashes) by the fire of knowledge."

The word pandita (or its Anglicized distortion pundit) has entered the vocabulary of many languages, generally with the correct meaning of "learned scholar, expert", although generally in material subjects. Just as in the west family names are still used to designate a non-qualified or non-practicing descendant of a person who originally earned the title (for example Bakers, Smith, Potter, etc), in India "Pandit" or "Panda" (just like "Acharya", "Gosvami" etc) is still used as family name even for people who have no such qualification and may even be totally illiterate and ignorant, and/or addicted to negative adharmic behaviors and conclusions. This is rather confusing, especially when such unqualified people expect to be automatically considered qualified because of their ascendancy and the family name they use. This is not happening in the west: no Bakers, Smiths or Potters, for example, can present themselves as automatically qualified to bake good bread, produce metal instruments or to manufacture pottery by dint of their family name only. The best solution would be to return to the original and genuine use of the definition, encouraging the individuals that are "differently able or qualified" to change their surname or family name to a more appropriate description of their role in society. In Vedic society, this responsibility rests in the hands of the Guru that trains the young students in the Gurukula and assigns them a proper name/ title, as well as in the hands of the King that employs or recognizes the individual according to the particular skills and activities, and in the hands of the Assembly of the Brahmanas, that has both the power to ostracize unqualified and degraded members of a varna, and the power to acknowledge officially the evolution of a qualified individual to a varna of greater responsibility. In all such cases, the recognition is officialized by some public rituals, not unlike the modern "award ceremonies" or "graduation/ doctorate ceremonies" by which a deserving individual receives a title that declares his merits. Another translation of the verse applies the word varjitah ("given up") to the actions (samarambhah) rather than to the person (panditah); the resultant version is, "Intelligent people say that a knowledgeable person is one whose actions are devoid of desires and intentions; this fire of knowledge has burned all his actions".

The expression sama arambhah indicates the actions undertaken with the determination to obtain a specific purpose; this specific purpose is called sankalpa. Both these terms are characteristically used in the ritual ceremonies of karma kanda. The sankalpa is the declaration in which the karta, the "doer" of the ritual (assisted by the officiating priests) expresses the purpose for which the ritual is performed. The sankalpa, or the determination to achieve a particular object, is the seed of kama, or desire, because through the sankalpa our mind gives the permission to the desire to start developing. The image of the fire, too, is characteristic of the fire ritual that constitutes the basis for the karma kanda rituals; the homa or fire sacrifice mainly consists in offering clarified butter and grains into the sacred fire with mantras that address the various Personalities of Godhead for whom the oblations are meant. This verse explains a further level of meaning in the fire sacrifice: while burning the oblations, we are also supposed to offer our desires and intentions, our identifications and attachments, to the Supreme Personality of Godhead in the fire of Knowledge. Then everything we do, everything we obtain or do not obtain will be sanctified, accepted as the reciprocation of the Divine, and there will be no reason for fear. The action of burning something in the fire is an extremely powerful archetypal symbol of renunciation, liberation, and purification. What happens when we leave our kama and sankalpa behind us? We are simply left with the performance of our sacred duty or sacrifice and its sanctified fruits - yajna sista, or prasadam.

त्यक्त्वा कर्मफलासङ्गं नित्यतृप्तो निराश्रयः । कर्मण्यभिप्रवृत्तोऽपि नैव किञ्चित्करोति सः ॥ ४-२० ॥

tyaktvā karmaphalāsaṅgaṁ nityatṛpto nirāśrayaḥ | karmaṇyabhipravṛtto'pi naiva kiñcitkaroti saḥ || 4-20 ||

tyaktva: having given up; karma: of the action; phala: the fruits; sangam: attachment to/ association with; nitya: always; triptah: satisfied; nir: without; asrayah: shelter; karmaṇi: in work; abhi-pravṛttah: fully engaged (like before); api: although; na: not; eva: certainly; kiñcit: anything; karoti: does; sah: s/he.

"Such a person has given up all connections with the results of the actions, is always satisfied and does not depend on anyone else. Although s/he is always engaged in activities, s/he is never doing anything."

The word sangam means "association", "attachment" and indicates a permanent tie, something that expresses some identification. The expression nirashrayah, "without shelter", is about self-reliance, being ready to face any situation and able to see everything in the Greater Picture. Even when we take shelter in God, it should not be as whimpering babies or as lazy passengers of a taxi; surrender must be active rather than passive. Surrender in action means positively engaging in doing our work properly. Again, Krishna repeats that being free from karma - actions and reactions - does not mean abstaining from the proper performance of one's duty, but simply continuing to do one's work in the most dedicated way, but without the intention of enjoying the results, without the identification as the cause of the action or the attachment to the action itself.

In other words, a liberated person does his best and leaves the rest to the Divine Plan, accepting whatever results come from the action as a gift from God. This feeling of surrender also extends to one's own maintenance, because although everyone is entitled to get their personal needs satisfied, a devotee is not anxious or overly attached to securing things or benefits or protecting them once he has obtained them. If he can't get them or he loses them, he understands that everything happens according to the Divine Plan, and there must be a very good reason for that.

There is a very interesting story. Two friends were walking near a forest, and one of the two lamented about a small accident he had a few days earlier, in which he had lost a finger of his hand. The other man insisted that everything happens for the better, according to the Divine Plan. The first man became annoyed and, seeing an old dried well, he threw his companion into it, angrily asking him whether he believed that such an event would be according to the Divine Plan, too. Then he returned back to his village, but on the way he was ambushed and captured by some thugs seeking a sacrificial victim for a ghost they worshiped. However, as soon as the thugs saw that his hand was missing a finger, they decided that his body was imperfect and thus not fit for the sacrifice and they let him go. Shaken, the man returned to the dried well and rescued his friend, recognizing that indeed if he had not lost that finger he would have been killed. However he still had doubts; he asked his friend how being thrown into a well had been good for him, and he replied that since he personally still had all his fingers intact, the thugs would have had no objection in sacrificing him instead.

निराशीर्यतचित्तात्मा त्यक्तसर्वपरिग्रहः । शरीरं केवलं कर्म कुर्वन्नाप्नोति किल्बिषम् ॥ ४-२१ ॥

nirāśīryatacittātmā tyaktasarvaparigrahaḥ | śārīraṁ kevalaṁ karma kurvannāpnoti kilbiṣam || 4-21 ||

nirasiḥ: without desires/ solicitations; yata: controlled; citta: consciousness; atma: self; tyakta: having given up; sarva: all; parigrahaḥ: sense of possession/ accepting; sarīram: body; kevalam: only; karma: work; kurvan: doing; na: not; apnoti: obtains; kilbiṣam: sinful reaction.

"One who works without (selfish) desires, in fully controlled consciousness, giving up all sense of possession, and only performing those activities that are required for the (proper maintenance of the) body/ performing the activities with the body only (without sense of identification and attachment), never incurs negative reactions although he engages in activities."

The expression sarīram kevalam karma carries two levels of meanings, namely 1) working for the proper maintenance of one's body, and 2) engaging body, mind and senses in work without developing a sense of identification and attachment to the actions. The negative reactions refer to the contamination caused by the inevitable acts of violence that are required in all occupations for the protection of society. Modern consumeristic society gives great importance to entertainment and fun and leisure, and presents work as a painful and primitive activity that we should minimize as much as possible in order to enjoy a really progressive, civilized life. The roots of this misconception, however, go much deeper into the history of western civilization, with a rigid division of classes - the commoners and the aristocrats - based on the Christian ideology.

The ancient Romans employed slaves in their Imperial period, starting a short time before Christianity (from 27 BCE to 393 CE); in the beginning these were usually petty criminals or debtors unable to pay their creditors, abandoned illegitimate children, as well as prisoners of war or individuals already made slaves previously, generally by specialized Arab traders that had been raiding the Mediterranean and Africa for slaves since the times of the Phoenicians. However, a slave or a son/ daughter of slave parents could earn their freedom by demonstrating qualities and behaviors that would make them useful and respectable members of the society. Such freed slaves were called "liberti". This liberality was frowned upon by the Christian clergy, and was lost with the spreading of Christianity. According to the main apostle of the Roman Church, "saint" Paul, slavery was a very good thing ordained by God, and society was supposed to be divided into masters (whose authority came from God himself, through the pope and the priests) and servants (who were expected to remain in servitude permanently, generation after generation).

When Christianity succeeded in becoming the absolute power in the Roman empire, Rome fell and western society crumbled into small isolated settlements, each protected by small kings and their vassals. Slavery proper became less practical, because it was more convenient for the king's vassals and the priests to utilize the general people as servants without having to purchase or feed them. The condition of "serf of the land" was also permanent as "ordained by God", and the peasants or commoners had no rights whatsoever. It was only with the French Revolution that the divine authority of the clergy and aristocrats on the commoners was challenged; however the equality among men newly established in society only meant that all men were entitled to "seek happiness" through sense gratification, entertainment and wealth, trying to work as little as possible. A bourgeois or middle class developed, and subsequently with the industrial and socialist revolutions the laborer class or proletariat kept shrinking and demanding more wealth, leisure time and benefits, to be gradually (ideally) helped by machineries, that would substitute the humans in slavery. This legitimate struggle to stop social injustice and exploitation, however, did not do much (if anything) to recognize a moral value to the honest work in a social occupation, because according to the abrahamic fundamental ideology, work is nothing but a curse cast on man by God when he kicked out Adam from the Garden of Eden. The Vedic perspective is diametrically opposite, as Gita is very clearly explaining: work is a sacred duty that connects the human beings - from the ordinary to the liberated, up to the Devas and the Supreme Personality of Godhead himself in a conscious cooperation for the sustenance of the universe. Unfortunately, the poisonous abrahamic influence has infiltrated even Indian society, weakening and almost destroying the ethic value of work, so much that the original varna system became totally confused, fragmenting the three higher varnas into hundreds of meaningless racial or ethnic sub-castes, moving sudras to the position of foremen and accountants rather than laborers and inventing a new fifth caste of dalits used as slaves by the rest of the society - a position that is never once mentioned in the Vedic system.

In imitation of the aristocratic and priestly classes of their abrahamic invaders (both Muslim and Christian), the brahmanas and kshatriyas of India embraced the misconception that the hallmark of a "high class" person is to work as little as possible, rather having others work for him. Similarly, a devious equation brought the Christian "monk" ideal as the new model for the ancient tradition of sanmyasa, and the disaster was complete. To compound and aggravate the situation, the exploitation rationale enforced by colonial regime further disconnected people from the just pride one should have in his own work, because all peoples subjected to a foreign rule quickly develop the tendency of not accumulating wealth or good things that will only attract the attention of the invaders. In this distorted perspective, a person who has lost the real understanding of the Vedic ethics of work might interpret this verse as encouraging laziness and neglect in one's social occupations - just do the minimum to survive - but this would be a serious mistake. The proper maintenance of one's body and its extensions the family members should be measured according to the Vedic standard of civilized life that is definitely on a higher level than people usually think. To get an idea of the level of quality of life that an average person would enjoy in Vedic society, we can have a look at the actual original text of the Kama sutras (not the later editions manipulated by the Arab invaders mostly interested in imaginative and often perverted gross sex).

यदृच्छालाभसन्तुष्टो द्वन्द्वतीतो विमत्सरः । समः सिद्धावसिद्धौ च कृत्वापि न निबध्यते ॥ ४-२२ ॥

yadṛcchālābhasantuṣṭo dvandvātīto vimatsarah | samah siddhāvasiddhau ca kṛtvāpi na nibadhyate || 4-22 ||

yadṛiccha: of its own accord; labha: obtained; santushta: satisfied; dvandva: duality; atīta: gone beyond; vimatsarah: free from envy; samah: equally stable; siddhau: in success; asiddhau: in failure; ca: and; kṛtvā: doing; api: although; na: not; nibadhyate: is bound.

"(Such person) is perfectly satisfied with whatever s/he obtains naturally, is free from duality and envy, and is balanced in success and failure. Although engaged in activities, he is never bound (by them)."

When a society is organized on the foundations of honest work and cooperation, there is no waste and there are no blockages of wealth due to undue and unnecessary accumulation, and each individual naturally obtains everything he needs for himself and his family. This is the natural order of things: every living entity has the fundamental right to a decent livelihood. If this is not happening, it means that there is a serious problem at the leadership level - the king is unworthy, the brahmana advisors are not qualified, the vaiśyas are not doing their work properly. The greater responsibility lies with the higher classes of society, and ultimately to the highest class of all, the brahmanas, who are supposed to give the proper directions to everybody else. If they are unable to do their job because of personal lack of guna and karma, they should step down and engage in the work they are actually qualified for. In the previous verses we have seen that the mass of the people will naturally follow the example set by the leaders. When the brahmanas behave properly and properly guide the kshatriyas and the vaiśyas, there is no reason why the mass of the people should not behave in a good way, too. So the blame lies square and fair on the door of the brahmanas.

There are still some qualified members of this class, and they should take up the responsibility to clarify the principles of religion to the leaders of society - by precept and by example - and publicly ostracize those leaders that do not respond adequately, substituting them with more qualified individuals, without being obstructed by birth prejudices. In the meantime, we need to carefully observe the actual situation in society and apply the good instructions to the particular circumstances, but even in an emergency situation like the present one, we can always take pride in our honest work, watch out for good opportunities and manage a decent maintenance with whatever money can come. In this particular context, duality refers to pleasurable and unpleasant, gainful or ungainful, successful or unsuccessful - in other words, without considering our personal selfish gratification. We need to do our work even when it is not so pleasurable or easy. Regarding the renounced persons who subsist on alms, the rules require a sanmyasi to accept whatever is given without asking for specific foods, provided it is not given in an abusive or spiteful way and it has not fallen on the ground. The food should be collected from six or seven houses without a specific plan and without choosing them on the basis of the wealth of their residents.

गतसङ्गस्य मुक्तस्य ज्ञानावस्थितचेतसः । यज्ञाचारतः कर्म समग्रं प्रविलीयते ॥ ४-२३ ॥

gatasāṅgasya muktasya jñānavasthitacetasaḥ | yajñāyacarataḥ karma samagraṁ praviliyate || 4-23 ||

gata: having gone away; sāṅgasya: of one who attachments; muktasya: of one who is free; jñāna: knowledge; avasthita: situated; cetasaḥ: whose consciousness; yajñaya: to Yajna (Vishnu)/ to the sacrifice; acarataḥ: performing action/ working; karma: activities; samagram: the total; praviliyate: becomes destroyed.

"One who has finished with all associations/ whose association is liberated and whose consciousness is firmly established in knowledge, worships Yajna (Vishnu) in practice (through his actions/ as all his actions become devotional service)/ works in a spirit of sacrifice. The entirety of his karma (reactions to actions) is thus destroyed."

The word mukta ("liberated, free") comes from the same root of the word moksha ("liberation"); a jivan mukta is a liberated person who is still living in a material body in this world.

The meanings of the word sanga ("association") expand to all the fields where the individual associates himself with some kind of identification. It applies to the people he keeps company with, to the organizations he becomes member of, to the institutionalized religion he belongs to, and to the material lineage as in family, society etc. As we have already mentioned, one should either keep association with liberated persons, or become liberated from association and live alone (not only physically but ideologically, too). The word praviliyate, "destroyed", comes from the same root as pralaya, the recurrent destruction of the universe in the cycle of creation, when the planets are submerged and destroyed. The word samagram, "together with its consequences" is composed by saha ("together with") and agrena ("its consequences").

Another meaning of the word praviliyate is "merging into"; in this case it may apply to karma samagram to indicate "the entirety" – at various levels this may refer to the particular relationship (sanga) in which one is acting (friendship, occupation, family), or the society in general, or the entire universe, of which we all are parts. At the highest level, it indicates God as the Ultimate Reality. In this perspective the meaning of the verse is "One who has finished with all associations and whose consciousness is firmly established in knowledge is engaged in the sacred offering of his actions to God, so his behavior is in complete accordance with the harmony of the universe/ the highest divine plan".

Another perspective on this verse is centered on the meaning of karma as "duty". According to the Vedic system called karma mimamsa or purva mimamsa, the proper performance of one's duty in a lifetime creates the suitable circumstances for a better birth in a next lifetime, either as a resident of the heavenly planets or as a member of a higher community in human society. In this verse Krishna clearly states that such cycle of "good karma" is not the ultimate purpose of human life: at some point the progress of the individual takes him/ her on a higher level of knowledge and understanding, and helps him/ her to become detached from the temporary material identifications and associations (gata sangasya muktasya). At this point, a person becomes totally transcendental and sees all activities as complementary forms of service to the Lord: this is a definition of a Vaishnava, "a person who has realized Vishnu". In the devotional service of the Lord there are no lower activities, and the highest brahmanas - those who have perfectly realized Brahman in full knowledge - are happy to offer menial service to the Deity, as in cleaning the altar, washing the body of the Deity, presenting the food, flower garlands and other items, and so on. On this level, the definition of karma as "duty" in the religious and social observances becomes less and less important, because each individual will spontaneously and happily serve the Lord in whatever capacity will be required by the circumstances.

This daivi varnashrama is applicable only for those who have become totally free from any material identification, association and attachment, because even a small amount of material motivations or selfishness or ignorance will have disastrous consequences - even more so than in the case of sannyasis who disgrace their vows with inappropriate behaviors. The definition of vaishnava, too, should be taken very seriously and not utilized to refer to cheap imitators, sectarian affiliations or to hereditary caste positions, even more so than the definition of brahmana, because a vaishnava is described as much more qualified than a brahmana, and consequently any inconsistencies with the descriptions found in the shastra will have disastrous consequences, at individual and collective level.

ब्रह्मार्पणं ब्रह्म हविर्ब्रह्माग्नौ ब्रह्मणा हुतम् ।

ब्रह्मैव तेन गन्तव्यं ब्रह्मकर्मसमाधिना ॥ ४-२४ ॥

brahmārpaṇaṁ brahma havirbrahmāgnau brahmaṇā hutam | brahmaiva tena gantavyaṁ brahmakarmasamādhinā || 4-24 ||

brahma: Brahman; arpanam: the ladle/ the offering; brahma: Brahman; haviḥ: the oblation (of clarified butter etc); brahma: Brahman; agnau: in the fire; brahmana: by one who knows Brahman; hutam: (is) poured (as offering); brahma: Brahman; eva: certainly; tena: by him; gantavyam: to be attained; brahma: Brahman; karma: activities; samadhina: in the samadhi (complete absorption).

"The purpose (of such actions) is transcendental, the offerings are transcendental, the fire is transcendental, the act of offering is transcendental, the goal to be attained is transcendental, and the consciousness is transcendental."

Krishna continues to explain that the real purpose of the daily religious duties is the worship of Vishnu, the Transcendental Reality, the Personification of Brahman of Supreme Spirit. And whatever comes genuinely in touch with the Spirit becomes "spiritualized", acquiring the same characteristics and the same level of consciousness.

The word Brahman (meaning "transcendental, spiritual, divine") is used in this verse to indicate the action itself, the ingredients or materials, the means, the end, the person who is acting, and the ultimate goal to be attained through the action. From the grammatical point of view, the five forms of accessories to the action are the nominative, objective, instrumental, dative and locative; in this case the sacrificer, the oblation, the ladle, the sacrificial fire and Brahman itself.

When our consciousness is firmly established on the spiritual/ transcendental level, we become able to perceive the real spiritual nature of everything: vasudeva sarvam iti (7.19). The sacrificer is certainly Brahman because the real identity of the soul is transcendental, the purpose of the offering is Brahman because as Gita will say later (5.29), Brahman is bhoktaram yajna tapasam, or the beneficiary of all sacred activities. The act of offering itself is sacred, as yajna and seva, and everything connected to it becomes spiritualized and sacred, because it keeps us in touch with the transcendental consciousness that is Brahman, or brahma-samadhi.

Some commentators interpret this verse to mean that a yogi sacrifices the senses and the sense objects by abstaining from engaging the senses in the material sense objects; this contradicts the purpose of the verse and is actually faulty perception, as it proposes that the objects in this world cannot be offered in sacrifice, or seen as spiritual paraphernalia utilized in the service of the Supreme. In fact we need to understand that the proper performance of the sacrifice requires the offering of very specific substances, not the abstention of offerings. Of course there are several things that should not be offered in sacrifice - rather, the act of abstention from their contact becomes the offering. These things are all those substances and activities that create obstacles towards the path of transcendental realization - Brahman realization.

When we speak of restraining the senses, this means utilizing them with a higher level of consciousness, that is the original and natural consciousness of the Atman/ Brahman. Brahman covered by maya is known as prakriti, and when the consciousness is purified, prakriti is purely perceived as Brahman, and even the body is perceived as a sacred instrument for the worship of the Absolute. In such transcendental consciousness, the very act of perception of the objects not prohibited by the scriptures is considered a sacrifice, or sacred action. Subsequent verses (4.33 and 4.39) will explain that knowledge considered as a sacrifice is greater than the sacrifices requiring materials, and that by achieving knowledge one attains supreme peace.

दैवमेवापरे यज्ञं योगिनः पर्युपासते । ब्रह्माग्नावपरे यज्ञं यज्ञैर्नैवोपजुह्वति ॥ ४-२५ ॥

daivamevāpare yajñam yoginaḥ paryupāsate | brahmāgnāvapare yajñam yajñenaivopajuhvati || 4-25 ||

daivam: God / the sum total of the Devas; eva: certainly; apare: other; yajnam: sacrifice; yoginah: yogis; paryupāsate: worships perfectly; brahma: Brahman; agnau: in the fire; apare: other; yajnam: sacrifice; yajñena: by the sacrifice; eva: certainly; upajuhvati: offers.

"Some yogis perform the yajna by perfectly worshipping the Devas, others perform sacrifice in the fire of Transcendence by offering sacrifice itself (as sacred action) as an oblation."

The sacred action (yajna) is not necessarily a strictly regulated religious ritual: every action in our life, from the simplest to the most complex, can become an act of sacrifice when we remain in the proper consciousness. Thus every word becomes a prayer, every step becomes a circumambulation of God's image, every morsel of food becomes the worship of God's mercy, every time we lay down becomes a prostration to God's feet, and every action becomes a sacred offering to God. Or, as Krishna will say later (9.27), "Whatever you do, eat, sacrifice, or give in charity, and whatever difficulty you face, offer everything to me as a sacred act of sacrifice." What is the meaning of "offering sacrifice itself as an oblation"? It is about sacrificing the act of sacrifice itself, sacrificing the sense of doership, the false ego, in the fire of Brahman or Knowledge.

The tendency of the conditioned soul is to perform activities in order to get a selfish benefit from them - either at individual level or collective but separative level. This also applies to religious activities, such as yajnas, rituals etc. This verse declares that we need to go beyond this selfish and materialistic consciousness, and attain that transcendental platform where all actions - what to speak of the religious rituals - are performed in a spirit of divine service to the Absolute. Every step of our journey should be directed to help us attain the liberated stage of consciousness (moksha), where everything else is consumed in the fire of Brahman. Who is a yogi? What is yoga? Certainly yoga is not about burning excess fat or becoming able to twist one's body like a pretzel. Yoga means to unite with the Brahman consciousness, with the Absolute Reality.

श्रोत्रादीनिन्द्रियाण्यन्ये संयमान्निषु जुह्वति । शब्दादीन्विषयानन्य इन्द्रियाणिषु जुह्वति ॥ ४-२६ ॥

śrotrādīnīndriyāṇyanye saṁyamāṇiṣu juhvati | śabdādīnviṣayānanya indriyāṇiṣu juhvati || 4-26 ||

śrotra: the hearing power; adini: and so on; indriyani: the senses; anye: others; saṁyama: of restraint/ control; agnishu: in the fires; juhvati: offers; śabda: the sound; adin: and so on; viṣayan: the sense objects; anye: others; indriya: of the senses; agnishu: in the fire; juhvati: offers.

"Others offer (the activities of) the senses, such as the hearing etc, in the fire of regulated activity/ abstinence, others offer the objects (of senses) such as the sound etc in the fire of the senses as an oblation."

This verse continues to elaborate on the higher and subtler level of worship that transforms every moment of our lives into a sacred meditation. In such a transcendental consciousness, every moment of time that is given to us, becomes a miracle of spiritual happiness and an opportunity to remember and serve the Divine. In this sacred activity, the body of the worshiper becomes spiritualized by the constant flow of higher spiritual energy and becomes radiant and pure, vibrating the wonderful power of suddha sattva, transcendental goodness. The practical process of puja is meant to train the worshiper in this personal evolution. Every time the Deity is offered worship, the sadhaka evokes the presence of the Deity from within his heart and installs it in the image on the altar, and applies the sacred mantras on his own body in order to spiritualize it. This particular process is called nyasa, and it is used on the various body parts and also separately on the fingers of the hands, that are the main instrument in the process of ritual worship.

In this verse, the word agnishu ("in the fires") is plural because the sacrifice is performed simultaneously with all the senses. The two modalities of sacred action described here are 1) abstinence or strict regulation of the sense activities, 2) offering the sense activities in the worship process. The ancient tantric worship, especially in the vamachara or kanalachara tradition, takes this concept to the extreme application, transforming the most popular and powerful activities of sense gratification (sex, intoxication, food) into an act of sacrifice. Unfortunately some people - both in the west and in India - are trying to reduce this extremely difficult and dangerous practice into a cheap, exotic and pseudo-mystical excuse for uncontrolled sense gratification. This will only confuse the minds of the general people, taking them away from a serious and honest investigation about spiritual development.

सर्वाणीन्द्रियकर्माणि प्राणकर्माणि चापरे । आत्मसंयमयोगाग्नौ जुह्वति ज्ञानदीपिते ॥ ४-२७ ॥

sarvāṇīndriyakarmāṇi prāṇakarmāṇi cāpare | ātmasaṁyamayogāgnau juhvati jñānadipite || 4-27 ||

sarvani: all; indriya: of the senses; karmāni: the activities; prana: of the prana; karmani: activities; ca: and; apare: others; atma: self; saṁyama: controlled; yoga: of the yoga, agnau: in the fire; juhvati: offers; jñāna: of the knowledge; dipite: with the lamp.

"Others offer all the activities of all the senses and the activities of the prana, and the oblation is constituted by the control of the self in the fire of yoga in the light of knowledge."

Krishna's explanation of the actual purpose of yoga is further elaborated in this verse. What is prana? There is no western word that is exactly equivalent with the original Sanskrit definition. Prana is life air and energy; it is not contained only in air/ oxygen, but it is also carried by cosmic radiations and by the magnetic radiations of the living entities. However, the breathing pattern and speed are important for the life energy, as we can easily verify when we observe modifications in our state of mind: a relaxed mind slows down the breathing speed, and on the opposite side, when we want to "pump ourselves up" into action we increase the speed of the breathing cycle. These very simple actions have an immediate effect of the mental changes and are also observed as manifesting as an effect of mental changes. Therefore it is said that breathing is the bridge that connects the territory of our voluntary actions to the immensely greater territory of our involuntary actions, that includes not only the level of relaxation but also the functions of the organs that are normally controlled by the involuntary muscle system, such as heart, stomach etc.

A normal, or natural, breathing pattern is 360 breathing cycles in 24 minutes. The correct practice of pranayama is intended to eventually slow down and stop the breathing pattern, so that the mind becomes more peaceful and controlled, and we are able to focus permanently (samādhi) on the object of our meditation. In the 1970s and 1980s, western countries saw a rapidly increasing interest in pranotherapy, the particular healing technique that uses the magnetic energy of the healer's body to improve the circulation of the life energy in the body of the patient. Such development hit the roof - so to speak - with the widespread success of Reiki as codified by Mikao Usui into a pseudo-religious system, that includes initiations at three levels, a master-disciple relationship, and even certificates from an institution that blends spiritual, religious, ethical, psychological, emotional and (apparently) scientific aspects. However, we need to go back to the source and verify the solid facts established by the great acharyas of the ancient yoga tradition. After completing this important preliminary requirement, we will become able to utilize such knowledge in its pure form, or to present it in a particular language and context that is more suitable for the present circumstances and persons.

Within the human body, prana manifests in five main forms: prana proper, apana, vyana, samana and udana.

- Prana is the main life energy and goes outwards - is carried by the breathing during exhalation. It starts in the ajna chakra (between the eyebrows) and circulates in the head to regulate the functions of the mind
- Aprana goes downwards for digestion and evacuation (and childbirth as well), starting from the manipuraka chakra and pushing down towards the muladhara chakra; it is also carried by the inhaled breath
- Vyana makes the body move around, shrink and expand; it acts on the entire muscular system and especially in the energy tension area of the shoulders, neck and back.
- Samana keeps the balance among all the other life airs; starting from the manipuraka chakra it helps the distribution of energy to the entire body, and is particularly observed in burping.
- Udana goes upwards, and from the manipuraka it energizes the "fire of digestion" in the stomach, just like the bellows of a blacksmith blow on the furnace.

There are also minor pranas:

- Naga facilitates the opening of the eyes, mouth, etc, it raises the hair and carries emotions and artistic inspiration,
- Krikara controls cough and sneezing, thus keeping the breathing apparatus clean and functional; it also expels toxins through the tongue (in the form of the whitish paste that is called tongue coating),
- Kurma controls the contraction movements,
- Devadatta controls the movements of the mouth, especially in yawning,
- Dhananjaya supports the entire body and increases the appetite and enthusiasm for doing things.

This magnetic energy produced by the living soul travels within the body through a network of nadis - the subtle equivalent of the nerves of the nervous system.

The main 10 nadis are:

- Ida and Pingala, rising from the big toes, then rising up to the head, through the nostrils and down to the muladhara,
- Sushumna, the main straight channel that goes from the muladhara (lowest of the chakras) up to the sahasrara (the highest),
- Gandhari, starting from the manipuraka and energizing the throat and the tongue for the higher functions of sound production,
- Atti and Sikhu, starting from the muladhara chakra and energizing the ears and the perception of sound ,

- Alampurusha and Alampada, starting from the muladhara chakra and energizing the eyes, as they can also emit and absorb subtle energy,
- Sangini and Guhu, connecting the manipuraka with the base chakra (muladhara), energizing the perception of pleasure and the functions of the sexual organs.

द्रव्ययज्ञास्तपोयज्ञा योगयज्ञास्तथापरे । स्वाध्यायज्ञानयज्ञाश्च यतयः संशितव्रताः ॥ ४-२८ ॥

dravyayajñāstapoyajñā yogayajñāstathāpare । svādhyāyajñānāyajñāśca yatayaḥ samśītavratāḥ ।। 4-28 ।।

dravya: objects/ materials; yajñab: sacrifice; tapab: austerity; yajñab: sacrifice; yoga: yoga; yajñab: sacrifice; tatba: similarly; apare: others; svādhyāya: study of the scriptures; jñana: of knowledge; yajñab: sacrifice; ca: and; yatayaḥ: ascetics; samśīta: serious/ sharp; vrataḥ: vows.

"Others sacrifice their wealth, or perform austerities as a sacrifice, or engage in yoga as an act of sacrifice, or perform sacrifice by the study of the scriptures and the cultivation of knowledge, or by engaging in strict vows."

The concept of yajña is expanded here, creating a wider understanding of what brings sacredness in the life of a human being. The sacrifice of dravya or objects or materials is performed not only in the form of the homa, where valuable substances such as clarified butter and grains are offered into the fire as auspicious presentations for the Devas. It can be performed also in the form of charity, by which one donates cash or kind to the development and maintenance of institutions such as dharma sala (free housing for pilgrims and sadhus), anna kshetra (free food distribution), atithi sala (free temporary housing for travelers and foreigners), anathalaya (free accommodation and maintenance for orphaned children, widows and other people who have no protectors), vidya pitha (free educational institutions, such as universities, training centers etc).

The greatest charity, however, consists in donating materials and wealth for the mission of spreading transcendental knowledge and consciousness, therefore all shastras recommend giving donations to qualified brahmanas who are engaged in this crucial work.

The sacrifice of austerity, or tapo yajña, includes the performance of vratas that help to purify the consciousness and concentrate it on transcendence. The practice of vrata involves controlling the mind and senses through several techniques and regulations. The most famous traditional vratas are the chaturmasya and the chandrayana, generally observed by sannyasis (yatayaḥ) but there is ample choice to suit everyone's needs and possibilities that are also suitable for ordinary people. The famous Ekadasi vrata, for example, is very simple and followed easily; it is performed as a form of sacrifice and worship to Vishnu also by householders, including women. An equivalent vrata, the Pradosha puja, is found among the devotees of Shiva, and among the devotees of the Mother Goddess the most popular vrata is Navaratri. The devotees of Vishnu/Krishna and Shiva also observe annual vratas such as Janmashtami, Ram Navami, Shiva ratri, etc. Various scriptures also describe specific observances such as the Katyayani vrata, the Pumsavana vrata, the Payo vrata, etc. The sacrifice of meditation, or yoga yajña, also offers a wide range of practices to suit every mentality - buddhi, kriya, bhakti, karma, jñana etc. However, we need to make sure that such yoga practices are genuine and not simply cheap inventions of some unqualified person, or that they are not distorted by the influence of ignorance and materialism.

This verse also highlights the sacred nature of the act of svādhyaya, or studying the scriptures with a sincere attitude of research; this sacrifice is called jñana yajña.

अपाने जुह्वति प्राणं प्राणेऽपानं तथापरे । प्राणापानगती रुद्ध्वा प्राणायामपरायणाः ॥ ४-२९ ॥

apāne juhvati prāṇam prāṇe'pānam tathāpare । prāṇāpānagatī ruddhvā prāṇāyāmaparāyaṇāḥ ।। 4-29 ।।

apane: in the apana; juhvati: offers; pranam: the prana; prane: in the prana; apanam: the apana; tatba: similarly; apare: others; prana-apana: of prana and apana; gati: the movement; ruddhva: checking; pranayama: the control of the prana; parayanah: those who are dedicated to.

"Others sacrifice the apana in the prana, and the prana in the apana, controlling both prana and apana: this method is called pranayama."

Verse 27 already mentioned the offering of the activities of the prana in the human body; this verse further elaborates on the purpose of the practice of pranayama, or "control of the prana".

Nowadays, many people have heard about pranayama, but the general misinformed public, and sometimes even misinformed yoga teachers, present pranayama merely as a general hygienic practice to "oxygenate the brain" (therefore improving one's mental power) and to "increase the metabolism" (therefore burning off the excess body fat). Of course an increased intake of oxygen by deepening one's breathing cycle will have both these effects, but the purpose of pranayama is much beyond this. In fact, as we have already mentioned, the ultimate purpose is exactly the opposite of what many people believe. The practice explained in this verse is meant to neutralize the double currents of prana in the body. Just like electricity, prana runs in a circuit, and its movements stimulate the movements of the consciousness. This verse does not recommend blocking the flow of prana (as it happens sometimes in the event of trauma), but explains the gradual pacification of its movements, that create a perfect balance in consciousness. Such practice consists in offering the exhaled breath (prana) into inhaled breath (apana), which is called rechaka (emptying out). It consists in stopping the breath while keeping the lungs empty. The natural and balancing counterpart action consists in offering the inhaled breath (apana) into the exhaled breath (prana), which is called puraka (filling in). It consists in stopping the breath while keeping the lungs full.

The perfect stillness of breath - and the life energy that travels with it - is called kumbhaka, and brings about the perfect concentration and stillness of consciousness, the result sought by the mystic yogis. In fact, we see from various examples in the Puranas and Itihasas and Upanishads, that often mystic yogis go to meditate under water, where obviously one is not supposed to breathe so much. This pranayama practice is meant to reduce (not to increase) metabolism and therefore to reduce the need of eating. Eating requires a lot of energy and time because one has to earn one's food, collect it, prepare and cook it, eat and digest it, and clean up the mess, too. For a person who does not need to eat, meditation can continue practically undisturbed and uninterrupted day and night. We can see for example in the stories of Dhruva, Hiranyakasipu and other persons who engaged in deep meditation, and by the practice of pranayama they quickly gave up eating and ultimately even breathing, because they had become able to use the subtlest pranic energy to keep their bodies alive.

श्रद्धावाँल्लभते ज्ञानं तत्परः संयतेन्द्रियः ।

ज्ञानं लब्ध्वा परां शान्तिमचिरेणाधिगच्छति ॥ ४-३९ ॥

śraddhāvāṁllabhate jñānam tatparaḥ samyateन्द्रियः । jñānam labdhvā parāṁ śāntimacireṇādhigacchati ॥ 4-39 ॥

apare: others; niyata: controlled; abarah: intake of food; pranan: the prana; praneshu: in the pranas; jubvati: offers; sarve: all; api: although; ete: these; yajnah: the sacrifice; vidah: who know; yajna-kshapita: the purification due to the sacrifice; kalmashah: the negative reactions.

"Others sacrifice the prana into the pranas by fasting/ suspending breath. However, all these are known as acts of sacrifice, that cleanse (the person from) the negative reactions (of actions)/ one who knows about these sacrifices, purifies his negative reactions through the power of the sacrifice (itself)."

The word abarah, meaning "intake", applies both to the intake of food and the intake of air while breathing. The correct practice of yoga and pranayama enables the sadhaka to live normally without eating any food and ultimately without breathing in any air. For many people this idea can be incredible, but it is definitely very possible, and it has also been demonstrated by several researches. There are well-documented cases in which a sadhaka has continued to abstain from food and beverages for long periods of time, even for years. Regarding the cessation of breathing, a yogi that has acquired the complete control over his body and vital energy is able to remain under water or buried under soil for many hours. The process is similar to the hibernation of some animals, such as the bears etc, which remain sleeping during several months in the winter season, slowing their breathing and heart rate, and totally abstaining from all foods. However, this extraordinary ability is controlled by the yogi while retaining full consciousness, and not by sliding into an unconscious slumber like the hibernating animals.

The sacrifice of prana through the pranayama is described in this verse as the cessation of the cycle of breathing, when both brain hemispheres are perfectly balanced and the energy remains in a quiescent state, like a flame without wind. As we have already mentioned, this gradual process also slows down the body metabolism, so that the yogi needs less and less food, and then less and less air to breathe. Of course, one can also utilize pranayama in the reverse form, to increase the intake of oxygen through deeper breathing and revitalize the brain and metabolism, to lose weight and increase the appetite and the ability to enjoy sense gratification - but this is not the purpose of yoga. It is the purpose of cheaters who bank on the materialistic tendencies of materialistic people who aspire to increase their opportunities for sense gratification. All the yoga practices are sacred acts meant to purify our consciousness by raising it from the material level to the transcendental level. This is the only way we can become free from the negative reactions of our wrong choices. If we perform these practices for another purpose, we will not achieve the same result.

Another important meaning contained in this verse refers to the regulation of the diet (niyata abarah). A strictly vegetarian and sattvic diet is required for the practice of yoga, because only a pure vegetarian sattvic diet fulfills the requirements of yama and niyama, the fundamental first "limbs" of yoga practice. By consuming moderate amounts of sattvic foods such as water, fruits, grains, milk products, leaves, flowers and roots, one's body and mind become purified, energized and fit for the practice of sadhana and pursuit of knowledge.

Chandogya Upanishad (7.26.2) states: ahara suddhau sattva suddhib, sattva suddhau dhruva smritih, smriti lambhe sarva grantihinam vipramokshah, "By eating pure food, the mind becomes pure. When the mind is pure, one develops a good memory. When the memory is strong, all the knots of the heart become dissolved." Later on (Gita 6.17), Krishna will repeat that one must carefully regulate the intake of food and the sleep habits, and almost at the end of the text (Gita 17.7-10) he will explain which foods are increasing the power of sattva, rajas or tamas on the body and mind of a person who is consuming them. Sattvic foods are not only fresh and healthy, but also juicy, fatty, nutritious and palatable, therefore since the purpose of yoga consists in reducing the metabolism and therefore the need for food, we must understand that such sattvic foods are to be consumed in very small quantities. When a person is able to control his mind and senses, and to regulate the diet, even a very small amount of good food will be sufficient to give full satisfaction for the body and the mind.

यज्ञशिष्टामृतभुजो यान्ति ब्रह्म सनातनम् ।

नायं लोकोऽस्त्ययज्ञस्य कुतोऽन्यः कुरुसत्तम ॥ ४-३१ ॥

yajñaśiṣṭāmṛtabhujo yānti brahma sanātanam । nāyam loko'styayajñasya kuto'nyaḥ kurusattama ॥ 4-31 ॥

yajna: of the sacrifice; sishta: leftovers; amrita: the nectar; bhujah: who have eaten/ tasted; yanti: they go; brahma-sanatanam: the eternal Brahman; na: not; ayam: this; loka: planet; asti: there is; a-yajnyasya: one who does not perform sacrifice; kutah: where is; anyah: other; kuru-sattama: o best among the Kurus.

"O best of the Kurus (Arjuna), those who accept the nectar of the leftovers from the sacrifice attain the eternal Transcendence. Those who do not perform sacrifice cannot (have even) (the benefits that we can find in) this world, what to speak of (attaining) another (world)/anything else."

Another translation of the second part of the verse is, "the world ceases to exist for one who does not perform sacrifices, what to speak of the other world". Another meaning still is, "those who do not perform sacrifices are not allowed to remain in this world (as human beings), what to speak of attaining the other world (of the Devas)".

This verse states that the purpose of human life is to qualify oneself through the proper performance of sacred actions (yajnas) according to time, place and circumstances, in order to elevate and purify one's consciousness and attain the transcendental level. By this process we subordinate all other considerations to the primary purpose of yajna, just like a mother cooks and serves the meals for her small children thinking about the happiness and nourishment of her dear ones, and consumes her own meal after the child has finished eating. A mother does not feel diminished in eating whatever is left after feeding her small children, because feeding the child constitutes a greater happiness than having the first choice of foods. Vedic tradition teaches that one should not eat leftovers - the food that has already been tasted by other people - because leftovers are one of the most effective vehicles for contamination and disease, as everybody's mouth is full of germs. It is also said that together with the germs (that belong to a gross level, although they may be microscopically small), leftover food and similar articles carry the subtle imprint of the person who has touched them first. This is the reason why it is not healthy to use second-hand clothes or shoes. However, when the leftovers come from a divine manifestation, they become "infected" with the divine qualities and thus the person who receives them acquires these same qualities. This is the principle of the prasadam, the sacred food that has been sanctified by being offered to the Deity, and it also applies to all "leftovers" that remain after the performance of a sacred action.

Thus we can interpret the yajna sistha amrita in a very practical way, as the food and beverages that have been offered to the Deity first, and thus have been surcharged with spiritual energy. Such food nourishes the soul and the mind as well as the body, and constitutes one of the greatest factors that support us in our sadhana. Everybody needs to eat, especially at the beginning stages of the practice of yoga, and if we do not eat the right things we will have to suffer.

The practice of fasting is only one side of the equation and would not be very useful if it was not accompanied by the consumption of sanctified foods. Excessive fasting is detrimental to health, just as excessive eating: we therefore need to regulate our habits. The definition can also be expanded to indicate the sense pleasure and other side benefits that come spontaneously from the proper performance of our duties as sacred actions. On the other side, those who focus on their personal interest remain unable to really relax and ironically are unable to actually enjoy the good things of life. All their pleasures are spoiled by anxiety, greed, lust, anger and fear, and they slide into the lower regions of consciousness, thus losing the valuable opportunity of the human birth.

एवं बहुविधा यज्ञा वितता ब्रह्मणो मुखे । कर्मजान्विद्धि तान्सर्वानिव ज्ञात्वा विमोक्ष्यसे ॥ ४-३२ ॥

evam bahuvidhā yajñā vitatā brahmaṇo mukhe | karmajānviḍḍhi tānsarvānevam jñātvā vimokṣyase || 4-32 ||

evam: thus; bahu: many; vidha: types of; yajna: sacrifice; vitata: branched out/ were elaborated; brahmanah: of the Brahman/ Vedas; mukhe: from the mouth; karma-jan: born out of work/ activities; viddhi: you should know; tan: them; sarvan: all; evam: thus; jñatva: knowing; vimokṣyase: you will become free.

"Thus there is a great variety of sacrifices found everywhere/ at every level and aimed at Brahman/ emanating from the mouth of Brahman (God). Knowing that all these are born from activity/ are genuine forms of dutiful action, you will be liberated."

Here Krishna observes that the genuine system offers a great variety of proper engagement for everyone, so that each individual can remain happily connected with Transcendence and progress in his/her own evolution, by properly utilizing the natural tendencies and abilities that he has, and enjoying the leftovers (yajna sistha) that are most suitable to his taste and requirements. Such sacrifices are accomplished through the actions of body, senses and mind, and they also include the performance of one's occupational work, provided this work is supported by the transcendental consciousness, that is offering the results from one's work for the cause of Brahman. The sacred action or yajna is not limited by material circumstances, and it does not have to be exactly the same for everybody. Imposition of a particular religious practice on others is always wrong, even if we believe that such religious practice is the highest and most effective. Without freedom, there can be no real progress. But what is freedom? Only a person that has the proper knowledge can really be considered free, because ignorance binds us to wrong uninformed choices and non-progressive situations. First and foremost, we need the knowledge that sacrifice/ sacred action is based on the various activities we perform in the course of our life - every action can be a yajna, provided the proper knowledge is present. Each individual must be carefully guided on the path of personal development by a qualified spiritual master, who takes full responsibility for the student's success. Of course, the particular spiritual practice one chooses to perform must be genuine, i.e. must come "from the mouth of Brahman", or - for our practical purposes - from the mouth of a qualified brahmana, who knows Brahman and can help other attain the same level.

The word vatata, "branched out", further clarifies that such different varieties of transcendental engagement should be based on the same fundamental principles of dharma and the same genuine knowledge. A sincere seeker should carefully study all such different applications of the concept of yajna, in order to acquire a greater picture, and better understand transcendence.

Another important point is that, just like in all other cases, we must avoid false cultural superimpositions that have been created by popular beliefs. In the non-abrahamic ideology, sacrifice is about joy and glory, and improving life. On the other hand, in abrahamic ideologies the idea of sacrifice is about suffering, generally killing or renouncing life. It originated from the animal sacrifices required to worship evil spirits and from the habit of eating meat, particularly popular among the populations living in desertic areas. In the course of time, with the development of Christianity, animal sacrifice was substituted by the "sacrifice" of a Jesus who - as the "sacrificial lamb" - was nailed to the cross for the pleasure of God the Father. Thus the consumption of meat was separated from the concept of the sacredness of life of animals (that had to be offered to God first before people could eat their meat) and therefore it became a trivial consideration. So instead of relieving the sufferings and saving the lives of innocent animals, Christianity taught that the life and sufferings of animals had no value or importance (as animals "had no soul") and could be indifferently be used for the pleasure of men. This mentality is the basis for the horrible slaughterhouses, the factory farms, the pleasure hunting, and so many other uncivilized practices that spread with abrahmism.

Since abrahmism also considers women as inferior beings (somewhere between animals and men) little more than mere bodies, in cultures dominated by the abrahamic mentality the only value for women is when they dedicate themselves fully to the service and pleasure of husband and children, not out of love and free choice, but out of duty and passiveness. Women who do not submit easily are persecuted as "bad women" and called selfish, rebellious, disobeying, disrespectful, arrogant, proud etc. Submission is often enforced by denying education and other facilities to girl children, so that in the future they will not have any opportunity for independent employment, financial independence or power, or any other type of freedom or power, including the opportunity to progress in the science of spirituality and religion. When this idea is applied to the concept of sacrifice as suffering and death, the result is fatal. Not long ago, the Catholic church canonized ("declared saint") one woman because she refused to allow her pregnancy to be interrupted although she had been clearly told by doctors that she had no chance to survive childbirth and even the child would not have been able to live long after birth.

श्रेयान्द्रव्यमयाद्यज्ञाज्ज्ञानयज्ञः परन्तप । सर्वं कर्माखिलं पार्थ ज्ञाने परिसमाप्यते ॥ ४-३३ ॥

śreyāṇdravyamayādyaññāyājñānayaññah parantapa | sarvaṁ karmākṣhilaṁ pārtha jñāne parisamāpyate || 4-33 ||

śreyan: better; dravya: possessions; mayat: made of; yajnat: than the sacrifice; jñana-yajnah: (is) the sacrifice of knowledge; parantapa: o destroyer of the enemy (Arjuna); sarvam: all; karma-akṣhilaṁ: the totality of actions; pārtha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); jñane: in knowledge; parisamāpyate: end.

"O Parantapa (Arjuna), better than the sacrifice of one's wealth is the sacrifice of knowledge. O Partha (Arjuna), the entire scope of all the activities (must) culminate in knowledge."

It is important to understand that the "sacrifice of knowledge" mentioned in this verse does not mean giving up knowledge to accept blind faith, as some groups of people may believe. Rather, it refers to the search and application of knowledge as a sacred action. Without knowledge, the sacrifice of material possessions remains on the material platform and cannot give a transcendental benefit. However, it is true that not everybody has sufficient intelligence to engage in the acquisition of knowledge, so the sacrifice of materials ultimately leads to the sacrifice of knowledge, due to the gradual purification from selfishness. The word śreyan ("better") is particularly interesting, because it suggests that the acquisition of knowledge brings more permanent results than the mere sacrifice of objects. Even after attaining the heavenly planets by the power of one's charity or ritualistic ceremonies, one will ultimately fall from heaven and have to return to a life of hard work on this planet. Also, the sacrifice of materials requires the acquisition of wealth and goods, which might be difficult in some circumstances. On the other hand, one does not need to be rich or materially powerful in order to dedicate himself to the sincere search for knowledge. However, these considerations are relative, because the rituals and sacrifices prescribed in the karma kanda are not necessarily performed out of selfish and materialist considerations (i.e. to get some material benefit). In fact the purpose and proper application of the karma kanda sacrifices consist in gradually purifying and elevating one's consciousness to the divine level, and becoming free from all material identifications and attachments. Such gradual purification and spiritual progress lead to liberation from material conditionings and towards the natural relationship of service and devotion to the Supreme.

Although this verse appears to give preference to the jñana kanda over the karma kanda, we should not forget that the system of ritualistic ceremonies was created with the purpose of engaging people in a practical active meditation on the Divine. Mere theoretical knowledge or dry scholarship is not sufficient to qualify as "jñana yajna". Therefore we must understand that the proper application of knowledge gives the required transcendental value to all activities. It is through the proper application of knowledge that we can understand how to properly direct the sacrifice of materials, by offering them in the sacred fire or by using them in various other ways for the Divine service. In this way, we should understand that there is no contradiction, opposition or competition between jñana kanda and karma kanda - actually either one without the other is useless, as they are meant to complete each other. The sacrifice at the level of consciousness or knowledge is superior to the mere sacrifice of ingredients in ritual worship, because gross matter is generated at the subtle level first; this introduces the concept of manasa puja, or "worship in meditation", that is considered equally valuable as physical worship when it is done with the proper attention and consciousness.

तद्विद्धि प्रणिपातेन परिप्राश्नेन सेवया । उपदेक्ष्यन्ति ते ज्ञानं ज्ञानिनस्तत्त्वदर्शिनः ॥ ४-३४ ॥

tadviddhi prañipātena paripraśnena sevayā | upadekṣyanti te jñānaṁ jñāninastattvadarśinaḥ || 4-34 ||

tat: that; viddhi: you should learn; pranipatena: by prostrating; pariprasenena: by questioning thoroughly; sevaya: by serving; upadekshyanti: they will initiate; te: you; jnanam: knowledge; jnaninah: the jnanis (those who have the knowledge); tattva: the truth; darsinah: who see.

"You should learn this (knowledge) by approaching those who directly contemplate the Truth, asking them many questions and offering them service. Those who have the knowledge will initiate you (into this science)."

This verse is one of the most important of the entire Bhagavad gita, and is often quoted to substantiate the need to surrender to, and take formal initiation from a spiritual master. The importance of accepting a Guru needs to be stressed because it is a natural tendency for many people to pick just what they find convenient and use it to manufacture some new process. The independent study of books of knowledge is always possible, but we must be very careful against the misunderstandings that are created by cultural superimpositions, attachments, personal beliefs and prejudice, both ours and received second-hand from someone else. Many people read books superficially, without making a real effort to understand or verify their understanding, and sometimes they are motivated by the desire of being part of a trend or fashion, or to showcase their erudition.

However, it is also very dangerous to delegate one's spiritual life to an institutional Guru that does not really care to help his disciples attain the perfect level of Self realization, or even worse, that has no idea of how to do that, because he himself has not attained that level. The world is full of cheaters that distort the meaning of the sacred relationship between teacher and student, to cheaply acquire unquestioning followers. Someone else's misconceptions are no better than the misconceptions that one can make up for himself. So it is better to trust someone who is really expert, and we have the right and duty to make sure that our guide is really expert. Gita does not say that disciples should not ask questions. Quite the contrary.

The word pariprasnena, "questioning thoroughly" refers to the development of a solid and deep personal relationship with the spiritual teacher, who needs to understand exactly the mind of the student in order to adjust the teaching plan. A Guru that has thousands or even hundreds of thousands of disciples will be unable to even remember their names, or the general and publicly known information about such disciples - what to speak of their difficulties, shortcomings and problems, that tend to be kept hidden because of ego considerations. Such "mass of disciples" never or almost never has the opportunity to ask relevant questions from the Guru, because usually the personal presence of the Guru is monopolized by a small group of "intimate followers", that ultimately may even prevent him from getting in touch with other people, and who inspect and control all the correspondence and other contacts that the Guru may have with others. But this is not what Gita recommends. A true Guru should not take too many disciples, because he realizes that accepting a disciple entails a huge responsibility - the obligation to bring the student to Self realization, some way or another, in this life or in another.

This Herculean task cannot be performed without a constant and exhaustive questioning process. If a Guru does not follow or allow this genuine process as prescribed in Gita, he is a faker and a cheater, and he should be immediately abandoned. The questions and answers also go both ways, in the sense that the teacher is also supposed to question the student in order to understand his actual position and realizations. However, the questioning by the student is even more important. When the teacher asks questions to the student, the evaluation of the student's understanding and knowledge can be vitiated by a superficial and mechanical memorization of the answers, but when the student is the one who asks questions the process of learning and understanding becomes easier and more personal.

Another very important word in the verse is pranipatena, "approaching submissively", or by "prolonged salutations" or pranama. This is followed by sevaya, "offering service", or taking orders from the teacher and reciprocating with gratitude and appreciation for the extremely important work that the teacher is doing for our benefit. It is true that knowledge should always be offered freely (there should never be a price on the transmission of knowledge), but it is also true that the student should be adequately grateful and develop a favorable personal relationship with the teacher. This means we should accept a Guru in full humility and serve the Guru without remaining attached to our prestige, as a menial humble servant, not just inquiring out of mere curiosity or in a challenging spirit. Thus both blind following and absurd inquires are obstacles on the path of the correct acquisition of knowledge. The submission and humility that the student needs to offer the teacher is not intended to please the ego of the teacher. A genuine teacher is very kind by nature and is free from abankara and mamatva, as he is situated on the purely transcendental level of Self realization. He does not want to be worshiped or to have power on other people, because he considers himself as a mere servant of God. The only reason why the student should be humble and submissive is that without such humility, it will be very difficult to actually listen and understand the teachings. If such submission is misused, and the Guru does not deliver on his responsibilities, the disciple has the right and the duty to leave him and seek better guidance.

Thus, just like the disciple needs to pass the test of the guru, the guru needs to pass the test of the disciple. There is nothing wrong or offensive about that. Also, it is perfectly possible that a student might outgrow the teacher, and find that there is more to learn and realize than the old teacher can give him. In such case, the student has the right and duty to take leave from the first guru and seek a new one. In fact, this verse clearly indicates that one should not just stick to one teacher, but that one should approach "the jnanis who see the tattva" and receive initiation "from them". A false unqualified Guru is always afraid that inquisitive students may find out about his shortcomings and seek other teachers, so he emotionally manipulates and blackmails their disciples into an "exclusive loyalty" that is compared to the faithfulness of a wife towards a husband, and he claims that a student must have one Guru only, with one initiation only. This is another misconception that needs to be demolished.

In Vedic times, children were sent to the gurukula, where they studied under the personal, expert and loving care of the teacher, who knew how to recognize the natural talents and develop the true potential of each individual. After a number of years spent in preliminary studies, the disciple would be officially initiated by the guru, and such diksha was the public recognition of the actual guna and karma of the student. After being initiated to the Gayatri mantra and other mantras, to the performance of rituals and to the secret knowledge, the disciples remained with the guru for a few more years to complete their studies, and then returned home after offering a gift in gratefulness to the teacher (guru dakshina). Back home, they would marry and start working at their occupational duties, becoming teachers in turn (if recognized as brahmanas) or administrators (kesatriyas) or entrepreneurs (vaisyas). Occasionally, a few students (naistika brahmacharis) chose to remain with the guru instead of getting married and working on their own, and kept assisting the teacher without limitations of time. Other students, that were particularly gifted and were still thirsty for knowledge after completing their normal studies, took leave from the guru and went seeking for other teachers, and were again initiated, into higher or different branches of science. Nobody considered this as a betrayal (as if a wife had left her husband seeking for a better man), rather the first teacher was happy and blessed the student to achieve the perfection he sought. We need to return to this sane and healthy vision of things.

Now, some people will object, saying that "the Sat Guru remains our lord and master lifetime after lifetime". This is true. There are several levels of gurus, and the Sat Guru, the "eternal Guru", is the most important because he gives us the transcendental knowledge that will lead us to liberation. But this has nothing to do with the official function of formal initiation, and even more important, one does not need to get a different "eternal Guru" in each lifetime. After we have met our Sat Guru, and after our eyes have been opened to the wonderful truth of spiritual nature, we can and should continue to learn from every qualified person we meet, recognizing that the Guru is one - always residing in our heart - even when speaking through the mouths of different people. Another extremely important expression in this verse is tattva darsinah, "those who directly contemplate the tattva". One cannot be guru by proxy, by political vote, by power of attorney or by right of inheritance. One who does not have the direct vision of the tattva is simply not qualified to teach; it is better to associate with the books written by the great previous acharyas than to waste time with people who do not have true realizations - starting from the basic realization of Brahman: we are not this material body.

यज्ज्ञात्वा न पुनर्मोहमेवं यास्यसि पाण्डव । येन भूतान्यशेषाणि द्रक्ष्यस्यात्मन्यथो मयि ॥ ४-३५ ॥

yajñātvā na punarmohamevaṁ yāsyasi pāṇḍava । yena bhūtānyāśeṣāṇi drakṣyasi ātmanyatho mayi ।। 4-35 ।।

yat: this (knowledge); jnatva: knowing; na: not; punah: again; moham: illusion; evam: like this; yasyasi: you shall come; pandava: o son of Pandu (Arjuna); yena: by that; bhutani: living entities/ states of being; aseshani: endless/ without exception; drakshyasi: you will see; atmani: in the Self; atha u: that is to say; mayi: in me.

"O Pandava (Arjuna), knowing this (science) you will never again fall into illusion, and you will directly see all the innumerable living entities/ states of being in the self, therefore in me."

Krishna continues to give us important clues on the proper acquisition of transcendental knowledge. Such knowledge (yat, that is equivalent to the tat of the previous verse) dispels all illusions and enables one to see all living entities and states of being within the Self. This is not just theory, it must be experienced in practice. If this is the result of acquiring the transcendental knowledge, then it is logical and natural to expect that a guru offering to initiate a disciple into this knowledge must exhibit the very same symptoms in a permanent and constant way. A real guru is never under the illusion of being the material body or seeing others as material bodies; he has no ahankara or mamatva, but is free from all upadhis or separatist/ sectarian definitions. The expression drakhyasi atmani atha mayi refers to the direct perception of the spiritual/ transcendental nature of each living entity, as part and parcel of God. When we are firmly established in this knowledge and realization, we are able to see the unity of all life and appreciate each small part of it in its unlimited spiritual glory. It is a real experience that radically changes our views on things.

The expression atmani atha u mayi, "in the Atman/ Self, that is in me", is very interesting. It proclaims the identical nature of the atman, or individual Self, with the brahman, or Supreme Self. Abrahamic faiths teach that the individual is just a sinner, a puny and powerless creature, contended between a "good God" and a "bad god" (i.e. Satan), and that can only be "saved" through unquestioning allegiance to the representatives of the "good God". This is totally alien from the Vedic concept and from the Gita.

This "sameness" of the individual Self with the supreme Self must be understood properly, because a person who is still under the delusion of material identification can easily get trapped in a megalomaniac belief that pushes him to believe that he is indeed the one and only Supreme Personality of Godhead, and as such he is entitled to the worship and obedience of everybody else, to the enjoyment of everything that exists, and to the destruction of anything and anybody else who may be perceived as threats to such position. That would be a tragic mistake. This verse states that the atman, the individual Self, contains all the states of being because the individual Self is part of the supreme Self, the Brahman, that is the father of all beings and the origin of all the states of existence. The atman is reality just like the brahman is reality. Reality contains all the states of existence and comprises all living entities, and therefore the consciousness of the atman includes all the states of consciousness of all living beings. Each one of these different states of consciousness becomes manifested when the atman develops the corresponding body. Moreover, the recent studies in particle physics show that all the particles that compose the universe are connected on a subtle level. All jivas are connected through the param atman, the supreme Self that is the underlying Reality that makes individual existences real. The feeling of separatism is just illusion.

अपि चेदसि पापेभ्यः सर्वेभ्यः पापकृत्तमः । सर्वं ज्ञानप्लवेनैव वृजिनं सन्तरिष्यसि ॥ ४-३६ ॥

api cedasi pāpebhyah sarvebhyah pāpakṛttamaḥ । sarvaṁ jñānaplavenaiva vṛjinam santariṣyasi ।। 4-36 ।।

api: although; et: if; asi: you are; papebhyah: of sinners; sarvebhyah: of all; papa-krit-tamah: the greatest sinner; sarvam: all (such sins); jnana-plavena: by the boat of knowledge; eva: certainly; vrijinam: (the ocean of) wickedness; santarishyasi: will cross over.

"Even if you were burdened by many negative actions, by the greatest possible sins, you will be able to cross the ocean of bad things by the boat of knowledge."

No matter how many mistakes we may have committed, the true acquisition of the correct knowledge and realization purifies them all, putting them in the right perspective. This does not mean that a superficial conversion to some kind of sectarian Krishnaism is a free ticket out of jail that erases all the results of the bad choices we have made, or a free pass to continue to commit bad actions without getting punished. Such a thing is not possible. Even after attaining liberation, we will have to face the consequences of our past bad choices, but we will not be bound by them because we have realized our true nature and transcendental position. The natural results of a bad choice create circumstances that will push us into committing more bad actions; for example when we tell a lie we create a situation that will force us to tell more and more lies to uphold the first one. Similarly, by indulging in violence and hatred we create results that will come back at us and make us suffer, usually by clashing with other violent and hateful people.

The vicious circle will continue for the conditioned soul because he remains unable to clearly understand why bad things keep happening to him, and he will consider himself a victim of other people or of circumstances. By repeatedly trying to apply forcible material solutions to such problems he becomes more and more entangled and more conditioned, more deluded and more strictly enslaved by lust and anger. The material world is an ocean of wickedness and suffering. Everybody is food for someone else (Bhagavata Purana 1.13.47), and birth, disease, old age and death are present at every step. One's body, senses and mind are difficult masters to please, and naturally cause a host of sufferings through hunger, thirst, lust, fatigue, confusion, etc. Among human beings, cruelty can become even worse than among animals, and there is no limit to the horrors that people can inflict on one another and even on themselves.

Foolish people try to block out all "upsetting" views and news, deluding themselves into thinking that they can keep evil out of their tidy and manicured lives by fitting iron bars at the windows or at the door and paying others to remove all suspicious people and causes for trouble from the "perfect neighborhood", but this is impossible, because the wickedness spontaneously grows inside any person that remains ignorant of the transcendental knowledge and realization. Proper knowledge and realization ends all this wickedness because it shows us the proper path - the ultimate benefit of sreyah that is better than the immediate gratification of preyah.

Starting to choose transcendental and virtuous solutions modifies our consciousness, purifying it and attuning it to the Divine plan, and thus we come out of the vicious circle, entering a virtuous circle that will take us further into the realization of our true nature - liberation. The metaphor of the boat of knowledge (jnana plavena) is very appropriate because this world is an ocean of problems. We can hope to cross a river or a small lake by swimming, but the ocean is too large: one cannot swim across - we need a boat that will carry us through.

यथैधांसि समिद्धोऽग्निर्भस्मसात्कुरुतेऽर्जुन ।

ज्ञानाग्निः सर्वकर्माणि भस्मसात्कुरुते तथा ॥ ४-३७ ॥

yathaidhāṁsi samiddho'gnirbhasmasātkurute'rjuna | jñānāgniḥ sarvakarmāṇi bhasmasātkurute tathā || 4-37 ||

yatha: just as; edhamsi: pieces of wood/ firewood; samiddhah: blazing; agnih: the fire; bhasma-sat: into ash; kurute: makes; arjuna: o Arjuna; jnana-agnih: the fire of knowledge; sarva-karmani: all the karma (actions and their reactions); bhasma-sat: into ashes; kurute: makes; tatha: similarly.

"O Arjuna, just like the blazing fire turns firewood into ashes, similarly the fire of knowledge turns all karma (reactions to action) into ashes."

It is important to understand that it is the fire of knowledge and realization, and not a mere allegiance, that will destroy all the reactions of our bad choices. All the reactions to all actions will be burned to ashes, both good and bad karma, but we should worry more about the bad karma because its consequences pull us further and further into committing mistakes, while good karma gives us more opportunities to liberate ourselves by making more good choices. Reactions to our choices develop in various stages - as seeds, as plants, and finally as fruits. The fire of knowledge will first destroy the seeds of karmic reactions (i.e. the desires, or forms that have not manifested yet), then it will burn the plant (i.e. the activities and habits, that we keep building day by day) and help us process and burn the fruits of the karmic reactions that have already become manifested (the visible consequences that we have already reaped such as diseases, handicaps, debts, etc).

The blazing fire of knowledge burns the ignorance and therefore the attachment and identification to actions. If these are not burned properly after a reasonable amount of time, we should consider that maybe the knowledge we are following is not correct, or it is not applied in the correct way, or with sufficient dedication and sincerity. To consume a pile of firewood we need a blazing fire - a small candle will not be enough. Like the powerful heat of the fire, the transcendental knowledge and consciousness will pervade all our actions and purify them deeply, transforming them in turn into ardent fire, so that the same actions that used to create bondage will now act like fire itself, and consume all material attachments and identifications because they carry the same heat of the original fire. Only the ash will remain - a pure, clean substance that can be used to purify the body, fertilize the land and even to make soap. Even after a Self-realized yogi has left this world, the benefits of his transcendental actions will continue to bless people for a long time.

न हि ज्ञानेन सदृशं पवित्रमिह विद्यते । तत्स्वयं योगसंसिद्धः कालेनात्मनि विन्दति ॥ ४-३८ ॥

na hi jñānena sadṛśam pavitrāmiha vidyate । tatsvayaṁ yogasaṁsiddhaḥ kālenātmani vindati ॥ 4-38 ॥

na: not; hi: certainly; jñanena: by knowledge; sadṛśam: in comparison; pavitrām: pure/ sanctified; iha: here (in this world/ body); vidyate: it is known (to exist); tat: that; svayaṁ: himself; yoga-samsiddhaḥ: (established) in the perfection of yoga; kalena: in the course of time; atmani: in the Self; vindati: realizes/ attains/ finds pleasure.

"In this world there is nothing as pure/ sacred as knowledge. One who achieves perfection in (this) yoga comes to find full happiness in the Self in the course of time."

Again, this verse identifies yoga with the transcendental knowledge and realization of Brahman. What is the purpose and perfection of yoga? Finding pleasure within the atman, the spiritual Self - certainly not bodily fitness or mind relaxation. This transcendental science of the Atman/ Brahman is the purest knowledge, the most important knowledge in the world, because without knowing and realizing one's Self, a human being remains constantly dissatisfied, feeling that something vital is missing, and keeps trying to achieve the happiness he needs by running after sense gratification, position, possessions etc.

All the problems in the world are due to the lack of this transcendental knowledge. One who has acquired this knowledge theoretically and practically becomes happy in himself and does not need anything else, therefore he becomes able to deal with the many duties and situations in life with a spirit of detachment and balance that guarantees success. A Self-realized yogi's inner happiness is undisturbed by external circumstances, because he can never be separated from his inner Self. He does not need to seek material validation or gratification, and he does not need to reassure or protect himself through material arrangements. He peacefully and sincerely performs his due work, out of duty only, with a very straightforward attitude, and in the best possible way because he offers such work as worship to the Supreme. When material pleasures come, he accepts them as prasadam - leftovers from the superior spiritual happiness he feels and generates - and utilizes them to keep his mind and body in good conditions. When material sufferings come, he finds solace in the inner happiness and peace that always remains with him, and he is able to carry on the performance of his duties without becoming depressed. He remains happy and satisfied even at the time of leaving this body, because not even death can confuse the transcendental realization of atman/ brahman.

The word kalena, "in the course of time", warns us that perfection of yoga is not a quick fix that we can achieve in a few gym lessons, or even with some spiritual retreat or novitiate in some institution. A minimum of 21 days in full-immersion is required simply to start changing one's bad habits and obtaining a clear perception of what we are supposed to achieve in the end. A minimum of 1 year of scrupulous practice in purification and sādhana is required to start feeling a deep change in one's perception of life, and to get the direct experience of spiritual existence. Of course one may get quicker results because of the good work that was done and the results already achieved in previous lifetimes, but for a beginner the first period can be extremely taxing.

The various stories contained in the scriptures clearly show that yogis meditate and practice their *sādhana*s for many years, sometimes hundreds of years before attaining full realization. We may not have all that time, therefore we have been offered many facilitations on this path, of which we should take proper advantage.

श्रद्धावाँलभते ज्ञानं तत्परः संयतेन्द्रियः । ज्ञानं लब्ध्वा परां शान्तिमचिरेणाधिगच्छति ॥ ४-३९ ॥

śraddhāvāṁlabhate jñānam tatparaḥ saṁyatendriyaḥ । jñānam labdhvā parāṁ śāntimacireṇādhiḡacchati ॥ 4-39 ॥

śraddha-van: one who has faith; labhate: obtains; jñanam: knowledge; tat-paraḥ: dedicated to; saṁyata: controlled; indriyah: the senses; jñanam: knowledge; labdhva: by obtaining; param: supreme; śāntim: peace; acireṇa: very soon; adhiḡacchati: attains.

"One who has faith and controls his senses by focusing on that purpose (can) achieve knowledge, and one who has attained knowledge very quickly finds peace."

The previous verse promised that happiness comes with the proper realization of the Self (Atman/ Brahman), and this verse further explains that happiness is also accompanied by peace.

The acquisition of transcendental knowledge (tat viddhi) needs to start with faith (śraddha), because we need a bit of faith if we want to seek for something valuable. Faith is an essential factor of progress in life. Without trusting the teacher's word, we cannot learn anything because we will not be able to accept the basic information on which to build our knowledge. For example, when a pupil starts learning how to write, the teacher asks him to memorize some new strange drawings called letters and tells him that they have such and such sounds, and relate to the names of such and such objects. It is by faith and trust only, that the student can accept this information instead of rejecting it, because the student is not equipped yet to verify whether such information is correct or not. The same applies whenever we want to learn swimming or driving a car, or anything other knowledge.

Faith is also required in many daily situations - when we purchase a ticket for a journey or a show, when we ask directions to find a street, when we get legal advice or any other consultancy, when we take a medicine recommended by a doctor or pharmacist, and so on. Without a bit of faith or trust we would not be able to do much even in our ordinary life. Of course, faith is just the beginning, the first push that sets us in motion - then we need to experiment and verify directly the validity of the things we have put our faith in.

There are two words indicating faith: śraddha and nistha. Śraddha is the initial act of trust that puts us on the path of progress, while nistha is the ripe faith that comes from personal experience.

One of the most famous treatises on Bhakti, called Bhakti rasamrita sindhu (1.4.15-15), gives the technical steps in this sequence: adau sraddha, tatab sadhu-sango, atha bhajana kriya, tato anartha-nivrittib syat, tato nistha, rucis tatha, atha saktis, tato bhavas, tatab prema abhyudanchati. In the beginning some faith is required. This faith will bring us in contact with sadbhus (good people), and by the power of their good example and encouragement we start to directly experiment on the process of sadhana (worship and devotional service). By practicing the sadhana we become purified from bad habits and bad qualities, from shortcomings and any other unwanted problem. Then we become firmly situated in the process and we actually experience happiness and enjoy the experience immensely. We become attached to the transcendental experience, then we feel a strong emotion and then pure love for God. Everyone is seeking God, although many people may have different ideas about what or who God might be. We seek a purpose in life, the origin and cause of everything, the subtle connection between us and the world and other people - unconsciously we feel all this is extremely important, and we constantly try to get the answers. This is the purpose of human life. Without such search, the valuable opportunity of human life is simply wasted.

The practice of controlling the senses (and the mind that is sometimes called "the sixth sense") is very important in the process of acquiring knowledge and realization. Faith encourages us to become engaged in the process, and sense control enables us to continue the process without getting distracted again and again.

Another important expression in this verse is tat-parah, "being dedicated to". The pursuance of spiritual knowledge and realization is not a hobby, a superficial flimsy interest, or a trendy way to find a place in society through membership of some exclusive club. It is not something that should come after all other concerns - the house mortgage, the upgrading of our technical gadgets, the renovation of our wardrobe, fun-seeking vacations, pleasing one's family, getting some university degree, developing a career, keeping up with the neighbors or the colleagues, and so on. "Busy people" get through the "busy lives" simply wasting time in various inconsequential activities, to discover at the time of death that they have not accomplished anything, and they have lost their human opportunity in nothing more than animal propensities such as gratifying their senses and the senses of others, eating, sleeping, mating and defending, and trying to please people whose minds have unlimited demands. This is why in the Vedic system each individual gave priority to the cultivation of transcendental knowledge, fully dedicating their time, energy and attention to this pursuit, living in the house of the guru and getting trained by him. After this all-important training, a person can safely proceed to take up other responsibilities in family and society, because he will be able to carry his consciousness through all the experiences of life and apply it to everything he does.

अज्ञश्चाश्रद्धानश्च संशयात्मा विनश्यति । नायं लोकोऽस्ति न परो न सुखं संशयात्मनः ॥ ४-४० ॥

ajñāścaśraddadhānaśca saṁśayātmā vinaśyati | nāyaṁ loko'sti na paro na sukhaṁ saṁśayātmanah || 4-40 ||

ajñah: a fool/ ignorant; ca: and; asraddha-dhanah: one who does not have faith; ca: and; samsaya atma: one who doubts; vinasyati: perishes/ is (engaged in) self-destruction; na: not; ayam: in this; loka: world; asti: there is; na: not; parah: in the next life; na: not; sukham: happiness; samsaya: doubt; atmanah: of one self.

"A person who is devoid of knowledge and faith, and cannot overcome doubts will be lost. For one who is plagued by uncertainty there is no happiness in this world or in the next."

As we have seen, an initial act of faith is required to approach transcendental knowledge and consciousness, because we need to make the effort of actually experimenting on what the scriptures and the Guru say. For someone who has always lived in the consciousness of material body identification, it is not automatically apparent that we are not the body or the mind, and that our true nature and identity is something that cannot be put under a microscope or weighed on a scale.

Earlier, Gita (2.29) clearly stated that the nature of the soul is so amazing that ordinary people find it very difficult to understand. All the experiences that we have on the material level tend, through our material senses, to convince us that matter is the only reality and spirit is a vague abstract concept that cannot be proven. Words, too, have limitations when it comes to describe the adbokshaja, that is beyond sense perception. To actually come to understand Atman/ Brahman, we need to carefully listen to the instructions of the scriptures and guru, and meditate favorably on them in a sincere effort to understand them. This requires faith and sense control - we trust that very soon we will become able to perceive Transcendence - not through the material senses we use in every day's work, but through the spiritual senses that we naturally possess, and that ordinary people in a materialistic society never get the chance to use. As we have already mentioned, any form of learning requires a measure of faith, especially in the beginning when we have no reference parameters or previous experience to verify the information that we are given. We just need to try, accepting the risk on the faith that the person who is giving us the instruction knows what he is talking about.

The word samsayam refers to chronic uncertainty and fear that prevent us to actually make the effort to put theory into practice. It is perfectly legitimate to ask all the questions we want (pariprasnena) and to verify all claims or statements, but we should overcome the chronic tendency to doubt. We should be willing to take some risk, because otherwise we will remain stuck in the same non-progressive situation forever. For example as we already mentioned, we need a certain amount of faith to purchase a train ticket, as we are investing money and we obtain only a piece of paper, by which we are directed to board a certain train. Technically speaking, at that time we have no way of being sure that we will ultimately reach the destination we want, but without making the conscious choice of trusting the Railway service and board the train we are directed to, we will never be able to get to the place we want. We will just be stuck in the railway station, wasting our time and experiencing negative emotions - fear, disappointment, anger, etc. A person who is unable to get beyond the doubting phase will lose everything, as he will not be able to enjoy life normally like simple-minded materialists do, and he will not be able to achieve the transcendental happiness that comes from the direct experience of the Atman/ Brahman. He goes neither left nor right, and just remains stuck at the crossroads. The next verses will give further emphasis on this point, to stress its crucial importance.

योगसंन्यस्तकर्माणं ज्ञानसञ्छिन्नसंशयम् ।

आत्मवन्तं न कर्माणि निबद्धान्ति धनञ्जय ॥ ४-४१ ॥

yogasannyastakarmāṇaṁ jñānaśāñchinnaśaśayam | ātmavantaṁ na karmāṇi nibadhnanti dhanañjaya || 4-41 ||

yoga-sannyasta: one who has attained renunciation through yoga; karmanam: of the activities; jnana: by knowledge; sanchinna: cut; samsayam: doubt; atma-vantam: situated in the atman; na: not; karmāni: activities; nibadhnanti: create bondage; dhanañjaya: o Dhananjaya (conqueror of wealth).

"One who practices the renunciation / has attained detachment from actions through yoga and has cut through all doubts by (the sword of) knowledge, resides in the self/ finds his desires turning towards the self. O Dhananjaya (conqueror of wealth), such a person is never bound by any action."

The expression yoga sannyasta summarizes all the requirements that have been explained before: faith, sense control, dedication are all based on the fundamental consciousness of renunciation, or detachment from the material identification and possessiveness. This understanding is also reflected in the popular meaning of "sacrifice". However, such renunciation does not entail suffering or deprivation, and should not cause us to stop performing our proper duties (to family and social occupation) as many people mistakenly believe. Such renunciation consists in giving up the selfish motivation that usually prompt people to work; it is yoga sannyasta, renunciation through the yoga of transcendental knowledge and consciousness.

A yogi continues to work in the best possible way, but he is detached from the results of the activities because he is already fully satisfied with inner happiness and peace. Having directly experienced such happiness and peace, a yogi is not disturbed by doubts any more, because he has a direct view of reality. And because the inner Self is a source of unlimited happiness, he does not need to seek elsewhere, just like a man who owns a five star restaurant does not need to wander in the streets begging for food. Still the yogi continues to work, and if circumstances require so, he is ready to go out and win wealth for a higher purpose, as indicated by the name Dhananjaya ("conqueror of wealth") that Krishna chooses to use in addressing Arjuna. Such pursuit of wealth is not motivated by the desire for sense gratification or possession, but by the legitimate desire to perform yajnas for the benefit of the entire society. According to the particular circumstances of place and time, such collection of funds can be used to build nice temples and ensure the worship of the Deity, or to publish spiritually enlightening literature, to distribute sanctified food (prasadam), to gather people for spiritual discussion and the glorification of the names, qualities, activities and teachings of the Personalities of Godhead, and to properly engage qualified persons in the service of society in a transcendental spirit of devotion.

Any beneficial activity (including "material welfare work") that is performed in a spirit of devotion and with a transcendental consciousness becomes an asset towards liberation, and does not bind us either with good or bad karma.

तस्मादज्ञानसम्भूतं हृत्स्थं ज्ञानासिनात्मनः ।

छित्त्वेन संशयं योगमातिष्ठोत्तिष्ठ भारत ॥ ४-४२ ॥

tasmātajñānasambhūtaṁ hṛtsthaṁ jñānaśinātmanah | chittvainaṁ saṁśayaṁ yogamātiṣṭhottisṭha bhārata || 4-42 ||

tasmāt: therefore; ajñana-sambhutam: created by ignorance; hṛt-stham: settled in the heart; jñana-asina: with the sword of knowledge; atmanah: of the Self/ on the Self; chittva: cutting; enam: this; samsayam: doubts; yogam: in the Yoga; atisṭha: (firmly) situated/ undertaking/ taking shelter of; utisṭha: rise (for battle); bharata: o descendant of Bharata.

"Therefore o Bharata, get up and fight, establishing yourself in yoga and using the sword of knowledge to slash off all these doubts that were born from ignorance and are infesting the heart."

This verse concludes the fourth chapter of Bhagavad gita, summarizing its contents. By properly pursuing the transcendental knowledge and consciousness we destroy ignorance and illusion, but still it is possible to be attacked by doubts in the early stages of sadhana, because of a long habit of the mind to identify the self with the body and the thought processes, and also because of occasional association with materialistic persons or messages. Attachment to ignorance creates doubts in the heart and cause negative emotions such as fear, depression and confusion. A moderate amount of doubts can be useful in the beginning, before we choose a path, because doubt is a natural function of intelligence and can save us from many dangers and especially from the widespread cheating enterprises that thrive in the field of religion and ideology in general. However, once we have verified that our spiritual guide is a qualified and sincere person, we should not allow doubts to sap our energy and determination, otherwise our progress will be slowed down. Which doubts are we talking about? Those about the Self, atman. The confusion about one's true nature and identity comes from a long habit of associating with the ignorance of material identification and attachment, and at times some new sprout can grow from the felled plant, if we are not careful enough to extirpate the roots.

The word atmanah can also be interpreted to indicate that one's doubts cannot be removed by anyone else. Faith is just the beginning, and it is required in order to listen attentively to the instructions of guru and shastra, and to take the leap "of faith" that makes us think and act in a transcendental way. The result of such activities will give us a direct experience that is the only true answer to all doubts.

If you wish to know what honey tastes like, you first need to gather the theoretical knowledge of what honey is - what it looks like, where it is normally found, how it is acquired (either from the bees or from a shop), the quantity that one should take, etc. This requires faith because we need to believe what we are told, otherwise we will never be able to act on such information.

Next, faith must lead us forward, seeking for the actual thing - the honey - and when we have found something that corresponds with the theoretical descriptions we have heard, we need some more faith to invest our money or work to acquire the honey. Finally, there is one more act of faith, that consists in actually putting the honey into our mouth without listening to the hundreds of doubts raised by the mind (could it be poisonous? oh my god it looks like carpenter's glue! how sticky and messy it is! will it really be palatable?). After that point, the job of faith (sraddha) is over. We can actually and directly taste the sweetness of honey, and nobody will be ever able to convince us that honey is not palatable.

The two expressions athistha and utthistha are very interesting. Athistha means "situating himself on a strong basis" and utthistha means "rising up to move on". We need a center of permanent balance in our life, but such stability is dynamic and must be preserved by the proper action. We cannot remain stable by abstaining from action, because in this world everything moves and changes, and sattva quickly rots into tamas when it is not exercised dynamically. The secret is therefore to move on with the flow of Life, remaining solidly balanced on the proper consciousness of the Self, but always ready to perform one's duty selflessly.

Chapter 5: Sannyasa Yoga

The yoga of renunciation

This chapter speaks clearly about two extremely difficult and misunderstood subjects - sannyasa and yoga - explaining what actual renunciation is, and what is the true purpose of yoga. We will see how the teachings of this chapter do not contradict the teachings of previous chapters but rather they integrate them and make them easier to understand.

The order of sannyasa is the fourth stage of life or ashrama for civilized people (aryas). In the previous chapter, Krishna has explained the system of varnas as a categorization of social duties according to one's qualities/ tendencies and activities/ abilities (guna and karma), that is part of the greater system called varnashrama, including both varnas and ashramas and detailing their duties to ensure the gradual progress of the entire society. Quite the opposite of the present degraded caste system based on birth prejudice and disregard for real personal qualities and duties, the varnashrama system is meant to support and stimulate the individual's training for progress and development, by setting duties and responsibilities that are progressively more demanding just like the higher classes in school are set lessons and tests that become increasingly difficult and demanding. The general direction leads from the lower gunas (qualities) of tamas (ignorance) and rajas (passion) towards sattva (virtue/ goodness), that is characterized by selflessness, sense of responsibility and duty, simplicity of life, peacefulness, cultivation of knowledge, cultivation of detachment/ renunciation, wisdom, internal and external cleanliness, and inner happiness and satisfaction that radiates in every aspect of life. Later Krishna will explain more about the three gunas (modes or qualities) of material nature, especially in chapter 14, that is specifically entitled guna traya vibhaga yoga, or "the yoga of differentiating between the gunas". However, already in 2.45 (nitya-sattva stho) he had said that one should always remain situated in sattva, because the purification of the mind and body and the cultivation of knowledge are the purpose of all the karmas and yajnas, or dutiful activities and religious rituals.

Among the 8 categories of the varnashrama dharma, the brahmana (for the varnas) and the sannyasi (for the ashramas) are expected to be the highest and most qualified among the human beings; the brahmana is one who knows Brahman in theory and practice, while the sannyasi has completely renounced all material identifications, associations and attachments. Thus they exemplify the highest level of jnana (knowledge) and vairagya (detachment), the two main qualities/ practices that enable spiritual and material progress. Just like it is not sufficient for a man to wear a sacred thread to be considered a brahmana if he does not possess the qualities and does not perform the duties as per descriptions in the shastra, it is not sufficient for a man to wear saffron colored clothes to be considered a sannyasi if he does not possess the qualities and does not perform the duties as per descriptions in the shastra. The instructions for sannyasis are found especially in the Upanishads, many of which are specifically dedicated to that purpose: Aruneya Upanishad, Avadhuta Upanishad, Bhikshuka Upanishad, Brahma Upanishad, Jabala Upanishad, Katha rudra Upanishad, Kundika Upanishad, Maitreya Upanishad, Narada parivrajaka Upanishad, Nirvana Upanishad, Para brahma Upanishad, Paramahansa Upanishad, Paramahansa parivrajaka Upanishad, Sannyasa Upanishad, Satyayani Upanishad, Teja bindu Upanishad, Turiyatita Upanishad, Varaha Upanishad, and Yajnavalkya Upanishad.

Formally entering the order of sannyasa has never been obligatory, but it had been recommended for brahmanas to set an example of higher aspirations among the general population. However, with the onset of Kali yuga the social body became increasingly afflicted by degradation and thus the order of sannyasa has mostly become a mockery of itself. According to the original shastras, a sannyasi cannot have any possession, any fixed residence, any opportunity for self gratification. He cannot accept disciples, he cannot teach or even mix with other people, except for the brief span of time a householder needs to milk a cow to feed a beggar. A sannyasi would not be invited for meals into the house, but was just given alms in his kamandalu (water pot) or uttariya (upper cloth), generally in the form of rice, fruits, vegetables, and especially milk - considered the most suitable food. A sannyasi was not supposed to cook his food, but he was expected to eat raw unseasoned food just to keep the body barely alive, without any concession to taste. To avoid the possibility of the sannyasi becoming too complacent with his means of living, a precise and explicit rule stated that sannyasis could never come near women or wealthy or powerful people in society. This observance was also helped by the fact that sannyasis were expected to totally disregard the care of their own bodies and clothing, even roaming around naked or scantily covered by rags. They could not use shoes, umbrellas, or vehicles of any kind, and in general they were expected to do nothing else but simply prepare themselves to death through total detachment from all material identification and belongings. Since the rules of sannyasa are so strict, it is better to humbly remain in an apparently ordinary position as a vanaprastha or grihastha or brahmachari, rather than venturing into the order of sannyasa and then falling from that position. A person who leaves the order of sannyasa to engage again in material life - family, society, business etc - is called a vantasi, "one who eats his own vomit" (Bhagavata Purana 7.15.36), and a person who behaves in a way that disgraces the name of sannyasa is called a dharmaha, "one who kills dharm" (Bhagavata Purana 11.18.40-41).

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

संन्यासं कर्मणां कृष्ण पुनर्योगं च शंससि ।

यच्छ्रेय एतयोरेकं तन्मे ब्रूहि सुनिश्चितम् ॥ ५-१ ॥

sannyāsam karmāṇāṁ kṛṣṇa punaryogaṁ ca śaṁsasi । yacchreya etayorekaṁ tanme brūhi suniścitam ॥ 5-1 ॥

arjuna: Arjuna; uvaca: said; sannyasam: sannyasa; karmāṇām: of the activities/ duties; kṛṣṇa: o Krishna; punah: again; yogam: yoga; ca: and; śaṁsasi: you are praising; ya: that; śreya: the higher benefit; etayoh: of the two; ekam: one; tat: that; me: to me; brūhi: tell; sunīcitam: absolutely without doubt.

Arjuna said: "O Krishna, you have praised sannyasa (renunciation to all actions) and then (you praised) yoga (conscious engagement in action). Please tell me which one of these two will, without any doubt, be the best."

In this verse, the definition of yoga is opposed to the concept of sannyasa as "renunciation to action", highlighting the fact that yoga means "engagement in action". The difficulty of understanding expressed by Arjuna is common to everyone, especially when one finds himself in difficult circumstances. Good theories need to be put on the test of practical application in life - there are so many armchair philosophers and week-end bhaktas who like to spend a lazy afternoon in hefty talks or ponderous tomes, but when difficulties arise, all their nice talking and reading is forgotten and they act in very opposite ways, "because this is real life".

The difference between a person who acts out of selfish interest and a person who acts in a transcendently renounced consciousness is not always apparent, because they both engage wholeheartedly and painstakingly in the dutiful action, investing their intelligence, their will power, and the effort of their bodies. Krishna also says that one should never renounce the performance of one's dharmic duty, yet the position of a sannyasi - who has given up all ties to family and society and does not perform any duties - is considered exalted and transcendental. This is the main focus of Gita, and we should not think that the repetition of this concept is boring, because repetition is aimed at stressing the importance of the teaching, and engraving it into the student's mind, so that it becomes part of his mental structure. Krishna will repeat this point again and again.

See 6.1: "The real sannyasi and the real yogi is one who selflessly performs all his duties in society and takes the proper actions where required, without any attachment to enjoy the fruits of his activities - not one who escapes from action in the name of some rules of renunciation."

And 18.2: "Actual renunciation or sannyasa consists in giving up the desire for selfish activities. In fact, one should renounce the fruits of all activities: this is defined as renunciation."

And 18.5: "Sacrifice (sacred action), charity and austerity, and one's duties, should never be given up, but must always be performed. Certainly these - sacrifice, charity and austerity - can purify even the wise."

And 18.7-8: "Sannyasa is never about giving up prescribed duties. Those who abandon their prescribed duties (with the idea of renunciation) are said to be under the influence of tamas (ignorance)", "One who is unhappy about his duties, and gives them up out of fear of physical difficulties, is renouncing under the influence of rajas (passion), and certainly does not obtain the (expected) fruits of renunciation".

The answer is that there is no duality between sannyasa and yoga.

The real yogi is also the real sannyasi. This is the statement that will open the next chapter (6): "One who performs the (ritual and social) activities constituting his/ her duties without depending on the results of the action is the real sannyasi (renouncer) and yogi, not one who does not kindle the (sacred) fire and does not engage in activities."

The word tat in this verse is very interesting, because with it Arjuna subtly shows that he knows the ultimate purpose to be attained: tat ("That"), Transcendence, is the purpose of sannyasa and yoga.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

संन्यासः कर्मयोगश्च निःश्रेयसकरावुभौ ।

तयोस्तु कर्मसंन्यासात्कर्मयोगो विशिष्यते ॥ ५-२ ॥

sannyāsaḥ karmayogaśca niḥśreyasakarāvubhau । tayostu karmasannyāsātkarmayogo viśiṣyate ॥ 5-2 ॥

śrī: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; sannyasah: sannyasa; karma-yogah: karma yoga; ca: and; niḥśreyasa: of the highest benefit; karau: making/ leading to; ubhau: both of them; tayoh: of the two; tu: but; karma-sannyasat: than renunciation to activities; karma-yogah: engagement of action (in transcendental consciousness); viśiṣyate: is better.

The Lord said: "Both these (paths), the sannyasa (renunciation) and the karma yoga (the yoga of action) will bring the best benefit, but the karma yoga (the yoga of action) is better than the karma sannyasa (renunciation to action)."

The best benefit is indicated by the word nihsreya, a strengthened form of the word sreya. We have seen previously that sreya is the real ultimate and permanent benefit, while preya is the immediate gratification, the apparent material benefit. So nihsreya defines the epitome of the ultimate benefit: liberation from material conditionings and the attainment of the transcendental level of consciousness.

Both aspects of sadhana (spiritual practice) - sannyasa and karma yoga - are perfectly compatible with each other, and in fact they are both required to achieve the desired success (sreya). As we have seen in the other quotes from Gita, real sannyasa consists in renouncing the selfish motivation of the activities, rather than abstaining from activities themselves. However, the simple act of renunciation to the fruits of the activities is not sufficient to attain perfection, because it is a "negative" concept. We need to eliminate misconceptions in order to properly understand the tatva, but the mere elimination of misconceptions is not sufficient to actually understand the subject. Therefore we need to proceed with a proactive plan, a constructive plan, by which we engage our body, senses, mind and intelligence in positive action that is free from selfish motivations. To make an example: when we want to cultivate a field, we first need to clear away all the garbage and stones and weeds, and prepare the soil properly, making it level and aerating the superficial layer, and adding the fertilizing substances that are most suitable for that particular cultivation.

This preliminary work will ensure that the plants will grow healthy and strong, and the harvest will be done smoothly and without damages. But that is only the beginning of the work: we then need to spread the seeds, cover them with some soil and irrigate the land. When the plants have sprouted, we need to continue the cleaning work we have done in preparation - cleaning out the garbage and the weeds, and taking care of the pests that might be attracted to the nutritious and tasty stuff that the plants bear.

Similarly, before we start the process of sadhana proper we need to understand the difference between a weed and the useful plant we are growing, and how to keep our grounds clean. But the proper care of the harvest remains our main concern. What is the harvest here? Service to the Supreme. A bhakta could also translate karma yoga as "devotional service", because that is the purpose of the action when one is free from selfish motivations. However, we need to weed out a few misconceptions from this definition. Devotional service, described more appropriately as bhakti yoga (rather than karma yoga), requires the proper understanding and realization of what the Divine is, and what are the basic parameters that define the service to the Divine. When we translate karma yoga as "devotional service" we imply that all our regular activities, all our duties to family, society, and the universe, must be performed selflessly in a spirit of service to the All. It does not mean that we can jump from family life to sannyasa and back, or to some strange and new position between them, whenever it is more convenient for us to enjoy something or to escape from something else, or to enjoy the advantages of both positions under the pretext of being "transcendental".

ज्ञेयः स नित्यसंन्यासी यो न द्वेष्टि न काङ्क्षति । निर्वन्द्वो हि महाबाहो सुखं बन्धात्प्रमुच्यते ॥ ५-३ ॥

jñeyah sa nityasannyāsī yo na dveṣṭi na kāṅkṣati | nīrvandvo hi mahābāho sukhaṁ bandhātpramucyate || 5-3 ||

jñeyah: it should be known; sah: he/ she; nitya: always; sannyasi: sannyasi; yah: he/ she; na: (does) not; dveṣṭi: hates; na: not; kāṅkṣati: aspires to; nīrvandvab: non-duality; hi: indeed; maha-baho: o Mahabaho ("mighty armed"); sukham: easily; bandhat: from the bondage; pramucyate: becomes completely liberated.

"It should be known that the (real) sannyasi (who remains in) permanent (renunciation) does not hate nor aspires to (anything), and/ because is certainly (always) free from duality. O mighty-armed (Arjuna), (such a person) becomes completely liberated from (all) ties very easily."

The expression nitya sannyasi implies that the official vow of permanent renunciation should not be taken lightly. In fact in Kali yuga such official vows are not prescribed because most of the degraded people of this age are unable to follow the strict rules of this ashrama and usually they end up making a superficial show of sanctity in order to obtain some material benefits from the gullible public. A temporary practice of sannyasa may be taken up by anyone, as an exercise in renunciation and simplicity of life especially during vratas (periods of special austerities) or pilgrimages to holy places, but the permanent acceptance of the order of sannyasa requires a remarkable level of personal evolution. Only a person who has attained the transcendental level of Brahman realization will be able to overcome duality and remain undisturbed in front of the many favorable and unfavorable circumstances of life.

A sannyasi has no likes or dislikes, is not attracted or repulsed by anything and sees all living entities just as souls and parts of God, without being distracted by their bodily appearance or even by their behavior. He does not pursue sense gratification but he is always ready to engage everything and everyone in the service to the Divine, without ever being confused by external conditions of the body such as gender, caste, age, race and color. However, to be a sannyasi one does not need to leave one's family or job, or dress in a saffron-colored loincloth or stop wearing shoes. Many times, Krishna repeats that a true sannyasi continues to perform the prescribed duties - to one's family, one's professional occupation, etc - but without the selfish motivation of getting a personal benefit, such an increase in profits, name and fame, a high position, etc. So one who merely changes the external dress and social position in order to avoid the hurdles that come with the proper selfless performance of duties, and to enjoy a total lack of responsibilities, is acting under the influence of the lower modes of material nature.

The expression sukham bandhat is very interesting because it contains several meanings. Sukham means "easily", in the sense "with ease, comfortably, smoothly, without problems". According to this meaning, the verse upholds the gradual system of purusharthas described in Vedic literature - dharma, artha, kama and moksha - that enable the individual to experiment all the opportunities of human life in this world, without remaining entangled in the related activities and their results.

Happiness and ease are not condemned by Gita, however, one should not become attached to them, either. In fact attachment to one's happiness and comfort is also a form of bondage, albeit under the influence of material sattva. For example, a person who has developed a strong habit of cleanliness may feel repulsion at the idea of executing some work involving contact with dirty or contaminated things, but this is a conditioning, too.

साङ्ख्ययोगौ पृथग्वालाः प्रवदन्ति न पण्डिताः । एकमप्यास्थितः सम्यग्भयोर्विन्दते फलम् ॥ ५-४ ॥

sāṅkhyayogau pṛthagbalāḥ pravadanti na paṇḍitāḥ । ekamapyāsthitah samyagubhayorvindate phalam ॥ 5-4 ॥

sankhya: the Sankhya; yogau: and the Yoga; pṛthak: different; balah: childish; pravadanti: they say/ declare; na: not/ never; paṇḍitah: the paṇḍits ("expert in learning"); ekam: in one; api: although; asthitah: situated; samyak: complete; ubhayoh: of the two; vindate: enjoys; phalam: the results.

"Only childish people, and not paṇḍitas, speak of Sankhya and Yoga as two different paths. In fact one who is firmly situated on either of these attains the final purpose of both."

After clarifying that sannyasa and karma are one and the same path, Krishna here states that sankhya and yoga, too, are one and the same path. This means that the path of spiritual realization, called Yoga, must be integrated by all the genuine techniques offered by the scriptures - Sankhya, Karma, Jnana, Sannyasa, Hatha, Dhyana, Kriya, Bhakti, and Buddhi. All these methods are simply ingredients of the one and only path of Yoga: if one is missing, we will not achieve the expected result. This is directly opposing the mainstream ignorant notion that there are "different" paths in the Vedic system, and one who chooses one path cannot choose another at the same time. The only real difference taught by Vedic knowledge is between sat and asat, dharma and adharma, sura and asura, vidya and avidya. Otherwise, all genuine dharmic methods are not only compatible, but also complementary, just like the "different" limbs of one single body cannot be detached from the body without losing their purpose. Let's examine the meaning of the various limbs of the dharmic path of Yoga presented in Bhagavad gita.

Sankhya is the knowledge of the difference between spirit and matter, that cleans the field from misconceptions. Karma is the practical engagement in active life in the performance of one's duties, that creates merits or punya, increasing sattva and therefore the intelligence and ability to achieve success in Self realization. Jnana is the transcendental knowledge and wisdom that keep us in the proper consciousness; it is also called svadhyaya, or study of the scriptures. Sannyasa is the renunciation to the ahankara and mamata - the identification with the material body/ mind (position, etc) and the attachment to material things and relationship (possession, belonging, affiliation etc). Hatha is the balancing of the two energies of the body and mind - masculine and feminine - that enables us to transcend both and become situated in Transcendental identification. Kriya is the practice of sadhana, the regulated activities that train us in the personal association of the Divine consciousness. Dhyana is the meditation on the Absolute that includes all realities; it only becomes possible after we have acquired the proper knowledge and consciousness. Bhakti is the sentiment of love and devotion to the Lord, or isvara pranidhana. Buddhi is the intelligent discrimination that enables us to apply each and every ingredient in the appropriate way.

Recently some clever business people have come up with imaginative definitions such as the "Yoga of laughing" (Hasya Yoga), or the "Yoga of sleeping" (Nidra Yoga), and some people have even patented "Yoga systems" under their own personal names. They have invented Yoga for pregnancy, Yoga dance, Sauna Yoga, sex Yoga, antigravity Yoga, and who knows what else. There is even a special Yoga for dogs that has been (ridiculously) called "Doga". All this bogus stuff has distorted the original concept of Yoga and has no foundation whatsoever in the original scriptures, although most of these speculations claim to get their authoritativeness from the ancient Tradition. If we want to really understand Yoga, we need to go to the source.

यत्साङ्ख्यैः प्राप्यते स्थानं तद्योगैरपि गम्यते । एकं साङ्ख्यं च योगं च यः पश्यति स पश्यति ॥ ५-५ ॥

yatsāṅkhyaiḥ prāpyate sthānam tadyogairapi gamyate । ekam sāṅkhyam ca yogam ca yaḥ paśyati sa paśyati ॥ 5-5 ॥

yat: what; sāṅkhyaiḥ: by the Sankhya; prāpyate: is obtained; sthānam: position; tat: that; yogaiḥ: by Yoga; api: even; gamyate: can be obtained; ekam: one only; sāṅkhyam: Sankhya; ca: and; yogam: Yoga; ca: and; yaḥ: he/ she; paśyati: sees; sah: he/ she; paśyati: sees (correctly).

"The (same) purpose/ position/ place that is attained through Sankhya is also attained through Yoga. One who sees Sankhya and Yoga as the same one thing, is (really) seeing (correctly)."

In this verse, Krishna unequivocally condemns the "different schools" concept taught by mainstream academia and by sectarian "religious" organizations entangled in material politics. Sankhya is described as the analytical study of Reality, that distinguishes the various categories of existence, and specifically highlights the difference between the material elements of prakṛiti and the conscious being called purusha. Yoga is described as the science of action in transcendental consciousness, which consists in the pure awareness of one's own identity as atman, and the detached observation and utilization of the material elements that compose the body and the mind. Therefore, Sankhya and Yoga are not different at all from each other. Sankhya philosophy is not opposed to the Bhagavata philosophy as some may believe, as the knowledge of the categories of Reality can not be opposed to the knowledge of the Supreme Reality. In fact, by knowing the glories that Bhagavan Isvara manifests in this world, we will become able to appreciate the deep meaning of the nature of Bhagavan - otherwise, our bhakti will remain only superficial. This genuine method of study is exemplified in the Bhagavata Purana as well as in later chapters of Gita, and especially in chapters 11, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 17. Dismissing the knowledge of the universe as unnecessary or even opposed to the knowledge of the Supreme Personality of Godhead is a dangerous and foolish choice that puts us in the fatal risk of increasing our false ego and arrogance, making us believe that we are too "elevated" for this kind of topics. Without understanding that we are not the material body - the first and foremost teaching of Krishna in Gita - there is no point in fantasizing about being transcendently engaged in so many activities in devotional service or even contemplating so-called intimate lilas, because all such activities will simply boil down to politics and sentimentalistic cheating. It is true that mere theoretical scholarship will not take us to the transcendental level, but that applies to all philosophical/ theological schools; the same applies to philanthropic activities, to Deity worship, etc. The real difference is in the consciousness, not in the official allegiance to one institution or "school" or another. In the previous verses, niskama karma, or action in selfless service, was declared as better than mere sannyasa or renunciation; sankhya on the other hand is based on the fundamental knowledge that governs renunciation and action at the same time. The word sthanam, "permanent position, place" mentioned in the verse refers to the liberated position, the platform on which one has transcended material identifications and attachments, and acts from the pure consciousness of the Self, or atman. It is a stable and solid position, from which one does not falter or fall into ignorance and delusion. The words sah and yah are personal pronouns but do not contain any reference to masculine or feminine gender; they can be translated either or both as "he" and "she".

संन्यासस्तु महाबाहो दुःखमाप्तुमयोगतः । योगयुक्तो मुनिर्ब्रह्म नचिरेणाधिगच्छति ॥ ५-६ ॥

sannyāsastu mahābāho duḥkhamāptumayogataḥ | yogayukto munirbrahma nacireṇādhigacchati || 5-6 ||

sannyasab: sannyasa; tu: but; maha-baho: o Mahabaho ("mighty armed"); duḥkham: suffering; aptum: afflicts; ayogataḥ: without yoga; yoga-yukto: engaged in yoga; munib: the wise; brahma: Brahman; na: no; cirena: delay; adhigacchati: attains.

"O mighty-armed (Arjuna), sannyasa (renunciation) without yoga (proper engagement) only produces misery/ is attained with difficulty; one who is engaged in yoga is a muni (a wise person) and quickly attains Brahman."

The word muni describes a wise person, who remains silent and quiet because s/he is not afraid of silence and solitude. Such a person is focused on inner happiness and detached from external circumstances. This happy state of being is possible only with yoga, the proper engagement of the consciousness. The concept of sannyasa, renunciation, is not sufficient in itself to liberate the individual from material identifications and attachments, because the sannyasi may still think that he has become a great personality because he has chosen to abstain from pleasures that legitimately belonged to him, and that such sacrifice is putting him above all other human beings, so he is entitled to extra respect and service from the general people.

Krishna has already said (3.6): "One who controls the senses of action but continues to remain attached to the memory of the sense objects, is called a fool and a hypocrite". A person who restrains the senses but still maintains the concept of sense enjoyment and sense objects as connected to his personal gratification (either positive or negative) is a pretender.

In this verse Krishna adds that such a person is also inevitably destined to suffer, because his mind, senses and body miss the pleasures and comforts that he has left behind. The reason was explained in 2.59: the taste for the sense objects remains in the mind, senses and body of a person who still identifies with the material body - the only way to overcome this problem is to be engaged in something better (param drstva nivartate). Such engagement is called yoga, the art and science of action (2.50), by which one can work happily without being tied by the results of the activities, and thus attain liberation (Brahman).

This result is not obtained simply by showing one's esophagus' movements in public, or by increasing the oxygen intake with deeper and faster breathing - or even getting a fit and trim body and a relaxed mind. All the physical benefits of asana and pranayama, mudras, kriyas etc are simply a side effect, not the purpose of Yoga - that otherwise would not be much different from Pilates or jogging, that have the effect of increasing one's bodily identification rather than enabling us to break away from it.

योगयुक्तो विशुद्धात्मा विजितात्मा जितेन्द्रियः । सर्वभूतात्मभूतात्मा कुर्वन्नपि न लिप्यते ॥ ५-७ ॥

yogayukto viśuddhātmā vijitātmā jitendriyaḥ | sarvabhūtātmabhūtātmā kurvannapi na lipyate || 5-7 ||

yoga-yuktab: engaged in yoga; viśuddha-atma: (having) purified one's self; vijita-atma: (having) controlled one's self; jita-indriyah: (having) conquered the senses; sarva-bhuta-atma: the self of all living entities; bhuta-atma: the self of existences; kurvan: making; api: even; na: not; lipyate: is affected.

"A person who has purified him/ herself through the engagement in yoga, conquering the self and controlling the senses, considers him/herself as the atman that is the same atman/ existence of all living entities. Although engaged (in activities), s/he is never affected (by them)."

The three stages of yoga are hereby described in descending order as viśuddhatma, "purified mind", vijitatma, "controlled mind" and jitendriya, "controlling the senses". At first we must learn to control the senses - starting with one's tongue, both in speech and eating. In a wider sense, this "faculty of speech" and "faculty of nutrition" expand to the expression of the mind through writing and other means, and to the subtle food we give to your senses and to our mind. So it is very important to control what our senses acquire from the external world and also what our senses transmit to the external world. As we have seen also in other verses, the word atman means "self". According to the particular context, it can refer to the spirit soul or jivatman, or to the identification of the living entity, a concept that may extend to the mind. The expression visuddha atma in this verse specifically refers to the identification of the atman, because by purifying one's identification - establishing one's identification as pure atman - also our mind, senses and body automatically become purified because of the fire of Knowledge and transcendental consciousness.

The expression sarva-bhutatma-bhutatma may seem redundant, but we know that Krishna is not speaking unnecessarily. It is a mysterious definition that obviously includes different layers of meanings. We have already seen that the word bhuta means both "being" (in the sense of "entity") and "existence", and in fact even the two meanings have a deep connection in English language. A being is something that exists, a state of existence of the consciousness or atman. When the atman incarnates in this world, it becomes a "bhuta", or "being", as the definition implies a manifestation, a state of existence that has come to be. The beginning of such manifestation can be traced at the beginning of the cycle of creation, while the existence of the atman has no beginning. This is the difference between atman and bhuta.

The expression bhuta atman connects the two meanings, resulting in "the Self of all beings"; when repeated twice, the meaning is expanded in the other direction, including the sense that the Supreme Self is the foundation for all beings. Later in Gita (7.7) we will find the same concept expressed even more clearly: "There is nothing greater than me, as everything is strung on me like pearls on a thread." Moving this wonderful metaphor on the level of ontological reality, we can see that the Self of all beings is at the same time the foundation for all states of existence - the two concepts actually expressed in the very same words. By meditating on this interesting fact, we are blessed with yet another opportunity to understand and realize the true nature of the Atman/ Brahman, and by understanding and realizing Brahman we are never affected by any material circumstance.

नैव किञ्चित्करोमीति युक्तो मन्येत तत्त्ववित् । पश्यञ्श्रुवन्स्पृशञ्जिघ्रन्नाश्नन्गच्छन्स्वपञ्श्वासन् ॥ ५-८ ॥

naiva kiñcitkaromiti yukto manyeta tattvavit | paśyañśruvanspṛśañjighrañnaśnangacchansvapañśvasan || 5-8 ||

na: not; eva: certainly; kincit: anything; karomi: I do; iti: like this; yukta: engaged; manyeta: he/ she thinks/ should think; tattva-vit: one who knows reality; paśyan: seeing; śruvan: hearing; spṛśan: touching; jighran: smelling; asnan: eating; gacchan: going; svapan: dreaming/ sleeping; vasan: breathing.

"One who is a yogi thinks/ should think, 'I am not the doer of anything'. One who knows the truth (engages in the activities of) seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, going, dreaming, breathing,

This verse and the next are usually studied together since they constitute a list of activities normally performed in ordinary life, as Krishna has already stated clearly (3.8) that everyone must work, at least to maintain one's body.

Seeing, hearing, touching or using one's hands, smelling, eating, walking or moving, dreaming and breathing are fundamental activities for everyone's bodily survival. The first 5 items on the list directly refer to the sense activities - sight, sound, touch, smell and taste. These fundamental functions of the body enable us to work to provide for our own maintenance, offer the opportunity to enjoy the pleasures of life, and enable us to engage in divine service as well. These activities are considered natural duties - nitya (regular) and naimittika (specifically required by circumstances or needed in order to achieve a particular goal) as well as kāmya (chosen according to one's personal inclination and abilities).

Even the most basic and daily activities are seriously obstructed by the lack of eyesight, but at times it is difficult to control the eyes because the sense of vision is always attracted by beautiful forms and even by terrifying forms, and the connection between the eyes and the brain is the most direct among all the senses in the body. The sense of hearing is only marginally less important than eyesight; a deaf person can manage almost all normal activities and take care about a job and a family. However, it is through sound that we are warned of dangers and other events that are happening outside our view's range, and even during sleep, when our eyes are closed. Without the sense of hearing it is extremely difficult to acquire knowledge of those things that are beyond the gross bodily level. A person with a healthy sense of hearing is naturally attracted by nice sounds - the voices of his dear loved ones, the melody of music and song, interesting stories, information on the world, and the acquisition of knowledge.

The sense of touch is not connected simply with the perception of heat and cold, softness or hardness, etc, but it is essential in order to execute any work. It is through touch that our hands manipulate matter and our feet move our body around. In the course of such work, the sense of touch procures pleasure and pain that the Yogi faces bravely without being confused by them.

The sense of smell also carries pleasures and pains on a daily basis, and it is closely connected with our mind's emotions. A bad smell causes depression and irritability, and even a tendency to ignorance and delusion, while a good smell can calm our mind, elevate our thoughts, and even drastically improve our health, as demonstrated by the studies in aromatherapy.

The sense of taste is here represented by the word asnan, "eating". In fact, this is the only good sattvic utilization of the sense of taste: to nourish the body and mind with healthy, clean and tasty foods that are a crucial factor in maintaining and improving our health and happiness of mind.

The word gacchan, "going", is listed separately from the activities of the basic senses because it can apply to methods of traveling that do not depend on our feet only. A person can and should utilize this faculty both for daily maintenance and for the performance of higher duties, such as traveling to holy places of pilgrimage, going to preach and teach where required, and acquire knowledge. The activity of sleeping and dreaming may seem less fundamental if compared to the other basic engagements of the senses of this list, but sleep is required to maintain a healthy mind balance, and even dreams are an important part of a person's life. The dreams we experience during our ordinary sleep are required to balance and cleanse our mind from the debris of the day's events - problems, emotions, interactions with other people. The dreams we experience during our waking time are also useful because they keep our mind open to new things and allow us to perceive subtle realities: it is a natural and elementary form of meditation that can and should be developed into real meditation through the knowledgeable practice of yoga.

The activity of breathing is here listed last, as a function that can be both conscious and unconscious, and greatly influences our state of mind, more than all the other sense activities. All the activities listed in these 2 verses are performed by the body, the senses and the mind, and not by the actual atman, because the atman is not concerned by such needs. Sometimes we find that our senses are automatically engaged even without our conscious choice, so we could inadvertently see, hear, touch, eat something bad that is cause of contamination, or even arrive in a bad place, have a bad dream, or suffer breathing difficulties. But as long as our consciousness remains fixed on the transcendental level or yoga, the awareness of Atman/ Brahman, such disturbances will disappear without causing too much damage. However, the body and the mind need to perform these activities in order to remain functional and facilitate our work in Self realization.

The yogi has left all identification with the body and mind, and is simply using them like a vehicle. In this verse, the definition of yogi is "one who knows Reality", or Atman/ Brahman: this is the only genuine and authoritative requirement for a person to be called a true yogi. The word manyeta includes the meaning of "thinking, considering, remembering, being aware of", and the particular grammatical form of the verb suggest that such thinking is expected or characteristic of the yogi.

प्रलपन्विसृजन्गृह्णन्निमिषन्मिषन्नपि । इन्द्रियाणीन्द्रियार्थेषु वर्तन्त इति धारयन् ॥ ५-९ ॥

pralapanvisrjangrṇannunmiṣannimiṣannapi | indriyāṇīndriyārtheṣu vartanta iti dhārayan || 5-9 ||

pralapan: talking; visrjan: leaving; grihnan: accepting/ taking; unmishan: opening; nimishan: closing (one's eyes); api: although; indriyani: the senses; indriya-arthesu: in the objects/ the purposes of the senses; vartante: let them be; iti: like this; dhārayan: meditating.

talking, leaving/ abandoning, accepting/ taking, opening and closing (one's eyes), but s/he meditates that the senses should naturally be engaged in the sense objects (and s/he does not identify with them)."

This verse continues the list of the ordinary activities of the senses that are required in order to properly maintain one's body and progress in life, materially and spiritually. Talking is a very important function, that can further our progress to the highest levels through the recitation of the scriptures and the beneficial discussions that help ourselves and others to improve the quality of our consciousness. However, the tongue is the most difficult sense to control, and sometimes we find ourselves talking more than necessary, or engaging in discussions that are not really beneficial, or having to tell off people for the purpose of correcting them. What we talk about, just like what we hear, can have an enormous influence of our consciousness, identifications, attachments, desires, and concerns. The work visrjan, "giving up", can also be translated as "evacuating", as this physiological function is also connected to our sense of attachment and possession - often people who suffer from constipation are afraid of letting go or losing something. Similarly, grihnan, "accepting", "taking", "holding", can have a variety of meanings in daily life, which includes praise and insult, gain and loss, pleasures and pains of many types. A yogi is not afflicted by false ego, therefore he can take a lot from life without being really disturbed. However, this does not mean that a yogi should accept or take anything and everything - there are limits to what one's mind, senses and body can manage, so although he remains undisturbed internally, he should still watch out, just like he remains careful about what he is watching, listening to, touching, sniffing, eating, where he is going, what fantasies he allows his mind to wander in, what he talks about and so on.

The words mishan and nimishan refer to the opening and closing of one's eyes, which is not exactly the same as svapan, sleeping or dreaming as mentioned in the previous verse, or the visrjan and grihnan, rejecting and accepting, mentioned earlier in this verse. We open and close our eyes as a choice to become directly involved in what is happening around us, in the world - injustice, ignorance, happiness and distress of others, the beauty and the horror, anger, fear, cruelty, emotions, attachments, and all the phantasmagoria of the immense theme park that is the universe in which we live. A yogi does not necessarily remove himself from the world, except for the time when he needs quiet and silence to train himself in meditation. When he has progressed to a stable level of consciousness, the yogi can maintain his meditation in more difficult circumstances, that offer the opportunity for performing a useful service to the Supreme. In this regard, the word dhārayan is particularly important. We know that dhārayan is the first step in actual meditation, a crucial part of the practice of yoga (yama, niyama, asana, pranayama, pratyahara, dhārayan, dhyana, samadhi). The dhārayan mentioned in this verse concerns the awareness of one's true identity as Atman/ Brahman, detached from the natural activities of the senses. Another important point made in this verse is that the yogi does not stop or abstain from the activities of the senses - something that would only bring suffering, as just stated in verse 6 - but he allows such functions to continue in a way that is useful and beneficial.

ब्रह्मण्याधाय कर्माणि सङ्गं त्यक्त्वा करोति यः । लिप्यते न स पापेन पद्मपत्रमिवाम्भसा ॥ ५-१० ॥

brahmaṇyādhāya karmāṇi saṅgaṁ tyaktvā karoti yaḥ | lipyate na sa pāpena padmapatramivāmbhasā || 5-10 ||

brahmani: in Brahman; adhaya: surrendering; karmāṇi: all activities/ duties; sangam: association/ affiliation/ attachment; tyaktva: abandoning; karoti: makes; yaḥ: he/ she; lipyate: becomes affected; na: not; sah: he/ she; pāpena: by forbidden actions; padma-patram: the leaf of the lotus; iva: like; ambhasa: by the water.

"Surrendering/ connecting/ dovetailing all activities to the Brahman, giving up all (identification and) association, one is never affected by the negative consequences/ sin of bad action, just like a lotus leaf is never affected by water."

Can we translate "Brahman" as "Krishna consciousness" in this verse? Of course yes, provided that "Krishna consciousness" is based on the constant awareness of one's transcendental identity as spirit soul (rather than the material body) - the very first concept that Krishna has chosen to clearly establish in his teachings in Gita. However, if we believe that "abam brahmasmi" is an "impersonalist speculation" and that "sankhya" (as taught by Krishna in the second chapter of Gita) is "opposed to bhakti", then we have a serious problem. Couldn't we just call "Brahman" as "Brahman" instead? By really studying and presenting Bhagavad gita as it is, we will be able to achieve the results Krishna is promising. As long as one believes (on which grounds and on whose authority, it is not clear) that Brahman realization (the overcoming of the false ego or identification with the material body) is opposed or detrimental to the realization and service of Bhagavan, the only result will be a foolish fanatical and superficial sentimentalism motivated by partisan and sectarian affiliation and allegiance. More trouble than benefit, according to the great bhakti authority Rupa Gosvami (Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, 1.2.101): sruti smriti puranadi pancharatra vidhim vina, aikantiki harer bhaktir utpatayaiva kalpate, "Exclusive devotion to Lord Hari (Krishna) that ignores the teachings of sruti, smriti, Puranas and other Vedic scriptures, as well as Pancharatra, is simply a fantasy and an unnecessary disturbance in society." To tell who is actually "Krishna conscious" in the proper sense (18.66), we need to see who puts the actual teachings of Krishna above the stupid and false matters of bodily identification and categorization, social position, political allegiance, and divisive sectarian speculation and advantage.

Another extremely important word in the verse is sangam ("association/ affiliation/ attachment"). Krishna clearly states that we should abandon (tyaktra) all association, attachment or affiliation, because these are limiting our identification, by turning it into a material designation. This is also the very same meaning of bhakti, according to the famous bhakti authority Narada Muni in his Narada pancharatra (the very same Pancharatra mentioned in Rupa Gosvami's verse together with sruti and smriti): sarvopadhi vinirmuktam tat paratvena nirmalam (hrishikena hrishikena sevanam) bhaktir ucyate, "Bhakti is defined as (serving the Lord of the senses through the actions of the senses) in a manner that is totally free from all designations, in the pure dedication to the Transcendence (tat)". Krishna has already warned very clearly about the danger of defining oneself and working in terms of sangam, in 3.9, "Actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage (and further) actions. Therefore, o son of Kunti, you should perform your activities for that (purpose of sacrifice), remaining free from (material) association." In the commentary to that verse we mentioned that "sanga refers to the position of one's body (anga) in relationship with other bodies/ persons, activities or environments, but even more so to being a part (anga) of something, as in 'affiliation' or 'membership' of a group, an organization or an institution, community, lineage or tradition. All such denominations (upadhi) must be 'liberated' (i.e. free from material identification, duality, or sectarianism) otherwise one must become 'liberated' from them."

Krishna repeats this extremely important instruction also in 4.23, "One who has finished with all associations/ whose association is liberated and whose consciousness is firmly established in knowledge, worships Yajna (Vishnu) in practice (through his actions/ as all his actions become devotional service)/ works in a spirit of sacrifice. The entirety of his karma (reactions to actions) is thus destroyed." Our commentary to that verse was, "The meanings of the word sanga ("association") expand to all the fields where the individual associates himself with some kind of identification. It applies to the people he keeps company with, to the organizations he becomes member of, to the institutionalized religion he belongs to, to the material lineage as in family, society etc. As we have already mentioned, one should either keep association with liberated persons, or become liberated from association and live alone." Only this freedom from sticky limiting identifications will enable our consciousness to remain always pure, just like a lotus leaf never becomes wet because water simply rolls away from its surface. It has no affinity with muddy water.

कायेन मनसा बुद्ध्या केवलैरिन्द्रियैरपि । योगिनः कर्म कुर्वन्ति सङ्गं त्यक्त्वात्मशुद्धये ॥ ५-११ ॥

kāyena manasā buddhyā kevalairindriyairapi | yogināḥ karma kurvanti saṅgaṁ tyaktvātmaśuddhaye || 5-11 ||

kāyena: with the body; manasā: with the mind; buddhyā: with the intelligence; kevalaiḥ: only; indriyaiḥ: with the sense organs; api: also; yogināḥ: the yogis; karma: duties/ activities; kurvanti: they do; sangam: association/ affiliation/ attachment; tyaktra: giving up; atmaśuddhaye: for the purification of oneself.

"The yogis perform activities with their body, mind, intelligence and senses only, and purify themselves by giving up identification/ association/ attachment."

The three factors defined by kāyena, manasā, buddhyā are all required for any activity to be successful, on the material and on the spiritual level. When things are done mechanically, with the body only, without the proper engagement of the attentive mind and the awakened intelligence, we just get the empty wrappings of whatever we want to achieve. However, this verse states that such factors are limited, by saying kevala, "only". What else is there, beyond the body, the mind and intelligence, that is not engaged in the dutiful action? The Atman, whose consciousness rises above the activities of this world.

The word sanga is also correctly translated as "attachment". But what is attachment? It is the belief that we have been the authors of the action, and therefore we are entitled to the enjoyment of its fruits - whether it comes to eating a cake we have baked, or accruing the merit of our welfare work to ourselves as individuals (thus earning social respect, gratitude from the beneficiaries, and/ or a reward in our next life) or as the collective designation we belong to (thus earning political advantages for the institution or group).

But who is really acting? Is it the atman, or it is merely the "material package" composed by body, mind, intelligence and senses? If we believe we are the author of the action, the "doer", we identify with these material elements - body, mind, intelligence and senses - that are engaged in the activities by the power and play of the gunas or modes of the material nature (sattva, rajas, tamas).

The actual Self is never acting, because all the activities and duties relate to the body and mind only. Most people remain unable to even imagine what the Self is - because once you have excluded the body, mind, senses and intelligence, they can't think of anything else. The Self as Atman is of the same nature of the Supreme Self as Brahman - a nature called sat-cid-ananda, eternity, knowledge and happiness. The Supreme Brahman does not perform any work, but channels his energies to do this work, while remaining in the blissful transcendental awareness. Similarly, the Atman engages his energies - body, mind, senses, intelligence - in the required activities in this world, and in the pure state of awareness, free from the dark cloud of ahankara and mamatva, remains in the same blissful transcendental awareness of the Brahman. This ahankara and mamatva are also called kartri-bhoktri-bhava, or the "feeling of being the doer and the enjoyer". They can be dissipated when we turn our attention to the atman/ brahman, by "looking within", beyond the intelligence, the senses, the mind and the body that constitute the external appearance.

As Krishna will clearly state at the conclusion of Gita (18.54), it is precisely at this point that we can start talking about real bhakti. Only when we have overcome the material identification and attachments, and our awareness is as transcendental as the awareness of the Supreme, we can really connect at a personal level and develop a devotional relationship. We do not need to "evolve" our soul: this evolution of the consciousness consists in dissipating the ignorance and illusion that is clouding our perception. In this way we become constantly conscious of our original and eternal nature. As Krishna explained very clearly in the second chapter of Gita (from verse 17 onwards, and especially in verses 24 and 25), the atman is impervious to any change or transformation. The atman is never touched by material contamination: it only appears covered and obscured, just like the sun in a cloudy sky. Therefore when the cloud of material identification dissipates, we become able to see the atman in its original and eternal glory of perfect knowledge and happiness. While remaining on this transcendental consciousness, the yogi simply observes the activities of the body, mind, senses and intelligence, and offers them as a sacrifice to the Supreme.

The important expression sangam tyaktva can be interpreted in two ways that are completing each other: a) being liberated from (bad) association and (material identification), and b) associating with liberated people and identifying with the (liberated) pure atman/ brahman. Both choices and practices are essential in order to achieve success.

युक्तः कर्मफलं त्यक्त्वा शान्तिमाप्नोति नैष्ठिकीम् । अयुक्तः कामकारेण फले सक्तो निबध्यते ॥ ५-१२ ॥

yuktaḥ karmaphalam tyaktvā śāntimāpnoti naiṣṭhikīm | ayuktaḥ kāmakāreṇa phale sakto nibadhyate || 5-12 ||

yuktaḥ: one who is engaged (in yogā); karma-phalam: the fruits of the activities/ duties; tyaktva: giving up; śāntim: peace; āpnoti: achieves; naiṣṭhikīm: permanent; ayuktaḥ: one who is not engaged (in yogā); kāma-kāreṇa: motivated by the desire (of pleasure); phale: in the fruits; saktaḥ: attached; nibadhyate: becomes bound.

"A yogi gives up the results of activity and (therefore) attains permanent peace. One who is not a yogi becomes tied by the results of the action that s/he desired (to obtain) through work."

We have seen that by becoming free from ahankara and mamatva, the yogi remains situated on the level of transcendental consciousness, where the activities are performed by the body, the mind, the senses and the intelligence. This detachment from the material identification of the "doer of the action" needs to be understood carefully. Krishna has already explained, and will repeat again in the course of Gita, that renouncing the fruits of one's actions does not mean that we should become sloppy, foolish and careless in our duties, or that we should become lazy and avoid performing our duties altogether. Rather, it means that we engage our body/ mind/ senses/ intelligence sincerely, to do the best job possible, because we consider it as our sacred duty. Similarly, giving up the results or the fruits of the activity does not mean that we refuse to accept money or other benefits that may derive from the performance of such duties, or that we throw them away as if they were garbage. Krishna has already explained this point very clearly, and introduced the concept of prasadam, the pleasure and nourishment that we accept as a divine blessing, a pure and sacred manifestation of the love and compassion of the Divine. So a Yogi can and should continue to perform his proper duty as per his guna and karma, and according to the circumstances, without calculating the profit that he may get or the loss that he may suffer. The word karu comes from the same root of karana, "cause", and indicates that the motivation of the action is the really important point. In a Vedic society, this selfless performance of one's duties is much easier because money does not exist like in the present industrialized system. However, people may possess valuable objects such as ornaments and various objects made with gold, silver and precious stones, and may even sell them in case of emergency to obtain food, clothing or other essential requirements. Especially kshatriyas are expected to wear such valuable items to increase their strength, health and mental power, but they are periodically required to part company with such wealth in order to celebrate sacrifices and distribute charity according to the circumstances. Vaiśya merchants and traders also use rare and valuable items (such as jewels etc) in their profession, especially when traveling over long distances in their search for goods that are not readily available in the area where they live. But in their case, too, they are expected to give up such wealth in order to acquire the commodities that people need back home. Brahmanas never accumulate gold or jewels, but utilize all the wealth they may receive to support their work for the spiritual and material development of society. A brahmana never takes a salary from anyone, and especially not from the kshatriyas, as such arrangement would put him in the position of a dog that depends on a master and has no freedom. A brahmana that depends financially from the government will be forced to compromise on dharma and calculate what to say and what not to say due to political considerations, and this will be his destruction.

Sudras do not accumulate gold or jewels either, because they tend to spend or lose whatever valuable things they acquire; they do not receive a salary from their employers, but all their needs are met adequately - food, lodging, clothing, etc - so they do not need to worry about anything. However, even in the present industrialized society we can still apply the principles taught in Bhagavad gita. Even if we receive a salary for our work, or if we need to earn some money through our professional activities in order to maintain ourselves and our families, we can still be selfless and remain in the pure and transcendental consciousness of performing our duties as a sacred offering to the Supreme.

सर्वकर्माणि मनसा संन्यस्यास्ते सुखं वशी । नवद्वारे पुरे देही नैव कुर्वन्न कारयन् ॥ ५-१३ ॥

sarvakarmāṇi manasā sanṇyasyāste sukhaṁ vaśī | navadvāre pure dehī naitva kurvanna kārayan || 5-13 ||

sarva-karmanī: all the activities/ duties; manasa: with the mind; sanṇyasya: by renouncing; aste: remains; sukham: easily/ happily; vaśī: one who controls; nava-dvare: of the nine gates; pure: in the city; dehī: one who has a body; na: not; eva: certainly; kurvan: while doing; na karayan: does not cause to be done.

"One who has consistently renounced to all the (various) actions in his/her mind remains in happiness in the city of the nine gates that is his body; s/he does not do anything nor causes anything to be done/ never becomes the direct or indirect cause of action."

The expression manasa sanṇyasya, "renouncing within the mind", is very useful for understanding the nature, quality and modality of this renunciation. External renunciation is not important and may not even be required or practical, especially in Kali yuga - the era of hypocrisy - when so many people make a big show of external renunciation precisely with the purpose of obtaining more material facilities and benefits, a higher social position and even luxury and political power without engaging in honest and useful work for the society. Real renunciation is manifested in one's consciousness, in the perception of oneself, of the world and of others - we could say, within our mind. That is because our mind is firmly fixed in the transcendental meditation on the Supreme, who is the beneficiary of all sacred actions, the owner of all planets, and the most intimate friend of all living beings (5.29). This is also called "Krishna consciousness" and has nothing to do with historical affiliations or political allegiances, sectarian dogma or religious hierarchies, endorsement by vote or institutional interests, or any other external concern that still thrives in the minds of people that are still in the bodily concept of life.

The activities that must be renounced in one's mind cover the entire range of duties - the normal duties, the special enterprises aimed at some specific goal for the benefit of society - as well as the activities chosen according to one's liking and of course the forbidden activities. Although one should continue to externally perform those duties that are intended to give a good example to the mass of the people (3.18-26), carefully avoiding all forbidden and selfish activities, Krishna says that in his mind, the yogi renounces proprietorship of all activities and duties, including the vedic rituals of the karma kanda.

This constant selfless consciousness requires a constant control, because in this world at every step we find the opportunity to fall back into the bodily consciousness of abankara and mamatva. Even the compassion and love that a true yogi feels for the poor suffering conditioned souls may slide into personal attachment and identification, as exemplified in the story of Bharata. That powerful emperor renounced his kingdom and royal family to retire into the forest and focus on Self realization, but unwittingly developed an affectionate attachment for a baby deer he happened to rescue, and subsequently had to take another birth as a deer himself because of it. Thus in this verse the word vaśī, "one who controls" can apply both to controlling one's mind activities and to controlling the gates of the body - the eyes that connect us to beautiful forms, the ears that tie us to attractive sounds, the mouth that desires good food, the nostrils that catch fascinating scents. By carefully controlling our mind and senses, we can direct them into the engagement with sattvic forms, sounds, foods and scents, connecting them to the Supreme and purifying our sense activities in this sacred act, in a spirit of renunciation and humble acceptance of God's kind gifts.

The expression na karayan, "does not cause (action) to be done", can also refer to a person that does not act personally but gives orders to others to perform a particular activity, or to the individual consciousness that observes the body, the senses, the mind and the intelligence acting on his behalf. The next verse will further elaborate on this point.

न कर्तृत्वं न कर्माणि लोकस्य सृजति प्रभुः । न कर्मफलसंयोगं स्वभावस्तु प्रवर्तते ॥ ५-१४ ॥

na kartṛtvaṁ na karmāṇi lokasya sṛjati prabhuḥ | na karmaphalasamyogam svabhāvastu pravartate || 5-14 ||

na: not; kartritvam: doership/ agentship; na: not; karmanī: activities; lokasya: of the people; sṛjati: manifests/ creates; prabhuḥ: the lord; na: not; karma-phala-samyogam: connection with the fruits of the activities; svabhāva: one's own nature; tu: but; pravartate: acts.

"The lord/ master (of the city of the nine gates, i.e. the body) does not create/ manifest the idea of being the cause of the actions performed by (other) people. Thus s/he is not engaged by the results of activities. It is only his/ her nature that acts."

In the previous verse Krishna stated that a person can continue to live in the body and yet remain untouched by the activities of the body, senses, mind and intelligence, provided his consciousness remains on the level of Transcendence - the genuine Brahman realization - renouncing the false egotism called abankara and mamatva, i.e. bodily identification and sense of possession or belonging.

Here Krishna further elaborates, saying that such renunciation enables the Atman to control the body and mind and at the same time to clearly remember that the results of the activities and the activities themselves are carried on by material nature, its laws and influences, its natural tendencies and abilities. This also applies to the activities and the results of the activities performed by other people and by the agents of nature, that bring us pleasures and sufferings of various types, gain or loss, victory or defeat, honor or infamy, and so on. The yogi clearly realizes that all these experiences only concern the body and mind and their qualities and natural activities, so he detaches himself from them, tolerating them as one tolerates the heat during the summer and the cold in winter (2.14). Still, the Self is called prabhu, "lord, master", because he needs to control his subjects - the mind, the senses, the organs of action etc. We should also understand that the word "prabhu" is normally used to address the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and it should not be taken lightly. This concept of transcendental detachment from action and its consequences is very tricky and must be understood carefully, because there are many traps on the way, that have been already indicated by Krishna. Some immature people may be glad to find a good pretext to give up their proper duties under the garb of detachment or transcendental consciousness, abandoning their responsibilities and thus causing great damage to society, family and to themselves. We must always remember that the entire Gita was explained by Krishna to Arjuna with the precise purpose of convincing him to engage in the great battle of Kurukshetra, and to oppose his desire to give up the fight and retire from the kingdom's responsibility to choose an ascetic life in the forest.

Some historians claim that India was invaded and conquered by alien forces - the Islamists and the British colonialist, as well as the Portuguese and the French albeit in smaller measure - because the teachings of Krishna in Gita and later the teachings of Adi Shankara and the great bhakti acharyas (including Chaitanya) had lured many men of great valor into giving up the active responsibilities in society and especially the protection of the kingdoms, to choose a meditative and renounced lifestyle focused on transcendence. Such an idea is incorrect. Of course there might have been many foolish and irresponsible people who consciously or unconsciously distorted the teachings of Krishna and Chaitanya (and others) and took the formal order of sannyasa or the babaji vesha to escape their responsibilities, pretending they had become "transcendental". But these have been aberrations due precisely to ignorance and gross misunderstanding of the actual path of Transcendence. Only by sincerely studying the Bhagavad gita we will be able to clarify such misconceptions.

नादत्ते कस्यचित्पापं न चैव सुकृतं विभुः । अज्ञानेनावृतं ज्ञानं तेन मुह्यन्ति जन्तवः ॥ ५-१५ ॥

nādatte kasyacitpāpam na caiva sukrataṁ vibhuḥ | ajñānēnāvṛtaṁ jñānam tena muhyanti jantavaḥ || 5-15 ||

na: not; adatte: accepts; kasyacit: anyone's; papam: demerits/ sins/ guilt; na: not; ca: and; eva: certainly; sukratam: merits/ virtues/ credits; vibhuḥ: the powerful (Lord); ajnanena: by ignorance; avritam: covered; jnanam: knowledge; tena: by that; muhyanti: they become confused; jantavaḥ: the people.

"The (all) powerful (Lord) does not accept/ consider the merits or demerits of anyone. It (the problem) is (only due to) the living entities, that are confused because their knowledge is covered by ignorance."

Na adatte means that God is not interested in punishing the sins, mistakes or imperfections of anyone, or in rewarding those who try to please him by virtuous actions. Karma is not a punishment or reward by God. It is simply a natural physical law of the universe, like gravity etc. God does not have a "chosen people" and certainly does not order the annihilation or persecution or punishment of those who worship him in "wrong" ways or do not worship him at all. All the mess in human history that is ascribed to "religious differences" is actually created merely by confused and ignorant human beings - as confirmed by the word muhyanti, derived from moha, "confusion", "illusion". Such confusion can be cleared not by engaging in "religious wars" but simply by making sufficient knowledge (jnana) available to the people in general. So whenever you find someone who wants to "eliminate" the "wrong spiritual or ideological conclusions" by taking physical action against persons or books etc, you know that they are certainly not following Krishna's instructions. Physical action is only justified against a physical attack by aggressors - and not for any other reason.

All human beings have the same tendencies, and in different traditions we can find different levels of personal inner growth and development. The lowest level of understanding of religion - the "connection with the Divine" - is shaped around the ordinary relationships of this world, and God is seen as a bigger and more powerful person not unlike the big and powerful persons we may meet in our daily life. This understanding of God is nothing but the projection of a gigantic version of a regular conditioned soul with a material form, material qualities, and a dualistic approach in relationships. Simple-minded people usually go to worship in their designated cult place, pray and present their offerings and follow the religious rules, because they hope for a reward and fear a punishment. For such people, worship of the image of the Deity is very important because it helps the mind to gradually overcome such limitations.

Public functions and festivals, ritual and ceremonies, pilgrimages etc are also very beneficial, because they help the mind of unevolved people to focus on the concept of Transcendence and religion in a positive way. Whenever such visible engagements are reduced or removed, out of an ill-advised attempt to "purify the faith", people lose the understanding of the Transcendence and slide into moralism, taboos, or gross materialism, that are much worse than the sticky sentimentalism of the simpletons. Some "Vedic" religious organizations condemn and oppose the worship of the Deities in the temples, using the very same offensive vocabulary ("idols") introduced by abrahamics. In this way they are deluding themselves into thinking that they are "purifying" and "reforming" Hinduism, but they are simply alienating and dividing people, and confusing the minds of the public.

No wonder they also offensively reject Bhagavad gita, together with the Puranas and Itihasas and even the Upanishads, claiming to follow "only the original four Vedas", of which they obviously do not understand anything. The results of this irresponsible and foolish preaching can be seen in the present conditions of Hindu society. This approach might have been useful to please the abrahamic invaders that dominated India at the times when such organizations were founded, but today they are the ones who need to be reformed and purified from their colonial servilism.

Krishna instructs us in Gita (3.26) not to confuse the minds of the unevolved people by trying to artificially push them to a "higher level" by "forbidding a lower level", otherwise these kanistha adhikaris could be overwhelmed by destructive doubts: "If God is not interested in the sins and virtues of people, why should one abstain from performing bad actions and make efforts to perform good actions? What is the purpose of worship, sacrifice, pilgrimage to the holy places, prayer, and making efforts to improve oneself? What is the idea of devotional service?"

Higher than this level of kanistha adhikari, or "neophyte worshiper", we find the madhyama adhikari, the "intermediate worshiper", that is able to understand the omnipresence of God, in the heart of all living beings and everywhere in the universe and in all circumstances - as expressed in this verse by the definition vibhu, "powerful", also translated as "omnipresent". The intermediate student of Transcendence has understood the scriptures and the teachings of the genuine acharyas and is making an effort to serve the mission of the Divine simply because it is the right thing to do, and not because he aspires to a reward or is afraid of a punishment. He has a clear perception of the difference between the sadhu karma ("good actions") and the asadhu karma ("bad actions"), he knows that each action he chooses can elevate or degrade him in his journey, and tries his best to purify his consciousness and to progress in his evolution through experience. He understands that the Param Atman, the Divine that resides in the heart of each living entity, is helping everyone to achieve what they need or want, but that the ultimate purpose of all the experiences of life is to attain the realization of the Self.

Someone might also wonder why God is not interested in the merits and demerits of the individual human beings. Is that because he does not care? Quite the opposite. God loves each and every living entity (subridam sarva bhutanam, 5.29) and is the father of them all (aham bija pradah pitah, 14.4). A good father loves all his children, no matter how qualified or unqualified they may be. As we can see with several verses of Gita, this particular verse finds a very similar version in Bhagavata Purana (6.16.11)

ज्ञानेन तु तदज्ञानं येषां नाशितमात्मनः । तेषामादित्यवज्ज्ञानं प्रकाशयति तत्परम् ॥ ५-१६ ॥

jñānena tu tadajñānam yeṣāṃ nāśitamātmanah । teṣāmādityavajjñānam prakāśayati tatparam ॥ 5-16 ॥

jñanena: by knowledge; tu: but; tat: that; ajnanam: lack of knowledge; yesam: of those (people); nasitam: is destroyed; atmanah: of the atman; tesham: of them; aditya-vat: like the Sun; jnanam: the knowledge; prakasayati: manifests/ shows directly; tat: That; param: Supreme.

"For those in whom ajnana (ignorance) is destroyed in the (perception of the) self by jnana (knowledge), that Knowledge, similar to the (radiant) Sun, reveals that highest (consciousness/ identity/ reality)."

This verse repeats yet again the importance of transcendental Knowledge, the theoretical and practical realization of the Atman that destroys the ignorance of material identification. The two terms of comparison in the verse are tat ajnanam, "that ignorance", and tat param (jnanam), "that Supreme (knowledge)". Jnana or knowledge is the opposite of ajnana or ignorance, but this is not a duality proper. Ajnana literally means "lack of knowledge", which is the precise definition of "ignorance". Ignorance itself has no real separate existence: it is nothing but the absence of knowledge, just like darkness has no existence of its own but is simply the absence of light, and evil has no existence of its own but is simply the absence of good. This is the correct perspective from which we become able to understand that this apparent duality is not duality at all. There is no "bad God" (i.e. Satan) opposed to a "good God": this is a divisive dualistic idea that has created a lot of unnecessary problems in human society, especially creating the concept of "otherness" that is necessarily evil and condemned simply because it is "different" (irrespective of the actual ideologies and behaviors of the two concerned parties). Already the conditioned mind is affected by the delusion of duality, but a path that consecrates duality as the only possible truth is seriously dangerous for the proper progress and evolution of the individual and society. The proper solution is to make a positive and proactive effort towards dharma ("ethical values"), vidya ("knowledge"), sat ("good").

There is no point trying to fight evil with equally evil policies, or to fight ignorance by banning knowledge, just like it is not possible to bring more sunlight in our world by building walls that block our vision of the sun rays. The knowledge of the Atman is compared here to the light of the Sun that automatically reveals everything: the Sun itself, the world, and even those who are observing. Only when one has realized the true transcendental nature of the Self or Atman, s/he will be able to realize the Supreme Self or Param Atman. Some people are afraid that the Brahman and Paramatma realization will somehow "distract" the mind of the devotee from "devotional service", fueling instead the conceited arrogance that makes one think he has become God himself. This is a foolish fear, created by ignorance and immaturity. Actually, the genuine knowledge and realization of Brahman and Paramatma is the only protection we have against the temptations of megalomania, because it naturally and directly dissipates the darkness of ignorance and illusion that consists in material identification or false ego.

There is a distinction between jivatma and paramatma, between prabhu and vibhu, but it is definitely not a difference in nature. Both the Self and the Supreme Self are sat-cit-ananda, inconceivable through material parameters, and not subject to any material limitation. One who has a material concept of the Self will never be able to understand the Supreme.

तद्बुद्धयस्तदात्मानस्तन्निष्ठास्तत्परायणाः ।

गच्छन्त्यपुनरावृत्तिं ज्ञाननिर्धूतकल्मषाः ॥ ५-१७ ॥

tadbuddhayastadātmānastanniṣṭhāstapārāyaṇāḥ | gacchantyapunarāvṛttim jñānanirdhūtakalmaṣāḥ || 5-17 ||

tat: That (Atman/ Brahman); buddhayah: those who have such intelligence; tat-atmanah: those who identify with 'That'; tat-nishthah: those who have faith in That; tat-parayanah: those who are dedicated/ devoted to That; gacchanti: they go; apunah-avrittim: they do not fall back; jñana: by knowledge; nirdhuta: destroyed/ removed; kalmashah: impurities/ contamination.

"Those who understand/ realize That (Transcendence), identify with That, remain faithful to That, and fully dedicate themselves to That, attain that liberation from which one never falls back, because their impurities have been cleansed by Knowledge."

The word tat, "That", is one of the most recurrent definitions for Transcendence, especially in expressions such as tat tvam asi, "you are That" and om tat sat, "That Transcendence is eternal". It refers both to Tattva and Para Tattva, i.e. to Atman and Brahman. Gita also uses this definition of Transcendence in many important verses such as 2.17 (tat viddhi), 3.19 (tat artham), 4.39 (tat parah), 5.5 (tat yogaih gamyate), 5.16 (tat param), 7.1 (tat srinu), 8.21 (tat dhama paramam), 10.39 (tat abam), 11.37 (tat param), 13.13 (tat pravakshyami), 13.14 (tat sarvatah), 13.16 (tat avijneyam), 13.17 (tat jneyam), 13.18 (tat jyotih), 15.4 (tat parimargitavyam), 15.5 (tat padam avayam), 15.6 (tat dhama paramam), 15.12 (tat tejah), 17.23 (om tat sat), 17.27 (tat arthiyam), 18.5 (tat yajnam danam tapah), 18.20 (tat jnanam), 18.55 (tat anantaram), 18.62 (tat prasadat), 18.77 (tat samsmṛitya).

Tat is the root for the word Tattva, or Reality. The concept of Transcendence, Tat or Tattva, is described as Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan: vadanti tat tattva vīdas tattvam yaj jñanam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti bhagavan iti saḍyate, "Those who know Reality say that Transcendence is Reality, the non-dualistic Knowledge that is called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan" (Bhagavata purana, 1.2.11). The supreme importance of this knowledge, the realization of Transcendence, is stressed again in this verse as the most important factor in the purification of the consciousness and the attainment of the perfection of life.

The expression apunah avrittim is very important, as it gives assurance about the permanent nature of the purification and liberation promised as a result of the attainment of Transcendental realization. There are two types of liberation: one is temporary, and the other is permanent. Temporary liberation is obtained at the end of a cycle - the duration of one's body or the duration of Brahma's body, that consists in the entire universe. When the material body ceases to exist because its allotted time has expired, we become free from its limitations and sufferings, and we experience a state of existence that is very difficult to understand for those who are still identified with their gross bodies. However, the conditioned soul still remains with the subtle body that is composed of ego, mind and intelligence, and contains the seeds of material incarnation in the form of material desires and identifications - the karana body - that are described in this verse as kalmashah - impurities. During the time of the maintenance of the universe, this karana body becomes attracted to the particular circumstances where it can manifest its qualities and tendencies (guna and karma), and there it starts to develop another gross body. The interval between the death of the previous body and the birth of the new body may vary according to several factors, but it is usually short.

When the entire universe dies at the end of Brahma's life, the karana bodies of the conditioned souls do not have the opportunity to express their guna and karma in a new material vehicle, so all the subtle bodies of the living entities are absorbed into the Karana Ocean, into the Karanodakasayi Vishnu or Narayana, where they remain in the blissful state of passive brahmananda ("spiritual happiness") until the next cycle of manifestation of the universe. Such brahmananda is however temporary, because the conditioned souls still have some impurities that need to be removed through the process of Self realization.

विद्याविनयसम्पन्ने ब्राह्मणे गवि हस्तिनि ।

शुनि चैव श्वपाके च पण्डिताः समदर्शिनः ॥ ५-१८ ॥

vidyāvīnayasampanne brāhmaṇe gavi hastini | śuni caiva śvapāke ca paṇḍitāḥ samadarsīṇaḥ || 5-18 ||

vidya: with divine knowledge; vinaya: and with gentleness/ humility/ lack of arrogance; sampanne: endowed; brahmaṇe: in the brahmana; gavi: in the cow; hastini: in the elephant; śuni: in the dog; ca: and; eva: certainly; śva-pake: in the dog-eater; ca: and; paṇḍitah: learned persons; sama-darsinah: see equally.

"The pandits (wise learned persons) look with equal (friendliness) to the brahmana who is learned and gentle, to the cow and the elephant, as well as to the dog and to the (uncivilized) dog eater."

The expression sama darsinah is the key to this verse, and contains several layers of meanings, making this verse one of the most important ones in Bhagavad gita. The first and foremost meaning, that naturally appears from the context of the discussion in the previous verses, applies to the nature of Atman/ Brahman, that is exactly the same in all living entities, no matter what their body and even what their behavior is. A true pandita or panda perceives himself and others as Atman/ Brahman, therefore he does not disrespect anyone and he does not mistreat anyone. When he offers respect and friendship to other living entities, it is because he sees the many cells of God's bodily limbs in the various components of the universal society, and at the same time s/he sees the Atman as the pure Self on an educational journey of incarnations, and the Paramatman within every single body as the most intimate and dearest friend of all living beings (5.29).

The "equal vision" of the true pandita is free from prejudice as well as from separatism, because it is not based on bodily identifications and evaluations - it is based on the same perspective and consciousness that the Supreme Personality of Godhead has. A true pandita is only contemplating the question of how s/he can work for the benefit of everyone, because s/he sees every living entity as a cell in the Body of God. Each single cell has a different function in the body, but all cells need to be treasured, protected and nurtured according to their specific needs. This practical consideration of different engagements and requirements, however, is not based on prejudice, but on actual observation of the true potential of each individual.

There are great differences between a human being, a cow, an elephant and a dog, as these bodies really belong to different genetic programs. For example, a cow has four stomachs, an elephant can crush down a big tree just by pushing it, a dog sweats through its tongue only, and a human being is capable of complex and articulated speech. Their actual abilities really set them apart, therefore the pandita will not try to milk the brahmana or ask philosophical questions from a dog, and will not expect the elephant to be content with the amount of food a human being requires.

However, this verse distinguishes the two examples of human beings - the qualified brahmana and the uncivilized person - not on the basis of birth, but on the basis of actual behavior. Recognizing a cow from an elephant or from a dog is not difficult, but all human beings have the same genetic potential; there are some minor differences due to the various races but such ethnic genetic differences have no relevance in regard to the behavior of the individuals. Just like a dog is always a dog - no matter what breed or color he is, he will always go after a dog treat and lick his own butt - all human beings have the natural capacity to overcome the material identification and attain Transcendence. Krishna will clearly confirm this later (9.32), saying that not only brahmanas and saintly kings have the potential to attain the highest perfection in Transcendental realization (param gatim), but also women, vaisyas, sudras, as well as all those who were born in sinful or uncivilized circumstances or degraded families (papa yonayah, and even sva pakab). This effectively covers all types and levels of human beings, none excluded. However, the inherent potential of the human form of life must be put to good use. It is not sufficient to be able to do something in order to get the credit for having done it: we must actually perform the action. Therefore this verse clarifies a definite functional difference between the learned and gentle brahmana on one side and the dog-eater (literally, "one who cooks dogs") on the other side, almost as if they belonged to different species of life, because they have very different behaviors. On the other hand, a so-called brahmana that is not learned and humble is actually an uncivilized person, especially if his food habits are not regulated by the dharmic considerations of compassion and cleanliness - or in other words, if he is not a vegetarian. The criteria to classify human beings into functional categories are here stated as: 1) knowledge, 2) kindness/ freedom from arrogance, 3) food habits. In fact, these are the three major factors intelligent people consider when evaluating the possible engagement of an individual.

The pandita is well aware of the practical qualities and activities (guna and karma) of each individual being, and is capable of engaging each and every individual being in the service of the Supreme in the best possible way. But because these different circumstances are not evaluated in terms of the personal benefit that the pandita could get from the various individuals, he sees no real fundamental difference between them.

इहैव तैर्जितः सर्गो येषां साम्ये स्थितं मनः । निर्दोषं हि समं ब्रह्म तस्माद् ब्रह्मणि ते स्थिताः ॥ ५-१९ ॥

ihaiva tairjitaḥ sargo yeṣāṁ sām्यe sthitaṁ manaḥ । nirdoṣaṁ hi samaṁ brahma tasmād brahmaṇi te sthitaḥ ॥ 5-19 ॥

iha: here; eva: certainly; tair: by them; jitaḥ: conquered; sargat: rebirth; yeṣām: of them; sām्यe: in equanimity; sthitaḥ: established; manaḥ: the mind; nirdoṣaṁ: without defect; hi: certainly; samaṁ: equanimity; brahma: Brahman; tasmād: therefore; brahmaṇi: in the Brahman; te: them; sthitaḥ: established.

"Those who, in this very life/ body, have vanquished rebirth, have a mind that is established in equanimity. This equal vision is certainly pure/ free from all defects, because the same (pure) Brahman is (in all that exists). Thus they are (firmly) established in Brahman."

The word iha means "here", and can be applied to the particular body where one is residing, as well as this world where we live. A derivative meaning is "in this lifetime", and indicates that one does not need to take another and more qualified birth in order to attain the perfection of Brahman realization. Sometimes we hear Indian materialists stating that one needs to be born in a so-called high caste, or in a male body, in order to become able or qualified to engage in the pursuit of Transcendental realization. This is really a stupid idea, and finds no confirmation in any shastra or by any genuine acharya. All human beings are equally entitled to directly pursue this crucial purpose of life, as Krishna clearly states in Gita (9.32).

The word sargat means rebirth as well as creation or manifestation; it comes from the same family of the word srijami, "I manifest myself" (4.7). A new body where we take birth is the manifestation or creation of the subtle desires and material identification that we carry in our karana body. As the previous verses explain, when such subtle body has been purified from all contamination, there is no need to take another material body - and therefore we can say we have conquered rebirth. A person that has attained this level of pure transcendental consciousness can be equally benevolent towards all living entities, because s/he does not evaluate them in terms of the personal attraction or repulsion (pleasure or displeasure) s/he can get from their bodies, but s/he sees the Supreme Soul in every heart, and each Atman as an equally powerful and glorious spark of Brahman.

This verse refers to a yogi that has already attained the Transcendental realization and has therefore gone beyond the early need to isolate himself from the world in order to train his mind in steady meditation. The intermediate and advanced stages of yoga shift from the passive meditation called dharana to the active meditation called dhyana, and the best way to carry on this dhyana sadhana consists in going among innocent and sincere people and engaging them in discussions about Transcendental knowledge and realization, and in loving service of Transcendence. In the course of this transcendental and sacred activity, the yogi has the opportunity to manifest his equanimity towards all the living entities he meets.

न प्रहृष्येत्प्रियं प्राप्य नोद्विजेत्प्राप्य चाप्रियम् । स्थिरबुद्धिरसम्मूढो ब्रह्मविद् ब्रह्मणि स्थितः ॥ ५-२० ॥

na prahr̥ṣyetpriyam prāpya nodvijetprāpya cāpriyam | sthīrabuddhirasammūḍho brahmavid brahmaṇi sthitaḥ || 5-20 ||

na: not; prahr̥ṣyet: rejoices; priyam: what he likes; prāpya: by obtaining; na: not; udvijet: becomes disturbed; prāpya: by obtaining; ca: and; apriyam: what he does not like; sthīra-buddhiḥ: steady intelligence; asammudhabḥ: free from confusion; brahma-vit: one who knows Brahman; brahmaṇi: in Brahman; sthitaḥ: situated.

"A brahma-vit (one who knows the Brahman) does not become elated in obtaining what is pleasing/ desirable and does not become agitated in obtaining what is unpleasant/ undesirable. S/he has a steady intelligence and is free from illusion, because s/he is firmly situated in Brahman."

It is normal and legitimate that the body and mind will feel joy or sorrow because of the circumstances they face, because this is a natural consequence of the contact between the senses and the objects of the senses. Krishna has clearly said (2.14) that we should simply tolerate them. He does not say we should stop feeling them, or suppress our emotions and fall into denial of our problems. He does not say that one who feels joys and sorrows is a fallen materialist. Rather, he says that we should not be confused by these joys and sorrows to the point that we lose consciousness of our real nature.

The word prahr̥ṣyet indicates elation, a feeling of overwhelming joy that leaves our mind confused and unable to see things clearly. On the opposite end of the emotional range, the word udvijet indicates a disturbed state of mind that is too busy trying to cope with suffering, and therefore creates confusion and a feeling of illusion. In this case, too, our excessive emotions constitute an obstacle to the proper function of our mind. It is perfectly possible to control one's emotions and thought processes by channeling them in the proper useful direction and letting them flow away without remaining attached to them or even cultivating them. The important thing is to learn how to observe such emotions in a detached and objective way, without becoming identified in them: this happens normally when we are firmly situated in the transcendental consciousness, but it is also possible simply with some steady intelligence. After all, joys and sorrows are temporary feelings, and can disappear very quickly. Pleasant and unpleasant are extremely relative concepts, because what is priyam or "dear" to someone may not be "dear" to someone else, or to the same person in different circumstances. Cold water, for example, can be very pleasing to drink when the weather is very hot, and very unpleasant if thrown at us in the middle of winter. This concept will be repeated again in later verses.

बाह्यस्पर्शेष्वसक्तात्मा विन्दत्यात्मनि यत्सुखम् । स ब्रह्मयोगयुक्तात्मा सुखमक्षयमश्नुते ॥ ५-२१ ॥

bāhyasparśeṣvasaktātmā vindatyātmani yatsukham | sa brahmayogayuktātmā sukhamakṣayamaśnute || 5-21 ||

bāhya-sparśeṣu: in external contacts; asakta-atma: one who is not attached; vindati: finds pleasure; ātmani: in the atman; yat: that; sukham: happiness; sah: s/he; brahma-yoga: by the Brahma Yoga; yukta-atma: connected himself; sukham: happiness; akṣayam: permanent/ inexhaustible; asnute: experiences.

"Unattached to the contact with the external (things), s/he finds happiness in the pleasure of the Self. Such a person is engaged in Brahma yoga, and enjoys inexhaustible happiness."

What is Brahma Yoga? It is simply the "engagement in Brahman consciousness". Everyone wants to be happy: it is a natural and legitimate aspiration, as well as the actual true nature of the Self. However, in order to find happiness, we need to know where to seek it. Materialists, or people who are conditioned by external circumstances, try to find happiness in the contact of the senses with the objects of the senses, because they identify with the senses and with the body. Unfortunately, such pleasure or happiness is illusory because it quickly turns into suffering. We can make the example of a very thirsty man that comes to the ocean and, seeing all that water, drinks his fill. The effect will be exactly the opposite of what he was trying to obtain, and his thirst will increase because of the salt contained in the water. No matter how much sea water he will drink, he will remain thirsty. The salt in sea water could be compared to the material identification and attachment that confuses the mind and leads one to believe that it is possible to find real happiness in material sense gratification.

On the other hand, the inner happiness we find in the Atman is like fresh and pure water that comes from an inexhaustible source, and can give us the healthy satisfaction we long for. Once our deep thirst for happiness is quenched with the pure and holy water that springs from the feet of the Supreme Brahman, our intelligence becomes clear and our consciousness steady, and we become able to experience the contact with the external things in a more balanced and sober manner. A good vegetable soup can be described as "salted water", but it can be beneficial when taken in the small amount necessary for the proper maintenance of our body and mind; in the same way we can utilize sense gratification prepared in the proper way and purified from harmful components, and consume it in the required amounts only. As we have already explained earlier in the text, Gita does not condemn healthy sense experiences or pleasures, because as long as we have a material body we will also have senses (and a mind, that is sometimes called the sixth sense) and we will need to take care of them. The important thing is to remember that such sensory experiences will be temporary and strictly functional to facilitate and support our work in this body, and that they do not constitute the real source of our happiness.

We can make another example: many people dream about getting a car, but their purpose is not to acquire a useful vehicle that enables them to get from home to their workplace in a reasonable time and without unnecessary complications and efforts. Rather, they dream that the possession of such status symbol will reinforce their identification as successful individuals, and will make them truly happy. So they get the best automobile they can afford according to their financial condition. After the initial enthusiasm, they realize that they are not really happy, and instead of understanding that happiness cannot be found in material objects themselves, they conclude that they got the wrong type of car: what they need to become really happy is a particular type of automobile - a red Ferrari, or some latest model luxury car. So they beg, borrow or steal, and in the end they get the car of their dreams. Again, the pleasure lasts for a brief time, then sooner or later they feel dissatisfied. Even if they do not try to acquire a new and even more expensive vehicle, some day their car will start giving mechanical problems or will be stolen, or crashed, or lost in some other way, and then they will be devastated because they invested too many expectations of happiness in the wrong place - a temporary material object.

The same thing applies to those who seek happiness in intimate relationships with others, in the good health and good looks of their own bodies, or in some other temporary material situation. Sooner or later the fun will be spoiled by the inevitable decay or loss, and the suffering will begin. The correct approach is to utilize whatever comes to us, but remaining detached from the sense of identification and possession that could derive from such things - either gross objects or subtle objects. As the French saying of popular wisdom goes: tout passe, tout lasse, tout casse, tout se remplace... "everything ends, everything becomes boring, everything breaks, and everything can be replaced". The only inexhaustible thing, the only unlimited source of happiness is the Atman/Brahman, that is eternal and unchangeable. Therefore by practicing Brahma Yoga, the active meditation on Transcendence, we can become really happy in all conditions of life.

ये हि संस्पर्शजा भोगा दुःखयोनय एव ते । आद्यन्तवन्तः कौन्तेय न तेषु रमते बुधः ॥ ५-२२ ॥

ye hi saṁsparśajā bhogā duḥkha-yonaya eva te | ādyantavantaḥ kaunteya na teṣu ramate budhaḥ || 5-22 ||

ye: those; hi: certainly; saṁsparśa-jā: born from the contact (of the senses with the sense objects); bhogā: pleasures; duḥkha-yonaya: the matrix of suffering; eva: certainly; te: them; ādi-antavantaḥ: having a beginning and an end; kaunteya: o Kaunteya (son of Kuntī); na: not; teṣu: in them; ramate: rejoices; budhaḥ: one who is intelligent.

"Those pleasures that derive from contact with (the sense objects) are the cause for future sorrow because they have a beginning and an end. Therefore, o son of Kuntī, an intelligent person does not seek happiness in them."

In this verse the concept of contact between the senses and the sense object is repeated, to distinguish material pleasure from transcendental pleasure. The happiness of Brahman is natural and spontaneous and does not require a physical contact, because Brahman is everywhere. On the other hand, material pleasure requires sensory contact (and we should remember that the mind is included in the senses). This important point had already been presented by Krishna in the very beginning of his instructions (2.14). The expression duḥkha yonaya, "the origin of sufferings", can be interpreted at many levels. The word yonī, or "matrix", suggests that in order to enjoy the pleasures procured by the contact of bodily senses with a gross object, one needs to take birth in a gross material body, with all its limitations and conditionings and problems. This, in itself, is the root cause of all material suffering. Another meaning is related to the science of the gūṇas explained in Gīta. Desire for sense gratification is born from passion, rajo gūṇa, and it is a scientific fact that suffering is the inevitable result of all endeavors based on rajas as a value in itself. Later (Gīta 14.16) Krishna will clearly say that rajas fructifies in sufferings (rajasas tu phalam duḥkham). Such is the nature of this world that only detached and dutiful action performed in the proper enlightened and attentive consciousness (satva) can actually bring happiness. Another meaning of this verse is that the sexual pleasure that drives the natural instincts of all living entities is actually a flimsy delusional surrogate to the actual pleasure and contentment that derives from the union between the two components of our own individual being - puruṣa and prakṛiti - the male and female energies, or the two hemispheres of our brain. The internal union between the two halves of our Self does not require any sparsa ("touching"), but its counterpart on the gross physical level does, and that is where suffering is created.

In any case, the main point of the verse is that material pleasure cannot be trusted because it is temporary and illusory. Trying to build our happiness over it would be like trying to build a permanent house on temporary foundations - a very foolish attempt that is naturally destined to failure, sooner or later. On temporary foundations we can only build a temporary shelter that is solely aimed at a temporary functional purpose - and from which we can detach ourselves easily and without pain or sense of loss when the purpose has been served and the temporary construction is not necessary any more because we are moving on.

The word ramate, "rejoices", indicates the feeling of delight that one seeks to fulfill one's own desires and aspirations. The best place to seek for such happiness is the transcendental nature of the Atman (ātma rama) and the transcendental relationship with the transcendental Supreme Brahman (Rama), that is the actual source of all happiness for everyone.

शक्नोतीहैव यः सोढुं प्राक्शरीरविमोक्षणात् । कामक्रोधोद्भवं वेगं स युक्तः स सुखी नरः ॥ ५-२३ ॥

śaknotīhaiva yaḥ soḍhuṁ prākśarīravimokṣaṇāt | kāmakrodhodbhavaṁ vegaṁ sa yuktaḥ sa sukṣī naraḥ || 5-23 ||

śaknotī: is capable; īha eva: even here; yaḥ: he; soḍhuṁ: to tolerate/ to withstand; prāk: before; śarīra-vimokṣaṇāt: being liberated from the body; kāma-krodha: of lust and anger; udbhavaṁ: generated by; vegaṁ: the impulse; sab: he; yuktaḥ: a yogi; sukṣī: happy; naraḥ: human being.

"One who here (in this life/ body), before becoming liberated from the body, is capable of withstanding the onslaughts of lust and anger, is a yogi and a happy human being."

The key expression in this verse is īha eva: already in this lifetime, in this body. The characteristics of kāma and krodha have already been described in detail in 3.37: "This (power that pushes a man to perform sinful/negative actions) is (constituted by) desire and anger, and it is born from the quality of passion. Know that it is all-devouring, the cause of great sins, and the (greatest) enemy in this world."

The impulse of kama in the body is observed as enthusiasm, attraction, a strong emotion that can make one's hair stand, or cause tears, blushing, widening of the eyes and/or the smile, a slight dropping of the jaw, shivering of the limbs, a feeling of weakness similar to fainting, temporary speech impairment, confusion of the mind, an outburst of shouting or exclamation, and modification of the breathing pattern. The impulse of krোধ in the body can have similar symptoms, especially the modification of the breath pattern, temporary speech impairment, confusion of the mind, an outburst of shouting or exclamation, and even tears, but also perspiration, change of color of the face due to modification in blood circulation (not only blushing, but becoming pale as well), reddening of the eyes, and trembling of the limbs. Already in 2.62 Krishna had shown the connection between sense perception and the emotions of lust and anger: "By thinking about the objects of the senses, a person associates with them, by association desire develops, and from (unfulfilled) desire anger arises."

In the previous verses we have seen that the material joys and sorrows created by the contact between the senses and the sense objects are characteristic of the material body, and that the dissolution that the body gives a temporary relief from such problems, while the overcoming of the material identification - the root cause of the creation of the material body - takes one to the permanent liberation and pure undisturbed transcendental happiness. This verse further explains that anyone who has a material body will inevitably experience these sense activities, and the natural consequences of such pleasant and unpleasant contacts between senses and sense objects will create the impulses of desire and anger. The difference between a yogi and a non-yogi is that a yogi remains detached (i.e. non-identified) from these natural functions of the body and mind, and thus develops a higher level of sense control and tolerance towards the sensory experiences. Such detachment created by the power of transcendental consciousness is wholesome and substantial, and does not depend on external circumstances or supplies, unlike the artificial and temporary detachment achieved by consuming intoxicating substances, drugs or medication.

Someone could think that since the cessation of the allotted period in a particular body offers a respite in the form of a temporary liberation, it is better to commit suicide and thus shorten the "jail term" that one has to spend in the prison of an ailing material body, tormented by desires and anger. Unfortunately, this is not a good solution. Every particular lifetime constitutes a "course" in life's school, where we are supposed to learn some lessons and repay some debts. If we try to escape before completing the scheduled program, leaving unfinished jobs behind, it is very likely we will remain trapped in an intermediate dimension that is variously perceived and interpreted by different cultures. Some call it a "limbo", some call it the "ghost dimension" or pretaloka, some call it Bardo, but everyone agrees it is not a pleasant experience because the subtle body still identifies with the previous material body - position, relationships, possessions - and still feels desires, lust, thirst, hunger, anger etc, but is unable to act them out or relieve them without a gross body. This verse also warns that it is not wise to wait until the time of death to start thinking about spiritual realization. Liberation from conditionings must be attained before the time of death, otherwise it won't be attained at all.

योऽन्तःसुखोऽन्तरारामस्तथान्तर्ज्योतिरेव यः । स योगी ब्रह्मनिर्वाणं ब्रह्मभूतोऽधिगच्छति ॥ ५-२४ ॥

yo'ntahsukho'ntararamastathantarijyotireva yah | sa yogi brahmanirvanam brahmabhuto'adhigacchati || 5-24 ||

yah: he; antah-sukhah: happy inside; antah aramah: finding pleasure inside; tatha: as well as; antah-jyotih: whose light is inside; eva: certainly; yah: he; sah: s/he; yogi: a yogi; brahma-nirvanam: the peacefulness of Transcendence; brahma-bhuta: the position of Brahman; adhigacchati: attains.

"One who is happy within (the self), who finds pleasure within (the self), who finds enlightenment/ the light within (the self) is a yogi who attains the Brahma Nirvana and the existence/ realization of Brahman."

Brahma nirvana and brahma bhuta are two interesting expressions. Sometimes uninformed people believe that nirvana (the cessation of material agitation) is a characteristic Buddhist concept, or an "impersonalistic" idea that needs to be opposed, but we find that Krishna speaks of nirvana as genuine spiritual realization (5.24, 25, 26, 6.5) and the very purpose of yoga. So if we claim to recognize the authority of Krishna and Gita, we should respect his teachings and accept the validity of the definitions he presents.

The word nirvana literally means "without wind" and defines the state of consciousness that is firmly radiant and undisturbed like a flame sheltered from the wind. A synonym for nirvana is nirvikalpa samadhi. Of course this nirvana is not a void, an absence of all activities and thoughts. The state of quiescence it refers to applies to the constant and unnecessary chattering of the mind, that prevents us from actually concentrating on what is important. A flame without the wind does not cease to exist, or to burn, or to radiate light - on the contrary, it burns better, with a brighter light, and is much more useful. Similarly, brahma bhuta, or the "existence/ being of Brahman" applies to the transcendental consciousness that is free from material identifications/ attachments. Such consciousness is the first preliminary step for any further exploration of the Divine: the final instruction of Gita (18.54) states that only from this level of consciousness one can develop true bhakti. We must therefore understand that the level of Brahman, the transcendental spiritual consciousness, is not something we should despise or fear, but rather the goal we need to concentrate on.

The word aramah, "finding pleasure", contains a dynamic aspect, indicating the idea of sporting, doing something for the pure pleasure of it. It is closely connected to the concept of lila, "playing", that applies to the transcendental activities manifested by Bhagavan.

The expression antah jyoti indicates that the yogi attains the level where does not depend on external sensory perception to acquire knowledge and enlightenment, because of the direct contact with the Param Atman. Once the chattering of the mind and ego have ceased, and the intelligence is steady like a flame undisturbed by wind, the natural radiance of the Atman and the Param Atman will be revealed from within.

लभन्ते ब्रह्मनिर्वाणमृषयः क्षीणकल्मषाः । छिन्नद्वैधा यतात्मानः सर्वभूतहिते रताः ॥ ५-२५ ॥

labhante brahmanirvāṇamṛṣayaḥ kṣīṇakalmaṣāḥ | chinnadvaidhā yatātmanāḥ sarvabhūtahite ratāḥ || 5-25 ||

labhante: they obtain; brahma-nirvanam: the Brahma nirvana; rishayah: the Rishis; kṣhina-kalmasah: cleansed from impurities; chinnadvaidha: having cut off doubts; yata-atmanah: having controlled themselves; sarva-bhuta: for all living beings; hite: in beneficial work/ to the benefit; ratat: engaged/ dedicated/ attached.

"The (wise) seers (of Reality) attain the brahma nirvana (because) have been purified from (all) sins/ faults and have cut off (all) doubts (dualistic illusions), engaging themselves in (work for) the benefit of all living beings."

We have seen in previous verses the definition of the word muni, used by Krishna as a synonym for yogi. This verse offers the definition Rishi, "those who see (Reality)", a synonym for the definition tattva darshi we found in verse 4.34. In vedic tradition, the Rishis are wise men that directly realized the Knowledge of Transcendence and expressed it in the various scriptural texts they compiled. This definition can apply both to men and to women: the feminine form of the noun is Rishika, from which the name of the city Rishikesh derives, "Lord of the Rishikas", being dedicated to Mahesvara Shiva.

Some people believe that such Rishis were special because of their noble birth and ancestry, but this is not the actual point; in fact in the history of Vedic knowledge there were some Rishis that came from ordinary or degraded families. One famous example is Satyakama Jabala, whose story is described in the Chandogya Upanisad (4.4.1-5). He was the son of a single mother who worked as a maidservant for many different people and had no idea who the father of the boy was (generally maidservants also moonlighted as prostitutes). Another famous example is Valmiki Rishi, the compiler of the Ramayana, who came from a family of street robbers. What to speak of Veda Vyasa, who was born out of wedlock from a woman from the fishermen community. However, to be considered a Rishi one needs to fit the description given in this verse: become purified from all sins and faults, cut off all doubts and dualities, and engage sincerely in working for the benefit of all. Such great souls deserve all respect, whatever was their birth. The expression kṣhina means "diminished, reduced", and indicates the process of gradual purification called anartha nivritti, by which one strengthens the influence of sattva and then rises to the level of visuddha sattva, or transcendental purity.

The expression dvaidha, "doubt", conveys the meaning of a dualistic illusion, by which one is torn between two opposite positions and does not know which one is the true or good one. Krishna has already stated in chapter 4 (40, 41, 42) that chronic doubts prevent all progress: "For one who is plagued by uncertainty there is no happiness in this world or in the next... cut through all doubts by (the sword of) knowledge... using the sword of knowledge to slash off all these doubts that were born from ignorance and are infesting the heart."

The expression sarva-bhuta-hite ratat refers to all activities that are performed for the benefit of all the living beings; real welfare work should not create unnecessary sufferings to one category or groups of beings for the purpose of facilitating the pleasure and profit of another category or group. There is always a better way to work for the benefit of all, and we need to carefully consider all the factors, and keep in mind the permanent benefit or preya, that is more important than the temporary benefit called preya.

कामक्रोधवियुक्तानां यतीनां यतचेतसाम् । अभितो ब्रह्मनिर्वाणं वतते विदितात्मनाम् ॥ ५-२६ ॥

kāmakrodhaviyuktānāṁ yatīnāṁ yatacetasām | abhito brahmanirvāṇaṁ vartate viditātmanām || 5-26 ||

kama-krodha-vimuktanam: of those who are completely free from lust and anger; yatinam: of those who are renounced/ regulated; yata-cetasam: who control their consciousness; abhitat: guaranteed; brahma-nirvanam: the peacefulness of Transcendence; vartate: is there; vidita-atmanam: of those who have known/ realized the atman.

"The saintly persons who are completely free from lust and anger and have their consciousness steadily fixed (in Brahman), who have realized the Self: (for them) there is brahma nirvana very soon/ in whatever way."

The word yati is a synonym for sannyasi, a person who has become completely free from abankara and mamatva - material identification and sense of possession or belonging - and therefore is beyond all scope of lust and anger. Since krodha, anger, is generated from kama, lust, and kama arises from the desire of possessing a sense object for the gratification of the material body and mind, the only way to completely uproot this enemy of peaceful and happy life is to move on a higher platform, already amply described by Krishna in the previous chapters, where such lust cannot arise. We have already seen that a renounced person humbly accepts as prasadam, for the maintenance of his body and mind, whatever sense gratification he receives without too much effort. This is the idea of regulating one's sense gratification: be satisfied with what comes on its own accord in the course of the performance of one's proper duties.

Those who have formally accepted the sannyasa order of life must practically demonstrate this concept in its extreme form, by renouncing all possessions and social position, including their name and home, and survive from day to day by begging alms for their food, traveling constantly so that they do not develop a depending relationship with any particular place or people. A sannyasi cannot have a permanent address or a bank account, movable or immovable properties, or even valuables he could sell in case of emergency. His clothing consists of a simple kaupina or loincloth and a shawl made from discarded rags picked from the street, and his ornaments consist of a kanthi mala or japa mala (string of beads) made from the wood of tulasi or the seeds of rudraksha, and the tilaka made from clay or ashes. No Sony, Seiko or Samsonite are contemplated in the characteristic equipment of a sannyasi. A sannyasi should not even wear shoes or carry an umbrella - what to speak of traveling executive class in airplanes and having diamond jewelry on silken clothes, or employing a personal cook or masseur (or masseuse). He can never engage in politics, trade or any type of business or relationship with people who are engaged in such fields.

Of course, this formal acceptance of the rigid rules of sannyasa is not intended for the degraded and weak people of Kali yuga. In fact it is strongly discouraged if not forbidden, as clearly stated in Brahma vaivarta purana: asvamedham gavalambbham sannyasam pala paitrkam devarena sutotpattim kalau panca vivarjayet, "In the age of Kali, five acts are not to be performed: the horse sacrifice, the cow sacrifice, the acceptance of the order of sannyasa, the offering of oblations of flesh to the forefathers, and a man's begetting children in his brother's wife." We can therefore safely assume that there are very few genuine sannyasis - if any at all - and that for the most part, the people that are considered sannyasis are simply spiritual practitioners that do not engage in family life but live in some ashrama or matha, depending on some religious institution for their maintenance and working more or less diligently or effectively for the propagation of spiritual activities and functions. They do not get a salary but their basic maintenance needs and their work instruments are provided by the matha.

Unfortunately not all such people are actually sincere: the fraud mentality can exist in many degrees and at various levels. Some are just looking for easy food, quiet sleep, little work, sufficient respect from the society and sometimes good opportunities for sense gratification, with no responsibilities and liabilities. In time they can become frustrated, dry, cruel, insensitive, rough, proud and engage in institutional politics and power games, and some may even become cynical hypocrites, who simply take advantage of their artificial dress to shamelessly exploit innocent and ignorant people for their personal sense gratification and profit, and when they do not obtain money, facilities or adoration (which they think is due to them simply because of their dress), they get angry and revengeful. This is why this verse specifies yata cetasam, putting the emphasis on the fact that the definition of "renounced person" has nothing to do with the externals, but everything to do with the level or mode of consciousness or awareness. Other interesting expressions in the verse are abhitah - meaning "guaranteed, very soon, in one way or another" - and vidita, "those who know", coming from same root as vit and veda.

स्पर्शान्कृत्वा बहिर्बाह्यांश्चक्षुश्चैवान्तरे भ्रुवोः ।

प्राणापानौ समौ कृत्वा नासाभ्यन्तरचारिणौ ॥ ५-२७ ॥

sparsāṅkṛtvā bahirbāhyāṁścakṣuścaivāntare bhruvoh | prāṇāpānau samau kṛtvā nāsābhyantaracārīṇau || 5-27 ||

sparsan: sense objects; kṛtvā: making; bahib: externally; bahyan: external; cakshuh: the eyes; ca: and; eva: certainly; antare: inside; bhruvoh: of the eyebrows; prana-apānau: the prana and the apana; samau: balance; kṛtvā: doing; nasa-abhyantara: inside the nostrils; carīṇau: that are moving.

"Keeping outside (his/her concern/ attention) the external (objects/ concerns) and fixing one's eyes to the internal space between the eyebrows, balancing the prana and apana, controlling the breathing within the nose,

The previous verses described a yati, a sannyasi, that has completely overcome all material identification and sense of possess, and is striving only for permanent liberation from the prison of the body. In other words, a sannyasi's only concern is about preparing himself for death. Of course, this approach and purpose does not correspond with the mentality and activities of the so-called sannyasis of Kali yuga, that are actually monks who simply live in a monastery, not unlike their Christian counterparts. In fact, this sad state of affairs has created among many people the general idea that in fact a sannyasi is nothing more than a Christian monk or friar. Unfortunately all along history Christian monasteries have set an extremely low standard of spiritual realization and behavior, and this cultural superimposition has vastly contributed to the degradation of Hindu standards as well.

It was Adi Shankara who established the system of mathas, radically reforming the institution of sannyasa as a necessary step to counteract the degradation of the brahmanic tradition, and incorporating the new concept of "monastery" introduced by Buddhism. In this system sannyasis started living together in a fixed residence and training brahmacharis as "new/ apprentice monks", collecting and managing funds for the maintenance of the matha, organizing preaching functions to the public etc - all occupations that had previously been the natural and undisputed rights of grihastha brahmanas, including the highly transcendental ones such as the Rishis living in their remote ashramas in the forests.

We should not forget that the sannyasi described by Krishna in Gita is not the monk-type religionist who lives in a matha, but a real sannyasi who lives alone without shelter - a very important point, that will be repeated several times later on. Without understanding this crucial point, the instructions given in the next chapter on the practice of the Yoga of meditation will be horribly distorted, creating a fantasy of sense gratification that is a mixture of luxury monastery and fitness spa, where monks dedicate all their time to the care and improvement of their material bodies, through physical well being and fitness exercise techniques, eating expensive and rare biodynamic foods in a trendy diet prepared by expert cooks, sleeping on specially made futons and orthopedic beds, and so on. When the concept of meditation enters this golden fantasy of Beverly Hills Yoga, it becomes a series of relaxation techniques to delude the mind into believing that this material world is actually a place of happiness and peace, that the purpose of life is to feel good inside one's material body, and that the best time of the day is when we can dream about the fairy-tale sunlit meadows full of flowers and the rosy clouds at dawn on the ocean beach that we are told to visualize in our minds to improve our "spiritual well-being".

Such practice of “yoga and meditation” is as much as a sadhana as watching any of the many fantasy films produced by Hollywood studios. It's a mental movie, nothing but a mental projection, that belongs to tamas rather than sattva, even if the room where we spend our fantasizing time is well-aerated and lit, the floor is clean and there are perfumed incense sticks burning in some artistic incense holder. If we wash away the fancy misconceptions and come back to the solid reality described in Gita, we will find an unkempt elderly man, who lives in the open without any shelter like any homeless bum and eats whatever scarce food he can obtain by begging, and whose only concern is to carry his awareness beyond the material level so that he can leave his body without having to take another birth. Another extremely important clue in this regard is the description offered by Krishna in this verse about the pratyahara and pranayama of the ancient science of Kriya yoga. Pratyahara means withdrawing one's attention internally, excluding all external disturbances from one's consciousness and even the memory of external objects. So, we are not supposed to meditate on meadows, forests or beaches. But what does it mean to focus one's attention “internally”? Should we visualize our bodily organs - lungs, brain, blood in the veins? Certainly not. Those are external things, too, as the material body is just the outer covering of the Atman. What should we meditate on, then? On the Atman, or even better, on the Param Atman, that is the inner soul of our soul. Pranayama means equalization of breathing: controlling breathing until all breathing stops. It is not meant to increase the oxygen flow to the brain so that we can become more brilliant at our managerial careers, or to quicken the metabolism so that we can eat more caloric food without gaining pounds of anti-aesthetic weight - all with the purpose of getting more and better opportunities for sexual relationships. We have already mentioned the two brain hemispheres - the male and the female - that control each one side of the body, and respectively the logical and emotional faculties. The particular practice of pranayama described in this verse is aimed at having both nostrils work simultaneously, something that only happens spontaneously at times of great balance between the two hemispheres. When the male energy and the female energy within a single body are perfectly balanced, the individual becomes free from the sexual attraction and impulses, and the awareness remains stable and undisturbed, able to properly focus on Self realization.

यतेन्द्रियमनोबुद्धिर्मुनिर्मोक्षपरायणः ।

विगतेच्छभयक्रोधो यः सदा मुक्त एव सः ॥ ५-२८ ॥

yatendriyamanobuddhirmunirmokṣaparāyaṇaḥ | vigatecchābhayakrodho yaḥ sadā mukta eva saḥ || 5-28 ||

yata-indriya-manah-buddhiḥ: having controlled the senses, the mind and the intelligence; munir: the Muni; moksha-parayanah: (fully) dedicated to liberation; vigata-iccha-bhaya-krodhab: having gone beyond (all) desire, fear and anger; yaḥ: he; sada: always; muktaḥ: liberated; eva: certainly; saḥ: he.

controlling the senses, the mind and intelligence, the muni (the silent sage) who is fully dedicated to moksha (liberation), free from all desires, fear and anger, is certainly always liberated."

A muni is the “silent sage” that has lost all interest and concerns for the external world. Therefore he is free from desires and hopes, fear and anger, and his senses, mind and intelligence are perfectly undisturbed and under control. The practice of silence (mauna vrata) is one of the most fundamental exercises, especially for beginners in Yoga, because without restraining the speech it is very difficult to restrain the mind. Everything first appears in the mind, and when it is expressed by speech it becomes “objectivized”, taking up a stronger sense of reality. This is also the reason why the practice of mantra japa is so important.

There is a difference between a muni and a dumb person who would like to speak but is unable to. Using sign language or making inarticulate sounds in imitation of ordinary speech is not admissible in the practice of mauna, either, as the silence should also include the activities of the mind. A merely external show of silence, that is not subordinated to the meditation on the Supreme Self, will simply create a tamasic sense of inertia and ignorance, and if the “practitioner” ever wakes up from this slumber, the spark of rajas will create frustration and clashes with other people. There are several examples of “mauni babas” in India who made a big name for themselves by remaining silent for years, and ended their silence by getting angry with followers over trifles, or by breaking their continence vows, or with similar acts that revealed how their lack of actual realization and inner peace. In a previous verse (3.6) Krishna had already described such people as vimudha (fools) and mithyacara (pretenders).

What the muni seeks is simply moksha, permanent liberation - not followers, not name and fame, not a career in politics, not large donations, not palatial temples or ashramas, not the credit of being able to do welfare work, not government recognition. Because he has finished with the material world, when the emaciated and neglected body fails him, he will not call an ambulance to be carried to the hospital and beg the doctors to “save his life”. And nobody else will call the ambulance for him because he lives alone, far from human habitation, according to the specific instructions given by Krishna in Gita in the next chapters.

If we want to bring the authority of the Vedic scriptures, and especially the prasthan trayā, and especially the Gita, to build credibility for what we are doing, then our first priority should be to carefully study the Gita and understand the actual system. However, since the vast masses of people are abysmally ignorant about the actual shastra, and in fact most do not have any interest in reading them, it is easy for cynical cheaters and charlatans to take advantage of the vague and distorted information of the general population and claim to “represent Hindu orthodoxy” in their unauthorized conclusions and behaviors. Anyone who has the correct vision of the ethics of actual Hindu orthodoxy, i.e. the genuine teachings of shastra and original acharyas, has the duty to speak up and do his part to save society from going to hell in the name of religion.

भोक्तारं यज्ञतपसां सर्वलोकमहेश्वरम् ।

सुहृदं सर्वभूतानां ज्ञात्वा मां शान्तिमृच्छति ॥ ५-२९ ॥

bhoktāraṁ yajñatapaśāṁ sarvalokamaheśvaram | suhṛdaṁ sarvabhūtānāṁ jñātvā māṁ śāntimṛcchati || 5-29 ||

bhoktaram: the beneficiary; yajna-tapasam: of sacrifices and austerities; sarva-loka-mahesvaram: the great Lord of all the worlds; subridam: the close friend; sarva-bhutanam: of all living beings; jnatva: knowing; mam: me (as); santim: peace; ricchati: attains.

"(One who) knows me as the enjoyer/ beneficiary of yajna (sacrifice) and tapas (austerity), the great Lord of all the worlds /all people, and the dearest friend of all beings, attains peace."

Here is another extremely famous verse of Gita, that one great commentator called "the peace formula", capable of bringing real and lasting peace to individuals and societies as well. Usually people fight over benefits and glory, domination, material possessions or relationships, out of greed for position and property, for jealousy, revenge, and similar reasons. So if everyone agrees that ahankara and mamatva are impurities to be abandoned, and that we should treat everything and everyone respectfully as property and relations of God, the usual reasons for fighting dissolve into irrelevance. After all, we are all working for the same Boss, who is a very nice person and wants everybody to be happy. It is not possible to obtain peace through adharmic solutions, simply by substituting one bad and selfish ruler with another bad and selfish ruler, one defective ideology with another defective ideology. If we examine them, all ideologies claim to be aimed at bringing prosperity and happiness to society, and peace is often the reason presented as the motivation for ruthless wars.

On the other hand, by recognizing that Param Atman is the actual beneficiary of all sacred actions and sacrifices, the creator and proprietor of everything (not only on this planet but in the entire universe) and the best well-wishing friend of all beings, people become more peaceful. Unfortunately, in Kali yuga there are many greedy and egotistic people who claim to be the representatives (or worse, the sole representatives) of God, and they are authorized to "dominate, own and collect tribute" in the name of the Lord of all planets and beneficiary of all actions. This inevitably leads to endless conflicts, oppression and sufferings, because it places faulty human beings in the position of God, even in the name of serving God. Each of the groups believes and claims that they are the (only) qualified and authorized "true representatives" of God, and of course since God himself cannot be called to appear in a court of law to make a declaration in the usually legal way in front of a judge and a court, and since there is no fax or courier service between this world and heaven, they expect that any document presented to substantiate these claims of monopoly over transmitting God's orders should be taken as unquestionably valid, merely on the word of the "representatives" themselves.

Those who refuse to blindly accept such unsubstantiated claim are accused to be offenders, non-believers, heretics, etc. The general method used by these delusional and tyrannical "theocracies" relies on material power - political, military, financial, etc. In Kali yuga, most people will believe that might is right, so the entire purpose of religious consciousness as presented in this verse becomes horribly distorted into a totalitarian oppression. What is the difference between someone who oppresses people and enforces adharmic actions and laws by claiming that he is directly God, and someone who oppresses people and enforces adharmic actions and laws by claiming that he is the sole representative of God? No difference.

God is one, but the theocratical leaders are many, and usually each of them believes he has the monopoly on the understanding of God's orders. Sometimes these deluded people even come to the conclusion that their God is the only good one, and there are "other gods" that are bad and should therefore be persecuted and eliminated by the followers of the "good God". The history of the last 2500 years is the proof that such delusional doctrines are extremely dangerous and destructive. How to solve the problem? Vedic knowledge, Vedic civilization, offers the answer to the dilemma: the genuine representatives of God never claim any material power on society - no political power, no military power, no legislative power, no law enforcement power, even no financial power. Brahmanas can only act as advisors and teachers, and can never have any material power on society, what to speak of sannyasis, who have absolutely no social position or relevance.

All religious persons should only concern themselves about giving good advice to people - all people, not only the rulers - on how to progress in their own personal spiritual lives, about the universal principles of dharma (properly called sanatana dharma because they apply to all, at any time in history and in any place) and about what is written in the genuine shastra. Nothing else. Each individual will have to apply the teachings in his/ her own life, never to the lives of others. The government powers reside in the King only, and the king has no power over the religious beliefs and practices of the subjects. The only difference between an ordinary raja and a rajarishi is that a rajarishi, a saintly king, personally gives the perfect example of a Self-realized person and always behaves according to the ethical principles of dharma. No king would ever tell people what form or non-form of God they are supposed to worship, and how. In the history of India, there have been many good kings that gave the same protection and patronage to different dharmic religious traditions, within Hinduism and even outside it, as for Buddhism and Jainism. A king is supposed to protect all religious people, without making any ideological discrimination.

The only concern of kshatriyas is to protect the prajas and the kingdom from aggressors, from the criminals that try to commit violence against others. In this work, there is no need for many laws - good people will behave properly without being forced by laws, and bad people will always try to get around the laws to commit their crimes. The only principle that the King needs to apply is to stop aggressors. Not even punishing them, as in the Vedic system there are no prisons or courts or lawyers: if the criminal surrenders and repents, he is either pardoned or banned, depending on the seriousness of his crime.

It does not matter what these aggressors profess to believe, even if they think that God has ordered them to rape and murder innocent people and pillage or steal properties, the kshatriya is only concerned about the act in itself, the rape and the murder and the stealing. The king has the duty to stop aggressions and violence, and he does that without leaving much space to the rationalization that the criminals may try to offer to justify their bad actions.

Chapter 6 : Dhyana Yoga

The yoga of meditation

Dhyana yoga means "the yoga of meditation", and offers instructions that people usually connect with Hatha Yoga or Kriya Yoga, and some people call Astanga Yoga. Krishna, on the other hand, describes it as dhyana or meditation because the only purpose of the asana, pranayama and pratyahara is to facilitate dhyana or meditation. What is meditation? Meditation is the ability to control one's mind and engage it in a beneficial and purposeful way. Most of the problems people face everyday are due to a lack of control of one's mind. Loneliness, depression, difficult or unhealthy personal or social relationships, fears, worries, phobias, hatred, jealousy, failures in enterprises, addictions of all kinds, stress, anxiety, aggressiveness, confusion, resentment, guilt, regret, envy, lust, self-loathing, insecurity, and even unethical behaviors can be solved simply by learning how to operate one's mind. Of course, controlling our own mind can influence the minds of other people only marginally, therefore when other people refuse to do their own part for the benefit of everyone even if our requests are reasonable, we can remove ourselves from the situation, choosing to speak up about the reasons, or to avoid unnecessarily conflict by remaining silent. In any case, a person who has controlled his/ her mind is acting consciously, deliberately and responsibly, making a choice in full awareness of the consequences of his/ her actions, therefore s/he remains the master of his/ her own life. The general mass of conditioned people, who do not control their minds, become easily prey of those who want to control the minds of others, or in any case they remain the slaves of their own whimsical mind and senses, victimized by their tyranny and oppression, and besides the inevitable sufferings that are inherent in the things of the material world, they are unnecessarily tortured by their own mind and senses.

All these problems can be solved by properly learning meditation. Everyone is capable of meditation. Without this faculty, it would not be possible to perform even the most fundamental tasks of life: working, studying, solving practical problems, making choices. That's what people usually mean when they say, "switch your brain on"... and we could add, "when the brain is functioning, keep it going in the proper direction". Whenever we get a machine or appliance, before trying to utilize it we should understand its functions and proper operation, otherwise we will not get the perfect result in our job, and the machine can also get damaged in the process. Our mind is the most complex and wonderful machine, therefore it is essential to understand how it works and how we can use it in the best way.

Although meditation is an instinctive process, like breathing, moving, walking, talking, eating etc, we can learn its science and art, and use it in the best possible way to transform our lives and attain success in all enterprises. Like any muscle, the mind must be trained properly and exercised with intelligence and regularity, so that it can become able to perform its intended work. Those who do not control their minds through the practice of meditation cannot progress in life, either materially or spiritually.

In the last decades there has been some incorrect information and ideas circulating in the name of meditation, so that many people have come to confuse various concepts. Meditation is not daydreaming, fantasy, relaxation, creative visualization, or mechanical repetition of some affirmations, although these are all good exercises for the mind and may be useful for one's mental balance and health. Actual meditation in the practice of yoga, called dhyana, is the focused concentration of the mind on the Transcendental Reality, by which all other movements of the mind are dissolved in the contemplation of the Atman/ Brahman, the eternal existence of knowledge and happiness. It is supported by the preliminary requisites such as yama and niyama (life habits), asana (control of the body), pranayama (control of breathing) and pratyahara (withdrawal of attention from external objects). When the external objects are excluded from the attention of the mind, it is possible to really focus on the object of meditation: this stage is called dharana, "holding the focus", or "getting the mind under control". The next step consists in driving the mind in the proper direction, contemplating Reality without the veils of illusion and distraction, and coming to the point of realizing it, understanding it deeply: this stage is called dhyana.

By constant practice, this deep meditation and state of awareness becomes spontaneous and uninterrupted - a position that is also called sthitā prajña, "solid knowledge" - and thus it is called samadhi, "constant meditation".

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

अनाश्रितः कर्मफलं कार्यं कर्म करोति यः । स संन्यासी च योगी च न निरग्निर्न चाक्रियः ॥ ६-१ ॥

anāśritaḥ karmaphalam kāryam karma karoti yaḥ । sa sannyāsī ca yogī ca na niragnirna cākriyaḥ ॥ 6-1 ॥

sri-bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; anasritaḥ: without depending on; karma-phalam: the results of work; kāryam: duties; karma: activities; karoti: he does; yaḥ sa: he is; sannyasi: a (true) sannyasi; ca: and; yogi: a (true) yogi; ca: and; na: not; nir-agniḥ: one who does not have (contact with) fire; na: not; ca: and; akriyaḥ: one who does not engage in duties.

The Lord said, "One who performs the (ritual and social) activities constituting his/ her duties without depending on the results of the action is the real sannyasi (renouncer) and yogi, not one who does not kindle the (sacred) fire and does not engage in dutiful activities."

The true sannyasi and the true yogi is one who selflessly performs all his/ her duties in society and all the suitable actions when they are required, without any attachment to the enjoyment of the fruits or results of his/ her activities. One who refuses to perform the needed actions by claiming he is following the rules of renunciation is a fake. Similarly, one who dutifully performs, according to the fundamental principles of dharma, the appropriate ritual and social activities as required by the time, place and circumstances, without being attached to the results or the identification as the author of the action, is the true sannyasi and the true yogi, not one who merely abstains from lighting the sacred fire and engaging in honest practical work. This is another very famous verse, often partially quoted (especially the first part). We have already seen that asritah means "depending". A devotee depends on the Lord, not on the results of his own activities. Sometimes asritah is translated as "taking shelter", and asraya is translated as "shelter", but it is an expression that can be confusing. When we think of "shelter", we associate the idea with the image of a building where we will be protected from rain and wind, heat and cold, wild animals and other dangers. However, this kind of shelter is only temporary, and we normally get out of it to go about doing our business. On the other hand, when one depends on someone or something, it is a permanent concern, to which all one's actions are subordinated.

The expression karyam karma refers to the dutiful actions, that a person is required to perform according to his position in society and family: the brahmachari, the grihastha and the vanaprastha are supposed to regularly perform the homa or fire sacrifice, and keep a sacred fire (vaishnava agni) from which the kitchen fires are lit. No homa, no cooked food. The expression niragnih indicates that persons engaged in renunciation from family and social life (sannyasa) do not keep a fire; they do not perform the fire sacrifice rituals because they do not have the financial means to support them, and they do not cook because they subsist on the food leftovers he obtains by begging alms from the homes of householders. Usually such alms consist in food that has already been cooked, or that does not need to be cooked, like rice flakes (chuda), fruits, milk, etc.

The word akeriya refers to someone who is not bound to perform any actions, rituals, work, etc, because he has no more responsibilities towards family and society, and has lost all desires to gain personal benefits, either for this lifetime or for the next. Because he has renounced all plans and desires, and simply depends on God, he does not need to make separate efforts to acquire anything: yas tv atma-ratir eva syad atma-triptas ca manavah, atmany eva ca santushtas tasya karyam na vidyate, naiva tasya kriterartho nakriteneha kascana, na casya sarva-bhuteshu kascid artha-ryapasrayah, "A human being who loves the Self certainly becomes satisfied in the Self and peaceful within the Self: for such a person there is no need to perform any action. This person does not have any reason to abstain from activities, just like he does not have any reason to perform any duty. In this world he does not depend on any other for any purpose." (Gita 3.17, 18). The karya karma mentioned in the verse are the nitya karmas that must be performed regularly, like the homa (fire sacrifice) and the occupational duties according to the varnas, as well as the naimittika karmas or the particular rituals and activities that are performed to obtain a particular religious purpose, like the birth of a son etc. In the beginning of Gita, Arjuna had expressed the desire to renounce his position as a kshatriya and retire to the forest as a sannyasi: in the previous chapter Krishna has vividly illustrated the real practice and purpose of sannyasa to clarify all misconceptions, and here he concludes that there is no need for the externals of sannyasa in order to attain the ultimate purpose of life.

यं संन्यासमिति प्राहुर्योगं तं विद्धि पाण्डव । न ह्यसंन्यस्तसङ्कल्पो योगी भवति कश्चन ॥ ६-२ ॥

yaṁ sannyāsamiti prāhuryogaṁ taṁ viddhi pāṇḍava । na hyasannyastasaṅkalpo yogī bhavati kaścana ॥ 6-2 ॥

yam: that (which is); sannyasam: sannyasa; iti: like this; prahub: they say; yogam: yoga; taṁ: that (is); viddhi: you should know; paṇḍava: O Arjuna (son of Pandu); na: not; hi: certainly; asannyasta-saṅkalpab: without giving up expectations; yogi: a yogi; bhavati: becomes; kaścana: nobody.

"O son of Pandu (Arjuna), (you should) know that what is called sannyasa (renunciation) is actually yoga, because no one can ever become a yogi without giving up all expectations."

After establishing that there is actually no need to take the formal vows of sannyasa and retire from active life, and that yoga (Karma Yoga) is superior to Sannyasa Yoga, Krishna repeats that the only true renunciation consists in not depending on expectations. Such renunciation is not based on the lack of opportunities, because in that case renunciation disappears as soon as the opportunity for sense gratification arises. In other words, it is possible to distinguish a true sannyasi from an ordinary beggar that is under financial stricture, by observing his reactions when he is offered some money. The expression asannyasta-saṅkalpab can mean "without giving up expectation" and also "without deciding to remain renounced", and "while remaining determined not to give up (attachment and material identification)". This variety of meanings can be applied to the different degrees of determination by which a sadhaka is pursuing the practice of Yoga. In his Yoga sutras, Patanjali says in this regard: drishthanusbravika-vishaya vitrishnasya vashikara-sanjina vairagyam, "Renunciation is the consciousness in which one steadily controls the thirst for the objects that are seen or heard" (1.15). And again: tivra-samveganam asannab, mridu-madhyadhimatratvat tato 'pi visheshab, "An intense desire will quickly take (the sadhaka to success), but (such desire for success in yoga) can be differently described as soft, medium or strong" (1.21, 22)

Vairagya is a synonym for sannyasa, and saṅkalpa is the act of determination or will power that gives permission to the mind, the intellect and senses to develop a desire for the sense objects. The definition of saṅkalpa was also given in 4.19 as "determination" and will be repeated again in verses 6.4 and 24. A synonym is arambhah, that we find in verse 12.16 used in a very similar context.

आरुरुक्षोमुनिर्योगं कर्म कारणमुच्यते । योगारूढस्य तस्यैव शमः कारणमुच्यते ॥ ६-३ ॥

āruruṣṭho muneryogaṁ karma kāraṇamucyate | yogārūḍhasya tasyaiva śamaḥ kāraṇamucyate || 6-3 ||

aruruṣṭho: one who wants to climb up; muneh: the muni; yogam: yoga; karma: action/ duty; karanam: the means; ucyate: it is said; yoga: yoga; arūḍhasya: of one who has climbed up; tasya: of him; eva: certainly; śamaḥ: equal disposition (to all types of activities); karanam: the means; ucyate: it is said.

"For a muni who has just begun the practice of yoga, activity is said to be the means. For one who has ascended the staircase of yoga, equanimity is said to be the means."

What is medicine for someone is often unhealthy for someone else who is in a different condition. In the beginning of the yoga practice, the mind and senses need constant engagement in beneficial activities to avoid sliding into inertia, callousness, neglect and laziness, and into the development of bad habits such as gossiping, etc. On the other hand, a person who has developed the second nature of positive engagement through constant practice needs to turn one's attention to the inner activity, exploring the transcendental consciousness of the Self without being distracted by the external temporary circumstances.

Another meaning is that in the beginning of one's spiritual journey we need to have accumulated sufficient puṇya, or "good karma", because a person that is devoid of good merits will usually find lots of difficulties in the process of self-growth. However, at a certain stage the good material merits take a back seat in comparison to the direct exploration of the inner Self, while insisting in engaging in materially meritorious activities can have the opposite and detrimental effect of distracting one's attention from the actual goal and reinforcing one's ego instead of overcoming it.

In this verse yoga is compared to a staircase that is gradually climbed in different stages of practice, and with different sets of rules. However, it is very interesting to notice that the beginner or neophyte in the practice of yoga is called a muni, "a silent sage". One would tend to think that it is not possible to engage in activities while following the strict rules of the sādhanā of silence. Therefore, we need to understand that such recommended activities are not ordinary work, and that the meditative silence is not the ordinary abstention from speech. A beginner that is starting to climb the staircase of yoga must concentrate on the specific kriyas or activities, given by the Teacher in order to train his consciousness in the proper way. Such kriyas are not merely physical exercises such as asanas or mudras, but include active engagement in the normal duties of life - to earn a livelihood and maintain one's body must also become an integral part of our yoga practice, and similarly our relationships with other people and circumstances must be strictly controlled under the category of engaging in activities. Silence thus becomes a mental attitude more than merely restraining the speech. It means learning to shift one's attention from the endless opportunities of egotistic engagement and mind chattering, and rather focusing on the true purpose of life and the spiritual object of our meditation, even while we are engaged in apparently trivial occupations.

This training requires constant vigilance and an expert guidance. A Yoga Teacher is not simply someone who shows you how to bend and stretch your body or breathe in a deeper way - this would be a gym teacher only. A true Yoga Teacher has the responsibility to assist each student in the deep transformation of their lives and awareness, up to the point of liberation from all material identifications, attachments and conditionings: the cessation of all material activities. If he is unable to fulfill this role, he should not usurp the definition and content himself of being called physical trainer. The word karanam is translated as "means" or "cause", in the sense that it indicates the cause of success in that particular attempt as well as the motivation for embarking into it.

यदा हि नेन्द्रियार्थेषु न कर्मस्वनुषज्जते । सर्वसङ्कल्पसंन्यासी योगारूढस्तदोच्यते ॥ ६-४ ॥

yadā hi nendriyārtheṣu na karmasvanuṣajjate | sarvasaṅkalpasannyāsī yogārūḍhastadocyate || 6-4 ||

yada: when; hi: certainly; na: not; indriya-artheṣu: in the sense objects; na: not; karmasu: in the activities; anuṣajjate: engages/ is attached; sarva-saṅkalpa: all desires/ imagination/ intentions; sannyāsī: one who has renounced; yogarūḍhaḥ: on the top stairs of yoga/ established in yoga; tada: then; ucyate: he is said.

"Indeed, when one does not become attached to the objects of the senses or to the activities, and renounces all expectations, s/he is said to be advanced in yoga."

The gradual process of yoga is aimed at dissolving the bondage of ego, the identification with the material body and position, and even with the merits of good pious activities. Such pious activities are mainly performed with the purpose of obtaining some benefit - either the material benefit of attaining the heavenly planets, or the spiritual benefit of becoming able to actually engage in the spiritual journey. All these fall into the category of sankalpa, or "intention, expectation, purpose".

The performance of karmas and kriyas is essential in the first stages of human progress because without the sincere performance of one's duties and religious activities and rituals, a human being remains focused on the mere animal propensities, such as sense gratification, eating, sleeping, mating, taking care of family, getting a place in society, protecting oneself and one's kith and kin, accumulating wealth to provide for the future, playing and having fun, and expressing artistic tendencies. All these activities are found in various degrees in animals and even in plants. So, what's the real difference between an animal and a human being? Religion. Unfortunately, the idea of "religion" has become burdened with a lot of negative semantic luggage, especially connected with the oppressive nature of dogmatic and intolerant faiths that are aimed at controlling the people for political or otherwise material purposes, and are often cause of stupidity and ignorance, remarkable cruelty and unnecessary sufferings. This is the reason why many people have become "allergic" to the very idea of religion, sometimes declaring themselves atheists or agnostics, or becoming followers of some other non-religious ideology such as materialism, scientism, communism, capitalism, nationalism, feminism, or "cultural manifestations" such as performing or figurative arts, music, literature and philosophical speculation, sports, gastronomy, pet care, sexual/ romantic experimentation, tourism, folklore, and so on. Although such pursuits have nothing wrong or bad intrinsically, they do not constitute the actual purpose of human life, and when cultivated as the center of one's life and interest, they distract us from the very valuable opportunity that we have been offered: Self realization. The word "religion" comes from the Latin religare, "to connect, to unite", which is the very same meaning of the word "yoga". All the pursuits we have listed above come under the category of sankalpa, or "imaginative path to achieve happiness", but we cannot find true happiness unless we find our own Self and we connect with our deep, original and pure nature of sat-cit-ananda. This is the only pursuit that really distinguishes human beings from animals, and that offers the extremely valuable opportunity for liberation, of freedom from material conditionings. No cultural manifestation or "way of life" can offer us such exceptional blessing: materialism, scientism, communism, capitalism, nationalism, feminism, performing or figurative arts, music, literature and philosophical speculation, sports, gastronomy, pet care, sexual/ romantic experimentation, tourism and folklore will simply give us a temporary satisfaction, but they will tie us to material identification and attachments, thus condemning us to the continuation of the cycle of birth and deaths. They can only become beneficial when they are harnessed into the proper direction, i.e. development of a sattvic mentality and life style, which in turn will lead us to awareness of our real nature and Self realization. They are simply means, while yoga is the end.

उद्धरेदात्मनात्मानं नात्मानमवसादयेत् । आत्मैव ह्यात्मनो बन्धुरात्मैव रिपुरात्मनः ॥ ६-५ ॥

uddharedātmanātmānaṁ nātmanamavasādayet | ātmaiva hyātmano bandhurātmaiva ripurātmanah || 6-5 ||

uddhared: one should save; atmana: by himself; atmanam: himself; na: not; atmanam: oneself; avasadayet: one should degrade; atma: oneself; eva: certainly; hi: indeed; atmanah: oneself; bandhub: friend; atma: oneself/ one's mind; eva: certainly; ripub: enemy; atmanah: oneself.

"One should raise him/ herself by his/her own effort, and not degrade him/ herself. Certainly one could be one's own friend or one's own enemy."

In this verse, as in most other contexts, the word atman can mean "oneself", "the sense of identification (ego)", "the mind" or even "the soul". Each individual should be the best friend of him/ herself. We need to learn to understand and know ourselves, to be loving and supporting with ourselves, to respect, appreciate and trust ourselves first - because whatever we are seeking in others is already within ourselves. If we do not like our selves, if we do not live happily with our own selves, it will be impossible to find sufficient validation, support and happiness in or from others.

When we become enemies of our own selves, life becomes extremely dangerous, degrading and even intolerably painful, because we can never leave our own company at any time. One can really become one's worst enemy, because of a mistaken sense of one's identity and an uncontrolled mind, and this will perpetuate suffering and imprisonment practically without end, and with incredible sufferings. It is due to lack of self-esteem and self-acceptance, and distorted sense of guilt and self-punishment, that one becomes constantly negative and refuses to accept even legitimate good things that come his way - praise, encouragement, and happiness. The worst hell is within one's own mind. Even any other enemies that we may have are such only because we have made them enemies, consciously or unconsciously, directly or indirectly.

This verse highlights the great importance of the sense of responsibility and power over one's own life - what we could also call self-esteem, self-reliance, or self-empowerment. Many confused people have come to believe that religion or spiritual life entails "abandoning" oneself to a higher power, in a sort of passive surrender in which one renounces all responsibilities and personal power, and always depends on someone else, delegating one's life and choices on others - usually seen as some "authority", especially "religious authority", "guru", or some imaginative projection they call "God" or "destiny".

This is not what Krishna is teaching. Spiritual progress cannot be delegated to anyone else: it is our personal responsibility only. When we choose a spiritual master, we must make a responsible choice, and we must make sure that the teachings of such master are genuine and beneficial. A guru may take responsibility to guide the disciple, and pay the consequences if he does not perform his duties properly, but ultimately each and every individual must make the effort for spiritual progress. At school, no student can learn passively without making any effort, or expect someone else to learn for him. Similarly, spiritual realization is a very personal journey, and each one of us needs to develop the proper knowledge, realizations, and good behavior. The idea that one only needs to accept a guru or a "savior" in order to attain spiritual perfection, without making any personal effort to improve one's Self realization is a dangerous fantasy that might cost us the valuable opportunity of a human life.

बन्धुरात्मात्मनस्तस्य येनात्मैवात्मना जितः । अनात्मनस्तु शत्रुत्वे वर्तेतात्मैव शत्रुवत् ॥ ६-६ ॥

bandhurātmaātmanastasya yenaātmaivātmanā jitaḥ | anātmanastu śatruṭve vartetaātmaiva śatruvat || 6-6 ||

bandhub: friend; atma: oneself; atmanah: of oneself; tasya: of him; yena: by him; atma: oneself; eva: certainly; atmana: by oneself; jitaḥ: conquered; anātmanah: one who has not (conquered) oneself; tu: but; śatruṭve: out of enmity; varteta: behaves/ acts; atma: oneself; eva: certainly; śatru-vat: like an enemy.

"One is his/ her own friend when s/he has conquered oneself, but one who is not self-controlled behaves as his own enemy."

The purpose of controlling one's identification is to improve oneself and cultivate the best qualities and habits, not to torture and deprive oneself of legitimate happiness and peace.

When we speak about the difference between friend and enemy, the most important factor is considering whether the behavior of the person is favorable or unfavorable towards us. Therefore we recognize a friend because he is helping us to progress in life, supporting us in difficult times, offering good advice and gifts, inspiration and encouragement, and good company. The problem with whimsical material identification and an untrained mind is that they demand our allegiance and service even to our risk and detriment, without caring for our real benefit, and even remaining callous to our sufferings. However, when we have overcome material identification and trained our mind properly, we can organize, integrate and harmonize our assets and utilize them for our material and spiritual progress. Thus we behave as our best friend.

The concept of jita, "conquered", implies that one who conquers should know what he has conquered and should be able to use it properly. It is a positive conquest, much like conquering the heart of someone and developing a loving relationship. It should not be a hostile takeover, an oppressive colonialist or totalitarian regime - rather, it should be the benevolent government of a virtuous, just and affectionate king that considers his subjects as his beloved prajas, or children. We should never forget that we are supposed to make friends with oneself, that is with one's mind. In this process, we cannot ignore the power of one's subconscious mind. Our conscious mind is only a small part of the totality of our identification - some have calculated that it is not more than 10% of our entire subtle body. Just like an iceberg is submerged for the greatest part of its mass, and only the tip is visible above the water, similarly our subconscious mind remains submerged under the waters of awareness, but it constitutes the largest part of our identification, including all the memories of our past lifetimes. On the physical level, it is common knowledge that only a small percentage of the brain is generally used in ordinary life, while 70% up to 85% of the brain remains inactive in most people. Vedic knowledge, and especially the scientific texts of yoga teach that the human mind is actually capable of doing extraordinary things, when properly trained - including manipulating the structure of matter and traveling through space and time.

The "self" that we need to conquer and harmonize includes the body and the senses, the "lower self" that constitutes a valuable vehicle and instrument for our material and spiritual progress. Mind, senses and body can be compared to a tiger that we can ride, but only after having tamed her and made her into a good friend. This requires great care and balance. As Krishna already explained, we need to keep the tiger reasonably fed and rested, and in good spirits. We cannot hope for success in such a difficult and dangerous enterprise if we starve the tiger or torment her denying her the proper rest and other basic necessities. Verses 6.16 and 17 say, "O Arjuna, yoga is not (possible) for one who eats too much or does not eat at all, or for one who sleeps too much or does not sleep at all. For one who consciously controls his food intake, who is balanced in moving around, who makes controlled efforts in working/ performing one's duties, and is regulated in sleeping/ dreaming and keeping vigil, yoga becomes the destroyer of sufferings."

जितात्मनः प्रशान्तस्य परमात्मा समाहितः । शीतोष्णसुखदुःखेषु तथा मानापमानयोः ॥ ६-७ ॥

jītatmanah prasāntasya paramātmā samāhitah | śītoṣṇasukhaduḥkheṣu tathā mānāpamānayoh || 6-7 ||

jīta-atmanah: one who has conquered himself; prasantasya: one who is peaceful; parama-atma: the Supreme Self; samāhitah: has become manifest; śīta-ushna: cold and heat; sukha-duḥkheṣu: in happiness and distress; tatha: as well as; māna: in being respected; apamānayoh: in being disrespected.

"The Paramatma/ Supreme Self manifests in/ is accessible to one who has controlled himself and has attained peace/ is contented in heat and cold, in happiness and in distress, and in honor/ adoration and dishonor/ spite as well."

The first part of Bhagavad gita (chapters 2 to 4) focused on the realization of Brahman - telling the difference between matter and spirit, realizing the jiva's eternal spiritual nature, the transcendental knowledge of Atman/ Brahman, and the renunciation to material identification and attachments. In chapter 6 we move from the realization of Brahman to the realization of Paramatma, that will be explored at length in chapters 6 to 11, with a growing emphasis on bhakti. Chapters 12 to 18 will focus on the realization of Bhagavan and the development of a personal relationship between the devotee and the Lord.

Continuing the conversation thread from the previous verses, Krishna tells Arjuna that a yogi is peaceful and happy because he turns his attention to the inner Self and is detached from external concerns and dualities. The problem of dualistic mentality will be elaborated all along the Gita as a cause of confusion and disturbance that could distract the yogi from his meditation on the Supreme Transcendental Reality. Such feeling of duality is due to the limited perception of the senses and the mind, that try to come to terms with the constant transformation of the material world. Just like the cycle of seasons brings heat and cold, the maturation of the seeds of our past choices and actions brings temporary joys and sufferings (5.22) that are due to the contact of the senses with the sense objects: "Those pleasures that derive from contact with (the sense objects) are the cause for future sorrow because they have a beginning and an end. Therefore, o son of Kunti, an intelligent person does not seek happiness in them." At the very beginning of Krishna's teachings to Arjuna (2.14) we found a very similar verse: "O son of Kunti, the contact of the senses (with the sense objects) causes joy and distress just like (cold in) winter and (heat in) summer. Such feelings are temporary: they come and go, o descendant of Bharata, and you should just try to tolerate them (without being confused and distracted from your duty)."

Also in 2.38 the same concept was reinforced: "If you fight this battle while remaining equally disposed (unattached and prepared) to joy and sadness, gain and loss, victory and defeat, you will never be touched by sin."

ज्ञानविज्ञानतृप्तात्मा कूटस्थो विजितेन्द्रियः । युक्त इत्युच्यते योगी समलोष्टाश्मकाञ्चनः ॥ ६-८ ॥
jñānavijñānatṛptātmā kūṭastho vijitendriyaḥ । yukta ityucyate yogī samaloṣṭāśmakāñcanaḥ ॥ 6-8 ॥

jnana: knowledge; vijnana: wisdom (applied knowledge); tripta: satisfied; atma: oneself; kuta-stha: one who is firmly situated; vijita-indriyah: one who has conquered the senses; yuktah: engaged (in yoga); iti: like this; ucyate: it is said; yogī: a yogi; sama: equally; loshtra: a lump of soil; asma: stone; kāncanah: gold.

"A person who finds satisfaction in the theory and practice of knowledge remains stable and unmoved (because) s/he has controlled his/ her senses. This person is connected (with the Supreme) and is called a yogi. S/he is impartial to clay, stone and gold."

The definitions jnana and vijnana refer to theoretical and practical/ applied knowledge respectively. As we have already seen, mere theory is not really going to help much. We need to individually develop the actual realization of knowledge and experience it in practice, making it an integral part of our own life and mentality. This direct realization of knowledge remains undisturbed in the various circumstances of life, because it gives greater satisfaction than the ordinary material sense gratification. The pleasure we find within the Self (5.24, antaḥ sukhaḥ, antaḥ aramāḥ, 5. 21, vindati atmani yat sukham) is the supreme pleasure described in 2.59 (param dṛṣṭvā) by which we become able to give up the temporary and limited joys of the material world. A peaceful and satisfied mind has no reason to run here and there after the vṛttis, the modifications of the thoughts, emotions and desires, and therefore remains stable (kuta-stha) in Knowledge. This stability in Knowledge has been described as acalaḥ (not moving) in verse 2.53, sthita dhib (firm meditation) in 2.56, and prajna pratisthita (established in wisdom) in 2.57, 58, 61.

Such stability is been compared (6.19) to a flame that is not disturbed by the wind, also described as nirvana ("without wind") in 5.24, 25, 26 and 6.15 (sa yogi brahma nirvanam, labhante brahma nirvanam, abhito brahma nirvanam, santim nirvana paramam). Another synonym of the word nirvana is nirvikalpa samadhi. This stability of the transcendental consciousness in detachment from material activities and dualities is also described in other verses, such as: brahma bhuta prasanna (18.54), nirdvandvo hi maha babo (5.3), sarva karmani manasa sannyasya (5.13), na kartritvam na karmani (5.14), nirdosam hi samam brahma (5.19), sthira buddhir asammudho (5.20), sa brahma yoga yukta (5.21), vigateccha bhaya krodho (5.28), iccha dvesa samutthana (7.27), te dvandva moha nirmukta (7.28), visanti yad yatayo vita ragah (8.11), iccha dvesah sukham dukham (13.7).

The most famous definition of Yoga in Patanjali's Yoga sutras is "the cessation of the fluctuations of the mind": yogah citta-vṛtti-nirodhaḥ, by which the perception is established in its true svarupa (inherent form): tada drastuḥ svarupe avasthanam.

It is not easy to understand this transcendental consciousness, because the people who are accustomed to thinking in material terms tend to confuse it with the tamasic or ignorant indifference or the rajasic selfish cynicism. Impartiality to clay, stone and gold means that each and every thing should be engaged properly in yoga without prejudice - just like verse 5.18 explained that every person/ living being should be engaged properly without prejudice: "The panditas (wise learned persons) look with equal (friendliness) to the brahmana who is learned and gentle, to the cow and the elephant, as well as to the dog and to the (uncivilized) dog eater." In this regard, it is important to notice that the Deities of the Godhead can be sculpted either in clay, stone or gold, and the results of the worship of the Deity will be the same, irrespective of the material in which the vigraha was fashioned. Only a foolish and ignorant materialist will give more value to a divine vigraha made of gold than to a divine vigraha made of stone or clay. Sometimes we see that artisans tend to put more effort and care in working with expensive materials - such as gold or rare wood - and they do not give any attention when they work with inexpensive and readily available materials such as clay or bamboo, but this betrays a self-defeating mentality that is afflicted with laziness, spite and foolishness. What really matters is the use that we make of things, the effort by which we perform our duties - no matter how humble - in the best possible way. This will really make us perfect persons.

सुहृन्मित्रार्युदासीनमध्यस्थद्वेष्यबन्धुषु । साधुष्वपि च पापेषु समबुद्धिर्विशिष्यते ॥ ६-९ ॥

suḥṛmmitrāryudāsīnamadhyasthadveṣyabandhuṣu । sādhuṣvapi ca pāpeṣu samabuddhirviśiṣyate ॥ 6-9 ॥

su-hṛit: well wishers; mitra: friends; ari: enemies; udasina: neutral people; madhya-stha: intermediaries/ mediators; dveshya: the envious/ hateful; bandhubuḥ: the relatives; sadbushu: to the good people; api: even; ca: and; papesu: to the bad people; sama: equal; buddhib: intelligence; visiṣyate: he is the best.

"The highest (yogi) is one who is impartial/ unprejudiced towards a benefactor, a friend, an enemy, a neutral person, a mediator, an envious person, a relative, a good person and a sinner."

Just like we should be able to remain equally friendly towards a gentle and learned brahmana, a cow, an elephant, a dog and a dog-eater, and to recognize the proper value of clay, stone and gold, we should become able to look beyond the temporary confusion and illusion of those who see the world and others in terms of duality.

A person who is deluded by maya, or "that which is not (what it seems)", evaluates people in terms of the pleasures and displeasures he can obtain from them, and therefore creates the concept of friends and enemies. Such concept is illusory because it is temporary and it relates only to the material identifications and attachments. This does not mean that friendliness and enmity are non-existent. Duality and illusion actually exist and have an effect on our activities: they produce results and in turn such results bring joys and sorrows, creating the circumstances in which a deluded person makes more materially-oriented choices and perpetuating the cycle of birth and deaths. Sometimes the word maya is translated as "that which is not", and this translation conveys the idea of a mere projection of images that has no substance and effects. For example, a mirage in the desert shows us the presence of water where in fact there is none - it is simply the movement of hot air that trembles and reflects the light imitating the movement and reflection of a water surface. There is no moisture in that place.

However, the actions and the identifications of human beings actually create consequences, albeit temporary - we can compare them to a cloud, that collects humidity from the land and the water reservoirs and then precipitates it in the form of rain. After a rain shower, the clouds disappear and therefore we can say that their existence was illusory, but the rainfall reaches the soil and imbibes it, stimulating the growth of vegetation, which in turn will feed the animals and the human beings. Similarly, the Atman is the real person or Self in all the people we see and meet. The Atman has no friends or enemies, relatives or position in society, and is never touched by material relationships. In one lifetime, two people can be sworn enemies and in a next lifetime they can become friends, lovers or siblings or family members - in fact this is usually the system by which they can learn to understand the reality of life.

Life is a school where we are supposed to learn about how to progress and become perfect persons, and the most difficult lessons concern personal relationships. A negative relationship with someone is a test for us to develop good qualities and realizations, and become detached, compassionate and benevolent towards all - because all living beings are merely parts and parcels of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. This gradual evolution of the consciousness through the Knowledge of yoga takes us from the platform called kanistha adbhikari (neophyte worshiper), on which we are still plagued by duality, material identifications and attachments, to the platform called madhyama adbhikari (intermediate worshiper), on which we become able to recognize the intentions and behaviors of people, using our intelligence to serve the divine mission.

Beyond this level, a Self realized yogi who is firmly established in the transcendental vision is able to see the eternal atman, and understands that enmity and affection are temporary circumstances. Thus the uttama adbhikari (advanced worshiper) is able to tolerate and forgive more easily, and remains always free from resentments - that are also attachments, albeit in a negative mode.

Of course, this does not mean that he is stupid or that he likes to be cheated or attacked or mistreated. An uttama adbhikari is not a masochist dedicated to martyrdom; he will not choose to remain exposed to mistreatment but will take the proper distance from ill-motivated people, as soon as he has verified what the real situation is. He may offer opportunities, because he wants to help people to improve themselves, but such windows of opportunities will not remain open forever and without conditions. Also, he will forgive, but not forget, because forgetting is an act of ignorance that would expose him to more unnecessary sufferings and damages. He will concentrate his awareness on positive thinking and proactive choices, all focused on the true value of life and action - that is the sacred offering in service of the Supreme - without wasting his time and energy in brooding or blaming, but he will not delude himself into thinking that a venomous scorpion can become a good room-mate, if only you are nice to him. Feeding snakes with milk and bananas only increases their poison.

It is interesting to study the specific meaning of the various definitions offered by Krishna in this verse about the behaviors and intentions of people. The expression su brit means "having good heart" (i.e. sentiments) towards someone. It is often translated as "well wisher", but such translation is not exactly precise. The word mitra, "friend", indicates affection, companionship and a feeling of positive relationship. This sentiment is the recommended attitude towards all living beings - that are jivatmas on the very same journey we are going through. The expression madhya stha refers to someone who takes a position in the middle, who would like to bring peace and harmony between factions. This sentiment or attitude is possible only when one has become detached from his own personal identifications and attachments, and can see and act in a selfless way. When influenced by tamas or rajas rather than by sattva, this attitude can be a blind and foolish stubbornness that refuses to take sides out of a wrong notion of "impartiality" that chooses to ignore the consequences of bad actions, or by the fear of retaliation from the "bad guys" or by the attachment if the "bad guys" happen to be their family members or friends or allies. However, these neutral people should know that refusing to take the proper action in defense of dharma is also an action that will bring them consequences.

The word bandhu means "relative", or "kith and kin" - in other words, it indicates a person that has some natural ties with us due to attachment or affinity. It generally applies to family members and clan members, either by birth or by adoption or marriage. In this sense it is particularly appropriate when kindly referring to those unqualified people who have taken birth in a good family, such as the brahma bandhus or kshatra bandhus, "relatives" of brahmanas or kshatriyas. The two words used to indicate hostile persons are ari (one who stabs you in the back) and dvesyah (one who is openly hateful). A Self realized yogi is not blind or stupid, and can see the true character of a person, just like he is able to recognize a scorpion, but he is not interested in investing energy or time into hatred and resentment.

योगी युञ्जीत सततमात्मानं रहसि स्थितः । एकाकी यतचित्तात्मा निराशीरपरिग्रहः ॥ ६-१० ॥

yogī yuñjīta satatamātmānaṁ rahasi sthitaḥ । ekākī yatacittātmā nirāśīraparigrahaḥ ॥ 6-10 ॥

yogī: the yogi; yuñjīta: should engage (in sadhana); satatam: constantly; atmanam: on the Atman; rahasi: in a secluded /isolated place; sthitah: settling/ staying; ekaki: alone; yata: controlled; citta-atma: the consciousness of the self; nirasih: without desiring anything; aparigrahaḥ: without possessing anything.

"A yogi should constantly practice (meditation) on the Self by living alone in a secluded place, carefully keeping the mind and the consciousness under control, free from expectations and from attachments (to material acquisitions)."

The previous verses clearly stated that the perfection of yoga is about overcoming the temporary and superficial vision based on material identifications and attachments that present a dualistic evaluation - friend or enemy, good or bad, dirt or gold. True, the realized yogi is equally benevolent towards those who are good people and those who are bad people, but he prefers to avoid all of them. He likes to stay in the company of the Atman only. Krishna stresses the fact that one can remain in such a transcendental vision only by living alone in a secluded place, giving up all sense of exclusive belonging and association. This point is not easy to understand and to accept, because the conditioned mind needs support and nurturing from friends, and protection from enemies. When an ordinary person thinks about living alone, without identification or attachment or association, his mind is attacked by the fear of loneliness and abandonment. A non-evolved person constantly needs the validation and reassurance supplied by the "clan" to which he belongs, and the noise of the crowd that gives him a pretext not to listen to his own conscience. Most ordinary people are terrorized by silence and solitude, because they cannot bear facing the emptiness and dissatisfaction of a materialistic life. Rajasic or passionate people live in large cities just like ants and bees live in large colonies, preoccupied only by the animal requirements for survival and pleasure, by the instinct of accumulating, building, keeping themselves busy and having fun. Life in a metropolis is a constant battle, and street-savvy city people soon learn to fight to survive - to get a good seat on a crowded bus, to avoid being run down by speeding taxis and other vehicles while crossing chaotic roads, to get the best bargain on the market or in the mall, to secure the best and most lucrative and prestigious job, to avoid areas infested by muggers and drug addicts, to elude corrupt and aggressive policemen, and so on. Starting from the earliest childhood, a "city boy" (or girl) learns how to defend himself and survive in the asphalt jungle, and such skills are often sustained by the consumption of stimulants such as coffee or tea or stronger drugs, that give the "extra edge" to remain ahead of the others in the rat race. As they are over-excited by passion, city people also feel the need to consume substances that help them relax and sleep, from harmless herbal teas to strong liquors or Valium or other legal or illegal drugs. All this exacts a heavy toll on the body and mind of city folks, and creates a lot of sufferings and numbness. A sattvic person may prefer to live in a quiet place, away from the disturbance of ignorant and noisy people, and choose a residence in a natural environment decorated by nice and useful trees and plants, reservoirs of clear water, and the pleasurable chirping of the birds. He likes spacious, well lit and well aerated houses, preferably with gardens of sweet-scented flowers, where he can enjoy life in a civilized way together with his family and friends. However, Gita teaches that attachment to sattva binds the human being to material happiness through material conditions and arrangements, and therefore to rebirth in the material world. The level of suddha sattva does not depend on external circumstances but focuses on the inexhaustible inner happiness of the true Self, and therefore the yogi prefers to live alone, in order to avoid all negative and even positive disturbances to his deep meditation. When living alone, one only needs to be concerned about one's own mind, while when living among others, one needs to be always wary of the minds of others as well.

Ekaki, or "living alone", is an important rule in the practice of yoga that will be repeated again in Gita (13.11, 18.52). When a particular instruction is repeated three times, it is considered an extremely important point. This will come as a surprise to many people, who believe that ashramas and mathas are the ideal places to practice yoga, or even the "only possible/ authorized" places, and that yoga cannot be legitimately practiced anywhere else. In fact, the "gregarious" practice of yoga tends to lose its original purpose and meaning, and to shift the focus towards the "pecking order" in the chicken pen - establishing the social position and influence, or political power of each individual within the Institution or group, and to the constant comparison between one's own "performance" and the performance of other inmates that live or practice in the same group. Thus the entire situation becomes a farce, a mockery of the actual genuine spiritual life.

Granted, in Kali yuga the genuine practice of yoga is not easy, as Arjuna himself will declare in the next verses (6.33, 34). Living alone and without the support and protection of like-minded people requires a tremendous control of one's mind, that is almost impossible to attain for an ordinary person and sometimes even for advanced spiritualists. We should remember that this practice of Kriya Yoga or Dhyana Yoga is the path chosen by a sannyasi that is preparing to leave his body and therefore retires into the forest to perform austerities. Going to live into the forest means living alone, without the benefits of the support and protection and supplies that we can get in urban or semi-urban settlements. Krishna has stated at the beginning of the chapter (6.1) that the true Sannyasi and the true Yogi does not need to stick to the external trappings and rules of the description, but is characterized by the genuine renunciation that comes from the dissolution of material identifications and attachments. We can apply the same principle here. In this overcrowded world, where the demographic explosion is gradually turning forests into cities and there are hardly any isolated places any more, we can attain genuine solitude within ourselves, by dissolving our identifications and attachments to family, clan, community, nationality, and so on.

शुचौ देशे प्रतिष्ठाप्य स्थिरमासनमात्मनः । नात्युच्छ्रितं नातिनीचं चैलाजिनकुशोत्तरम् ॥ ६-११ ॥

śucau deśe pratiṣṭhāpya sthiramāsanamātmanah | nātyucchritam nātinīcam cailājīnakuśōttaram || 6-11 ||

śucau: in a clean; deśe: place/ land; pratiṣṭhāpya: settling; sthiram: permanently/ firmly; asanam: sitting place/ residence; ātmanah: oneself; na atī: not too much; ucchritam: elevated/ high; na atī: not too much; nicam: low/ under; caila: soft cloth; ajina: (deer) skin; kusa: kusa grass/ straw; uttaram: on top.

"Having established his/ her residence in a clean/ pure place, s/he should settle firmly on a seat that is neither too high nor too low, with (layers) of cloth, deerskin and kusa grass."

Sucau dese means "pure place" and applies to the environment, that must be clean and pure, characterized at least by sattva guna, if not by suddha sattva. It is extremely difficult to practice yoga among neighbors who are dirty (physically and/ or mentally) and/ or in a country where the government does not value purity and cleanliness. Big cities are not a very congenial place to practice yoga because they are necessarily dirty because of the dust, smoke, garbage and sewage produced by the daily activities aimed at physical survival. People must eat and therefore they must use toilets. The drainage from such toilets is also accompanied by the dirty water used for cleaning bodies, clothes, cooking pots, floors, streets, commercial and industrial places etc.

The simple act of walking around or traveling in vehicles raises dust and circulates various kinds of pollutants and contaminants that end in the streets - such the droppings and other bodily excretions of animals of all kinds, from birds to rats, if not of larger animals. Cooking and eliminating biodegradable garbage - such as vegetable peels, rotten or dry leaves, etc - also creates fumes, smoke and dust, and non-biodegradable garbage becomes even more persistent and noxious when we try to eliminate it. However, the production of all this garbage is inevitable and becomes more and more overwhelming when the density of the population increases. We can certainly improve the situation by applying wise policies, such as recycling and purification installations, an effective garbage disposal service, proper plumbing, de-centralization etc, but the mere number of people in any city presents a serious challenge to the purity of the place.

The need for cleanliness also applies to subtler factors, such as noise pollution (very loud noise), visual pollution (unpleasant views), and electro-magnetic pollution (excessive radiation from electrical and electronic devices and transmission lines). Social pollution consists of the presence of bad people, who have a materialistic, lusty, hostile, greedy and/ or criminally inclined mentality, that creates a negative feeling in the neighborhood. Such negative mentality also manifests in the form of prejudice, self-righteousness, arrogance, selfishness, excessive curiosity and interfering tendencies, and even other manifestations that sometimes are mistakenly considered symptoms of a "good neighborhood". All these forms of pollution depend in great measure on the type of government and civil administration of the area, as the general mass of people naturally follow the example established by the leaders (3.21). Usually in a degraded place, the government people are the most corrupt of all. A clean and pure place is where our mind can easily find peace and contentment, without feeling constantly threatened. Sacred places or places of pilgrimage are naturally surcharged with positive feelings and energy, because the people living or traveling there are inclined to a spiritual consciousness and benevolence towards all living beings. They are always graced by sacred rivers or large reservoirs that ensure sufficient clean water for the purification of the body and the mind, and usually by forests or groves where a yogi can find some peaceful solitude for meditation. This is why the stage of life where one leaves home and family to travel to holy places is called vanaprastha. This verse recommends that the asana should be comfortable and safe, so that the body will not distract us with any disturbing sensation. Again, we need to understand that the physical exercises of yoga are meant to train the body to become as inactive as possible, so that we can focus our meditation on Transcendence, which is the true purpose of yoga. The place where we are sitting should be firm and stout, so that there will be no danger of tottering or falling down. If it is too high or too low, we will also be distracted. In another sense, this can also refer to one's self-perception, meaning that we need to remain balanced and sober and not think of ourselves as too good or too bad, too high or too low, since the word asana has several meanings, including "position", "place" or "residence", although the primary meaning indicates the sitting place and the body posture.

The animal skin mentioned in Gita and shown in traditional iconography of Yogeshvara Mahadeva, for example, has the purpose to keep insects and snakes away. Such skin can be obtained from any sizeable animal - deer, tiger, lion etc - that died naturally in the forest or was killed by kshatriyas during hunting expeditions. A yogi does not need to kill anyone. An active kshatriya goes hunting for the purpose of controlling the population of dangerous wild animals that might attack people and damage the crops.

तत्रैकाग्रं मनः कृत्वा यतचित्तेन्द्रियक्रियः । उपविश्यासने युज्याद्योगमात्मविशुद्धये ॥ ६-१२ ॥

tatraikāgṛaṁ manaḥ kṛtvā yatacittendriyakriyaḥ | upaviśyāsane yujyādyogamātmaviśuddhaye || 6-12 ||

tatra: there; eka-agraṁ: strongly focusing one's attention; manaḥ: the mind; kṛtvā: making; yata-citta-indriya-kriyaḥ: practicing renunciation in one's consciousness, senses and activities/ controlling the activities of the consciousness and the senses; upaviśya: sitting; asane: in the residence/ seat/ in the body posture; yujyat: one should engage; yogam: in yoga; ātma-viśuddhaye: for the purification of oneself.

"Sitting there, s/he should carefully focus her/ his mind on the practices required for the control of the consciousness, engaging in yoga for the purification of the self."

Again, the true purpose of yoga is stated very clearly in this verse: the practice of yoga must be performed with the sole aim of purifying oneself from the contamination of material identification and attachments, through the control of the consciousness, the mind and the senses. Not once in Gita or in the genuine yoga literature it is said that yoga has the purpose of relaxing the mind or to acquire health or physical well-being. The practices required to control the mind and focus it on the meditation on the Supreme can be chosen according to the capabilities of the sādhaka. There is not one practice "one size fits all". Just as each sādhaka will feel attracted to a particular form of the Supreme - called īśa deva or "desired (form of) God" - there are also specific practices that are most suitable for the particular situation, inclination and inspiration of each sādhaka.

The expression eka-agraṁ clearly indicates that we must forget all other concerns and purposes (sankalpa, 4.19, 6.3) and abstain from all other activities. The degree of concentration of our mind will determine the swiftness and ease by which we will attain the desires result in yoga. Actually, if we want to get any good result, yoga must be a full-time occupation. In 2.41 Krishna had already warned that one should not try to think about too many things at once, because concentration will become dispersed. This especially applies to spiritual sadhana: we should concentrate on one mantra at a time, on one ista-deva at the time, on one rasa or devotional sentiment at a time. Sometimes people are afraid of neglecting some form of Godhead in favor of another, so they fill their home altars with dozens of Deities, they chant japa with many different mantras, read different shastras and recite different stutis to different Personalities of Godhead. This is not bad in itself, but the danger is to disperse one's attention and devotion by diluting them into a rather superficial homage, without actually developing a true attraction or personal relationship with any form of the Godhead. This is why Adi Shankara sang, ekam sastram devaki-putra-gitam, eko devo devaki-putra eva, eko mantras tasya namami yani, karmapy ekam tasya devasya seva - "Let there be one scripture (for all): the Gita of Krishna (the son of Devaki); let there be one Lord (for all): Krishna (the son of Devaki); let there be one mantra (for all): his (many) names; let there be one duty (for all): service to him."

Probably the most universally popular form of the Lord is Jagannatha - that appears accompanied by Balabhadra, Subhadra and Sudarshana. This form manifests the main aspects of the Godhead - Vishnu/ Krishna, Shiva and the Mother Goddess - and therefore is called the "Lord of everyone", because everyone is happy to worship Jagannatha. According to one's personal inclination, one can worship other forms or Personalities of the Godhead, even in different periods of one's lifetime, and there is no contradiction because all forms are ultimately One. As Krishna will explain in 9.23, all the various forms of ista devatas are actually different manifestations of Krishna, and not opposite or competitive Gods. To avoid the dangers of sectarianism, Adi Shankara Acharya preached that everyone should respectfully meditate on the five main forms of the Godhead - Vishnu, Shiva, Durga, Surya and Ganesha - keeping in mind that they are all strictly connected to each other. Vishnu or Narayana is the transcendental Parama Purusha that exists eternally beyond the cycles of manifestation of the material universes. Shiva is Vishnu when he descends into the material world to interact with Mother Nature. Surya is the manifestation of Vishnu/ Shiva that is visible before the eyes of everyone in this world. Adi Shakti, the Mother Goddess, takes various forms, names and activities for different purposes, and she is known respectively as Durga, Mahalakshmi, Mahasarasvati, Mahakali, Gayatri, Lalita, Lakshmi, Sarasvati, Kali, Chandi, Parvati, Bhairavi, Annapurna, Matangi, Bhumi, Siddhi, Santoshi, Sita, Radha, etc. Ganesha is the son of Shiva and Parvati, the "son of God" that represents the progress that develops from divine intervention in the world, and therefore he is remembered at the beginning of all activities, to remove the obstacles and bring auspiciousness.

This pancha devata puja, however, does not require a person to perform the same worship for all these forms of the Godhead; it is rather a dutiful act of paying respect to these great Personalities before engaging in the worship and service to one's ista devata. Thus there is no contradiction between the prescription of pancha devata puja and the exclusive devotion to Krishna shown by Adi Shankara in his famous verses: in fact, this is the true form of exclusive devotion to Krishna, because it is free from foolish offenses as it does not disrespect the other Personalities of Godhead.

समं कायशिरोग्रीवं धारयन्नचलं स्थिरः । सम्प्रेक्ष्य नासिकाग्रं स्वं दिशश्चानवलोकयन् ॥ ६-१३ ॥

samaṁ kāyaśirogrīvaṁ dhārayannacalaṁ sthiraḥ | samprekṣya nāsikāgraṁ svaṁ diśaścānavalokayan || 6-13 ||

samam: equally balanced/ straight/on the same line; kaya: the torso of the body; sira: the head; grivam: the neck; dharayan: keeping; acalam: without moving; sthira: firmly; samprekshya: looking/ fixing the eyes; nasika-agram: in front of the nose; svam: one's own; disab: (all) directions; ca: and; anavalokayan: not looking (here and there).

"Keeping the body, the head and the neck in a straight line, one should remain still, focusing one's attention in front of one's nose, without looking in any (other) direction."

The expression nasikagram does not suggest that one should twist one's eyes to try to see the tip of one's own nose or even the root of one's nose, but simply that one should avoid looking around or even watching anything that moves. The gaze should remain fixed just in front of us, either on the form that is the object of our meditation (such as a yantra, a murti, etc) or by turning our attention towards the inner contemplation. The sense of sight/ vision is a very restless instrument, and tends to jump here and there, pulling the mind behind it. If you notice, very few people have a straight gaze: most people tend to move their eyes a lot, and this usually indicates a very short attention span. By unfocusing one's gaze, the attention is removed from the contemplation of the external objects and of anything that may happen in front of oneself. This is another description of the practice called pratyahara, "withdrawing the senses from the sense objects".

Keeping head, neck and back in a straight line helps the circulation of energy within the body, easing the breathing, balancing the weight of the head and avoiding excessive strain on the spine and other bones and muscles. This enables the sadhaka to remain still for a longer time without feeling discomfort. Sitting in the padmasana ("lotus position") or sukhasana ("easy position") is the best choice for meditation, but if for some reason sitting up is problematic, one may also choose the savasana ("corpse position") that simply consists in lying down on the back, supported by a level surface that can keep head, neck and back on a straight line. In fact, this position is excellent to keep the entire body on a straight line, as mentioned in the verse. When we sit, only the torso can remain straight, while the legs and arms are necessarily bent at some degree. For a beginner or for a person who has physical problems this may slow the process of meditation because it is still a relative unstable position and the weight of the body parts can create a tension. However, when we are lying down in the savasana, gravity works in our favor, anchoring all our body parts to the ground, making relaxation easier. This position is particularly useful for astral traveling, or "out-of-body-experiences".

The word achalam, "without moving", is important because one can overcome the feeling of bodily identification more easily when the body is not attracting any attention from the mind. Bodily movements are distracting the mind as much as the feelings of discomfort, therefore they must be stopped. Ultimately, the atman consciousness must become easily detached from the bodily consciousness so that the sadhaka experiences the real nature of the Self.

प्रशान्तात्मा विगतभीर्ब्रह्मचारिव्रते स्थितः । मनः संयम्य मच्चित्तो युक्त आसीत् मत्परः ॥ ६-१४ ॥

prasāntātmā vigatabhīrbrahmacārivrate sthitaḥ | manah saṁyamya maccitto yukta āsīt matparaḥ || 6-14 ||

prasanta-atma: satisfied in oneself/ in the atman; vigata: gone; bhīr: fear; brahmachari-vrate: in the vow of brahmacharya; sthita: firmly; manah: the mind; saṁyamya: controlling/ conquering; mat-cittah: the consciousness focused on me; yukta: engaged; asita: should remain/ sit; mat-parah: dedicated to me/ devoted to me.

"Conquering fear and practicing contentment, firmly established in the brahmacharya, controlling/ engaging the mind, (one should) sit/ remain (still), connecting the consciousness with me, and contemplating me (as the goal)."

It is impossible to avoid looking here and there (disa anavalokayan) unless one has completely conquered fear, lust and greed. On the other hand, when one has realized the pure eternal existence of Brahman, and the presence of Paramatma in the hearts of all living beings and in all situations, the mind is satisfied in itself because it finds all happiness in the Atman. Thus the eyes do not feel the need to wander here and there, and the consciousness remains undisturbed and peaceful.

The brahmachari vrata, the "vow of acting as Brahman", requires a complete paradigm shift, from the bodily identification to the transcendental identity of the Atman that is exactly the same in all beings. The meaning of brahmacharya is something more than simply controlling or abstaining from sex life - it really means being able to see persons instead of men or women. It means thinking and acting on the level of Brahman, the position of transcendental spiritual realization, where all living entities are seen equally as eternal spirit souls, and we understand that their bodies are simply an outer temporary covering. When one considers all jivatmas - oneself included - as pure spirit souls, glorious and perfect manifestations of Brahman, and finds happiness in the Atman/ Brahman, there is no question of seeking sexual identification, sexual relationships or sexual pleasure. Baudhika brahmacharya (celibacy of the intellect) is a way of thinking and seeing people, considering them and treating them as the transcendental Brahman. Besides, a person who is situated on the level of Brahman realization also understands that matter (including bodies) is a product of Brahman, energy of the Supreme Lord and therefore sacred. The Lord resides in the heart of all living entities, and this makes every body a temple of the Divine.

Vacika brahmacharya (celibacy of speech) means abstaining from vulgar or sexual expressions, sexual stories, allusive remarks etc. Success in saririka brahmacharya (celibacy of body) and control of sexual energy and desire is helped by avoiding foods prepared or cooked by people who are engrossed in sex life or negative thinking or behavior, avoiding rajasic or tamasic foods (i.e. spices, excess sugar, stimulants, onion, garlic etc) and avoiding the company of materialistic people. One should also bathe regularly, wear clean clothes, and practice some specific yoga asana, pranayama and bandha exercises. Still, the sadhaka needs to work constantly to keep the mind under control (saṁyama) by engaging it in positive meditation on transcendental and divine forms, names, activities etc. The root of the word saṁyama is the same of the words yama and niyama (the abstentions and prescriptions that constitute the first step in yoga practice), but with the added meaning of "engagement", that is also intrinsic in the very definition of yoga ("union").

The expressions mat-cittah and mat-parah clearly affirm that the purpose of meditation is to concentrate one's attention on the Supreme Personality of Godhead, the "me" to whom Krishna refers. The sadhaka has now graduated from the Brahman realization to the Paramatma realization, and is realizing that Paramatma is indeed Bhagavan. Cittah indicates the consciousness or awareness, while parah indicates the dedication or priority in life. A true yogi is conscious/ aware of Krishna (as brahman, paramatma and bhagavan) and puts Krishna at the top of his priorities in life.

युञ्जन्नेवं सदात्मानं योगी नियतमानसः । शान्तिं निर्वाणपरमां मत्संस्थामधिगच्छति ॥ ६-१५ ॥

yuñjannevaṁ sadātmānaṁ yogī niyata-mānasah | śāntiṁ nirvāṇaparamāṁ matsamsthāmadhigacchati || 6-15 ||

yunjam: engaging; evam: like this; sada: always; atmanam: oneself; yogi: the yogi; niyata-manasah: having controlled the mind; santim: peace; nirvana-paramam: the supreme nirvana; mat-samstham: situated in me; adhigacchati: attains.

"Practicing/ engaged in this way (focusing) on the Atman, the yogi that has controlled/ engaged the mind attains the peace of the supreme Nirvana, abiding in me."

After indicating the consciousness of the Supreme Personality of Godhead as the goal and purpose of yoga meditation, Krishna is defining this stable consciousness as nirvana paramam, "the supreme nirvana", where the mind remains undisturbed and perfectly balanced. This balance does not need to be static: it can very well be dynamic, and in fact dynamic meditation is the next step in the yoga sadhana. The sadhaka has realized the values of yama and niyama, assimilating them through practice and habit into his regular nature. He has mastered and overcome the body through the practice of the postures and the awareness of his true identity as atman, and has regulated his breathing and his emotions through the practice of pranayama. He has learned how to detach and withdraw his senses from the sense objects through the practice of pratyahara, and to focus his attention unswervingly on the transcendental object of meditation through the practice of dharana, or passive meditation. It is now time to attain perfection in the practice of dhyana, or active meditation, that consists in raising the consciousness on a purely transcendental level, where all activities eternally exist and unfold in an unlimited present. It is common knowledge that the spiritual world, also called Vaikuntha ("without anxiety") is not subject to the limitations of time and space, but not many people have a clear realization of what this beautiful concept actually means. Vaikuntha is not a geographical place that one reaches from going from "here" to "there". There is no need for vehicles, there is even no journey required because there is no distance to cover. It's already everywhere. Similarly, its existence is not subjected to the passing of time. There is no past and no future, but only an eternal present that contains everything simultaneously. Transcendental forms are not subject to birth, growth, decay, old age, disease or death: they exist eternally and their manifestation always contains all the unlimited possible variations simultaneously.

The word yunjan means "engaging, concentrating", and is from the same root of yoga. Nirvana paramam is the "supreme Nirvana", the liberated state of deep meditation on the Supreme Self that can be attained when the mind is pacified and controlled. This supreme peace is also called moksha, or liberation. Some uninformed people translate moksha with "salvation", not realizing that such word expresses a Christian concept that is profoundly different from the Vedic concept. The expression mat-samsthan, "situated in me", refers both to the peace and nirvana, and to the consciousness of the yogi. It is a continuation of the thread mat cittab, mat parab, mat sbanam, that Krishna has described in the previous verses. But who is the "me" that Krishna is talking about? The next chapters will offer the answer to this very important question.

Some people believe that nirvana is a negative concept, that should not be used in the bhakti context, but obviously they do not give sufficient value to this verse and the other verses in Gita where Krishna teaches that nirvana is the purpose of life and equates it with Krishna Consciousness.

नात्यश्नतस्तु योगोऽस्ति न चैकान्तमनश्नतः । न चातिस्वप्नशीलस्य जाग्रतो नैव चार्जुन ॥ ६-१६ ॥

nātyāśnatastu yogo'sti na caikāntamanaśnataḥ । na cātiśvapnaśīlasya jāgrato naiva cārjuna ॥ 6-16 ॥

na-ati: not too much; asnataḥ: one who eats; tu: but; yogah: yoga; asti: there is; na: not; ca: and; ekantam: even once; anasnataḥ: one who does not eat; na: not; ca: and; ati-svapna: sleeping too much; śīlasya: one who has the habit; jāgrataḥ: one who does not sleep; na: not; eva: certainly; ca: and; arjuna: o Arjuna.

"O Arjuna, yoga is not (possible) for one who eats too much or does not eat at all, or for one who sleeps too much or does not sleep at all."

Krishna has gone a great length to clarify that the yogi must constantly meditate on the transcendental Self, Atman/ Brahman, and become detached from the body, sense organs and mind. He has also recommended the control of mind and senses, and this requires the regulation of diet and sleep as well as other life habits. However, as long as one has a material mind, senses and body, it is necessary to take care of them with adequate food and rest, especially in the earliest stages of the practice of yoga. The mind and senses are like tigers: starving or mistreating them will not help us in the taming process, but will rather create a tension that will cause more problems. We need to understand the difference between an actual need and a whimsical desire: we should not run after whimsical desires, but we should not neglect actual needs either, because a neglected need becomes repressed and inevitably transforms into some kind of obsession, that is much more dangerous especially because it usually takes different misleading and pathological forms.

Eating is the basic need for all those who have a material body - including the plants and the micro-organisms. A yogi should eat to live, not live to eat, and choose sattvic foods that are favorable to the process of yoga - simple foods that are healthy, fresh, nutritious and tasty, but cheap and easy to collect. These qualities can be found in a good vegetarian diet, especially in a society where the production of food is properly organized by applying the concepts of local subsistency farming, environmental biodiversity for cultivations, gentle organic methods for fertilizing and defending crops against pests, multiculture or permaculture, respectful and compassionate dairy farming, natural and small scale methods for food processing and preservation, and sustainable development in general. Since the practice of pranayama is meant to slow down metabolism, the yogi needs less food, but fasting should only be to decrease one's ego, not to increase it. The process of fasting helps to minimize one's needs and detach oneself from the body, and on the physical level it can be very beneficial for the purification and healing of all those diseases that are created by the accumulation of undigested food and toxins. There are many different types of fasting, and one needs to properly understand the situation of his/ her own body and mind to apply the various rules.

Some people take fasting to the extreme and even abstain from swallowing the saliva produced by their own mouth. Since it can certainly impress simple-minded people, this practice can be used to encourage the general population by demonstrating that it is actually possible to control the senses and the mind. However, such staunch performance should be handled carefully, to avoid the risk of abhimana and ahankara spoiling its results, and also to avoid the risk of artificially imposing it on persons whose body and mind are not suited for strict austerities. Forced fasting can create serious problems because the individual becomes weak physically and mentally, and can be victimized by negative emotions and thoughts. Another dangerous practice is strict fasting suddenly followed by large feasts, usually with a lot of heavy fried foods and sweets: this creates a very bad reaction both physically and mentally, and is the cause of many serious diseases.

Too much eating means eating not for the proper maintenance of body and mind, but for the pleasure of eating, a form of lust that can never be really satisfied because the mind always demands more. In today's society, food has become loaded with too much emotional and social luggage, including the artificial obsession for "good bodily shape and health". Ironically, the more one focuses on this obsession, the more the bodily identification creates negative emotions in the personality, and the more unbalanced one becomes in connection with food consumption. This also causes other and worse problems with drinking, smoking, intoxicating substances etc.

All eating disorders, from bulimia to anorexia, that is from the obsession with eating to the rejection of eating, come from the same basic distortion that charges the act of eating and the image of food with misplaced and damaging emotions, covering a wide range of issues from low self-esteem to the feeling of rejection, passive aggressiveness, emotional manipulation, self-torture, guilt, fear, etc. A yogi should never fall in such traps: as Krishna has already said in 3.27 and 5.8-9, all the activities of the body and the senses should be brought back to their basic meaning only, and not given too much importance, either positive or negative.

Similar considerations apply to the practice of jagran, a particular form of austerity that consists in keeping awake, sometimes for the entire night - a very popular tradition especially on the occasion of the celebration of Maha Shiva ratri. This "fasting from sleep" should be used carefully and sparingly, and always remembering that its purpose is the purification of the consciousness and the development of a devotional sentiment towards Isvara. Remaining awake through the night and meditating on the radiance of the Brahman, symbolized by the dipa (ghi lamp), brings the light of Knowledge into the darkness of material consciousness, and enables us to experience the feeling of freedom from the bodily limitations. This purpose is best served by actively engaging body, senses and mind in a favorable service to God - by singing bhajans, by watching religious re-enactments, by making garlands for the Deity, by performing active worship, by cooking food to be offered as prasada, and so on.

युक्ताहारविहारस्य युक्तचेष्टस्य कर्मसु । युक्तस्वप्नावबोधस्य योगो भवति दुःखहा ॥ ६-१७ ॥

yuktāhāravihārasya yuktaceṣṭasya karmasu । yuktasvapnāvabodhasya yogo bhavati duḥkhaḥ ॥ 6-17 ॥

yukta-ahara: (one who) eats according to the yoga; viharasya: one who moves around; yukta-cestasya: one who makes regulated efforts; karmasu: in activities/ duties; yukta-svapna-avabodhasya: one who is regulated in sleeping and keeping awake; yogab: yoga; bhavati: becomes; duḥkha-ha: destroying sufferings.

"For one who consciously controls his food intake, who is controlled in moving around, who makes controlled efforts in working/ performing one's duties, and is regulated in sleeping/ dreaming and keeping vigil, yoga becomes the destroyer of sufferings."

The key word in this verse is yukta, "connected". All our actions should be performed in connection to the practice of yoga, with consideration for the higher purpose of the human opportunity of life. This means that intelligence, or the proper awareness, should govern all our activities and choices. Eating, moving around, working and sleeping are basic activities that cannot be neglected, because they are required to maintain one's body (3.8). Other activities, such as mating and defending, that are instinctive and prominent in the lower species of life, can be minimized on the level of the human form of life and especially through the practice of yoga. In fact, a yogi that has realized Brahman and Paramatma becomes situated on a higher level of awareness, where mating and defending are not required any more and even appear to be delusional behaviors. However, eating remains a basic need and manifests in many ways, including the need for water, air, solar light, and even food for thought and food for the soul. A yogi can shift the focus of the act of eating towards sattvic and transcendental (prasadam) foods, or even towards subtler dimensions such as the absorption of pranic energy or spiritual energy. However, this act of nourishment remains a necessity.

The word viharasya, that refers to the "moving around" of the sadhaka, is sometimes translated as "recreation" as in the natural desire to enjoy pleasant walks or journeys to beautiful and interesting places. One may travel for pleasure or for business, or decide to move to some other place for a better life, or to embark in a knowledge quest, or to engage in a teaching/ preaching tour. However everybody needs to move around - from the commuting worker in the industrialized metro city to the tourist seeking an exciting experience in places never seen before, from the homeless vagabond to the traveling salesman, from the political refugee to the exchange student, from the sannyasi that wanders to collect alms for mere survival, to the rishi that walks through the virtuous forest to gather fruits and flowers for the worship of God. Whether such traveling covers thousands of kilometers or just few meters from a bed to a computer desk, or even switching from one TV channel to another, this "moving around" implies a choice, an impetus for action, a need for change.

The subsequent word, cestasya, that refers to "making efforts", is strictly connected to the idea of "moving around". All progressive actions require an effort, therefore we should consider this definition as referring to karmasu, "in the actions", covering all positive, useful and dutiful activities (karma as opposed to vikarma). One should therefore make sincere efforts to perform one's duties according to one's particular position, whether these apply to the daily care of one's body and its extensions (clothing, personal items, living quarters, family, etc), to the sacred service to society and occupational responsibilities, to the higher engagement in personal growth and self-improvement, to the acquisition of knowledge, or to the overcoming of material conditionings and identifications. All such efforts must be balanced and consciously monitored so that they can harmoniously and effectively support our own progress and the progress of others - always remembering the actual purpose of life and work.

As we have already elaborated, the regulation of sleeping and dreaming is also required. A yogi has learned to control the mind, and this enables him to enjoy timely and peaceful sleep, for the purpose of restoring the proper functionality of body and mind. Both excessive sleep and sleeplessness are caused by the improper engagement of the mind that remains connected to the wrong thoughts and emotions, such as fear, anxiety, agitation, depression, etc. In all his/ her activities and choices, a yogi is always conscious and careful, and makes sure that the valuable opportunity of human life is utilized in the best possible way - for even one minute of time is extremely important. This anyartha kalatvam, the utmost attention to every single action and every single moment, is the key to the progress in consciousness.

यदा विनियतं चित्तमात्मन्येवावतिष्ठते । निःस्पृहः सर्वकामेभ्यो युक्त इत्युच्यते तदा ॥ ६-१८ ॥

yadā viniyataṁ cittamātmānyevāvatiṣṭhate | niḥspṛhaḥ sarvakāmebhyo yukta ityucyate tadā || 6-18 ||

yada: when; vinitayam: controlled; cittam: consciousness; atmani: on the Atman; eva: certainly/ only; avatiṣṭhate: remains; niṣpṛihah: devoid/ detached; sarva-kamebhyah: for all desired things; yuktah: engaged (in yoga); iti: like this; ucyate: it is said; tada: then.

"When the consciousness is trained to focus firmly on the Atman, free from the desire for the various types of sense pleasures, it is said to be (properly) engaged (in yoga)."

This verse describes the ultimate step in the practice of yoga, called samadhi or "constant spiritual awareness". When the consciousness (citta) is actually fixed in the supreme Nirvana, it becomes completely detached from the sense objects that continue to revolve in the material world. This is the true position of a yogi. Anyone who claims to be teaching yoga must be instantly recognizable for his/ her constant concentration and awareness of the Transcendental Reality, as Gita has been explaining in all these chapters. A yogi - what to speak of a yoga teacher - must treat all living beings as Atman/ Brahman, without making any distinctions on the basis of the body such as color, family of origin, nationality, financial situation, position in society etc. The intelligence, mind and senses of the genuine yogi are deeply immersed in the contemplation of transcendental happiness and therefore have no interest in pursuing any other sankalpa or determination to act to obtain some personal result. There is no more karta, no more arambhah, no more sankalpa, no more duality related to time and space and separation, which are all illusions of maya. The only reality is the permanent nature of the Atman/ Brahman, and the harmonization of the Atman with the Brahman, the individual intelligence with the supreme intelligence. The body continues to perform the required duties assigned on the basis of qualities and tendencies and position, but their routine performance is automatic, especially when the subconscious has been properly integrated and harmonized with the conscious and superconscious for the attainment of the main purpose of life.

The proper performance of duties is not necessarily impaired by this different awareness and shift of priorities; rather it may even be improved because of the absence of selfish motivations and inner conflicts. The best practical example is offered by the behavior of the gopis of Vrindavana that were ecstatically in love with the wonderful Krishna. Day and night they kept thinking about him, but because their sweet love was a private secret, externally they were very careful to perform all their duties properly, so that nobody suspected something else was going on. We should not think that the gopis' relationship with Krishna is/ was a merely material romantic affair - in fact it is highly symbolic of this most intimate meditation of the jivatma that contemplates the param atman at the highest level of yoga.

यथा दीपो निवातस्थो नेङ्गते सोपमा स्मृता । योगिनो यतचित्तस्य युञ्जतो योगमात्मनः ॥ ६-१९ ॥

yathā dīpo nivāstho neṅgate sopamā smṛtā | yogino yatacittasya yuñjato yogamātmānaḥ || 6-19 ||

yatha: just like; dīpah: a lamp; nivata-sthah: remaining/ in a place without wind; na: not; ingate: waver/ flicker; sa: that; upama: comparison; smṛita: remembered/ considered; yoginah: a yogi; yata-cittasya: one who has controlled the mind/ whose mind is renounced; yuñjatah: engaged; yogam: in yoga; atmanah: the Atman/ Self.

"Just like the flame of a lamp remains stable when there is no wind, the controlled mind of the yogi does not flicker - this is the comparison given for one who is engaged in the meditation on the Atman."

This verse contains the most famous definition of nirvana, the state of mind where all restlessness and fluctuations have been calmed down and the radiant light of the Atman can illuminate the consciousness without distraction or obstruction. Nivata is the attribute of the position, while nirvana is the position itself. In the absence of wind, the flame of the lamp does not stop burning, rather it burns better, in a steadier and more radiant way.

Another famous example is the crystal clear water of a small lake or pond, where there is no disturbance and therefore all the mud and sand has settled to the bottom, allowing a perfect purity and vision. Patanjali's Yoga sutras also define this blissful and enlightened state in the first verses of the samadhi pada (1.2, 3): yogah citta-vṛitti-nirodhaḥ ("Yoga is the cessation of the fluctuations in the mind") and tada drastuh svarupe avasthanam ("then the seer is established in his real form/nature"). Again, the purpose of yoga is highlighted here as the pure and firm contemplation of the Supreme Self as Transcendental Reality through a controlled mind. Without any doubt, Bhagavad gita is the most authoritative and specific text about yoga, also considering that this definition appears in the original verses a great number of times.

Some people believe that nirvikalpa samadhi means that one should meditate on a void. This is incorrect. There is no point in meditating on a void, especially considering that a void does not exist, by definition. There is not a single spot in the entire universe, or in the spiritual world, where we can find a "void". We can find ethereal space, we can find planetary space (antariksha), but there is no void. By definition, a void is something that does not exist, the absence of all existence. It is impossible to "meditate" on nothingness. The misconception of "void meditation" derives from some half-baked and badly digested concept of Brahman that is described as devoid of material qualities. Naturally a person who can only think in terms of material existence will conclude that something without material qualities simply does not exist, and therefore it is "a void". But this is not confirmed in any scripture. Rather, Brahman is the supreme existence (18.54), the source of all existences and qualities, characterized by perfect sat (eternity), cit (consciousness) and ananda (happiness). How can something like that be "a void"?

Nonsense. Therefore the traditional scriptures state that only a brahmana, "one who actually knows Brahman" (brahmana brahma janati), is qualified and authorized to teach and guide others on the path of yoga and spiritual realization.

यत्रोपरमते चित्तं निरुद्धं योगसेवया । यत्र चैवात्मनात्मानं पश्यन्नात्मनि तुष्यति ॥ ६-२० ॥

yatroparamate cittam niruddham yogasevayā | yatra caivātmanātmānam paśyannātmani tuṣyati || 6-20 ||

yatra: there/ in that situation/ when; uparamate: becomes withdrawn; cittam: consciousness/ awareness; niruddham: restrained; yoga-sevaya: by engaging in the service of yoga; yatra: there; ca: and; eva: certainly; atmana: by oneself; atmanam: the Atman; paśyan: seeing; atmani: in the self; tushyati: becomes satisfied.

"When the consciousness becomes quiet because of the cessation (of the wavering) by engagement/ service in yoga, then one becomes satisfied in the Self by contemplating the Atman within the self."

Krishna continues to describe the stage of samadhi, or steady contemplation that becomes natural and spontaneous to the yogi. The expression yatra eva means "just then", and draws the line between the preparatory training and the actual constant position of yoga. It is said that there are two types of samadhi - called samprajnata or "endowed with knowledge, reasoning, discrimination" and asamprajnata, where we find the cessation of all mental activities and the transcendental consciousness that is beyond the mental level. It is said that in this chapter, verses from 1 to 20 describe the samprajnata samadhi, while verses from 20 to 25 speak of the asamprajnata samadhi. We must be very careful to understand this point properly. Many people mistakenly think that "cessation of all mental activities" implies the mindless behavior typical of the fools, by which one acts whimsically and stupidly, often under the manipulation of others. This is still the mental level, as all whims, even the unconscious ones, are created by the restlessness of the mind. There is still a lot of mental activity going on: simply, the consciousness remains unaware of it, because it is clouded by the darkness of ignorance.

The human beings that live on this planet, called martyaloka, are generally characterized by the influence of passion or rajas. They have strong desires and work to satisfy the impulses of their mind and senses, and as already described by Krishna (2.61-63, 3.36, 3.38, 5.23, 5.26) such lusty and greedy activities are also accompanied by the anger rising from personal frustration. Especially in Kali yuga, the general tendency of the human beings is to slide down from rajas to tamas, when frustration and depression follow the discharge of selfish anger. Tamas is characterized by a state of ignorance and oblivion, in which the mind is not functioning properly, and that is demonstrated in practice by the innumerable individuals that we call fools or idiots. In a sense, this is also a state of mindlessness, but the apparent bliss that results from such stillness of the mind is degrading the individual towards the lower species of life, such as animals, plants and even less intelligent creatures.

Through one's sincere efforts and under the expert guidance of a qualified teacher, an individual can rise from rajas to the platform of sattva, where the restlessness of the mind is pacified with a totally different type of happiness, enlightened by knowledge and understanding of the true nature of the world. On this platform of sattva, the mind works beautifully and for the benefit of the individual and the collectivity, producing beneficial and pleasing creations that inspire noble thoughts and emotions. When this happy and luminous state of material sattva has purified the consciousness and is sustaining the individual's search for the transcendental knowledge, the actual realization of the transcendental nature of the Self raises the awareness beyond the mind, taking it to the level of direct perception of Reality that is described as darshana. This is the level suggested in this verse by the word paśyan - "seeing, having direct experience" as in darshana. The Rishis are those who "see" directly the tattva, through the transcendental spiritual intelligence, and therefore the knowledge they explain can correctly be described as "revealed".

Again, we should be very careful about cultural superimpositions. Abrahamic faiths claim to be "revealed religions" in the sense that their prophets say they have received their scriptures directly and personally from God, who chose them specifically as his representatives and gave them the monopoly on religion. The Revelation in the dharmic tradition is a totally different concept. Anyone can and should aspire to individual Revelation, through the purification of the consciousness from material identifications and attachments, and the contemplation of the inherent divine nature of the Self. The teacher is not a "savior", but only a guide, and each individual is responsible of his/ her own Self realization and enlightenment. This same concept is found also in the original Buddhism. Enlightenment or revelation is something that is completely natural and pre-existing in all human beings. We do not need to "be saved from our negative nature" by some exclusive divine intervention, and therefore there is no question of allegiance to a particular religious hierarchy or even to a particular form of God.

The expression yoga sevaya in this verse is interesting because it introduces the concept of transcendental service in the practice of yoga. One should become a worshiper and servant of yoga as the expression of the highest consciousness of Reality. Considering yoga as a method to be "utilized" like an instrument to attain some selfish material goal is therefore condemned.

सुखमात्यन्तिकं यत्तद् बुद्धिग्राह्यमतीन्द्रियम् । वेत्ति यत्र न चैवायं स्थितश्चलति तत्त्वतः ॥ ६-२१ ॥

sukhamātyantikam yattad buddhigrāhyamatindriyam | vetti yatra na caivāyam sthitaścalati tattvataḥ || 6-21 ||

sukham: happiness; atyantikam: endless/ unlimited; yat: which; tat: that; buddhi-grahyam: can be grasped by intelligence; atindriyam: beyond the senses; vetti: you should know; yatra: there/ at that time/ in that situation; na: not; ca: and; eva: certainly; ayam: that; sthitah: situated; calati: moves; tattvataḥ: truly.

"In this absolute state of happiness that can be grasped by the intellect but is beyond the reach of the senses, one certainly knows that he is firmly situated in the truth and does not move away."

This verse continues to elaborate on the need to rise above the mental platform, to the transcendental state of consciousness known as nirvana. In this verse, one of the most important words is calati, that means "moves away, move astray"; the expression is na eva calati, "certainly does not move away". The soul's awareness does not move any more because it has finally found the perfection of happiness and engagement that everybody is seeking, a perfection that is not disturbed by external circumstances. Also, the genuine realization of Atman/ Brahman dissipates the illusory limitations of time and space, and therefore there is really no place or time to "go away" to, there is no other reality to observe, there is no other purpose to attain.

Another very important word is atindriyam, "beyond the senses". By definition, Transcendence is what is beyond the gross material existence, and therefore it cannot be perceived by the material senses, including the mind (usually considered the "sixth sense"). However, it is possible for us to perceive Transcendence or Tattva by using our intelligence. Buddhi, intelligence, is a bridge between the material world and the spiritual world, and from the very beginning Krishna has already amply recommended (2.39, 2.44, 2.49-53, 2.65-66, 3.1, 4.18, 5.20) that we should engage in Buddhi Yoga, employing our intelligence to comprehend the spiritual nature of Transcendence. Again in the next chapters Krishna will reiterate the concept.

In verse 3.42 we learned that "the senses are superior (to this angry lust/ to dull matter), and the mind is superior to the senses. Intelligence is superior to the mind, and he (the soul) is superior to the intellect." In our daily experience we see that what cannot be perceived by the senses can still be perceived by intelligence through the observation of its symptoms. For example we can perceive the existence of the air by watching the leaves of a tree move in the breeze, or the dust raised by a windstorm. We do not see the air or the wind itself, but we can perceive its existence and movements by its results. Similarly, our senses cannot perceive the mind - even our own mind - but our intelligence can directly show us its existence and functions in the form of thoughts and emotions and impressions or feelings. When it has been sufficiently purified, intelligence can even perceive the soul or Atman/ Brahman, and the functions of this Transcendental Existence, observed as sat cit and ananda, "eternal existence, awareness and happiness". These three functions are ultimately the conscious or unconscious goal of all living beings: everyone wants to continue existing forever, everybody wants to know or to be aware, and everybody wants to be happy. While our senses and mind may try to convince us to pursue these three supreme functions through the contact with material objects, intelligence can lead us beyond this delusional idea and enable us to perceive the true Reality, where the real happiness is found.

यं लब्ध्वा चापरं लाभं मन्यते नाधिकं ततः । यस्मिन्स्थितो न दुःखेन गुरुणापि विचाल्यते ॥ ६-२२ ॥

yaṁ labdhvā cāparam lābham manyate nādhikam tataḥ | yasminsthito na duḥkhena guruṇāpi vicālyate || 6-22 ||

yaṁ: that which; labdhvā: by obtaining; cā: and; aparam: something else; labham: attainment; manyate: thinks/ considers; nā: not; adhikam: other; tataḥ: than that; yasmin: in which; sthitaḥ: situated; na: not; duḥkhena: by sufferings; guruṇa: very heavy/ great; api: even; vicālyate: is moved/ disturbed.

"One who has obtained this (position) does not take into consideration/ feel the need for any further acquisition, and once established there, he does not become shaken even by severe sufferings."

As we were mentioning in the previous verse, the consciousness that has found the unlimited and inexhaustible happiness of the Atman/ Brahman does not move away or astray because intelligence shows that there is nothing that remains to be attained. Krishna had already explained this perfect state of happiness and contentment in the Self while speaking of himself and of the elf-realized soul in general. The verses in this regard are the following: na me parthasti kartavyam trishu lokeshu kiñcana, nanavaṇam avartavyam varta eva ca karmani, "O son of Pritha, in all the three worlds there is nothing that I need to do or that I want to obtain, yet I also engage in activities" (3.22) and yas tv atma-ratir eva syad atma-triptas ca manavaḥ, atmany eva ca santushtas tasya karyam na vidyate, "A human being who loves the Self certainly becomes satisfied in the Self and peaceful within the Self: for such a person there is no need to perform any action" (3.17). Krishna has also stated that Self realization gives the highest pleasure: "In this world there is nothing as pure as knowledge. One who achieves perfection in yoga comes to find full happiness in the Self in the course of time" (4.38), "Unattached to the contact with the external things, s/he finds happiness in the pleasure of the Self. Such a person is engaged in Brahma yoga, and enjoys inexhaustible happiness. One who here (in this life/ body), before becoming liberated from the body, is capable of withstanding the onslaughts of lust and anger, is a yogi and a happy human being" (5.21, 23). For one who has attained this state of being, nothing else remains to be attained. This verse repeats that a liberated soul that has obtained the awareness of Transcendence is not disturbed or shaken by external circumstances, even in case of extreme difficulties or sufferings. Naturally, the body and the mind will perceive the suffering and may even become seriously impaired by it, but the pure consciousness always remains fixed on the contemplation of Reality, and does not move away from the perfection of realization. In the next chapters Krishna will continue to explain that such transcendental position of consciousness is never lost, and the liberated soul will never return again to the material delusion.

तं विद्याद् दुःखसंयोगवियोगं योगसंज्ञितम् । स निश्चयेन योक्तव्यो योगोऽनिर्विण्णचेतसा ॥ ६-२३ ॥

taṁ vidyād duḥkhasamyogaviyogaṁ yogasañjñitam | sa niścayena yuktavyo yogo'nirviṇṇacetasā || 6-23 ||

taṁ: that; vidyāt: you should know; duḥkha: suffering; samyoga: contact; viyogaṁ: absence of contact; yoga-sañjñitam: understanding of yoga; sab: he; niścayena: with perseverance; yuktavyaḥ: should engage in; yogaḥ: yoga; anirvinna: not depressed; chetasā: consciousness.

"This should be known as the absorption in yoga that liberates from all contacts with suffering; that is undoubtedly the yoga system that must be practiced without deviation/ without getting discouraged."

In verse 5.22 Krishna explained that the source of suffering is due to the contact with the material sense objects that are limited by time and transformation, and therefore can only give a temporary pleasure. The applied science of yoga enables us to become detached from such illusion, and to perceive the true satisfaction and happiness that derives from the Atman, or spiritual Self. So, to continue the thread of discussion from the previous verse, a yogi that finds himself in the face of material difficulties is not confused, and by remaining detached he can quickly find relief and enjoy real freedom from all conditionings. Physical diseases and difficulties can only affect the body and the mind, not the original consciousness of the soul. When the consciousness is correctly identified with the soul, it remains constantly focused, beyond the states that appear in the ordinary mind: the state of wakefulness, the state of dreaming and the state of deep sleep. Beyond these, there is a "super-conscious" state called turiya that is our real nature. Joys and sorrows come and go like the seasons (2.14) and the yogi learns to tolerate them, knowing that they will soon disappear. Therefore the yogi remains free from depression (anirvinna) even when attacked by sorrows and sadness and various kinds of problems. This is the true understanding (samjñitam) of yoga. Some people interpret this verse to mean that the physical practice of asana and pranayama, and the relaxation of the mind they call "meditation", are meant to prevent and eliminate all the sufferings caused by diseases, old age and death in order to engage in sense gratification without interruption or obstacles, but this is not possible. Of course it is possible to improve one's health and slow down the process of aging, but it is not possible to stop disease and death completely, and an increased attachment to the material body will create more sufferings in the next lifetime. The purpose of yoga is to detach ourselves from the body.

सङ्कल्पप्रभवान्कामास्त्यक्त्वा सर्वानशेषतः । मनसैवेन्द्रियग्रामं विनियम्य समन्ततः ॥ ६-२४ ॥

saṅkalpaprabhavāṅkāmaṁstyaktvā sarvānaśeṣataḥ | manasaivendriyagrāmaṁ viniyamya samantataḥ || 6-24 ||

sankalpa: imagination; prabhavan: generated by; kaman: desires; tyaktva: giving up; sarvan: all; aseshatah: completely; manasa: by the mind; eva: certainly; indriya-gramam: all the senses; viniyamya: regulating; samantatah: from all sides.

"Completely abandoning all the desires/ plans arisen from the mental processes, (one should) control the mind and all the senses by regulating them from every side."

A very important word in this verse is sankalpa. In verses 4.19 and 6.4 we have already seen that the yogi needs to overcome and bandon all sankalpa, or intentions, plans and desires. This does not mean that his professional duties, family duties or religious duties should be performed haphazardly or mindlessly, without the proper planning and organization. It means that the Self-realized yogi does not identify with the ahankara and mamatva any more, and therefore he is ready to follow God's plan and to accept whatever comes his way. He knows that the Supreme Purusha is the supreme consciousness and the supreme intelligence, and that everything that happens has a part in the greater plan. A materialist is always full of selfish plans. He wants to expand his ego and achieve material happiness through the mirage of success in this world, and his mind is constantly elaborating and scheming, teeming with so many different purposes. On the other hand, a yogi simply performs his duties according to the capabilities - guna and karma - of his present body and mind, and follows the prescribed methods that have been explained in the scriptures and by the great acharyas. Both the knowledge of the material world and the knowledge of the spiritual world have already been presented by the great rishis, and there is ample information and description that we can effectively utilize for the benefit of the individual and society at large. We do not need to reinvent the wheel every morning. This does not mean that we should not try to study and understand reality through a direct observation and research. It means that we should first study the information and explanations that have been compiled by the great personalities of the past, before venturing into unnecessary new mental speculations. For example: everybody can understand that, in order to become a good mathematician, one needs to go to school, starting from the primary classes, and learn whatever knowledge has already been explained and collected by previous mathematicians. Only after having learned correctly all the existing material, we can start creating new equations and theorems, expand and elaborate on the previous ones, and so on. Some people believe that spirituality or metaphysics are abstract and subjective ideas, and therefore all opinions are valid. This is really foolish. Metaphysics or spirituality is a precise science that can and should be verified objectively. Some people interpret this verse to state the necessity of the passage from the samprajnata samadhi ("meditation with mental processes") also called savichara and savitarka, to the asamprajnata samadhi ("meditation without mental processes"), where vichara ("research") and vitarka ("discussion") are absent. However, we need to make a distinction between what is required for our own mind at an initial or intermediate stage of meditation, and what is required for our preaching mission. Without this distinction, we would never have received any teachings from Krishna or the great acharyas or the Vedic scriptures (including Patanjali etc) - or we would be expected to believe that Krishna, the great acharyas and the great Rishis were merely situated on the "inferior" level of samprajnata samadhi.

शनैः शनैरुपरमेद् बुद्ध्या धृतिगृहीतया । आत्मसंस्थं मनः कृत्वा न किञ्चिदपि चिन्तयेत् ॥ ६-२५ ॥

śanaiḥ śanairuparamed buddhyā dhṛti-gṛhītayā | ātmasaṁsthāṁ manaḥ kṛtvā na kiñcidapi cintayet || 6-25 ||

sanaiḥ: gradually; sanaiḥ: gradually; uparamet: one should withdraw/ abstain; buddhya: by the intelligence; dhṛiti: with steadiness; gṛhītayā: accepting; atma-samsthān: situated in the Atman; manah: the mind; kṛtvā: doing; na: not; kiñcid: anything; api: even; cintayet: should think/ worry about.

"Gradually withdrawing (from external things) by the use of intelligence, with a determined effort, one should fix the mind in the Self/ Atman and stop worrying/ thinking about everything else."

The use of intelligence is a key factor in the proper practice of yoga. Blind following of rules or methods, or even concepts, is not the proper way to proceed. In all circumstances, we must allow ourselves to be guided in our choices and actions by the superior power of intelligence and good sense that comes directly from the soul and the Supreme Soul. The first application of intelligence is to understand that we must proceed gradually. Gradually does not necessarily mean slow. We can also proceed quickly, but things must be done gradually, as in all new exercises. When we start some physical training, intelligence tells us that we must first attempt easy and brief exercises, then upgrade to some exercises that require a little more effort and strength, and so on. If on the first day of our jogging training we attempt to run a marathon of many kilometers within a short span of time, we will unnecessarily face great difficulties and almost invariably we will fail. We may even suffer physical damage that will prevent us from actually engaging in a proper training for a long time.

Withdrawing from external things should be done gradually, in a natural and spontaneous way, without artificially forcing the mind, the senses and the body into premature renunciation. Yoga is not about following strict rules of abstinence or making efforts to practice difficult exercises, but about training the mind, the senses and the body to become regulated and controlled. Dhriti, determination, should also be controlled and engaged by intelligence. Without intelligence, it becomes blind stubbornness, obstinate resistance to progress, and foolish prejudice. The expression atma samsthan manah krtva indicates a conscious effort to keep the mind focused on the Atman. Of course intelligence will tell us that this Atman or self is not the material identification, the separatist selfishness and egotism that motivates the ignorant and foolish people. Again, na kincid api cintayet ("never worry about anything") is a basic rule that must be applied with intelligence. A realized yogi is always aware that everything happens according to a divine plan, under the direction of the supreme intelligence, and that all opportunities can be utilized for progress.

This certainly does not mean that he will carelessly neglect the considerations about cause and effect - he will still look both sides when he is going to cross a road, and pick up the umbrella if the sky becomes cloudy. But this is not worrying, it is responsible thinking.

यतो यतो निश्चरति मनश्चञ्चलमस्थिरम् । ततस्ततो नियम्यैतदात्मन्येव वशं नयेत् ॥ ६-२६ ॥

yato yato niścarati manaścañcalamasthiram । tatastato niyamya itadātmanyeva vaśam nayet ॥ 6-26 ॥

yatah yatah: due to whatever/ wherever/ whenever; niścalati: it strays; manah: the mind; cañcalam: restless; asthiram: unsteady; tatah: there/ then; niyamya: by regulating; etat: this; atman: in the Atman; eva: certainly; vaśam: under control; mayet: must bring.

"The mind is unsteady and impatient to wander around. Every time/ wherever it runs off, one should bring it back under control, and regulate it so that it remains controlled in/ by the Self/ Atman."

Controlling the senses might be relatively easy, but controlling the mind is much more difficult. The nature of the mind is very restless, as Arjuna will clearly say later in the chapter (6.34, cañcalam hi manah kṛṣṇaḥ). This is why the process of yoga requires patience, enthusiasm and determination. Controlling one's mind is not much different from controlling one's small children: a young child is naturally restless and curious about everything, often asking for things - even impossible or non-beneficial things - and jumping from one interest to another when it becomes bored. We cannot fulfill all the requests of small children, yet we should not become angry or mistreat them. Every time they run off in a playful and curious spirit, we need to watch over them and go get them back when they start getting into trouble, before things become serious. Gently but firmly, we need to attract their attention again and again on the task they need to perform for their training, such as doing their homework, eating the proper food, taking bath, etc. Similarly, we need to take care of our mind with the patient, tolerant but firm attitude of a good parent. Our "inner child" needs to play sometimes, but every time it engages in dangerous activities we need to bring it back to a safe place and offer a better engagement, that will give greater happiness (param dṛṣṭva nivartate, 2.59). Some believe that small children should be punished - beaten with a stick in the morning and with a shoe in the night - but this drastic action should be applied only when the mind has become spoiled and arrogant, especially the mind that has developed the false ego of being a great guru, a great devotee, a great scholar, a great brahmin, a great leader etc. When the mind is sweet and humble, and innocently desires a little fun and pleasure, beating it with a stick and with a shoe will turn it into a repressed psychotic pervert, that distorts the healthy and natural attraction for happiness and love into a hunger for power and even into cruelty and callousness. Not much of a spiritual progress.

प्रशान्तमनसं ह्येनं योगिनं सुखमुत्तमम् । उपैति शान्तरजसं ब्रह्मभूतमकल्मषम् ॥ ६-२७ ॥

prasāntamanasaṁ hyeṇaṁ yoginaṁ sukhamuttamaṁ । upaiti śāntarajasaṁ brahmaphūtamakalmaṣam ॥ 6-27 ॥

prasanta: peaceful; manasaṁ: in the mind; hi: certainly; enaṁ: this; yoginaṁ: among the yogis; sukham: happiness; uttamaṁ: supreme; upaiti: attains; śānta-rajasaṁ: having pacified the passion; brahma-bhūtam: the existence of Brahman; akalmaṣam: free from all contamination.

"Certainly s/he among the yogis who has perfectly pacified the mind can attain the highest happiness. (Thus) having attained the pacification of passion, s/he becomes situated on the transcendental existence and becomes (totally) purified."

The expression hi enam yoginam, "only this (among) the yogis" suggests that many people practice yoga on various levels and with different degrees of success. Later on in Gita (7.3) Krishna will state, "Out of many thousands of human beings, only a few strive for perfection, and among all those who are engaged (on this path) and have achieved perfection, only a few know me in truth."

A peaceful mind, that finds satisfaction in the Atman/ Brahman, is the greatest wealth a human being can attain, and gives true happiness - that kind of happiness that is unlimited, inexhaustible and undisturbed by any circumstance. What needs to be pacified within the mind? The restlessness of the mind is due to the guna or material mode of passion, called rajas. When this natural tendency of the mind has been pacified by the predominance of the guna or material mode of goodness, called sattva, the mind becomes able to remain peaceful long enough to contemplate and realize the Transcendental Reality. At this point the material guna of sattva becomes purified and spiritualized, and is called suddha sattva. How to bring the predominance of sattva over rajas in your mind? By following the yama and niyama prescriptions that constitute the preliminary foundations of yoga that refer to food consumption and other basic life habits. In later chapters, especially in chapter 14, Krishna will speak more about the characteristics of the various gunas and how to utilize them.

The expression brahma bhuta means "the existence/ condition/ being of Brahman" and refers to the direct awareness of the transcendental nature of our existence that has already been called brahma nirvanam (2.72, 5.24-26). This state of transcendental awareness will be presented again at the conclusion of Krishna's teachings in Gita (18.54, brahma bhuta prasannatma) to highlight, yet again, the fundamental importance of Brahman realization, on which true bhakti can be built. Again, as we have already mentioned, we need to repeat that one cannot realize Bhagavan without having truly understood and realized Brahman.

The word akalmasam refers to the contamination consisting of material identifications, attachment and desires. Life on the level of pure Brahman realization (brahma bhuta) is naturally free from all contaminations and material impurities.

युञ्जन्नेवं सदात्मानं योगी विगतकल्मषः । सुखेन ब्रह्मसंस्पर्शमत्यन्तं सुखमश्नुते ॥ ६-२८ ॥

yunjannevaṁ sadātmanam yogi vigatakalmashaḥ | sukhena brahmasaṁsparśamatyantam sukhamaśnute || 6-28 ||

yunjan: engaging; evam: like this; sada: always; atmanam: in the Atman; yogi: the yogi; vigata-kalmashah: all contamination gone; sukhena: in happiness/ easily; brahma-saṁsparśam: in contact with Brahman; atyantam: unlimited; sukham: happiness; asnute: attains.

"Concentrating always on the Atman/ Self, the yogi who has become free from all contaminations attains the highest happiness because s/he easily remains in contact/ connected with the Brahman."

This verse repeats the message of the previous two verses. Krishna wants to make sure that the crucially important point is well understood: the true purpose of yoga is life on the level of pure transcendental awareness, free from all contaminations, characterized by the supreme happiness and satisfaction. The happiness of Brahman, also called brahmananda, is different from the pleasure or happiness on the material level that is based on the contact between the senses and the sense objects.

Brahmananda is experienced in the contact with Brahman, and since Brahman is everywhere - we are Brahman, too - it cannot be interrupted at any time. The word samsparsam, "in contact with", is used here as the alternative to the sparsa, or "contact" that according to materialists is supposed to give happiness by touching the objects of the sense with the senses. Since Brahman is spiritual and transcendental, such contact belongs to a category that is completely different from gross sense gratification. Again, here the most important point is the consciousness. A Self-realized soul perceives the Brahman in himself and in all other things, without dualistic distinctions based on the body, on time and space, and therefore the happiness of contact is never interrupted.

सर्वभूतस्थमात्मानं सर्वभूतानि चात्मनि । ईक्षते योगयुक्तात्मा सर्वत्र समदर्शनः ॥ ६-२९ ॥

sarvabhūtasthamātmānam sarvabhūtāni cātmani | ikṣate yogayuktātmā sarvatra samadarśanaḥ || 6-29 ||

sarva-bhuta-stham: that remains in all living beings/ in all existences; atmanam: the atman; sarva-bhutan: all living beings/ all existences; ca: and; atmani: in the atman; ikṣhyate: sees; yoga-yukta-atma: one who is engaged in yoga; sarvatra: everywhere; samadarśanaḥ: with equanimity.

"One who is connected through yoga contemplates the Atman that is situated in all living entities/ states of existence and all the living entities/ existences as situated in the Atman, therefore s/he is equally disposed towards everyone/ everything."

The Atman or Self engaged in yoga (yoga-yukta-atma) is connected to the entire Reality that is gradually realized as Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. When we speak of "engagement" or "connection", that is the basic meaning of the word yoga, this concept necessarily implies a greater Reality to which we are connected, and to whose service we are engaged. The meaning of this verse is confirmed in other passages of Gita, for example in 5.18 (vidya vinaya sampanne), 15.15 (sarvasya caham bridi sannivisto) and 18.61 (isvarah sarva bhutanam brd dese 'rjuna tisthati). The expression sarva bhuta means "all the states of being", referring not only to "all the living entities" but also to all forms of existence, including the various types of situations that we can experience in our life. This confirms that genuine spiritual realization can never be hampered by any external circumstance.

We could say that this verse is rather esoteric, and not so easy to understand. Most of the verses of Gita are very direct and clear, and express logical, simple and fundamental truths that anybody can understand, especially if he has sufficient intelligence and common sense. Granted, a few of these truths are to be accepted with faith, as in the beginning the student does not have the instruments and the experience required to verify them, because they go beyond the perception of the material senses and the ordinary course of material life. Also, the simple and clear instructions given by Krishna may not be so easy to put into practice, but it is just a matter of making a personal effort into improving oneself and purifying one's consciousness. They are not vague or mysterious statements, and when sincerely studied in their original form, they do not leave much space for interpretation.

However, Krishna is gradually introducing very deep concepts that penetrate the core of Reality, into a dimension that is highly symbolic and relates to the activity of consciousness more than to the activities of the mind and senses - in other words, he talks of transcendental Reality, that by definition is considered too great to be expressed by words or thoughts. This is the inherent challenge of all genuine paths of spirituality and religion: they need to use words to express what is said to be beyond the scope of words. Therefore all genuine religions utilize the divine language of symbols that is embedded as a sort of "universal dictionary" into the subconscious of every human being, irrespective of the culture s/he was born and brought up in. In the last century the study of archetypes has developed under the patronage of non-religious researchers in the field of psychology, and this path has led rigorously scientific psychologists to trans-personal psychology to the threshold of spirituality - from Carl Gustav Jung to Roberto Assagioli and beyond - just like the most advanced research in nuclear and particle physics has led scientists to a perspective that is strikingly similar to the vision of the rishis of the ancient Vedic tradition.

Usually religious scriptures contain a certain amount of good advice on ethics, moral life, duties, rituals, purification etc, and the recommendation that human beings should worship God and recognize the greatness of divine power, wisdom, compassion, and glory. Bhagavad gita contains all this and much more, because it also offers the opportunity of exploring the realm of transcendence to help the human being in his/ her natural and legitimate quest for Self realization, as a divine spark of that same supreme power and glory that is God. Neither the Bible or the Koran, or other similar popularly known scripture offer this supreme knowledge, as they are destined for the masses of ordinary people that are unevolved and immature in their understanding and aspirations, not much different from animals, and therefore need to be controlled by a class of priests in some sort of theocracy. But that is not the purpose of genuine spirituality or even of human life. Vedanta sutras clearly state, athato brahma jijñasa, "this (human lifetime) is the opportunity to learn about Transcendence", and Krishna is kindly, patiently and expertly guiding us, step after step, into that supreme Science.

In ancient times, this Science was known all over the planet, but it was considered a great secret (raja vidya, raja guhyam) as Krishna will also confirm in 9.2, and was passed down from master to disciple in a restricted circle of initiates "to the mysteries", to ensure that the proper understanding of the immense glory of this Science would not be lost. Krishna will also recommend at the end of Gita (18.67) as a final instruction, that this Science should not be given indiscriminately to the ignorant masses, to those who are not austere, who do not have love for God, who are not interested to hear it or are envious or hateful. Today, at the dawn of the Third Millennium, we find ourselves in a new situation. Humankind in general has come to the threshold of a major evolutionary step in consciousness, and each and every human being on the planet is faced with the choice of making the required effort to rise to the Transcendental consciousness, and offered the opportunity to understand the level of existence that s/he can attain in that way. Today Bhagavad gita is amply available to almost everyone on the planet - except in those places where intolerant and ignorant so-called religions are afraid of its liberating science, and therefore they forbid its circulation. We should all take advantage of this extraordinary opportunity and make a sincere effort to study and understand it.

यो मां पश्यति सर्वत्र सर्वं च मयि पश्यति । तस्याहं न प्रणश्यामि स च मे न प्रणश्यति ॥ ६-३० ॥

yo māṁ paśyati sarvatra sarvaṁ ca mayi paśyati | tasyāhaṁ na praṇaśyāmi sa ca me na praṇaśyati || 6-30 ||

yah: one who; mam: me; paśyati: sees; sarvatra: everywhere/ in all things; sarvam: all; ca: and; mayi: in me; paśyati: sees; tasya: of him; aham: I; na: not; pranasyami: (I) become lost; sah: he; ca: and; me: to me; na: not; pranasyati: (he) becomes lost.

"One who sees me everywhere and sees everything in me never loses (sight of) me, and is never lost for me."

The word pranasyati, "becomes lost", refers to being "lost to the vision", or forgotten. Here we find the strong confirmation of a personal relationship between the Atman and the Brahman, that is based on the awareness of unity, on devotional service and on loving exchanges. In this verse Krishna continues to offer himself as the perfect example of Brahman consciousness - this will become more and more prominent in the verses of Gita, as we proceed to study it. After the science of differentiation between physics and metaphysics, the science of proper action, the science of acquisition of knowledge, the science of renouncing delusional ideas, and the science of meditation to control one's own mind, we will proceed to the other aspects of the Transcendental Science, including bhakti yoga and purusottama yoga. These more personal aspects can be studied and understood properly only after we have genuinely studied and understood the previous instructions, and assimilated the realizations that they offer. If we do not become free from the materialistic illusion of identification with the body, we will remain unable to appreciate the personal aspect of the transcendental science, and there will be the risk of becoming consciously or unconsciously envious of this personality that speaks of himself in such glorious terms.

Conscious envy is relatively easy to recognize, because it generally shows in the behavior of the envious person, mostly in the form of joy in front of the sufferings, defamation, losses and problems of others, and moroseness or anger in front of the happiness or glorification of those persons. An envious man/ woman cannot tolerate to see the happiness of others, especially of the person that is the object of his/ her envy.

Of course when the object of envy is a very powerful person, the envious must be very careful about showing their real feelings, and therefore they may make special effort to pretend they have favorable feelings towards the object of their envy - such as respect, appreciation, and even love or devotion. In the effort to be more credible, they may even go to the extreme and behave externally as they have become fanatical supporters or followers or devotees. There is a famous proverb saying, ati bhakti chori lakshana, "too much devotion is the symptom of a thief".

For a superficial observer it is not easy to distinguish a genuine devotee from one of such envious pretenders, and some ignorant people may even be led to believe that the envious pretender is actually a greater devotee than the real followers, who may be more dignified in their external behavior and prefer to serve humbly rather than making a big show of emotions in public. Usually such envious pretenders are more easily found in the closest and most intimate circle around the great personality, because that is where their dramatic performance can have the strongest effect, and where their actual aspirations can find a way to success. For example, from that position they can sabotage the relationship of the great personality with other, more sincere, people, and create a void around him so that nobody will be able to help him in the time of need. Also, a position in the "inner circle" or "core group of followers" can offer the opportunity to eliminate the great personality and take his place, or simply to enjoy his property and usurp his glory and authority.

When we apply these consideration to the greatest personality of all, Krishna, we can see that many of those who claim to be his greatest devotees are trying to direct the attention of the general people towards aspects of Krishna that appear to be more ordinary - for example, his being a pretty baby in the arms of his mother, a toddler fond of sweets, a simple-minded cowherd boy playing with his little friends, or a careless adolescent romantically involved with girls. In the name of the "most intimate rasas", these false devotees insist in focusing the attention of people on those activities of Krishna that most resemble the materialistic adventures of common people, and that are so often the object of foolish (and often envious) gossip among the ignorant masses.

These professional reciters encourage their audience to watch the most intimate dealings between Krishna and the gopis, for example, as a sort of peep show just like people go to the movies to watch some romantic comedy or tragedy or porn film, or like those old ladies whose greatest interest is to find out juicy details about the personal private lives of their neighbors. But genuine spiritual life is not that cheap. We definitely can have a very personal relationship with God as Bhagavan, but such relationship should be based on a permanent, strong and genuine realization of God as Brahman and Paramatma.

सर्वभूतस्थितं यो मां भजत्येकत्वमास्थितः । सर्वथा वर्तमानोऽपि स योगी मयि वर्तते ॥ ६-३१ ॥

sarvabhūta-sthitam yo mām bhajatyekatvamāsthitaḥ । sarvathā vartamāno'pi sa yogī mayi vartate ॥ 6-31 ॥

sarva-bhuta-sthitam: remaining in all beings/ existences; yah: he; mam: me; bhajati: worships/ serves; ekatvam: with concentrated consciousness; asthitah: situated; sarvatha: in every way; vartamanah: he may be; api: even; sah: he; yogi: a yogi; mayi: to me; vartate: exists.

"The yogi who worships me as the One who resides in all existences is situated (in me); wherever s/he may go, s/he always remains in me."

Krishna wants to clarify the concept that he is not an ordinary human being. Many people become devotees of great and powerful personalities, such as cricket or soccer players, pop singers, movie actors, famous politicians, social leaders, writers, philosophers or even religious teachers, because this is a natural tendency of human beings, especially of those who are still unevolved and immature, such as children and adolescents. People who feel insecure about their own identity and purpose in life tend to vicariously identify with a model and shape their opinions, attitudes and behaviors in the imitation of such model - sometimes even replicating the accent, the gait, or some typical physical gestures. There is nothing intrinsically wrong in this, because each human being needs to develop gradually in order to grow naturally and evolve a balanced and self-sufficient personality, and in healthy societies there are sufficient positive role models that growing people can look up to. As Krishna already said (3.21), the mass of people always look up at the great personalities and follow their example. However, there is a difference between God and a great man. Many great men may consciously or unconsciously convince themselves they have become God, especially when their followers and fans become their devotees and literally worship them as God.

In Vedic tradition, formal worship is offered as an expression of respect and gratitude to all the great personalities and even to one's direct superiors and to nature's manifestations, but all these traditional rituals always require the very clear understanding that the Transcendental Supreme Reality is superior to all the secondary manifestations of power. No man can ever become God. No matter how much power and glory seem to emanate from great men, such greatness is nothing but a pale reflection of the true glory of Bhagavan, as Krishna will clearly state in the next chapters (from 7.7 to 7.13, from 5.9 to 22.9, from 2.10 to 11.10, from 19.10 to 42.10). As clearly stated in chapter 12 (verses 2 to 5), meditation on the personal form of Bhagavan is more congenial to the personal nature of the soul, but we should not forget that the personality that is worshipping God should also have the same transcendental and divine consciousness, otherwise the results will not be the same.

When a materially identified man worships the personal form of God within his limited materialistic perception, his devotion is not true bhakti: at best it can be some sentimentalistic attachment or attraction, or cheap bigotry, at worst it can be an offensive attitude of material familiarity that breeds contempt and may even slide into cynical exploitation. Later in Gita (9.11) Krishna will explain that less intelligent people attribute material qualities and behaviors to the divine manifestations and their activities because they are unable to understand Transcendence: avajananti mam mudha manusim tanum asritam, param bhavam ajananto mama bhuta-mahesvaram. We should never think that the true worship of the personal form of God is something easy and cheap. Gita (7.3) confirms that the true understanding of this personal form is extremely difficult to achieve, and those who are true devotees of God are very rare: manuṣyaṇaṁ śaśvatsa kascid yatati siddhaye, yatatam api siddhanam kascid mam vetti tattvataḥ.

One who really knows the Lord and understands the transcendental nature of his form and activities can remember him at the moment of death and does not need to return to this world of birth and death: janma karma ca me divyam evam yo vetti-tattvatah, tyaktva deham punar janma na iti mam eti so 'rjuna (Gita, 4.9).

आत्मौपम्येन सर्वत्र समं पश्यति योऽर्जुन । सुखं वा यदि वा दुःखं स योगी परमो मतः ॥ ६-३२ ॥

ātmaupamyena sarvatra samam paśyati yo'rjuna । sukham vā yadi vā duḥkham sa yogī paramo mataḥ ॥ 6-32 ॥

atma: with oneself/ the Atman; aupamyena: by comparison; sarvatra: everywhere; samam: equally; paśyati: sees; yab: s/he; arjuna: o Arjuna; sukham: joy; va: or; yadi: if; va: or; duḥkham: sorrow; sab: s/he; yogi: a yogi; parama: the best; mataḥ: considered.

"O Arjuna, one who sees everything/ everyone as non-different from oneself, both in joy and in sorrow, is in my opinion the greatest yogi."

In the previous chapters Krishna has clearly stated that a true yogi and sannyasi is completely detached from all material association, from all identifications, sense of belonging and attachments. However, this does not mean that s/he has become insensitive to the happiness and distress of other living entities. Just as the yogi and sannyasi continues to perform his/ her duties in the best possible way without expecting any personal advantage in return, in the same way s/he loves all living entities without selfish attachment and expectations. Compassion is a characteristic symptom of a self-realized soul. As the perfect yogi is conscious of his/her nature as spirit soul and sees everyone around as a spirit soul, s/he does not make discriminations between him/ herself and others, and therefore deeply shares the joys and sorrows of everyone - especially the sorrows. S/he is therefore called para-duḥkha-duḥkhi, "one who shares the sufferings of others".

The expression atman-aupamyena indicates that one should see others according to the same standard one applies to oneself, treat others as he would like to be treated himself. This is precisely the contrary of envy and jealousy, and all the other similar sentiments that are characteristic of materialistic people, who see others as separated and different from himself. The Self-realized soul sees the divine atman in all beings, and therefore s/he makes no difference between atman and atman, as we have already seen in the previous verses. This verse, however, add a new dimension of compassion, by specifying sukham va yadi va duḥkham, "in joy and in sorrow". Now, we know that the pure consciousness of the Atman only knows a transcendental happiness called ananda (as opposed to the material joy called sukha), in which there is no place for duḥkha or distress. Therefore, we must understand that this empathy also applies to the material joys and sorrows experienced by the bodies and minds of the living entities, and to the pressure these feelings create on the consciousness of the soul. The compassionate sage thinks, "Seeking happiness is a natural tendency in everyone, and all beings experience joy and suffering. The joys and sorrows of others are the same joys and sorrows that I have experienced in my life, therefore I understand them and I will try to do my best to help others, just like in the past I have anxiously desired to be helped in my time of need." However, the sage also knows that the greatest happiness lies not in the comforts of the body and mind, but in the attainment of the transcendental realization of the Self, so s/he will try to encourage the conditioned souls to pursue the highest purpose of human life.

This transcendental concern may seem similar to the mentality of some missionaries that conduct activities of social assistance and welfare with the overt or covert motivation of gaining new converts for their particular affiliation. But in fact there is a huge difference between conversion into the sectarian allegiance to a particular faith and the genuine realization of the transcendental nature of the Atman, that is liberating the mind from all divisive identification, affiliation and bondage.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

योऽयं योगस्त्वया प्रोक्तः साम्येन मधुसूदन । एतस्याहं न पश्यामि चञ्चलत्वात्स्थितिं स्थिराम् ॥ ६-३३ ॥

yo'yaṁ yogastvayā proktaḥ sāmyena madhusūdana । etasyāhaṁ na paśyāmi cañcalatvāsthitim sthīrām ॥ 6-33 ॥

arjunab: Arjuna; uvāca: said; yab: it; ayam: this; yogab: yoga; tvaya: by you; proktaḥ: explained; samyena: as sameness; madhusudana: o Madhusudana (Krishna); etasya: of this; aham: I; na: not; paśyāmi: (I) see; cañcalatva: the quality of restlessness; sthitim: (permanent) situation; sthīram: firmly established.

Arjuna said: "O Madhusudana, I do not see how it is possible to consistently perform this yoga that you have now described to me as equanimity, because (the mind) is restless."

Krishna has described the traditional system of yoga and sannyasa as it was practiced in the ancient times. It is said that in the beginning, in Satya yuga, the yuga dharma was precisely the practice of yoga and sannyasa, that transcendental meditation that purifies the intelligence from all material identification and attachment and carries it to the level of Brahman realization. This was possible because all human beings were capable of observing and following the basic principles of dharma: tapas (austerity), saucha (cleanliness), daya (compassion) and satya (truthfulness). People were able to retire alone in the forest and live in a totally detached way. With the passing of time in the cycle of the yugas, mankind gradually became more degraded, because of the restlessness of the mind and its overwhelming desires. First austerity was lost, and people became lusty for the pleasures of the heavenly planets and the material advantages that one can obtain on this earth: a good birth, good descendants, a good wife or husband, fame, wealth and opulence, material power, beauty and physical vigor or fitness, mental strength, knowledge, and so on. Therefore in Treta yuga the ritual performance of sacrifices becomes the yuga dharma, that is faithfully executing the nitya karmani, the daily duties that include the boma or fire sacrifice.

The main qualification and concern for this type of religious practice is cleanliness (saucha), therefore tradition puts a lot of emphasis on purification and cleanliness at every step - both externally and internally. Without the proper cleanliness and purification, a person has no adbhikara (right) to perform the traditional rituals, while on the other side, anyone can become qualified through the proper purification and cleanliness system.

In the cycle of the universal seasons, Treta yuga is followed by Dvapara yuga, and the qualities of human beings diminish accordingly. Cleanliness becomes difficult to uphold, both internally and externally, and therefore the focus of religious activities is shifted towards the compassionate yuga dharma of Deity worship. Although cleanliness and austerity are always recommended, Deity worship in the temple can be open to those who do not possess very high qualifications in that field, as they can always attend the functions, offer their homage and receive the prasadam. The direct altar worship is delegated to priests that can maintain high standards of cleanliness and austerity because they are not required to do any other job, and who act as intermediaries in the relationship between the general people and the vigrahas installed in the temple.

Therefore in Dvapara yuga, wealthy kshatriyas and vaiśyas take up the responsibility of establishing temples and providing for the regular maintenance of the brahmanas who perform the rituals in the name of the karta (the financier who dedicates the worship) and of the entire society. Of course cleanliness is always encouraged, especially for the officiating priests but also for the general people albeit in a lesser degree. For example, traditional temples always have sacred tanks or pools, called kundas or sarovaras, where the devotees and the pilgrims can bathe or at least clean up a bit before entering the temple. But the main activity of temples is the compassionate distribution of sanctified food (prasadam) and other consecrated items (such as holy water, flowers etc) and the public readings and discussions about the shastra, so that the general people can obtain benefit from the transcendental knowledge without having to strictly observe the rules of cleanliness or austerity.

At the time when Krishna is talking to Arjuna on the battlefield of Kurukshetra, the Dvapara yuga is coming to a close and Kali yuga is approaching, with the gradual degradation of the qualifications of human beings, who will lose compassion after having already lost cleanliness and austerity. The only religious principle that will still remain to support spiritual life will be satya, truthfulness, and this is the quality that Arjuna is now demonstrating, by honestly and candidly objecting that the ancient system explained by Krishna (ayam yah proktaḥ, "this that has been explained") is very difficult and impractical for this age.

Of course Arjuna is much more qualified than us, and he expresses this opinion for our benefit rather than considering his personal qualifications and capabilities, but what he says is the pure truth and we need to become truthful - i.e. humble and honest - enough to recognize it.

चञ्चलं हि मनः कृष्ण प्रमाथि बलवद् दृढम् । तस्याहं निग्रहं मन्ये वायोरिव सुदुष्करम् ॥ ६-३४ ॥

cañcalaṁ hi manaḥ kṛṣṇa pramāthi balavad dṛḍham | tasyāhaṁ nigrahaṁ manye vāyoriva suduṣkaram || 6-34 ||

canalām: restless; hi: indeed; manah: the mind; krishna: o Krishna; pramathi: turbulent; balavat: strong; dridham: obstinate; tasya: of it; aham: I; nigraham: conquering; manyē: (I) consider; vayoh: than the wind; eva: certainly; su-duṣkaram: extremely difficult.

"O Krishna, the mind is indeed restless, turbulent, powerful and stubborn. I think that controlling it would be more difficult than controlling the wind."

This is one of the most famous verses of Gita, and one of the most useful in the daily practice of sadhana. Arjuna is a very practical person, and he can understand the problems of people. He is the perfect example of the yogi as described in verse 32, as one who can sympathize with the joys and sufferings of others, and looks compassionately upon them in their difficulties.

As we have already commented in the first chapter regarding Arjuna's sorrow, we should never fall into the mistake of considering him an ordinary person, a confused conditioned soul. Arjuna is a very close and eternal associate of Krishna, and descended with him in this world for the purpose of manifesting the wonderful adventures of assisting the Lord's mission. As stated by the Lord himself, Arjuna has been a close protagonist of the Lord's lila during many lifetimes (see Gita 4.4), acting under the superintendence of Yogamaya and apparently forgetting what he is not expected to know, so that he will be able to better play his role, like all the other divine manifestations that appeared with Krishna to assist his mission.

Arjuna's objections in this verse clearly demonstrate that the purpose of meditation is to control the mind and focus it on the contemplation of Transcendence. Many uninformed people believe that yoga meditation consists in fantasizing or visualizing imaginary pictures, or simply to witness the constant whimsical flow of the thoughts, perceptions, desires and emotions that run through the mind. This idea is created by the clever mind that naturally resists all forms of control just like a wild horse stubbornly rears and kicks in the attempt to overthrow his rider.

The mind is made of a subtle substance that is able to change appearance and movements, just like an ever-transforming monster that keeps sliding off our grasp, even taking up the appearance of Guru and God in order to deceive us into following its whims. It is easy for the unbridled obstinate mind to twist things and ideas around and to rationalize and try to justify even the greatest nonsense. We can overcome this problem by listening to our intelligence, that is superior to the mind, and to purify ourselves from all material identifications and attachments that constitute the roots of the selfish desires of the mind.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

असंशयं महाबाहो मनो दुर्निग्रहं चलम् ।

अभ्यासेन तु कौन्तेय वैराग्येण च गृह्यते ॥ ६-३५ ॥

asamśayaṁ mahābāho mano durnigrahaṁ calam । abhyāseṇa tu kaunteya vairāgyeṇa ca grhyate ॥ 6-35 ॥

sri-bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; asamsayam: without (any) doubts; maha-baho: o mighty armed (Arjuna); manah: the mind; durnigraham: difficult to catch; calam: moving; abhyasena: by practice; tu: but; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); vairagyena: by renunciation; ca: and; grihyate: is brought under control.

The Lord said: "O mighty armed (Arjuna), certainly the mind is restless and very difficult to manage, but it can be controlled by practice and detachment, o son of Kunti."

One of the most frequent questions asked by beginners in yoga practice is, "how can I control the mind?"

Gita clearly recognizes the fact that controlling the mind is not an easy job, but it gives the perfect formula: abhyasena (by practice) and vairagyena (by detachment). The next verse also hints at some specific exercises that help in that regard. The Yoga sutras (1.12) by Patanjali also give the same instruction: abhyasa-vairagyabhyam tan-nirodhah, "The cessation (of the cittavrittis) is done by (persistent) practice (abhyasa) and detachment (vairagya)".

Practice and detachment can be exercised with the help of three virtues that are particularly important in the journey of spiritual realization: utsaha (enthusiasm), dhairya (patience) and nischaya (confidence). The last chapter of Gita (18.26) also lists utsaha (enthusiasm) together with dhriti (determination), that is a variation of dhairya (patience). Anyone who had the experience of taking care of children knows that it takes a lot of enthusiasm, patience and determination, as well as practice and detachment. Training one's mind is very much like educating a child. By nature, small children are restless, turbulent, energetic and stubborn, and they constantly come up with innumerable demands - desires, ideas and emotions. Some children are stronger and cleverer than others and they are therefore more difficult to manage, but when properly trained and educated, they become the best friends of the people who have taken care of them. Already in 6.5 Krishna has said that one's mind can be one's best friend or worst enemy. Punishing or merely restraining the child are not effective systems, and allowing the child to do whatever he wants is generally dangerous; in both cases the child will behave like an enemy to us, and there will just be sufferings. The best course of action consists in taking the guidance of intelligence and good sense, and following Krishna's instructions in Gita: we must become the best friends of our mind by treating it like a beloved child who needs the proper training. What does a child need? Some good, healthy and tasty food, sufficient rest, some fun, and training exercises suitable for his/ her stage of development. Under the guidance of an expert teacher, we can train our mind successfully if we give it the proper food, rest and fun, and engage it in suitable work, as also confirmed earlier in Gita (6.16, 17). Every time the restless childish mind wanders off, we must patiently bring it back, with tolerance, enthusiasm and gentle firmness. It is also extremely important to offer the mind something better than what it already knows: rasa-varjam raso 'py asya param drishtva nivarate, "it can give up the taste (for such objects) when he sees/ finds the Supreme/ something that has a higher/ better taste" (2.59).

The superiority of the gentle, patient and positively enthusiastic method, as opposed to the "hard way" that some people believe is required to deal with small children, is highlighted by the humorous hint offered by Krishna in this verse when he calls Arjuna maha-baho, "mighty armed". Can we control the wind with our mighty arms? Certainly not. One may also try to use brute force to try to control the mind (or a small child) but the results will not be good. Just like the wind or the water find their way around obstacles, popping up again in unexpected (and often more violent and destructive) ways, a repressed mind will become distorted and create many problems that sometimes may seem totally unconnected to the original issue. For example, a child that does not receive sufficient attentions may develop a physical disease, a neglected need of proper nourishment for the body may take the form of craving for junk food, a river in spate whose waters are not properly channeled will break the levies, and a repressed mind will create a series of unhealthy obsessions and phobias. The gently firm method recommended by Krishna is certainly the best. He stresses this important point by using the word asamsayam, "without (any) doubts".

असंयतात्मना योगो दुष्प्राप इति मे मतिः । वश्यात्मना तु यतता शक्योऽवाप्तुमुपायतः ॥ ६-३६ ॥

asamāyātātmānā yoga duṣprāpa iti me matiḥ । vaśyātmanā tu yatatā śakyo'vāptumupāyataḥ ॥ 6-36 ॥

asamyata: uncontrolled; atmana: self; yogah: yoga; duṣprapah: difficult to obtain; iti: like this; me: my; matih: opinion; vasya: controlled; atmana: self; tu: but; yatatata: making efforts; sakyah: possible; avaptum: to achieve; upayatah: by the means (I have) described.

"My opinion is that it is very difficult to attain yoga when the self/ mind is not engaged/ controlled, but there are (appropriate) means by which with a little effort one will be able to control the self/ mind."

Controlling one's mind is certainly the main issue in yoga. All the practice in asana and pranayama has the only purpose of helping us to control the mind, because without being able to direct the mind firmly towards the chosen object of meditation, there is no question of yoga. The most famous authority on yoga, Patanjali, clearly states in the first chapter of his Yogasutras (1.2): yogah cittavritti-nirodhah, "Yoga is the cessation of the fluctuations in the mind". This is possible only when we become able to control the activity of the mind and focus it firmly on one object only - what is called dharana, "holding the meditation firmly". The first step in the process consists in deciding that we will not run after the myriad of desires, impulses, feelings, emotions, thoughts, plans, ideas, fantasies, fears, and anxieties that the mind constantly proposes us. Therefore only a fool will think that he can practice yoga with the purpose of getting a trim and fit body that is able to run after the whims of the mind and the desires for sense gratification. Some people even think that we should "get rid" of the mind, but this is simply stupid. The mind is an element of material nature, and we cannot "get rid" of the mind any more than we can get rid of the water that composes our bodies. Also, the idea of "cutting off the mind" because we have problems controlling it is something like deciding to cut off our head because we have a headache. It is true that controlling the mind is difficult, but when we need to do something important, we should make an effort to overcome difficulties.

We need commitment and determination in order to achieve any good result. Maybe we will not succeed 100% immediately, but even a small percentage of success is better than nothing, and without making any effort our life will not become any better. The word yata means precisely "making efforts, striving". Krishna reassures us: it is difficult, but it is possible. The word sakya ("possible") derives from the same root of saktum ("to be able to") and sakti ("power"). As individual souls, we have the power to control at least our own mind: this is the door that will take us beyond, towards the greatest possible power in this world. The word upayata suggests that there are means, rules, methods and exercises that we can use to achieve success in this enterprise, but the essential point is always about engagement. Control means engagement: positive engagement enables us to prevent the mind from negative engagement. Another very important point is that one's mind must be controlled by oneself, not controlled by others. Having someone else control your mind is not the solution to your problems: it can help in the beginning, during a training period, because you need to learn good habits and practice the exercises that will enable you to control your mind movements, but after some time you need to stand on your own feet and take responsibility for your own progress.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

अयतिः श्रद्धयोपेतो योगाच्चलितमानसः । अप्राप्य योगसंसिद्धिं कां गतिं कृष्ण गच्छति ॥ ६-३७ ॥

ayatiḥ śraddhayopeto yogāccalitamānasah । aprāpya yogasamsiddhiṁ kām gatiṁ kṛṣṇa gacchati ॥ 6-37 ॥

arjuna: Arjuna; uvaca: said; ayatiḥ: one who fails (in the effort); śraddhaya: with faith; upetaḥ: having commenced; yogat: from the yoga; calita: strayed; manasah: the mind; aprapya: has not attained; yoga-samsiddhiḥ: the perfection of yoga; kām: which; gatiḥ: destination; kṛṣṇa: o Krishna; gacchati: he goes to.

Arjuna said: "O Krishna, (let's say that) someone has faithfully embraced yoga but due to insufficient renunciation/efforts s/he is led astray by the mind and fails to attain the complete perfection of yoga. What destination will s/he achieve?"

Committing oneself fully to yoga, to the serious and dedicated practice of Self realization, is not an easy task, because it requires a complete paradigm shift. It is not a mere hobby or leisure activity. It is a full time occupation. We need to radically rearrange our priorities, starting with our own identification, and this important choice will inevitably change many things in our life - including our relationships, our lifestyle, our position in society. Material illusions can be very gratifying, and when we give them up we may get the feeling that we are losing something very important, that we will not get back so easily if we changed our mind and decided that the path of yoga is too difficult for us. It will be difficult to leave an affectionate family, a good social position, a prestigious job, a comfortable house, and the little indulgences we call "creature comforts" (although we do not really need to lose them - we need to renounce our identification and attachments to them) but even the least successful person in this world has some attachments, some "comfort zone" he does not like to give up, at least in his consciousness.

In the 1960s and 1970s, many young people in the West left their homes and families, dropped out from school and refused to get stuck into conventional professional careers and to adapt themselves to conventional social expectations. They had the strong feeling that there must be something more in life, something that is worth pursuing beyond the illusory trappings of the materialistic dream and the illusory identifications and attachments that were obviously insufficient to explain life and make it really worthy of living. Most of those people were rather ignorant and confused, but they took inspiration from the early preachers of Sanatana Dharma that had ventured in the world to bring the transcendental message of yoga to the wealthiest countries of the world - some even traveled to India and lived together with sadhus to "experiment" on "how to expand the area of consciousness".

It took a lot of courage and dedication to just drop everything and just search for the meaning of life, to live with integrity and a higher purpose, and there was always a price to pay for burning the bridges behind oneself. Arjuna is thinking along the same lines: if one gives up all attachments and identifications to engage in yoga, it will not be possible to return to a life of ignorant bliss and attachments. And because it seems so difficult to achieve success in the higher dimension of life in yoga, what will happen to someone who fails because he is not strong and determined enough? What if he changes his mind and decides that he should have taken it a little easier? What if he "bit off more than he could chew"?

The word ayati refers to one who fails in the effort, that cannot strive enough, or is not diligent enough. In the previous verse the word yata, "making efforts" clearly stated that it takes a lot of determination and work to achieve success on the path of yoga. The expression yogat calita manasah translates as "the mind has gone away from the yoga", indicating a powerful urge to change the course of one's life, a total loss of interest, as when we say that our heart is "somewhere else". Because the mind is so powerful and difficult to control, when it leaves the path of yoga and simply refuses to engage any more into it, the situation becomes unbearable and it is just impossible to continue to work in that direction.

कच्चिन्नोभयविभ्रष्टश्छिन्नाभ्रमिव नश्यति ।

अप्रतिष्ठो महाबाहो विमूढो ब्रह्मणः पथि ॥ ६-३८ ॥

kaccinnobhayavibhraṣṭaścinnābhramiva naśyati | apratiṣṭho mahābāho vimūḍho brahmaṇaḥ pathi || 6-38 ||

kacit: anything; na: not; ubhaya: of the two; vibhrastab: fallen; chinna: torn; abhram: cloud; iva: like; nasyati: is destroyed; apratishthab: without any position/ support; maha-baho: o mighty armed (Krishna); vimudha: confused; brahmanab: of Brahman; pathi: on the path.

"O mighty armed (Krishna), (I wonder) whether s/he will not perish like a scattered cloud, since s/he has abandoned both (pursuits, i.e. ritual activity and engagement in sannyasa yoga) and remains without a position/ stand, confused on the path of Transcendence."

In verse 2.41, Krishna explained the importance of seriously focusing on one thing only, which saves our intelligence from getting dispersed into many ineffective enterprises (ekeba kuru nandana bahu sakba hy anantas ca buddhayo 'anyavasayinam). It is not possible to attain Self realization without giving up materialistic pursuits, identifications and attachments, because the path of yoga requires a totally different perspective on life. The path of yoga is the path of moksha, and one who is seeking moksha has already gone beyond artha and kama. The natural evolution of the civilized human being goes from the stage of learning and practicing about dharma to the stage when he engages in the dharmic pursuit of artha and kama. These two stages correspond to the ashramas called brahmacharya (celibate life) and grihastha (married life).

Every human being needs to receive the proper training from an early age, so that he will be able to learn good principles, habits and skills. This training is best received as a student in the Guru's house, starting from the age of 5, when a child has become physically and mentally self-sufficient enough to seriously engage in his studies. After completing his training, the young man can successfully engage in the pursuit of artha and kama without the danger of falling into vikarma, or detrimental activities and choices that will obstruct his development and create a dark future for him. He marries and engages in a suitable professional occupation and his regular duties, reaping the fruits of his good karma in the form of wealth, knowledge, social position, respect from good people and so on. All this is perfectly legitimate, but as Krishna has explained in the previous chapters, such pleasures are temporary and do not constitute the real purpose of life. All scriptures clearly teach that artha and kama are just temporary stages in life, and that moksha is the highest and most important acquisition for a civilized human being.

Yoga is the path to moksha. But what if one was not ready? What if he still wanted to have some artha and kama from life? What if he felt that he still had something to do, some debts to repay, some work to complete? What if he wanted another chance at doing something good for his family, for his community, and for the world? Of course we know that all this is still possible, and at a higher level, after attaining the liberated stage, so nothing is really ever lost. But what if one is still feeling childish, and small, and attached to the little things that make the life of an ordinary human being? There is nothing wrong in that. The Divine plan is built on the principles of dharma, so there must be compassion.

We do not get one chance only, like the abrahamics say, foolishly rejecting the real fact of reincarnation and imagining that a few years in disadvantaged circumstances are all we are offered to win an eternity of happiness in heaven or be sentenced to an eternity of sufferings in hell. God is much more compassionate than that. Whatever good work, whatever progress we have made, we will be able to take it with us to the next lifetime, as Krishna will explain in the next verses. While we cannot take material possessions with us when we leave our body, our spiritual realizations will remain to our credit, and in the next lifetime we will get better circumstances and opportunities to continue our progress and evolution.

In this verse Arjuna responds to Krishna's subtle humor by also addressing him as maha baho, "mighty armed", but in this context the name is appealing to Krishna's powerful protection, so that in his compassion he will support the confused souls. In other words, Arjuna is replying, "My dear Krishna, there is nothing to laugh about here: the sufferings of people are real enough, even if they are due to illusion."

एतन्मे संशयं कृष्ण छेत्तुमर्हस्यशेषतः ।

त्वदन्यः संशयस्यास्य छेत्ता न ह्युपपद्यते ॥ ६-३९ ॥

etanme saṁśayaṁ kṛṣṇa chettumarhasyaśeṣataḥ | tvadanyaḥ saṁśayaśyāsyā chettā na hyupapadyate || 6-39 ||

etat: this; me: my; samsayam: doubt; krishna: o Krishna; chettum: to cut off/ to eradicate/ remove; arhasi: you should; aseshataḥ: completely; tvad-anyaḥ: other than you; samsayasyasya: of the doubt; chetta: one who cuts off; na: not; hi: certainly; upapadyate: can be found.

"O Krishna, (please) you should dispel these doubts completely for me, because I cannot find anyone else but you who can remove uncertainty."

We are entitled to have doubts, because doubting is a faculty of intelligence, and blind following is always dangerous even when we are following a good person or a good path. However, we should not remain in doubt forever. The faculty of doubt is meant to encourage us to find the proper information and understanding, so that we will confidently engage in the best path we can find, supporting our choice with the faith we have developed from the experiences we have had. When we overcome our doubts after the proper deliberation, we can really progress in life.

This crucial step, that consists in clarifying and overcoming doubts, has already been mentioned several times in Gita: "I am asking you to clarify the confusion of my mind, to tell me without a doubt what is the best thing to do" (2.7), "get up, o son of Kunti, and abandoning all doubts, fix your mind on the battle" (2.37), "Please give me one instruction only, that will not create doubts, and by which I will obtain the best result" (3.2), "A person who is devoid of knowledge and faith and cannot overcome doubts will be lost. For one who is plagued by uncertainty there is no happiness in this world or in the next" (4.40), "One who has cut through all doubts by knowledge, finds his desires turning towards the self" (4.41), "Therefore o Bharata, get up and fight, establishing yourself in yoga and using the sword of knowledge to slash off all these doubts that were born from ignorance and are infesting the heart" (4.42), "O Krishna, please tell me what will be the best, without any doubt" (5.1), "The seers of Reality have been purified from all faults and have cut off all doubts..." (5.25), "This is undoubtedly the yoga system that must be practiced without getting discouraged." (6.23).

How is it possible to overcome doubt? We need someone we can trust, that has already experienced what we want to attain, and that is only interested to help us, without any strings attached. If one of these factors is missing, then the person we want to trust can be a serious disappointment. Arjuna clearly states that Krishna is the best possible person to solve our doubts, as it will become even more apparent in the next chapters.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

पार्थ नैवेह नामुत्र विनाशस्तस्य विद्यते । न हि कल्याणकृत्कश्चिद् दुर्गतिं तात गच्छति ॥ ६-४० ॥

pārtha naiveha nāmutra vināśastasya vidyate । na hi kalyāṇakṛtkāścid durgatiṁ tāta gacchati ॥ 6-40 ॥

sri-bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; pārtha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); na: not; eva: certainly; iha: here (in this world/ life); na: not; amutra: in the next (world/ life); vinasah: destruction; tasya: of him; vidyate: is known; na: not; hi: certainly; kalyana-krit: one who performs good/ auspicious activities; kascit: any; durgatim: bad situation; tata: (my) dear (son); gacchati: goes to.

The Lord said: "O Partha, s/he will never be lost, in this world or in the next life. One who is engaged in beneficial activities will never meet with a bad end."

The first point in Krishna's reply to Arjuna is reassurance. When we say that God is good, loving and compassionate, we cannot really believe that he will sentence a poor soul to eternal hell just because of some mistake or weakness - also considering that it was God to create human beings in the first place, with their weakness and fallibility, and sanctioned the unfavorable circumstances in which human beings must live and make their choices.

The truth is that all living entities are created as parts of God's body, and their experience in the material universe is meant to be an evolutionary journey - its meaning is reflected in the various dimensions of the microcosm-macrocosm like a series of mirrors reflecting each other. Each living entity appears, grows and strives towards completion and perfection, and at the time of death it naturally moves to the next higher level of evolution; from the unicellular organisms to the human form of life, the laws of progress are naturally and automatically engraved in the heart of the jiva, and the process is instinctive. At the human level, these laws of progress are also given in the form of religious teachings, that must be in conformity to the natural law of progress eternally inscribed in the heart of the jiva - what we call "the voice of conscience" or the sanatana dharma. The opportunity of human birth is extraordinarily important because it constitutes a sort of "graduation" or "coming of age", granting special freedom of choice and action and a greater power to participate more in God's work, just like a grown-up child will be given the keys of the house or the car, a more substantial allowance for his expenditures, his own TV set or computer, and so on.

However, with greater power comes greater responsibility: if the human being misuses the facilities he has been given, he will be held accountable and even deprived of some of the privileges he used against himself. This is why sometimes the natural evolution of the jiva is stopped and even appears to have been reversed, with a next incarnation that is lower than the previous one. Such lower birth can be as a disadvantaged human being (handicapped, poor, unfortunate etc) or as an animal or a plant, but it is important to understand that the laws of karma are very complex and that in no instance our good actions and especially our spiritual evolution will be lost: they will simply remain dormant and will be revived at the proper time to help us continue our evolutionary journey. Many stories from Puranas, Itihasas and Upanishads confirm this fact.

As Krishna has explained in the last verses, everything is based on personal effort (yatata, ayatih). We only fail due to lack of personal effort - either in this present lifetime or in a previous lifetime... which created the karmic consequences of difficult circumstances in this present lifetime. Why someone fails and falls from the path of transcendence? It is only because of previous bad karma, therefore if someone performs good activities, the balance of karma will become favorable and after a short time all difficulties will be overcome. In this verse, the word tata is particularly significant. It refers to a bodily relationship (tanoti) such as the one between father and son or between teacher and disciple (in Vedic tradition the disciple is considered exactly like a son). As a patient and benevolent parent that is teaching a baby how to walk his first steps, God watches over us and guides us in our efforts, step after step, and gradually letting us go more and more, so that we can learn to stand on our two feet and grow up, becoming stronger and more responsible, until we reach the level where we understand and appreciate God's nature and mission. At that point we attain our "final graduation" or the "full maturity", by which our consciousness becomes firmly established in God's consciousness. This level is called brahma bhuta, "the existence of Brahman", or moksha, "liberation", and generally takes several lifetimes to be attained, as Krishna will confirm in the next chapter: babunam janmanam ante (7.19).

प्राप्य पुण्यकृतां लोकानुषित्वा शाश्वतीः समाः । शुचीनां श्रीमतां गेहे योगभ्रष्टोऽभिजायते ॥ ६-४१ ॥

prāpya puṇyaktṛāṁ lokānuṣitvā śāśvatīḥ samāḥ | śucināṁ śrīmatāṁ gehe yogabhraṣṭo'bhijāyate || 6-41 ||

prāpya: after achieving; puṇya-kṛitām: one who has performed auspicious/ good activities; lokām: the planets; uṣitva: after dwelling (there); śāśvatīḥ: numerous; samāḥ: years; śucinām: of pure (people); śrīmatām: of wealthy (people); gehe: in the house; yoga-bhraṣṭab: one who has fallen from the path of yoga; abhijāyate: takes birth.

"After attaining the planets of those who are virtuous and residing there for many years, one who has fallen from yoga takes birth in the house of people who are pure and prosperous."

In this verse Krishna continues to reassure Arjuna, declaring that the yogi that renounces material identification and attachments will not lose the material facilitations and benefits pursued by the materialists engaged in their professional and religious duties. As he had already explained in 2.46: "Whatever value is found in a pond is also found, for all purposes, also in a large lake, and similarly whatever is contained in the all the Vedas can be found in a person who has realized the knowledge of Brahman".

As yoga is precisely the science of Brahman realization, it must naturally offer all the benefits that are contained in all the knowledge of the Vedas, what to speak of the ordinary and imperfect knowledge that is characteristic of non-civilized people. Materialistic people worship God to obtain material blessings, such as elevation to the heavenly planets, a good birth, wealth and other similar facilities, therefore Krishna mentions such attainments as intrinsically available to the yogi in virtue of whatever effort s/he has done in the direction of personal evolution, even if such effort was not completely successful. One can fall from the path of yoga after a long progress or after a short progress, and the circumstances of the next opportunity will be directly related with the amount of work and therefore with the credit that the yogi had accumulated in his effort.

Elevation to the heavenly planets is not a bad thing, because the kingdoms of the devas are characterized by sattva, and life there offers ample opportunities for progress and engagement in the service to God's mission. However, because the residents of the heavenly planets enjoy much greater power and pleasures than the people of the Earth, it is more difficult for them to seriously concentrate on progress in yoga and to abandon such attractive and virtuous material identifications and attachments. This is why after a long and very pleasant vacation for rest and relaxation in the best possible resorts in the universe, the failed yogi is given another opportunity to engage in serious work in the human form of life, and in favorable circumstances. Taking birth in a good family means growing up in a favorable atmosphere that supports spiritual life and personal evolution through the example and precept of great cleanliness (sucinam) and other qualities that attract the blessings of Mother Lakshmi, the bestower of wealth and prosperity (sri-matam). These qualities are sense of responsibility, respect towards wealth resources, and proper engagement in hard work. Certainly taking birth in such a family provides a fundamental base of support for further training in yoga.

At lower levels, where the family may not be so good, there must still be some cleanliness or sense of order and discipline, in order to maintain a sufficient amount of wealth that enables the children of the family to get a proper education and the opportunity to pursue yoga without being harassed by financial difficulties. However, wealth accumulated by illicit and unethical means is not considered to be sri-mata and is not accompanied by suci or cleanliness - a quality that applies both to the external cleanliness and to the internal or mental cleanliness. People born in families that are simply possessing a lot of money or property, but do not have the blessings of Lakshmi Devi, will lose their wealth and happiness in various ways; this may also be a blessing in disguise because the unfavorable situation will create a friction between the sincere nature of the fallen yogi and the unhealthy environment, pushing him to renounce all family ties, identifications and attachments. The Divine plan will provide for the most suitable arrangement according to each individual's particular needs.

अथवा योगिनामेव कुले भवति धीमताम् । एतद्धि दुर्लभतरं लोके जन्म यदीदृशम् ॥ ६-४२ ॥

athavā yogināmeva kule bhavati dhīmatām | etaddhi durlabhataram loke janma yadīdṛśam || 6-42 ||

atha va: or; yoginām: of yogis; eva: certainly; kule: in the family; bhavati: becomes/ takes birth; dhīmatām: of the wise; etat: this; hi: indeed; durlabhataram: extremely difficult to obtain; loke: in (this) world/ among people; janma: birth; yat: which; idṛśam: of this type.

"S/he can even take birth in a family of wise yogis - certainly such a birth is extremely rare in this world."

Birth in a family of sucinam (clean people) and śrīmatam (wealthy people) is blessed with favorable circumstances for personal evolution, and it is not so difficult to attain. There are many families that offer such benefits, both in India and at global level all over the world. Actually, at present it is even easier to find such families in western countries, where the level of prosperity is higher and people have proper bathrooms, cleaner houses and streets than what is generally seen in present India. Also, there are more opportunities for sattvic sense enjoyment, with a greater variety of fruits and vegetables, milk products, grains, and similar virtuous vegetarian ingredients and recipes than what we can find at present in India. And in all western cities there are dozens if not hundreds of yoga centers, and the ethics of work and individual responsibility are well developed.

Granted, in ancient times Indian civilization was much better, even compared to the highest level of progress, development, opulence and well-being attained in the western countries. In the ancient Vedic civilization, for example, each home had a bathroom and a functional system of water pipes for centralized sewage disposal, as we can still see in the archaeological sites of the Sarasvati valley. In the description of the Puranas, we see that the cities were characterized by many amenities and beautiful buildings, gardens full of flowers, parks and sarovaras, or man-made lakes with ghats or steps made of stone that descended into the water just like in modern swimming pools. From the descriptions of the Kama sutras, we learn that the quality of life in such ancient Indian civilization was extremely high and refined, and people had long hours to dedicate to pleasurable activities such as poetry, music, dance, calligraphy, making of riddles, cooking delicious foods and preparing a variety of drinks. They were also making their own oil, sugar, clarified butter, floral bouquets, garlands and other types of decorations, perfumes and scented incense, spinning and weaving, beautiful clothing and ornaments, gardening, interior decoration, artificial flowers, hairdressing and hair dyeing, cosmetics, toys and ropes. They also learned many languages, used to go on picnics, and often engaged in various types of playful games such as chess etc. Homes were carefully kept clean and pure, and had fine furniture and especially beautiful cots and sitting places, soft beds with white sheets, kitchen gardens, a rich flower garden with a swing and a small pond, ample storage rooms and so on. Such wonderful opulence made India famous all over the world in ancient times, with merchants traveling up and down from China, Indonesia, Egypt, Rome, and Ethiopia. There is ample archaeological evidence about all this, and in fact the climate and the natural resources of the Indian subcontinent are perfectly sufficient to ensure an extremely high quality of life. If this does not materialize today, it is due to poor management of the resources, ignorance, neglect and foolishness only. At the time when Krishna spoke the Gita to Arjuna, Indian civilization was still extremely advanced, opulent and refined, so when he speaks of wealthy people, we should take his words seriously. Yet, in this verse Krishna says that even better than the birth in the house of the sucinam and srimatam, is taking birth in the family of wise spiritualists that are engaged in the practice of yoga as explained by Gita.

The expression yoginam dhimatam kule, "in the family of wise yogis", implies that the genuine practice of yoga does not require the acceptance of the order of sannyasa. One can effectively and successfully practice yoga even while living in ordinary family life, with wife and children, and engaging in a suitable professional occupation, especially in the field of teaching, writing and conducting religious ceremonies and festivals. These families of brahma rishis and raja rishis were the illustrious origin of descendants that are still bearing the family names of Acharya, Gosvami, etc. Unfortunately, by the effect of Kali yuga the glorious tradition of such families has become lost, and their descendants are often more degraded than people who are of lesser ancestry. We sincerely wish that such descendants will understand the importance of reforming themselves and returning to the glorious qualifications of their ancestors, through a sincere effort guided by the original teachings. Of course any qualified person, from any family of origin, can become a genuine Acharya or Yogi, and start his own kula or family tradition, as many Rishis did in the past. Again, the required process consists simply in following the ancient original teachings. Another meaning of kula, or "family", applies to the house of the Guru, of which a disciple becomes a member when he chooses to remain there even after completing his normal course of studies. In ancient times it was not uncommon for a brilliant disciple to be officially adopted by the Guru and become his son and successor under all aspects.

तत्र तं बुद्धिसंयोगं लभते पौर्वदेहिकम् ।

यतते च ततो भूयः संसिद्धौ कुरुनन्दन ॥ ६-४३ ॥

latra tam buddhisamyogam labhate paurvadehikam | yatate ca tato bhūyah samsiddhau kurunandana || 6-43 ||

tatra: there/ then; tam: that; buddhi-samyogam: intelligent engagement/ engagement in buddhi yoga; labhate: obtains; paurva-dehikam: from the previous body; yatate: he makes efforts; ca: and; tatah: then; bhūyah: again; samsiddhau: towards perfection; kuru-nandana: o beloved of Kuru.

"O son of Kuru, there (in such birth) s/he recovers the realizations from his/ her previous lifetime, and again resumes his/her efforts towards full perfection."

When the fallen yogi obtains a new favorable environment and circumstances presented by Krishna in the previous verses, he or she should be very careful not to waste that valuable opportunity. S/he should sincerely engage in hard work, making serious efforts in his/ her own individual progress, properly utilizing everything that has been supplied by the kindness of God, and feel encouraged and inspired to continue on the path towards success in yoga. It is very important to understand that such effort is still required. We cannot afford to become complacent and neglectful, and delude ourselves into believing that simply by dint of our high birth, wealth, good position in society etc, we will automatically attain the goal of life. Sooner or later, the fallen yogi that has been supported by the favorable circumstances and has been thriving on the good results of his past good activities will find himself facing the very same obstacles that stopped his progress and evolution in the previous lifetime. Advancement in yoga will be naturally smooth only up to the point where he had left his previous progress, just like a student that failed an exam after a full year of studies finds life very easy in the next year while repeating the same class, but only until he comes to the point where he had not learned the required lessons well enough to pass the exam in the first instance.

This is a serious moment of crisis, that can create a deep suffering and a lot of doubts, and even the danger of a worse downfall. If the fallen yogi makes the wrong choices in this favorable lifetime, allowing himself to be deluded by bodily identifications and attachments and does not make any effort in the proper direction, he will lose all his good qualities and slide into more troubles for his future lifetimes, until he has properly understood the lesson and reformed himself. In that case, since in this lifetime he has not made any effort on the path of yoga, he will not get the same benefits that Krishna has promised to one who falls from the sincere practice because of insufficient strength and perseverance. Instead of obtaining a nice holiday on the higher planets and a great next birth, he will slide into the lower forms of life until he awakens from his delusion and becomes sincere again and ready to make the required efforts (yatate). This is not a punishment, but a necessary lesson.

In this verse, the expression paurva debikam refers to the realizations (buddhi-samyogam) acquired in a previous body or lifetime. While we cannot take material possessions with us when we leave our body, our realizations come with us into the next lifetime.

Perfection in yoga requires many lifetimes (aneka-janma samsiddhab). This is also confirmed in the next chapter (7.19) with the expression babunam janmanam ante, "after many births". Remembering previous lifetimes is a great blessing in this regard, because it will protect us precisely from the disastrous mistake we were mentioning above - coming to believe that we are special people just by dint of our birth, and that we do not need to make any effort to reform ourselves and to become perfect in the Self realization of yoga. A person who falls into this delusion may even become downright adharmic and indulge in the worst actions, lying and cheating, becoming offensive and arrogant, and exploiting any social or religious credit to perform illicit and unethical activities, thus accumulating extremely bad karma because he will be misleading people by presenting a false and horrible farce of spirituality and religion as the actual, genuine and original process prescribed by Vedic knowledge. These people are not included in Krishna's reassurance in verse 6.40 ("he will never be lost, in this world or in the next life... will never meet with a bad end"), precisely because they are not "engaged in beneficial activities".

पूर्वाभ्यासेन तेनैव ह्रियते ह्यवशोऽपि सः । जिज्ञासुरपि योगस्य शब्दब्रह्मातिवर्तते ॥ ६-४४ ॥

pūrvābhyāseṇa tenaiva hriyate hyavaśo'pi saḥ | jīgñāsuraṇi yogasya śabdabrahmātivartate || 6-44 ||

purva: previous; abhyasena: by the practice; tena: by that; eva: certainly; hriyate: is attracted to/ is carried forward; hi: certainly; avas: spontaneously; api: even; saḥ: s/he; jīgñasur: inquisitive; api: even; yogasya: of the yoga; śabda-brahma: the (rules of the) scriptures; ativartate: transcends.

"Whatever s/he had attained in the previous life will certainly create a spontaneous attraction (towards perfection) - because the seeker of yoga even transcends the regulations of the scriptures."

As we have already seen in the previous verses, Krishna explains that the good realizations and merits of one's previous lifetimes are carried on to the next birth, where they create favorable circumstances to continue one's personal evolution. This will be true even if the yogi had really degraded himself due to some serious mistake or bad choice; in that case he will have to go through some difficult times until the bad effects of the negative actions will not become exhausted, but then his mind will become purified and the good tendencies will rise again, because the results of the sincere effort on the path of yoga are not destroyed even if they are covered for a long time. Actual realizations will always accompany us lifetime after lifetime, even if we do not remember exactly when and where we attained them. A powerful habit becomes second nature and will resurface easily whenever the circumstances allow it - this verse says avasah api, "without desiring so". Just like a student moves with ease through the lessons that he had already learned in the previous years, even without studying too much, a person who sincerely practiced yoga in a previous lifetime finds himself spontaneously attracted by the practice and actually enjoys it. He easily understands the concepts and the methods, and does not need a lot of coaching and training - that is, until he reaches the point where he had stumbled in his previous lifetime. As we explained in the previous verse, at that point he must make a choice to sincerely put sufficient effort to continue his progress. Without this hard work, he will not learn anything further.

The spontaneous attraction to the ideals and practices of yoga manifested by a fallen yogi who is resuming his transcendental journey is so strong that it does not need to follow the strict systems described in the scriptures and by the conventional traditions. This means that the yogi does not need the tedious exercises of asanas and pranayama and dharana, and is not even tied by the rules of yama and niyama, because the power of his previous realizations and practice is sustaining him easily. Yet again, the yogi needs to remain firmly situated in sincerity and hard effort in his personal evolution towards the ultimate purpose of yoga, otherwise he will risk falling into the delusional traps of arrogance, neglect, material identification, callousness, cynicism, cheating propensities and unethical practices, which will cause an even greater downfall.

It is said that rules are made to help us, not to obstruct our development, and this is certainly true when we remain sincere and honest and hard working, and do not go astray from the proper path of yoga - yogat chālita - which would be a downfall.

प्रयत्नाद्यतमानस्तु योगी संशुद्धकिल्बिषः । अनेकजन्मसंसिद्धस्ततो याति परां गतिम् ॥ ६-४५ ॥

prayatnādyatamānastu yogī saṁśuddhakilbiṣaḥ | anekajanmasamsiddhastato yāti parāṁ gatim || 6-45 ||

prayatnat: by serious practice; yatamanah: making efforts; tu: but; yogi: the yogi; samsuddha: purified; kilbishah: from contaminations; aneka-janma: many lifetimes; samsiddhab: having achieved perfection; tato: then/ there; yati: attains; param gatim: the supreme position/ goal.

"Engaging in a serious practice, such a yogi becomes purified from all contaminations and attains the supreme goal, a perfection that requires many lifetimes."

The need for sincerity and a serious effort is repeated here by Krishna, and this definitely clarifies the huge importance of these two factors. It is only by sincerity and hard work that one can become purified from all contaminations, reform all imperfections, and progress in his personal development and evolution, towards the supreme goal. This hard work is not necessarily cause for suffering or anxiety. Especially when done in favorable circumstances, in a good environment and with proper instruments, hard work can be extremely pleasurable and satisfying, just like a person with a healthy and strong body will enjoy regulated physical exercise even if done strenuously. There is a cumulative effect in the totality of the work and realizations accumulated in many lifetimes, just like many small streams converge to create a large river with a powerful current that sweeps away all obstacles. Every river starts with a small seasonal stream springing from some unassuming source, and only becomes a huge reservoir towards the end of its journey, enriched by all the small and not so small affluents that it will meet on its way. So when we see someone who seems to be a natural in yoga or spirituality, we must understand that this person has done a lot of sincere work in previous lifetimes and had a lot of experiences - some good, some bad, but all of them required a lot of effort to be faced and utilized in the proper way. Nothing comes automatically on this path, and there is no need of being envious or to think that such person is intrinsically special. Anyone can attain the same level, with the proper amount of work and effort, over the necessary length of time.

Krishna will confirm that in the next chapter, especially in 7.19 and 28: "After many lifetimes, one who has knowledge attains me, realizing that Vasudeva is everything. Such a great soul is very rare" (babunam janmanam ante jnanavan mam prapadyate vasudevah sarvam iti sah mahatma sudurlabhabh) and "Those who have put an end to all bad activities, have accumulated virtuous activities, and are completely liberated from the delusion of duality and firm in their determination, worship me" (yesam tv anta-gatam papam jananam punya karmanam, te dvandva moha nirmukta bhajante mam drdha vratabh).

तपस्विभ्योऽधिको योगी ज्ञानिभ्योऽपि मतोऽधिकः । कर्मिभ्यश्चाधिको योगी तस्माद्योगी भवार्जुन ॥ ६-४६ ॥

tapasvibhyo'dhiko yogī jñānibhyo'pi mato'dhikah । karmibhyaścādhiko yogī tasmādyogī bhavāṛjuna ॥ 6-46 ॥

tapasvibhyah: than the ascetics; adhikah: greater/ superior; yogī: the yogi; jñanibhyah: than the scholars; api: also; matah: considered; adhikah: greater; karmibhyah: of those who engage in ritualistic duties; ca: and; adhiko: greater; yogī: a yogi; tasmāt: therefore; yogī: a yogi; bhava: become; arjuna: o Arjuna.

"The yogi is superior to the ascetic and is considered also greater than a scholar and greater than those who perform (ritualistic) activities. Therefore, o Arjuna, you should be a yogi."

The entire Bhagavad gita teaches about yoga, a very complex and deep science that can take us to the highest perfection and fulfill the purpose of life. Therefore it is not a cheap subject, certainly not just about bodily positions and breathing exercises as many cheaters would have us believe.

There are six opulences that a human being can obtain, and three of them are considered more important than others - detachment, knowledge and prosperity. These can be attained by one's determined effort during one's lifetime even from a disadvantaged position, while the other three opulences - physical beauty and strength, and fame - largely depend on the good merits from one's previous lifetime, and are not really very useful to achieve the perfection of life. Moksha, liberation, is certainly not attained by physical efforts or through one's name and fame, or thanks to one's good looks. Prosperity can therefore be attained through good karma that includes the daily worship of the devas, knowledge can be attained through the cultivation of jnana or the study of scriptures, and detachment can be attained through the practice of sannyasa.

In the previous chapters, Krishna has already described the importance and benefits of karma (chapter 3), jnana (chapter 4) and sannyasa (chapter 5), and how to bring these practices to perfection through the application of yoga, that transforms them into karma yoga, jnana yoga and sannyasa yoga. He has also explained that this essence of yoga is called buddhi yoga, or the engagement of intelligence into the transcendental meaning and purpose of all actions, and that it is superior to all these practices. Similarly, it is called bhakti yoga, because it engages emotions and sentiments in the favorable service to the Transcendental Reality. The next chapter will explain that this essence of yoga is also called vijnana, because it focuses on the practical application of knowledge to the perception of Reality and one's choices in the service to the Divine. Being a yogi, as opposed to being an ascetic, a scholar or a performer of rituals, does not mean that a yogi can not or should not be detached and renounced, or underestimate knowledge, or to despise the proper performance of the duties required for the progress of the individual, the family and society. Rather, it means that a yogi knows that all these are means, and not the end. Asceticism is an instrument to train one's mind and control it, so that it will become able to concentrate easily on the contemplation of Transcendence. The cultivation of knowledge must be oriented towards the highest and most important knowledge, brahma jnana, and all other forms of knowledge should support this supreme purpose of life. And the performance of the karmas, or duties, should be dedicated to the Supreme in full transcendental renunciation and knowledge of the actual purpose of all yajnas: the Supreme Reality or Tattva, that is called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. In other words, by applying one's intelligence and devotion, a yogi can utilize everything else to attain perfection.

Last but not least, Krishna clearly gives his direct instruction: become a yogi. Arjuna has asked him to clarify his doubts once and for all, and this is exactly what Krishna is doing, not only for him, but for all of us.

योगिनामपि सर्वेषां मद्गतेनान्तरात्मना । श्रद्धावान्भजते यो मां स मे युक्ततमो मतः ॥ ६-४७ ॥

yogināmapi sarveṣāṃ madgatenāntarātmanā । śraddhāvānbhajate yo māṃ sa me yuktatamo mataḥ ॥ 6-47 ॥

yoginam: of the yogis; api: even; sarveṣāṃ: all; mad-gatena: fixed on me; antar-atmana: within his self; śraddhavan: who has faith; bhajate: who worships/ serves; yah: s/he; mam: me; sah: s/he; me: by me; yukta-tamah: the best of the yogis; matah: is considered.

"And among all yogis, one who worships/ serves me with faith and full concentration/ dedication, is considered by me as the greatest yogi."

In the previous verse, Krishna established that yoga is the spirit that can give life to asceticism, knowledge and the performance of ritualistic duties. We mentioned that such essence of yoga is also called buddhi yoga or bhakti yoga.

In this verse, Krishna confirms that even more powerful than intelligence, is the loving devotion that fixes the meditation to the Transcendental Reality in a dynamic contemplation. Again, the example of the lilas of Krishna in Vrindavana can help us understand how love and devotion can overpower any other consideration. The transcendental appearance and adventures of Krishna (janma karma ca me divyam, 4.9) are not comparable to the ordinary birth and activities of conditioned human beings: they are specifically planned to attract the attention of devotees and engage them in a blissful meditation, and at the same time to offer a wealth of wonderful symbolic teachings. This is the reason why the great Rishis composed the Puranas and Itihasas, the sacred scriptures that are most suitable for the simple-minded people of Kali yuga.

All Vedic scriptures contain many layers of meanings, and the adventures or lilas of the Lord and his eternal companions also participate to the same transcendental and multi-layered nature. Besides, Krishna will later declare (9.11) that only foolish people mistake his adventures for the ordinary activities of a normal human being (avajananti mam mudha manusim tanum asritam, param bhavam ajananto mama bhuta-mahesvaram) because they do not know that he is the Lord of all beings/ existences, and his nature is transcendental and supreme. This means that Krishna is always in control of everything that happens. Therefore, whatever events appear and develop in his adventures, they are precisely what he wanted them to be, just like a good theater director allows the play to develop seamlessly and naturally, but always remains in full control of the action, and uses it to convey symbolic meanings and his particular message. It is in this light that we must understand the adventures of Krishna and especially his most intimate relationships in Vrindavana - how the intense feelings of the gopis, both younger and older, and the other women there, including the wives of the brahmanas that were performing the sacrificial rituals when Krishna and Balarama sent their friends to ask for food. The bhakti sentiments or rasas of these apparently simple-minded women have madhurya, vatsalya or dasya characteristics, but they are always stronger than mere passive contemplation or santa, as usually manifested by the Vedic scholars, the sannyasi renunciates, and the ritualistic performers of the karma kanda.

The word bhajate is particularly important and interesting here. It comes from the root bhaj, that means "serving, worshipping, adoring, engaging the consciousness". From the same root we have the word bhajan, meaning "devotional songs". This same word was used in 6.31: yo mam bhajaty ekatvam asthitah, "one who worships me as the One who resides in all". We will also find it in the next chapters: catur vidha bhajante mam (7.16), te dvandva moha nirmukta bhajante mam (7.28), bhajanty ananya manaso (9.13), ye bhajanti tu mam bhaktya (9.29), api cet suduracaro bhajate mam ananya bhak (9.30), imam prapya bhajasva mam (9.33), iti matva bhajante mam budha (10.8), tesam satata yuktanam bhajatam priti purvakam (10.10), sa sarva vid bhajati mam (15.19). From the same root we have the word bhakti, that will also appear many times in the text of Gita. This supremacy of devotion to God in the practice of yoga is confirmed by Patanjali in his Yoga sutras, especially in 1.23: ishvara pranidhanad va, "(samadhi) can also be attained by dedicating oneself to Isvara (God)". Who is Isvara? The Yoga sutras immediately answer the question (1.24): klesha karman vipakashayair a-paramrshitah purusha-vishesha ishvarah, "Ishvara is that special Purusha who is Transcendent, and is never touched by sufferings or obstacles, by the actions and their consequences".

Chapter 7: Vijnana yoga

The Yoga of wisdom or applied knowledge

In the first 3 chapters, Krishna has been instructing Arjuna about the performance of one's duty, the distinction between the temporary body and the eternal Atman, the purpose of Yoga as the science of conscious action, the need to control one's mind, the meaning of detachment as selflessness, and the concept of duty as sacred action.

Then Krishna starts to speak about the transcendental level that is above duty and action, and the realization of Atman (3.17-18). However, even those who are already above action and duty should continue to act dutifully, because by their good example they can inspire and support society. Here, for the first time, Krishna speaks about himself and his own transcendental nature (3.22-24), to say that although he is certainly above all duties and actions, and yet he continues to perform those actions that are required for the protection and maintenance of the universe. After this brief comment, Krishna goes back to the subject of dutiful action according to one's position within the order of things in the universe, based on one's qualities and abilities. Again, he briefly mentions his divine nature in 3.30, saying that a yogi offers all his/ her activities to him. However, by the end of 3rd chapter, Krishna still presents himself as the equivalent of Atman/ Brahman, in a general transcendental way rather than a very personal way.

The 4th chapter becomes more specific, and Krishna begins to make a clear distinction between himself as a divine Personality, that is immensely different from all other personalities: he is the Supreme Lord of all creatures and states of being (4.6). Unlike the other individual manifestations of Brahman (the Jiva Atmans), Krishna is the supreme individual (Param Atman). Thus from the realization of Brahman, we move to the realization of Paramatma and Isvara. Krishna continues to speak about his own divine nature from 4.1 to 4.14, also revealing that the realization of his transcendental position is the secret to liberation.

Again from 4.15 to 4.43 and from 5.2 to 5.28, Krishna speaks about the sacred nature of dutiful selfless action, talking about Brahman and Nirvana, with only a brief mention about his own divine position (4.35). In 5.29 again Krishna states that one who knows him as the Supreme Lord of all planets, the purpose of sacrifices and the friend of all beings, attains peace.

The 6th chapter shifts the focus again on duty, yoga and the realization of the Paramatma, with 2 verses (6.14-15) and then again 2 more verses (6.30-31) stating that Krishna himself is personally the purpose of yoga and meditation. This concept is repeated in the last verse of the chapter (6.47).

In the 7th chapter, Krishna will speak much more about himself and his supreme nature, with only one exceptions when he does not mention himself (7.5) This focus on Krishna bhakti becomes so important that, while previously he spoke about detachment as the key to success, now he is speaking about attachment to him as the key to success on a higher level.

From 7.8 to the end of the chapter, we clearly see that Krishna is not an ordinary material personality, but an extraordinarily deep level of consciousness - that can be found in this world as the essence and support of everything that exists. However, not everybody is able to perceive Krishna because one needs to turn to him with an open mind. It becomes clear, therefore, that vijnana is equivalent to the supreme level of transcendental consciousness that we call Krishna consciousness - the complete and constant awareness that encompasses Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan, and includes all realities, material and spiritual. By directly connecting to this supreme consciousness, the yogi attains the highest position and the perfection of life.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

मय्यासक्तमनाः पार्थ योगं युञ्जन्मदाश्रयः ।

असंशयं समग्रं मां यथा ज्ञास्यसि तच्छृणु ॥ ७-१ ॥

mayyāsaktamanāḥ pārtha yogam yuñjanmadāśrayaḥ । asamsayaṁ samagraṁ māṁ yathā jñāsyasi tacchṛṇu ॥ 7-1 ॥

sri-bhagavan: the Lord; uvaca: said; mayi: to me; asakta: attached; manah: mind; pārtha: o son of Pritha; yogam: in yoga; yuñjan: uniting; mad-āśrayaḥ: taking shelter in me; asamsayam: without a doubt; samagram: completely; mam: me; yatha: thus; jñasyasi: you will know; tat: that; śrīnu: listen.

The Lord said: "Now listen, O Partha (son of Pritha), how by getting the mind to develop attachment for me through the practice of yoga and taking shelter in me, you will be able to know me completely and without any doubt."

The expressions mad-āśrayaḥ and mayy āsakta indicate that yoga requires the practice called isvara-pranidhana, or surrendering to God in his personal form, and developing a genuine personal relationship of devotion. The word samagram, "completely", does not refer to the idea of completely knowing God: that would be impossible because God is infinite and ever expanding. It refers to the fullness of the consciousness of the devotee, that is completely absorbed in Krishna consciousness, in the awareness of his complete perfections (bhagas) for which he is known as Bhagavan: power, beauty, knowledge, wealth, fame and detachment. The word asamsayam expresses complete certainty. Meditation on the Atman, described in the earlier chapters, must be supported by knowledge and renunciation to material identification and attachments, in order to realize its transcendental nature. However, it is a long and difficult method, and there is the danger of falling from the path. In alternative, such awareness can also be attained simply through devotional dedication to Bhagavan: isvara pranidhanat va (1.23), Isvara being the special being (purusha) that is not touched by sufferings and by the consequences of past actions that create attachments: klesha karman vipaka āśayāḥ āpara mṛista purusha vishesa isvaraḥ (1.24). So vijnana yoga is equated with bhakti yoga.

Of course, this path of bhakti yoga must also be supported by knowledge and renunciation, and this is why it is presented after the previous teachings about the disillusionment about material life, the difference between the body and the Self, the importance of performing one's duty with a pure and sincere consciousness, the knowledge of yoga, the renunciation to all forms of selfishness, and the science of meditation on Transcendental Reality. We should never take bhakti cheaply. It true that bhakti, devotion to the Personality of Godhead, is the fastest and surest path to perfection, and it is independent from the separate pursuit of learning and renunciation, but genuine bhakti includes knowledge and detachment from selfishness, for the simple fact that love for the Personality of Godhead is so pure and powerful that makes us forget all other concerns, desires, fears, and delusions. So when we find a person who claims to be situated in Krishna bhakti, but refuses to follow the instructions of Krishna as expressed in Bhagavad gita, we should immediately understand that s/he is a cheater - an ignorant pretender, or worse.

The word śrīnu, "listen", is the first step in the development of bhakti. The nine paths of the devotional practice are listed as śravaṇa ("listening"), kīrtana ("speaking"), smarana ("remembering"), vandana ("offering homage" or "glorifying with prayers"), pada sevana ("following the instructions"), dāsyā ("working in service"), pūjana ("worshiping"), sakhya ("behaving as a friend"), ātma-nivedanam ("fully dedicating oneself"). There are also nine steps in bhakti, known as śraddha ("faith"), sādhu saṅga ("association with good people"), bhajana kriyā ("engaging in sādhana - regulated devotional activities"), anartha nivṛitti ("abandoning one's bad habits and correcting one's defects"), nistha ("stability of consciousness"), ruci ("actual taste for spiritual life"), āsakti ("attachment" for spiritual life), bhava ("spontaneous devotional emotions"), and prema ("pure love for God").

ज्ञानं तेऽहं सविज्ञानमिदं वक्ष्याम्यशेषतः ।

यज्ज्ञात्वा नेह भूयोऽन्यज्ज्ञातव्यमवशिष्यते ॥ ७-२ ॥

jñānam te'haṁ savijñānamidaṁ vakṣyāmyaśeṣataḥ । yajjñātvā neha bhūyo'nyajjñātavyamavaśiṣyate ॥ 7-2 ॥

jnanam: knowledge; te: to you; aham: I; sa: together with; vijnanam: applied knowledge/ wisdom; idam: this; vakṣyami: I will tell; aśeṣataḥ: in details/ unlimited forms/ complete; yat: which; jñatva: by knowing na: not; iha: here; bhūyah: further/ again; anyat: anything else/ more; jñatavyam: to be known; avaśiṣyate: remains.

"I will tell you in detail that jnana and vijnana, knowing which nothing remains still to be known."

This chapter is dedicated to the vijnana yoga, or the "yoga of applied knowledge". The word jnana refers to theoretical knowledge, while vijnana refers to applied knowledge or wisdom. In the previous chapters Krishna spoke of detachment from material identification and belonging, and now he has started to speak about spiritual identification and attachment. Before building or cultivating spiritual knowledge, we need to make sure that our ground has been cleared from all material garbage, otherwise there will always be dangers in the future, and the plant of bhakti will be suffocated by the outgrowth of weeds.

Patanjali's Yoga sutras explain that "Yoga means cessation of the fluctuations of the awareness": yogah citta vritti nirodhab (Yoga sutras 1.2). The purpose of such cessation is to attain the clear realization of the Self, the Atman, expressed in verse 1.3 as tada drastuh sva-rupe avasthanam: "then (when the consciousness is stable), the witness (drasta) becomes firmly situated in one's true identification (the sva-rupa, that is actually true because it can never be lost)".

Verse 1.4 of Yoga sutras further clarifies, vritti sarupyam itiratra (1.4): "that (awareness) is opposite to the material identification with the mind and body (that is constantly changing)". These verses clearly state that the practice of yoga is meant to develop knowledge and wisdom, therefore we must expect anyone who practices yoga to be more than happy and competent to discuss such topics - not about health and fitness, rajasic or tamasic sense gratification, or other similar grossly materialistic pursuits.

Later on (Gita 13.8-12) Krishna will define what is knowledge, clearly mentioning the freedom from material identification (anahankara) and attachments (asakti), and the study of spiritual texts (adhyatma jnana) and understanding of the categories of reality (tattva-jnana). Not even once, in the vast expanse of the yoga shastra, we find a statement to suggest that the purpose of yoga is to get good health or a good-looking slim and trim body. Such material delusion has originated quite recently, when the Indian Yoga teachers came in contact with the Western mentality - characterized by the obsession with sexual attractiveness as a parameter of social acceptability - and should be considered one of the greatest disasters in Indian culture, comparable to the formulation of the notorious Aryan invasion theory. As stated in Bhagavata Purana (1.1.10), in Kali yuga people become manda, sumanda matayoh manda bhagya hi upadrutah: unfortunate, foolish and lazy, and misguided by bad teachings. Another interpretation of jnana and vijnana is given as material and spiritual respectively, or phenomenal ("pertaining to the effects") and numinous ("pertaining to the cause"). The words phenomenon and noumenon derive from the Greek language and were used by the ancient Greek philosophers.

The knowledge of Krishna includes both the material and spiritual manifestations, and in fact we see that the Bhagavata Purana, that is specifically dedicated to the knowledge of Bhagavan Sri Krishna, begins very much like Bhagavad gita - with the questions about duty and proper action, then explains "the first step in God realization" as Brahman and Paramatma, and then speaks about the creation of the material universe, the divisions of the cosmic manifestation, the calculation of time, the appearance of the various avatars, the principles of material nature, the cycle of material activities, the story of the descendants of Manu, the Surya dynasty and the Chandra dynasty, the geographical description of the universe, the prescribed duties for mankind, the varnashrama dharma, and the wars between the Suras and the Asuras. Of course all these stories and descriptions carry an immense wealth of spiritual information and instructions, especially in the form of dialog between the protagonists of the stories. Similarly, the entire vast ocean of Vedic knowledge can be considered "the science of Krishna", as by Krishna we intend the highest possible level of consciousness - eternity, knowledge and happiness - that is the complete Reality.

मनुष्याणां सहस्रेषु कश्चिद्यतति सिद्धये । यततामपि सिद्धानां कश्चिन्मां वेत्ति तत्त्वतः ॥ ७-३ ॥

manuṣyāṇāṃ sahasreṣu kaścidyatati siddhaye । yatatāmapī siddhānāṃ kaścinnmāṃ veti tattvataḥ ॥ 7-3 ॥ manuṣyanam: among the human beings; saahasreshu: (counted in the) thousands; kascit: (maybe) someone; yatat: makes efforts; siddhaye: towards perfection; yatatam: among those who strive for perfection; api: even; siddhanam: among those who have achieved perfection; kascit: (maybe) someone; maṃ: me; veti: knows; tattvataḥ: in truth.

"Among thousands of human beings, one may strive for perfection. And among all those who have achieved such perfection, one may actually come to know me."

Krishna wants to dissipate any illusion for those who might have thought that knowing him was something cheap and easy, that can give perfection without the need of too much effort (karma yoga), study (jnana) or renunciation (vairagya). Some foolish people delude themselves and others into thinking that, in order to be situated on the highest platform of spiritual realization, it is sufficient to make a show of some chanting, singing, dancing and eating good food, and fantasizing about romantic or erotic meetings between young Syamasundara and the cowherd girls. Others, equally foolish, believe that sectarian affiliation to some politicized materialistic religious organization is the only requisite to become "properly situated" on such highest platform of bhakti. But reality is quite different, as Krishna explicitly states here. First of all, one must sincerely and seriously strive to become perfect in the performance of one's prescribed duties and in the understanding of yoga and knowledge, as illustrated in the previous 6 chapters of Bhagavad gita. Then, after the sadbhava has attained such perfection, s/he can hope to actually approach the Lord - the actual Supreme Personality of Godhead, rather than a first-hand or second-hand mental projection of a fantasy character one may choose to call "Krishna".

The path of perfection is explained in Bhagavata Purana (1.2.17-21) as srinvatam sva-kathab krishnab ("listening to Krishna's discourses", which of course includes Krishna's instructions), punya sravana kirtanab ("a subject of discussion that brings good merits", because it inspires devotees to act dutifully), bridi antah-sthab hi abhadrani vidhumoti subrit satam ("by which the presence of the Lord becomes fixed in the heart and purifies the heart from all inauspicious things"), nashṭa prayesu abhadresu ("all bad things are destroyed), nityam bhagavata sevaya ("by the constant service to Bhagavan/ to the Bhagavata"), bhagavati uttama-sloke bhaktiḥ bhavati naistiki ("devotion to the Divine, glorified by sublime verses, becomes firmly and permanently established"), tada rajas tamo bhavah kama-lobbhadayah ca ye ceta etair anaviddham sthitam sattve prasidati ("thus the sadbhāka becomes firmly situated in sattva, goodness, without being influenced by the various forms of lust and greed and other material defects born from passion and ignorance").

Then, when the mind is perfectly satisfied on the spiritual level (evam prasanna manaso) one becomes united with Bhagavan in the Bhakti Yoga (bhagavad bhakti-yogataḥ) and at that time the applied knowledge of the reality of Bhagavan (bhagavat tattva vijnanam jayate) through the contact with the liberated level (mukta sangasya). All the knots of the heart are slashed (bhidhyate bhidaya granthibh) and all doubts find their answer (sarva samsayah kshiyante), because one can directly see (dristhe) that the soul and Lord (atmani isvare) are the purpose of one's activities (asya karmani). A sincere devotee should not underestimate the dangers of inconsistency, neglect towards the basic instructions and requirements, superficiality and artificiality.

भूमिरापोऽनलो वायुः खं मनो बुद्धिरेव च । अहंकार इतीयं मे भिन्ना प्रकृतिरष्टधा ॥ ७-४ ॥

bhūmīrāpo'nalo vāyuh kham mano buddhireva ca | ahaṅkāra itīyaṁ me bhinnā prakṛtirasṭadhā || 7-4 ||

bhumib: earth; apah: water; analo: fire; vayuh: air; kham: space/ ether; manah: mind; buddhib: intelligence; eva: as well as; ca: and; ahankara: material identification; iti: like this; iyam: all these; me: my; bhinna: separate/ distinct; prakritib: nature; ashtadha: eight fold.

"Earth, water, fire, air, ether, mind, intelligence and material identification: all these are the eight different forms of my prakriti."

Prakriti means "nature", and refers to the inherent power of God, the Supreme Reality. It is not possible to separate Reality from Power - there is no reality without power, and no power without reality. In the previous verse Krishna has stated that one should not take him cheaply, because it is not easy to obtain the true knowledge of his nature, and we should remember this warning while reading this verse, so that we do not take cheaply God's energies, too. Material nature - composed by the 8 elements - is not simply a creation of God: it is his actual nature, albeit "separated" (bhinna). What is the meaning of "separated"? It means that the elements composing the material bodies in this world are distinct from the principle of consciousness, called the Purusha or Atman. Why? Because the 8 elements of material nature are constantly transforming and they are subject to the action of time and space, they are meant to be the "field" in which the Purusha is working. Later (Gita 13.2-4) Krishna will speak about the kṣetra ("field") and the kṣetra-jna ("one who knows the field"). The Purusha or Atman is not transforming and is not subject to time and space: he is the active principle, that animates the inert matter. There are two Purushas (kṣetra jnas): the individual jivatma (irrespective of the gender of the body it is wearing) and the Supreme Lord, called param atma.

Another meaning of bhinna refers to the fact that in the primary creation of the universe, the original pradhana - that is described as Brahman itself - separates into the various categories of energy, thus manifesting the 8 material elements, the gunas, etc. Material science is meant to study the manifestations and the elements of nature, and many famous scientists have expressed their gratitude for the special insights they obtained from Vedic literature. Starting with the decimal system to the most advanced particle physics, one who reads Vedic literature with an open mind and a solid culture will be blessed with extraordinary realizations. Many people do not know that the so-called Arabic numbers were introduced in Europe by Arabs, who took them from India, as confirmed by many historians and scholars, including famous physicist Albert Einstein, author of the revolutionary relativity theory and the law of the photoelectrical effect (the basis of quanta theory) and Nobel Prize for Physics 1921. He declared, "We owe a lot to Indians who taught us how to count, without which no worthwhile scientific discovery could have been made." Hans Torwesten (born in Germany in 1944), author of Vedanta - Heart of Hinduism, wrote, "A fair number of leading physicists and biologists have found parallels between modern science and Hindu ideas". Brian David Josephson (born in Wales, 1940), pioneer of superconductivity and magnetic fields, director of the project of Unification Mind-Matter, and Nobel Prize 1973 for physics, wrote, "The Vedanta and the Sankhya hold the key to the laws of mind and thought process which are co-related to the Quantum Field, i.e. the operation and distribution of particles at atomic and molecular levels."

Werner Heisenberg wrote, "After the conversations about Indian philosophy, some of the ideas of Quantum Physics that had seemed so crazy suddenly made much more sense." He was the pioneer of quanta mechanics, the father of the "uncertainty principle of quantum theory" that carries his name, and Nobel Prize 1932 for the work that set the foundations for the discovery of the allotropic forms of hydrogen. At the end of the war he was appointed director of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Physics and he reorganized it until the transfer to Munich in 1958, when it was renamed Max Planck Institute for Physics and Astrophysics. He was also president for the German Research Council, chairman of the Commission for Atomic Physics, chairman of the Nuclear Physics Working Group, and president of the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation.

Other prominent scientific thinkers who shared the same opinion were Fritjof Capra (American of Austrian origin, founder of the Center for Ecoliteracy and author of The Tao of Physics: An Exploration of the Parallels Between Modern Physics and Eastern Mysticism), Erwin Schrodinger (Austrian physicist and political refugee, Nobel Prize 1933 for quantum mechanics, the author of What is Life? The Physical Aspect of the Living Cell, and Mind and Matter), David Bohm (one of the greatest physicists of quanta mechanics), John Archibald Wheeler (American theoretical physicist, who worked with Niels Bohr on the foundations of nuclear fission, introduced the S-matrix and created the expressions black hole, quantum foam and wormhole), Carl Sagan (astrophysicist and author of Cosmos), and Julius Robert Oppenheimer (known as the "father of the atomic bomb", author of the Born-Oppenheimer approximation, the electron-positron theory, the Oppenheimer-Phillips process and the first foundations of the quantum tunneling, of the modern theory of neutrino stars and black holes, quanta mechanics, the theory of the quantum field, and the interaction of the cosmic rays). Those who say that Vedic knowledge is incompatible with modern science are just plain ignorant.

अपरेयमितस्त्वन्यां प्रकृतिं विद्धि मे पराम् । जीवभूतां महाबाहो ययेदं धारयते जगत् ॥ ७-५ ॥

apareyamitastvanyāṁ prakṛtiṁ viddhi me parām | jīvabhūtāṁ mahābāho yayedam dhāryate jagat || 7-5 ||

apara: lower/ not higher; ayam: this; itab: besides; tu: but; anyam: another; prakṛti: nature; viddhi: you should know; me: mine; param: higher; jīva-bhūta: the living beings; maha-bāho: o mighty armed; yaya: by whom; idam: this; dhāryate: is sustained; jagat: the universe.

"O mighty-armed (Arjuna), know that besides this lower prakṛti there is also another - the living beings by which the universe is upheld."

The two prakṛtis (natures) mentioned in this verse are the two "energies" of God: the material elements of creation and the spiritual spark. Later in verses 13.2-4, Krishna himself gives another definition of the difference between the two when he speaks of the ksheṭra ("the field") and the ksheṭra-jña ("the knower of the field"), implying that everything is based on consciousness or knowledge. The spiritual spark is called "superior" because it is the direct manifestation of Shakti, while the material elements are called "inferior" because they are a secondary manifestation of the same Shakti. Just like the senses are more powerful than the sense objects, and the mind is more powerful than the senses, so the jīvatman is more powerful than the mind.

Some people believe that there are two separate divine Shaktis, of which one is inferior to the other, but this is not a fact. Shakti is one, but manifests in many forms, just like electricity is perceived differently as light, heat, magnetic field, sound, motion, waves, and even as coldness (as in a freezer), logical processing (as in computers), and so on. Thus we find several different definitions of Shakti, such as bahiranga shakti ("external potency"), tatbasta shakti ("marginal potency"), antaranga shakti ("internal potency"), bladini shakti ("pleasure potency"), cit shakti ("consciousness potency"), avaranaṭmika shakti ("covering potency"), prakṣhepatmika shakti ("attracting potency") and so on. The two prakṛtis mentioned by Krishna in this verse are respectively the bahiranga shakti ("external potency") and the tatbasta shakti ("marginal potency"); we should note that Krishna says "there are two energies" and not "there are only two energies". This is a very important distinction, that we need to understand clearly.

Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.8) states, parasya shaktir vividhāna sṛjate svabhāviki jñāna-bala-kriyā ca, "The Supreme is known to have many Shaktis, that by their own nature manifest as knowledge, strength and activity."

The word dhāryate means "supporting"; it derives from the same root of the word dharma. The living entities participate to the divine play of creation, maintenance and dissolution by performing their specific dharmic duties as per their guṇa and karma. The idea that the living entities are in this world to "exploit" and "enjoy" it, as suggested by some commentators, is the very basis of our delusion that keeps us imprisoned in material identification and attachment. People may be deluded into thinking they are the owners and enjoyers of material nature, but it is just an illusion, a faulty concept that is projected by the elements of material nature itself - abankara, buddhi and manas. When a person is less evolved, s/he is conditioned by ignorance, manifesting as material identification and attachments, compared to bondages: therefore the Atman is called baddha jīva ("bonded soul") as opposed to mukta jīva ("liberated soul"). Some commentators believe that these two categories of conditioned souls and liberated souls are intrinsically different, and therefore they call them nitya baddha ("eternally conditioned") and nitya mukta or nitya siddha ("eternally liberated" or "eternally perfect"). While we can accept the idea that there are indeed nitya siddha personalities, that have always been situated at the highest level of consciousness because they are direct emanations of the Divine on a higher platform, the idea of nitya baddha souls (as intrinsically conditioned souls that can never attain the level of liberation) is totally unfounded, as it is not confirmed in any genuine śāstra that we know of. Of course, we have seen that sometimes words are used in a relative sense - for example, amara ("immortal") as applied to the Devas living on the higher planets is not exactly correct because the Devas, too, come to the end of their lives when the universe is withdrawn... the definition applies more to the "eternal position" in the universal administration that will be filled by different personalities from time to time.

Similarly, the "eternity" of the samsara or cycle of births and death should be interpreted as the eternal law of cyclic manifestation in the material universe, that comes into being at each new creation. Thus, when we speak of nitya baddha souls, it means that the jīvatman has the free will to choose to remain in the material universe indefinitely, disappearing and reappearing at each dissolution and manifestation of the universe, until s/he chooses otherwise. Conditioning, as a manifestation of ignorance, is called asat precisely because it is temporary and illusory. As Krishna has already explained very clearly in 2.16, sat can never become asat, and asat can never become sat. What is illusory, temporary and bad does not really exist. Claiming that the nitya baddha jīvas are eternally or ontologically conditioned by ignorance and impermanence because of their permanent nature is a serious contradiction in terms - it amounts to saying that asat is sat.

एतद्योनीनि भूतानि सर्वाणीत्युपधारय । अहं कृत्स्नस्य जगतः प्रभवः प्रलयस्तथा ॥ ७-६ ॥

etadyonini bhūtāni sarvāṇītyupadhāraya | ahaṁ kṛtsnasya jagataḥ prabhavaḥ pralayaḥ || 7-6 ||

etat: these; yonini: from the sources; bhūtāni: living beings/ states of existence; sarva: all; iti: thus; upadhāraya: (you should) understand; aham: I; kṛtsnasya: of everything; jagataḥ: the universe; prabhavaḥ: the source of creation; pralayaḥ: the cause of dissolution; tatha: also.

"Know that all the things/ beings come from these two matrices. (Thus) I am the origin of the creation and the destruction of the entire universe."

Everything that exists in the universe is composed by the interaction of matter and spirit. Even what appears to be dull and inert matter is actually permeated by consciousness, albeit in a low and faint degree. According to the Vedic vision, even mountains and hills, rivers and oceans are living beings, although they do not appear to be characterized by the usual symptoms of life - birth, growth, reproduction, dwindling and death. The fact of the matter is that they simply have life cycles that are too long and their changes are too imperceptible for us to notice, just like our life as human beings would appear eternal and unchanging to those small insects who live only for the short period of one of our days. And we can see that even minerals can transform with time and the change of circumstantial conditions - compressed coal turns into diamonds, rocks turn into sand and dust, and so on. Any corpse, any dead body - human, animal or vegetal - is still teeming with life in the form of microbes, bacteria, molds, spores and worms. Similarly there are many disembodied entities, such as ghosts and spirits, that are still considered living beings because they have a body made of subtle, but still material, elements - mind, intelligence and ego (manasa, buddhi, abankara).

We need to keep our minds open and allow the possibility that actually conventional knowledge, modern mainstream science and popular wisdom may not be perfect or right, and that there are still many things to be known and understood in our universe. What would be the harm in hypothetically accepting the idea that Vedic knowledge can still teach us something, if we sincerely make an effort to study and understand the peculiar language it uses? Why shouldn't we put aside the so-called "modern scientific" prejudices and make a fully hearted attempt at experimenting the teachings of the Vedas exactly according to the method given in the Vedas themselves, and see what comes out of it?

The so-called modern science of mainstream conventional western academia has developed empirically in the last 300 years, and in spite of having full credence and support from government, media, schools and general people, it has created more problems than solutions, still leaving a lot of gaps and unanswered questions, and often undergoing dramatic changes of scenario because of new "revolutionary" discoveries, especially at its top levels as we have seen in the commentary of a previous verse. If the "scientific system" was really objective and unbiased, school books should be re-written every 10 years or even more often, and the "uncomfortable evidence" should not be swept under the rug and kept from the public knowledge.

Krishna states in this verse that he is the origin of both matrices - the material and the spiritual - and therefore he knows how they work. An intelligent reader, with an open scientifically inclined mind, will be happy to listen to Krishna's explanations and put such knowledge to the test in the laboratory of practical life, without prejudice or bias, and incorporate the results without being obstructed by false egotism and envy. There is nothing to lose in the process. The word yonī ("matrix") used in this context is particularly interesting, because it clearly defines Shakti as the Feminine principle, the Mother Goddess that is at the root of the manifestation of the cosmos. This means that both material nature and the jīvatman are feminine in nature, and parts and parcels of the Mother Goddess; also feminine is the illusory energy māyā, that acts in the material mode as Mahamāyā or in the spiritual mode as Yogamāyā.

मत्तः परतरं नान्यत्किञ्चिदस्ति धनञ्जय । मयि सर्वमिदं प्रोतं सूत्रे मणिगणा इव ॥ ७-७ ॥

mattah parataram nānyatkiñcidasti dhananjaya । mayi sarvamidaṁ protaṁ sūtre maṇiganaḥ iva ॥ 7-7 ॥

mattah: than me; parataram: higher; na: not; anyat: other; kiñcit: there is; asti: there is; dhananjaya: o conqueror of wealth (Arjuna); mayi: in me; sarvam: all; idam: this; protam: strung/ woven/ connected; sūtre: thread; maṇi-gana: a series of pearls; iva: like.

"O Dhananjaya (Arjuna), there is absolutely nothing superior to me. Everything rests on me, like pearls are strung on a thread."

All creations are formed by the interaction between the spiritual spark and the material elements, but still both these natures rest on the transcendental existence of Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. Before the manifestation of the universe, only the Transcendental Reality existed, one and undivided. Then pradhana manifested as the total aggregate of existence, and the jīvatmans, sparks of the Transcendental Reality, entered into the pradhana, like the seed enters the field and takes birth by developing a body. Actually we could say that the Supreme One entered the pradhana in the form of innumerable sparks known as the jīvatma: eko 'ham bahu syam prajayeyeti, "I am one, but I manifest myself into many" (Chandogya Upanishad 6.2.3). This is not easy to understand, because of the eternal and unchangeable nature of the Transcendental Reality; we could compare the process with the generation of an offspring, by which the parent does not become diminished at all. In fact later (14.4) Krishna will clearly say that he is the father of all living beings (aham bija pradah pitah). Each and every emanation is complete and perfect in itself, yet the Supreme remains complete and perfect: purnam adah purnam idam, purnat purnam udacyate, purnasya purnam adayah, purnam eva avasishyate (Invocation at the beginning of the Upanishads of the Sukla Yajur Veda, including the Isha Upanishad).

Katha Upanishad (2.2.13) states, nityo nityam cetanas cetananam, eko bahunam yo vidadhati kaman, "God is the eternal reality from whom all eternal realities emanate, the conscious soul among all the conscious souls, but alone he is providing for the necessities of all". The Supreme also manifests as the pradhana: eka-desa-sthitas yagner jyotsna vistarini yatha parasya brahmanah saktis tathedam akhilam jagat, "From one single place (existence), Brahman expands everywhere in the form of its energies, just like the radiance of a fire that pervades the entire universe. (Vishnu Purana, 1.22.53). Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.16) states, sa visva krd visva vid atma-yonir jnab kalakalo guni sarva vid yah, pradhana-ksbetra jna-patir gunesab samsara-moksha-sthiti-bandhabhetub, "God has created the world and knows the entire universe. He has no other origin or matrix than himself, he is the beginningless origin of time, the origin of the gunas and possesses all knowledge and all qualities, and he is the Lord of the gunas, of knowledge and pradhana. He binds the jivas in the samsara, keeps them there and guides them to liberation, too."

Svetasvatara Upanishad (3.8-9) says, vedāham etam puruṣam mahantam, aditya-varṇam tamasāḥ parastat, tam eva viditvati mrityum eti nanyāḥ pantha vidyate āyanaya, yasmat param naparam asti kincid yasman naniyo no jīyao asti kincit, vrikṣha iva stabdho divi tishtati ekas tēnedam purnam puruṣena sarvām, "I know this Supreme Puruṣa, whose color is like the sun dissipating the darkness. One who knows him can conquer death: this is the only path. Nothing is superior to him, either in greatness or in subtle pervasiveness. Like a tree, he remains in the spiritual sky, and yet pervades the entire universe."

रसोऽहमप्सु कौन्तेय प्रभास्मि शशिसूर्ययोः । प्रणवः सर्ववेदेषु शब्दः खे पौरुषं नृषु ॥ ७-८ ॥

raso'hamapsu kaunteya prabhāsmi śaśisūryayoḥ । praṇavaḥ sarvavedeṣu śabdaḥ khe pauruṣaṁ nṛṣu ॥ 7-8 ॥

rasaḥ: taste; aham: I (am); apsu: in water; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); prabha: the radiance/ light/ power; asmi: I am; śaśisūryayoḥ: of the moon and the sun; praṇavaḥ: the praṇava; sarva-vedeṣu: in all the Vedas; śabdaḥ: the sound; khe: in space; pauruṣam: capability; nṛṣu: in human beings.

"O son of Kunti, I am the taste of water, the radiance of the moon and of the sun. I am the praṇava omkara in all the Vedas, I am sound in space, and capability in human beings."

In the previous verses, Krishna has clearly stated his divine nature, saying that he is the origin of both the material and spiritual existence, the father of all the living entities and the foundation of the universe. Now, he is elaborating on the meaning of "divine nature". Some people imagine God simply as a powerful person, some kind of king, who lives in a nice place somewhere in the sky, knows everything, sees everything, and constructed the world and created people because he was bored, then gave those creatures a number of laws - those who obey his laws will go to heaven and those who disobey will go to hell.

Things become more complicated because of a number of delusional people claiming to know "something new" about God - new messages, new laws and orders, new stories - which is of course impossible to verify and sometimes even to question, but usually have no deeper symbolic meaning attached and often are contrary to the fundamental principles of ethics, logic and common sense. In this deviant ideologies, people are discouraged to ask questions or even to try to understand things - because it's all "a mystery". Bhagavad gita offers a very different scenario, and it certainly does not ask us to believe simply out of loyalty. Rather, it goes a great length to explain things under different perspectives so that we might understand its science, verify it for ourselves and become Self-realized. The big difference is that in Vedic knowledge, God realization is Self realization. The concept of God is much deeper and vaster than what most people think and expect. The transcendental presence of God can be perceived everywhere in this world by a sensitive and pure soul as the intrinsic and pure source of happiness (rama means "happiness") - the fresh and sweet taste of water, the smell of clean earth, the light of sun and moon, the warmth of fire, and the feeling of life itself. Subtler energies are also divine, such as the primordial sound vibration from which everything comes to being, and the ability/ capability of action in human beings.

The word rasa means "taste" and can be applied at many levels. Taittiriya Upanishad (2.7) states, raso vai saḥ, rasam hy evayam labdhvanandibhavarati, "God is the taste, and everybody finds happiness by tasting a drop of it." This taste is obviously not limited to the sensory experience of the material tongue, but it can also include it, as we see in the concept of the sacredness of prasadam, the food offered to God and then shared by devotees and public. A person who is spiritually active or at least firmly situated in sattva can easily taste the difference between the food that has been offered to God and the exact same recipe but cooked with a selfish materialistic mentality. The connection between water and taste is significant. Contemporary conventional academic knowledge says that pure water is colorless, odorless and tasteless because it contains nothing that triggers taste receptors, but the people who have written these definitions had their sensitivity damaged by bad habits such as smoking, drinking alcoholic beverages, and even consuming industrial food "enhanced" with artificial flavorings, spoiled foods and foods that are hot, spicy, pungent, or downright disgusting - what is diplomatically called today "an acquired taste" - such as fermented fish sauce, some types of fermented cheese, etc. Besides, the water they may have tasted is usually dead water, distilled or processed industrially to make it "safe to drink" and stored in containers for quite some time, generally both before and after the treatments.

Krishna's presence in this world is subtler than that, and can only be perceived by those who have purified their tongue by observing a proper sattvic/ spiritual diet and life habits. Any evolved human being who is situated on the platform of sattva can experience the true taste of fresh clean and lively water as sweet as nectar (amṛita), the best drink that one can possibly have. Unfortunately, the number of people who can afford to even taste such water - if only once in their lifetime - is rapidly decreasing, and may become practically zero in a few short years, due to the spreading of pollution and industrial consumerism at global level. Another important point is that water as mentioned in this verse applies to the essence of liquidity that is present in all liquids. Nobody, even the cleverest scientist, can actually feel any taste when they are really thirsty, the food is dry and their mouth is dry. To get any taste from what they are eating, they need some moisture. Do the experiment and verify for yourself: this is much more scientific than playing parrots and blindly repeating the words of the "academic authorities" when they dish out their pontificating nonsense.

On a different level of meaning, rasa indicates the taste of the sentiment of devotion that the bhakta experiences towards God. There are several varieties of such sentiments or feelings, some primary and some secondary, and all are considered perfectly legitimate and virtuous. The most intimate and intense rasa - called parakīya sringara rasa - is the sentiment of a secret lover, exemplified by the love of the gopis of Vrindavana towards Krishna. Their feelings were so overwhelming that they completely forgot everything else, and even appeared to have lost their mental sanity. Slightly less intimate and intense is the svakiya srīngara rasa - the sentiment of a legitimate spouse - exemplified by the queens of Krishna in Dvaraka; such feelings are also so strong that the devotee forgets the divine position of the Lord in the desire to please him and serve him. Next is the vatsalya rasa, that we can define as motherly and fatherly affection, exemplified in Krishna's lila not only by Yasoda and Nanda and Devaki and Vasudeva, but also by all the elder gopis and gopas, the elder inhabitants of Vrindavana, Mathura, Dvaraka, all the elder relatives of Krishna, Krishna's gurus Garga Muni and Sandipani Muni, and even the cows who were overwhelmed by ecstasy at the thought that Krishna would drink their milk. This vatsalya rasa can become mixed with sakhyā rasa, as in those friends and relatives of Krishna who appeared to be only slightly older than Krishna, such as Balarama the elder brother of Krishna, and the two eldest Pandavas Yudhisthira and Bhimasena. Sakhyā rasa is the sentiment of friendship among peers, exemplified by the young cowherd boys in Vrindavana, by Arjuna (4.3, 11.41-42) and by all those who appeared in Krishna's lila to be of the same age of Krishna. This sentiment can also become mixed with the dasya rasa - relationship of service towards a superior - when appears in those who appeared in Krishna's lila to be younger than Krishna - such as the smallest gopas and gopis, and Arjuna's younger brothers Nakula and Sahadeva. By itself, dasya rasa is very respectful and submissive, and it is exemplified by the sons of Krishna at Dvaraka, by his house servants both in Vrindavana and Dvaraka, his soldiers, and his devotees in general. Uddhava as a young relative of Krishna also accepted him as his master and teacher, and received his instructions in the Bhagavata Purana. The same sentiment can also be observed in the environment of Krishna, including the calves and cows that Krishna takes to the pastures, the animals of the forest, the tree, the grass, and even the water of the rivers. We must not make the serious mistake of evaluating bhakti according to the material criteria, and seeing Krishna's personal companions as "just animals" or "just uneducated girls".

The main rasas can also become tinged by secondary rasas such as virya (heroism in battle), bhayanaka (fear), hasya (humor), karuna (compassion) and adbhuta or vismaya (amazement), manifested in observing Krishna's activities, including some extraordinary roles that Krishna played in his lila. In observing the activities of other persons directed towards Krishna, such as devotees offering prayers or enemies attacking him, other secondary rasas can appear such as raudra (anger) and bibhatsa (disgust).

The most elementary of the main rasas is santa ("peacefulness"), that consists in the realization and appreciation of Krishna's exceptional qualities and transcendental position; this sentiment is expressed in all the prayers we find in the Puranas and Itihasas. The light of the moon and the sun is actually the brahmajyoti, the light of the Brahman, that reaches us filtered through the various layers of material elements. Krishna is also the origin and the basis of the Brahman (14.27, brahmano hi pratistha aham) and so we can just imagine what Krishna is talking about when he speaks about himself. The word prabha does not mean simply "light", because both the moon and the sun have other powers besides supplying illumination.

The sun's energy includes UV rays, which disinfect liquids and solids and stimulate the growth of plants, and infrared rays, which produce heat. Between the ultraviolet and the infrared frequencies there is a series of "nice colored rays" that have a variety of properties not yet fully explored by conventional mainstream science - such as the healing power of green light, the relaxing power of the blue light, the metabolism-stimulating power of the yellow light and so on. These specific properties may not have been recognized by academic physicists, but they have been empirically verified and effectively utilized for several years already by market strategists in the choice of colors for interior decoration or various equipments.

A suitable elaboration on the pranava omkara in Vedic literature and tradition is too bulky to be presented here, therefore we will refer to later verses on this subject (9.17, 17.23-24). Pranava means "of the prana", and refers to the fact that the omkara (the sound AUM) is the fundamental sound of the energy, the subtle life air that constitutes the magnetic field of the living organism and is created by the Atman in the body. All sounds are created from the basic sound AUM, which makes speech and communication and knowledge possible. The expression pauruṣam translates ability or potency and sometimes even manliness, but it does not refer to the biological function that modern society tries to enhance through medications such as Viagra. It has a much deeper meaning, connected with the other concepts expressed in these verses in regard to the important supportive role (dharma) of human beings in the universe.

पुण्यो गन्धः पृथिव्यां च तेजश्चास्मि विभावसौ । जीवनं सर्वभूतेषु तपश्चास्मि तपस्विषु ॥ ७-९ ॥

puṇyo gandhaḥ pṛthivyāṁ ca tejaścāsmi vibhāvasau | jīvanam sarvabhūteṣu tapaścāsmi tapasviṣu || 7-9 ||

puṇyaḥ: original/ attractive/ pure/ good/ auspicious; gandhaḥ: fragrance/ smell; pṛthivyām: in earth; ca: and; tejaḥ: heat/ power; ca: and; asmī: I am; vibhāvasau: in fire; jīvanam: life; sarva-bhūteṣu: in all living beings; tapah: austerity; ca: and; asmī: I am; tapasviṣu: in those who practice austerity.

"I am the good/ pure smell in earth, I am the heat in fire, I am life in all beings, and I am austerity in ascetics."

What taste is to water, scent is earth. The word puṇya is generally referred to saintly activities, such as hearing and talking about the Transcendental Reality (puṇya śravaṇa kīrtanab, Bhagavata Purana 1.2.17, 10.41.16). In Bhagavad gītā it is referred to the activities that must be performed in order to accrue merits (6.41, 7.28, 8.28, 9.20, 9.33, 18.71, 18.75). So we should not think that puṇya gandham just means "good smell". Literally, puṇya means "pure and pristine, not decayed, not decomposed", and therefore it can also be translated as "pure, clean, healthy, original, attractive, good, auspicious". We understand that the bad smell comes from decomposition and impurity, that are manifestations of tamas or ignorance.

Just like the pure original water that we can find in uncontaminated nature, pure original earth or clay is actually a very purifying substance - whatever the conventional contemporary knowledge may say, and as proven practically by many individuals and groups that work in the field of natural medicine. Applications of pure original clay (mud) packs on wounds actually clean them, spontaneously extracting any impurities and splinters, and can even remove pus from a closed wound that has become infected, or from otherwise contaminated body parts, including tumors. On a more daily basis, clay "masks" are used in natural beauty practice to heal and remove pimples and skin impurities of all kinds, and many commercial companies have been producing clay-based cosmetics for many years, with increasing success. And just as with water, the purity of earth has become increasingly jeopardized and destroyed by the advancing pollution and non-sustainable development, so that in the future it will be more and more difficult to actually find clean earth in the natural state in the environment... in subservience of the "self-fulfilling prophecy" that "mud is dirt", and therefore we can and should throw all kinds of contaminating things into the soil, "where they belong".

In the proper order of things, the purity of water and earth is ensured by the powerful rays of the sun, that disinfects and energizes, burns and regenerates the material elements. This purifying effect of the sun, too, is being threatened by the increasing air and space pollution, from industrial fumes (causing acid rains), nuclear radiation fallout, smog from the burning of fossil fuels, excess carbon dioxide and monoxide, ozone depletion, to the notorious chemtrails.

Tejas is the powerful destructive energy that purifies everything by burning, the remedy that is applied by the laws of nature to bring back the balance in the universe. This power manifests primarily as fire and sun, but also in the microcosm of the human body as the jataragni, the "fire in the belly" that digests foods, and the solar plexus that irradiates the energy of determination and will power. It is important to notice here that in Vedic language, fire also includes everything that "burns", including chemicals acids, such as the hydrochloric acid produced by our stomach. The primary elemental nature of the radiance of sun/ fire called tejas (also mentioned in the next verse) is highlighted here by the name Vibhvasu referred to the Deity of fire, where vibha means "shining with great brilliance" and vasu means foundations", "that which resides". The Vasus are the eight principles of the cosmic manifestation, sometimes referred as the "material elements", but that definition creates confusion because they can be mistaken for the 8 elements previously mentioned by Krishna (7.4) as bhumih apah analah vayuh kham manah buddhib ahankara. The personifications of these Vasus are called fire as Agni ("burning") or Anala ("lively"), earth as Prithivi ("wide") or Dhara ("that which supports"), wind as Vayu ("wind of life") or Anila ("breath of life"), space as Antariksha ("what is seen in the middle") or Aha ("pervading"), the sun as Aditya ("eternal") or Pratyusha ("he who follows dawn"), the sky as Dyaus ("luminous") or Prabhasa ("radiant") also connected to sunset, the moon as Chandra ("illustrious") and Chandramasa (the lunar month) or Soma (the rejuvenating plant). Nakshatra (the aggregate of constellations) is also strictly connected to Dhruva (the pole star) and with the Sapta Rishis (the Seven Sages) that compose the most famous constellation in the sky: the Great Dipper or Ursa Maior.

Dhruva is also known as Svetadvipa, the prapancika vaikuntha planet in each universe. The primary principles of the universe are also categorized in a slightly different way as the Adityas, that are 12 aspects of the sun: Mitra, Aryaman, Bhaga, Varuna, Daksha, Amsa, Tvastri, Pushan, Vivasvat, Savitri, Sakra and Vishnu. The other group of categories, called the 11 Rudras, are the aspects of Shiva or the Purusha principle: Atma (the individual soul), Ananda (happiness), Vijnana (knowledge), Manas (the mind), Prana (the vital energy), Vac (the faculty of speech), Isana (the dominating principle), Tatpurusha (that activating principle), Aghora (nothing is horrible), Vamadeva (pleasant Lord) and Sadyojata (appearing quickly). Life in all living beings is again, the Atman/ Brahman, that is the main subject of all Vedic scriptures.

Tapasya is the deliberate practice of tolerating difficulties for a higher purpose; it is another form of tejas because it creates power, especially for the creation, the preservation and the dissolution of the universe. In a sense, it is one of the primary principles of the cosmos, too.

बीजं मां सर्वभूतानां विद्धि पार्थ सनातनम् ।

बुद्धिर्बुद्धिमतामस्मि तेजस्तेजस्विनामहम् ॥ ७-१० ॥

bījaṁ māṁ sarvabhūtānāṁ viddhi pārtha sanātanam । buddhirbuddhimatāmasmi tejastejasvināmaham ॥ 7-10 ॥

bijam: the seed; maṁ: me; sarva-bhutanam: of all beings; viddhi: (you should) know; pārtha: o son of Pritha; sanatanam: eternal; buddhib: the intelligence; buddhimatam: in those who are intelligent; asmī: I am; tejah: the radiance; tejasvinam: in all the things that resplend; aham: I (am).

"O Partha, know that I am the eternal seed of all existences/ all beings, I am intelligence in the intelligent, and I am the powerful radiance in the powerful."

Krishna is the seed, or principle, or essence, of everything - all beings, all species of life and all existences. The seed of material existences is eternal, albeit its manifestations appear and disappear in cycles, and keep changing. The word bija is also used for the technical proceedings of worship and rituals, as the "seed sound" from which the mantras and the personal presence of the Deity are manifested. So we can understand that here the definition does not simply apply to the sperm that fertilizes the egg in the animal forms of life, or the grain from which the plant sprouts. It is rather the power of life, the knowledge or consciousness contained in the blueprint of existence, that blossoms into full bloom in the cycle of creation.

The attribute sanatana, "eternal", adds a new layer of meaning, indicating that at the time of the dissolution of the universe all existences and all living beings are withdrawn and absorbed again into the timeless Brahman, the Maha Vishnu Narayana, "the shelter of all", to be manifested again at the beginning of a new cycle of creation. This is another reminder of how the Divine presence or existence should not be taken cheaply. Sometimes this sanatana sarva-bhutanam bija is interpreted as the pradhana, the primary non-manifested aggregate of existence that remains eternally even after the dissolution of the universe, the Shakti that develops the divine seed into the various forms and that is also eternal - the pradhana - albeit the forms that she creates are appearing and disappearing in cycles. Again, this is non-different from Brahman. The intelligence in those who are intelligent is a very interesting principle. It can be defined as a sharper awareness or consciousness, and this brings us back to the intimate nature of the Atman/ Brahman, that is fundamentally consciousness. We have already seen how in Bhagavad gita Krishna keeps presenting intelligence as the most important factor in progress, both in material and spiritual life. Such intelligence is created by the accumulation of punya or results of virtuous activities, especially the sincere performance of one's duties, and by the effort and desire one invests in obtaining one's purpose.

The expression tejas (on which we already elaborated in the previous verse commentary) translates "power" but in its natural form, that radiance of energy/ vibrations/ aura that characterizes truly powerful personalities (7.10, 10.41, 11.17, 11.30, 11.47), just like heat and light immediately reveal the presence of fire.

In human society, it is generally applied to kshatriyas and brahmanas (16.3, 18.43) especially in the meaning of "courage", but in 11.19 and 11.30 the word tejas is specifically applied to the form of Time, that devours and burns everything, covering the universe with its radiance and power. In 15.12 it is applied to the sun and the fire. This same meaning is also expressed in Bhagavata Purana (1.1.1) tejo vari mridam, "sun/ fire, water and earth", which also connects the idea of fiery power together with water and earth like in the two previous verses of Bhagavad gita (7.8-9). After all, earth is produced by the union of fire and water - the first elemental components of the universe, that create the stars and the planets.

बलं बलवतां चाहं कामरागविवर्जितम् । धर्माविरुद्धो भूतेषु कामोऽस्मि भरतर्षभ ॥ ७-११ ॥

balam balavatām cāham kāmārāgavivarjitam । dharmāviruddho bhūteṣu kāmo'smi bharatarṣabha ॥ 7-11 ॥

balam: strength; balavatam: of those who are strong; ca: and; aham: I (am); kama-raga-vivarjitam: free from lust and attachment; dharma aviruddha: not against the dharma; bhuteshu: in the living beings; kama: desire/ pleasure; asmi: I am; bharatarṣabha: o best among the descendants of Bharata.

"O best of the Bharata dynasty (Arjuna), I am the strength of the strong who is free from lust/ selfishness and attachment. In all beings, I am the (sexual) desire that is not contrary to dharma."

The strength (balam) mentioned in this verse is connected with the tejas of the two previous verses, and with the intelligence (buddhi) of the intelligent mentioned in verse 7.10. Like splendor and intelligence, strength is a shakti attribute of the Supreme Lord, but just like in the feminine/ masculine couple of pradhana and brahman, the "genders" are switched. This is an important point that we should remember every time we contemplate the Supreme Deity pictured in an apparently male or female form: the Divine is not limited like the embodied conditioned souls, and it would be a mistake to project human social conventions on God, even if God plays some roles in the performance of the avatara lilas.

Here balam is further defined by the expression kama-raga-vivarjitam: free from lust and attachment. This is particularly important because tejas, balam and buddhi are required for the protection of the individual and society, but can be very badly misused and therefore become a great danger for everyone. A person that is controlled by lust, selfishness and attachment but has no strength, power or intelligence can do very little harm, so before training people to help them develop greater power or strength, we should make sure that they are fit candidates. This is the logic of the gurukula system, where all children are first examined and tested by the guru to ascertain which position they should occupy in society and what kind of training they should receive in that capacity. Re-establishing this educational system is one of the most important priorities in rebuilding a functional society.

In contemporary conventional education (usually called "western") teachers do not have any responsibility towards the proper development of the children, either on the level of the knowledge of the subjects or on the level of ethical principles. Like the members of governments, teachers are appointed by an impersonal "authority" that calculates merits on the basis of academic certificates and other similar criteria, with a great emphasis on the ideological conformity and allegiance to the "official version". So when the students fail in learning their curriculum or in developing the proper qualities and skills, or in becoming useful members of society, the teachers are not held responsible. Their job is just to tell the students to read the text books approved by the school management or the government education board, and if some teachers have a passion for their subject and go the extra mile to inspire students to understand and appreciate it, they are scarcely recognized or supported. The worst situation seems to be in India, where even the students from the lowest grades of elementary schools need to get regular tuition from private teachers or institutions besides the normal school attendance, if they want to have any chance to passing the test. The reason for this disaster is mainly the casteist discrimination enforced by the government system that rewards backwardness, irresponsibility, and a heavily politicized approach, totally disregarding intelligent, ethical values, merit and actual need - both for the appointment of teachers and for the enrollment of students. Since priority is given to non-brahmins, people learn that the brahminical qualifications are to be considered an obstacle to education, so the general population becomes more and more alienated from the Vedic heritage, values and knowledge. The ideal education is the gurukula-based system, in the hands of genuine brahmanas that are qualified both in regards to the knowledge of the subject they are teaching, and in training their students in ethical values (dharma) and self-discipline (tapasya), as well as in directly developing the skills that are required to perform the job. This can be re-established by promoting home schooling and distance education, that take advantage of present legal provisions created by various ideological groups.

Another important point is that contemporary conventional education does not give the students sufficient practical skills and useful knowledge to become good members of society, because it does not want to recognize the natural diversity of talents and abilities of the individuals. Obsessed by the fear of "diversity", mainstream society (especially in western countries) expects all individuals to be equally capable of learning a common basic education curriculum and getting the same results - so when unqualified students fail in the attempt, the entire class is set a lower standard so that "nobody is left back", and the most intelligent students lose interest in the proceedings. The gurukula system, on the other hand, gives a personalized evaluation and training of each individual student's potential in qualities and tendencies, and gives a different curriculum and training to intellectuals, warriors, business persons, and artisans. The only minimum common education everybody gets is about the basic ethical principles - truthfulness/ honesty, compassion/ selflessness, cleanliness/ purity and self control/ discipline. Even animals can be trained in these basic rules, so there is no question that some human beings are unable to be educated at this level. Of course, there will be human beings who choose not to live according to these basic rules of dharmā, but they should be kept outside the boundaries of a civilized society, as anāryas.

The expression kama translates "desire", and is often referred to sexual desire. The topic is tricky because of the artificial superimpositions of the dominant Abrahamic cultures at subtler levels, that often create a tangled mess of emotions around sexual energy and urges, with the development of unnecessary guilt and fears ultimately leading to perversions and damages. First of all, we need to make the very important distinction between natural sex urge and artificial sex urge, that are respectively on the physical and on the mental level.

The human body naturally produces hormones and sexual fluids, especially during the "fertile" period, that is from adolescence to the beginning of old age. In the gurukula system, the students are trained in the basic ethical principles and learn to control their minds and senses by engaging them in appropriate and beneficial ways under the constant surveillance and responsibility of a qualified teacher. If a boy is trained properly before puberty, adolescence will be much easier and happier both for the individual and for society: practically all the problems that people have on the sexual level are created by social pressure, cultural myths and stereotyped roles they are unable to cope with. All forms of desire, including the natural sex urge, are not only admissible but sacred and divine as well, as long as they do not violate the principles of dharmā - truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness, and self-control. So, as long as a relationship is not based on physical or psychological violence, on betrayal or hypocrisy, on some type of psychological or physical perversion, or on mere animal lust, it is considered legitimate from the moral point of view. It is important to understand that Vedic culture does not consider sexual acts (as long as they are free and based on mutual consent) as illegal or immoral - on the contrary, kama is one of the four main purposes of human life (dharmā, artha, kama, moksha).

The two important concepts expressed in this verse are connected in the definition of strength (bala) as divine when it is free from lust, selfishness and attachment, as kama and bala never go well together. There is no need for "force" in civilized and healthy sexual matters. If someone is attracted by the idea of violence in sexual relationships, they should get their mind examined by a qualified expert, because must be some psychological issue that is poisoning their system. Kama or desire is a powerful divine principle in itself, but the activities prompted by it could become disastrous (both for the individual and for the collectivity) unless they are consistently channeled through the principles of dharmā. Some people believe dharmā to be merely a collection of traditional social rules and norms such as marriage rituals and reciprocal duties of family members, or even a net of social prejudices that systematically stifle progress and proper engagement of resources. This misconception is the root of the degradation of society.

ये चैव सात्त्विका भावा राजसास्तामसाश्च ये । मत्त एवेति तान्विद्धि न त्वहं तेषु ते मयि ॥ ७-१२ ॥

ye caiva sāttvikā bhāvā rājasāstāmasāśca ye | matta eveti tānviddhi na tvaham teṣu te mayi || 7-12 ||

ye: they; ca: and; iva: certainly; sāttvika: according to sattva, goodness; bhava: state of being; rajasah: according to rajas, passion; tamasah: according to tamas, ignorance; ca: and; ye: they; mattah: from me; eva: certainly; iti: thus; tan: them; viddhi: you (should) know; na: not; tu: but; aham: I (am); teṣu: in them; te: they; mayi: in me.

"You should know that certainly all (those forms of) existence (created) by sattva, rajas and also tamas come from me, but I am not in them: rather, they are in me."

With a long first a, the word bhava means "emotion, feeling". The word bhava (with a short first a) means "existence, birth, becoming, manifestation". Bhava is also a name of Shiva. In this verse Krishna is elaborating about the nature of existence. In 7.9, he has said he is the seed of all beings (bijam mam sarva-bhutanam sanatanam). The difference of meaning between bhava and bhuta is that bhava is something that is manifesting, while bhuta is something that has already come into existence. To continue with the logical thread of Krishna's discussion, we could say that bhava is the seed or the preliminary stage of bhuta. The variety of states of being in the material world are produced by the union of the two basic energies - the apara prakriti constituted by the 8 material elements, and the para prakriti constituted by the living beings, of which Krishna has already said he is the origin (7.4-6). As we will see in detail later in the text, the apara prakriti has three gunas (modalities or qualities), namely sattva, rajas and tamas, that regulate all material existences and all living beings. The science of the gunas is so important that Bhagavad gita dedicates the entire chapter 14 to elaborating on it, and it is also mentioned in many other parts of the text.

All the various forms of material existence emanate from God but they are not divine in themselves (and therefore should not be considered as absolute) because they are intermediate positions meant for the development of the jivatma towards the realization of the eternal existence of awareness and bliss, that is the Atman/ Brahman. Krishna, the Transcendental Reality, is like a canvas template on which the three colors of the gunas (white, red and black) are painted: the colors are in the canvas, but the canvas is not in the colors. The canvas template is the support for the ever-changing play of the colors, but it is not really pervaded by them at any stage, even if superficially people may think so: the proof is that when the individual or mixed colors are washed away, the canvas template returns to shine with the original clarity. Similarly, God (brahman, paramatma, bhagavan) remains always unchanged before and after the creation of the universe, and before and after the dissolution of the universe. At the same time, God contains eternally the "blueprint" for existence, in the form of the spiritual seed - the spiritual qualities. The temporary and changing existences are originated and supported by the eternal existence. Here is the key to reconcile the apparent contradiction between nirguna ("without qualities") and saguna ("with qualities"). Everything we see in the material world has an original counterpart in the spiritual existence, in the "world of ideals" that transcends manifestation and dissolution, and is eternally perfect. The material copy of the original blueprint is purposefully distorted with defects (impermanence, ignorance and suffering) because the purpose of the material universe is to train the individual soul towards progress. What is training without the purposeful application of difficulties? There would be no effort, no exercise of will power, no improvement. So the proper way to utilize the material manifestation is to engage it in our journey of progress in consciousness, and let it go when it is not useful any more.

त्रिभिर्गुणमयैर्भावैरेभिः सर्वमिदं जगत् ।

मोहितं नाभिजानाति मामेभ्यः परमव्ययम् ॥ ७-१३ ॥

tribhirguṇamayairbhāvairebhiḥ sarvamidaṁ jagat | mohitaṁ nābhijānāti māmēbhyah paramavyayam || 7-13 |

tribhiḥ: by the three; guṇa-mayaiḥ: composed by the gunas; bhavaibḥ: by the existences; ebhiḥ: (all) these; sarvam: all; idam: this; jagat: universe/ people; mohitam: confused; na: not; abhijānāti: does understand; mam: me; ebhyah: compared to these; param: higher/ supreme; avyayam: imperishable.

"Under the conditions of existence created by the three gunas, this world does not understand me, as I am inexhaustible and transcendental."

The subject of this verse is jagat, "the world", intended as "all the people in general according to the material concept". The embodied conditioned beings cannot understand Krishna, the Transcendental Reality, because of the limitations of their material sense of identification (ahankara), that manifests in the bhavas, or conditions of existence, constituted by the three gunas, or qualities of material nature.

Krishna is beyond and above this level of material identification, beyond and above the gunas, in the eternal transcendental reality: we can move to this higher level and ultimately understand him, but first we need to leave our limitations behind. How can we see reality, if we insist in wearing heavily colored eyeglasses? The colors of the gunas confuse our vision and project shadows of forms that do not really exist, because they are only temporary. The actual reality is beyond the eyeglasses and does not depend on them, while the colorful projections of the lenses are precisely what constitutes the eyeglasses and depends on the greater reality for their existence. Nobody is forcing us to keep our eyeglasses on, but because of a strange sense of fun and entertainment, we have taken up the habit of wearing them and after some time we have become convinced that they are an integral part of our vision, and that without these eyeglasses we would not be able to see anything. To solve the problem, it takes an act of surrender, of faith, that pushes the will power to actually choose to remove the eyeglasses and to look at the real world. The issue of faith and surrender in Bhagavad gita is radically different from the concept of faith and surrender we find in abrahamic ideologies, because surrendering to Krishna is only the first step that will enable us to actually experiment and verify the value of his teachings by our direct perception. Krishna answers all questions and does not speak of mysteries that nobody will ever know, he never asks for blind allegiance and obedience, and does not threaten punishments or promises rewards. On the contrary, he will tell Arjuna, "I have given you this knowledge, now think about it and then choose what you want to do" (18.63-64).

The word maya without long a means "composed by" or "consisting of", while maya with long a means "illusion".

Another meaning of guṇa is "rope". We can visualize the gunas as three different threads that are woven together to form the beautiful cloth or network of the universal manifestation, that is three-dimensional in nature, that we can use as a ladder to move around and upwards. The combination of the three gunas produces bodies/ conditions of existence/ manifestations such as devas, asuras, human beings and animals and plants. Among the human beings, brahmanas, kshatriyas, vaiśyas and sudras are also characterized by particular mixtures of the gunas, and so are the anāryas or uncivilized people. All such conditions of life are temporary, and the living being is supposed to progress through them towards the ultimate purpose of liberation or Self realization.

दैवी ह्येषा गुणमयी मम माया दुरत्यया ।

मामेव ये प्रपद्यन्ते मायामेतां तरन्ति ते ॥ ७-१४ ॥

daivī hyeṣā guṇamayī mama māyā duratyayā | māmēva ye prapadyante māyāmetāṁ taranti te || 7-14 |

daivī: divine; hi: certainly; esa: this; guṇa-mayī: consisting of qualities; mama: my; maya: illusion; duratyayā: very difficult to overcome; mam: me; eva: certainly; ye: those (who); prapadyante: approach; mayam: illusion; etam: this; taranti: can go beyond; te: they.

"This divine energy of mine, manifesting as the three gunas, is very difficult to overcome but those who take shelter in me (can) cross over this illusion."

The apara prakṛiti mentioned by Krishna in the previous verses (7.4-6) is still divine and unconquerable even by the living beings that are known as para prakṛiti, so she deserves all our respect and worship. Some foolish people think they can "declare war to Maya" or material nature, but they will be invariably beaten down... the greatest defeat for them is to develop the strong ego of being "a stalwart sannyasi" - or brahmachari, or brahmana, or yogi, or jnani, or vaishnava, or whatever identification their minds dictates to them to make them feel superior - important and great. Indeed, such deluded people have already been humiliated by their arrogance and they remain even more strongly and permanently under the grip of illusion. Krishna's instructions are the only safe path to become free from ignorance and illusion: we need to recognize the divine nature of Maya and bow to the Transcendental Reality that manifests such wonders. Goddess Mahamaya is like a mother tiger: her jaws are inescapable death for all animals, but they are a place of comfort, safety and love for her kittens, who have affection and respect for her, and depend on her for everything. This is the sentiment of surrender (prapadyante) expressed by Krishna in this verse.

The word prapada refers to the front part of the feet, and it especially relates to the traditional gesture of touching the feet of a superior as a mark of respect and submission; it expresses the meek and humble attitude that a devotee needs to cultivate towards the Lord and his divine energies. Such meekness and humility, however, should be directed towards God, and not towards adharmic and foolish people who are trying to create obstacles on the path of progress for individuals and for society. We must remember that Krishna speaks the instructions of Bhagavad gita to Arjuna precisely to encourage him to engage in a terrible fight where he will contribute directly or indirectly to the killing of several thousands of people, including his own relatives and elders and other great personalities, such as kings and gurus. Obviously Krishna does not want Arjuna to surrender, or to be meek and humble towards the evil Duryodhana and his supporters - and neither should we.

Sometimes ignorant people criticize dharmic activists for their outspoken awareness campaigns. Many believe that self-realized souls should always be silent and wearing a beatific vacant smile on their faces, "transcendentally" callous to the events of this world, and if they speak at all, they should only utter incomprehensible and philosophical speculations, vague blessings, sentimentalistic platitudes generally based on "love", totally impractical instructions or complicated technical details about religious rituals. Unfortunately, the general public is so misguided and so ignorant about the actual contents of the shastra that they routinely fall victims to such dangerous cheaters and their followers, because they are told that by simply making a public show of submission to such so-called gurus one is automatically "saved" as taught in the abrahamic ideologies.

The expression guna-mayi, "made of gunas", does not refer to the origin of maya but to her production. As we have seen already, and will see again later in the text, the three gunas - sattva, rajas, tamas - are the expression of the bondage of the conditioned soul, that is originated and perpetuated by the choices of the individual soul through the exercise of free will. The Lord is not responsible for such choices and neither is the Mother Goddess Mahamaya: the only cause of the bondage of the conditioned soul is the material identification that covers possession, belonging and gratification. Therefore it is only logical that the only way to get out of the mesh of delusion consists in giving up abankara and mamatra, and approaching the Divine - the Lord and his Shakti - in a very humble and submissive attitude, actually following God's teachings. In this regard, it is important to note that in spiritual symbolism, the idea of pada, indicating the feet of a divine personality, includes his/ her teachings and instructions, position on the level of consciousness, and service to his/ her mission.

Another meaning of guna is "rope", that we can easily connect with the idea of bondage and net, but also with rope walking and rope ladders. The rope is not responsible for our bondage: it all depends on how we use it. By following carefully and sincerely Krishna's detailed instructions in Bhagavad gita, we will be able to climb the net by using the higher ropes of rajas and sattva to lift ourselves out of the most tangled mess of tamas, then moving up from rajas to sattva and finally out of the entire net altogether, attaining the level of suddha sattva or spiritual goodness. In the earliest stages of the process, it is very important to get help from an expert person, because when one is bound hands and feet, it is very difficult to do anything, and one's efforts may even cause a further tightening of the ropes. Have you ever disentangled a mass of yarn? It is a very useful exercise for the mind, because it teaches patience, carefulness, gentleness, and the logical process of tracking the extremities of the yarn and liberating them from the mess, keeping all threads clearly visible at all times.

न मां दुष्कृतिनो मूढाः प्रपद्यन्ते नराधमाः ।

माययापहृतज्ञाना असुरं भावमाश्रिताः ॥ ७-१५ ॥

na māṁ duṣkṛtino mūḍhāḥ prapadyante narādhamāḥ । māyāyāpahṛtajñānā āsuram bhāvamāśritāḥ ॥ 7-15 ॥

na: not; mam: me; duṣkṛtinah: evil doers; mūḍhah: stupid; prapadyante: approach in a respectful mood; nara-adhamah: the lowest of the human beings; māyaya: by illusion; apahṛta: stolen; jñāna: knowledge; asuram: demoniac mentality; bhavam: nature; asritah: those who have taken shelter of.

"The evil doers, the foolish, the most degraded, those whose knowledge has been covered by delusion, and those who have chosen an asuric existence do not approach me."

In the previous verses, Krishna has declared that he is the origin of the universe and the father of all living beings (7.4-7). He is the Transcendental eternal Reality that supports the existence of all things, and knowing him constitutes the highest perfection. Why then it is so difficult to know him? Krishna explains that the consciousness of the conditioned souls is covered and tied by the three gunas (7.13) or modalities of material existence, and that only those who approach the Divine in a respectful, humble and sincere manner will be able to overcome (taranti) the net woven by such ropes. How to do this practically? Krishna now explains what are the main obstacles to this process.

Duṣkṛtina means "evil doers": duḥ means "bad", kṛit means "one who does". Thus, the first negative factor that prevents us from approaching Krishna is the deliberate choice of committing bad actions. What are "bad actions"? Those activities (committed physically, mentally or by abstention) that are contrary to dharma, that are contrary to truthfulness and honesty, compassion and benevolence to all, cleanliness and purity of mind, and self-control. Those who choose to engage in wrongful and damaging activities get caught in a net of negative reactions and lower modes of material identification, and become bound more and more tightly by the gunas. Earlier (4.36) and later (9.30) Krishna will say that sincere engagement in devotional service can purify even the greatest criminal actions, but we should never forget that in many more verses he reiterates that it is necessary to give up all bad activities before one can come to know him. This obviously means that the purification from the sins or wrongful activities starts only when one sincerely makes deliberate efforts to give them up, and applies to the karmic residues left by the previous negative activities. Krishna certainly does not condone the cynical behavior of a false devotee who deliberately continues to engage in wrongful acts, counting on his fake devotion to neutralize their effects: this is clearly an offensive attitude, and listed among the 10 main offenses to be carefully avoided in devotional service.

A duskritina has set the course of his boat in the wrong direction, so he will not be able to reach the proper destination. It is up to us, individually: at every step in our lives we are offered the choice between the right thing and the wrong thing, and our conscience is always there to tell us which is which. As a counterpart, the next verse will speak of sukritinah, "good-doers", if we may say. From the same root, kirti means "good fame" and refers to the glory that is accrued by making the right choices even when it would be easier to make the wrong one. The expression duskritina is sometimes translated as "miscreant", but we should be very careful as this English word carries a profound abrahamic bias that is alien to the Vedic concept. In abrahamic societies apostasy or heresy are punishable crimes. While for abrahamics a "miscreant" is someone who does not blindly accept to believe in the dogmas established by their priests, a duskritina is simply one who performs bad and unethical activities, callous to the damage that he causes to others: the definition has nothing to do with one's religious faith or lack thereof.

The second category of hopeless people are the mudha, the "fools". Here and in several other passages, we see that Krishna is not trimming words too much when it comes to lack of intelligence or good qualities. Sometimes "politically correct" people object to the use of "strong words", protesting that satyam bruyat priyam bruyat, "truth should only be told in a pleasing manner", but how can you describe a fool without risking him to feel offended at all? If you are not clear enough, there will be no point in speaking, because your warnings will be lost. Calling spade a spade cannot be considered offensive: it just plain truth. Truth has no fault in itself. Those who feel offended by truth should verify their priorities. So, the famous quote (satyam bruyat priyam bruyat) actually means that we should try to tell the truth in a friendly manner, so that we avoid unnecessarily hurting people. Of course, it should be the truth: we need to stick to the actual point - we cannot say that someone is a fool because of race, gender, or other factors that are irrelevant to the degree of intelligence and ability to understand.

The word mudha has been also translated as "devoid of discrimination" and "beast of burden", as exemplified by the behavior of the donkey, that can be made to carry very heavy burdens simply by dangling a carrot tied to a stick in front of him. Of course the donkey can never get the carrot because the stick with the carrot also moves with him, but in the meantime he is laboring all day, and in the end he must content himself of a bunch of dry grass he could have had simply by stopping on the way to graze from the roadside. Another characteristic of donkeys is that they like to kick, especially with their rear legs; a male donkey always risks to be hurt when he approaches a female for sex, but still he cannot restrain himself. Nonetheless, the donkey likes to brag and often even sings, very pleased with what he considers his beautiful voice and profound poetry. In human society, these characteristics apply to the gross materialist, only interested in the philosophy of "work hard, play hard", always pursuing a dream of happiness that he can never obtain because of the very nature of the material world, and carrying a burden that give him no benefit. These people may aspire to "cultural programs" such as music, dance and similar entertainment, but because these have no spiritual or educational contents, they remain empty and vain. When they are offered the opportunity for spiritual research, and asked if they ever wonder about the meaning of life and the purpose of the universe, they become spiteful and offensive because they cannot even understand the point of such "waste of time", as they say. "Get a job," is their most likely response.

Naradhamah are the lowest among the human beings, the degraded uncivilized people that prefer to live "freely" like animals, without following any rule or ethical principle, without striving to improve themselves. Or worse, they have concocted cruel and degrading rules for their community, and they stick to them. These fallen people see no harm in killing innocent and friendly creatures to eat them, to violate women or children for their own sense gratification, to cheat and steal property to which they have no rights, to befoul nature, to destroy or waste resources and the property of others, and in general to behave in a very irresponsible way. The maya-apabrita-jnana people are those who know things "theoretically" but remain unable to put them in practice because of some material attachment or delusion. Many people like to talk about philosophy and spirituality, but when it is time to walk their talk, they do not make any effort to become consistent, and sometimes they are even surprised to hear that we expect them to do what they have been preaching. "But that was just philosophy", they say. Or sometimes, when they have pledged to give or to invest something, they conveniently forget their promise or pretend they did not realize what was expected from them.

Many people like to make grandiose statements, such as affirming they are ready to give everything to the cause, even their lives, and fight to the last, and then they refuse to donate even a small amount of money or a few hours of their leisure time. Many people preach about not smoking and yet they keep smoking, talk about environment protection and don't care how much garbage they are producing or how many resources they are consuming unnecessarily. Some say, "dharma rakshati rakshitah" ("ethic principles defend those who defend them") and then keep merrily trampling dharma in many ways, or say "satyam eva jayate" ("truth will prevail") and keep telling lies privately and publicly without any shame, and so on. The fourth category of people who remain unable to approach Krishna are the asuram bhavam asritah, those who have deliberately chosen an asuric life. The word asura is generally translated as "demoniac", but we should not confuse this concept with the abrahamic meaning based on the idea of mythical creatures also called "fallen angels", who have powers practically identical to "the good God" (and sometimes even greater) and are always trying to push human beings "to sin". This concept of a "bad god" that keeps fighting against the "good God" in the minds and hearts of human beings is a convenient delusion normally used by abrahamics to justify their own bad choices and even the persecution of innocents. Also, the translation "atheists" is not applicable here, because some people may believe in the existence of God, but project their asuric tendencies on him, or even worship some Asura believing him to be God - so they should be counted in this category, too.

The population of the universe is divided into two broad categories: the suras and the asuras - those who support the divine plan for the benefit and progress of all beings, and those who oppose such plan for their own misguided and deluded selfishness (individual or collective). More about the asuric nature as opposed to the daivic nature (often translated as "demonic nature" and "divine nature") is in chapter 16, entirely dedicated to the subject. The expression asuram bhavam asritah shows that the demonic nature is something that one chooses by one's free will, not a genetic inheritance of a particular species or race. Some commentators aggregate the various categories listed in this verse, signifying that the "bad guys" are expected to have all the four bad qualities at the same time, but this is not the case.

चतुर्विधा भजन्ते मां जनाः सुकृतिनोऽर्जुन । आर्तो जिज्ञासुरार्थार्थी ज्ञानी च भरतर्षभ ॥ ७-१६ ॥

caturvidhā bhajante mām janāḥ sukṛtinō'ṛjuna | ārto jijñāsūrarthārthī jñānī ca bharatarṣabha || 7-16 ||

catuh: four; vidhah: types; bhajante: they worship/ serve/ pray; mam: me; janah: people; sukritinah: those who do good deeds; arjuna: o Arjuna; artah: one who suffers; jinasub: one who is seeking knowledge; artha-arthi: one desires wealth and prosperity; jnanī: a learned person; ca: and; bharata-rshabha: o best among the descendants of Bharata.

"O Arjuna, best of the descendants of Bharata, four types of good persons worship me: one who is suffering, one who is inquisitive, one who wants some favor or benefit, and one who has knowledge."

Just like there are four types of people who remain unable to approach Krishna, there are four types of devotees, who are willing to make the right choices in their life (sukritinah). Sukritinah are also those who have already performed a sufficient amount of good actions and have therefore accumulated karmic merits (sukriti or punya), even unconsciously (ajñata sukriti) as for example in the case of someone who offers a gift to a devotee who in turn will offer it to the Deity, or someone who transcribes or prints or distributes a spiritual book without knowing its contents. The word bhajante is very interesting and expresses a higher level of religious sentiments and behavior. Rather than running around trying to enroll more people into their religious camp by hook or by crook, the genuine devotees of Krishna worship and serve him through the process of bhakti yoga by applying Krishna's teachings to their own lives and by elevating their consciousness to a transcendental level. The word bhajan derives from the same root of the word bhakti, and it can be translated as "devotional service in transcendental consciousness". The word "religion" derives from the Latin religare, "connecting", as referred to the relationship connecting the individual with God. This means that religion should be a private concern, based on personal beliefs and worship practices, in which neither the government nor society or other people should have any saying. Of course, there are limits to the personal beliefs and worship practices: if some people believe that killing, or raping, or stealing etc is a legitimate worship practice, they should be closely monitored and prevented from committing any unethical/ violent action.

Expert preachers should inspire them to raise their level of consciousness and engage their destructive tendencies in a non-damaging manner, by directing them against their own negative tendencies. So the "killing" should be turned into the destruction of one's own defects, or as an intermediate stage there will be a temporary allowance for animal sacrifice (duly restricted and monitored, especially to sensitize people towards the sufferings of the animals). The lusty tendencies can be sublimated into the higher emotions towards God by the process of śravanam kīrtanam, also helped by practices such as dancing, dramatic performance, Deity worship, etc - and at an intermediate and temporary (lower) level through consumption of psychotropic substances and other similar methods. Stealing will be sublimated through the regulated collection of donations and alms from the general public, that will be directly engaged in the service of the Deity, especially used for preparing and distributing consecrated foods. Such fund raising must be done strictly according ethical principles and behaviors, otherwise it will be detrimental to the progress of everyone.

What are the main motivations that inspire a decent person (sukritina) to approach God?

The most popular reason is suffering. When one is in very serious danger, or experiences a very great pain, it is natural to think of God: even a professed atheist or agnostic will then resort to fervently praying God. The effect may not be very long lasting - generally people forget God as soon as the danger has passed - but at least for some time the sentiment is very strong.

A jijnasu is "one who seeks knowledge". As stated in Vedānta sūtras (ātato brahma jīnasa) and in other Vedic texts, human life finds its real purpose when the individual starts asking questions about existence, the purpose of life, and so on: this is called "search for knowledge". In different times and different places, such quest has taken various forms, but the common denominator is the aspiration towards a higher level of consciousness. In Vedic tradition, God/ Krishna is consciousness, the essence and origin of all existence, so by approaching Krishna we will obtain the knowledge we are seeking.

Another reason why people approach God is to ask for favors. For most people, "prayer" is the only means by which they approach God, and "praying" simply means asking for something. They say, "give us our daily bread, give us this blessing or that blessing, make me pass this school exam, make me win the lottery, give me a good job, give me a good husband/ wife, remove my disease, give me wealth, give me health, give me position, give me protection, give me intelligence, give me devotion, give me liberation". There is nothing intrinsically wrong in asking God for something valuable (artha), and in fact artha is one of the four main purposes of life according to the Vedic system. Of course, God helps those who help themselves: praying God for his blessings does not mean that we can just sit back and relax and let him do all the work for us. So if we want to get our daily bread, we need to work for it, and if we want to pass a school exam we need to study. If we want to win the lottery we should remember that there are lots of people who are praying for the same result and only one can possibly win (so we had better accumulate some good karma credit by performing sufficient good deeds first). If we want a good job we must make sufficient efforts to qualify ourselves and to go looking for one, and so on.

A jnani is a person who lives by knowledge. Having already attained the level of knowledge, he becomes truly qualified to understand and worship Krishna, as we will see in the next verses. The wise person has overcome the fear of duality and loss, so he is ready to accept whatever comes to him according to the results of his past deeds: the bad things - including death, disease, misfortunes of various types, pain and disappointments - as well as the good things, that already come by themselves. Such a jnani could be in any varna or ashrama, because intelligence and wisdom are inherently human characteristics and can be found even in illiterate people or in those who are engaged in menial work, or are faithful to family responsibilities.

In this chapter, Krishna has only started to discuss about the science of bhakti (loving devotion to God), and at this stage bhakti is still presented as the means to approach God, and not the end (kevala bhakti).

तेषां ज्ञानी नित्ययुक्त एकभक्तिर्विशिष्यते । प्रियो हि ज्ञानिनोऽत्यर्थमहं स च मम प्रियः ॥ ७-१७ ॥

teṣāṃ jñānī nityayukta ekabhaktirviśiṣyate । priyo hi jñānino'tyarthamaham sa ca mama priyaḥ ॥ 7-17 ॥

tesam: of them; jnani: one who has knowledge; nitya-yukta: constantly engaged; eka-bhakti: only in devotional service; visisyate: excels over others/ in various special ways; priya: the dearest; hi: indeed; jnaninab: to the jnani; ati: very much; artham: value; aham: I; sa: for this person; ca: and; mama: my; priya: dearest.

"Of them, the person of knowledge who is constantly engaged (in yoga) and focused in devotion is the best; I am very dear to the jnani, and s/he is very dear to me."

This verse strictly connects yoga and bhakti, as one and the same. In fact, yoga and bhakti are one and the same: yoga means "uniting/ connecting with God" and bhakti means "loving God". How can one unite with God without love? It is not possible, just like it is not possible to love and serve God without having established a connection with God. However, this yoga is not the fancy gymnastic set of exercises that are presented as meant to lose weight or relieve back pain. To really achieve the purpose, the goal shown by Krishna in Bhagavad gita, one must be nitya-yukta, "constantly engaged", 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, and the engagement must be focused on perfect devotion, eka-bhakti. What is perfect devotion? It is perfect concentration on Krishna consciousness only - also called kevala bhakti ("only devotion"), suddha bhakti ("pure devotion"), ananya bhakti ("exclusive devotion"), akinchana bhakti ("devotion without anything else"), and uttama bhakti ("the highest devotion").

Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, one of the most famous texts in bhakti literature, states: anyabhilashita sunyam jnana karmady anavritam anukulyena krishnanusilanam bhaktir uttama, "The highest level of bhakti is free from all reservation, completely dedicated to please God in a favorable way, and independent from any desire for scholarship or material merit. It is simply about behaving always in accordance with Krishna's instructions and desires." (1.1.11) So, the highest form of bhakti is not conditioned by jnana or karma. More ordinary forms of bhakti are called jnana mishra bhakti ("devotion mixed with the pride of learning") and karma mishra bhakti ("devotion mixed with sense of duty"), which tend to dilute the sentiment of dedication to Krishna, and therefore must ultimately be moved to the back seat. However, we need to watch out for tamas and rajas creeping and sneaking back from the rear door, and suggesting that bhakti can be a cheap and quick shortcut that does not require study and work, but will simply develop with some sentimentalistic emotions and a bigot sectarian allegiance. Bhakti rasamrita sindhu (1.2.101) explicitly warns us against this dangerous foolishness: sruti smriti puranadi pancaratra vidhim vina, aikantiki barer bhakti utpatayaiva kalpate, "Exclusive devotion to Lord Hari (Krishna) that ignores the teachings of Sruti, Smriti, Puranas and other Vedic texts, including the Pancharatra, is simply a fantasy and an unnecessary disturbance in society." Eka bhakti corresponds to aikantiki bhakti.

The word visisyate derives from visista, a definition that carries various levels of meanings. For example, we can find it in the expression visista-advaita, or "special non-duality that carries diversity". Thus visisyate also means "excellent, special" and also "in various ways" - a meaning that opens the doors to a wide horizon of engagements in devotional service. One should not think that bhajan, service to God, is limited to singing or reciting the names, qualities and activities of God, or worshipping the Deity in the temple. Anything, any activity, can be transformed in the highest form of devotional service simply by an act of consciousness. Later Krishna will say that a simple offering of a leaf, a small fruit or a little water (9.26) is sufficient, or even the daily acts that everybody performs such as eating, performing one's daily duties, distributing charity, or tolerating difficult situations (9.27) can all be transformed in perfectly bona fide devotional service to Krishna. The purpose of such pure bhakti is simply to develop a strong loving relationship with Krishna, a personal relationship of affection and care that Krishna will personally reciprocate. Already (4.11, 5.15) Krishna had stated that God is equally disposed towards everybody, and in 9.28 he will repeat that his equanimity towards all living entities is not diminished by the personal loving relationship with his intimate devotees. It is not easy to understand the sublime love relationship between God and his devotee, especially when one is still plagued by the materialistic lust, material identification and attachments, and material concepts. God is not jealous (contrarily to what some deluded people think) and therefore does not become angry if we neglect or forget him or fail in our duties, and he does not punish anyone.

Each individual simply receives the result of his/ her own actions, that s/he sowed in the past and have gradually fructified: it is a natural impartial law, like all natural laws. Gravity works exactly in the same way for everyone, irrespective of their sectarian allegiances, and so do hurricanes, floods, tsunamis, earthquakes, and all natural laws. The laws of probability only create some differences when the actions of a person are different from the actions of another person (for whatever reason, including religious beliefs) - not on the basis of religious beliefs or allegiance themselves. A pure devotee of Krishna acts in perfect harmony with the universal laws and with the Divine plan, and thus sees opportunities of service in each situation - difficult, favorable and unfavorable. This is why Bhagavata Purana (1.2.6) says that bhakti is not hampered by any circumstance. Sai vai pumsam paro dharmo yato bhaktir adbokshaje abaituky apratihata yayatma suprasidati, "The supreme dharmo (duty) for human beings is whatever activity carries selfless and constant love and devotion to the Transcendental Lord: this is the way to achieve complete satisfaction." Whether it is nitya karma ("regular duties"), naimittika karma ("accessory duties"), tapasya (simply tolerating difficulties with patience), any type of work in all the varnas and ashramas can be transformed into pure blissful bhakti seva: it is all in the consciousness - Krishna consciousness. Therefore the pure devotee does not lament or blame or hates anything, and is always sober in all circumstances (12.17, 18.50). This makes the pure devotee "dear to Krishna" because Krishna is the supreme level in pure consciousness. Bhagavata Purana (9.4.68) states, sadbho bridayam mahyam sadbunam bridayam tv aham mad-anyat te na jananti naham tebhyo manag api, "I am always in the heart of the sadhus, and they are always in my heart, because they are not interested in anything but me."

उदाराः सर्व एवैते ज्ञानी त्वात्मैव मे मतम् । आस्थितः स हि युक्तात्मा मामेवानुत्तमां गतिम् ॥ ७-१८ ॥

udārāḥ sarva evaite jñānī tvātmaiva me matam | āsthitaḥ sa hi yuktātmā māmēvānuttamāṁ gatim || 7-18 ||

udarah: great personalities; sarva: all; eva: certainly; ete: these; jñanī: the person who has knowledge; tu: but; atma: the Self; iva: like; me: my; matam: opinion; asthitaḥ: situated; sah: s/he; hi: indeed; yukta: united; atma: the Self; mam: me; eva: certainly; anuttamam: the highest; gatim: destination.

"All (these) are great souls, but the person of knowledge is verily the Self. This is my opinion. S/he is firmly situated and connected with the (consciousness of the) Atman, therefore s/he certainly attains me, the highest goal."

The various types of devotees described previously (7.16) are all good people and will ultimately attain perfection. Bhagavata Purana (2.3.10) states, akama sarva-kamo va moksha-kama udara-dhib tivrēna bhakti-yogena yajeta puruṣam param, "Those who have superior intelligence will worship the Supreme Lord with an intense devotional service, whether they are free from all personal desires, they are full of desires, or they only desire liberation." The word udarah is used in both verses to indicate a higher level of intelligence or wisdom, that is required to connect with the Supreme. Sentimentalistic fools are thus excluded from the picture. However, the arta, the jijnasu and the artha-arthi are still distracted by a sense of duality, a sort of separatist selfishness that prevents them from actually experiencing the Transcendental Reality in full consciousness of Krishna. Their approach is pradhani bhakti ("mostly devotion") or guni-bhuta bhakti ("devotion conditioned by the modes of material nature").

In chapter 17, entitled śraddha traya vibhaga yoga, "the yoga of differentiating between the three forms of beliefs", Krishna will further explain this guni-bhuta bhakti, detailing the types of śraddha (faith), yajna (sacrifice in worship), achara (behavior), ahara (dietary choices), tapasya (austerity), and dana (charity) - all essential components of spiritual or religious life - under the influence of the three gunas. This means that merely "religious" people still have some material identification or attachment.

On the other hand, the jñani has acquired the proper knowledge and realized his/ her transcendental nature (atma), which enables him/ her to actually develop a spiritual relationship with the Lord as his/ her own Supreme Soul (param atma). This concept is quite tricky and almost impossible to understand for those who are still immersed in a material concept of life, because they cannot see how Transcendence is omnipresent and indivisible, therefore they imagine that the individual soul and God cannot be in the same place at the same time. The way prescribed by Vedic knowledge must then include the Brahman realization and the Paramatma realization before one can safely say s/he has actually realized Bhagavan. Of course, the realization of Bhagavan includes the Paramatma and Brahman, but such preliminary stages must have been assimilated - if not in this lifetime, in a previous lifetime. One does not simply jump from the darkness of ignorant gross material identification to pure transcendental bhakti: if someone claims to have performed such a feat, we need to verify whether s/he is actually deluded by some form of prakṛita sabajyism, or "materialistic superficiality", because following such people is extremely dangerous.

This same concept will be repeated by Krishna at the conclusion of the Bhagavad gita (18.54): only one who is firmly situated on the transcendental level of Brahman (brahma-bhuta) and is favorably disposed towards all beings and situations (samāḥ sarvesu bhutesu), which is a characteristic of the Paramatma realization, can really achieve the highest devotion (mad bhaktim param). By realizing this transcendental and inconceivable oneness and diversity, we will be able to understand how the devotee can be the atma of Krishna, and Krishna the atma of the devotee, on a level of consciousness so sublime, vast and deep that everything else becomes completely irrelevant. This is the anuttama gatiḥ, the supreme destination, or paramam dhama, the supreme position, also described in 8.13, 8.20, 8.21, and then in 15.6. It is also the param bhava described in 7.24, the brahma bhuta of 6.27 and 18.54, the mat samsthā of 6.15 and the mam ("me") mentioned frequently as the supreme destination (4.9, 6.13, 6.47, 6.48, 8.5, 8.15, 8.16, 9.25, 10.10, 18.55, 18.65) and the tat ("that:") referred to the Supreme abode (18.55).

बहूनां जन्मनामन्ते ज्ञानवान्मां प्रपद्यते ।

वासुदेवः सर्वमिति स महात्मा सुदुर्लभः ॥ ७-१९ ॥

bahūnām janmanāmante jñānavānmām prapadyate | vāsudevaḥ sarvamiti sa mahātmā sudurlabhaḥ || 7-19 ||

babunamr: of many; janmanamr: births; ante: at the end; jnanavan: one who has knowledge; mamr: me; prapadyate: approaches respectfully; vasudevah: Vasudeva, the omnipresent Transcendental Reality; sarvam: everything; iti: thus; sah: s/he; mahatma: great soul; su-durlabhabh: very rare.

"After many lifetimes, one who has knowledge attains me, (realizing that) Vasudeva is everything. Such a great soul is very rare."

The name Vasudeva (with a long first a) means "omnipresent", and it is also referred to Krishna as the son of Vasudeva (with a short first a), a name that means "the substance for the universe". When we mentioned the Vasus in the commentary to verse 7.9, we said that the Vasus are the basic components from which the universe is made: fire, earth, wind, space, sky, sun, moon and stars. In the previous verses Krishna has stated that he is the essence and foundation of the universal existence, therefore he is called Vasudeva (omnipresent).

In this verse Krishna clearly expresses that the genuine realization of Bhagavan can be attained only after a long journey of Self realization based on knowledge (jnana). This means that actually getting in contact with Bhagavan is no cheap thing. It is not likely that a conditioned soul, immersed in the lower gunas and engaged in negative activities, devoid of knowledge, not particularly inclined to do good deeds, identified with the material body and attached to the sense of possession and duality, will quickly become able to realize Krishna consciousness. What could happen is a chaya ("shadow"), pratibimba ("reflection") or abhasa ("semblance") of devotion that inexperienced people can mistake for the real thing, but it will inevitably disappear, destroyed by the anarthas ("bad things") that have not been eliminated from the heart. This "free taste" of devotion is meant to kindle the faith of a beginner, or to reawaken a person to a forgotten progress that was practiced in a previous lifetime, but it does not last long.

If the anarthas are not eliminated, if there is no sufficient effort on the devotee's part and the guidance of an expert self-realized soul, the seed of the bhakti lata will be suffocated by the weeds growing from the watering of the garden - in the form of the practices of sadhana bhakti, including the chanting of the holy names of God. Such weeds are the desire to obtain fame, honor, worship and profit for oneself, the desire to engage in politics and meddling about the private lives of other people, the desire to live an easy comfortable life without working or caring for anybody, a sense of irresponsibility and complacency, a sense of self-righteousness that can grow up into arrogance, exponential growth of abankara and mamatva (that are detrimental even when they are just applied to the religious field), and sometimes plain madness and perversion. The blessings of a genuine guru, the company of true devotees, the sincere and practical engagement in favorable service, the discussion of the glories of the Lord, the contact with the holy names of God and with the prasada - the consecrated food and other articles offered to God - are all very powerful and can be contagious in spreading the faith and attraction towards the sentiments of devotion.

This benign bhakti "virus" brings a sort of "mutation", spiritualizing the entire body and mind, deeply transforming the consciousness by making it so clear and transparent that the light of the spiritual Self can shine through all the time, with its happiness, wisdom, peace, harmony, love, and a healthy disposition towards life. It is so beneficial that it can heal all wounds and damage, and protect the entire system from any harm. However, a grossly conditioned soul is "guarded" against the beneficial and purifying contagion of spiritual consciousness, by a strong negative "immune system" made of doubts and desires that fight back fiercely, by a thick layer of ignorance that is difficult to penetrate, and a constant flow of mental fantasies and impressions and memories that instantly washes away the spiritual feelings as soon as they appear. Sometimes, a deeply ingrained tumor of anartha (bad habits, cruelty or cynicism) may remain hidden even in later stages of the process of re-spiritualization of the consciousness, and proliferate out of sight until it surfaces with a profusion of contamination and suffering. This is why it is important to constantly work at removing any bad habit and defect that may jeopardize the development of genuine bhakti. The process may take several lifetimes.

As we have already mentioned in the commentary to verse 7.1, the stages of the development of the bhakti lata (the tender creeper plant of devotion) are sraddha, sadhu sanga, bhajana kriya, anartha nirvrtti, nistha, ruci, asakti, bhava and prema. It is a long process that requires patience, enthusiasm and determination. According to the level of his/ her realization, a devotee is described as kanistha (neophyte), madhyama (established on an intermediate level) and uttama (advanced). The kanistha adbhikari is attracted to Krishna in the form of the Deity in the temple, the lilas narrated in the scriptures and the recitation of the holy names; he has sufficient faith to remain on the spiritual path and humility to serve those who are universally recognized as elders and make friends with those who are normally recognized as devotees.

The madhyama adbhikari has developed more knowledge and realization, so he is able to inspire faith in others and teach and guide them; he has realized the Transcendental existence and the presence of the Lord in the hearts of all living beings (as Brahman and Paramatma respectively), so he sees God everywhere and is friendly with all the good living entities. He can recognize the difference between sura and asura, vidya and avidya, dharma and adharma, and has established himself strongly and consistently on the level of spontaneous attraction toward God in all his forms. He can recognize an elder and a devotee even when they are not manifesting their position openly, and similarly he can also recognize a cheater who is wearing the dress of a religious person or an elder or a devotee, and avoids such company. He is very serious in the practice of sadhana bhakti (regulated devotional service) and compassionate towards the innocent people, including those who are afflicted by ignorance and other defects. His attachment for the Deity in the temple is selfless, and he prefers to engage directly in service (whatever form it may take) rather than attending a gorgeous ceremony as a spectator that enjoys a good show.

The uttama adbhikari is on the highest level of raganuga bhakti (spontaneous loving devotion to God) and has dropped any material concern, identification and attachment; he has become free from all defects and bad habits, and only has good qualities and behaviors. He is compassionate towards all living entities, including the asuras or evil-minded people, and he is not touched by what happens to his material body or by the circumstances in which he may find himself. He sees everything in the spiritual dimension, even ignorance and bad behaviors, considering them as simply different lessons in the great school of life, and different manifestations of the Divine plan - as Krishna will explain in the next verse. Attaining this level usually takes many, many lifetimes.

कामैस्तैस्तैर्हृत्ज्ञानाः प्रपद्यन्तेऽन्यदेवताः ।

तं तं नियममास्था च प्रकृत्या नियताः स्वया ॥ ७-२० ॥

kāmaistaistairhṛtajñānāḥ prapadyante'nyadevatāḥ । taṁ taṁ niyamamāsthāya prakṛtyā niyatāḥ svayā ॥ 7-20 ॥

kamair: by the desires (for pleasure); taib taib: these and those; brīta-jñanab: devoid of knowledge; prapadyante: respectfully approach; anya-devatāb: other Divine Personalities; taṁ taṁ: these and those (respectively); niyamam: methods; asthaya: following; prakṛtya: according to their own nature; niyatāb: guided; svaya: by themselves.

"Those whose knowledge is confused by a variety of desires approach other devas, and according to their nature they follow the (specific) regulations."

In verse 7.16, Krishna explained that good-natured people (sukṛitinaḥ) approach him respectfully to obtain knowledge and prosperity, and relief from their sufferings and dangers. Such people have a concept of God as the Transcendental Reality, the supreme collective intelligence, the origin and foundation of all existence, and they are able to perceive his presence as Brahman and Paramatman. However, there are many people who are unable to understand what Brahman or Paramatman means, because of their own lack of knowledge about the difference between the material and the spiritual levels. Therefore they project on God the same concepts and dynamics they have observed in material life: when they want to obtain something that is not within their own reach, they ask help from a taller or older person - a more powerful, wealthier, wiser, and more important person.

Because in the material world everything is based on duality and differentiation, different powerful personalities are competent to give help in different fields. If you are unable to make your own iron tools, you go to the blacksmith and ask what you want, pay some money and get your article. Similarly, if you cannot grow your own vegetables or fruits, you go to those who sell vegetables and fruits, and so on. If you are unable to overcome a disease you go to the doctor, if you are illiterate and want to read a letter from a relative you go to the school teacher, if you want an electrical connection you go to the officer in charge, and so on.

These are all different persons, each endowed with the specific power that can fulfill one of your wishes, and you approach them one by one according to the circumstances. When you have obtained what you wanted, you may be somehow grateful, but generally the relationship remains superficial. Materialistic people project the same scenario on the religious level. It is true that the scriptures recommend to meditate on the various aspects of the Personalities of Godhead that are subtly connected to the principle one wants to develop - for example Surya when one feels the need for health or strength - but this meditation is meant to awaken those qualities and powers within ourselves, because as Paramatman lives in our soul, so do all his limbs and parts, symbolized by the various aspects of the Personality of Godhead that control the principles of the entire creation.

The confusion (brīta-jñana) mentioned in this verse consists in approaching a variety of personalities of Godhead as if they were somehow separated or even in competition with each other, and trying to "bribe" them individually in order to obtain some material benefit. Deluded people sometimes think they are "using" such divine Personalities (and their mantras, yantras, etc) as if the Devas were order suppliers of the commodities they want to "purchase". However, even this low-mentality tendency should not be stopped as it will ultimately lead to spiritual progress. This is the reason why in the next verse Krishna clearly says that he personally strengthens the faith of such worshipers. A so-called devotee of Krishna who tries to forcibly stop others from performing such worship according to their faith is therefore acting against the Lord's plan and is simply creating an unnecessary disturbance in society. If this method of separate worship is followed sincerely and carefully, and the form worshiped is genuine, ideally under the guidance and the tuition of expert persons who have realized Brahman (the brahmanas), the worshipers will gradually develop the same qualities of the Devas they honor and serve, and they will become situated on a sattvic level. Some foolish people say that some Personalities of Godhead such as Vishnu etc are manifestations of sattva, other Personalities of Godhead such as Brahma etc are manifestations of rajas and other Personalities of Godhead such as Shiva Mahadeva etc are manifestations of tamas. This idea is preposterous and totally contrary to Krishna's teachings. All the Personalities of Godhead are transcendental, even when they appear in this universe playing an apparently material role.

It is true that Vishnu, Brahma and Shiva are in charge of each of these three gunas respectively, but there is not one single passage in all scriptures that says that God is subject to the power of the gunas - like a conditioned soul. Such an idea is deeply offensive. It amounts to saying that a judge of a criminal court is nothing but a criminal, a manifestation of the criminal tendencies of people. Unfortunately some foolish and immature people utilize this verse of Bhagavad gita to justify and encourage an offensive attitude towards those they call "paltry/ unimportant demigods", because they consider the various Personalities of Godhead as different and separate from each other, or even in competition with each other. It amounts to trying to hurt the feet of our friend to show that we prefer his face, because our friend told us that when addressing him we should talk to his face and not to his feet. Such lack of intelligence is certainly the effect of previous offenses committed by the so-called devotee, and leads to complete disaster in spiritual life - as in the case of the square-headed idiot who spit out Mahadeva's prasada and rushed to drink the footwash water of some confirmed criminal. Here the point presented by Krishna is that we should not make the mistake of considering the Devas as ananya, "different" from Krishna, from the Unified Transcendental Reality. Such mistake has two sides:

1. approaching "other Devas" as competitors and separate limited powers that are more likely to grant a wish, 2. approaching Krishna as a competitor and separate different but still limited power that is more likely to grant a wish than the "other Gods".

The first two of the 10 offenses that can damage the development of bhakti (as listed in the Padma Purana) are: 1. insulting a genuine devotee, 2. separating Vishnu from Shiva and the other Personalities of Godhead by considering them as different and independently existing.

This means that those so-called vaishnavas who insult the Devas (who are much more elevated spiritually and closer to God than any foolish human being on this planet) considering them as independently existing from Krishna are in a very bad position indeed. Much worse, in fact, than the sincere and humble devotees who offer their devotions to the Personalities of Godhead they feel spontaneously attracted to, such as Shiva, Surya, etc.

Even those who can stretch their brain only to accepting the idea that Shiva is the greatest vaishnava (vaishnavanam yatha sambhu, as stated in Bhagavata Purana, 12.13.16) should stop just one moment and ask themselves whether it is healthy to callously commit offenses against the greatest vaishnava, and dare to call him "a paltry demigod on the inferior jnana mishra bhakti level" - and this in the name of exclusive pure devotion to Krishna, too!

यो यो यां यां तनुं भक्तः श्रद्धयार्चितुमिच्छति । तस्य तस्याचलां श्रद्धां तमेव विदधाम्यहम् ॥ ७-२१ ॥

yo yo yām yām tanuṁ bhaktaḥ śraddhayārcitumicchati । tasya tasyācalāṁ śraddhāṁ tāmeva vidadhāmyaham ॥ 7-21 ॥

yah yah: which (whatever); yam yam: that (same); tanuṁ: body/ form; bhaktah: a devotee; śraddhaya: with faith; arcitum: to worship; icchati: wishes; tasya tasya: to him (individually and respectively); acalam: firm; śraddham: faith; tam: that; eva: certainly; vidadhām: I give/ strengthen; aham: personally.

"Whatever form the devotee wishes to worship with faith, I strengthen the determination by which s/he will become established (in that method and ista devata)."

The variety of forms in which people worship God is not a bad thing at all: in fact God has unlimited forms, unlimited names, unlimited qualities, activities, and variety of approaches - to attract the minds of so many different people. The concept of the "preferred form of God" that one likes to meditate on and worship is called ista devata (one's "desired form of God"). One can choose the ista devata s/he prefers, and even change his/ her choice in the course of time, when the progress in devotional service or a change of circumstances inspire him/ her to focus in a different aspect of Godhead. Some people choose their ista devata according to the suggestions of astrologers, or to please their parents and family, or to gain acceptance into a community; however, the best reason is because of the development of his/ her own personal devotional sentiments.

The important thing is that we should always remember that God is one, and that by worshiping or meditating on one form of God rather than another, we are not offending or betraying the other forms of God. All the forms of the Mother Goddess are aspects of the same Shakti, and similarly, all the forms of the Lord are expansions and emanations of expansions of Vishnu: we should not make the mistake of applying material limitations to the Godhead. All the various forms of the Godhead are limbs of his/ her transcendental body, and there is no real difference among them.

In the Vedic system, the genuine scriptures present a variety of Personalities of Godhead, sometimes focusing on one, sometimes on more, and even each Personality is shown in different avatars or forms in which s/he descends into this world for a divine mission. Skanda Purana teaches, "One should worship Lord Krishna, the cause of all causes, and then worship the best of the devatas, Lord Shiva. Then one should worship all the other devatas with great faith and devotion." And again, śivasya hridayam viṣṇur, viṣṇos ca hridayam śiva, "Shiva is the heart of Vishnu, and Vishnu is the heart of Shiva."

The Gautamiya tantra (one of the most important texts for vaishnavas) says: gopalam pujaḥ yas tu nindayed anya devatam astu tavam paro dharmah purva-dharmo 'pi nasyati, "If one worships Gopala but disrespects other devas/ devis, his bhakti will be lost. Not only he will not be able to get bhakti, but even whatever dharma he had acquired previously will be lost."

In the Kurma Purana (12.20), Vasistha (the guru of Ramachandra) answers the questions of the sons of Kartavirya Arjuna saying, "the best thing for human beings is to understand that Shiva is non-different from Visnu, therefore Shiva and Vishnu must be worshiped simultaneously". Bṛihad Bhagavatamṛta (1.2.86) says: krṣṇac chivasya bbedekṣa maha-dosa-kari mata ago bhagavata svasmin kṣamyate na sive kṛtam, "One who sees some difference between Krishna and Shiva is committing a great offense. Krishna may excuse someone who commits offenses to his own lotus feet, but will never forgive one who commits aparadha at the lotus feet of Shiva". Krishna himself, in the Mahabharata, presents the Śiva sahasra nama stotra, to which Bhishma follows with the Vishnu sahasra nama stotra (which also contains many names such as Shiva - twice - and Sambhu, Isana, Rudra, Mahadeva and others). Krishna also instructs Arjuna to recite the hymn to Durga before the battle of Kurukshetra, following the example of Ramachandra who worshiped Durga before the battle against Ravana. Again, in Bhagavata Purana (10.88.38-39) Krishna addresses Shiva as visva-isa (Lord of the Universe) and jagat guru (the guru of all), and says, "If someone commits offenses against you, s/he will never get any good fortune". Again Bhagavata Purana (4.4.14) says, yad dry-akṣharam nama gireritam nṛinam sakrit prasangad agham asu hanti tat, pavitra-kīrtim tam alanghya-sasanam, "If someone pronounces the name of Shiva, composed by two syllables, all impurities and faults will disappear from his heart immediately. Shiva's fame is spotless, and nobody dares to disobey him."

Narada Purana (63.121, 65.58) says: dikṣaya guru-murti-stbāḥ sarvanugrahāḥ śivāḥ, "In the process of dikṣha, Shiva, the universal guru, manifests in the form of the dikṣha guru to bless the disciple" and om namas te nātha bhagavan śivaya guru-rupine, "I offer my homage to Bhagavan Shiva, who manifests in the form of the guru". On a side note, this would explain why some so-called devotees who enjoy offending "the demigod Shiva" have so much troubles with finding a genuine guru.

In several scriptural texts we find direct personal disciples of Shiva who were also exalted vaishnavas - starting from Narada himself (Narada Pancharatra, ratra 1, chapters 8-9), to Garga Muni (Brahma vaivarta purana 4.13.72), Markandeya Rishi (Bhagavata Purana, canto 12, chapter 10) and the Pracetas (Bhagavata Purana, canto 4, chapter 24) who specifically became able to approach Vishnu only after being tutored by Shiva. The Narada Pancharatra also states: sivo harir hara iba sakshat siva eva nirupitah, siva-dveshi hari-drohi vishnum nityam bhajan api, "Shiva is Hari and Hari is none other than Shiva. One who is hostile to Shiva is hostile to Vishnu, even though he may daily worship Vishnu." In the line of the followers of Chaitanya, we find the Shivastakam prayers (text 7), quoted by Murari Gupta in his Sri Caitanya Carita Mahakavya. There Chaitanya describes Shiva's position as the universal spiritual master: sinaya sarva-gurave namo namah, "I repeatedly offer my obeisances to Lord Shiva, who is the guru of everyone."

Krishnadasa Kaviraja, in his Sri Vraja dhama mahimamrita, glorifies Shiva as Gopisvara - still today, genuine pilgrims humbly offer their obeisances to Gopisvara Mahadeva in his temple before starting their Vrindavana parikrama. It would also be wise, for the prakrita sabajiya fans of Vrindavana Krishna, to remember that Shiva is the kshetrapala (guardian) in Vrindavana (as in all the other holy places) and specifically watches the rasa mandala area, so that unqualified people will not be able to enter it. Through his mahamaya, Shiva deludes the foolish fake devotees into thinking they are actually standing in the rasa mandala or in the vraja mandala, while they are simply remaining on the external material and geographical surface - where the Seva kunja is not much different from the Radha Golf Club.

स तया श्रद्धया युक्तस्तस्याराधनमीहते । लभते च ततः कामान्मयैवविहितान्हि तान् ॥ ७-२२ ॥

sa tayā śraddhayā yuktastasyārāḍhanamīhate | labhate ca tataḥ kāmānmayāivavihitānhi tān || 7-22 ||

sah: s/he; tayā: with that; śraddhaya: faith; yuktah: together with; tasya: of that (Personality of Godhead); aradhanam: for the worship; ihate: engages in; labhate: s/he obtains; ca: and; tataḥ: from that (Personality of Godhead); kaman: the objects of his desires; maya: by me; iva: certainly; vihitam: (according to) the wishes; hi: certainly; tān: those.

"Engaged in that faithful dedication, s/he worships that form s/he desires, and obtains those blessings/ favors. But all this is arranged by me."

The fact that a worshiper with material desires decides to approach a particular Personality of Godhead does not mean that such Personality of Godhead is "material". This applies not only to Shiva and the "other devas", but to Krishna as well, since there are lots of materialists who worship Krishna with the purpose of getting material benefits: this does not make Krishna a material personality and certainly does not make such materialists any more "spiritual".

Another reading of the last two words is ihitam, meaning "beneficial", referred to the things received by the worshiper. This would indicate that the Godhead is very intelligent and gives to their worshipers only those things that will be beneficial for their progress - whether such things will be pleasurable or unpleasurable. Also, Krishna has already given very clear instructions in 3.9-16 about the need of offering grateful worship to the Devas, to reciprocate their gifts and support in life. As long as we have a material body, we need material resources for our basic maintenance (food, clothes etc) and even to engage in a practical worship to the Supreme Lord. Leaves, flowers, fruits and water (9.26), as well as the tasty sattvic food that is offered to Krishna, and all the other practical paraphernalia for devotional service, are produced only thanks to the blessings of the Devas. What's wrong in asking help from the Devas for one's devotional service to Krishna, and showing them recognition and gratitude according to the explicit orders of Krishna himself in Bhagavad gita, when we do not hesitate to beg and grovel in front of materially wealthy and powerful materialistic people, to flatter them and sycophantically try to get into the picture with them for a nice photo opportunity? Are those arrogant politicians, business people and industrialists, and similar people, more respectable and more worthy of being approached than the sattvic Devas? I think not.

Some say that a pure devotee does not ask any material favor, and therefore s/he does not need to approach the devas or even show them a modicum of respect, but this is fundamentally wrong, and inspired by impersonalist and nihilistic ideas. Devotional service does not require the elimination of all desires, but transforms them into spiritual desires by connecting them to a higher purpose, precisely engaging them in the service of God. Narada Pancharatra is quoted to say: sarvopadhi vinirmuktam tat-paratvena nirmalam, brisikena brisikesa sevanam bhaktir ucyate, "Bhakti means serving the Lord of the senses by engaging one's senses, and it is pure when it is free from all material designations/ identifications, and completely focused on God." What's wrong in having desires? Krishna has already said (7.11) that kama is even divine when it is in accordance with dharma. What we need to give up is not desire, but attachment to the material identification that makes us believe that we are the author of the action and its beneficiary. The best example that illustrates the real meaning of this verse is the fact that the gopis of Vrindavana worshiped Durga by the observance of the long Katyayani vrata to obtain the blessing of having Krishna as their lover. The "exclusive devotees" of Krishna who refuse to honor Mother Durga, Shiva and the other Personalities of Godhead should stop one moment and think whether they are considering themselves more advanced in bhakti than the gopis of Vrindavana.

Another example is Chaitanya himself, who on several occasions instructed his followers and gave his personal example by offering worship and glorification to Durga and Shiva. For example, at Mayapur, during the dancing drama performance at the house of Chandrasekhara, Chaitanya (then known as Nimai) entered into the royal mood of the Mother Goddess while his follower Gopinatha played Vishnu - in the genuine couple of Durga-Madhava, hugely popular in the Bengali and Oriya cultural areas - and the devotees started offering many prayers to Lakshmi and Chandi Durga. Then Chaitanya explicitly instructed his followers never to disrespect or belittle the Devas.

Vrindavan Dasa quotes him in the Chaitanya Bhagavata: "All glories to the universal Mother, Mahamaya Devi. Kindly give the shelter of your lotus feet to the wretched conditioned souls who suffer in this material world. You are the controlling power of the entire material universe and you appear in every yuga to uphold the principles of religion. Even Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva are unable to fully describe your unlimited powers, what to speak of ordinary people. You are faith, compassion, modesty, and the personification of pure devotion to Lord Vishnu, Krishna, so all branches of knowledge are your manifestations. The Vedas describe you as the original energy, and you appear to be within this material nature consisting of the three gunas but you are actually their cause, and you are always situated in a transcendental position. You are the eternal, unchanging, supreme energy, the shelter and resting place of all living entities, the universal Mother who sustains everyone, matchless and unrivalled. You are the life-giving water, and by remembering you one can easily cut the bonds of material illusion. You appear also as Mother Lakshmi, the eternal consort of Lord Narayana, in the homes of the dharmic people, but to the sinful offender you manifest as the all-devouring death. You are the creator of the universe and those who ignore you, not offering you worship, are punished by the threefold miseries. To the devotees you inspire pure faith, and therefore we pray you to please give us shelter in the shade of your lotus feet. Your illusory potency keeps the entire creation enthralled, so if you do not protect me, who will? Your appearance in the material world is to deliver the conditioned souls, and by remembering you one attains all perfection. O Mother, we are all surrendered to you: kindly look upon us with benevolence, so that we may remain with a fixed mind at your lotus feet."

Also, when Chaitanya set on his journey to Jagannatha Puri, he first visited Chatrabhoga on Ganges at Mathurapura (now called Diamond Harbor), a famous tirtha dedicated to Shiva, where Shiva manifests as the water linga at Ambulinga ghat, in the form of a great number of streams formed by Ganga. All the followers of Chaitanya took bath there, and Chaitanya himself immediately manifested a strong ecstasy with uncontrollable spiritual emotions and lost external consciousness.

At Prayaga ghata in the Midnapura district of Orissa, Chaitanya guided his followers to pay respects to the temple of Shiva Mahesha, a lingam installed at a temple near a bathing ghat established by Yudhisthira during the journey of the Pandavas. There Chaitanya ecstatically participated to the kirtana of the devotees of Shiva, and in the end he was so happy that he went around to collect food to feed everyone. Walking on, after the incident when Chaitanya's sannyasa staff was broken, he left his companions; he arrived alone in Jalesvara and went directly to the local Shiva temple, where his anger subsided and he started to dance happily. Vrindavana Das writes in his Chaitanya Mangala, commenting the fact: "If anyone disrespects Lord Shiva, not following the example of Lord Chaitanya, then he cannot be considered a Vaishnava, and all his spiritual advancement will be annulled."

After reaching Bhubaneswar (anciently called Ekamra kanana and Koti lingesvara) Chaitanya took bath in the Bindu sarovara, the holy tirtha filled with all the waters collected by Shiva from the various places of pilgrimage. He immediately went to take darshana of Tribhuvanesvara svayambhu lingam (also known as Lingaraja - still the most important temple in Bhubaneswar) and by seeing that it was beautifully surrounded by innumerable ghi lamps offered by the devotees, Chaitanya felt very pleased and started to dance ecstatically, singing "Shiva, Rama, Govinda". Then he instructed his followers by quoting Krishna's words: "One who claims to be My devotee but disregards Shiva is only trying to pretend devotion to Me" and he offered worship to Shiva, followed by all the devotees. Vrindavana Das comments: "The Supreme Lord is the supreme guru, one who does not follow his instructions suffers because of such grievous mistake." Chaitanya also visited many other Shiva temples in Bhubaneswar before resuming his journey to Puri. He also stopped on the way outside Bhubaneswar at the Shiva temples called Jalesvara and Kapotesvara near the Bhargavi river. Similarly, Chaitanya devotedly visited many Shiva temples while traveling around south India.

अन्तवत्तु फलं तेषां तद्भवत्यल्पमेधसाम् । देवान्देवयजो यान्ति मद्भक्ता यान्ति मामपि ॥ ७-२३ ॥

antavattu phalam teṣāṁ tadbhavatyalpamedhasām | devāṇdevayajo yānti madbhaktā yānti māmapi || 7-23 ||

anta-vat: that has an end; tu: but; phalam: result; tesam: to them; tat: that; bhavati: becomes; alpa-medhasam: less intelligent; devan: the devas; deva-yajah: those who become devotees of the devas; yanti: go; mad-bhaktab: my devotees; yanti: go; mam: to me; api: also.

"Persons of lesser intelligence seek temporary benefits. Those who worship the Devas go to them, but my devotees come to me."

This concept is further clarified as Krishna specifically states that confused and less intelligent people seek temporary material benefits only. On the other hand, offering one's unmotivated and selfless respect and adoration to the Devas as limbs of the Supreme Personality of Godhead is a symptom of a true devotee of the Lord, a genuine follower in the footsteps of Chaitanya and the gopis of Vrindavana. Those same people who approach the Devas with selfish purposes, to try to bribe them for some special favor or karma discount, inevitably also aspire to attain the higher planetary systems, the realms of pleasure, beauty, power and longevity that are generally known as "paradise". Because materialists are merely interested in their own sense gratification, their ideal of perfection in life is to obtain greater and greater pleasures, at a higher level and for a much longer time. They cannot even imagine a higher purpose, but of course, we know that this is not the best possible things we can do with the valuable opportunity of our human life.

However, there is nothing intrinsically wrong or offensive in that limited understanding and aspirations. It is rather a temporary choice, and those who consider it permanent and sufficient for their full satisfaction are actually less intelligent and knowledgeable. These "demigod worshipers" are not the ones who should be worrying about committing offenses. On the contrary, if they are intelligent enough to properly utilize the opportunities that they receive from the Devas, and to keep their minds and hearts pure, they can further their understanding of devotional service and better serve the Divine mission.

Later in the text (8.15, 16), Krishna will state that in the entire material manifestation, even up to the highest planetary systems, all positions are asasvatam (temporary) and dubkhalayam (fraught with sufferings). So those who aspire to svarga, the heavenly planets, when they can actually attain moksha, liberation, and prema, love for Godhead, can easily be described as less intelligent people. They are not exactly mudhab (7.15, 9.11, 3.6) but they do not exactly shine out of their brilliance... not because they have missed out on a "better deal" they could have obtained from Krishna", but because they have not outgrown the materialistic illusion.

Anyway there is no danger if one neglects the worship of the various Personalities of Godhead separately, provided s/he sincerely engages in devotional service to Vishnu, even from a platform of materialistic motivation and gross consciousness. In time, even the grossest and most contaminated materialist can become free from the old attachments and identifications, and attain the level of purity of consciousness (4.36, 9.30). Of course there is a big difference between honoring the Devas as bodily parts of God, and worshiping only one of them as the "all in all" of Godhead - although such ignorant position is not a dangerous one: after attaining the planet/ dimension of the Personality of Godhead s/he was worshiping, a materialist will get the opportunity to be instructed properly by his/ her ista devata, and then return to the earthly level in a human species, to continue his/ her spiritual progress. And of course that route is different from the destination of those who have actually realized Bhagavan and attained the level of genuine and pure devotional service to him: it is all in the consciousness. It is a much faster and safer route, that takes us directly to the ultimate destination (param gatih) without waste of time and energy, unnecessary sufferings and anxiety.

अव्यक्तं व्यक्तिमापन्नं मन्यन्ते मामबुद्धयः ।

परं भावमजानन्तो ममाव्ययमनुत्तमम् ॥ ७-२४ ॥

avyaktam vyaktimāpannam manyante māmabuddhayaḥ | param bhāvamajānanto mamāvyayamanuttamam || 7-24 ||

avyaktam: non-manifested; vyaktim: manifestation; apannam: obtained; manyante: they think; mam: me; abuddhayaḥ: those who have no intelligence; param: supreme; bhavam: nature/ birth/ existence; ajananto: the ignorant/ unaware; mama: my; avyayam: eternal; anuttamam: supreme (without superiors).

"Those who are not intelligent believe that the non-manifested has evolved by becoming manifest. They do not know my supreme existence/ nature as the highest imperishable (reality)."

One of the most important words in this verse is bhava (with a long first a), which means "existence", "birth", "nature" and "purpose". Another important concept is expressed by the words avyaktam vyaktim ("non-manifested manifestation") that may appear as a contradiction in terms but are meant to expand our understanding, like so many similar statements and definitions in the scriptures. When two apparently opposite terms are expressed deliberately, we should utilize the contrast to move beyond duality and see how they can be reconciled in a wider sense.

The definition abuddhaya ("those who have no intelligence") is a further step in the crescendo that started with brita-jnana ("those whose knowledge is confused", 7.20), and moved to alpa-medhasam ("those who have little intelligence", 7.23) and will culminate in mudhab ("fools", 7.25). It is evident here that Krishna gives great importance to the quality of intelligence and equates it to the level of evolution and realization in the individual soul.

The word apannam refers to an achievement, a success, a higher step in evolution, and therefore cannot be applied to the Supreme Lord, who is always eternally liberated and in full control of everything. People with a materialistic frame of mind are unable to understand the eternal and supreme existence of a reality they cannot see with their own limited eyes, and they try to superimpose their own limitations to the transcendental level of Reality. This mentality is called mayavada ("following illusion"), because it entails the conclusion that illusion is more powerful than God, suggesting that Krishna, Vishnu-Narayana himself is under the control of illusion as even God takes a material body, an illusory temporary form made of ordinary material elements like any ordinary individual, subject to ignorance and sufferings. Of course such conclusion is not supported by any genuine scripture. It is rather created by a material misunderstanding about the simultaneous oneness and difference of Atman and Brahman, that remains inconceivable for the material senses, mind and intellect (acintya-bhedabheda tattva).

Some less informed persons incorrectly apply the definition of mayavada by relying on heavy prejudice, often confusing it with the concept of advaita, and pointing at Adi Shankara as the teacher and propagator of "mayavadism". They do not know, or they do not want to notice, that Adi Shankara begins his commentary to the Bhagavad gita with the unequivocal statement narayanah paro 'vyaktat, "Narayana (Vishnu) is supreme and transcendental", besides having written many wonderful texts in glorification of Govinda (as for example the famous Bhaja Govindam song) and of Krishna (as in the famous Gita mahatmya) and so on.

The reason of such offensive confusion is the material perception of reality, that is based on material identification and attachments: this creates a strong dualistic mentality based on partisan bias and blind allegiance to a particular camp, which in turn motivates unintelligent people to systematically vilify "the opposite camp" even with unfounded accusations. In dirty politics, all sorts of mudslinging goes on, even if politicians have to concoct and manufacture imaginative new types of mud to throw at their adversaries. Another verse (9.11) very similar to this one repeats the same concept about the mayavada faulty theory: avajananti mam mudhab manushim tanum asritam param bhavam ajananto mama bhuta-mahesvaram, "Fools do not understand me when I manifest my human appearance, because they do not know my supreme nature, by which I control all forms of existence."

Because in their experience all the things are at first non-manifested, then become manifest and finally disappear again (2.28), materialistic people apply the same criteria to the Supreme Lord, and think that he has come to existence at a certain moment in time. In this regard, we should also clarify that the expression "incarnation" is inappropriate when referring to the manifestation of a divine avatara, as it derives from the Latin carn or caro, meaning "flesh" and indicates an ordinary earthly form.

Mainstream contemporary academia tends to consider the "historical existence" of a religious teacher as an essential validation of the authority of his teachings, but there is no logical sense in that idea: the validity of a system of knowledge should be in its actual contents and merit, and not in the exhibition of archaeological relics that might be connected to an objective time and place and person. There have always been - and there are still - many individuals whose position in time and space can be fully demonstrated, but who have never contributed to the patrimony of knowledge and wisdom of the world, or even have spread dangerous misconceptions or defective theories.

Hinduism or Sanatana dharma is different from the so-called "historical religions" because it did not begin at a certain point in time, but it constitutes the eternal and universal principles of ethics and spirituality, the verifiable scientific knowledge of reality both objective and subjective, and the fundamental consciousness that is sometimes called "conscience", "logic" or "common sense" - but that we call buddhi yoga, or "utilization of intelligence". We could say that Sanatana dharma is the natural religion for all human beings, that can accommodate comfortably all categories and types of mentalities, gradually engaging them towards the direction of progressive understanding, awareness, happiness and harmony.

From time to time, the fundamental principles of Sanatana dharma are presented anew according to various perspectives, especially considering time, place, circumstances and audience, but such presentations are to be studied and understood in the light of a direct personal realization by each and every individual. It is in such light that we must understand the transcendental Personality of Krishna. Earlier (4.6-9), Krishna has explained that he appears periodically to re-establish the eternal principles of dharma (generally translated as "religion"), but he is not subject to the oblivion that limits the individual souls. Why? Because Krishna is not an individual soul. In this chapter, he has clearly stated that he is the essence of all existence - the taste of water, the strength of those who are strong, the light of the sun and the moon, and the eternal origin of everything that exists. How can this Transcendental Existence have a beginning and an end in the material dimension? It is not logical.

It is true that Krishna manifests (srijami, 4.7) particular forms as avatars that are specifically suited for a mission, but such forms are actually eternal or independently existing, and they only become visible and non-visible cyclically, appearing to take birth and to disappear not unlike ordinary individual souls, but with an important difference: all these forms are made of pure spiritual energy, perfectly controlled by the consciousness - in fact, they are consisting of consciousness only.

The discoveries offered by one of the most recent fields of research in western science - particle physics - can help us to understand this mystery. Sub-atomic physicists have found that all matter actually consists of energy organized according to specific vibrational frequencies arranged in a very precise plan, that are sensitive to various factors, including magnetic fields, heat, etc. This principle of a vibrational energy matrix for the material universe explains the functioning of the Vedic science of yoga, based on the control of subtle sound and the biomagnetic energy fields created by the subtle nervous system of the nadis, marmas and chakras. It also explains all the so-called "paranormal" phenomena and many other things that conventional science is still unable to account for. It is the consciousness - as Atman/ Brahman - that controls the vibrational frequencies of matter. The more powerful, vast and deep is the consciousness, the greater is the control over matter, and there is no doubt that Krishna is the most powerful, vast and deep consciousness, being the origin of Brahman and Paramatma as explicitly stated in Bhagavad gita (brahmano hi pratistha aham 14.27, sarvasya caham bhrdi sannivistho 13.28). The individual living entities - that are transcendental in nature just like the Supreme Lord, but limited in quantity if not in quality - also have a certain amount of controlling power, in a measure that is directly proportional to the evolution of their consciousness, characterized in ascending order by the material gunas of tamas (darkness), rajas (passion), sattva (goodness), visuddha sattva (pure goodness) and the spiritual qualities of sat-cit-ananda vigraha. The manifestations controlled by the spiritual principle (purusha) are accordingly the bodies of less evolved creatures such as plants and less conscious animals (tamas), human beings at various levels of evolution (rajas), the subordinate Devas (sattva), and the five main Personalities of Godhead known as pancha devata - Vishnu, Shiva, Devi, Brahma, Surya and Ganesha (that are situated in visuddha sattva). All these forms appearing in the universe are sometimes manifested and sometimes non-manifested: even the first Vishnu avatars such as Kshirodakasayi Vishnu and Garbhodakasayi Vishnu appear and disappear with the cycles of creation and dissolution, while the original Supreme Personality of Godhead is not a particular form, but the non-manifested essence of all existence (sat-cit-ananda vigraha) and thus exists eternally without any change.

नाहं प्रकाशः सर्वस्य योगमायासमावृतः । मूढोऽयं नाभिजानाति लोको मामजमव्ययम् ॥ ७-२५ ॥

nāhaṁ prakāśaḥ sarvasya yogamāyāsamāvṛtaḥ | mūḍho'yaṁ nābhijānāti loko māmajamavyayam || 7-25 ||

na: not; aham: I; prakasah: make myself known; sarvasya: for everyone; yoga: connection; maya: illusion; samavritah: covered by; mudhal: the fools; ayam: this; na: not; abhijanati: can understand; loka: a person; mam: me; ajam: un-born; avyayam: imperishable.

"I do not show myself to everyone, but I remain veiled by my own yoga-maya. Foolish people remain unable to understand that I am unborn and eternal."

Krishna does not show any "special mercy", concern or preference towards the most fallen and stupid living beings. Some people believe that excessive generosity in this regard is praiseworthy and bound to conquer the hearts of the idiots, but in the reality of facts we see that it just encourages laziness and callousness, even to the point of rewarding cynicism and open exploitation. Again here Krishna is speaking disparagingly about the mudha, the idiots, demonstrating that he gives paramount importance to intelligence and its proper use in buddhi yoga, while he has absolutely no sympathy for stupid people. Other occasions in which he used the definition are 3.6, 3.27, 3.29, 7.15, 9.11, 10.3, 11.49, 14.15, 15.5, 15.10, 16.20, 17.19.

It is interesting to note that in this verse Krishna is speaking of Yogamaya and not of Mahamaya when he refers to the covering of his transcendental and supreme nature to the eyes of people during his manifestation in this world. Some commentators hypothesize that here yogamaya indicates the "the three gunas when considered all together or united", but that meaning is not applicable. Yogamaya is the modality of Shakti that enables the development of a favorable relationship that unites the devotee to God within the devotional sentiments and service, while Mahamaya is that the modality of Shakti that prevents ordinary and ignorant conditioned people from realizing the transcendental reality. In other words, Yogamaya covers the Supreme Personality of Godhead and influences the spiritual perception, while Mahamaya covers the materialistic knowledge of the individual soul.

Yogamaya is qualified by the various rasas or sentiments of attachment to the Supreme, while Mahamaya is qualified by the three gunas or qualities of material goodness, passion and ignorance. The material gunas can never cover the Personality of Godhead, while the spiritual gunas that inspire the rasas definitely cover the Personality of Godhead and his intimate devotees - to make a crude example, the two coverings can be compared respectively to a layer of smelly filth and to beautiful resplendent ornaments. This same idea is expressed in Isa Upanishad (15): hiranmayena patrena satyasya apibitam mukham, tat tvam pushan apavrinu, satya dharmaya dristaye, "O radiant sustainer of everyone, the face of the True Reality is covered by a sheet of golden maya. Please remove this veil, so that the true Personification of dharma can be seen." The expression hiranmayena patrena means "the sheet of golden maya".

We should wonder why Krishna is saying in this verse, "I do not show myself to everyone". Anyone who has read the previous chapters of the Mahabharata have seen that Krishna was very much visible to everyone during his appearance as avatara: he was there present on the planet, speaking to Arjuna, and could be clearly seen by all the people assembled on the battlefield at Kurukshetra and by a great variety of people in previous occurrences. To mention one example for all, we can think about the appearance of Krishna and Balarama in the arena of the Dhanus yajna organized by Kamsa at Mathura: the Bhagavata Purana and other similar texts clearly say that different people could definitely see the two brothers attending the festivities and wrestling against Kamsa's champions, but that their perception was different according to their particular level of consciousness. In verse 10.43.17 it is said that human beings (nara) simply saw Krishna as nara varah, "the best of human beings", and those who were devoid of knowledge (avidusam) saw him as a material manifestation (virat). But they did see him, otherwise the wrestlers would have been unable to do their gig, or some of the people in the audience would have been surprised to see the wrestlers fighting against some invisible opponent.

The meaning of Krishna's statement in this verse is that he does not reveal his true nature to those who are unable to perceive it; Yogamaya however makes him appear as an ordinary human being - the people of Vrindavana saw him as their relative, and Devaki and Vasudeva saw him as their child - so that ignorant people will ignore him and pure devotees will interact intimately with him according to their loving propensities. Both these approaches can be considered relationships or connections (yoga).

What is veiled is the supreme nature of Krishna's Personality, that is pure and immensely powerful consciousness. The human-like body that Krishna manifests in his adventures is fundamentally different from the material bodies of ordinary individuals (actually composed by the 3 gunas), because it can take any form and intrinsically possesses all the qualities of mystic perfections (siddhis). Even jivatmas can develop this power in a limited measure through the perfect practice of the yoga science, and can therefore manifest their forms as extremely small (anima siddhi), extremely large (mahima siddhi), extremely light (laghima siddhi), reconfiguring the patterns of material atoms (vasitva siddhi), materializing things by attracting atoms from other places (prapti siddhi), creating new things altogether (isitva siddhi), assuming any shape or form (kamayasayitva siddhi), and manifesting all kinds of powers (prakamya siddhi). There is nothing really miraculous or supernatural in such feats: anyone can do that, with the proper training and practice - it's all a matter of the appropriate level of consciousness.

वेदाहं समतीतानि वर्तमानानि चार्जुन । भविष्याणि च भूतानि मां तु वेद न कश्चन ॥ ७-२६ ॥

vedāhaṁ samatītāni vartamānāni cārjuna । bhaviṣyāṇi ca bhūtāni mām tu veda na kaścana ।। 7-26 ।।

veda: know; aham: I; samatītāni: past; vartamānāni: present; ca: and; arjuna: o Arjuna; bhaviṣyāṇi: future; ca: and; bhūtāni: beings; mam: me; tu: but; veda: knows; na: not; kaścana: anyone.

"O Arjuna, I have full knowledge of the past, the present and the future. I also know all existences/ living beings, but nobody knows me."

To confirm the meaning of the previous verse, Krishna is reiterating here that his supreme nature is nothing by supreme consciousness - Krishna consciousness. Being supreme, there is obviously no higher level of consciousness or knowledge than Krishna's.

Anyone can attain that supreme level of consciousness by simply "connecting" (yoga) with Krishna, just like any ordinary computer can instantly manifest much higher functions when directly connected with a more powerful computer database. As with computers, however, the smaller ordinary computers can only share a limited quantity of such data, although there is no difference in the quality of the data shared. This is why the jivatman and the paramatman are described as "inconceivably one and different". Any jivatma can function on the supreme level of Krishna consciousness, provided it remains strongly connected (no loose connections) and humbly devoted to the supreme Program - for example, not trying to change the parameters of the software or too perform too many functions at the same time, or expecting a very high speed of processing data. For anything else, a truly connected unit is by no means different from the supreme unit: one can feed data to the Supreme Unit through any terminal, and the data will be instantly received by the central data base.

Problems can only occur when the peripheral terminal - the individual jivatma - becomes convinced that it can function independently or drive the entire show by inserting contrasting instructions in the global data base. The Supreme Unit will not be damaged by such infringement, but the individual system will become confused and stop functioning properly.

The words samatitani ("past"), vartamani ("present") and bhavisyanti ("future") clearly state that time is a continuum, not a linear evolution. The Supreme Consciousness is fully aware of all such time dimensions, and this knowledge is also possible to the individual consciousness, albeit in a limited form. The knowledge of the past is the easiest function, as each and every event is recorded indefinitely in the akashic structure of the universe (which we could call etheric space) and can be accessed by those who have developed the proper skills. Besides, all the memories of one's previous lifetimes are contained within the corresponding subtle body of the individual (made of akasha, or "etheric space" and accessible through the subtle functions of the mind, the intelligence and the ego). Knowledge of the present events is tricky, because things are happening in the "here and now" of which most people remain totally unaware. The actual consciousness of the present moment requires a very intense exercise of will power, focusing one's attention on each and every fraction of second, and most people find difficult to maintain that perception already when it is limited to the events that are happening in their immediate vicinities, what to speak of what is happening in other parts of one's house, neighborhood, geographical region or planet.

The future is even trickier, because it is constantly changing under the effect of the actions being performed in the present. We can compare the perception of the future to the scintillating reflection of the sun over the swift current of a powerful river: to truly know the future one must be simultaneously aware of the present and the past, too. Not an easy exercise.

Furthermore, the perception of the future expressed within a linear projection of time will externally appear to be different from the perception of the future expressed in another particular moment of time called "present" in a parallel line of development, or in what contemporary cutting edge science calls "parallel universes". These are not different separate universes, but just various projections of the same universe, that are intricately woven together like the threads of a rope to express the version of reality that our gross material senses can perceive from one moment to the next. Just trying to imagine this level of awareness will give a bad headache to the majority of ordinary people, who use only 15% to 20% of their brain substance - what to speak of also remaining constantly aware of all levels of consciousness in the various conditions of life and all living beings in all the three dimensions of time. And that's only the beginning, because the material manifestation (eka-pada vibhuti) is merely one fourth of the sum total of reality, whereas the non-manifested spiritual world is described as being three fourths (tri-pada vibhuti) of the entire existence. Who can top that? Genuine Krishna consciousness is unquestionably supreme.

The power (shakti) that manifests such consciousness (cit) is called respectively bahiranga shakti ("external power") and antaranga shakti ("internal power"), not on geographical considerations but rather in connection to the attitude of the jivatmas. The bahiranga shakti covers the perception of those jivas who are "outsiders" because they position themselves "outside" Krishna consciousness (bahirmukha, or "turned towards the exterior"), while the antaranga shakti covers the perception of those who position themselves "within" Krishna consciousness (antaratmana, "in the innermost soul" as in Gita, 6.47). This same antaratmana consciousness is expressed in Bhagavata Purana (1.11.32) to describe the rasa feelings of the queens of Krishna in Dvaraka.

इच्छाद्वेषसमुत्थेन द्वन्द्वमोहेन भारत ।

सर्वभूतानि सम्मोहं सर्गे यान्ति परन्तप ॥ ७-२७ ॥

icchādvēṣasamutthēna dvandvamohēna bhārata | sarvabhūtāni sammoham sarge yānti parantapa || 7-27 ||

iccha: desire; dvesa: hatred; samutthēna: arisen from; dvandva: duality; mohēna: by illusion; bharata: o descendant of Bharata; sarva: all; bhūtāni: beings; sammoham: confused; sarge: at creation/ into the creation; yānti: (they) go; parantapa: o Arjuna ("who burns the opponents").

"O Parantapa, descendant of Bharata (Arjuna), all living beings come to existence/ take birth totally confused, deluded by the duality created from likes and dislikes."

The expression iccha-dvesa clearly shows that both attraction and repulsion are the root cause of the material imprisonment. Some people "renounce the world" in disgust and frustration, but they continue to contemplate the objects they renounced, still considering them as legitimate targets for their personal sense gratification. This misunderstanding will cause them to take another birth where their rejection/ repulsion will turn into attachment/ attraction, and so on. The only way out of the trap consists in observing all existences/ beings/ objects as worshipable parts of the Divine Reality and properly engaging one's senses in the service of the Lord of the senses (brishikena brisikesha sevnam bhaktir ucate, "bhakti is defined as serving God through the use of one's senses", Narada Pancharatra). What is the origin of the confusion (sammoham) that binds the conditioned soul to a material birth? The equal and opposing forces of attraction and repulsion (raga and dvesha, or iccha and dvesha) disturb the balance of the consciousness, creating tension and confusion. It is like being pulled in different directions simultaneously: it becomes very difficult to hold one's balance and make deliberate and conscious choices. Already in 2.67, Krishna had explained that the pull of the senses victimizes the mind and destroys one's wisdom, like the wind sweeps a boat on the water.

The solution to the problem is repeated by Krishna several times: to overcome the idea of dvandva, duality (4.22, 5.2, 7.27, 7.28, 15.5) by applying the equanimity, samata, born from knowledge and detachment (2.14, 2.38, 2.48, 4.22, 5.18, 5.19, 5.27, 6.3, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.29, 6.32, 9.29, 10.4, 10.5, 12.4, 12.13, 12.18, 13.10, 13.28, 13.29, 14.24, 18.10, 18.42, 18.54), also defined as tulya, "balance" (12.19, 14.24, 14.25).

Some people may be perplexed about this need of "equal vision" as they fear the concept of oneness (advaita) and its faulty application demonstrated by a class of confused philosophers in the course of time. We need to properly understand the concept of duality, in order to be able to overcome it successfully. Duality is not an "evil" to be defeated and destroyed (as the so-called monotheistic abrahamic ideologies imply at several levels) but rather a veil that we need to recognize as such and overcome in our quest to get a direct vision of Reality. Duality - as a fundamental expression of form - is both Mahamaya and Yogamaya, and as such it is worthy of all our respect. We just need to recognize it and work in harmony with her higher vibrational frequencies rather than become victimized by her lower vibrational frequencies: it is a tiger, and we have a choice whether we want to be affectionate tiger cubs or a rabbit-based lunch.

The illusion of duality (dvandva moha) is inherent in the cosmic manifestation from the very beginning, where the One Transcendental Reality splits into Two, appearing as the Divine Couple. Actually these Two cannot be divided as they are always united, but they appear to be separate in order to create the Supreme Dance of the variegated perceptions of Consciousness. This profound concept is at the foundation of the various representations of Krishna engaging in the rasa lila, or the mystic dance, with his many shaktis. Actually Shakti is one only, but she manifests in innumerable forms in order to create an infinite variety of enjoyment (bladini shakti) starting from the transcendental level and then manifesting also on the material level of the cosmic manifestation.

It is actually this apparent separation (vipralambha) between the Two halves of the Supreme Couple that manifests the most powerful energy of attraction and moves the consciousness in the strongest way, therefore its attending sentiment of parakiya sringara rasa is considered the most intense and intimate relationship with Bhagavan. Those who fail to understand this ontological and universal truth will remain superficially deluded by the materialistic and dualistic concept of an ordinary human couple relationship between a naughty young man who likes to play around with other women while his true lover is neglected and left alone to suffer because she is a silly village girl - young, ignorant and simple-minded.

We should never take Krishna cheaply and think that he is merely a cowherd boy having fun with some girls of his village who were "his devotees". Of course when an avatara descends into this world there is a visible symbolic re-enactment of the profound concepts, that is compared to a theatrical drama performance - a captivating story that aims at focusing the attention of people at whatever level their minds are able to perceive it.

This verse says, yanti sarge, "they enter the creation". The locative grammatical case of the word sarge ("creation") can indicate either time or place, or both. So according to the different shades of meanings, we can understand that the living entities are confused at the time of their creation and/or at the time of the creation of the material universe, when they enter into it. This is the central subject of the lively and sometimes controversial discussion about the origin of the jivas. Some people believe that the jivatmas originally were in the personal company of Krishna in what Gita calls "the supreme abode from which one never falls into the material world" (yam prapya na nivartante tad dhama paramam mama, 8.21, yad gatva na nivartante tad dhama paramam mama, 15.6), but this idea is obviously against Krishna's teachings. This mistaken theory comes from an ignorant speculative elaboration starting from incomplete data, and is compounded by the lack of study of the genuine Vedic scriptures and the de-contestualization of the teachings of some vaishnava acharyas. By carefully analyzing Krishna's statements in Bhagavad gita we can bring some more light to the subject.

The word bhuta refers to the living beings or conditions of beings, indicating only the ordinary conditioned jivatmas that are sometimes called nitya baddhas. It is important to properly understand this definition as relative to its context and not in an absolute sense. This nitya ("eternal") does not apply to a supposed ontological eternal bondage as some are led to believe, but to the immortality of the jiva, as highlighted in Bhagavad gita (nityah sarva-gatah sthanur aalo 'yam sanatanah, 2.24, jiva bhuta sanatanah, 15.7). The adjective baddha ("conditioned") is an independent addition to the attribute nitya ("eternal") and not its qualifying explanation. This meaning is demonstrated by the fact that a jiva can (and should) evolve from the baddha position to the mukta position, even in this life itself (jivan mukta): this is actually one of the main four puruṣa arthas, or purposes in human life.

It would be very illogical to propose mukti (liberation) as a normal goal for conditioned souls, if the conditioned souls were intrinsically and ontologically destined to remain conditioned eternally (the improper explanation of nitya baddha). Therefore all the innumerable Vedic instructions about the attainment of mukti as the most important goal for all conditioned souls would be meaningless, and there would be no point whatsoever in any religious activity or teaching. Any intelligent person will understand this simple point. Those who remain unable to understand it must be confused by Mahamaya because of their offensive attitude and behavior, especially towards the Supreme Guru, Mahadeva. The fact of the matter is that the jivatmas are paramatma vaibhava, or the emanations of the radiance of the Supreme Soul, just like in our bodies the various cells composing the tissues and the organs are manifested by the energy emanating from the soul. They start as anu-atmas ("atomic souls") and they gradually grow through the evolution of consciousness to the point of developing a transcendently spiritual siddha deha ("body of perfection") fully manifesting the qualities of sat, cit, ananda and vigraha - like Bhagavan, but only smaller and therefore dependent on his consciousness. All nitya baddhas are confused from the beginning, but their confusion can and should have an end through the attainment of the spiritual perfection of siddha deha, developed gradually through sadhana (sadhana siddha) and as a result of sincere devotion (krīpa siddha). It is important to understand that success through special blessing (krīpa) can shorten the long path of personal practice (sādhana) only when there is sufficient sincerity and pure desire and devotion in the heart of the aspirant.

This is clearly explained in Patanjali's Yoga sūtras: tatra sthitaṁ yatno 'bhyasaḥ, "It is the practice (abhyasa) (consisting of) being firmly established in one's own effort" (1.13), and ishvara pranidhanād va, "Otherwise, (samādhi can be attained by surrendering to) God." (1.23).

So the anu atmas are born in an immature and confused seed form from the brahmayoti (spiritual radiant light) of the param atman, and enter (yanti) into creation like any child is born to the world with the purpose of developing a useful body for the human mission of life. This birth, this "entering creation" does not really have a beginning, because it happens at every cycle of creation of the universe, while during the non-manifested state of the universe all the anu atmas remain within the body of Mahavishnu in a happily oblivious sleep. Those anu atmas who had already experienced the material universe retain their subtle mental bodies containing the seeds of their karmas, like the deciduous trees in the winter just lose their leaves and remain apparently lifeless, only to sprout and blossom again at the arrival of spring. Others, that are just beginning their journey into the cycle of life, are comparable to seeds that are sprouting for the first time as seedlings and later will grow and produce leaves, flowers and fruits, as the consequence of their good and bad actions in this world. But their original existence as seeds has no beginning and is as eternal as Vishnu. The other category of living entities, called *nitya mukta*s as opposed to the *nitya baddha*s, are only direct expansions of divine Personalities as their vibhinnaśas, or "separated parts", as exemplified by the main gopis and gopas in the Vrindavana lila, and they never enter creation in a confused state of mind. However, once a nitya baddha jivatman has attained mukti, it is not substantially different from a nitya mukta.

येषां त्वन्तगतं पापं जनानां पुण्यकर्मणाम् ।

ते द्वन्द्वमोहनिर्मुक्ता भजन्ते मां दृढव्रताः ॥ ७-२८ ॥

yeṣāṁ tvantagataṁ pāpaṁ janānāṁ puṇyakarmaṇām । te dvandvamohanirmuktā bhajante mām dṛḍhavrataḥ ॥ 7-28 ॥

yesam: those who; tu: but; anta: the end; gatam: reached; pāpam: of the wrongful actions; jananam: the persons; puṇya: virtuous; karmaṇam: actions; te: them; dvandva: duality; moha: illusion/ confusion; nirmuktaḥ: completely free from; bhajante: (they) worship; mam: me; dṛḍha: firmly; vrataḥ: (engaged) in vows.

"Those who have put an end to all bad activities/ sins, perform /have (accumulated) pious/ virtuous activities, and are completely liberated from the delusion of duality and firm in their determination, worship me."

It is not possible to truly worship the Supreme Personality of Godhead and continue to commit negative activities at the same time. Those who try to do that are simply deluding themselves. Sometimes cynical exploiters quote verses 4.36 (api ced asi papebhyah sarvebhyah papa-krit-tamaḥ) and 9.30 (api cet suduracaro) to defend their material attachments and bad habits, but Krishna's instruction is never meant for that purpose. Others even claim to be "transcendental" and "dovetailing" their criminal activities to what they consider "devotional service to Krishna", but they are dangerously delusional, and the object of their worship cannot possibly be Krishna - it will most likely be their own mental projection, and the fact that they are calling it "Krishna" does not make it any better, or more divine or spiritual. Another tricky verse (sarva dharmaṇaṁ parityajya, 18.66) should be properly understood in its context. The plural form of the word dharma indicates a dualistic perception of social duties as material identifications and attachments, and the verb parityajya refers to a quality of detachment, just like in the other famous verse (subha asubha parityagi, 12.17) recommending that we should be balanced in front of the various auspicious and inauspicious situations, without being overwhelmed by either elation or depression.

True, bhakti is independent from karma, dharma and jnana, but Krishna repeats many times throughout Bhagavad gita that a devotee must continue to behave in a proper way, even just to give the good example to the general population (3.25). Neglect towards one's duties, bad behavior and ignorance are never conducive to genuine bhakti. This message has already been presented in various verses, including 7.15 (na mam duskṛitinaḥ bhajante) and will be repeated many times in the course of Bhagavad gita.

So for those who are beginners on the path of spiritual realization, it is important to first become trained in dharma, then in karma (as in duties and active service) and jnana (as in study of the scriptures). Later on, when the devotee will be firmly established in the proper consciousness, it will be possible to rely on a higher level of understanding, and give less importance to rules. We can make the example of mathematics: a beginner in the study of arithmetics will be taught that it is not possible to subtract a larger number from a smaller number (for example, 7 from 5), but after successfully assimilating the fundamental lessons, the student will be told that in fact one can subtract 7 from 5, and the result is -2. If such information had been given to a student on the first day of school, it would have caused only confusion. Similarly, trying to function on the purely transcendental raganuga bhakti in the higher rasas and depending exclusively on the direct instructions of paramatman can be disastrous for someone who has not properly assimilated dharma, karma and jnana, and is still materially identified and attached, more or less unconsciously. In this process, the safest choice is to follow the personalized instructions given by an expert spiritual teacher (4.34), that is able to actually see the level of progress of the student and apply the proper lessons and tests from time to time. Krishna outlines the process in this verse: first of all, one must understand and practice dharma, by abstaining from negative actions (papa) and removing bad habits and defects (anarthas) as well as wrong conceptions and ignorance (avidya).

We also need to engage in positive actions (puṇya karmaṇa) that culminate in the practical activities of bhakti yoga - śravanam kīrtanam viṣṇu smaranam, pada sevnam, archanam, vandanam, etc. All these are called puṇya karmaṇi. Even simply listening to krishna katha is called puṇya śravaṇa kīrtana (Bhagavata Purana 1.2.17). The practical knowledge of how to offer a pleasing service to the Lord is called vidvat pratiti. Collectively, this stage of development in devotional consciousness is called yama and niyama, or regulated vaidhi sadhana bhakti.

These practices include svadhyaya, isvara pranidhana, dharana and dhyana as per the yoga system. The genuine spiritual realization obtained through this process will develop a sincere attachment (asakti) to God, and already at that point the devotee is situated on the platform of dvandva moha nirmukta, because s/he is not confused any more by personal likings and dislikings, but is ready to selflessly serve God and accept whatever God sends him/her. There is no more question of personal gain or loss, pleasure or pain, victory or defeat, heat or cold, fame or infamy, rich or poor, male or female, or any other duality. At that point, it becomes possible to engage in firm vows (vrata) of genuine worship to God (bhajana), and with time and sincere efforts the devotee will become situated on the levels of raganuga bhakti, prema and bhava.

जरामरणमोक्षाय मामाश्रित्य यतन्ति ये । ते ब्रह्म तद्विदुः कृत्स्नमध्यात्मं कर्म चाखिलम् ॥ ७-२९ ॥

jarāmaraṇamokṣāya māmāśritya yatanti ye | te brahma tadviduḥ kṛtsnamadhyātmam karma cākḥilam || 7-29 ||

jara: (from) old age; marana: (from) death; mokṣaya: liberation; mam: me; asritya: taking shelter; yatanti: (they) go; ye: those who; te: they; brahma: Brahman; tat: that; viduḥ: (they) know; kṛtsnam: everything; adhyatmam: transcendence; karma: dutiful actions; ca: and; ākḥilam: completely.

"They take shelter in me, endeavoring to attain liberation from (the cycle of) birth and death, and they come to know that Brahman is the sum total of all transcendence. (Therefore) they completely understand/ know the science of action/ know everything about transcendence, as well about the social/ religious duties to be performed."

The concept of reincarnation was common knowledge in all human societies until the Christian church took over the power in the ancient Roman Empire and banned the idea as illegal heresy, actively persecuting with very cruel punishments anyone who dared to talk about it. The purpose of this asuric law was to control the people through fear and despair, as one brief lifetime of total submission to the religious and political tyranny was the only way to avoid a sentence of eternal torture in hell and win paradise, and the whimsical cruelty and injustice of differences in the birth circumstances made people believe that God was really as bad as those who claimed to be his representatives on earth. Not surprisingly, intelligent people became cynical about religion and the existence of a soul, also because the Christian dogma imposed by the government taught that the individual is the body and has a soul (rather than the contrary). Of course such an idea of soul is totally impossible to demonstrate, and irrelevant for any intelligent person. This situation created a great confusion in the minds of people in general, and led to the idea that life in this world is the only real thing that matters, and we should do everything possible to prolong it in spite of old age and disease, and even in a totally disabled condition. Death became the most terrifying thing, and even speaking about it came to be considered bad taste, therefore when the general people is told about reincarnation, they consider it as a special miraculous occurrence, an extraordinary "second chance" that is only possible for some very special people - like the Tibetan Lamas or other great sages. The Vedic view is radically different. Krishna has already explained, especially in chapter 2, that the Atman is eternal and independent from the material body, and that in any case the body is temporary and afflicted by various types of sufferings. Death - like birth, disease and old age - is an inevitable passage of life and a confusing moment only because of the natural survival instinct, and the accompanying unpleasing feelings. But the problem is neither with birth nor with death: it is the entire cycle of reincarnation under the bondage of conditioned life (samsara) from which we can and should become free in order to attain real happiness.

In verse 13.9 Krishna will state that real knowledge consists in the perception that this cycle of birth-death-old age-disease (janma-mrityu-jara-ryadhi) is a problem because of its inherent sufferings and impermanence (dubkha-doshanudarsanam). Therefore the ultimate success to be achieved by a human being (puruṣa-artha) in this life is mokṣa, liberation from the cycle of births and deaths. The only way to achieve such success consists in taking shelter in the transcendental spiritual consciousness that is Krishna, the Brahman that is also adhyatma or the principle of Atman, the true original identity of the soul. Acquisition of knowledge through the Vedas (indicated here by the word viduḥ, "they know") and a consistent sincere effort (yatanti) on this path of Self-realization are the essential requisites for success, because they support the complete renunciation to material identifications and attachments (sarva parityaga vrata) that enables us to direct all our attention and energies to the spiritual platform. It is important to understand that taking shelter in Krishna (mam asritya) does not refer to the mechanical prayers, the sectarian affiliations, or the blind belief in some supreme person that dispenses rewards or punishments to those who obey or disobey him. Rather, it indicates the level of consciousness or awareness of the transcendental reality (adhyatma) and its realization or application in daily life and in the sense of identity and belonging.

All the necessary branches of knowledge are contained in Bhagavad gita: the proper understanding of Atman/ Brahman, the science of action and duty (karma), and the structure and functions of the universe (ākḥilam or jagat) which will be specifically explained in the subsequent chapters. Since Sanskrit terms usually have various layers of meanings, the second part of this verse could be translated as "Therefore they completely understand the Atman, the world and the science of action" or "Therefore they know everything about transcendence as well about the material universe, and the social and religious duties to be performed".

साधिभूताधिदैवं मां साधियज्ञं च ये विदुः ।

प्रयाणकालेऽपि च मां ते विदुर्युक्तचेतसः ॥ ७-३० ॥

sādhibhūtādidaivam mām sādhiyajñam ca ye viduḥ | prayāṇakāle'pi ca mām te viduryuktacetasah || 7-30 ||

sa: with; adhibhuta: the principle of material elements; adhidaivam: the principle of divinity; manr: me; sa: with; adhiyajnam: the principle of sacred action; ca: and; me: me; vidub: they know; prayana-kale: at the time of death; api: even/ certainly; ca: also/ as well; manr: me; te: they; vidur: they know; yukta-cetasah: those who engage their consciousness.

"They know me and simultaneously they know the principle of material manifestation, the principle of the archetypes governing it, and the principle of sacred action. Thus they will also know me at the time of (their) death, because their consciousness is connected (with me)."

In these last two verses of the chapter, Krishna mentions the fundamental concepts of Brahman, Adhyatma, Karma, Adhibhuta, Adhidaiva, Adhiyajna, and the consciousness at the time of death. At the beginning of the next chapter, Arjuna will ask him for more clarifications specifically on these subjects. The principles called Adhyatma, Adhibhuta, Adhidaiva and Adhiyajna are the foundations of the realities called respectively Atman, material elements, Devas and Yajna, that together with Karma and time constitute the sum total of existence. Chapter 2 spoke extensively about Adhyatma, the principle of Atman, that we could also call the nature of the soul. This is the most important science, because it studies directly the subject of knowledge, without which there would be no knowledge and no cognition. By understanding the actual nature of the Self, one can achieve complete success in this life and in the next.

The sum total of Atman is called Brahman. Each and every individual Jiva Atman emanates from the Param Atman, or "Supreme Soul", Vishnu. Some commentators translate Param Atman as "Supersoul", but such definition may not be easily understandable for most people, as it could give the idea of a merely bigger and more powerful individual soul, something like a Superman in comparison to ordinary men.

To really understand the principle of Param Atman, we should consider for example the expression param guru, that indicates the "guru of the guru". Thus the Param Atman is the "self of the self" or the "soul of the soul". Just like the individual soul - the Jiva Atman - produces a great number of living cells that constitute his/ her material body, so the Supreme Soul - the Param Atman - produces a great number of living spiritual cells that constitute his spiritual body within the material manifestation.

From this, we can understand how and why the individual Jiva Atman cannot exist separately from the Param Atman, and in fact its consciousness is only a spark of the sum total of the individual consciousness of the Param Atman. We know that each and every cell of our own material bodies is conscious and possesses a complex genetic code that constitutes a great amount of knowledge or information, yet when it is separated from the entire body and from its "higher central consciousness", it inevitably perishes.

The principle of Adhibhuta (that indicates the "conditions of life") is more than the material elements in themselves, that include the pancha maha bhuta ("five gross elements") such as earth, water, fire, air and space, and the three subtle material elements known as manas, buddhi and ahankara (mind, intelligence and identification). When considered all together, the sum total of all these material element is called pradhana or maha tattva, or material nature. Unlike her manifestations, pradhana is eternal and always existing, and therefore is also called Brahman - specifically, she is the feminine component of the Undivided One, while the masculine component is called purusha.

The Undivided One is called avyakta, "non manifested", and param, "supreme", and is presented by Adi Shankara Acharya in the first verse of his commentary to Bhagavad gita as narayanah paro avyaktat, "Narayana (Vishnu) (who) is supreme and non-manifested". This Narayana or Vishnu is also called Sadashiva, "the eternal Shiva", while the "non-eternal" Shiva is his manifestation in the material world for the purpose of renovation - the action of dissolution that establishes the pre-conditions for a new creation. Vishnu is thus the origin of the Adhyatma and the Adhibhuta (7.6).

The concept of Adhidaiva, like the concept of Param Atman, should be understood properly. Just like the Param Atman lives within the heart of each living entity, all the Devas also live within the body of the individual Jivatman, because they are the controlling principles of the Virat rupa, the universal material form of the Purusha.

The budding science of psychology in western academia was considerably developed by Carl Gustav Jung (1875-1961), a great admirer and student of Vedic knowledge. Considered the founder of Analytical Psychology, he gave summer lectures on Yoga philosophy and Kundalini in Zurich for a few years. He wrote, "We do not yet realize that while we are turning upside down the material world of the East with our technical proficiency, the East with its psychic proficiency, is throwing our spiritual world into confusion."

Jung is famous for having expounded the concept of Archetypes, or collective, universal and eternal "personality principles" that are found in the subconscious mind of all human beings, irrespective of their education or cultural background, and even unknown to the conscious mind. These archetypes are expressions of the universal symbolic language of the spirit; they are the original model template or ideal representation from which all things of the same nature are copied. He mentioned the Persona, the Shadow, the Anima, the Animus, the Great Mother, the Wise Old man, the Hero, and the Self. Of course Jung expressed this idea in his particular way, that is not the original knowledge, but simply his perception of the reality, and his research has been continued by other scientists, that have developed for example the Constellations technique, or the Dialogue between a person's "sub-personalities", also utilizing instruments such as role playing, and so on. The most important Archetypes are the Mother, the Father, the King, the Child, the Warrior, the King, the Lover, the Architect, the Magician, the Jester (or Madman), the Hermit, the Teacher, and so on. Other "minor" universal Archetypes are symbolic objects such as a forest, a lake, the ocean, a house, a vase, a wall, etc, or animals such as a bear, a cat, an eagle, a lion and so on. There are several exercises for the exploration of the subconscious programming that are based on the visualization of these particular archetypes.

Traditionally, the best and deepest application of these Archetypes is the study of mythology, or the ancient sacred figures of all cultures - whose memory is still lingering at the edges of the contemporary mind, for example in the figures of the Tarots from which the game of cards originally derived. The Vedic or Hindu tradition contains the greatest wealth of such symbolical descriptions and depictions still surviving in spite of the onslaught of the abrahamic iconoclasm that has been continuously going on for over 2000 years.

Chapter 8: Taraka brahma yoga The Yoga of transcendental liberation and liberating spiritual existence

In the first 3 chapters, Krishna has been instructing Arjuna about the performance of one's duty, the distinction between the temporary body and the eternal Atman, the purpose of Yoga as the science of conscious action, the need to control one's mind, the meaning of detachment as selflessness, and the concept of duty as sacred action.

Then Krishna starts to speak about the transcendental level that is above duty and action, and the realization of Atman (3.17-18). However, even those who are already above action and duty should continue to act dutifully, because by their good example they can inspire and support society. Here, for the first time, Krishna speaks about himself and his own transcendental nature (3.22-24), to say that although he is certainly above all duties and actions, and yet he continues to perform those actions that are required for the protection and maintenance of the universe. After this brief comment, Krishna goes back to the subject of dutiful action according to one's position within the order of things in the universe, based on one's qualities and abilities. Again, he briefly mentions his divine nature in 3.30, saying that a yogi offers all his/her activities to him. However, by the end of 3rd chapter, Krishna still presents himself as the equivalent of Atman/ Brahman, in a general transcendental way rather than a very personal way.

The 4th chapter becomes more specific, and Krishna begins to make a clear distinction between himself as a divine Personality, that is immensely different from all other personalities: he is the Supreme Lord of all creatures and states of being (4.6). Unlike the other individual manifestations of Brahman (the Jiva Atmans), Krishna is the supreme individual (Param Atman). Thus from the realization of Brahman, we move to the realization of Paramatma and Isvara. Krishna continues to speak about his own divine nature from 4.1 to 4.14, also revealing that the realization of his transcendental position is the secret to liberation.

Again from 4.15 to 4.43 and from 5.2 to 5.28, Krishna speaks about the sacred nature of dutiful selfless action, talking about Brahman and Nirvana, with only a brief mention about his own divine position (4.35). In 5.29, again Krishna states that one who knows him as the Supreme Lord of all planets, the purpose of sacrifices and the friend of all beings, attains peace.

The 6th chapter shifts the focus again on duty, yoga and the realization of the Paramatma, with 2 verses (6.14-15) and then again 2 more verses (6.30-31) stating that Krishna himself is personally the purpose of yoga and meditation. This concept is repeated in the last verse of the chapter (6.47).

In the 7th chapter, Krishna will speak much more about himself and his supreme nature, with only one exception when he does not mention himself (7.5) This focus on Krishna bhakti becomes so important that, while previously he spoke about detachment as the key to success, now he is speaking about attachment to him as the key to success on a higher level.

From 7.8 to the end of the chapter, we clearly see that Krishna is not an ordinary material personality, but an extraordinarily deep level of consciousness - that can be found in this world as the essence and support of everything that exists. However, not everybody is able to perceive Krishna because one needs to turn to him with an open mind. It becomes clear, therefore, that vijnana is equivalent to the supreme level of transcendental consciousness that we call Krishna consciousness - the complete and constant awareness that encompasses Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan, and includes all realities, material and spiritual. By directly connecting to this supreme consciousness, the yogi attains the highest position and the perfection of life.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

किं तद् ब्रह्म किमध्यात्मं किं कर्म पुरुषोत्तम ।

अधिभूतं च किं प्रोक्तमधिदैवं किमुच्यते ॥ ८-१ ॥

kiṁ tad brahma kimadhyātmaṁ kiṁ karma puruṣottama । adhibhūtaṁ ca kiṁ proktamadhidaivaṁ kimucyate ॥ 8-1 ॥

arjunah : Arjuna; uvaca: said; kim: what; tad: that (is); brahma: Brahman; kim: what; adhyatmam: Adhyatma; kim: what; karma: Karma (action/ duty); puruṣa: Person; uttama: Supreme; adhibhutam: Adhibhutam; ca: and; kim: what; proktam: called/ defined; adhidaivam: Adhidaivam; kim: what; ucyate: it is said.

Arjuna said: "O Purushottama (Krishna, Supreme Person), what is Brahman, what (is) Adhyatma, what (is) Karma? And what are (the realities) called Adhibhuta and Adhidaiva?"

This verse summarizes the main topics of Gita: Brahman (the transcendental unchangeable Reality of the entire sum total of Consciousness), Adhyatman (the living entities), Karma (action), Adhibhutam (the material world) and Adhidaivam (the controlling principle, incarnated by the archetypal Devas). Adhiyajna is the sum total of all the sacred actions, the relationship that connects all these principles and makes it all worthwhile, supporting everything in the universe and creating the harmony and progressive movement we call Dharma and Ritu. In fact, these topics are all that there is to know in the world, and the subject of all the Vedic scriptures. A genuine devotee of Krishna cannot disregard them, because they are right in the heart center of the three most important chapters of the Bhagavad gita, that speak about pure devotional service or Bhakti Yoga. Purushottama means "supreme person", the highest among all the purushas, or persons. The concept of "person" appears fundamental in the correct understanding of all the realities described above. Without it, the six fundamental principles of the entire material and spiritual existence lose all their meaning.

1. Brahman is ultimately personal in nature as Bhagavan or Isvara.

Those who believe that Brahman is simply "impersonal" fail to understand that Brahman is consciousness and spirit, and this is precisely what defines "personality". Actually, Brahman is the sum total of all personalities. How can consciousness and awareness not be conscious and aware of itself? And when it is conscious and aware of itself, how can it not be a subject of cognizance, a personality? Therefore, the definitions nirviesa ("without variety") and nirguna ("without qualities") that are generally applied to Brahman simply refer to the manifestation of variety (implying change and "not being" of something that was "being" before) and quality (as the guna implying the absence of one quality when another opposite quality is present). Krishna will elaborate more on this point in later chapters.

2. Adhyatma is sum total of the the individual jivas or subordinate purushas.

This stage of manifestation has already "separated" itself from the Adhibhuta principle, as a couple represented by Shiva and Shakti. Both these principles were already present within the non-manifested Vishnu (narayanah paro anyaktat), and when they manifest as a couple appearing as male-female, the principle of variety and relationship is manifested.

3. Karma or activity/ duty requires a karta or person that carries on the action. Without a subject of the action, no action can be performed, although of course the consciousness of the karta does not have to be materially identified (4.24).

4. The world of Adhibhuta is filled with personalities, albeit temporary.

The characteristic of the immense variety of material manifestations is specifically built on the various hues of abankara, the sense of identification that is generally considered the basis of a personality, and that constitutes the first material element (bhuta) and the origin of all the others. Again, as in the concept of karma, the subject of the action can choose to interact with the material elements (bhuta) with a material consciousness of selfish exploitation, or with a spiritual consciousness of service. In any case, without a subject (personality) that manipulates and supports (dharyate, 7.5) the material elements of the universe, there would be no meaning to the cosmic manifestation.

5) Adhidaiva, the controlling principle, is incarnated in millions of forms or personalities of the Devas, parts of the universal body (virat purusha) described in the Purusha sukta.

6) Adhiyajna, that will be mentioned in the next verse, is the principle of religious/ spiritual activity, that is different from Karma and in a sense constitutes its purpose. This concept is summarized in verse 3.9: yajnarthat karmano 'nyatra loko 'yam karma-bandhanah, "actions must be performed with a religious consciousness, otherwise they will bind to material consequences". In a deeper sense, this definition refers to the Param Atman, the Supreme Self, that resides in the bodies of all the beings, and is the ultimate enjoyer of all their actions.

The word proktam (pra + uktam) means "defined", "called", "explained", and expresses the concept of universal agreement on the supreme science of Bhagavad gita. Some foolish people believe that any opinion should be considered equally valid, and that any person is entitled to give a whimsical meaning and explanation to definitions and concepts, and even to reality.

Now, while it is a fact that there can be many apparently different perspectives of the same reality, and many languages in which we can legitimately and truly describe it, it is also a fact that we must always remain aware of the general context of the perspective and utilize a language that can be interfaced with other languages in an official way. If we fail to do so, our opinions will have no value and will even become an unnecessary disturbance to society. Any language needs a dictionary, where each and every expression is defined in a clear, consistent and universally recognized way. We cannot use words by giving them whimsical meanings that are not recognizable by others, because such a behavior will create confusion and unnecessary hostility. When we want to give a different meaning to a word, we need to record it in some way, so that others can use the reference to understand what we are talking about.

अधियज्ञः कथं कोऽत्र देहेऽस्मिन्मधुसूदन । प्रयाणकाले च कथं ज्ञेयोऽसि नियतात्मभिः ॥ ८-२ ॥

adhiyajñah katham ko'tra dehe'sminmadhusudana | prayāṇakāle ca katham jñeyo'si niyatātmabhiḥ || 8-2 ||

adhiyajnah : Adhiyajna; katham: how; kab: who; atra: here; dehe: in the body; asmin: this; madhusudana: o Krishna; prayana: of death; kale: at the time; ca: and; katham: how; jñeyah: known; asi: you are; niyata: that strive; atmabhiḥ: to those souls.

"O Madhusudana (Krishna), how is the Adhiyajna (residing) in this body? And how you will be known at the time of death by those who are engaged in Yoga?"

The name Madhusudana refers to Krishna killing the asura Madhu, that represents ignorance and illusion, so Arjuna appeals to this power to vanquish confusion and lack of knowledge.

As we have already mentioned, the main subjects of Bhagavad gita are as follows:

1. what is Brahman?
2. what is Adhyatma?
3. what is Karma?
4. what is Adhibhuta?
5. what is Adhidaiva?
6. how is the Adhiyajna residing in the body?
7. how will Krishna be known at the time of death by those who are engaged in Yoga?

We have already explained five of these all-important concepts at the end of the previous chapter, when Krishna mentioned them, and now in the subsequent verses Krishna will elaborate more. The concept of Adhiyajna is just as deep and intriguing as the concept of Adhyatma. At a first glance, it indicates Param Atman, that resides in the body together with the Jiva Atman, as described in Mundaka (3.1.2) and Svetasvatara (4.7) Upanishads (samane vriksho purusho nimagno anisaya socati muhyamanah, justam yada pasyati anyam isam asya mahimanam iti vita-sokah; dva suparna sayujya sakbaya samanam vriksham parisavajate). The two purushas, like two birds of the same nature, are sitting on the same tree.(the body). One of the two is engrossed in contemplating and eating the fruits of the tree, while the other is simply watching him and waiting for him to realize his glories, which will put an end to all worries.

But why is it called Adhiyajna here? Because the param atman is the origin and purpose of all yajnas, the spiritual and religious activities. Again, materialistic people with a short supply of intelligence will think that a yajna, or religious activity, is just a ritual ceremony, a specific set of verbal formulas and ritual gestures that is performed by a caste of priests, but that is not a fact. The concept of yajna as religious activity encompasses all the five categories of dutiful action (pancha maha yajnas) expressing gratitude and reciprocating the benefits we all received from God and the Devas (agnihotra, sandhya vandana, upasana), the Vedic knowledge compiled by the great Rishis (svadhyaya, sadhana), the ancestors of the family (tarpana, sraddha, garbhadana), the other human beings (varna karma, atithi seva, dana seva) and even animals and other creatures (bali, ahimsa).

Such yajnas can be performed externally as rituals, or just internally as a sacrifice of consciousness and the activities of the senses and the mind in daily life (4.25, 4.26, 4.27, 4.28, 4.29, 4.30), and in many different ways (babu vidha yajna, 4.32) to cover all types of activities on the human level. In fact, each and every action should be transformed into yajna by the power of consciousness, as Krishna will clearly say at the conclusion of the central three "purely devotional" chapters of Bhagavad gita, in 9.27: yat karosi, yad asnasi, yaj juhosi dadasi yat, "whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice and you give away", kurusva mad arpanam, "do everything as a sacred offering to me". This "me" mentioned by Krishna is the Adhiyajna, who lives in the heart of each and every soul, and therefore it is not limited by the form of the Deity in the temple, and does not need to be endorsed by any religious organization or specific process. Bhakti is the most natural function of the self, and it cannot be limited or stopped by any external circumstance.

For those who have established themselves in this consciousness, death becomes irrelevant, as it was already stated by Krishna at the very beginning of his instructions in Bhagavad gita: dehantara praptir dhiras tatra na muhyati (2.13), a person who is balanced does not become confused by the end of the body.

Anyone can achieve this level of perfect consciousness: it is just a matter of effort. The niyata atmas are those jivatmas that sincerely and seriously engage in the practice of the development of consciousness according to the system of yoga, that starts with yama and niyama.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

अक्षरं ब्रह्म परमं स्वभावोऽध्यात्ममुच्यते ।

भूतभावोद्भवकरो विसर्गः कर्मसंज्ञितः ॥ ८-३ ॥

akṣaram brahma paramaṁ svabhāvo'dhyātmamucyate । bhūtabhāvodbhava-karo visargaḥ karmasāñjītaḥ ॥ 8-3 ॥

sri-bhagavan: the perfect Lord; uvaca: said; akṣaram: eternal/ syllable; brahma: Brahman; paramam: supreme; sva: own; bhava: nature; adhyatmam: Adhyatma; ucyate: is said; bhuta: of the living entities/ the conditions of life; bhava: the existence; udbhava: manifestation; karah: that makes; visarga: the production/ creation; karma: Karma; samjñitah: is known as.

The Lord said: "Brahman is the transcendental/ supreme unchanging (existence). The intrinsic nature (of the being) is called Adhyatma. And Karma is described as the creative action that causes the states of existence/ the bodies/ the nature and the birth of the embodied beings."

Krishna is giving here the following definitions:

1. Brahman is the supreme existence that never changes
2. Adhyatma is what manifests the existence of the living entities
3. Karma is creation or manifestation

The definition of Brahman as akshara is specifically mentioned also in Brihad aranyaka Upanishad (3.89) as "unchanging" is expressed as na ksharati, where kshara is a synonym of bhava, "becoming". The other meaning refers to the the supreme syllable (akshara), the pranava omkara, that was mentioned in verse 7.8 and will be mentioned again in 9.17, and 17.23 and 17.24 as the sound form of the Brahman. This science is also explained in detail in many Upanishads - Chandogya, Prasna, Brahma, Para Brahma, Turiyatita, Amrita nada, Darshana, Dhyana bindu, Hamsa, Mandala brahmana, Nada bindu, Sandilya, Yoga tattva, Kausitaki, Maha, Narayana, Savitri, Rahasya, Svetasvatara, Dattatreya, Hayagriva, Mahanarayana, Nrisimba tapani, Rama rahasya, Vasudeva, Atharva siksha, Bhasma, Rudra hridaya, Brahma vidya, Akshi, Garbha, Gopala tapani, Tara sara, Akshamalika, and especially Paramahansa parivrajaka, Sannyasa, Satyayani, Yoga chudamani, and Narada parivrajaka.

The word karah, "the maker" may be applied to the definition of Adhyatma and/ or to the definition of Karma, which is strictly connected by the same verbal root. It is not difficult to see that the word karma comes from karah. However, the position of the words in the verse can also refer to the Adhyatma, the principle of manifestation of the bhutas, the "beings", a definition that is applicable both to the individual living entities and to the various conditions of existence. These two explanations are not contradictory, but rather meant to expand our understanding on more levels and make it deeper.

The concept of Adhyatma has been explained as the svabhava (with a long a), that is the inherent and original nature of the Atman, that is the specific mode of consciousness. Such mode of consciousness can be spiritual or material, and as a consequence, a suitable body is manifested through action. The spiritual body is developed through bhava or transcendental emotion in the devotional service to the Lord through the agency of Yogamaya, while the material body is developed through the birth into the material universe through the agency of Mahamaya.

It is said, jivatmanah sambandha yo bhavo: through the connection or from the relationship, the jivatman experiences the feeling of identification (either as part of the Supreme or as a separate enjoyer) and this in turn makes him choose to engage in action (adi kṛitya), which creates his body. It is then said, svam bhavayati: he transforms himself through perception, through emotion or feeling he develops a condition of being. We will here repeat that with a long first a, the word bhava means "emotion, feeling", while with a short first a it means "existence, birth, becoming, manifestation". Although the two meanings are obviously connected to each other, they do not have the same significance, as the former is the cause of the latter. In this sense, it is what causes the manifestation of the conditions of the beings, the original reason for coming into being of all the positions of a living entity. While the Prakriti is the cause of action, the Purusha is the cause of perception and consciousness: this is symbolized by the image of Mother Kali standing on the body of Shiva - as Shiva without Shakti is sava ("corpse") and cannot act. However, the perception (pleasure, aspiration, desire, feeling, etc) of the purusha stimulates the prakriti, and the karma (action) is generated.

Karma is probably the most successful and popular word leaked from the corpus of Vedic knowledge into the daily life vocabulary of western countries, even more than yoga. However, its meaning is often distorted due to cultural superimpositions and lack of proper information. It is generally used with the meaning of destiny, and sometimes retribution or punishment. In abrahamic ideologies, this destiny is the "lot in life" incomprehensibly assigned by a tyrannical God to each individual at birth, and that must be accepted without discussion and without attempting to improve one's situation. To this fatalistic interpretation of Destiny, the additional concept of reincarnation mixes the idea that the good or bad actions we performed in previous lifetimes come back to us in the form of reward or punishment, in a sort of "tit for tat" reaction that was also described in some versions of hells (for example, in Dante Alighieri's Divina Commedia). However, Karma is not just an inevitable jail sentence we simply need to storm out in a passive and fatalistic way. Karma is constantly changing with each action (or inaction) of ours, and can even be neutralized or overcome completely by new and suitable actions; people usually want to get rid of the "bad karma" (and don't mind having some "good karma"). Actually, the law of Karma is much more complex and deep than that, and is explained precisely, clearly and consistently in Bhagavad gita.

The word visarga, that can be translated as "creation" or "completion of the sacrifice or activity offered to the Devas", "sending forth", "discharging", is also the name of a particular item in the Sanskrit alphabet, indicating the "end" of sound - an echoing end, as opposed to the nasal end provided by its companion and counterpart anusvara. The third companion, the virama, provides an abrupt end to the sound. A symbolic interpretation of these three items in the Sanskrit alphabet is also directly connected with karma and the law of cause and effect: when an action is done (mentally, verbally or physically), the result is instantly created, although it may become manifest only after a period of time. The visarga or creation proper is the echo of previous tendencies, and perpetuates the repetition of the choices and actions in this life into the future by creating the seeds for future actions and lifetimes. The anusvara, that is crowning the transcendental syllable AUM, is the sacred action that neutralizes action and creates moksha, the cessation of the cycle of births and death and the attainment of the transcendental level of consciousness. The virama is the end of the manifestation. In the cycle of the moon and the earth, visarga is the waxing and waning moon, and the pleasant seasons of spring and autumn, anusvara is the full moon (symbolized by the dot into the moon sickle, a very recurrent sacred image in all ancient cultures) also called prana bindu or sasa bindu, and connected to the rainy season. This also connects Chandra, Indra and Soma, and the addition of the name chandra to the names of Krishna and Rama. Virama is the dark moon (amavasya), sleep, death and the barren season where everything seems to be dead and non-manifested: summer in the hot climates and winter in the cold climates. The word visarga is related to visarjaniya, and to the "dis-installation" of the Deity at the end of the worship rituals. As a component of the yajna or sacred action, the visarga or completion is the moment when the desired result of the activity is created and the action or vow is therefore completed.

अधिभूतं क्षरो भावः पुरुषश्चाधिदैवतम् ।

अधियज्ञोऽहमेवात्र देहे देहभूतां वर ॥ ८-४ ॥

adhibhūtaṁ kṣaro bhāvaḥ puruṣaścādhidaivatam | adhiyajñō'hamevātra dehe dehabhūtāṁ vara || 8-4 ||

adhibhūtaṁ: the physical manifestation of the universe; kṣara: impermanent; bhavaḥ: nature; puruṣaḥ: the principle of Consciousness; ca: and; adhidaivatam: the controlling archetypes; adhiyajñah: the Divine principle; aham: I; eva: certainly; atra: in this; dehe: body; deha-bhūtaṁ: of those who have/ carry a body; vara: o best.

"O best among those who have a body, the adhibhūta is the physical manifestation of the universe and is undergoing constant transformation. The adhidaivatam is the principle of Consciousness manifested as the controlling archetypes in the universe, and I am the adhiyajna, the Divine principle that resides in each body as the Param Atman."

Krishna is answering Arjuna's questions: in the previous verse he explained about Brahman, Adhyatma and Karma, and here he explains about Adhibhūta, Adhidaiva and Adhiyajna. This should be contemplated in preparation for death, so that it will be easier to leave the body without being confused by identifications and attachments, just like a bird leaves the nest in the tree to soar freely in the sky. The expression deha bhūtaṁ vara, "o best among those who are embodied", indicates that the topics of this verse refer to the human body and to the material universe, microcosm and macrocosm, or in other words, they are present atra dehe, "in this body".

The adhibhūta manifestation is also called material nature, although it is merely a production of the original supreme Shakti. She is also eternal in existence, but the manifestations she produces are in constant transformation, revolving in cycles of creation, preservation and dissolution: therefore the adhibhūta principle is called akṣara, or "non-eternal". The various stages of the material bodies are also detailed as birth, growth, maturity, reproduction, deterioration and death. This is also highlighted by the definition bhavaḥ, "nature" or "manifestation", as something that comes into existence; we remember that bhūta, "being", is the result of bhava, "manifestation". The word bhava also means "condition, nature as manifestation of life circumstances". Whatever exists on the physical level is constantly changing due to the action of the adhyatman and the karma; such action can be direct as in the case of the body or indirect as in the case of those things related to the body, such as buildings, utensils, etc. The definition of adhibhūta includes the 5 gross elements and the 3 subtle elements, but the gross elements are more easily visible, as they form the tangible objects like clay and pots. All the forms of adhibhūta depend, for their existence, on the support (dharyate 7.5) of the jīvatman (individually) or adhyatma (collectively), and they are originated from the Brahman, that is also the origin of the adhyatma.

The definition of adhidaiva or adhidaivata is the controlling principle, the plan or the system of natural laws and regulations according to which the adhibhūta (the material objects) are functioning and directed with intelligence for the proper maintenance and progress of all beings. We can also identify it with the viśva rupa or the virat rupa, the "universal form" of the Lord, that includes all Devas and planets, the principle of order and management that constitutes the authority of the Devas, beginning with Surya. This Puruṣa or principle of Consciousness resides in the Sun and sustains the organs and senses of all creatures; he is also called Hiranyagarbha, "the golden embryo". All the Devas are parts of the body of the Lord, and as such each particular Deva has the power to perform some activity or function in the universe, and to regulate those jīvatmas and those material elements that are under their control. The definition of adhiyajna is the last - but not least - factor in Krishna's explanation, and is given special importance by the expression aham eva, "that is myself", or "it is I only".

The adhiyajna is the sacred principle, the principle of the sacred action or sacrifice (yajna), the act of sacred consciousness that brings the purpose of the universe and life to a higher level. This Supreme Consciousness or Supreme Lord called Yajna or Adhiyajna also resides within the body, but while the atman is a separated part or vibhinnaṁsa, the param atman is directly the One Reality or svamsa. The Bhagavata Purana (2.2.8) states, kecit sva-dehantar brdayavakase pradesa mantram puruṣam vasantam, "The Supreme Puruṣa that resides in the heart within the body, is as big as a thumb". This measure is also confirmed by the Katha Upanishad (2.1.12): angustha-matrah puruṣo madhya atmani tiṣṭhati. This pradesha matra or angustha matra is explained as the measure of the distance from thumb to tip of index. Of course the body of the Param Atman is a subtle spiritual presence, that can only be contemplated by the vision of the mind and the intelligence.

The meditation practiced by the yogis has the only purpose of actually contemplating this Param Atman, and with sufficient practice and purification of the mind and intelligence, through the precise and ample instructions of the śāstra and the guru, the sādhaka ultimately becomes able to see the Lord. Those who have attained this vision confirm that it is a beautiful form, radiant with a soft transcendental light. The Lord appears to be in the prime of youth, with a smiling and kind face, four attractive arms holding the symbols of divinity, and decorated with wonderful ornaments and clothing. Several other verses of Bhagavad gita confirm this presence of the Adhiyajna within the body of the jīvatman: 15.15 (sarvasya cāham brīdī sannivisto, "I reside in the hearts of all beings"), 18.61 (īśvaraḥ sarva bhūtanāṁ hṛd deśe 'rjuna tiṣṭhati, "O Arjuna, the Lord of all beings resides in the heart"), 13.23 (upadrasta anumanta ca bhārta bhokta mahesvaraḥ paramatmeti capy ukto dehe 'smin puruṣaḥ paraḥ, "It is said that the Supreme Lord, the Supreme Person, resides in this body as Paramatma together with the Atman, as the witness, the sanctioning authority, the sustainer and the enjoyer of all actions"), 13.3 (kṣetra jñam capi māṁ viddhi sarva kṣetresu bhārata, "O Bharata, know that besides the Atman, there is another Consciousness, that is me, and such Consciousness is aware of all the bodies").

Yajna inspires the acts of sacrifice from within the heart of the human being, and resides in the body because sacrifice is performed through karma or the actions or work of the body (Gita, 3.5, brahma nityam yajne pratisthitam, "Brahman eternally resides in sacred action").

This position of the Param Atman or Yajna as the actual enjoyer (5.28, bhoktaram yajna tapasam) of all the sacred activities should be properly understood on the transcendental level; to help us in this effort, the shastras offer a different and apparently opposite perspective with the example of the two birds sitting on the same tree. The Bhagavata Purana (11.11.6) says: suparnav etau sadrisau sakhayau yadricchayaitau krita-nidau ca vrikshhe, ekas tayoh khadati pippalannam anyo niranno 'pi balena bhuyan, "Two birds of similar nature, and related by friendship, by their own choice have made a nest in a tree; one is eating the food from the banyan tree, the other is not eating but he is more powerful."

The same image is found in Mundaka Upanishad (3.1.1): dva suparna sayuja sakhaya samanam vriksham parisavajate, tayor anyah pippalam svadv atty anasnann anyo 'bhicakasiti, "Two birds are sitting on the same tree as friends; one bird is eating the fruits of the tree, and the other is simply observing, without eating." This exact verse is repeated in Svetasvatara Upanishad 4.6, and another verse is added (4.7): samane vrikshhe purusbo nimagno 'nisaya socati muhyamanah, justam yada pasyaty anyam isam asya mahimanam iti vita-sokah, "Although the two purushas are in the same tree, one is experiencing deep anxiety and confusion, but if he turns towards the Lord and becomes aware of his glories, immediately he becomes free from all worries."

The example of the tree as the body is also repeated in Bhagavata Purana with different symbolic meanings and references: ekayano 'sau dvi-phalas tri-mulas catu-rasah pancha-vidbah sad-atma, sapta-ivag asta-vitapo navaksho dasa-ccbadi dvi-kebago hy adi-vrikshah, "The one body called the original tree has 2 types of fruits (joy and pain), 3 roots (the gunas), 4 tastes (or rasas - dharma artha kama moksha), 5 ways to acquire knowledge (5 senses), 6 states (lamentation, illusion, old age, death, hunger, thirst), 7 coverings (skin, blood, muscle, fat, bone, marrow, semen), 8 branches (the material elements), 9 holes (or openings), and 10 leaves (the life airs)" (10.2.27), and dve asya bije sata-mulas tri-nalah pancha-skandbah panca-rasa-prasutib, dasaika-sakho dvi-suparna-nidas tri-valkalo dvi-phalo 'rkam pravistab / adanti caikam phalam asya grdbra grame-cara ekam aranya-vasab, hamsa ya ekam babu-rupam ijyair maya-mayam veda sa veda vedam, "This tree has 2 seeds (good action and bad action), hundreds of roots (the previous impressions or vasanas), 3 lower trunks (the subtle elements), 5 upper trunks (the gross elements), producing 5 types of sap (sense perceptions or sense pleasures), 101 branches, 2 birds nests, 3 types of bark (valkala, coverings), 2 fruits (pravritti and nivritti, or bhoga and tyaga), and it grows as high as the sun. Those who eat one of the 2 fruits are lusty for sense gratification (grdbrah) and live in urban areas (grame carab), while the hamsas who live in forests eat the other fruit. One who understands that this tree is the illusory potency (maya-mayam) of the One that appears in many forms, by those who are worthy to be worshiped (the Personalities of Godhead, or the Gurus), he actually knows the Vedas." (11.12.22-23).

अन्तकाले च मामेव स्मरन्मुक्त्वा कलेवरम् । यः प्रयाति स मद्भावं याति नास्त्यत्र संशयः ॥ ८-५ ॥

antakāle ca māmēva smaranmuktva kalevaram | yah prayāti sa madbhāvaṁ yāti nāstyatra saṁśayaḥ || 8-5 ||

anta: end; kale: at the time of; ca: and/ also; mam: me; eva: certainly; smaran: remembering; muktva: being liberated from; kalevaram: the material body; yah: s/he; prayati: goes; sab: s/he; mad-bhavam: my nature; yati: attains; na: not; asti: there is; atra: here; samsayah: doubt.

"One who, at the end of time (of this life), remembers me while leaving his/ her body attains my nature. There is no doubt in this."

The expression sa mad-bhavam yati means "attains my nature/ state of existence", but could also be translated as "attains the conception/ idea/ consciousness of me". The word bhava also refers to the highest stage of pure bhakti, which extends the meaning of the expression "mad-bhavam" to an extremely personal level of happiness and realization. We may recall here that the siddha deba, the perfect spiritual body developed by the devotee in the progressive cultivation of raida and raganuga bhakti, is nothing but the sentiment - rasa or bhava - in relationship with God. The same meanings of bhava can be applied in the following verse to the expression sada tad-bhava-bhavitah, that refers to always thinking of something, or we could say, developing the same vibration frequency. In Vedic culture, nature or state of existence is synonymous with level of consciousness.

Anta kale literally means "at the end of time" and can apply both to the end of the time allotted within a particular body, or to the time of the death of the universe, when all the bodies are withdrawn inside the pradhana and then inside the body of Karanodakasayi Vishnu, the "Spirit floating on the waters". When all the bodies and the planets are destroyed, the jivatmans that still have karmic seeds to develop, temporarily re-enter the body of Vishnu, to be manifested again at the beginning of the next cycle. In both cases, the jivatmans that had attained the level of jivanmukta return to the supreme Dhama, and the others get a little rest from the fatigue of living in the material world. The time of death is a crucial moment for the embodied being, because it opens a door that facilitates the free movement out of a set of material circumstances and into a new path - something like getting off from one train and boarding a new one. We could really say that death is like a railway station, and the more conscious and informed we are at the time of death, the better we can choose our next destination.

In order to have a strong and focused consciousness at the time of death, when the body is struggling with its survival instinct and the senses and mind are failing - and sometimes the awareness is hurt by offensive actions, words and thoughts especially in case of a violent death - we need to have made a lot of practice during our entire lifetime. Probably the greatest danger is to be unable of detaching one's consciousness from thinking negatively about the immediate material cause of our death - in other words, the people we blame for that or for any other failure in our life - because this will push us towards a new incarnation precisely among that type of people. For that, we do not need to be thinking of that form in a positive way, with attraction and desire: a negative meditation, with repulsion and hatred, will have the exact same effect. For example, let's consider two opposite and hostile factions that keep fighting each other for some ideological or even "religious" reason. People from the group A kill people from the group B (and vice versa), with obsessive determination in a feud that never ends, even coming to the point of suicide terrorism, by which one is glad to blow himself up only to cause the death of more enemies, including people who are not engaged in any hostile activity. What do you think will happen to the suicide bomber? If he is lucky, he will find himself in the womb of some woman of the opposite faction, and after birth he will be trained to hate and kill the people that were previously his kin, but are now his enemies. But still, that would be a great fortune, because he does not really deserve a second opportunity for a human life after wasting it with a hateful immolation of one's own body to bring about the death of other innocent and unaware people, who had no chance to defend themselves. Usually such a cowardly and cruel action drags the individual down into the lower realms of ghosts or inferior animals, where he cannot do too much damage any more. The purpose of this cycle of deaths and births is to help the individual to understand the futility of the identification with the material body and its affiliations and designations. Foolish people entertain the strange belief that at the time of death some "savior" will come to reward them of their political or institutional loyalty, and modify their consciousness from the outside, or even take them to "the spiritual world" without any need of modifying their consciousness. Therefore during their lifetime they do not bother to make sufficient efforts to improve their own realization and consciousness, becoming lazy and complacent about their position they call in "good standing" or "among the saved" because they have made some public statement of allegiance to the particular sect to which they belong, and they have managed to avoid getting into some fight with a priest. Reality is quite different. If we have not developed a higher level of consciousness during our allotted time in this body, we will simply have to take another birth, and another, and another, until we qualify for liberation.

At death, usually the jivatman has a window of time in which s/he can gather his/her concentration and direct it towards the proper destination to be attained. The maximum extent of this period is 40 days, after which the jivatman that has not been able to cut free from the previous material identifications and attachments remains as a ghost between the gross and the subtle dimension. In ancient times, several civilizations had developed rituals to help the recently deceased find their way towards a better incarnation: the most famous are the Bardo Thodol (also called the Tibetan Book of the Dead) and the Egyptian Book of the Dead, that was often inscribed in the frescoes within the tombs of pharaohs and very important or wealthy people. In the Vedic field we have the Garuda purana, that was traditionally recited for this purpose. However, such practice is meant to be supported by a lifetime of proper meditation and awareness development. In the previous verse, Krishna clearly stated that one who remembers him at the time of death, will attain him. However, we need to properly understand how to remember Krishna. Arjuna himself asks this important question directly to Krishna, and Krishna answers in the core chapters of Bhagavad gita.

यं यं वापि स्मरन्भावं त्यजत्यन्ते कलेवरम् । तं तमेवैति कौन्तेय सदा तद्भावभावितः ॥ ८-६ ॥

yaṁ yaṁ vāpi smaranbhāvaṁ tyajatyante kalevaram | taṁ tamevaiti kaunteya sadā tadbhāvabhāvitaḥ || 8-6 ||

yam yam: whatever; va: or; api: also; smaran: remembering; bhavam: feeling/ situation/ nature; tyajati: leaves; ante: at the end; kalevaram: of the body; taṁ tam: that same; eva: certainly; iti: thus; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; sada: always; tad: that; bhava: nature/ sentiment; bhavitah: immersed/ absorbed.

"O son of Kunti (Arjuna), whatever state of existence/ nature one remembers at the time of leaving the body, s/he attains (precisely) that state of being/ condition, (because) of always contemplating that existence."

A true yogi knows first of all that s/he is not the material body, which is simply a vehicle or a dress to be used temporarily. This is the first step in spiritual progress and the ABC of Vedic knowledge, without which there can be no advancement or further realization possible. Krishna already explained this point extensively in the second chapter of Bhagavad gita, illustrating the mechanism of reincarnation as a perfectly natural and scientific fact that is caused by the habits and tendencies of each living entity. When the body is no more suitable for our work, we simply leave it and take a new one: "Just like a man abandons clothes that have become torn or worn out and acquires other and new clothes, in the same way one leaves the damaged body and accepts another new body" (2.22). At each moment in the course of our lifetime, we shed old and damaged cells and we add new fresh cells to our bodies, and when old age or disease make this process too slow or difficult, we drop the entire gross body and we move on to find the most suitable circumstances to develop a new one. Although these passages are perfectly natural, they involve a certain amount of suffering and anxiety because of the perception of non-existence, loss of consciousness and pain, that are contrary to our fundamental need of permanence, knowledge and happiness - the three basic qualities of spiritual reality.

The method of yoga is meant for the emancipation from this suffering and ultimately for the attainment of the supreme happiness, that leads to permanent liberation from the cycle of births and deaths. This is possible through the control of one's own mind and the constant meditation on Transcendence, because the deepest happiness of the Atman will automatically detach us from the inferior material pleasures, attachments and identifications even while still living in this material body, as confirmed in the second chapter: "The embodied soul may keep the sense objects at a distance and reject them, but he can give up the taste (for such objects) when he sees/ finds the Supreme/ something that has a higher/ better taste." (2.59)

Chapter 5 also discussed this topic in the following verses: "Those who, in this very body, have vanquished rebirth, have a mind that is established in equanimity. This equal vision is certainly pure/ free from all defects, because the same (pure) Brahman is (in all that exists). Thus they are (firmly) established in Brahman." (5.19),

"One who here (in this life/body), before dying, is capable of withstanding the onslaughts of lust and anger, is a yogi and a happy human being." (5.23),

"One who is happy within (the self), who finds pleasure within (the self), who finds enlightenment/ the light within (the self) is a yogi who attains the Brahma nirvana and the existence/ realization of Brahman." (5.25),

"The (wise) seers (of Reality) attain the Brahma nirvana (because) have been purified from (all) sins/ faults and have cut off (all) doubts (dualistic illusions), engaging themselves in (working for) the benefit of all living beings." (5.25),

"The saintly persons who are completely free from lust and anger and have their consciousness steadily fixed (in Brahman), and who have realized the Self: (for them) there is Brahma nirvana very soon/ in whatever way." (5.26).

However, death is not always an easy passage, and those who are unable to keep their mind fixed on the Supreme Transcendental Reality will have to incarnate again, in the form that is closest to the level of consciousness they had during their life. This will be determined by the positive or negative attachments that we have cultivated in this lifetime, making them too strong to be left behind peacefully.

The Bhagavata Purana (canto 5, chapter 8) tells the instructive story of King Bharata, who renounced everything to remain alone in the forest and engage in austerity and meditation to prepare himself for death, but developed a strong attachment for a young deer that had befriended him. One night, during a terrible storm, the deer became scared and ran away from the ashrama, so Bharata left his spiritual meditation to go after him, but while engaged in this rescue mission, Bharata himself fell down a slope and died, thinking about his beloved pet animal. Naturally he took a new birth as a deer, but as his previous spiritual realizations were not lost, he became conscious of what had happened and maintained his spiritual consciousness while living in that body.

तस्मात्सर्वेषु कालेषु मामनुस्मर युध्य च । मय्यर्पितमनोबुद्धिर्ममैवैष्यस्यसंशयः ॥ ८-७ ॥

tasmātsarveṣu kāleṣu māmanusmara yudhya ca | mayyarpitamano buddhimāmevaiṣyasasyasamśayaḥ || 8-7 ||

tasmat: therefore; sarveṣu: in all; kaleṣu: moments of time; mam: me; anusmara: remembering constantly; yudhya: (you should) fight/ in the battle; ca: and/ at the same time; mayi: to me; arṣita: offering; manah: with the mind; buddhiḥ: with the intelligence; mam: me; eva: certainly; aiṣyaḥ: will come; asamśayaḥ: without doubt.

"Therefore at all times (you should) always remember me, even while fighting (this battle), dedicating to me your mind and your intelligence: in this way you will certainly come to me."

To always remember Krishna and to engage at the same time in a battle in an effective way, one has to be a mahatma, a great soul, whose consciousness has expanded at least to the sattvic level.

It is important to understand what Krishna means by "always remember me". He is not suggesting that we should do so exclusively by reciting his adventures, contemplating the meaning of his many spiritual names, or meditating about offering some elaborate worship to the Deity through the mind while we are engaged in our other duties, because that would distract us from our practical service. When a few chapters later in the Mahabharata, Krishna and Arjuna will be actually engaged in the battle, there will be no more talking about Krishna's transcendental glories and forms, and especially not even one word will be said about Krishna's adventures in Vrindavana and his loving relationships with the gopis and the other people there. The subject of Krishna's discussion will be how to defeat Drona and Karna, and how to get through the battle to secure the protection of the kingdom, so that Arjuna will be able to perform his duty in the best possible way. Of course, Arjuna will continue to appreciate Krishna's presence and friendship rasa, but his attention will be mainly focused on his task. The bhakti literature offers the example of a woman who is secretly in love: she makes a great effort to perform her regular duties with the utmost care and attention, so that nobody will notice that she is thinking about her lover. We could modify the example into the attitude of a loving wife and mother, who makes equally great efforts to cook and take care of the house and provisions because she wants to please her husband and children with excellent food, a beautiful clean living environment and an inspiring atmosphere. She does not need to picture her family members vividly in her mind all the time, but there is certainly a purpose to her activities that pervades her consciousness even when she is totally focused on some difficult recipe or some other practical work.

The expression arṣita manah buddhiḥ, "offering one's mind and intelligence", refers precisely to this act of good will, by which we engage willingly and lovingly in the service to the Supreme by performing our duties to the best of our ability. Then, when the mind and the intelligence have fully absorbed the higher meaning of our activities, the senses and the bodily organs engaged in our work will naturally follow with a good performance.

This powerful concentration in active devotional service has two aspects: sankalpa or motivation, and nyavasa as concentration. It is easy to see that the proper motivation and concentration always bring huge improvement to any kind of work, and certainly this devotion to a higher purpose in performing practical activities does not detract anything from the good result of the job - in fact, it is a powerful factor for success and excellence in one's work.

Controlling one's mind by channeling one's thinking, feeling and willing into the proper direction is the key to this superior level of awareness and effectiveness. Already in 2.41, Krishna had clearly stated that one should strive to concentrate the mind and focus the attention properly in order to achieve the goal, and in 6.35 he has recommended to train the mind with practice and detachment in order to improve its effectiveness.

अभ्यासयोगयुक्तेन चेतसा नान्यगामिना । परमं पुरुषं दिव्यं याति पार्थानुचिन्तयन् ॥ ८-८ ॥

abhyāsayogayuktena cetasā nānyagāminā । paramaṁ puruṣaṁ divyaṁ yāti pārthānucintayan ॥ 8-8 ॥

abhyasa: by practice; yoga: by engagement; yuktena: by remaining connected; cetasa: in the consciousness; na: not; anya: other; gamina: going; paramam: supreme; purusam: person; divyam: divine/ resplendent; yati: goes; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); anucintayan: always keeping in mind/ through the proper process of meditation.

"O son of Pritha (Arjuna), by engaging in the practice of yoga with a focused consciousness (that does not deviate from the object of meditation), one attains that supreme Being on whom s/he has been meditating."

The three main factors of success are mentioned as abhyasa (practice), tyaga (detachment from other pursuits) and jnana (knowledge). These are required for any enterprise to achieve any success, and the method of yoga and Self realization also include them as priorities. Practice (abhyasa) requires patience (dhairya), enthusiasm (utsaha) and determination (niscaya) to continue over a long period of time with the necessary strength and effectiveness. No success can be attained without sufficient effort over a period of time. Krishna highlights the importance of abhyasa in verses 6.35 (abhyasena vairagyena, by practice and detachment it will be possible to control the mind even if it is very restless) and 12.9 (abhyasa yogena mam icchantum, by practice and effort you will obtain your desired result). Good practice goes never lost even from one lifetime to the other: in verse 6.44 Krishna clearly says that thanks to one's previous practice it is easy to resume yoga in a next lifetime. The same concept is expressed in Bhagavata Purana, for example in verses 3.32.30 (yogabhyasena nityasah samahita atma nirsangah) and 11.20.18 (abhyasanena atmano yogi dharayed acalam manah).

A mind that is trained in the practice of concentration and consciousness should not be allowed to wander too much. We know that the mind is restless (6.34, 35), but every time that it runs into a wrong direction, we must bring it back, with patience (dhairya) and determination (niscaya), and knowledge (jnana) - by remaining conscious of the reason why we are engaging in the practice of controlling our own mind. This is indicated by the expression na anya gamine, "not going astray". Several other verses in Bhagavad gita use the exact same definition in connection to the practice of meditation: 8.12 (ananya cetah, "without thinking about others things"), 8.22 (bhaktya ananyaya, "by exclusive devotion"), 9.13 (ananya manaso, "by focusing the mind intensely"), 9.22 (ananyas cintayanto mam, "thinking about me only"), 9.30 (bhajate mam ananya bhak, "serving me exclusively"), 11.54 (bhaktya tv ananyaya, "with exclusive devotion"), 13.11 (mayi ca ananya yogena bhakti, "by a devotional relationship that is exclusively to me").

The concept of ista deva is central to the method of bhakti yoga. The devotee naturally feels a spontaneous attraction towards one particular form or Personality of Godhead, and s/he is encouraged to worship that specific form and meditate on it in a concentrated way, without dispersing the attention on too many forms: this is called ananya bhakti, "exclusive devotion", or also aikantika bhakti to such divine Personalities. Generally in the bhakti yoga method the guru gives one specific mantra that is directly connected to the ista deva of the devotee; the devotee should then practice that particular mantra with the greatest concentration and determination, taking the vow to repeat the mantra as japa practice for a minimum number of times daily or over a fixed period of time. There is no need to chant the japa mantras of many different Personalities of Godhead simultaneously, because that would tend to dilute the concentration: this exclusive concentration in meditation is called ananya bhakti, and gives good results in a very short time. However, we need to clarify a common misconception, because of which many people feel they are expected to disrespect and neglect the other Personalities of Godhead in order to show their exclusive devotion to the ista deva they have chosen. This is not a good idea, and should be corrected as quickly as possible to avoid serious damage to one's spiritual progress. Whether one has chosen a particular ista deva (for whatever reason) or is still trying to figure out which Personality of Godhead s/he should worship as ista deva, the best course of action consists in offering respect to all the Personalities of Godhead when the occasion arises - for example on the occasion of their festivals (such as Durga puja, Ganesh puja, etc) and to study carefully all the parts of the scriptures, including those passages that glorify a Personality of Godhead that is not our specific ista devata. For example, the Bhagavata Purana is dedicated mostly to the glories of Krishna, but there are many passages glorifying the various avatars of Vishnu, as well as Shiva, etc. At the very least, a devotee of Krishna should carefully and respectfully read also those passages and sincerely offer homage and worship. This thread of thought leads us to another important word in this verse: anucintayan, where anu means "according to the genuine method", "by following the proper instructions". Inventing new methods of meditation and worship is always a very risky business, because we cannot be sure of the results of such practice. It is much better to abide by the principles established by the great realized souls and by the genuine scriptures, that must be studied very attentively and sincerely before we attempt to present some new perspective on spiritual life.

In the famous Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, compiled by Rupa Gosvami, we find this illuminating verse: sruti smriti puranadi pancaratra vidhim vina aikantiki harer bhaktir utpatayaiva kalpate (1.2.101), "So-called exclusive bhakti to Hari (Vishnu/ Krishna) that is not in accordance to the sruti and the smriti, including the Puranas and all the other Vedic scriptures, and does not respect the rules of the Pancaratra, is nothing more than a fantasy creating unnecessary problems to society".

कविं पुराणमनुशासितारं अणोरणीयंसमनुस्मरेद्यः ।

kaviṁ purāṇamanuśāsītārāṁ aṇorāṇīyaṁsamanuśmaredyaḥ ।

सर्वस्य धातारमचिन्त्यरूपं आदित्यवर्णं तमसः परस्तात् ॥ ८-९ ॥ sarvasya dhātāramacintyarūpaṁ ādityavarṇaṁ tamasaḥ parastāt ॥ 8-9 ॥

kavim: the poet/ the scholar; puranam: ancient; anusasitaram: he who controls everything; anoh: than the atom; aniyamsam: smaller; anusmaret: one should remember/ meditate on; yah: s/he (the devotee); sarvasya: of all; dhataram: the one who sustains; acintya: inconceivable; rupam: form; aditya: the sun; varnam: the color; tamasah: the darkness; parastat: that transcends/ overcomes.

"One should remember (the Lord) as the omniscient, the primeval, who controls everything, so small that is contained inside the atom. He maintains everyone/ everything, and his form is inconceivable, as bright as the sun, transcendental to darkness (of ignorance)."

The word kavi means "all-knowing", or "very expert", and has passed into ordinary use to describe a poet or an Ayurvedic doctor, indicating that such positions should be occupied only by extremely knowledgeable persons. Of course the sum total of all consciousness must be the repository of all scholarly knowledge and be omniscient by definition, so the Supreme Personality of Godhead includes all the consciousness of Brahman and Paramatma and all beings.

Meditation on the Personality of Godhead should always be respectful and loving, aware of his supreme position. This means that one should not meditate on those fake and so-called artistic images of Krishna and other divine Personalities that show imaginative negative qualities or limitations or defects - such as eyeglasses for a weak eyesight, or similar nonsense. Even depictions of actual lila episodes where the Lord shows perplexity or sorrow or similar difficult situations - for example in his early childhood - should be considered only within the context of the consciousness of the unlimited glories of Bhagavan, and this means that the discussion of such episode or the contemplation of the connected images should be done only among very advanced devotees, who will not be confused by the apparent limitations shown by the Lord, and therefore will not be led to offensive ideas or behaviors.

The word purana means "ancient", "primeval", and reminds us that the Supreme Personality of Godhead is not a mere historical personality, a human being that started to exist at a particular time in a particular place, and is limited by those circumstances. The consciousness and knowledge of the Supreme Lord extend back into the beginning of time and beyond it, into the eternal unlimited non-manifested transcendental existence. The word anusasitaram is also very important, because it expresses the unlimited power of the supreme conscious intelligence that controls and sustains (dhataram) everything in the universe. Bhagavan is never poor or suffering, or lacking in anything. The supreme consciousness has a precise plan, and directs the entire play with great intelligence and artistry, as the best kavi (poet) would do.

The inconceivable form of the Lord is so subtle (aniya) that it even penetrates the atoms and at the same time sustains the entire cosmic manifestation, and pervades the heart of the soul of a microscopic unicellular organism and controls the immense body of a whale or elephant. The Lord is certainly not an ordinary cowherd boy who works at keeping the cows for his father or plays with the village girls: when Krishna manifests these activities, we should never take them cheaply, but we should always keep in mind these glories of Krishna described in the three central chapters of Bhagavad gita, universally considered the expression of the purest bhakti.

The word dhata means "maintainer", just like dhara means "holder" and dharma means "that by which (the world) is supported". Another connected word is vidhata, referring to the concept of God as destiny/ providence.

The poetic expression aditya varnam tamasah parastat offers a wonderful example for the existence of God: the sun is always gloriously existing beyond the darkness of the night, and similarly ignorance is nothing but absence of knowledge. Actually darkness and ignorance do not have an existence of their own - they are just due to our lack of proper perception. Aditya varna is literally "the color of the sun", and has nothing to do with ordinary limited perception and the darkness of the night, when the sun remains non-visible. Darkness (tamasah) is nothing but the inability to see the sun, that continues to exist in the sky independently from the movements of the earth and the relative position of the observers on the earth, who see the sun setting and disappearing into the night. Even the clouds that sometimes appear to cover the sun owe their very existence to the radiance of the sun, that evaporates water from the earth. Similarly, this world is created and functions on the power of Brahman, and although temporary in nature, affords the embodied beings the enlivening experience of spiritual evolution, that can be compared to the blessing of rain and the nourishment created by rains in the form of food grains.

The word varna means "color" and applies to the transcendental radiance of the Lord. Some confused people, who are still victims of the damages of the Aryan race theory, remain unable to explain why great Aryas such as Krishna and Arjuna are described in Mahabharata as black in complexion, because they would like to think that the best specimen of the Aryan race are blond, white complexioned and with blue eyes like the German nazis said. So they imaginatively state that Krishna's and Vishnu's black complexion, described in many scriptures besides Mahabharata, "symbolizes the non-manifested". Too bad that everybody on the battlefield was perfectly able to see Krishna in his black-complexioned body. Others - usually Indians - "solve the problem" by painting Krishna and Arjuna, and Vishnu, too, with a white complexion and distribute such images as genuine for commercial and devotional purposes.

The fact is that such people have a materialistic mind, focused on material bodily identification, and as long as they remain attached to such ignorance, they will never be able to understand the wonderful and radiant form of the Lord, that is black in complexion but resplendent of light like the sun. The example of the sun is also meant to remind us that the mere presence of the Lord is source of immense purification. There is another extremely famous verse from Garuda purana, regularly used in all the daily rituals of purification and sacrifice, that re-cites: om apavitrah pavitro va sarvanasthan gato 'pi va yah smaret pundarikaksam sa bahyabhyantarab sucib, "Anyone who remembers the lotus-eyed Lord (Vishnu) is immediately and completely purified, both internally and externally, irrespectively of the conditions he has gone through."

प्रयाणकाले मनसाऽचलेन भक्त्या युक्तो योगबलेन चैव ।

prayāṇakāle manasā'calena bhaktyā yukto yogabalena caiva ।

भ्रुवोर्मध्ये प्राणमावेश्य सम्यक् स तं परं पुरुषमुपैति दिव्यम् ॥ ८-१० ॥

bhruvormadhye prāṇamāveśya samyak sa taṁ paraṁ puruṣamupaiti divyam ॥ 8-10 ॥

prayana: of the end/ dissolution (of the body); kale: at the time of; manasa: with the mind; acalena: that is not distracted by moving in different directions; bhaktiya: with devotion; yuktab: united/ connected; yoga-balena: by the intense power of union/ yoga; ca: and; iva: certainly; bhruvoh: of the eyebrows; madhye: in the middle; pranam: the prana; avesya: keeping; samyak: fully/ completely controlled; sah: s/he; taṁ: that; param: supreme; puruṣam: person; upaiti: attains; divyam: divine.

"One who, at the time of death, (remembers the Lord) without any distraction of the mind, with devotion and powerfully connected through yoga, and perfectly keeping the prana between one's eyebrows, attains that divine/radiant supreme Person."

It is interesting to note that the words deva, divya, etc, derive from the root div, that means "resplendent", and also gave origin to the word diva, "day", as the time when there is sunlight, and dyaubh, "space", or "sky", from where the light comes. From this linguistic family we have the English words divinity, deity, divine, divination, day, the Latin word deus and divinus, and probably also the Greek word Zeus. The attribute divya, "divine" is clearly referred here to the taṁ param puruṣam, "that supreme Person", indicating the Supreme Personality of Godhead. Krishna was previously talking of the Supreme Lord as himself, and now he is making a subtle distinction, to highlight the need to maintain the meditation on the awareness of the immense power and majesty (aisvarya) of the Lord, and prevent all possibility of confusion with ordinary personalities in this world.

Those who do not like the aisvarya aspect of the Lord and prefer to meditate on his madhurya aspect, as in the most intimate rasas where Krishna is seen as a peer or even a subordinate to the devotee, should be extremely careful to avoid the disastrous danger of prakṛita sabajyism - that is the tendency to see Krishna cheaply and simply imitate rasas instead of actually developing a solid spiritual consciousness. Such prakṛita sabajyas can be recognized because they are lusty - not only and not necessarily about pursuing the pleasures of the flesh, but especially for recognition, followers, honors, fame, name, power, control of resources and people, or even just for the pleasure they derive from their contemplation of what they see as Krishna's activities in the most intimate rasas with his greatest devotees.

Because these people have been confused by the superficial external labeling of "spiritual" to anything that supports or concerns their political allegiance to some materialistic religious organization, they fall into the trap of believing that the thrill and pleasure they feel while reading and discussing such intimate activities is "spiritual" or "transcendental". They mistake the meaning of the power of the hladini shakti ("pleasure potency") as intended to give pleasure to the "devotee" rather than to Krishna, so they are unwittingly taking the position of the asuras, who are envious of God and constantly try to take his place as the enjoyer. Such delusion is deeply rooted in the ignorant identification with the gross material body, so it's very easy to recognize prakṛita sabajyas: that is anyone "relishes the ecstasy of Krishna's pastimes" but still has a material vision of bodily identification (regarding him/herself and/or others) and remains attached to labels, affiliations and allegiances to anything else that is not transcendental consciousness - in other words, the ahankara and mamatva that Krishna ordered us to drop already at the very beginning of his instructions.

The shastras and the genuine acharyas recommend that one should carefully avoid associating with prakṛita sabajyas and hearing their discussions about Krishna, because it is easy to remain contaminated by their materialistic mentality, especially for neophytes who have not had sufficient access to the preliminary teachings of the shastra. It is not by mistake or chance that Krishna's most intimate activities have been "sealed" within the heart of the Puranas, surrounded by the effective protection of many chapters of solid spiritual instructions about sadhana and the science of the glories of God as they are explained in Bhagavad gita. Therefore responsible devotees are always very careful about talking about intimate activities and subjects in the presence of non-qualified persons. Even the teachings of the Gita, that are extremely safe in this regard, should not be presented to the wrong people (18.67) with the wrong motivations. They should always be accompanied by sufficient explanations so that uninterested or offensive people will automatically be kept at a distance.

We should also make an effort not to neglect the reference to entering (avesya) into the prana and controlling the vital airs by concentrating them between the eyebrows, in the ajna chakra, because it offers another rail of protection against the fall into the abyss of prakṛita sabajyism. It is true that the practice of astanga yoga as a mere physical and mental exercise, without a real connection to its original purpose - Self realization - is just insufficient and may even become an obstacle on the true path of perfection, but as with everything, we have the responsibility to make it work properly and utilize it in the way it was always meant to. It is not that the prana stops flowing and acting in the body of a pure bhakta, or that his/her mind and attention become independent from the prana. The science of yoga is held in the greatest esteem by Krishna, who keeps using the terms yoga and yogi to refer to the bona fide devotee and spiritualist. It is true that the supreme bhakti is free from attachment to all personal pursuits of scholarship and social position (anyabhilasita sunyam jnana-karmady anavritam anukulyena krishnannusilanam bhaktir uttama, from Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, 1.1.11), but in our enthusiasm to embrace "the most exclusive and supreme method" we should not choose ignorance, complacency and arrogance as better substitutes of the knowledge, austerity and detachment offered by jnana, karma and yoga, that still remain very valuable instruments in devotional service.

यदक्षरं वेदविदो वदन्ति विशन्ति यद्यतयो वीतरागाः ।

yadākṣaram vedavidō vadanti viśanti yadyatayo vītarāgāḥ ।

यदिच्छन्तो ब्रह्मचर्यं चरन्ति तत्ते पदं संग्रहेण प्रवक्ष्ये ॥ ८-११ ॥

yadicchanto brahmacharyam caranti tatte padam saṅgrahaṇa pravakṣye ॥ 8-11 ॥

yad: that; aksaram: imperishable (Brahman/ the syllable Om/ Transcendence/ the spiritual world); veda-vidah: those who know the Vedas; vadanti: they explain; visanti: enter; yad: that; yatayah: the sannyasis/ the yogis/ those who make effort on the spiritual path; vita-ragah: having abandoned all attachments and identifications; yad: that; icchantah: they desire; brahmacharyam: the behavior of Brahman; caranti: move around; tat: that; te: them; padam: position/ destination/ stand; sangrahena: in summary; pravakṣye: I will tell.

"(Now) I will tell you in summary about that imperishable (goal/ destination) described by those who know the Veda. (That destination) is entered by the great sages/ sannyasis who have become fully detached (from material illusion), and who practice brahmacharya with the purpose of attaining that destination."

As we have already seen previously, the word aksaram means "imperishable" and is applied to the Brahman or eternal transcendental principle of universal consciousness, expressed in this material manifestation with the primeval sound AUM or OM, called the pranava omkara. Why the pranava omkara ("the syllable om that is the energy of life") is the Brahman? Because it constitutes the subtle sound vibration of all energy. Start a powerful electrical machinery or go near a heavy duty high tension electrical line wire, and hear the mechanical equivalent of the pranava omkara. The life in our body, too, has a bio-electrical nature, and all living organisms create a bio-magnetic field that is measurable through various devices, from the electro-encephalogram machine to the Kirlian camera, and so on. All these mechanical devices record the presence of life in a body merely through the registration of its bio-magnetic field and currents, so we can safely say that even mainstream conventional science recognizes the connection between life and electricity. Besides the gross and goofy machines used by mainstream contemporary technology, there are natural devices in-built in our own body that are capable of detecting, controlling, manipulating and strengthening these bio-electrical/magnetic field and currents. The nature of such physical devices is too subtle to be observed by the contemporary machineries, but it is explained clearly and precisely in the yoga literature, and it should be considered as the new frontier of science, where Vedic knowledge can help western mainstream academia to take a giant step into a deeper awareness of the universe.

Conventional scientists are baffled when examining the functions of the human brain, because they find that about 75% of the brain mass does not have any visible function. Through their lab experiments (some of which have been truly horrible and asuric) they have labeled about 15% of the areas of the brain in ordinary people, engaging them in different bodily and mental activities, but nobody among their subjects seemed to be able to use the rest of the cerebral mass. Of course such considerable amount of "unknown brain territory" is not without a purpose, and it seems to fit with the huge uncharted regions of so-called "paranormal activities", that conventional science tends to ridicule and dismiss blindly because it cannot explain them. What if these two huge ignorance pools within the academic scientism territory were one and the same? Vedic literature clearly says so, and it would be wise for contemporary academics to show some true scientific spirit and investigate the matter without being tied up and blinded by biased attitudes and prejudice and by the fear of having to rebuild a different and more realistic picture of the universe than the one they have come to cherish. Already physicists have broken several walls of academic prejudice, at least in their own small circles, and in the process they have come to develop a great respect for Vedic knowledge regarding the structure of the universe. What about actually understanding the structure of the spirit and life itself? Is this science less important?

Those who know the Vedas (veda-vidah) directly enter (visanti) this subtle dimension of Brahman to experience it, and anyone else can do the same by following the proper process (anucintayan, 8.8, "according to the genuine method", "by following the proper instructions"). This is the greatest obstacle in the pursuance of the Vedic knowledge in mainstream conventional academia (of the "western" type): the students and the teachers do not give any importance to the basic requirement of "following the genuine method" as it is clearly, precisely and consistently presented in the Vedic texts themselves. It is not possible to understand the subtle science of Brahman without modifying one's personal attitude, life style and choices, because the wrong attitudes and habits will obscure the subtle perception that the Brahman scientist needs to utilize.

This body of requirements for the Brahman scientist is called brahmacharya, "the behavior of Brahman". Influenced by the abrahamic ideologies, many people consider brahmacharya to be the exact equivalent of "chastity" or "sexual abstinence" vows observed by some priests or monks/ nuns, but that would be misleading. Like the other yama and niyama requirements in the study and verification of the transcendental science, brahmacharya is much more than the superficial and mechanical control of the sense organs, that could even cause serious damage when it is done in the wrong way, without the proper knowledge and techniques. What people call sexual energy is the fundamental energy/ power that sustains the body, and it is "sexual" only when it expresses itself through the lowest chakras in the body, i.e. the muladhara and svadhisthana, specifically positioned around the genital area. When this same energy, technically called kundalini in the yoga texts, is raised, channeled and sublimated through the proper yoga techniques, it expresses itself in very different forms: in the third chakra (from the bottom) called manipura. This power then emanates from the solar plexus, at the mouth of the stomach, and is expressed as will power, determination, courage in battle, enterprising spirit, control over one's mind and body and environment, and so on. In the fourth chakra, called anahata, located in the heart region, it is expressed as unconditional love, compassion, self-sacrifice, empathy, sensitivity etc. In the fifth chakra, called visuddha and located in the throat, the same energy becomes manifest as the power of sound, another immense and largely uncharted territory that conventional science should explore, especially in connection with bio-electricity and bio-magnetism, to understand how the ancient Vedic mantras applied by qualified persons were able to bring about such dramatic effects on the mental and material environment. In the sixth chakra, called ajna and located in the forehead, in the area between the two eyebrows, it is expressed as cognition, understanding, vision, illumination, intuition and so on. In the seventh chakra, called sahasrara and located at the top of the head or the crown, it produces subtle spiritual manifestations of power that are observed as tejas (radiance) as depicted in the aura of divine personalities.

The word brahmacharya literally means "behaving as Brahman" and points to the need of dropping all identifications and attachments with the gross material body. Obviously, this has a dramatic effect also on one's sexual behavior, because an individual that has overcome the gross material bodily identification leaves the platform where s/he sees bodies and evaluates them in terms of the sexual pleasure they could provide, and rises to the platform where s/he sees persons and evaluates them in terms of their level of consciousness, behavior, aspirations and ultimately transcendental nature. That's a big change of perspective, and without effecting it, nobody will be able to enter Brahman (aksaram visanti), which is the purpose of Vedic knowledge. Of course this method requires a serious effort (yatahay, yatanti, etc) and the renunciation to attachments and identifications (vita ragah), but it works in such a way that the armchair philosophers and academic professors will never be able to even imagine.

सर्वद्वाराणि संयम्य मनो हृदि निरुध्य च । मूढन्याधायात्मनः प्राणमास्थितो योगधारणाम् ॥ ८-१२ ॥

sarvadvārāṇi saṁyamya mano hṛdi nirudhya ca । mūḍhnyādhāyātmanah prāṇamāsthito yogadhāraṇām ॥ 8-12 ॥

sarva: all; dvarani: the doors; saṁyamya: controlling; manah: the mind; hṛdi: in the heart; nirudhya: fixing; ca: and; mūḍhni: in the head; adhaya: carrying; atmanah: the Atman; pranam: the prana; asthitah: firmly established; yoga-dharanam: the dharana of yoga.

"Controlling all the doors (of the body), keeping the mind within the heart and fixing the prana (carrying) the self to the top of the head, one is situated in the yoga meditation."

In this verse, Krishna continues to give instructions on how to prepare oneself for the time of death, so that the mind will be properly controlled and able to focus on the Transcendental Reality. The expression sarva dvāraṇi saṁyamya indicates the need to control the nine gates of the body, that correspond to the sense organs - two ears, two eyes, two nostrils, one mouth, one genital opening and one anus. Through these "doors of perception", the mind gathers impressions and feelings, and creates the seeds for action, therefore it is imperative to control them through the appropriate practice of yoga. The hatha or kriya yoga teaches several techniques to build such power of control, including the bandhas or "blockages" that are meant to show the difference of sensations between an opened "door" and a closed one. However, controlling something means we are able to stop the function or apply the function precisely in the way we intend to. It does not necessarily mean keeping the function blocked or eliminating the function. In bhakti yoga, the method of controlling the senses is performed by the deliberate choice of following the yama and niyama rules and regulations as per instructions of the guru, and by the active engagement in devotional service through its 64 specific practices, from guru pada asraya (accepting a teacher and guide), diksha (initiation), guru seva (service to the guru), sat dharma siksa (learning about dharma and transcendence), priccha (asking questions), sadhu sanga (keeping company of the sadhus), bhoga tyaga (accepting what is favorable to the process and rejecting what is unfavorable), tirtha vasa (residing in a holy place), yavat nirvaha pratigraha (accepting and consuming only what is basically required), upavasa (fasting and observing vows), dhatri asvattha go vipra vaisnava puja (offering respect to the Mother or amalaki and banyan trees, the cows, the brahmanas and the vaisnavas), aparadha adi dure visarjana (carefully avoiding to commit any offense), asat sanga tyaga (abandoning the company of bad people), bahu sisya griha grantha kala-abhyasa nyakhyana visarjana (avoiding to accept many students, construct large and expensive temples or ashramas, get tied by academic scholarship and/ or study selectively only what seems convenient), samatva (being balanced in joys and sorrows, or gains and loss, and being straightforward in one's dealings), soka vasa (controlling the tendency to worry and complain), deva sastra ninda visarjana (abstaining from disrespect towards other Personalities of Godhead and genuine shastras), visnu vaisnava ninda visarjana (abstaining from disrespect towards Vishnu and genuine devotees of Vishnu), gramya katha visarjana (avoiding superficial discussions or mundane stories), ahimsa (abstaining from causing anxiety or pain to any living entity, directly or indirectly), sravana (listening to discussions about God), kirtana (discussing about God), smarana (remembering God), arvana (engaging in worshiping God), vandana (offering one's homage to God), pada sevana (following God's instructions), dasya (considering oneself God's servant), sakhya (considering God as one's friend), atma nivedana (dedicating oneself completely to God), agre nrtya (dancing for the Deity), gita (singing), vijnapti (keeping one's mind open to change and new understanding), dandavat nati (offering prostrations), abhyutthana (standing up as a sign of respect), anuvraja (following a sacred procession), tirtha gati (going to the places of pilgrimage), parikrama (walking around a sacred object in sign of respect), stava patha (reciting famous prayers composed by self-realized souls), japa (chanting a mantra softly or mentally), sankirtana (chanting or singing loudly in the company of others), dhupa malya gandhadi mahaprasada bhojana (consuming or enjoying the incense, garlands, perfumes etc and food that have been first offered to God), aratika mahotsava darsana (attending the arati ritual ceremonies and the religious festivals), sri-murti darsana (seeing the Deity), nija priya dana (offering God things that we like), dhyana (meditating or contemplating), tadiya sevana (serving those persons or things that are connected to God, such as the tulasi plant and its leaves, the devotees, Mathura-Vrindavana and the Bhagavata Purana), krsna arthe akhila cesta (trying to do everything as Krishna wants), tat kṛpa avalokana (seeking his mercy), janma dina adi mahotsava (observing the specific celebrations connected to the Lord), saranagati (complete surrender, that consists in praying for spontaneous attraction, offering glorification and desiring to improve in devotional service), kartika adi vrata (observing the religious vows such as Kartika vrata), vaisnava laksana (wearing the symbols of vaisnavas, ie. tilaka and tulasi kanthi mala) and so on.

The expression mano bhr̥di nirudhya, "keeping the mind within the heart", means that one should concentrate on the Self. In the heart both the individual soul and the supreme soul reside, and the proper seat of the mind is the heart as well. The expression adbhaya atmanah pranam, "the prana carrying the self" refers to the prana kosha, the covering/ wrapping of the self that consists of vital energy. Yoga teaches that the individual self is covered by five layers of body - two of which are precisely the mind and the prana. These five koshas are:

1. annamaya (gross physical body made of anna, "food"),
2. pranamaya (etheric or energetic body made of life "airs"),
3. manomaya (astral or subtle body made of mind),
4. jnanamaya (identification or rationalization, made of cognitive substance or intelligence), and
5. anandamaya (spiritual magnetic field made of happiness, that can be distorted by the ahankara).

The expression yoga dharana specifically refers to the anga of yoga consisting in keeping one's attention powerfully focused on the object of one's meditation. After attaining this ability, dharana is further developed into dhyana or dynamic meditation, and finally in samadhi, constant consciousness of the object of meditation.

ओमित्येकाक्षरं ब्रह्म व्याहरन्मामनुस्मरन् । यः प्रयाति त्यजन्देहं स याति परमां गतिम् ॥ ८-१३ ॥

omityekākṣaram brahma vyāharanmāmanusmaran | yaḥ prayāti tyajandehaṁ sa yāti paramāṁ gatim || 8-13 ||

omr. om; iti. like this eka. one; akṣaram. syllable/ imperishable; brahma. Brahman; vyaharan. vibrating; mam. me; anusmaran. remembering; yab. s/he; prayati. leaves/ departs; tyajam. leaving; deham. the body; sab. s/he; yati. attains; paramam. the supreme; gatim. destination.

"Vibrating the Om, this one transcendental syllable/ the syllable form of the One Brahman, and remembering me, s/he who departs leaving the body attains the supreme destination."

The expression om brahma akṣaram indicates that the transcendental primordial vibration "AUM" is Brahman itself, as we have seen in the previous verses and commentaries. Among the various quotes, the Upanishads clearly mention this meditation: "O Satyakama, this Brahman is Om... one who meditates on the parama puruṣa as the syllable Om is lifted to the world of Brahman" (Prasna Upanishad, 5.1-2, 5), "I will tell you of that goal described by all Vedas, the purpose of all austerities and brahmacharya: it is Om" (Katha Upanishad, 1.2.14-15). Bhagavata Purana also confirms it: abhyasena manasa suddham trivrid brahma akṣaram param, "One should practice meditation on the pure and supreme syllable composed by three letters" (2.1.17).

The supreme destination is the liberated level of consciousness we call Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan: these three are aspects of the same tattva, as confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (1.211): vadanti tat tattva-vidas tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti bhagavan iti saḍyate, "Those who know Reality explain that it is One undivided Consciousness/ Knowledge, called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan." Attaining this level of consciousness can happen suddenly, in a strike of realization or illumination, defined as sadyo mukti, perfect instant liberation or prakasa. It can also happen through a gradual program for liberation called kerama mukti, or sadhana - in bhakti yoga this is called sadhana bhakti or vaidhi bhakti.

The word vyaharan, "vibrating", does not necessarily imply a verbalization, as the pranava omkara is a subtle vibration that also exists at the level of the mind and the causal body. Some people believe that chanting the pranava omkara is an "impersonalist practice" that should be discarded, in favor of the exclusive chanting of the Hare Krishna mantra - hare kṛṣṇa, hare kṛṣṇa, kṛṣṇa kṛṣṇa, hare hare, hare rama, hare rama, rama rama, hare hare. However, we do not find any such instruction in Bhagavad gita, Bhagavata Purana or in the instructions of the acharyas, therefore we must warn the uninformed people against such mental speculations.

Krishna in Bhagavad gita very clearly gives the instruction about the immense value of the omkara consciousness, and there is no reason why a devotee of Krishna should disregard or even worse, ridicule or oppose such direct order of Krishna. Of course, this does not mean that one should or could not chant the Hare Krishna mantra, too. Some argue that the pranava omkara is already contained in the Hare Krishna mantra, and therefore it does not need to be chanted separately: in this case, too, there is also no need to disrespect, ridicule or oppose the separate chanting of the pranava omkara in those who practice it, or the genuine scriptures that present it. Such offensive behavior has no basis in Vedic tradition and is due to the abrahamic mentality that strives to destroy and insult whatever is perceived as "different" from whatever practice one is following.

The chanting of the pranava omkara and any other genuine mantra should be done as attentively as possible, and with an effort to understand its import and meaning - it should not be a mechanical repetition, although even a mechanical repetition will eventually lead to a breakthrough in penetrating its meaning (Patanjali's Yoga sutras, 1.27, 28, 29). As it is said, "no quantity, no quality"... The japa practice is helped by the conscious counting of the repetitions of the mantras to fulfill a vrata, or vow: this is very effective to better control the mind and support one's determination and habit-forming. The specific mantra and the number of repetitions, and the window of time to perform them, are all variables that should be discussed from time to time with one's guru according to the individual situation and possibilities of the sadhaka. The guru is personally responsible for the progress of his/her disciple, and has the duty to adjust the sadhana to make it easy enough to maintain it happily for a long time (9.2 susukham kartum anyayam), and difficult enough to stimulate a healthy effort for improvement.

This obviously mean that there can be no "one size fits all" sadhana method, especially in regard to the mantra and the number of repetitions during a specific period of time; believing and teaching that the same precise sadhana is equally good for everyone, and excluding the personal responsibility of the guru by replacing it with an impersonal loyalty and affiliation to an organization, in which the sadhaka only has duties and no rights, is a very dangerous situation, to be accepted only in emergencies, where there is no other option, and in any case there will be negative consequences in the course of time.

Religious organizations quickly become impersonal and materialistic, more interested in their own survival, aggrandizement, propagation and power than in the original purpose for which they were started. Therefore the bhakti literature clearly recommends that one should not accept too many disciples or build great temples.

अनन्यचेताः सततं यो मां स्मरति नित्यशः । तस्याहं सुलभः पार्थ नित्ययुक्तस्य योगिनः ॥ ८-१४ ॥

ananyacetāḥ satatam yo mām smarati nityaśah | tasyāham sulabhaḥ pārtha nityayuktasya yogināḥ || 8-14 ||

ananya: nothing else; cetaḥ: thinking of; satatam: always/ constantly; yah: s/he; mam: me; smarati: remembers; nityaśah: always/ regularly/ consistently; tasya: of him/ her; aham: I; su-labhaḥ: easy to attain; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); nitya: always; yuktasya: who is engaged; yogināḥ: a devotee.

"O son of Pritha (Arjuna), for one who always constantly/ regularly remembers me without thinking of anything else, I am very easy to reach, because s/he is a yogi constantly connected (with me)."

The synonyms satatam, nityaśah, nitya all indicate "always", "regularly", "consistently", and since the concept is repeated for three times in the same verse, we understand that it is extremely important - a tri satya, "three times true". Other synonyms are sanatana, śasvata, dhrūva, and sadatana. Krishna has been repeating many times, also in previous verses and in subsequent verses, that spiritual realization, the attainment of the supreme abode and transcendental liberation, requires a lot of work. The spiritual path is never a hobby, to be enjoyed in leisure time as a trendy activity to impress one's circle of friends or to de-stress after a busy week fighting for one's career and indulging in excesses of sense gratification. It is not a part-time job that we can pick up and drop and keep on the back burner while we are giving priority to other concerns, identifications and attachments. Of course we do not need to give up our family, job and social duties, but we must direct our entire life purpose towards the development of a transcendental consciousness in all circumstances - including our family relationships, our professional choices, and life style.

In all our activities, in all our concerns, in all our choices, we must always remember the Transcendental Reality, that gives a real meaning to our life. It is not so difficult: yat karosi yad asnasi yaj juhosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kuruṣva mad-arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give as gift, whatever difficulty you face voluntarily, you should perform these (actions) as an offering to me" (9.27) And also, tesam satata-yuktanam bhajatam priti-purvakam, dadami buddhi-yogam tam yena mam upayanti te, "To those who are always connected to me by serving me with love and devotion, I give the buddhi yoga, the engagement in intelligence, by which they will come to me." (10.10).

Another beautiful description of this union with the Supreme is found in Adi Shankara's Soundarya Lahari, specifically in this verse: japo jalpah, silpam sakalam api mudra vicarana, gati pradaksinya kramanam, asanady abuti vidhib, pranamah samvesah sukham akhilam atmarpana drsa, saparyaparyayas tava bhavatu yan me vilasitam, "Let every word of mine be a prayer to you, every movement of my hands be a ritual gesture to you, every step I take be a mark of respect for your image, every morsel of food I eat be a ritual sacrifice to you, every time I lay down be a prostration at your feet, and every act I perform be an act of worship to you." (27)

There is no need of changing one's legitimate position in regards to family, professional occupation, society, and so on: we can simply perform our regular activities with a higher consciousness, a spirit of divine service, and remember what is the purpose of life. On the other hand, those who take sanmyasa artificially, dumping their responsibilities simply to live at the expenses of others, should not think that they are automatically on a transcendental position because they have "given up everything". That would be simply cheating themselves and the public in general. It is much better to continue to work sincerely to honor one's responsibilities, but with a niskama ("selfless") attitude.

Some may try to divide the path of Bhagavad gita in karma misra bhakti, yoga misra bhakti, jnana misra bhakti and kevala bhakti as if they were separate and independent methods chosen by different people, but this idea can be misleading, especially when presented to candidates who are still affected by materialistic desires for position, fame, name and distinction. The fact is that karma and jnana are the necessary preliminary steps that everyone must go through in order to ultimately attain the kevala bhakti platform. Irresponsibility and ignorance are not compatible with pure devotional service, and if they are not eliminated, they will inevitably cause the downfall of anyone, even of those who may pose as great devotees of Krishna. Why should a great devotee disregard and disobey Krishna's direct instructions? Who can run, without bothering to practice simple walking? It would be foolish, for someone who cannot even walk, to say that he prefers to run, and he does not walk because that is "below his standards".

In these three central chapters about pure devotion, after saying that one should properly qualify through abhyasa (practice) in the preliminary steps of karma and jnana (verses 7.17 to 7.29), Krishna continues in verses 8.5 to 8.10 by speaking about the yogi's attitude towards birth and death, and about moksha, that is the position just before attaining perfection - a level that can be attained through proper karma and jnana. From verse 8.11 to 8.28, Krishna explains how the practice of yoga, the control of one's own mind, can take us to the supreme destination, called kevala bhakti, the attainment of perfection.

It is a natural and safe process, that is expected to begin after several lifetimes of relative selfishness (7.19) and is a rare attainment (7.3). The expression su-labha means "easy to attain", but also refers to a good aspiration and to a beneficial goal to be attained: apart from the basic dharma principles, we should only embrace the rules that are favorable to genuine progress, without trying to demonstrate our greatness to the public by the observance of rigid rules and regulations, strict austerities and vows. We should also avoid the tendency to impress others with the "prema bhava bhakti ecstasy" displays and the boasting about our sublime position in the hierarchy of rasas, because Krishna is easy to attain but not cheap.

मामुपेत्य पुनर्जन्म दुःखालयमशाश्वतम् । नाप्नुवन्ति महात्मानः संसिद्धिं परमां गताः ॥ ८-१५ ॥

māmupetya punarjanma duḥkhālayamaśāśvatam | nāpnuvanti mahātmānaḥ saṁsiddhiṁ paramāṁ gatāḥ || 8-15 |

mam: me; upetya: having attained; punah: again; janma: birth; duḥkhalayam: full of misery; asvatam: impermanent; na: not; apnuvanti: return; maha-atmanah: the great souls; samsiddhim: completely perfect; paramam: supreme; gatah: arrived.

"Having attained me, they do not (have to) take another birth, that is the cause of sufferings and impermanence. Such great souls have (already) reached the highest level of perfection."

After summarizing the various phases of the progress on the spiritual realization journey, Krishna declares that the supreme destination is a permanent position, where all aspirations are fulfilled, and there is no more reason to take another birth. The material world, and the material body in which we are born, are here called duḥkhalayam asvatam, an impermanent position, seat of all sufferings. This characteristic applies to all the planets of the universe and to all states of embodied life, from the position of Brahma (the creator of the universe) down to the lowest level of life, as all such bodies contain in themselves the seeds for rebirth in the cycle of samsara, as we will see in the next verse (a-brahma-bhuvanal lokah punar avaritino 'rjuna, 8.16).

The word asvatam is the opposite of "eternal", that we have seen repeated three times in the previous verse, and highlights the difference between the material and the spiritual level.

आब्रह्मभुवनालोकाः पुनरावर्तिनोऽर्जुन । मामुपेत्य तु कौन्तेय पुनर्जन्म न विद्यते ॥ ८-१६ ॥

ābrahmabhuvanālokaḥ punarāvartino'rjuna | māmupetya tu kaunteya punarjanma na vidyate || 8-16 ||

abrahma: Brahmaloka; bhuvanat: from the world; lokah: the planetary systems; punah: again; avartinah: those who return; arjuna: o Arjuna; mam: me; upetya: having attained; tu: but; kaunteya: o Arjuna (son of Kunti); punah: again; janma: birth; na: not; vidyate: experiences.

"O Arjuna, (all these) worlds, from the planet of Brahma (downwards) (are places from which) one returns, but for one who has attained me, o son of Kunti (Arjuna), there is no more rebirth."

The highest planetary system is called Brahmaloka, and is the abode of Brahma, the first created being in the universe.

Sometimes there is a confusion between brahma (with the long final a) and brahman, that is also sometimes written as brahma (without long final a); the former refers to the Personality of Godhead that manifests the variety of the universe in the secondary creation, and the latter refers to the unchangeable eternal and omnipresent Brahman, the transcendental reality of the spirit. The first creation consists in the emanation of all the brahmandas ("eggs of Brahman") from the body of Mahavishnu while he is lying on the Karanodaka (karana udaka, "the ocean of causes"), like small bubbles of air from the pores of his skin. At the end of each breathing cycle of Mahavishnu, each and every universe is re-absorbed into the sleeping body of the Purusha Avatara, and at the beginning of the next cycle of breathing there is another emanation of brahmandas. Within each of these innumerable brahmandas, that are radiant like the sun and are therefore called Hiranya ("golden"), Vishnu manifests in a direct emanation known as Garbhodakasayi (garbha udaka sayi, "lying on the ocean of the embryo") and from his navel a lake is formed, with an immense sprouting lotus flower.

Inside the lotus bud grows the garbha ("embryo") of Hiranya Vishnu, also called Hiranyagarbha or Brahma ("coming from Brahman"). This Brahma begins the secondary creation of the universe. Each of the innumerable universes emanated by Mahavishnu (or Karanodakasayi Vishnu) has its own Garbhodakasayi Vishnu and Brahma. In this stage, the various elements are manifested, then the planets, and the bodies of all living entities. All the species of all the living entities are created simultaneously, although some are manifested in a particular period of time and some disappear or appear again. The evolutionary theory expressed by Darwin does not contradict the simultaneous creation of all the species at the beginning of the cycle, because in fact the different species appear and disappear according to the particular environmental circumstances along history - it is indeed the "survival of the fittest".

Inside the brahmanda, the expanse of the universe is measured by the length of the stem of the lotus on which Brahma is born. Of course this is no ordinary lotus flower, just like the "umbilical lake" of Garbhodakasayi Vishnu has nothing to do with regular lakes - it is more like an immense amniotic bag made of subtle energy, the "higher waters" that are different from the ordinary waters we find in the earthly dimension. It is an ocean of space, filled with matter so subtle that it cannot even be considered gas yet, but nevertheless there is matter everywhere, and energy everywhere - a sort of subtle blueprint of the universal manifestation. Sometimes this stem is measured as 16 times the length of Brahma's arm, which gives the total expanse length of Brahma's body, from the lowest chakra to the highest chakra. Usually yoga practitioners are told there are 7 chakras (sahasrara, ajna, visuddha, anahata, manipura, svadhisthana, muladhara) along the human body, respectively at the top of the head, between the eyebrows, at the base of the throat, in the region of the heart, at the solar plexus, a little above the genitals and at the base of the spinal column. These are considered the 7 earthly planetary systems, where it is calculated that 400,000 human species normally live, plus 8 million other animal and vegetal species. However, there are also 7 chakras above the top of the head and 7 chakras below the base of the spinal column: their names are the same used to describe the various planetary systems of the universe. Above the head there are the chakras that constitute the worlds of the upadevas (including yakshas, rakshasas, pisachas, nagas, uragas, kinnaras or pakshis, kimpurushas, vanaras, suparnas, charanas, etc), the world of the gandharvas and apsaras, the world of the siddhas and vidyadharas, and the worlds called maharloka or pitri-loka (with Dhruvaloka etc), janaloka (where the sons of Brahma like the Kumaras live), tapaloka (inhabited by mystic beings called Vaibhrajās) and satyaloka (the top of the lotus where Brahma himself resides). Below the root chakra, atala is located around the hips, vitala in the thighs, sutala in the knees, talatala in the calves, rasatala in the ankles, mahatala in the feet, patala at the soles of the feet. Other minor chakras are in the palms of the hands, at the elbows, at the clavicles, at the shoulders and at the ears; these should correspond to minor worlds.

This description in its entirety is called tri-loka, or the three divisions of planetary systems mentioned in many scriptures: the 3 groups of 7 chakras each. Above Satyaloka we find the divine planets (viraja, kailasa and vaikuntha) that do not belong to the material universe and from which one does not return to the cycle of births and deaths, while from Satyaloka downwards we find the material planets, and the lower we go, the most dense and dark are the regions. The base of the lotus flower is the bottom of the universe, originated from the navel of Garbhodakasayi Vishnu, who in turn is lying on Garbhodaka ocean that fills half the brahmānda. This ocean, too, is certainly not made of the water as we know it on this planet.

Similarly, the bodies of the living entities who reside on the various planetary systems can be very different, although they are all composed by a combination of the material elements that are found all over the universe - ahankara (sense of identity), buddhi (intelligence), manas (mind), akasa (space), vayu (air, and also prana energy), agni (fire, and also light and heat), apah (water, and also all liquid substances) and bhumi (earth, and all all solid substances). Also, some living entities are so powerful that their mind can modify and re-arrange the configuration of material atoms and energy vibration frequencies, so it is very difficult to understand or describe what their bodies are really made of. Because of the tejas (radiance) of the atomic rearrangement of their form - if this description can give the idea of the actual facts - these powerful beings are called devas, that literally means "luminous", "radiant".

These devas who live on the highest planetary systems have a duration of life that is measured by the movements or orbits of their abodes, up to the very long duration of the life of Brahma, then at the end of the cycle all those who have developed a sufficiently evolved level of awareness are directly promoted to the transcendental existence.

सहस्रयुगपर्यन्तमहर्षद् ब्रह्मणो विदुः । रात्रिं युगसहस्रान्तां तेऽहोरात्रविदो जनाः ॥ ८-१७ ॥

sahasrayugaparyantamaharyad brahmano viduh | ratrim yugasahasrantam te'horatratio janah || 8-17 ||

sahasra-yuga one thousand yugas; pari-antam: after the full completion; abab: one day; yat: of Brahma (the creator of this universe); brahmanab: of Brahma; vidub: they know; ratrim: the night; yuga-sahasra-antam: at the end of 1000 yugas; te: they; abab-ratratio: one full cycle composed by day and night; vidub: those who know; janab: the people.

"Those who have knowledge about the cycle of day and night know that one day of Brahma comprises 1,000 (cycles of) yugas, and the night also comprises 1,000 (cycles of) yugas."

According to the Surya siddhanta the calculation of the four ages is based on the "cycles of the Gods": Satya/ Krita yuga 4,800 years, Treta 3,600 years, Dvapara 2,400 years, Kali 1,200 years, for a total of 12,000 years. The "cycle" mentioned in this verse as a "year of the devas" composed by 365 earth years, calculating that one of our years is just one day for the devas, and therefore it gives the duration of the yugas respectively in Satya 1,728,000 years (or 80 cycles of 21,600 years), Treta 1,296,000 years (60 cycles of 21,600 years), Dvapara 864,000 years (40 cycles of 21,600 years), Kali 432,000 years (20 cycles of 21,600 years). If, on the other hand, we consider a "cycle of the gods" as the passage of the Sun within the Great Zodiac (12 x 2,160), we find that the Kali yuga would be lasting 25,920 years, which is too similar to the astronomical cycle of the alignment of the solar system with the center of the galaxy.

One day of Brahma corresponds to 2000 cycles of the Great Zodiac, each 21,600 earth years, for a total of 4 billion 320 million years - a time window that, according to geologists, is very likely the actual age of Earth and the solar system. Why 2000 and not 1000? Because Brahma's day includes the same duration of day and night, as Gita clearly states. During Brahma's night (half of that time) the solar system remains unsuitable for the activities of life. The number 4,320 is also found in other important astronomical references, as for example the cycle of Jupiter (that represented Amon Ra the Father God for the Egyptians, Zeus the King of Gods for the Greek, and Brihaspati the Guru of the Gods for the Indians) that goes around the entire zodiac in 12 years: multiplied into the 360 degrees of the circle, we get 4,320.

As we know, the ancient peoples gave great symbolic importance to mathematics, and not always to the decimal system. Sumerians, for example, had a numeric system based on 60: still today there is some trace of this system in the calculation of time - where one hour is 60 minutes and one minute is 60 seconds - and in the "dozen" measurement. According to Plato, 6 is considered the "perfect number" because it is the sum of its divisors (1+2+3). It is easy to count to 12 on hand fingers, if we use the finger joints instead of the finger tips (as it is still done in India): each of the 4 main fingers has 3 joints, that can be counted by using the thumb of the same hand. By using the other hand and counting a finger every 12 cycle, we can easily count 12 x 5 = 60. By dividing the entire cycle of the precession of the equinoxes (25,920) into 6, we get 4,320.

Saturn is the Lord of Time both in the Greek (and Roman) symbolism and in India it is identified as Sani, the "Black Lord", an emanation of Shiva in his destructive aspect. In Egypt Saturn (Ptah) was known as "the Lord of the 30-year cycle", which multiplied for the 360 degrees of the circle, gives the duration of Heraclitus' Great Year: 10,800 years. Which, curiously, is also the number of the bricks in the Vedic altar, that multiplied into 40 (the number of the syllables in each verse) gives the total of the verses in Rig Veda: 432,000.

In other traditions, the "warriors of the end of the world" are 432,000, and 4,320 are the Einhrjarr warriors coming out from the Valhalla on the day of Ragnarok for the final battle against Loki (800 warriors x 540 doors). The measurements of the Great Pyramid of Giza are based on the number 4,320: its height is 147.1 meters and is obtained by dividing the Earth's polar radius into 43,200, while its perimeter is obtained by dividing the Earth's equatorial radius for the same number (43,200). The measurements of the Angkor Wat temple, too, are based on the same number. On the other hand, Sri Yuktesvar and David Frawley believe that the total of 12 "divine cycles" does not refer to the Kali yuga but to a Maha yuga, a complete cycle of 4 ages, of which Kali yuga would be only a fraction. To be precise, according to their calculation the ascending cycle of the Kali yuga started in 700 BCE with the imperialist age of Alexander of Macedonia and the foundation of Rome, while the descending cycle started in 500 CE with the beginning of the middle ages and ended in 1700 with the age of lights and the rediscovery of electricity.

Sri Yuktesvara also speaks of another important alignment of planets, with a cycle of about 12,000 years: its effect produces strong gravitational and magnetic effects, with both cosmic and solar and meteorological storms on Earth. As we will see later on, this cycle has been confirmed by modern research: every 12,000 to 13,000 years the spiral that is at the center of the galaxy enters an explosive phase lasting 1,000 years and characterized by the emission of gamma rays and particles of matter.

From the geological point of view, the last of these periods coincided with 10,600 BCE - the explosion of supernova Vela X, and the arrival into our solar system of its shock-wave of magnetized cosmic particles. This shock-wave modified the orbit of the Encke comet, that shattered against some other asteroid; one of the fragments fell on the Earth, more specifically in the Atlantic ocean, destroying Atlantis, causing the Flood remembered by the Sumerian culture (quoted in the Bible). This also caused the inclination of the Earth's axis (that until then had been perpendicular to the ecliptic) and the sudden shifting of the earth crust, which radically changed the shape and position of the continents. This corresponds to the passage of the solar system into the cardinal sign of Leo, that had a great importance in the history of mankind, in Egypt but also in south America and in Asia.

Alchemist Fulcanelli connects the description of the Flood with the effect of the inversion of the poles, where Uranus, previously "constantly conjoint with Gaia", became distant. This movement shifted the south pole to Antarctica, a continent that had been lush green and a cradle of civilization, as shown by the famous map of Piri Reis. In the northern hemisphere, in what is today the arctic polar circle, there was the disappearance of another great civilization described by some Indian scholars - and recently surfaced thanks to the archaeological discoveries of Canadian Jenness and Danish Rasmussen Therkle and Birker Smith (the civilization of Thule or Tulla), described by Plato as originated by the hyperborean Apollo (the Sun).

In Rig-Veda (10, 89, 4) we find this verse: "With your power, you keep Heaven and Earth separated like the two wheels of a chariot are held by its axis". The verse refers to Svetadvipa Dhruvaloka, the polar star, the axis on which the "seven Rishis" of the Ursa Maior revolve in the movement symbolized by the svastika, and that according to another verse of Rig Veda (1, 24, 10) are "high above". Such an observation is possible only for someone who is standing at the north pole. Anaximenes repeats this image, comparing the movement of the skies in the early times to the "rotation of a man's hat on his head". Irish astronomer Sir Robert Ball described the cycle of the year in northern Europe before the disaster, as a summer of 229 days, with a mild winter of 136 days. This refers to the shifting of the poles, not to the complete reversal, that is much rarer. According to geological studies, a complete reversal happened 171 times in the last 76 million years, of which 14 times in the last 4,5 million years, the last time about 780,000 years (Science, 1969).

The movement itself can happen in very short periods, with an exponential increase in speed - 30 days could be enough to cover all the 180 degrees of the complete reversal - but the effects remain felt even for a thousand years, like it happened in the last episode, when the strata of geological material belonging to the 1,000 years after the shifting are magnetized towards various directions (that is, not aligned) before they return to the north-south alignment. At present, the magnetic poles are already moving, through north Canada and Antarctica, at the speed of about 30 km/year, but as we have seen this speed could increase exponentially even without any warning. The seriousness of the situation is demonstrated by the fact that from 1970 to date, the Earth's magnetic field has already dropped 38% and is still dropping. The largest crack in the magnetic field, called south Atlantic Anomaly, is about 250,000 sq km and goes from south Africa to Brazil. Many satellites have already been damaged while crossing space above this region.

The most sensational correspondence discussed at present is between the beginning of the third Mayan calendar and the date offered by the Indian Surya siddhanta as the beginning of the Kali yuga, 3,102 BCE (3,113 BCE for the Mayans). We know that in this period there was the sudden rise of the dynastic civilization in Egypt and the Sumerian civilization in present Irak, while the green plains of Sahara suddenly turned into a desert. In India, the catastrophe of those years has submerged the city of Dvaraka, the capital of the Yadu kingdom, Krishna's dynasty. It was a global event. Lonnie Thompson, glaciologist (ice researcher) at Ohio University, has collected a huge quantity of data analyzing the oxygen isotopes in the ice layers, as well as the tree growth rings, the bone sediments in human skeletons, and the plant pollen deposits. Everything shows that about 3,100 BCE Earth suffered a climate disaster also connected to a peak of solar activity.

अव्यक्ताद् व्यक्तयः सर्वाः प्रभवन्त्यहरागमे । रात्र्यागमे प्रलीयन्ते तत्रैवाव्यक्तसंज्ञके ॥ ८-१८ ॥

avyaktāḍ vyaktayaḥ sarvāḥ prabhavāntyāharāgame | rātryāgame praliyante tatraivāvyaktasāñjake || 8-18 ||

avyaktat: from the non-manifested state; vyaktayah: the manifestations; sarvab: all; prabhavanti: become emanated; ahab: of the day; agame: at the beginning; ratri-agame: at the beginning of the night; praliyante: they are dissolved; tatra: there/ in that; eva: certainly; avyakta: non-manifested; samjñake: is known.

"At the beginning of the day all manifestations/ beings rise from the (state of) non manifestation; at the beginning of the night they are dissolved into that same non-manifestation."

Here, vyakta and avyakta are utilized in a relative sense, just like sometimes the devas are called amartya, "immortals". From our human point of view, especially in Kali yuga, a duration of life that is calculated in millions of years can legitimately call for the definition of "immortality", and similarly the partial destruction of many planetary systems in our universe every 4 billion 320 million years can easily be considered a withdrawal of the creation, even if several planets remain still untouched. As we have seen, there is a greater cycle of the entire lifetime of Brahma that covers a period of time that is even greater: 157,680,000 millions of years (4,320 millions x 365 x 100), where it becomes really difficult for our mind to conceive a beginning and an end. Yet, this greater cycle, too, is just the time of one breath for Mahavishnu.

The words prabhavanti and praliyante refer to the shorter cycle constituted by the day and night of Brahma. At the end of this cycle not all the planets are destroyed, so the state of non-manifestation mentioned in this verse is not the original pradhana. Only Bhur, Bhuvah and Svar are destroyed; the residents of the other planets (from Mahar to Tapas) move to Satya, where they take rest along with Brahma himself. On the other hand, at the end of the longer cycle constituted by the life of Brahma all the planets are destroyed and the universe is re-absorbed into Mahavishnu. From the descriptions of the Vedic scriptures we understand that time is eternal, and there is no "end of the world", just end of cycles. We can become liberated from this cycle by attaining the full spiritual realization, or continue to incarnate in various species of life and on various planets, experiencing the immense range of pleasures and sufferings afforded by the various bodies of devas, human beings, animals and vegetal beings. Beyond all this, there is the unlimited expanse of the spiritual world, the eternal and unchanging existence of Brahman. The correspondence between the macrocosm and the microcosm continues: at the level of Brahma, who is the universal creature, the day and the night correspond to very long cycles of activity and rest in the entire universe, while at the level of the ordinary human beings, the day and night are marked by the appearance and disappearance of the sun and bring cycles of activity and rest for the earthly creatures.

This concept of the parallel between the macrocosm and the microcosm is exquisitely Vedic in origin, but along the history leaked into other cultures, where it created strong mystic and alchemic movements awakened by this astonishing realization about the nature of the universe. "As above, so below" is a very famous saying, extremely popular among the practitioners of what is called today wicca, witchcraft, magic or natural religion. It is the main foundation of all religious rituals, by which the adept calls the macrocosmic Deity into the microcosm of his/ her own heart, offers worship and obedience, and propitiates the attainment of something that s/he desires, through the practice of prayer and symbolic presentations. Some commentators explain that the 7 chakras within the human body should be identified as Bhur, Bhuvah, Svar, Mahar, Jana, Tapa and Satya respectively from the base of the spine to the crown on the head. According to this perspective, below Bhur there are the 7 lower chakras of sub-human life, and above Satya there are no more planetary systems: this gives the calculation of the 14 planetary systems or 14 worlds that we often find in the shastras. So, Bhur represents the planet earth, Bhuvah is the intermediate dimensions where the upadevas live, and Svar is the higher planetary system of the devas, where Indra and the Adityas live. This interpretation is not necessarily at odds with the version we have described in the commentary to verse 8.16 (where the 7 chakras normally considered in the human body, along the spine, all represent the earthly level) because the total number of planets remains the same - they are only classified in a different number of categories. In regard to the subdivision of the centers of energy in the human body, this calculation could also be applied to the physical structure of the energy body, made of vortexes (physical chakras), meridians (nadis) and nodes (marmas) from which the subtle or causal forms of the structure are projected into the aura, that can expand for several feet outside the limits of the gross physical body.

भूतग्रामः स एवायं भूत्वा भूत्वा प्रलीयते । रात्र्यागमेऽवशः पार्थ प्रभवत्यहरागमे ॥ ८-१९ ॥

bhūtagrāmaḥ sa evāyaṁ bhūtvā bhūtvā praliyate | rātryāgame'avaśaḥ pārtha prabhavatyāharāgame || 8-19 ||

bhuta-gramah: the aggregate of beings; sah: it; eva: certainly; ayam: this same; bhutva bhutva: coming to existence again and again; praliyate: is destroyed; ratri-agame: at the beginning of the night; avasah: automatically, controlled by higher laws; partha: o Arjuna (son of Pritha); prabhavati: it becomes manifest; ahar-agame: at the beginning of the day.

"O son of Pritha (Arjuna), all these beings certainly continue to appear and are dissolved again automatically at the beginning of the night, and manifest again when the day arrives."

In the second chapter, from verse 12 to 30, Krishna had already explained how the Atman goes through cycles of incarnations, that we could call manifestation and non-manifestation, corresponding to the birth and the death of the body, but is never destroyed. Here, responding to Arjuna's question about the consciousness of the devotee at the time of death, Krishna repeats the concept of the cyclic manifestation and non-manifestation of the body, from the macrocosmic to the microcosmic. Therefore we understand that there is no reason for anxiety or distress regarding death, just like we should not worry about "the end of the world". Nothing really ends: it just becomes invisible for some time.

The word ayam in this verse indicates that at the new manifestation at the beginning of the day of Brahma, it is those very same living beings of previous manifestation that are recycled, and obtain a new opportunity for action and development. So at the end of a body, or even at the end of a cycle of the universal manifestation, nothing is really lost. The conditioned souls simply "go to sleep" for some time, and then they "wake up" again to resume their activities, just like at any new day in one's regular lifetime. However, the conditioned beings cannot freely choose the type of body they are going to receive. The word avasab in this verse means "without control", to indicate that they are transported up and down by the mighty tides or waves of the material world, that is often compared to an ocean. We should not think that such movements are casual and simply governed by chance, because there are natural laws in the world that act very subtly outside the limits of the knowledge of ordinary persons: the ignorant conclude that things happen "by chance", or "by coincidence" when they are unable to see the subtle laws of cause and effects that created the circumstances they are facing. Nothing happens by chance.

This higher law, or higher control authority that governs the movements of the conditioned beings and their new incarnation and condition of life (bhuta), is an impartial conscious power based on the two major factors of karma and smarana. Karma ("actions") refers to the activities performed in previous lifetimes and their consequences, that create samskaras or vasanas, deep impressions in the causal body that give it a precise shape as the blueprint of the future gross body. Smarana ("remembrance") is the conscious act by which we choose what we want to contemplate in our consciousness. The two factors are closely connected, because by repeating a particular type of action or set of actions - physically, verbally and mentally - the impression is created, and the habit makes it much easier to perform the action, almost spontaneously.

The constant or regular choice of remembering and enacting a particular activity creates a strong attraction towards the particular vibrational frequency (or mode, called guna), like a diapason tuning, and this organizes the matter to form the new body. It is an automatic process, governed by natural laws; although the Atman has a certain amount of free will, the stronger its conditionings are, the less freedom it will have in the choice of its next body. According to the level of consciousness that one has developed, the ahankara that is the foundation of the causal or astral body responds to the attraction of the thought-forms (yam yam vapi smaran bhavam 8.6).

When we speak of an impartial conscious power that governs the manifestation of the bodies in the universe, we imply that besides the "mechanics" or "dynamics" of the guna, karma and smarana, there is some deva, some divine Personality, in charge of the process. Yama ("the regulator"), also called Dharma, is the personification of this natural law and oversees the process, even intervening directly or indirectly to modify it in case of necessity. Usually his intervention is indirect, as he sends his yamadutas ("servants of Yama") to capture those souls that are not ready for an immediate reincarnation and need a particular type of debriefing before proceeding into their next stages.

At the time of death there can be several different scenarios. In the best situation, the yogi has a very clear mind and a high level of consciousness and therefore s/he can freely proceed to the destination s/he had chosen, sometimes with the help of benevolent guides who have a subtle body made of mental energy. As the substance of the bodies of these guides is subject to the laws of the mind and expressed in the forms of symbols, each individual will see them through the filters of cultural expectations: as angels with wide swan-like wings and immaculate white tunics, or as radiant nishnudutas having a form similar to Vishnu's, or as one's loved relatives and friends who died before us, or any other form that the mind accepts as positive, benevolent and friendly.

If the deceased person is confused and still has material identifications and attachments connected to the previous body and circumstances, his/ her mind will play several tricks, bringing up various memories and visions of the past, present and future, sometimes all mixed together, and even visions of alternate realities according to his/ her unfulfilled desires and aspirations. Depending on his/ her good karma, guna and smarana, the deceased will be attracted by different colors of lights and other sensory perceptions that appear in this period between lives, and that attraction will lead to the circumstances where the next body will be developed. Sometimes the deceased is visited by visions of guides that may appear benevolent or angry, but these simply have the function of stimulating a response that will decide the direction of the new incarnation. In some cases, when the deceased is sincere and inquisitive, and humbly asks for help, these guides hold a consultation with him/her, not unlike university professors discussing a new curriculum and exams with a student, and there can be a thorough analysis of the karmic journey of the individual over a number of lifetimes. The consultation of the akasic records, guarded by an assistant of Yama called Chitragupta, is generally a very important factor in this process. It is very interesting to note that this particular exploration of the "between lifetimes" situation and the analysis of the various lifetimes can be performed also while one is still in the body, during the period of the current lifetime, through specific techniques that are called astral traveling. With or without a guidance in this gross physical dimension, the "explorer" can enter the subtle dimensions of the afterlife (that are always existing within our minds and all around us in the subtle dimension) and even meet those same guides that s/he would meet after death and before the next incarnation. This experience could be compared to a dream, but it is much more vivid than a dream, and gives very good and useful realizations; sometimes it is called "conscious dream" or "shamanic journey". The same facilities are available at the end of the day of Brahma, when most of the planets and the bodies of the conditioned souls are withdrawn into the cosmic sleep.

परस्तस्मात्तु भावोऽन्योऽव्यक्तोऽव्यक्तात्सनातनः । यः स सर्वेषु भूतेषु नश्यत्सु न विनश्यति ॥ ८-२० ॥

parastasmāttu bhāvo'nyo'vyakto'vyaktātsanātanah । yaḥ sa sarveṣu bhūteṣu naśyatsu na vinaśyati ।। 8-20 ।।

parah: supreme, transcendental; tasmat: that; tu: but; bhava: nature; anyo: other; avyaktah: non-manifested; avyaktat: from the non-manifested; sanatanah: eternal; yah: s/he; sah: s/he; sarvesu: in all; bhutesu: beings/ conditions of life; nasyatsu: while being destroyed; na: not; vinasyati: is destroyed.

"But there is another nature, different from this non-manifested (state), a non-manifested (nature) that is eternal and is not dissolved when all the beings are dissolved."

Previously (2.28), Krishna had already mentioned that the beings (bhutan) regularly go through a cycle of non-manifested, manifested, and non-manifested again. This applies to the individual bodies, and in a wider sense also to the varieties of species that appear and disappear cyclically in the various planets according to the different circumstances. Sometimes an animal species that had been considered extinct is seen to appear again, and sometimes entire sets of species - like the dinosaurs - disappear completely: this fact does not contradict the creation system explained in Vedic scriptures, because the genetic blueprint of the various species is always existing, either in the manifested or non-manifested state. When Krishna spoke of manifestation and non-manifestation in the cycle of creation and dissolution of the universe, either partial (at the end of Brahma's day) or complete (at the end of Brahma's life), he was talking about the bodies, physical and mental, that are made of material substance inevitably destined to change and transformation. However, Krishna had already clearly stated that there are two natures or prakritis (7.5), one called material or adhibhuta, and the other called spiritual or adhyatma. Their respective products are the material bodies and the jivatmans or the individual souls.

It is important to understand that the temporary non-manifested state (avyakta) described in the previous verses (8.18, 8.19) is different from the unchangeable and eternal original state of the soul. Therefore the expression anyo avyakto avyaktat sanatanah makes a clear distinction between the non-manifested state of matter (that is not eternal and is subject to change) and the non-manifested state of the Atman/ Brahman (that is eternal and is not subject to change). To make a practical example, we can compare the former to the darkness of the night and the latter to the darkness of the unlimited space in the universe. Night is a temporary situation, where our vision is limited by the absence of the sunlight and other similar factors, while the apparent darkness of the unlimited space is in fact full of the sun's energy and light, but due to the perspective of the distance there is a feeling of space and darkness of the background. However, a photovoltaic device, like the solar sails used in some spaceships, is not limited by this apparent darkness and easily perceives and absorbs the solar radiations and energy. To the materialist, transcendental reality seems not to exist because he is unable to see it with his physical eyes, but that does not mean that transcendental reality does not exist at all. We just need to develop the suitable vision and perception.

It is important to understand the meaning of jivabhuta as compared to jivatman. They are similar definitions, but there is an important difference: the jivabhuta is a "condition of being" in which the jiva finds itself, and it is always a material condition, a material body, a material situation. On the other hand, the jivatman is the individual soul itself, that as a jivabhuta is experiencing the material condition by falsely identifying with it. This verse explains this difference, saying that the position of the para prakriti or para bhava is different from the position of the apara prakriti, in the sense that the souls are never non-manifested, even when they appear to have no body. Later (15.17), Krishna will again confirm this fact, by saying that the jivabhutas are actually his eternal amsas ("parts", "limbs" or "cells") who appear in the material world of prakriti, and struggle with the six senses, starting from the mind (mamaivamso jiva-loke jiva-bhutam sanatanah manah-sbashtanindriyani prakriti-sthani karsati). Does it mean that during the night of Brahma the conditioned living entities do not lose their self-consciousness, but remain somehow conscious, while their bodies are sleeping in the non-differentiated non-manifested state? Of course. Just like in our daily microcosm we have the night, when we experience deep sleep and the dreaming state, during the night of Brahma the conditioned living entities are suspended in a happy sleep in which they do not lose themselves. Even during the time of the complete dissolution of the universe, the conditioned living entities, the jivabhutas are absorbed in the blissful radiance of the brahmajyoti, the non-differentiated white light of the pure consciousness, from which they will again emerge refreshed and ready for a new cycle of creation.

This brahmajyoti can also be attained at any time during the manifestation phase of the cycle of the universe, provided one has attained the Brahman realization and has abandoned all material identifications and attachments, even without developing an actual siddha deha or siddha svarupa (spiritual body). The jivatman remains in the radiant bliss of Brahman (brahmananda) in its anu-atma (atomic soul) form until s/he is ready to incarnate again and continue its development.

However, this temporary liberation is only a brief taste of the actual, permanent, fully cognizant and perfectly blissful state of liberation (the real moksha) that comes from the genuine development of the svarupa-siddhi; that highest perfection is called param dhama (supreme abode, supreme position).

अव्यक्तोऽक्षर इत्युक्तस्तमाहुः परमां गतिम् । यं प्राप्य न निवर्तन्ते तद्धाम परमं मम ॥ ८-२१ ॥

avyakto'kṣara ityuktastamāhuḥ paramāṁ gatim । yaṁ prāpya na nivartante taddhāma paramaṁ mama ॥ 8-21 ॥

avyaktah: non-manifested (materially); akṣarah: eternal - the Brahman or the Omkara; iti: like this; uktaḥ: it is described; tam: that; abuh: it is expressed/ called; paramam: supreme; gatiṁ: destination; yaṁ: which; prāpya: by reaching; na: not; nivartante: returns; tat: that; dhama: abode/ position/ nature; paramam: supreme; mama: my.

"That eternal non-manifested (Brahman) is the highest destination/ goal. After attaining it, one does not fall back. That is my supreme abode."

While the previous verse was speaking about the jivatmans, the products of the para prakriti that are never dissolved even at the cyclic destruction of the entire universe, this verse is speaking about the siddha vastu, the eternal perfect spiritual world, that is the abode of the siddha svarupas, the eternal perfect spirit souls that have fully developed a transcendental body made of eternity, awareness and happiness. Many people, who have an eminently materialistic vision - based on material body identification and affiliations - envision liberation (moksha) simply as a negative condition, in which there are no material ties, no identifications, to attachments, etc. However, moksha is not an end, but just a beginning. Verse 18.54 clearly says that on the level of Brahman (brahma-bhuta), that is another definition for the liberated state, true devotional service (mad bhaktim labhate param) starts. Without personal relationships, there can be no bhakti, and without personalities there cannot be any personal relationships. So there are personalities, and relationships, and activities on the liberated platform. Who can say that Krishna's nature or existence is void, or impersonal? It's full of lilas and rasas, activities and relationships: it is certainly not impersonal.

Also, all along the Gita, Krishna has been saying that those who are perfectly liberated attain him - his nature, his abode, etc - and then they do not return to the materially conditioned level again. Yet, we see Krishna descending into this world not only once (as he is evidently there talking to Arjuna), but regularly, from age to age (4.7). There is not one single statement by which we can assume that Krishna takes on a material conditioned form when he descends, but rather there are several very clear and very incisive statements on the opposite: see 2.12 (we all exist eternally as distinct persons, including Krishna who is obviously not a conditioned soul), 3.22 (Krishna is not conditioned to act, still he is engaging in the proper activities to give the good example to people), 4.6 (Krishna manifests his form and activities out of his own yogamaya and not as a material condition of life), 4.9 (Krishna's birth and activities are not material), 7.6 (Krishna as the person - aham - is the origin of the entire universe), 7.7 to 7.12 (Krishna as the person - aham - is the essence and existence of everything), 7.24 (only the fools - abuddhayah - believe that Krishna has taken a temporary material personality), 7.25 (only the idiots - mudhab - are unable to understand that Krishna is eternal and unborn). Again in later chapters we see 9.9-10 (Krishna manifests the creation of the universe, but he is always neutral and detached), 9.11 (only fools - mudhab - believe that Krishna takes a temporary material personality when he descends into this world), 10.2 (Krishna as the person - aham - is the source of all devas and rishis), 10.3 (one who understands this transcendental nature of the Personality of Godhead is on the liberated platform), 10.8 (Krishna as the person - aham - is the source of everything), from 10.19 to the end of the chapter (10.42) the transcendental nature and position of Krishna will be further elaborated, much like we had seen from 7.7 to 7.12, only in a more extensive way. In the 11th chapter, Arjuna penetrates this universal consciousness and existence personified by Krishna when he contemplates the universal form, the Visva rupa, that includes all the devas and all the planets and their inhabitants, that is presented as a mere partial emanation from Krishna the person. From chapter 12 the statements become even clearer as the declared topic is bhakti, or personal devotion to God, which obviously implies a personal relationship, and not as a "second choice" for the simple minded unable to grasp the philosophical truths. In 14.27, Krishna clearly states that he as the person - aham - is the foundation of the Brahman, the eternal existence of happiness, and 15.6 will speak about the siddha vastu, the dhama param, the supreme position, saying that the spiritual world is self-radiant and needs no sun or moon or fire.

Some commentators argue that Krishna speaks of himself - aham - as the impersonal principle of Brahman, but that is ridiculous. How can a statement based on a personal subject ("I") indicate an impersonal principle? And if this was the case, why is Krishna clearly saying that he is the foundation and origin (prasthita) of the eternal Brahman (14.27)? The fact is that the liberated state, both while still living in a body (jivanmukta) and after leaving this body, is full of consciousness and happiness, and a void by definition is non-existent: therefore, it is asat, and cannot have any consciousness or any happiness. There could only be a cessation of suffering, as in the idea of nirvana among some Buddhists, but that's certainly not the brahma nirvana described in Bhagavad gita. Suka rahasya Upanishad (40-42), Bahuricha Upanishad (5), Nrisimha tapani Upanishad (uttara, 4, 7), Rudra bridaya Upanishad (conclusion) explicitly describe the param padam, the supreme position, as sat cit ananda. The word sat expresses one of the most important concepts in Vedic knowledge, and by understanding its various levels of meanings, we can attain Self realization and liberation. Sat means "existence, reality", and hence "essence, ontological being", "eternity, permanence" but also "spiritual, transcendental", "good, positive, virtuous", because whatever is good is supporting the existence of the universe for the progress of all the beings. This also means that only good exists positively - what we perceive as "bad" is merely the apparent absence of "good". So when the shastra describe Krishna consciousness as sat, it cannot be a non-existent void, as it has already been explained in 2.16, 17, 18. The second attribute of the Supreme Existence is awareness, called cit, and sometimes describes as knowledge, cognizance, or consciousness. We have already seen that the essence of all existence is its knowledge, or its blueprint on the subtle level, so sat and cit cannot be separated, because they are one and the same. And if consciousness is the very nature of existence in the spiritual world, it means that such existence contains the knowledge and consciousness of everything that can exist - its pure ideal form, from which the material manifestation can subsequently take place in cycles of creation. This is the greatest possible variety, as it contains all the original perfect forms of all the varieties that can ever exist in the past, present and future. Finally, the third attribute of Transcendence is happiness, ananda. The personal transcendental level expressed by Krishna as "my nature" is characterized by the supreme happiness, and just as Krishna as the person is the foundation of the Brahman, the happiness of the siddha vastu, siddha svarupa, cintamani dhama and param bhakti is the foundation of the brahmananda, the happiness that is found in Brahman. To find this transcendental world one does not need to move physically or geographically: this siddha vastu, like the siddha svarupa, is contained within the atman, even within this body. Where? Within the origin of the prana in the body, the pranava ("of the prana") omkara, the supreme vibration that is the source of everything. The anyakta akshara is not a material sound, but a subtle vibration frequency of energy that organizes and supports the existence of matter as we see it: therefore, being the origin of everything, it is described as the supreme level or supreme position, parama gati or parama dhama, but in fact it cannot be described fully by words.

In this verse, abuh means "calling, expressing", and it also refers to consciously vibrating the pranava omkara as a practice of meditation on the subtle reality; uktah also means "pronounced", which reinforces the idea by repetition. In Patanjali's Yoga sutras (1.27, 28, 29) it is clearly said that the pranava omkara is the "description" of Isvara (God), and that by repeating this subtle sound, one comes to realize its meaning. This practice automatically turns the consciousness towards the inner Reality and all obstacles disappear (tasya vacakah pranavah, taj-japas tad-artha-bhavanam, tatah pratyak-cetanadhigamo'py antaryabharash ca).

पुरुषः स परः पार्थ भक्त्या लभ्यस्त्वनन्यया । यस्यान्तःस्थानि भूतानि येन सर्वमिदं ततम् ॥ ८-२२ ॥

puruṣaḥ sa paraḥ pārtha bhaktiā labhyaṣtvananyayā | yasyāntaḥsthāni bhūtāni yena sarvamidaṁ tatam || 8-22 ||

puruṣaḥ: the principle of consciousness; sa: he; paraḥ: superior, supreme; pārtha: o Arjuna (son of Pritha); bhaktiā: through devotion; labhyaḥ: can be obtained; tu: but; ananyayā: undivided; yasya: of him; antaḥ-sthāni: that are staying within; bhūtāni: all the beings/ conditions; yena: by him; sarvam: all; idaṁ: this; tatam: pervaded.

"O Partha, this supreme Person can be attained by undivided devotion. Within him exist all these beings, and he pervades everything."

In this verse we find the definition puruṣaḥ paraḥ, "the Supreme Person". The puruṣa is the principle of consciousness, while prakṛti is the principle of activity, therefore the Supreme Puruṣa is the sum total of all the consciousness. No single individual can be the sum total of all the consciousness: s/he can only connect to this supreme puruṣa, or "enter" into this supreme puruṣa (visate tad anantaram, 18.55) like one enters a great ocean or a great forest and becomes a part of it.

As we have already elaborated in the previous commentary, devotion or bhakti can never be applied to an impersonal object, what to speak of a "non-existence" or void. The expression bhaktiā labhya, "to be obtained through devotion" is a clear reference to the other instructions focusing on bhakti, devotion as the development of a loving service attitude through the dedication of all one's activities to God. Some people interpret this devotion and worship as meant to be directed towards one's self, and apply Krishna's statements on aham ("I") and mam ("me") as referring to their own self or Atman. By following the discourse of Krishna about the Atman and its non-difference in quality with Brahman, they conclude that all the subsequent descriptions of the glories of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, the origin of all existences, should be understood as applying to the ordinary jīvatman. This is a serious mistake, and because these confused people cannot understand the concept of paramatman, they end up worshipping their own material personality (ahangrahopasana). Some commentators confuse this idea with the concept of advaita, or "monism", but it is a mistake. Thinking oneself qualitatively one with God is not wrong, because the Atman is actually of the same nature of the Brahman: the difference is the "aham" in ahangrahopasana, that cannot refer to the Brahman in this meditation, simply because it is the "wrong" aham - it is the individual soul's ego, and not Krishna.

Along the Bhagavad gita, Krishna speaks of the Supreme Personality of Godhead sometimes in the first person as "I" and "me" (aham, mam) and sometimes in the third person as "he" and "him" (yasya, yena, tam puruṣam). However, he never applies the concept "you", because there is always a very clear distinction between the jīvatman and the paramatman. Atman and Brahman are qualitatively one, or "of the same nature" as Krishna says, but one (the Atman) depends on the other (Brahman, or Param Atman). It is true that the Parama Puruṣa (the Supreme Person) is within all living beings (18.61, isvarah sarva-bhutanam hrid-dese tiṣṭhati), but "residing in the heart of all beings" does not mean "being the individual atman", because the individual atman is only in the heart of one body. Here the verse clearly says, bhūtāni sthāni, "all the beings/ the multitude of beings exist in him".

If one wants to worship oneself, s/he should start by having the full knowledge of the past, present of future of all beings (7.26) and everywhere in the universe: it is easy to understand that such a consciousness cannot be an individual consciousness, by definition. Even the paramatman that is present in the heart of the individual as the soul of the soul, or the atman of the atman, is not the sum total of the Transcendental Reality (9.4, 9.5)

After attaining the level of perfect realization, one enters into the Supreme (18.55), which implies a differentiation that is present at least in the initial stage of the process: therefore the ahangraha upasana as a preliminary practice is totally useless. One could say that at least the neophyte moves his/ her attention away from the constant search of objects of enjoyment in the material world and focuses it towards the inner reality of Atman - but that was already done brilliantly in chapter 2 of Gita by simply explaining that the atman is the actual identity or self. After understanding that simple point, it is better to direct one's devotion towards the Paramatman, rather than towards the Atman.

The word ananya means "not other", in the sense of "exclusive, complete, full, dedicated, concentrated, focused, uninterrupted, constant, consistent". Once again, Krishna is emphasizing that spiritual realization should not be a side dish in our life, a social opportunity, a hobby or a method to become more fit and healthy to better enjoy our senses: it is the only purpose of life, and we need to become fully dedicated into it, every single moment of our time, with every single act and thought.

यत्र काले त्वनावृत्तिमावृत्तिं चैव योगिनः । प्रयाता यान्ति तं कालं वक्ष्यामि भरतर्षभ ॥ ८-२३ ॥

yatra kāle tvaṇāvṛttimāvṛttim caiva yogināḥ | prayātā yānti taṁ kālāṁ vakṣyāmi bharatarṣabha || 8-23 ||

yatra: there; kāle: at that time; tu: but; anāvṛttim: no return; āvṛttim: return; ca: and; eva: certainly; yogināḥ: the yogis; prayatāḥ: having left; yanti: they go; taṁ: that; kālāṁ: moment/ time; vakṣyāmi: I will tell; bharatarṣabha: o best of the Bharatas (Arjuna).

"O best of the Bharata dynasty (Arjuna), I will tell you at which time the yogis leave (the body) not to return or to return, and the time when they can attain (the supreme destination)."

We have seen in the commentary to verse 8.19 that at the time of death, the deceased can find various situations and circumstances, that will lead to rebirth on this planet or to the attainment of other levels of life. Nothing happens by chance, not even the particular time and place of death: everything is created by a combination of karma, guna and smarana - past actions, the qualities or tendencies developed, and the concentration of the mind to remember a particular level of consciousness. The moment of death is important in regard to one lifetime just like the moment of the final exams is important for an entire course of studies, or the moment we choose to board a train for a very long journey, so intelligent people will do their best to arrange the appropriate circumstances to keep very focused and attentive, so that there will be no mistakes caused by confusion or emotional imbalances.

A person who knows the Vedic science of the Self is not afraid of death in itself, but is concerned about the level of consciousness at the time of death, so s/he will give more importance to dignified and peaceful circumstances and environment than to the artificial and messy prolongation of life, as it happens too often in contemporary medical procedures. Resuscitation attempts, prolonged external life support, and unnecessary surgeries will simply confuse the dying person and cause fear, anger and resentment to develop in his/ her mind, and this in turn will most likely lead to a lower condition in the next lifetime.

Two serious legal and moral issues are connected to this topic: euthanasia and organ harvesting. These are very controversial issues, because mainstream culture and public opinion are conditioned to fear death itself and to blindly accept the decisions of the medical establishment that are built on total disregard for the dignity and the personal choices and proper information of the patients. Also, there is a lot of deliberate misinformation about both issues, caused by partisan interests and biased beliefs.

Euthanasia (a Greek word literally meaning "good dying") is the legal definition for medically assisted suicide, which means intentionally ending a life on the request of the patient in order to relieve pain and suffering in a terminal medical condition where there is no hope for recovery - to allow the patient the blessing of a dignified and orderly death at the time of his/her choice. This may be done actively, as by administering a medication that will painlessly stop the heart or cause similar effects on the body, or passively, as by simply switching off the artificial life support on which the patient depends for heart stimulation and breathing. Active euthanasia is used when the mere suspension of artificial life support would cause death only over a relatively prolonged period of time and entail a certain amount of sufferings.

The abrahamic ideologies put a blanket condemnation on all forms of suicide as a very serious sin because it gives the human being the power to decide on him or her own life and death, while in the Vedic system suicide is considered a very personal choice on which nobody else should have any say, except for the person who wants to die. A hot debate on the legal legitimacy of euthanasia is going on in several countries, and usually in the regions where Christian churches have more power, there is more persistence in prosecuting the patients who want to die peacefully and the doctors who are willing to help them.

But the really bad reputation of euthanasia is due to the arbitrary (and incorrect) application of the definition to the organized killing of people that the German Nazi regime did not consider "genetically fit" enough, especially based on racial considerations. There was nothing "good" about such deaths because those people were killed against their will, and without allowing them any dignity or peaceful or uplifting environment at all, so the term was misused and its distortion still causes similar fears in the minds of the general public opinion.

On the opposite side of the spectrum, organ donors are made to believe they are making a very good ethical and moral choice when they sign their legal declaration. Even when organs are harvested without the consent of the source patient, generally the public opinion tends to think that it is all for the best, because the receiving patient will get a new lease on life - and in any case the source patient was already dead. Or so they think. Actually organs must be harvested when they are still functional, and if they are not implanted immediately, they need to be kept strictly under refrigeration at a very low temperature, because death naturally brings about the decay of the body tissues, and in normal environmental conditions the organs become useless after mere minutes from death. So here the interests of the medical establishment intervene on the legislation to define the moment of death as the moment when the legally certified physician declares the source patient dead based on direct observation, usually focused on the absence of heart beat or brain waves. This means that the anxiety to harvest the organs of a patient and use them in their best shape possible could easily lead the doctor to speed up the procedure to the detriment of the source patient.

Also, the doctors do not give any consideration to the fact that the passage of death takes a longer time for the subtle body as compared to the reactions of the gross body, and this is precisely the crucial period when the level of the consciousness of the dying person should remain stable and peaceful, focused on the transcendental reality. Even after several minutes and sometimes even after hours from the moment when the heart stopped beating and the brain stopped showing signs of activity, the soul encased in the subtle body is still attached to the gross body, inside it or immediately around it, as it has been reported by many patients who had what are called NDEs or "near death experiences". Sometimes a patient that has been declared dead returned to life spontaneously and unexpectedly, and the descriptions given by these patients consistently report that they were perfectly conscious of everything that was done on and around their bodies, even if they were observing the events from a point outside the body itself. The most impressive part of these stories is that such patients are able to describe exactly what happened, what the doctors said etc, even if their body was apparently dead or completely unconscious.

In the Vedic system, death normally occurs in a very quiet and peaceful way, and the ideal circumstances are those characterized by silence and solitude, just like when one sits for meditation in the course of his/ her normal yoga practice. Of course the best scenario for a person who is dying consists in the loving support of evolved persons who encourage the departing soul to leave the body peacefully and happily and to continue in her/his journey, knowing that those who are left behind are not "bereaved" or "mourning" but simply remembering him/ her with affection and good wishes. Dying peacefully during the night is always better than dying surrounded by callous medical professionals or even crying family members, and although in the next verse we will see that the night is less auspicious than the day, still it offers a greater amount of protection from the distraction and distress caused by emotional people who do not have sufficient realization and wisdom to see death in a positive way.

Sannyasis live alone and take distance from other people specifically because they are preparing for the passage of death, therefore even during the daytime they are unlikely to be disturbed by emotional people who will create negative feelings about their demise.

अग्निर्जोतिरहः शुक्लः षण्मासा उत्तरायणम् । तत्र प्रयाता गच्छन्ति ब्रह्म ब्रह्मविदो जनाः ॥ ८-२४ ॥

agnirjotirahaḥ śuklaḥ ṣaṇmāsā uttarāyaṇam । tatra prayātā gacchanti brahma brahmavidō janāḥ ॥ 8-24 ॥

agnih: in the fire; jyotiḥ: in the light; ahab: during daytime; suklah: during the bright fortnight of the waxing moon; sat-masah: during the six months; uttarayanam: of the northern journey of the sun; tatra: there; prayata: by leaving; gacchanti: they go; brahma: to the Brahman; brahma-vidah: those who know Brahman; janah: the persons.

"In the fire, in the light, in the day, in the waxing moon, and in the six months of the uttarayanam: those who know Brahman attain Brahman departing at those times."

The most important part of this verse is the conclusion: brahma vidah janah, "those who know Brahman".

We should not delude ourselves into thinking that merely catching the proper time for our death will automatically take us to the spiritual world or to liberation, if we have not realized the Brahman - the Transcendental Reality of the Universal Consciousness - during our lifetime. So it is essential to understand that whatever dissertation we may conduct about the various auspicious or inauspicious moments for dying becomes irrelevant for those who are still conditioned by material identifications and attachments: for such people, there is no auspiciousness and no chance of attaining the supreme abode.

For those who have actually attained the level of liberation and realization, there are moments that are considered more auspicious or favorable, merely because they inspire happiness and enlightenment in the soul that is leaving for his/ her next journey after this lifetime. Such times have nothing particularly transcendental or magical about them, but they can certainly help, just like it is better to choose a sattvic place and time for our regular meditation, as per Krishna's instructions in Gita (6.10 to 6.13). Of course, the circumstances mentioned in this verse apply to a society where people respect the dignity and privacy of others, live according to the natural rhythms of the universe, are free from bad habits, have a keen sense of the purpose of life and the Vedic values and are not exposed to extensive pollution of the environment (including the sound and magnetic pollution). Also, exceptions to this verse are other external factors that are considered even more inauspicious, such as war, natural disasters, any type of violent death, negative emotions expressed or cultivated or caused by the people around the dying person, or any other cause of fear or anger that would lower the level of consciousness of the dying person.

In the ideal circumstances taken for granted by the Vedic civilization, a human being enjoys not only a high quality of life, but even more importantly a high quality of death. Fire (agni) refers both to illumination and cremation. The meaning of illumination is offered as an alternative to the daylight, because obviously during the day time there is no need for fire except for the cremation, but that is a subsequent factor that applies to a moment that comes after the precise time of death itself. The most important window of time for the proper orientation of the consciousness consists in the minutes before and after the gross material body becomes lifeless. Another important role of fire is the sacred flame of the sacrifice, that is carefully kept in every Vedic home, and transferred to the worship room or the kitchen when required. On the other hand, fire as a house heating facility does not have a central role in Vedic life, because of the mild climate characteristic of the places where people are situated in a sattvic mode.

Light is always given a great importance in Vedic culture and lifestyle, because it represents the radiance of the Brahman and has a positive effect on the mind, enlivening, enlightening and inspiring good feelings, therefore according to tradition there should always be some lamp burning in the rooms even during the night when everyone is asleep. To avoid the dangers connected with live flames, Vedic homes had built-in niches for lamps and special safe lamps - ideally transparent ones - positioned high on the walls, and equipped with long wicks and a good store of oil or clarified butter to last for several hours.

Still today, in some temples, there is the tradition of the akhanda dipa ("eternal lamp") that is kept burning constantly day and night by adding clarified butter or special types of vegetal oils. Also other ordinary types of lamps are regularly offered by the visitors of all temples as a mark of respect and devotion to the Deity, and the most famous popular festival in India is still Divali or Dipavali, a name that literally means "many lamps", as people in every household and neighborhood light as many lamps as possible on the new moon night in the month of Kartika, in October-November each year.

The sun (arā) is undoubtedly the greatest and most powerful source of light in the universe, and therefore its visible presence is very auspicious, inspiring and enlightening. A sunny day gives happiness to the heart and lightens and comforts the mind, and therefore it can ease the crucial passage of death. The other great influence on our planet is the moon, whose power creates the tides and controls the growth of plants. Ancient peoples also knew that the gravitational attraction of the moon, with its monthly cycles, had a deep influence on the mind, as well as on the menstrual periods of women, on the fermentation of brews and the preparation of medicines. The waxing moon brings a rising energy and an increasing amount of light during the night time, therefore it is considered auspicious. The two fortnights of the lunar cycle are called sukla ("white") and krishna ("black") to indicate the increasing and decreasing amount of moonlight.

Uttarayana is the definition given to the six months that go from the winter solstice to the summer solstice, and the days progressively become longer and brighter. It is said that on the highest planets of this universe, one day of the devas is equal to one entire earthly year, and therefore our six months from winter to summer constitute the daytime for them, and they can be approached more easily. However, we must be very careful not to judge anybody's death circumstances, because it is always difficult to know exactly what level of consciousness an individual is able to maintain at each moment, and the reason why something had to happen. Sometimes an advanced soul just needs to burn a little bit more of karma that is still attached to that body, so death may occur in stressful or violent circumstances. On the other hand, sometimes a person has organized everything to have a very peaceful and dignified death, and still the consciousness remains disturbed from within, and s/he is attracted to a lower birth or worse. We should never take anything for granted, and we should remember that self-complacency and self-righteousness are the first symptoms of pride and arrogance, which reinforce the material identifications and attachments... so by the very fact of remaining humble about our actual position and capabilities, we protect ourselves from falling down from such position. The following verses constitute a map of the subtle paths of the universe, by which a yogi can travel everywhere and choose to leave the material sphere or to remain in the higher levels of material enjoyment. The archetypes of light, fire, waxing moon and increasing radiance of the sun dispose the mind towards enlightenment, while the opposite archetypes tend to weigh it down to fall back into material vibrations. Similarly, the various purification rituals and pious activities are meant to elevate the vibrational frequency of the mind so that it can carry the soul to the highest levels of the material universe, up to the limits of liberation. These are also considered as valid as the auspicious environmental circumstances, if not more effective.

However, a true yogi transcends both paths - the light and the darkness - by constantly meditating on the Adhiyajna within the heart, therefore s/he can never be confused and s/he does not need to worry about external circumstances or ritualistic proceedings.

धूमो रात्रिस्तथा कृष्णः षण्मासा दक्षिणायनम् । तत्र चान्द्रमसं ज्योतिर्योगी प्राप्य निवर्तते ॥ ८-२५ ॥

dhūmo rātristathā kṛṣṇaḥ ṣaṇmāsā dakṣiṇāyanam | tatra cāndramasaṁ jyotiryogī prāpya nivartate || 8-25 ||

dhumab: in the smoke; ratrib: in the night; tatba: also; krishnab: the dark fortnight of the waning moon; sat-masa: the six months; dakṣinayanam: of the south-bound journey of the sun; tatra: there; candramasam: the moon sphere; jyotib: the light; yogib: the spiritual seeker; prāpya: attaining; nivartate: comes back.

"In the smoke, in the night, in the waning moon and in the six months of the dakshinayana, the yogi reaches the lunar light and then comes back."

Those who have attained liberation, the supreme consciousness of the Transcendental Reality of Brahman, are free from all material identifications and attachments, and do not have any selfish independent desire to be pursued in the material world.

However, the moment of leaving one's material body is always critical, because the yogi might be attracted by the sattvic opportunity to engage in a devotional service to the Lord of the universe, by joining the devas in the administration of the cosmic affairs. The uttarayana path described in the previous verse as connected to the sun's journey in the sky is also called devayana, or "the path of the devas" because it opens the way to a beautiful tour of the higher planets, where one is welcome to stay until the time of the dissolution of the universe, in the company of great Personalities such as Brahma, Indra, and others, under the sphere of influence of the sun, Surya.

The dakshinayana path described in this verse gives the tour in the opposite direction, that is governed by Chandramasa, the sphere of the moon, and it is also known as the pitri ayana, the "path of the pitris", the dharmic departed souls, generally called "the ancestors". Within the sphere of influence of the moon we find Pitri-loka or Yamaloka, the dimension where Yamaraja or Dharmaraja lives, and where all the ordinary souls (not the liberated yogis) arrive after death for a consultation about their next incarnation program. The "bad people" are escorted here by the yamadutas, "the servants of Yamaraja", who serve as a sort of police officers in the after-death dimension. Good people either arrive there spontaneously or guided by the same yamadutas, who in this case are perceived as gentle, caring and luminous angels, as the mind of the deceased remains neutral and free from fear.

To understand how it is possible that the same beings can be perceived as brutal and scary law enforcers - even looking like some depictions of devils in the abrahamic tradition - or as a beautiful sort of social services workers - even looking like the angels or saints of the abrahamic tradition - we can make the example of a man who is in a rather dark room, where eyesight cannot help much, and bumps into a mannequin wearing some bulky clothing. Depending on the state of mind of the man, he will perceive the dummy either as an enemy or a friend, possibly mistaking it for a thief or a murderer if he is really scared, or as a dear friend who came to help him: it is all in the mind, like the perception of the snake in the rope. In the subtle dimension between lifetimes, all perceptions remain on the subtle level of the mind, therefore the shape we project on things becomes real for our own mind.

When they reach this sphere, the yogis that know Brahman (brahma-vido janah) and are free from material identifications and attachments are not directed to take another material body because they do not need to play out any more karma. However, they are welcome to stay as guests of Yamaraja and members of his household and court: these are the pitris to whom the śraddha rituals are offered. The descendants of the great brahmanas and rishis know that their ancestors were pure, liberated souls who knew Brahman very well and had no material identification and attachment, so they offer the śraddha confidently that the presentations - tarpana, boma etc - will reach them. After all, the pitris are allowed to stay in Yama's house for a period of 10,000 years, in which they enjoy a very high level of quality of life, comparable to the most luxurious holiday resorts on this planet. The pitris drink the soma rasa with the devas, help the confused departed souls and even astral travelers and shamans by giving counseling and guidance, and gather in assembly to discuss the events of the universe and how they can influence the people on earth in a positive way. They also have the power to visit earth in various shapes - as birds, as human beings etc - to test human beings and offer them blessings or curses, but they never engage directly in any conflict, either between human beings or between devas and asuras. At the end of their 10,000 years, they return to this earthly dimension to take a new material body and complete their service to the Lord and mankind by spreading their wisdom and knowledge, then they get another opportunity to leave the material dimension and attain Brahman. In any case the śraddha rituals, the tarpana and the śraddha oblations for the ancestors are always beneficial, even if those ancestors we are thinking about have not been able to attain Pitriloka, due to their lack of knowledge of Brahman, purity of heart and luggage of bad karmic reactions. Any action performed for their benefit will reach them wherever they are and will help them in their progress.

Another interesting point about this verse is the definition of day and night, and its application to the level of consciousness to be pursued at the time of death. In verse 2.69, Krishna declared, "For a wise person, what is night for all creatures becomes the opportunity for regulated awakening, and the time when the creatures remain awake is night for him." In the commentary to that verse, we gave various levels of meanings, from the most literal (the most sattvic time is the brahma muburta, the quiet hours of very early morning, about 2 hours before sunrise, when everybody else is sleeping - most people would call it "night") to the deepest, that refers to the day and night of consciousness itself as the light of knowledge and the darkness of ignorance respectively. This deep and symbolic interpretation adds many layers of meaning to these two specific verses (8.24-25) because they elaborate on the various archetypal components of our mind, from the sun of the conscious level to the moon of the emotional level, to the fire of dedication and the smoke of confusion, and the greater orbit of the samsara cycle based on the guna and karma that each individual cultivates in his/ her own human life and leads upwards (uttarayana) or downwards (dakshinayana) in the wheel of evolution-involution of the species. We should remind our readers here that a man or woman who has misused the valuable opportunity of the human birth may very well be pushed to take birth in some animal or vegetal species, at least for some time. Some commentators have called the uttarayana and the dakshinayana as anavritti and avritti respectively, indicating that the recommendations on the different moments of time simply apply to the level of consciousness and the motivation. According to this interpretation the devayana refers to the Supreme Personality of Godhead (the supreme deva by definition).

This means that the yogis who take this road do not stop at the higher planetary systems but go directly into the siddha vastu, the eternal spiritual world that is also called Vaikunthaloka.

शुक्लकृष्णे गती ह्येते जगतः शाश्वते मते । एकया यात्यनावृत्तिमन्ययावर्तते पुनः ॥ ८-२६ ॥

śuklakṛṣṇe gaṭi hyete jagataḥ śāśvate mate । ekayā yātyanāvṛttimanyayāvartate punaḥ ॥ 8-26 ॥

sukla: in the white; kṛṣṇe: in the black; gaṭi: destination; hi: certainly; ete: these; jagataḥ: of the universe; śāśvate: eternal/ permanent; mate: are considered; ekaya: by one (only); yati: goes; anavṛttim: without return; anyaya: by the other; vartate: one returns; punaḥ: again.

"These two paths of the world, the white and the black, are considered eternal. One takes to the non-return, and the other winds back."

Several times along the text of the Bhagavad gita (2.45, 4.22, 5.3, 7.27, 7.28, 15.5), Krishna says that we need to overcome the idea of duality, but some people get confused and conclude that we must eliminate all sense of discrimination and distinction, and that we must believe that everything is the same - all is "one".

While it is true that everything is connected, and coming from the same origin and the same great universal plan, it is nonsensical to think that everything is the same, and that every choice will bring the same results. We cannot say that sat and asat are on the same level, that dharma and adharma are equally valid, or that knowledge and ignorance will give the same benefits. The illusion of duality (dvandva moha) consists in believing that one's existence is separated and independent, that we can hurt others to get whatever we want, and that there is an absolute value and importance in material differences such as pleasure and pain, gain and loss, success and failure, etc. All these things are relative and temporary, and they do not have a real permanent existence of their own - they are simply material conditions meant to keep us moving on in our pursuit of the permanent meaning of life. When we overcome this illusion, we realize what is important and what is not, what should be done and what should not be done (16.7 pravṛttim ca nivṛttim ca). This perception could be mistaken for duality, but it is not. It is intelligence, viveka, the power of proper discrimination that guides us along the right path, to obtain the desired results.

If there was really no difference or distinction, all the purpose of the Vedic knowledge would be lost, because whatever people would do, they would obtain the same result - enlightenment or conditioning: this idea is preposterous. There would be no meaning to the instructions of the Vedas and the missions of the avatars, the preaching of the acharyas and rishis, and the idea of sadhana would be ridiculous. Persons who are intelligent and sincere will be able to understand this point, while the foolish and materially motivated will remain confused and object that we are inconsistent.

Some people foolishly claim that all paths are equally good and should be equally considered valid and respectable, simply because there are those that have chosen to follow them as their affiliation. They call this "freedom of religion", but it is a mistaken definition. Freedom of religion, or freedom of thought, consists in having the legitimate right to think and believe whatever one wants, whether such beliefs are right or wrong, founded or unfounded. Nothing more.

The right to the freedom of religion does not make all opinions equally valid. It does not authorize people to commit criminal actions simply because they believe such actions are legitimate according to their opinion. It does not invalidate the others' right to question or criticize an opinion or belief that is obviously illogical, contradictory, unethical or based on false data, or even advocating or supporting ignorance, cruelty, violence, selfishness (individual or collective), dishonesty, injustice, intolerance, oppression, greed, insensitivity, and other similar asuric characteristics. Opinions should be allowed to exist as opinions, but they should never be allowed to materialize in actual aggressive or oppressive behaviors in society - simply because at that point they are not "opinions" any more. Acting out on wrong opinions becomes wrongful action, another definition of crime, and criminals must be stopped. The famous saying sarva dharma samo bhava, "all the manifestations of dharma are of the same nature", is often used by uninformed people to claim that "all religions are the same", so no ideology can be criticized (usually this means abrahamic ideologies cannot be criticized).

There are some Hindus who feel such statement to be fundamentally wrong, but because their ideas are not very clear, they respond by trying to deny that Hinduism is a religion to begin with - with the only result of losing their legally recognized rights and discouraging those who want a valid and healthy religious affiliation. Others react by resorting to racism or casteism, trying to establish that Hindus (as those who were born in the Indian race and from "high caste" families) are always right, because their birth makes them genetically different from the rest of the human beings. This weird idea is totally unsupported by any scientific evidence, but its fascination is so strong that its proponents do not even want to see that a growing number of individuals born in the Indian race and from "high caste" families easily become opposed to the Vedic knowledge and ideals, turning into cynical materialists, naxalites, criminals, or converting to Christianity or Islam or some other non-dharmic ideology. Nothing has changed in their physical genetic composition, but they hate the very idea of being somehow connected with Hinduism or Vedic culture.

The fact is that the quote says sarva dharma samo bhava, not sarva mata samo bhava ("all opinions are of the same nature"). The key word is dharma. The meaning of dharma is always accompanied by a set of positive principles, of an eternal and universal nature (sanatana dharma) that promotes progress and happiness of everyone, therefore when we translate the term as "religion", we are surmising that all the ideologies presently defined as "religions" are also based on the same positive principles. Yet, this is an illusory idea, that is not substantiated by facts, ideology, scriptural evidence or history of the behavior of those who claimed to be acting in the name of their religion (and were universally accepted as such).

Clever manipulators of debates will try to reply that bad people are found in all religious communities, but they will not be able to explain why an abrahamic who preaches killing people in the name of his religion should not be immediately stopped - unless they admit that abrahamic scriptures actually approve and recommend the action of killing people in the name of religion (or mindlessly destroying resources, enslaving, raping, lying, looting, etc), and that again, is certainly not within the category of "opinion".

Materialistic people, who identify with the gross body and birth, will propose the vision of sva-dharma or "specific duty" within society, saying that dharma is the duty connected to the inherent quality and tendency (guna and karma) of the individual, therefore since one is born to be good or bad, he will not be able to change that situation and therefore he should embrace it as his duty (dharma). But this is a fallacy, because there is no such thing as criminal dharma. It is true that dharma is the specific duty of each being, determined by guna and karma, but its meaning cannot be separated from its root, dhr, that means "to support". Dharma is what supports, not what damages. Dharma is about good qualities, not defects. The purpose of the existence in this world is to evolve: asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrityor ma amritam gamaya (Brihad aranyaka Upanishad 1.3.28), "from ignorance lead me to truth, from darkness lead me to light, from death lead me to immortality". Evolution means moving from bad to good, from defects to qualities. But even if we want to state that a sudra - for example - should not directly study the Vedas or make an effort to improve his life in a sattvic direction, because he does not have the guna and karma to actually succeed in that effort, still we should remember that such a condition is simply temporary and relative, and they should be abandoned as much as possible.

Krishna will clearly state later in Bhagavad gita (18.66 sarva dharman parityajya) that we must abandon the pluralistic and dualistic vision of "many" different *dharman*s as rules for different levels of human evolution, because such divisions are simply referred to the temporary variety of bodies, that belongs to the category of the illusory dualities to be overcome. Of course dharma, as the universal and eternal ethical principles, must never be abandoned.

Vedic society and culture have always demonstrated immense tolerance and accommodating attitude towards freedom of opinion, freedom of expression and even freedom of lifestyle, but within the limits of non-aggression towards innocent and good members of the society - technically called prajas, "children" in the family of the sattvic king.

As soon as any individual tried to perform an act of aggression, he would immediately be stopped, either by the individual that was being attacked, or by the kshatriya, "the protector" of the prajas. The protection of the prajas is the only real duty of the kshatriya, because the Government has no business controlling what people think and believe. The demonstration of this point is that in ancient times Vedic kshatriyas always showed perfect tolerance towards all religious traditions - Shaivas, Shaktas, Vaishnavas etc - and sometimes even directly funded and promoted all of them. The best example of this ideology is found in the tradition of Jagannatha ("the Lord of all") in Puri, that reunites all the main Vedic ista devata in the same tattva without any contradiction; this was and is still considered the best approach for the choice of an ista deva for the king, so much that the king of Puri traditionally considers himself as the "younger brother" and "first servant" of Jagannatha. Vedic rulers even had no problems with the proponents of antagonistic theories called nastika darśhanas ("faithless perspectives") such as because the teachings of Charvaka (materialistic atheism), Buddha (Buddhism) and Jina (Jainism).

The word nastika refers to the denial of the authority of the genuine scriptures and the existence of a Supreme Godhead, a position that is totally at odds with the Vedic tradition. Yet neither materialistic atheism, materialistic agnosticism, Buddhism, Jainism have ever been persecuted in Vedic India. Even in more recent times (up to about 50 years ago) the refugees of various faiths - such as Hebrews, Christians and Lamaists - have always found a peaceful and friendly welcome from Hindus of all groups and denominations, especially when such refugees and settlers maintained an equally respectful attitude towards other faiths and especially towards dharma.

नैते सृती पार्थ जानन्योगी मुह्यति कश्चन । तस्मात्सर्वेषु कालेषु योगयुक्तो भवार्जुन ॥ ८-२७ ॥

naite sṛtī pārtha jānanyogī muhyati kaścana । tasmātsarveṣu kāleṣu yogayukto bhavāṛjuna ॥ 8-27 ॥

na: not/ never; etc: these (two); sṛtī: different paths/ courses; pārtha: o Arjuna (son of Pritha); janam: knowing; yogī: a yogi; muhyati: is confused; kaścana: ever/ in any circumstance; tasmāt: therefore; sarveṣu: in all; kalesu: moments; yoga-yukta: connected through yoga; bhava: become; arjuna: o Arjuna.

"O Partha, a yogi who knows these paths is never confused, therefore (you should) be engaged in yoga always."

The definitions of yogi and yoga indicated in this verse obviously refer to the buddhi yoga, that is the intelligent application of knowledge (jnana yoga) and performance of one's duty (karma yoga) in a spirit of devotion (bhakti yoga) regulated by a scientific method of activities (keriya yoga). The progress in this yoga is clearly traced from the initial questioning about the purpose of life (visada yoga), the understanding of the difference between body and soul (sankhya yoga), the renunciation to material identifications and attachments (sannyasa yoga), the focusing of one's mind in meditation (dhyana yoga) that liberates from material ignorance (taraka brahma yoga). Each of these passages corresponds to a chapter in Bhagavad gita. The exact center of the Gita is the next chapter, 9, that bears the title raja guhya yoga: the yoga of the supreme secret.

We should never fall in the trap of those commercial exploiters who teach that yoga is a physical and mental system of exercises meant to help in de-stressing and improving one's body shape so that it will be easier to engage in artha and kama - wealth acquisition and sense gratification. It is true that artha and kama are legitimate purusha arthas ("purposes of human life") and there is nothing wrong with them, but they are not the purpose of yoga. A yogi may continue to give some space for artha and kama in his/ her life, but the real purpose of yoga is moksha (as declared by the name of the 18th and last chapter of Gita), but those energies and time invested in artha and kama will be subtracted from the pursuit of moksha, and this will delay success in the ultimate purpose. Therefore Krishna clearly says that one should be very focused and not pursue any other concern (8.14, ananya cetah): this will make success very easy to attain (su-labha). This is confirmed in Patanjali's Yoga sutras (1.21, 1.22) with the expressions tiṛa-samvegānam asannāh, "those who make a stronger effort attain a quicker result" and mridu-madhyadhimatratat tato 'pi viśesah, "going from mild to medium to intense".

Some commentators express the belief that Bhagavad gita teaches that one should leave everything and take sannyasa in order to attain the supreme Consciousness, but this is not confirmed anywhere. Rather Krishna clearly says at the beginning of the chapter on sannyasa yoga (6.1) that real sannyasa is not about formal renunciation to occupational and family engagements, but simply about the dutiful performance of the activities within their circle of responsibilities but without being attached to enjoying its results (2.47, ma phalesu kadacana).

The most important factor is the knowledge or awareness of the spiritual reality, that gives a clear vision and dissipates confusion (2.13, 2.72, 4.35, 18.72). This knowledge is based on the viveka, the "intelligent discrimination" between sat and asat - what is eternal and spiritual on one side, and what is temporary and material on the other side. Here is precisely the meaning of the previous verses as applied to the sukla and the krishna, the white path and the black path.

The word kaścana ("ever", "in any circumstance") suggests that a person who is situated in buddhi yoga can make the perfect choice in all circumstances, either favorable or unfavorable, because a journey is about the direction in which one is traveling, not about the position that one may have achieved at any given time along the road. Similarly, Krishna instruction sarveṣu kāleṣu yoga-yukta bhava, "always be a yogi at all times", refers to the level of consciousness in different situations, not to a particular position or moment in life, such as the time we dedicate to our regulated sadhana exercises or the stage in which we renounce all other responsibilities to simply lead "a spiritual life". In fact, the danger of this reductive vision according to which one can practice yoga only in certain circumstances and at certain times is that that one can easily miss the entire point of yoga and become mechanical, egotistic, self-righteous, arrogant, and totally confused about which is the white path and which is the black path. The evidence of such downfall is given by those so-called sannyasis that are engaged in activities and behaviors that are explicitly forbidden for sannyasis, and demonstrate a very strong tendency to material identification and affiliation, attachments and belonging, and materially based duality. The worst and most serious symptoms or examples of such behaviors are illicit sexual relationships and power-mongering politics; where by "illicit" we intend any sexual relationship that is contrary to the fundamental principles of dharma and by politics we intend a dishonest game of selfishness and duality that is contrary to truthfulness.

At another and more physical and superficial level of meaning, that applies to the material structure of the universe, the proper knowledge and practice of yoga towards the two paths called deva yana and pitri yana, enables the yogi to utilize both or either in a conscious and progressive way, without becoming confused by the external circumstances and by the particular position that one might find him/herself in at the time of death.

वेदेषु यज्ञेषु तपःसु चैव दानेषु यत्पुण्यफलं प्रदिष्टम् ।

vedeṣu yajñeṣu tapaḥsu caiva dāneṣu yatpuṇyaphalaṁ pradiṣṭam ।

अत्येति तत्सर्वमिदं विदित्वा योगी परं स्थानमुपैति चाद्यम् ॥ ८-२८ ॥

atyeti tatsarvamidaṁ viditvā yogī paraṁ sthānamupaiti cādyam ॥ 8-28 ॥

vedeṣu: in the study of Vedic scriptures/ in the pursuit of knowledge; yajñeṣu: in sacrifices/ sacred activities/ ritual performances/ sacred duties; tapaḥsu: in austerities; ca: and; eva: certainly; daneṣu: in charity; yat: that; puṇya: virtuous/ sattvic/ pure; phalam: fruit/ result; pradiṣṭam: indicated/ assigned/ declared by the scriptures; atyeti: surpasses/ exceeds/ is greater; tat: that; sarvam: all; idam: this; viditva: by knowing; yogī: the yogi; param: supreme; sthanam: position; upaiti: attains; ca: and; adyam: original/ primeval/ most important.

"(A yogi) obtains greater benefits than those acquired by the prescribed virtuous acts (puṇya) such as reciting the Vedas, performing yajnas, engaging in austerities and distributing charity. Knowing all this, a yogi attains the supreme and original position."

Both levels of meaning are confirmed here in this verse by Krishna: provided one knows (viditva) how things should be used in the proper way, both the white and the black paths can be used beneficially (puṇya phalam, "bring good results") "as indicated by the Vedic scriptures" (pradiṣṭam). The factors of veda, yajna, tapas and dana are found in both genuine dharmic paths - the anavritti and the avritti, leading respectively to devaloka and to pitriloka. The white path is faster and the black path is slower, but they are not antagonistic to each other, because contrarily to the abrahamic idea of the "only one true path" that disproves or destroys other paths, the Vedic vision offers the intelligence to utilize all resources in a positive way.

Another similar verse to this one is found in 9.27: yat karosi yad asnasi yaj jhubosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kurushva mad-arpanam, mentioning specifically jhubosi as representing yajna, dadasi representing charity, and tapasyasi representing tapas. There karosi ("you do") summarizes all other activities and behaviors that in this verse are regulated by the prescriptions of Vedic texts and/ or by the proper knowledge (veda). We can therefore add another layer of meaning to the discussion about sat and asat as "proper" and "improper" and about viveka and dvandva as "choosing with intelligence" as compared to "choosing whimsically".

Some say that the recitation of the Vedas and the practice of yajnas, tapas and charity belong to the karma kanda section or the scriptures and are followed by the smarta Hindus (smarta meaning "those who follow the smṛiti scriptures"), and therefore they belong to the black path of the pitris, and therefore they are to be abandoned in favor of complete renunciation and dedication to the path of God (deva yana). Realistically, in their opinion this idea is equated to the formal acceptance of the order of sannyasa in their particular religious organization, the purely theoretical of philosophical contemplation on the Supreme Consciousness as the union of Atman with Brahman, or the contemplation of the activities of the Supreme Personality of Godhead in a superficial devotional attitude not supported by jnana or karma. Krishna does not advocate any of these, so those who claim to consider Bhagavad gita as their authority should carefully examine their views, and make sure they have not misinterpreted other texts, too.

The expression sarvam viditva indicates that in the Vedic vision, a yogi should know everything, both the material (apara) and the spiritual (para) knowledge, because he needs a sufficient understanding of both in order to work within this body, within this universe, and render a useful and favorable service to God, as stated in the bhakti literature (Bhakti rasamrita sindhu.1.1.11) as anukulyena krishna-anusilanam bhaktir uttama, "supreme bhakti consists of the activities that are favorable to the service to Krishna".

The adjective anukula ("favorable") balances the other affirmation in the same verse according to which pure bhakti should be from selfish/ dualistic (anya, "other") personal desires (anya-abbilasita sunyam) and not overpowered or covered by jnana and karma. This statement could confuse some materialistic minds into thinking that a pure devotee can, or should, be ignorant or stupid and lazy or irresponsible. In the verse quoted above, jnana-karmady anavritam means "not covered (overwhelmed, obstructed) by jnana and karma". Of course we must be careful to avoid arid/ theoretical academic attitude and attachment to social expectations within one's religious community, because these may become obstacles to sincere devotion. But if you totally remove jnana and karma (knowledge and sense of responsibility in honoring one's duties) you do not get uttama bhakti ("supreme devotion") consisting in anukulyena krishnanusilanam ("a behavior that is properly in accordance with the favorable service to Krishna"). We will instead get the foolish and irresponsible behavior of the prakṛita sabāgyas ("materialistic simpletons"), the kind of people that Rupa Goswami described in his Bhakti rasamrita sindhu as "unnecessary disturbance to society". We should never forget that the original statement of this logical thread (8.24) subordinated the description of the two paths (the sukla and the krishna) to the preliminary realization of Brahman, which requires sufficient jnana and vairagya to destroy all material delusions to begin with.

The knowledge of Brahman (that is the same tattva also called Paramatma and Bhagavan) is also the pre-requisite mentioned in verse 2.46 with the expression brahmanasya vijanataḥ, "a person who really knows Brahman". That verse, too, expressed a sense of greater scope and inclusion in the direct knowledge of Brahman as compared to the various branches of knowledge contained in the different Vedic scriptures (sarveṣu vedeṣu). Here in this verse the same idea is expressed by the word atyeti, that means "surpasses" but also "includes", as a greater number automatically includes the smaller numbers. Again, this does not mean that we should discard the smaller numbers and throw them away, thinking they are opponents, rivals, or obstacles to the existence or glory of the greater number. Thus, as long as the yogi remains properly situated in the buddhi or viveka - the ability to distinguish sat from asat, dharma from adharma, there is no need of rejecting the knowledge of the structure and functions of the universe, especially since we still are in this universe and we need to work with it.

Precisely for this reason, in later chapters of Bhagavad gita Krishna will dedicate much time and energy in detailing about the three gunas and similar subjects that would appear to be "material".

Chapter 9: Raja guhya yoga The Yoga of the supreme secret

The supreme secret of Bhagavad gita is pure devotion to the Supreme Personality of Godhead. It is not the cheap and superficial devotion of materialistic simpletons, but the pure love of those selfless souls who have come to this level through the path already traced by Krishna in the previous chapters. Such path is so sublime, simple and clear that it can be followed successfully by everyone, including those who are less qualified materially in terms of erudition, austerity, ritual purity and so on.

In chapter 1, Krishna utilized the disillusionment expressed by Arjuna to move our attention from the ordinary material concerns to the pursuit of spiritual knowledge and realization. In chapter 2, Krishna clearly explained what is the difference between the temporary material body and the eternal transcendental spirit soul, called atman. In chapter 3, the yoga of action is explained, by which we can work on the spiritual level while still living in the material body and world - performing our duties selflessly, as an act of worship to the Supreme, or yajna (sacred action). This could be called the ABC of Self realization.

The next group of chapters takes us deeper into the understanding of the transcendental science. Chapter 4 teaches that adequate knowledge (jnana) is required in order to remain in spiritual transcendental consciousness, for our own benefit and for the benefit of society in general. Chapter 5 explains the importance of genuine detachment (vairagya), also called renunciation (sanmyasa) - something that is not limited to superficial appearances. Chapter 6 unites the application of knowledge and the development of genuine detachment, to guide us into the practice of true meditation, consisting in engaging the mind in the service of the Supreme. The next chapters bring meditation to a new level: from theory into practice (vijnana) as explained in chapter 7, that is also called devotion (bhakti), consisting in seeing the Supreme Personality of Godhead as the source and support of all manifestations, material and spiritual. Chapter 8 continues to elaborate on the meditation on the Supreme, especially in preparation for the moment when we will be able to leave the present body, so that we can remain on the liberated platform. Chapter 9 reveals how the Supreme Consciousness manifests through his divine energies, and how we can always concentrate on this consciousness and attain full perfection.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

इदं तु ते गुह्यतमं प्रवक्ष्याम्यनसूये ।

ज्ञानं विज्ञानसहितं यज्ज्ञात्वा मोक्षयेऽशुभात् ॥ ९-१ ॥

idaṁ tu te guhyatamaṁ pravakṣyāmyanasūyave । jñānaṁ vijñānasahitaṁ yajjñātvā mokṣyase'śubhāt ॥ 9-1 ॥

sri-bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; idaṁ: this; tu: but; te: to you; guhyatamaṁ: the most secret; pravakṣyami: I will explain; anasūyave: to the non-envious; jnanam: knowledge; vijnana: wisdom; sahita: united; yat: that; jñatva: (by) knowing; mokṣyase: you will become free; aśubhat: from all inauspiciousness.

The Lord said: "I will explain to you this supreme secret, because you are not envious. By knowing (reality) with/through this theoretical and practical knowledge, you will be free from all inauspiciousness."

All along the Bhagavad gita, the text repeats that Krishna is Sri Bhagavan, the wonderful Supreme Personality of Godhead, and not a mere human being. The knowledge we find in Gita has an extraordinary value because it opens for us the door into the consciousness of the Personality of Godhead, which is the precisely the characteristic that defines God. Krishna is God - not because he says so, or someone else says so, but because of what he says about the perception of Reality: an unlimited dimension of consciousness that covers everything that exists. Vasudeva sarvaṁ iti (7.19). This is the supreme secret: the secret of Krishna Consciousness. The word guhyatama ("the most secret") is the superlative form of the adjective guhya ("secret"), while the comparative is guhyataram ("more secret"). Bhagavata Purana (2.9.31) also offers homage to the supreme secret (jnanam parama guhyam), that is the Transcendental Consciousness expressed respectively as jnana (the study of material and spiritual natures, vijnana (the practical application and realization of knowledge), rahasya (the attraction and dedication to the divine consciousness) and tad anga (the supreme Consciousness himself). Translated into the technical bhakti language, jnana corresponds to the preliminary stage of sadhana or vaidhi bhakti, vijnana to the sambandha (establishment of a personal relationship) with the manifestation of the Supreme Guru in everybody's heart as the specific form of Krishna called Madana Mohana, rahasya to the abhidheya or actual devotional service to the form of Krishna called Govinda, and tad anga to the prajoyana or the attainment of the permanent union with the form of Krishna called Gopinatha.

The concept of guhyam is also confirmed in other verses of Bhagavata Purana such as in 11.11.49: the paramam guhyam ("greatest secret") that can be given only to a person who is not envious - a friend (sakha) and a servant (bhritya) of God. Interestingly, this verse in the Bhagavata uses the definition su-gopyam ("very confidential") associated to the definition paramam guhyam. We can comment here that the word gupta ("hidden") comes from the same root. Sometimes the best way of keeping a secret is to put it in full view, but covered by a layer of illusory energy, and this is exactly what Krishna does (4.6, 7.13, 7.25).

This maya ("illusion") is based on the perception of material duality, created by the centrifugal tension called selfishness or separatism. Another definition for this centrifugal force is "envy", therefore the only way to overcome such illusion is to renounce envy: this concept was already introduced in verse 7.14 (mam prapadyante mayam etam taranti te, "they can overcome the illusion of maya by taking shelter in me"). The same idea was expressed in 7.15 (na mam prapadyante mayayapabrita jnana, "they do not take shelter in me because they are deluded"), 7.25 (maya samavritah, "I am hidden by maya"), 9.3 (asraddhadhanah, "they do not believe") and 9.11 (avajananti mam mudha, "they disrespect me").

Specifically, the word anasuya means "not envious", "not finding faults", "not malicious", "free from ill will", "free from spite". This refers to the fact that doubting and questioning must always be expressed from a sincere approach, free from any hostile motivation, from any hidden agenda. The prerequisite of being free from envy does not apply only to the relationship between the individual devotees and Krishna. It also applies to the relationship between the devotee and the guru, and to the relationship between the guru and Krishna.

It is not possible for a student to learn much if there is any envy towards the teacher, because he will not listen properly with an open mind and he will give too much importance to marginal defects of expression or to the inevitable limitations of body and mind. Chandogya Upanishad (6.14.2) says that one should see the qualified teacher as the personification of Knowledge (acharyavan purusho veda), and this means that one should strive sincerely to understand knowledge even when it is presented in a form that seems difficult to grasp, or appears to have some superficial defects due to the material package in which it is delivered. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana 1.5.11: abaddhah api, "appearing irregular". Of course we are speaking here of superficial irregularities due to the limitations of the physical body and mind, and not to adharmic activities or conclusions, therefore we must make sure that we are choosing a guru that has no envy towards Krishna. For example, the guru should not demand or expect to be worshiped instead of Krishna.

Some people are interested to use the Gita (or any of the many other forms of God) for their individual or collective (sectarian) aggrandizement or material benefit, rather than helping people develop that same supreme consciousness that Krishna is showing to Arjuna. This is because they want to channel the manpower and the resources of a spiritual seeker towards themselves, and maintain such power over people through a politicized or organizational hierarchical system, by giving the impression that the general mass of people can merely be ordinary followers, servants or devotees, and can never qualify for the direct attainment of the supreme consciousness. The litmus test is the fact that they demand a person to follow them, worship them, serve them, listen to them, and obey to them unquestionably, but in exchange for such total dedication of the disciple they do not accept any real responsibility for the disciple's actual progress and attainment of the supreme realization.

These people carefully draw a line, more or less visible officially, between theory and practice, starting from the very first step in God realization, explained by Krishna in the beginning of Bhagavad gita: all beings are pure consciousness, and their material bodies are merely circumstantial, temporary and completely irrelevant in regard to the potential of perfect consciousness. Guiding their follower to this supreme realization, however, would make him/ her independent, therefore the fake guru cannot allow that, so they keep their follower strictly chained to the illusion of duality, and of bodily identification and belonging, while superficially preaching the opposite. On the other side, Krishna in Bhagavad gita explains that jnana and vijnana must be perfectly consistent and work together as united, and not separated. Theoretical knowledge is not sufficient: we must come to the realization level, the practical applied wisdom that is direct perception (aparoksha) rather than uparoksha (something that is learned from others). This does not invalidate the need for the guidance of a genuine spiritual teacher, as stated by Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.22-23): vedante paramam guhyam pura-kalpe pracoditam, na aprasantaya datavyam na aputrasya sisya ya va punah, yasya deve para bhakti yatha deve tatha gurau, tasyaite kathita hy arthah prakasante maha-atmanah, "The purpose and conclusion of Vedic knowledge is the supreme secret that was explained in a previous age. It should not be given to a person who is restless (with material interests) or to one who is not as well known as one's own child or disciple. This (secret knowledge) must be transmitted only to those who have affection both towards the Lord and towards the teacher: this is the meaning that has been explained by the great souls."

राजविद्या राजगुह्यं पवित्रमिदमुत्तमम् ।

प्रत्यक्षावगमं धर्म्यं सुसुखं कर्तुमव्ययम् ॥ ९-२ ॥

rājavidyā rājaguhyaṁ pavitramidamuttamam | pratyakṣāvagamam dharmyam susukham kartumavyayam || 9-2 ||

raja: king/ chief; vidya: knowledge; raja: king/ chief; guhyam: secret; pavitram: pure/ sacred; idam: this; uttamam: supreme; pratyakṣa: by direct experience; avagamam: understood; dharmyam: in accordance to the ethical principles; su-sukham: very pleasurable; kartum: to be performed; avyayam: eternal/ imperishable.

"This is the king among all sciences, the king among all secrets, the highest purifier/ sanctifier. It is known through direct experience, it is dharmic, it is easy/ joyful to practice and it is imperishable/ eternal."

This is one of the most important verses of Bhagavad gita, extensively memorized and quoted. The word raja, literally meaning "king", comes from the root raj (with a long a), meaning "to shine". In human society, the king is a person who shines with charismatic power (tejas) that comes from the guna and karma that define him (18.43). The word vidya derived from the root vid - the same of the word veda - is generally used to refer to spiritual knowledge. Transcendental knowledge as explained in Bhagavad gita is the most important of all sciences, because it gives us a much better perspective of all other forms of knowledge and perception, both in this world and in the next. Without it, all other forms of knowledge become irrelevant.

The expressions gūhyam and pratyaksha avagamam confirm the meanings expressed in the previous verse about the need of directly experiencing this most secret knowledge of the universal Consciousness. Devotion to Krishna, or Krishna consciousness, is not merely a question of faith, but must be directly experienced, by each and every individual. Nobody can be a vaishnava by proxy, by power of attorney, by inheritance, by affiliation, by birth, by tradition, by legal certification, or by vote. Those who entertain such a delusional idea are simply demonstrating their total ignorance and lack of understanding about what Vishnu is.

The definition of pavitra includes all those punya-phalam pradistam (8.28) such as the study of the Vedas, the performance of yajna, tapas and dana. These meritorious and purifying activities increase our credit towards progress and realization, and destroy our karmic debts. Among all meritorious activities, spiritual knowledge and bhakti yoga have the strongest effect, because through Krishna consciousness we lose all separate dualistic interests and we are only acting for the universal benefit, without any trace of selfishness. This pure consciousness destroys all karmic ties, whether they are prarabdha karma phala (already fructified), aprarabdha (not fructified yet), kuta (in the form of sprouts or seedlings) and bija (in the form of seeds). This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (6.1.15): kecit kevalaya bhaktiya vasudeva parayanah agham dhumvanti kartsynena niharam iva bhaskaram, "Only through genuine bhakti to Vasudeva (Krishna) all results of bad activities are destroyed completely, like fog disappears when the sun comes."

The word dharmyam means that Krishna consciousness, bhakti yoga or buddhi yoga, is never contrary to the fundamental, eternal and universal ethical principles. If we see anyone behaving in some adharmic way or preaching adharmic conclusions, we can rest assured that s/he is not a true bhakta or in Krishna Consciousness: he or she must be a fraud. This is one of the most important tests to verify the genuineness of the conclusions and practices that we are asked to follow. Anything very important expression in the verse is su-sukham kartum, meaning "it is performed very easily" and "it is performed very joyfully". Often this verse is quoted to support the idea that bhakti yoga is just about hearing and telling nice stories, singing songs and dancing, eating good food, enjoying flowers and scented incense, beautiful rituals, the attractiveness of the forms worshiped in the temple, and so on. Bhakti yoga does not require strict austerities or deprivation from sense enjoyment. It allows space for sense enjoyment, provided that such pleasures are dharmic and sattvic, and directly connected to Krishna as an act of worship. Later (9.27) Krishna will clearly say, "Whatever you do and eat, offer it to me." Since we can offer only sattvic and dharmic items to Krishna, there is no danger in happily accepting and consuming Krishna's prasadam.

However, we should not get in the mode of the entertainment "gurus" and take up religious life simply as a nice way to gratify our senses, because the purpose of all such activities should be Krishna's pleasure, not our personal pleasure. We get to enjoy, but only as a by-product of our service - which is the actual source of satisfaction. Everyone has experienced the fact that material sense gratification can never really satisfy the soul's hunger. People who have enough always want more, and those who have more want even more, to the point that wealthy, healthy and beautiful people commit suicide by recklessly risking their lives for a bit of adrenaline rush - bungee jumping, para gliding, free climbing, swimming with sharks, driving full speed in the wrong lane of the highway, consuming dangerous drugs, playing the Russian roulette, and pulling other similar unnecessary stunts.

It is a fact that we, as individual jivatmas, can find satisfaction only in service. We feel good when we have done our job or our duty properly, when we have pleased our loved ones, brought a smile on a child's face, given a present to someone who appreciates it. If we do not have customers or family members, children, friends, or a lover to serve, we may find joy in getting a dog or a cat and lovingly serve them by feeding them and taking care of all their needs, including the cleaning of their excreta.

Some people will object that it is better to be served than to serve, but that is not demonstrated by facts. What we really want is the loving reciprocation of service, something that we can only get when we serve selflessly to please a selfless and deserving person. The Supreme Personality of Godhead is the best choice. Once we attain this level of genuine bhakti, we lose all attraction for everything else, therefore true bhakti is anyaya, "imperishable", "permanent".

Another meaning of this word indicates that every small step of sincere devotion remains a permanent asset and is never lost even if we somehow fall back into material life before we have attained actual realization (6.40).

अश्रद्धधानाः पुरुषा धर्मस्यास्य परन्तप । अप्राप्य मां निवर्तन्ते मृत्युसंसारवर्त्मनि ॥ ९-३ ॥

asraddadhānāḥ puruṣā dharmasyāśya parantapa | aprāpya mām nivartante mṛtyusaṁsāravartmani || 9-3 ||

asraddadhānāḥ: those who have no faith; puruṣaḥ: the persons; dharmasya: in the dharma; asya: in this; parantapa: o tormentor of the enemies (Arjuna); apraṇya: without obtaining; mam: me; nivartante: they return; mṛtyu: death; samsara: cycle of; vartmani: on the path.

"O Parantapa (Arjuna), those persons who have no faith in this dharma wander back to the path of samsara and death, without attaining me."

The Bhagavata Purana (11.2.42) compares the experience of bhakti yoga with the process of eating: at each mouthful we can feel the taste, pleasure and satisfaction of good food, and at the same time we can feel that our stomach is becoming full and our hunger is disappearing. There is no need for anybody else to tell us that we are getting our food: it is pratyakṣa avagamam, "experienced directly". Similarly, by the experience of bhakti we feel the taste and happiness of the direct personal relationship with the Supreme Personality of Godhead, we become nourished with energy, blessings and realizations, and our sufferings and material attachments gradually disappear. Faith has a role to play in the process, but only in the beginning, when the aspirant is still unable to have the direct experience of buddhi yoga. One must first approach the Vedic system in the proper way, with an open mind, and acquire jnana and vidya, vairagya and punya. To continue with the example of eating: before we can actually put the food in our mouth, we need to earn the money to purchase the ingredients, then we must get to the kitchen and cook the meal properly, and then we will be able to eat. This applies to all experiences: even the simplest and most empirical experience initially requires a certain amount of faith because without following the instructions of an expert and investing the required time and energy, it will be impossible to actually obtain the success we desire in that particular field. The four types of duskrītinah that do not approach God (7.15) are all characterized by a lack of faith: the foolish gross materialist, the cynical person who has no ethical principles, one who is confused by an egotistic use of academic knowledge, and one who has chosen to be an asura.

The previous verse defined bhakti as dharmyam, "what is in accordance to dharma", and we already mentioned how genuine bhakti will never motivate actions that are contrary to dharma. In the Vedic system, all children enter the gurukula - the guru's family - to learn dharma and vidya in theory and practice, to become able to make the proper choices during their lives. And the greatest dharma and vidya consists in raising one's consciousness to the supreme level of Krishna Consciousness, the awareness of the transcendental, eternal and universal tattva that is called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. This is the "me" Krishna is talking about in this verse. Bhagavata Purana (1.2.6) states, sa vai pumsam paro dharmo yato bhaktir adboksaje abahituki apratihata yayatma suprasidati, "The supreme dharma for all human beings is loving devotion (bhakti) to the inconceivable Lord, and this bhakti can completely satisfy the soul when it is selfless and constant."

It is important to note that bhakti must be selfless, not motivated by selfish considerations, either individual or collective. Collective or expanded selfishness means shifting one's individual selfish separatist mentality to a larger group of persons with whom one identifies on the material level, such as family, interest group, community, nation, race, or even species. As already explained in verse 5.8, the person who possesses the true vidya (knowledge) is a sama darshi ("sees equally", without prejudice) all beings, from the qualified learned brahmana to the cow and elephant, and even the dog and the uncivilized human being who is accustomed to eating dogs' flesh. Since the previous verse (9.2) clearly stated that bhakti is the supreme vidya, it stands to reason to conclude that a true devotee of Krishna will never commit any injustice against any being on the basis of material prejudice, and rather s/he will gladly and affectionately accept the cooperation of any being that is behaving in a favorable way towards dharma, and will see all beings as jivatmas, parts and parcels of the Supreme Lord.

As long as one has not realized this level of consciousness, s/he will have to go round and around the wheel of samsara, the cycle of births and deaths, experiencing the many different conditions of existence (bhūtāni) of all the living beings (bhūtāni), to learn how to feel the sufferings of others and to become detached from material identifications. The word compassion (karuna) derives from the Latin cum-patere, "suffering together with" and refers to the ability of a sensitive person who can feel the sufferings of other beings, without any prejudice or separatist dualism: this is also another definition for Krishna Consciousness. Although Krishna does not identify personally with the specific beings and is not attached to their sufferings, he perfectly understands them because he lives in the hearts of all living beings.

Sometimes sensitive persons observe the sufferings of apparently innocent beings and, confused by the abrahamic cultural influence (denying the concept of reincarnation and karma), blame the all-powerful God for such injustices. Or, misunderstanding the concept of reincarnation and karma, and not knowing the Vedic principles of governance and the duties for the various categories of human beings, they feel that blaming the victims for their sufferings is nothing but a cruel joke and a justification of the unethical behaviors of those who cause damage to others. The truth of the facts is that there is no justification whatsoever for aggression and unethical actions, and each and every arya, or civilized person belonging to the Vedic society, has the duty to step in and make the aggression stop, with whatever means the situation requires. Kṣatriyas are particularly suited to this job, and therefore they are expected to fulfill this responsibility by carefully, dispassionately and wisely, applying the exact amount of force and strategy to protect the victims - without considering whether their sufferings are due to their previous karma or not. Giving spiritual instructions to the victims about their karmic problems is certainly not the job of the kṣatriyas; gentle brahmanas can step in later, when the aggression has been averted or stopped, and compassionately help the victims overcome the shock and come to terms with the facts in a positive and progressive way.

मया ततमिदं सर्वं जगदव्यक्तमूर्तिना । मत्स्थानि सर्वभूतानि न चाहं तेष्ववस्थितः ॥ ९-४ ॥

mayā tatamidaṁ sarvaṁ jagadavyaktamūrtinā | matsthāni sarvabhūtāni na cāhaṁ teṣvavasthitaḥ || 9-4 ||

maya: by me; tatam: pervaded; idam: this; sarvam: all; jagat: world/ universe/ people/ beings; avyakta: non-manifested; murtina: by the form; mat-sthāni: situated in me; sarva-bhūtāni: in all beings/ in all existences; na: not; cā: and; aham: I; tesu: in them; avasthitaḥ: situated/ contained.

"All this universe is pervaded by me in my non-manifested form. All beings exist in me, but I am not in them."

In this verse Krishna is briefly explaining what Krishna Consciousness is.

The sum total of the consciousness of all the beings and life conditions and existences in the universe is only a part of Krishna's Consciousness, as it corresponds with the Brahman and Paramatma consciousness. Krishna is also the Consciousness of Bhagavan, that is the origin and foundation of them all (brahmano hi pratisthaham, 14.27, aham sarvasya prabhavaḥ, 10.8, sarvasya hr̥di sannivistho 15.5).

The expression avasthitaḥ ("not contained", "not limited") specifically says that Krishna Consciousness is greater than the consciousness of all beings together. All beings exist in this supreme Consciousness, but the supreme Consciousness is not limited to them. Another extremely interesting expression in this verse is avyakta murti, "non-manifested form". This may look like a contradiction in terms, because a form is usually considered as "manifested"... if something is not manifested, how can it have a form? The answer is that the Sanskrit words vyakta and avyakta, or "manifested" and "non-manifested" have a more complex significance that applies respectively to the ordinary material manifestation and to the eternal spiritual existence, that both have forms. The difference is that the spiritual form is made of consciousness, and therefore it is perfectly directed by intelligence and deliberation. This means it is eternal (non subject to change), full of knowledge and bliss; it is the ideal form, a sort of conceptual blue print of reality, that becomes visible when the observer is properly tuned in with the appropriate vibrational frequency of awareness. As Krishna says in Gita, when he has "divine eyes" (dīnya cakṣu, 11.8). On the other hand the vyakta form is a temporary and circumscribed form expressed through the universal laws of material nature, from the smallest living being to the immense Virata rupa that includes the entire material universe itself.

In this verse, Krishna says that the vyakta form of the Virata rupa is pervaded by the avyakta form of the Supreme Consciousness - just like the individual consciousness of the jivatman pervades the entire body. This is the important correspondence between microcosm and macrocosm: "as above, so below". For this reason, the teachings of Bhagavad gita start with the knowledge of the nature of the atman compared to the material body that constitutes its vehicle and house.

Also the Mahabharata, in the Vishnu sahasra nama (Mahabharata, dana dharma parva, 189) lists the name amurtiman, "who has no form", in the same passage together with the apparently contradictory names visvamurti ("whose form is the universe"), mahamurti ("the great/ greatest form"), diptamurti ("radiant form"), anekamurti ("innumerable forms"), satamurti ("hundreds of forms"), as well as avyakta. This rather difficult concept, of the "form of the formless", has created a famous controversy between two different perspectives of the same Transcendental Reality in regard to the existence of the material manifestation - whether it is a transformation of God (parinama) or a delusional perception (vivarta).

Parinama vadis and vivarta vadis have been debating for a rather long time, just like the various proponents of the siddhantas ("conclusions") called advaita ("non-dualism" or "monism") and dvaita ("dualism"), generally described as "impersonalists" and "personalists" respectively. Here is the origin of the long controversy between the supporters of the advaita ("non-dual") philosophy and the dvaita ("dual") philosophy. Actually the contradiction between the two perspectives is simply due to a lack of understanding of the subject. If we sincerely want to understand the tattva, we must follow the path of the mahajanas (mahajano yena gataḥ sab panthah, Mahabharata, vana parva 313.117), the great acharyas, who have elaborated on this problem to help us overcome the limitations of the dualistic material logic.

Adi Shankara has explained the nature of Brahman simply as advaita, "non dual", which is amply confirmed also in Bhagavad gita and Upanishads. The great acharyas who appeared later have continued by presenting the same Knowledge in perspectives that are slightly different from each other, so that we can have a vision that is as multi-dimensional as possible. Ramanuja, who appeared some hundreds of years after Adi Shankara, proposed the vision called visista advaita, "non-duality characterized by variety". More than one century later, Madhva presented his perspective called visista dvaita, "duality with variety", that constitutes an extreme vision, at the opposite side of the kevala advaita ("pure and simple non-duality"). The perspectives called dvaita advaita or "simultaneous duality and non-duality" and suddha dvaita or "spiritual duality" have been presented respectively by Nimbarka and Visnusvami, the other two acharyas that are most famous for their teachings on Vedanta.

Still more recently we find Chaitanya's perspective, defined as acintya bhedabheda, or "inconceivable simultaneous diversity and non-diversity (or duality and non-duality)" that rightly puts the issue of Brahman realization on a level that goes beyond mere intellectualism. In fact, Chaitanya preached the primary importance of bhakti, devotion towards the Supreme Brahman in its forms of Paramatma and Bhagavan, that enables us to cross the abyss of intellectual elaborations beyond which we can find the pure perception of Reality. It is important to understand that according to the perspective of the genuine acharyas, the differences of opinions expressed in their commentaries are meant to offer a variety of perspectives (darshana) on the same reality (tattva), that are not in competition between themselves, but rather should help us to widen our field of understanding by reconciling apparent differences, exactly like the statements of the various genuine scriptures. Of course this applies only to the teachings of the realized souls, not to the mental speculations of those "empirical" philosophers that are simply grappling for answers or want to establish their beliefs in a dogmatic form, as an "absolute truth", considered as such only because it destroys other truths by stamping them as falseness a priori because they are presented by the "opponents".

न च मत्स्थानि भूतानि पश्य मे योगमैश्वरम् । भूतभृन्न च भूतस्थो ममात्मा भूतभावनः ॥ ९-५ ॥

na ca matsthāni bhūtāni paśya me yogamāiśvaram । bhūtabhṛnna ca bhūtastho mamātmā bhūtabhāvanah ॥ 9-5 ॥

na: not; mat-sthani: situated in me; bhutan: living beings/ states of being; pasya: look; me: my; yogam: of yoga; aisvaram: control/ glory/ power/ opulence; bhuta-bhrit: the support/ sustenance of all beings; na: not; ca: and; bhuta-sthab: in the being/ (material) existence; mama: my; atma: the Atman/ the Self; bhuta-bhavanab: the origin of (all) being/ existence.

"(At the same time) the beings are not in me. See my divine yoga! I maintain/ support/ create/ contain all existences/ beings, but I am not contained in the various beings, (because/ although) I am myself the source/ creation of all beings."

In the previous verse Krishna said, "all beings are in me, but I am not limited to them". Now he is saying, "I am distinct from these beings" and "these beings are not necessarily conscious of me". By applying the two meanings of bhuta as "living beings" and "conditions of being", we can expand the elaborations on the significance of this verse without any contradictions.

The avyakta murti of Krishna is not directly engaged or concerned in this material universe, as everything is done automatically through the laws of nature. Contrarily to what some people think, God is not some old dude living in the clouds that spends all his time watching what people are doing, to reward those who are faithful to him and punish those who are not. What is he doing then? He lives in the spiritual dimension, where the consciousness is focused on loving exchanges, and is engaged in attracting all souls. Therefore the name Krishna is sometimes associated with the root karsh, that means "attracting", and translated as "the all-attractive". From the same root comes the name Sankarshana, that is also applied to the principle of gravitation as the most important powers in the universe - immediately after the Consciousness. It is also interesting to note that the color black, described in connection with Krishna's complexion, is the sum total of all colors, the most concentrated form of the power in the universe, as in the black holes - the most mysterious objects contemplated by scientists.

The expression bhuta-sthab means "staying within the beings", while bhuta-bhrit means "supporting the beings", and bhuta-bhavana "causing the existence of the beings". Bhagavata Purana (1.11.38) confirms, etad isanam isasya prakriti-stho api tad gunaih, na yujyate sada atma-sthah yatha buddhib tad-asraya, "Although the Lord is situated in his nature, he is never affected by her qualities, and similarly also the devotees who take shelter of that intelligence remain unaffected by matter."

The expression yogam aisvaram is very interesting. It will be used again in 11.8 to refer to the vision of the universal form, or the form of the universal consciousness, when Krishna tells Arjuna that he is going to show him. One could translate it as "mystic opulence", but this does not help us to understand why Krishna speaks about yoga as the connection between him and the devotee, also considering that almost as often the same version translates yoga as "devotional service". In previous chapters and verses, Krishna has always used the word yoga with reference to the sadhana and meditation that the individual jivatman performs with the purpose of attaining a higher level of consciousness, or more specifically to "unite" with the universal Consciousness. In fact the word yoga is mentioned so many times in Bhagavad gita that generally Gita is considered the most important text on yoga, even more important than the famous Yoga sutras of Patanjali. The various approaches or limbs (angas) of this yoga practice have been described as buddhi, karma, sankhya etc. Here we see that Krishna is applying the same definition to himself, and later (11.4, 11.9, 18.74) Krishna will be called Yogesvara, "the Lord of Yoga". This greatly expands our understanding of the concept of yoga, and takes us one step closer to the actual Krishna Consciousness.

The expression pasya me, "look at me", "see me", is particularly important in this verse as Krishna is explaining the darsana or darshana, the "vision of Reality" of which so many perspectives exist. This is why the name of Darshana is used to refer to the six most important philosophical schools in the Vedic tradition, i.e. Nyaya (the science of logic), Yoga (control of body and mind), Sankhya (analytical philosophy), Vaisesika (cosmology and physics), Purva mimamsa (commentaries to the Kalpa sutra), and Uttara mimamsa (also known as Vedanta sutra).

यथाकाशस्थितो नित्यं वायुः सर्वत्रगो महान् । तथा सर्वाणि भूतानि मत्स्थानीत्युपधारय ॥ ९-६ ॥

yathākāśasthito nityam vāyuh sarvatrago mahān | tathā sarvāṇi bhūtāni matsthānītyupadhāraya || 9-6 ||

yatha: just like; akasa: in space/ ether; sthitah: situated; nityam: constantly; vayuh: the air; sarvatra-gah: that goes everywhere; mahan: great; tatha: similarly; sarvani: all; bhutan: beings/ existences; mat-sthani: situated in me; iti: thus; upadharaya: (you should) try to understand.

"Understand that just like air is always (present) in space although it blows everywhere as the great (winds), similarly all the beings are situated in me."

The example presented by Krishna in this verse is particularly significant. We should really make an effort to try to deeply understand it, as Krishna is explicitly requesting.

The material element called akasa or akash is often translated as "ether", a definition that most people are unable to understand, because it is not in their normal experience. Most people just do not bother to understand: they content themselves with mechanically repeating or "chanting" the Vedic texts, not unlike ignorant parrots, with the intention of acquiring some personal benefit called religious merits, or a good position in society, name and fame, respect from the neighbors, or even monetary profit. However, this is not what Krishna asks.

Krishna very clearly says, upadharaya, "make a sincere effort to understand these things", because simple mechanical recitation is not sufficient. Mere mechanical recitation it is like carrying a load of books on one's back: it is certainly a meritorious activity because in this way the books are preserved from oblivion and from the attacks of the asuras - who always try to destroy the visible manifestations of genuine spiritual knowledge - but it does not do much good to one's personal realization and cultivation of knowledge. If your children merely carried their textbooks up and down to school without ever reading them, you would certainly understand why they are failing their exams and you would want to teach them the proper method to study. A genuine guru must do the same with his/ her disciples: if s/he is not doing that, you should start to worry and seek for alternative options.

The word "etheric" or "sub-etheric" belongs to the advanced study of physics, as well as to the ancient vision of the world popular in various cultures. The average ordinary people, on the other hand, will more likely understand "ether" as the volatile flammable liquid formerly used as anesthetic and presently used as solvent and reagent.

In several ancient cultures, the definition of "ether" was explained as the element filling all the space in the universe, beyond the atmosphere of the earthly planet; this idea was also shared later by Gnostics and Rosicrucians, Alchemists, and other secret groups that continued to cultivate knowledge in medieval times in spite of the cruel and relentless persecutions they were subjected to. In more recent times, Theosophists Helena Blavatsky, Annie Besant and Charles Webster Leadbeater described it as the fourth of the planes of existence in their cosmology (beyond solid, liquid and gaseous). This view was presented also by Alice Bailey, Rudolf Steiner and Walter John Kilner, and became an object of study in Victorian physics as Luminiferous aether, the medium that supports the movement of light and electromagnetic radiations. In the 20th century the concept was considered controversial and its existence "disproved", also because in the late 1880s the famous Nikola Tesla had used it to formulate the Unidirectional Pulses fractioning electricity into etheric energy as spatially distributed voltage, which is the primary operating principle of his Magnifying Transmitter, a truly revolutionary device that seems to be producing electricity from space itself or better from ether, that he described as a fluid dynamic structure similar to crystal but infinitely subtler.

With this understanding of the expression akasa stha in this verse, referred to vayuh mahan that is described as sarvatra-go, we can better elaborate on the mystic connection between Krishna and the various beings in the universe. The expression vayu mahan is also very interesting. The adjective mahan, related for example to the expression mahat tattva, refers to the sum total of the manifestations of the air element, not simply to ordinary gases, otherwise it would not be called sarvatra go ("that goes everywhere").

In Vedic literature, the word vayu is often applied to the prana, that "life air" that circulates within the body at a subtler level than the ordinary air we breathe. Prana runs within the subtle energy channels called nadis (sometimes mistranslated as "nerves") and in the chakras (that can be detected only by instruments similar to the Kirlian camera, photographing the aura of living organisms), where obviously there is no gas - oxygen or others. So both these realities in the universe - akasa and vayu - are extremely subtle and all-pervading, although sometimes they cannot be perceived by our ordinary senses. This makes them excellent comparison terms for Bhagavan and Atman respectively. Also, both elements - akasa and vayu - never really touch the various objects and qualities in this universe, although they are really deeply connected to each other, and vayu cannot exist without akasa. Vayu can temporarily associate with them and therefore acquire temporary qualities such as smell, color (due to smoke or dust) etc, but akasa is never touched by them and never even comes in contact with them (asanga) even though it pervades everything. Another interesting point is that in the process of the manifestation of the mahat tattva, akasa generates vayu, which in turn generates the next element, and so on. Since the mode of this generation is sound (abda), we can understand how this example offered by Krishna can apply to the connection of the jivatmas with paramatma and brahman through the original sound, the pranava omkara, the syllable Om. We have already mentioned how the Upanishads and other important Vedic texts refer to the pranava omkara as the Atman itself, the origin of the jivatman and its final destination.

सर्वभूतानि कौन्तेय प्रकृतिं यान्ति मामिकाम् । कल्पक्षये पुनस्तानि कल्पादौ विसृजाम्यहम् ॥ ९-७ ॥

sarvabhūtāni kaunteya prakṛtiṁ yānti māmikām | kalpakṣaye punastāni kalpādaū visṛjāmyaham || 9-7 ||

sarva-bhutanī: all the beings/ existences; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); prakṛitim: into nature; yanti: they go; māmikām: my; kalpa-kṣaye: at the end of the kalpa; punah: again; tani: them (those same); kalpa: of the kalpa; adau: at the beginning; visṛjami: I manifest; aham: I.

"O son of Kunti (Arjuna), all beings enter my prakṛiti at the end of the kalpa, and again at the beginning of the (next) kalpa I manifest them."

This thread of discussion already started in 8.16, answering Arjuna's question on how to remember God at the time of death, and Krishna said that death and rebirth are a normal occurrence in the material world - even at the level of Brahma. Then verse 8.17 started to illustrate the duration of the kalpa, the day of Brahma, that lasts 1000 cycles of yugas each. Verses 8.18 and 8.19 were very similar to 9.7: "At the beginning of each day what was avyakta (non-manifested) becomes vyakta (manifested) and at the beginning of the night (everything) returns into non-manifestation; all classes of beings continue to appear and disappear automatically with the cycle of day and night."

There Krishna explained how the yogi can choose the sukla path or the krishna path, respectively called "the path of non-return" and "the path of return" to the earthly planet. In this verse the discussion returns to the cycle of manifestation and non-manifestation of all beings, that always remain in God at all times like air remains in space. So what is actually changing with the manifestation and non-manifestation of beings?

The answer to this question is "form". Any material or spiritual form is manifested by prakṛiti, nature, the feminine principle within God that is called the Mother Goddess. Vishnu or Krishna contains both sides - the feminine and the masculine - therefore Vedic scriptures and Tradition always highlight the importance of worshipping God together with his Shakti. When the Mother Goddess is not personally visible as Lakshmi, Bhu or Nila, Radha, Sita, etc, it is the name Sri or the very form (mūpa) of the Deity that represent the Mother Goddess and makes God perceivable. Prakriti is not necessarily illusory, and illusion is not necessarily contrary to the benefit of the jīvatman, or conducive to materialistic consciousness.

The delusion of material identification and attachments is caused by mahamaya, "the great illusion", that encompasses even Brahma himself, the creator of this universe (mūhyanti surayah, Bhagavata Purana, 1.1.1). On the other hand, the particular type of illusion that enables us to have a direct personal relationship with Bhagavan - the sum total of Existence - is called yogamaya, "the illusion for union". This is called bahiranga shakti, or "external power", and are identified with Mother Durga, who can either bless the living being with pure devotion (prema bhakti) or shackle him/her with material delusion (ahankara and mamatva). Durga also manifests in many other forms and names by which the one Mother Goddess is known and worshiped. A secondary manifestation of Durga is the pradhana or mahat tattva, from which all the material elements (bhuta) are created, specifically the pancha maha-bhuta (ether, air, fire, water and earth) and the subtle bhutas (material identification, intelligence and mind) that compose the material bodies. This material nature is called apara prakriti, or "non-supreme nature". Another manifestation of prakriti is the antaranga shakti, or "internal power", that manifests the spiritual forms according to the particular rasa or lila expressed and felt by Bhagavan. In this modality we find Radha, who expresses the most intimate form of Krishna's feelings and activities in madhurya rasa, and Lakshmi, who expresses the glorious opulence of Vishnu's feelings and activities in aisvarya rasa. Radha and Lakshmi manifest all the forms and core personalities (called akshara in 15.16) respectively in the dimensions called Goloka and Vaikuntha by the vaishnava bhakti literature.

The ordinary jīva-atmans, or anu-atmans, are called tathastva shakti, or "marginal power". They are part of the brahmajyoti ("the spiritual light") of Bhagavan or Paramatman, and get the opportunity to develop a fully functional spiritual body (siddha deha or siddha svarūpa) through the evolution of their consciousness. Ultimately, these jīva atmans become nitya siddha or akshara "in the following of" one of the original core personalities in Goloka or Vaikuntha and function as their expansions, friends, servants or associates. They will never return to the material level, and the original core personalities of the spiritual world will never fall to a material level, either. The idea that someone has fallen from Goloka is therefore unfounded.

The controversy over the origin of the jīva atmans or anu atmans can be easily clarified by understanding that the Paramatman, from whose jyoti the anu atmans are created, is also a form of Vishnu, although he appears in the material world as Purusha avatara or Kshirodakasayi Vishnu. This specific form of Vishnu resides in Dhruvaloka, the polar star, that is also called Prapancika Vaikuntha, "almost Vaikuntha", or maybe we could say "the Consulate of Vaikuntha". This is the place where Brahma comes to pray Vishnu for help when the management of the universe becomes difficult; this is where the four Kumaras arrived and had a clash with the two doorkeepers Jaya and Vijaya; this is where Durvasa Muni, Bhrigu Muni and all the other Rishis and Devas come when they want to meet Vishnu. From this place one can definitely return to the material world, either with a confused consciousness or with the sacred, pure and deliberate act of descending among conditioned souls for a mission of deliverance. Into this form of Vishnu all the beings are absorbed at the end of the kalpa, the day of Brahma. At the end of the life of Brahma, however, the entire universe is withdrawn back into the body of Karanodakasayi Vishnu (including Kshirodakasayi Vishnu and Garbhodakasayi Vishnu) for the time of one of his inhalations. This complete dissolution is mentioned in Bhagavata purana 12.4.5-6 (dvi parardhe tvatikerante brahmanah paramesthinah tada prakritayah sapta kalpante pralayaya vai, esa prakritiko rajan pralayo yatra liyate anda-kośas tu sanghato vighata upasadiṣṭe sanghata), where it is said that all the elements are fused into the universal egg (anda kośa) which is then reabsorbed by Vishnu.

प्रकृतिं स्वामवष्टभ्य विसृजामि पुनः पुनः । भूतग्राममिमं कृत्स्नमवशं प्रकृतेर्वशात् ॥ ९-८ ॥

prakṛtiṁ svāmaṣṭabhya viśṛjāmi punaḥ punaḥ । bhūtagrāmamimam kṛtsnamavaśam prakṛtervaśāt ॥ 9-8 ॥

prakritim: nature; svam: own; avastabhya: by entering; visrijami: I manifest/ I create; punah punah: again and again; bhuta-gramam: the categories of beings/ the aggregate of beings; imam: these; kṛtsnam: completely; avasam: without control/ controlled automatically; prakriteh: by nature; vasat: under the control.

"Entering my own prakriti, I repeatedly manifest (create), the entire sum total of all beings, that is automatically under the power of prakriti."

The word visrijami ("I manifest") is interesting because it applies to the manifestation of the beings from the Lord, while in 4.7 a similar (but not identical) word, srijami, applied to the manifestation of the avatara or the visible form of God within this world. The prefix vi used in the construction of Sanskrit words is a shortened form of viśesa ("differentiation") or vigata ("devoid of") and can indicate specificity, difference, a practical function, application (as in viñāna), separation, absence, also in a negative sense (as in the word vikarma, "bad actions"). In this case, vi brings the meaning of "separate manifestation" as applied to the material phenomena, as opposed to the spiritual manifestation of the avatars that are not separate or different from the original Personality of Godhead. The word avastabhya means "controlling, leaning, resting, initiating, igniting, entering", and it indicates the act of will, the resolution to perform an action, also called kratu or sankalpa. This kratu (will power) is one of the fundamental factors of success in action, together with dakṣha (skill), manisha (inspiration) and medha (wisdom). Chandogya Upanishad (6.2.3) expresses this act of will (sa kratum kurvīta) with the famous aphorism eko bahū syam, "I will become many". In this verse Krishna continues to explain the creation of the various beings or conditions of being within the material universe, that happens simultaneously, for all species of life, although during the long period of manifestation of the universe some species may appear or disappear (evolve or become extinct) due to temporary circumstances.

The expression prakṛite vasat means, "under the control of prakṛiti", indicating that nature is the active principle of the manifestation, development and dissolution of the beings - both the living entities and the conditions of being - without the direct participation of the puruṣha. In other words, "Mother is the Boss." In the previous commentaries we have already given some explanation about the meaning of prakṛiti, and this verse gives us the opportunity to elaborate more.

The fundamental concept in Vedic culture, dharma, expresses the ideal of harmony and selfless cooperation for the support, prosperity and progress of the collectivity. All the members of society are expected to work together seamlessly, like the various limbs of one single body, described in the famous Puruṣa sukta hymn (3.14-15, Svetasvatara Upanishad). It is not easy for western conventional academia to understand this concept, because for many centuries western society has been poisoned by the asuric attitude of inequality and exploitation, that created the hostility between social classes and even between genders. The natural condition of human life is ideally shaped by the individual tendencies, qualities and skills (4.13) for the division of work. In all societies or human groups there are individuals who have a greater inclination to acquire knowledge and a greater capacity to understand things: these are called intellectuals and are compared to the head of the social body. Similarly, those who are inclined to defend others, and have the strength to do so, are called warriors and are compared to the arms. Those who are unable to perform these functions can at least provide the material necessities of life, take care of good animals and cultivate useful plants, and supply functional tools and objects: these are called merchants or entrepreneurs, and are compared to the belly of the social body. Those who are only able to follow orders and depend on others for their sustenance are called laborers, and are compared to the legs and feet, that carry the others around and carry out the directions of their employers.

Similarly, by natural arrangement women are structured to give birth and nurture children, educate them and train them in the basic social skills and ethical values, and therefore they tend to take care of the home as the environment where the children can live safely and happily. Ordinarily, as "queen of the house", the woman watches over the cooking of the food, the ministration of water, the necessities of all the family members, and the service of the family Deities - all activities that can be easily woven into a good home caring schedule. According to this arrangement and task division, the man of the family has the duty to provide whatever is available outside the house, such as food provisions and other things, according to his abilities.

Like in the natural society, in Vedic society there is no competition for power and no exploitation of one member by another, and no strict limitations in regard to the roles: young women who have no children can choose to engage in activities that are not connected with children and home-making, and even mothers can leave their children in the care of responsible persons and join their husbands in their activities if they so desire. There is ample evidence that such choices are (or were) perfectly respected and even admired, and not only in times of emergency. However, because there is no competition or hostility between the genders (or the classes), individuals could engage in the activities they were naturally able and happy to perform, for the benefit of the collectivity and not to demonstrate something to themselves or to others, or to gain a modicum of dignity or respect or freedom, or some power over their own lives. On the other hand, such problems are very evident in societies shaped and governed according to the sociology models created by mainstream academic authorities.

The original Vedic society is not patriarchal or matriarchal, simply because there is no opposition between men and women: just like in the Godhead, the masculine side and the feminine side are one harmonious unit, and their diversity is functional simply for the increase of the pleasure of both, as in a dance or in intercourse. In the same way, brahmanas and śhatrīyas do not try to rule one over the other, but simply share the responsibilities towards society and work according to their abilities, in a selfless way (2.47) as Krishna explains very clearly in Bhagavad gita. When everyone works with the same purpose and motivation, and tasks are distributed according to functionality and actual abilities, the members of the group are not concerned about power games, petty interests and selfishness, personal gains and losses, position, hierarchy, bureaucracy, etiquette, definitions of rights and duties, prejudice, conventional expectations, conformism, imposed conformity to roles or the other artificial devices that create problems in contemporary societies. They just work together, as a family, as a team, for a common purpose.

As microcosmic manifestation of the macrocosm, or "part and parcel of God", each human being has a feminine side and a masculine side, incarnated in the two hemispheres of the brain that control the two halves of the body. The prevalence of one of the two energies in the subtle body of the individual at the time of birth determines which gender the body will be - boy or girl. Sometimes the two energies are more balanced or indecisive, and thus the individual develops with a detached mental disposition, or a "trans-sexual" tendency. In any case, the purpose of yoga consists in learning how to balance these two hemispheres perfectly and uniting the two energies in the Sacred Marriage within one's own body, with the purpose to overcome duality and the feeling of need and dissatisfaction that naturally comes with it. This ha-tha yoga ("the union of the masculine and feminine") is the practice of balance in one's identification, and is connected to the realization of Brahman; while materialistically imbalanced people see the world of duality as a fighting arena, where "one side" must fight viciously to prevail and dominate "the other side", because they project their imbalances on the external reality. Thus the problem expands into society and negatively impacts the minds of other people, reinforcing the vicious circle and creating male chauvinism and extreme feminism - just like it creates extreme totalitarian political ideologies that equally cause sufferings and damage to human beings, even if they appear to have opposite theories on how to achieve perfection in society.

न च मां तानि कर्माणि निबध्नन्ति धनञ्जय । उदासीनवदासीनमसक्तं तेषु कर्मसु ॥ ९-९ ॥

na ca mām tāni karmāṇi nibadhnanti dhanañjaya । udāsīnavadāsīnamasaktam teṣu karmasu ॥ 9-9 ॥

na: not/ never; ca: and; mām: me; tāni: them/ these; karmāṇi: activities; nibadhnanti: bind; dhanañjaya: o conqueror of wealth (Arjuna); udāsīna-vat: in a neutral position; asīnam: situated; asaktam: detached; teṣu: in those; karmasu: activities.

"O Dhananjaya, I am not bound by such actions, as I am situated neutrally, without any attraction for such activities."

As we were explaining in the previous commentary, Bhagavan is not directly involved in the process of creation, maintenance and dissolution of the universe, in the manifestation of the beings, and in their control and education, because that is the work of the Prakriti: Mother is the Boss. As exemplified by the symbolic representation of Mother Kali that stands on Shiva's body, Prakriti is the principle of action, while Purusha is the principle of consciousness or feeling. This is confirmed in 13.21 (karya-karana-kartrive hetuh prakritir ucyate, purushah sukha-dubkhanam bhoktrive hetur ucyate) and applies both to the individual purusha and to the supreme purusha. Even more clearly, 3.27 says that only a vimudha believes he is performing the action, while in fact it is the prakriti that does everything. Again, 13.32 repeats that the Paramatman, the Supreme Purusha, does not take part in any activity and simply remains as a witness, an advisor and a friendly helper to the individual soul directing him/ her on the path to realization (anaditvan nirgunatvat paramatmayam anyayah, sarira-stho 'pi kaunteya na karoti na lipyate). In 4.14 Krishna clearly said so: na mam karmani limpanti na me karma-phale spriha, iti mam yo 'bhijanati karmabhir na sa badhyate.

The expression udasina vat, "sitting like a neutral (observer)" is very clear in this regard. Mundaka Upanishad (3.1.1) gives the example of the two birds, inseparable friends, that are sitting on the same tree. One is busy eating the fruits and the other is just sitting and watching, but is always ready to illuminate his friend and offer him the perfect satisfaction of all desires on the level of the consciousness. Because real happiness can be attained only on the level of the consciousness, not through the contact of the senses with the material sense objects. The Lord is called aptakama, "one whose desires are all fulfilled" from the very beginning, and the path to happiness for the individual atman leads inwards, into the atman itself (2.41, 2.45, 2.55, 3.17, 3.43, 4.41, 5.26, 6.5, 6.10, 6.15, 6.18, 6.19, 6.20, 6.25, 6.26, 6.28, 6.29, 6.32, 7.18, 12.11, 13.25, 13.29, 14.25, 15.11).

The example of the etheric space supporting air offered in 9.6 will be repeated in 13.33 to reiterate that neither the individual purusha nor the supreme purusha are really touched by the material influences and activities. The same point was also stated in 5.14 where it was said that all actions are performed by nature only. Consequently, the Lord is not concerned by the actions or the merits of the individual souls, but with their consciousness. (5.15, 9.29) and specifically with their efforts to unite with the universal Consciousness. Of course, the fact that Bhagavan is not directly involved or attached to the manifestation of the beings does not mean that he is not conscious of them: actually, Bhagavan is the supreme Consciousness, and therefore he knows very well everything - every situation, every action, every thought and every feeling of all beings in the past, in the present and in the future. This is the Universal Consciousness, and it is characterized by the same qualities of consciousness manifested in the microcosm: intelligence, identity, personality, will power, relationships, compassion, and so on.

In fact, Bhagavan is rasa, "sentiment", or "taste", as stated in the Upanishads: yad vai tat sukritam raso vai sah, rasam hy evayam labdhva anandi bharati, ko hy evanyat kah pranyat, yad esa akasa anando na syat esa hy eva anandayati (Taittiriya Upanishad 2.7). Rasa and ananda are strictly connected, and they are the purpose that every fragment of God is trying to attain, the ultimate Reality that transcends the world of changes. Because the Supreme Consciousness is sat (eternity), cit (awareness) and ananda (happiness), he is not attracted or interested in the changes of the world. Even the embodied soul can lose interest in the objects of the world when he is tasting actual happiness (vishaya vinivartante niraharasya dehinah rasa-varjam raso 'py asya param drishtva nivartate, 2.59).

The Vishnu Purana explains the Transcendental Reality of sac-cid-ananda as connected to the attributes of bladini sandhini samvit, the threefold manifestation of the one para prakriti (bladini sandhini samvit tvayi eka sarva-samsraye) while the material duality of joy and sorrow (blada tapa kari mishra) does not affect him (tvayi no guna-varjita) because they belong to the bahiranga shakti, the external manifestation of the Prakriti. The Upanishads clearly state that Bhagavan, the Supreme Consciousness, has many shaktis that are in charge of all the activities: na tasya karyam karanam ca vidyate, na tat-samas cabhyadbikas ca dryate, parasya saktir vividhaiva smyate, svabhaniki jnana-bala-kriya ca (Svetasvatara Upanishad 6.7–8). These energies are also known as jnana, bala and kriya, or "knowledge", "strength" and "duty/ action".

Krishna calls Arjuna dhananjaya, "conqueror of wealth", to remind him that he collected tributes from other kings during the asvamedha yajna, but not for selfish purposes: those resources were meant to finance the protection of the kingdom. Each individual has a task in society according to the guna and karma, and such task is called "duty": the activities performed are therefore determined by the nature of each individual and carried out by that same nature, that same shakti that consists of determination (will power), strength (physical and mental), and intelligence (wisdom, knowledge etc). What is the individual purusha's responsibility, then, if everything is done by the prakriti?

The purusha can modify his/her own level of consciousness, which will bring him/her under the shelter of a different function of prakriti: either the material consciousness or the spiritual consciousness; sattva rather than rajas or tamas; bhakti rather than ahankara. Everything else will fall into place through the action of nature.

मयाध्यक्षेण प्रकृतिः स्यूते सचराचरम् । हेतुनानेन कौन्तेय जगद्विपरिवर्तते ॥ ९-१० ॥

mayādhyaṁśeṇa prakṛtiḥ sūyate sacarācaram । hetunānena kaunteya jagadviparivartate ।। 9-10 ।।

maya: by me; adhyakṣeṇa: by the instruction/ direction; prakṛtiḥ: nature; sūyate: manifests/ gives birth; sa: together with; cara: those that move; acaram: those that do not move; hetuna: for the purpose; anena: this; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); jagad: the world; viparivartate: goes around/ keeps working.

"O son of Kunti (Arjuna), under my order this prakriti manifests all things, both moving and non-moving; by this cause the universe revolves/ functions/ is created cyclically."

After clearly explaining that all actions are performed by prakriti and all beings are manifested automatically under the control of prakriti herself, Krishna states that such manifestation happens under the direction of the consciousness - the purusha. We should remember here that the individual purusha can be manifested either in a male or in a female body: still it remains a purusha. Here we also need to remember that the purusha is the consciousness (feelings, sentiments etc) while prakriti is the instrument or medium for action. Consciousness gives the direction for the manifestation of the action through the prakriti: therefore Bhagavan is the supreme controller, and similarly the individual soul is responsible for his/ her choices - if not in the short run, certainly in the long run, because even the influence of the gunas and karma that determine our present choices can be modified by the action of consciousness through the proper application of the will power, strength (or effort) and dutiful action (jnana, bala, kriya).

The word adhyakshena includes the meanings of direction, order, supervision, desire, without any direct involvement in the action. Still, this concept is summarized as "control", both at the supreme level and at the individual level. The purusha always has a choice about where to go in the prakriti, but while the Lord is always perfectly liberated and therefore always in control of the prakriti, the individual soul is subject to the power and control of the prakriti (prakriteh vasat 9.8) because of the limited power of his/ her consciousness. So the individual purusha can only choose whether s/he wants to be controlled by the prakriti in the material mode (Mahamaya) or in the spiritual mode (Yogamaya).

The word hetu indicates "cause, reason, purpose", and as an act of the pure consciousness, it triggers the activities of the prakriti and makes the world go round, in the samsara or cycles of creation and dissolution. One of the important questions that a human being can ask is "why all this?"... "what is the purpose of the world?". After the primary question "what am I?", the issue of the purpose of the material manifestation is certainly the most universal and eternal concern of all intelligent persons.

Some ideologies avoid the question by claiming that God's will is mysterious, and that it is impossible to know why he created the universe. So people may conclude that perhaps God was feeling lonely, perhaps he wanted some followers and worshipers, or he just acted on a whim. Some say that it is impossible to know why the universe exists - or that everything happens by chance, by the random combination of elements which in turn were created by chaos from a previously existing matter for whose creation there is no explanation possible. Often these ideologies conclude that the universe is simply a product of lust - the sensual attraction between the male and the female bodies - and is simply meant to fulfill the desire for lust and greed. This asuric mentality (16.8-10) prompts the conditioned souls to exploit and destroy for their own selfish purpose, without caring for others or for some higher or universal purpose. The Vedic version is rather different.

As the original source of the universe is Consciousness (characterized by existence, awareness and happiness as sat cit ananda), the purpose of the cosmic manifestation is to create opportunities for the Consciousness fragments, the jiva atmans or anu atmans, to develop in existence, awareness and happiness. Why, then, we find so much suffering in the universe, if its purpose is the tasting of happiness? The answer is that the world would be a much better place if people simply followed the original map provided with it: learn how to use the universe first by understanding dharma and vidya in theory and practice, then engage in an appropriate and civilized professional occupation in a selfless way, just for the satisfaction of doing a good job: if everybody in society does their part in the proper way, prosperity comes automatically.

After dharma and artha, the third purushartha in this universe is kama: the honest and joyful pursuit of sense gratification; as this pursuit is based on dharmic or ethical foundations, it does not entail sufferings for others and is not damaging for one's body and mind. After having enjoyed life in the fullest possible way, free from guilt and mental deviations or imbalances, a human being naturally engages in the pursuit of the highest possible happiness, found on the platform where one is liberated from all material conditionings. It is true that the nature of this cosmic manifestation is defined as a place of suffering and impermanence, dubkhalayam asavratam (8.15), but ideally this simply refers to the fact that everything in this world has a beginning and an end, and therefore those who are attached to identifications and possessions or affiliations will have to suffer when they lose what they liked and when they get what they do not like - such as heat or cold (2.14, 6.7, 12.18). One should simply learn to tolerate. This does not mean that one should passively accept sufferings without taking action to mitigate or solve it (as many misinformed people think). The endowment of intelligence that comes with the human form of life includes the ingenuity and resourcefulness required to build proper clothing to alleviate the impact of heat and cold, and proper housing where one can live comfortably both in the summer and in the winter. Even the loss of youth or health can and should be counteracted with appropriate methods (as described for example in the Ayur Veda), but it is not possible to completely eliminate old age and disease, or death. Trying to fight them or dominate them will simply bring more and more misery to our lives, individually and collectively.

The impermanence of material conditions is a fundamental characteristic of the material manifestation, and it is meant to push us forward, to improve ourselves, expand our consciousness, and set higher goals and objectives for our existence. Even considering the defect of impermanence, this process is supposed to be joyful, like the blossoming of a flower, or the graduation course of a good university student, or the developing of a good relationship between balanced, caring and responsible persons.

However, man should understand that it is not in his power to stop the cycle of seasons itself. He can mess with it - as he has done, causing dangerous climate changes - but he cannot really dominate it to his advantage. The best thing one can do is to "dovetail" one's own consciousness by tuning it into the supreme Consciousness and working in harmony with it, like a swimmer that decides to follow the current of the river instead of trying to go upstream: in this way we become able to actually enjoy the changes and appreciate summer and winter for their own characteristic qualities and opportunities, rather than trying to fight against them. When we tune in properly, we find out we are able to appreciate what we have when we have it, instead of always thinking about what we do not have.

अवजानन्ति मां मूढा मानुषीं तनुमाश्रितम् । परं भावमजानन्तो मम भूतमहेश्वरम् ॥ ९-११ ॥

avajānanti mām mūḍhā mānuṣīm tanumāśritam | paraṁ bhāvamajānanto mama bhūtamahēśvaram || 9-11 ||

avajananti: they do not recognize; mam: me; mudhab: the fools; manusim: human form; tanum: body; asritam: I take up; param: supreme; bhavam: nature/ birth; ajanantah: (because) they do not know; mama: my; bhuta-mahesvaram: the great Lord that controls all beings/ all existences.

"Fools disregard/ disrespect me when I manifest in a human form. They have no knowledge of my supreme/ transcendental nature as the great Lord of the living beings/ of the existences".

This concept has already been stated in previous verses (7.13, 7.15, 7.24, 7.25, 9.9) and will be repeated later (10.3, 16.20): the lack of intelligence and understanding of the power of Consciousness is due to the influence of ignorance and illusion, that is extremely strong (7.14). It also connects with verse 9.1, where it was stated that only a person who is free from envy (anasya) can come to understand God. In this regard, we would also like to remember the difference between the expression "Supreme Personality of Godhead" and "Supreme Person". The first implies the unity of all personalities as parts of the Supreme Godhead, while the second expression gives the idea of God as merely a bigger and more powerful person among many other independent, separated and different persons - something like the "monotheism" that says that there is a good God who must be made the winner and many other bad gods that must be defeated because they are manifestation of the "supreme bad god" called Satan.

Many people influenced by academic secularism tend to believe that Krishna was simply a great man, and they sometimes describe him as a philosopher and a politician, or a powerful warrior. By this they often mean no disrespect, because they are projecting on him the qualities and abilities they would like to have, and because such descriptions are by comparison much more favorable than the offensive opinions expressed by the opponents of the Vedic tradition. However, we can do much better than that. First of all, one who has really studied and understood the Bhagavad gita will never say that Krishna is an ordinary human being, because the text itself offers many statements to the exact opposite. The concept of Krishna's divinity is also expressed in several other recognized texts, such as the Bhagavata Purana, but Gita is the most effective in this regard. Why? Because it shows Krishna's supreme Consciousness.

Anyone can claim to be a divine Personality and tell some stories on his own childhood miracles (real or imagined), and even get some followers and supporters to invent such stories and circulate them to substantiate the divinity claims. There have also been individuals who have gone to a civil court to get their divine position of avatara certified by the government, but of course all this is very inconclusive to say the least. Materialistic courts have no authority to ascertain the divinity of an individual, and if the popular method to endorse such claims is the "miracle evidence", we should remember that any individual soul can develop mystic powers that can appear miraculous simply through the practice of yoga or magic, or more precisely, through the intimate scientific knowledge of the laws of material nature. Yoga is a very deep and complex science, and "magic" or "miracle" are usually the definitions given by less knowledgeable people for anything they do not really understand.

What really demonstrates Krishna's divinity is the expanse of consciousness he is showing. How can you tell a knowledgeable person from an ignorant fool? Government certificates or court orders, or a large number of followers are not demonstrating anything - but you can immediately recognize the level of consciousness of an individual by what he says. It is said that a fool can remain undetected or even pass for a great divine personality, especially if he has mastered the art of dressing and acting smart, but he can do so only as long as he does not talk, or as long as he is not faced with a difficult choice.

In the Indian folk tradition there is a very popular story about a jackal that had fallen into a dyeing vat and had come out colored in an intense blue. The animals of the forest, amazed by that very unusual sight, asked him who he was, and the jackal replied he was Vishnu. So the naive residents of the jungle accepted him as a divine avatara and worshiped him with all the best they could offer, and the jackal was very careful not to expose himself for what he really was. However, one day one of the animals inadvertently dropped a bone and the jackal foolishly blew his cover by jumping down from his simhasana to catch the bone. The teaching of the story is that external appearances can be very deceiving, and only talk and action can really demonstrate the level of consciousness of a person, and hence his divinity.

The nature/ existence (bhava) of Krishna is called supreme (param) because he can perfectly control (mahesvaram) all states of existence (bhuta). Krishna's body appears just like an ordinary human body (manusim tanum asritam) but it is perfectly controlled and operated by Consciousness, therefore it does not have the limitations of ordinary material bodies. This is why it is called a spiritual body - a body made of consciousness. Many Vedic texts also speak about this special nature of Krishna's body, especially the Bhagavata Purana, that describes the appearance and the activities of Krishna. In verse 3.21.8 we find a description of Vishnu's form as sabda brahma vapuh, "the body composed of spiritual vibrations", and in verses 7.10.48 and 7.15.75 we find, gudham param brahma manusya lingam, "the Supreme Brahman (the Supreme Consciousness) hidden by a human appearance".

The word bhuta is connected to the word bhu, or "earth", therefore it is sometimes translated as yukte kshmad avrite bhutam (Amara kosa dictionary) "whatever is covered by earth", where by "earth" we intend all solid substances that form a body - flesh, bones, etc. However, we can also translate bhu as the earthly platform or dimension of this planetary system, and therefore the word bhuta can be applied to all the embodied living beings that inhabit the earthly plane or dimension. Of course this also applies to the archa vigraha, the Deity of the Lord worshiped in the temple, that can manifest in a form shaped with various earthly materials - gems, stone, metal, wood, clay, sand etc.

The foolish iconoclasts remain unable to understand that the Deity of the Lord is not identical with the form made of earthly materials in which it manifests, and therefore it can be present or absent according to the level of consciousness of the devotee who worships it. Therefore when the iconoclasts disrespect the archa vīgraha of the Godhead, they are not touching the actual form of the Lord at all, but simply the external shell in which it was manifested. They cannot keep God as a prisoner by capturing the statue where the archa vīgraha was worshiped, and certainly they cannot destroy or harm God by destroying or mutilating the statue: simply the divine presence becomes non-manifested in that form.

मोघाशा मोघकर्माणो मोघज्ञाना विचेतसः । राक्षसीमासुरीं चैव प्रकृतिं मोहिनीं श्रिताः ॥ ९-१२ ॥

moghāśā moghakarmāṇo moghajñānā vicetasah | rākṣasīmāsurīm caiva prakṛtiṁ mohinīm śritāḥ || 9-12 ||

mogha-asah: confused in their desires; mogha-karmanah: confused in their actions; mogha-jnanah: confused in their knowledge; vicetasah: devoid of awareness; rakshasim: of the Rakshasas; asurim: of the Asuras; ca: and; iva: certainly; prakritim: the nature; mohinim: confusing; śritah: taking shelter in.

"Entertaining delusional hopes/ desires, engaging in delusional activities, and delusionally convinced of their knowledge, (such people are) confused by incorrect awareness, so they certainly take shelter in the bewildered nature of rakshasas and asuras."

We have already mentioned that the individual soul, that does not have the immense power of the Supreme Consciousness, can only choose whether to take shelter in the spiritual nature or in the material nature. This is confirmed also in verse 7.14 asuram bhavam asritah, "(the evil doers) take shelter in the nature of the Asuras", 9.13 daivim prakritim asritah, "take shelter in the divine nature", and 12.11 mad yogam asritah, "take shelter in my Yogamaya".

Chapter 16 of Bhagavad gita, entitled daivasura sampad vibhaga yoga, will describe more specifically the difference between the daivic and the asuric personalities, by describing their respective characteristics. The asuric qualities are listed as arrogance, pride, selfishness, anger, cruelty and ignorance (16.4) and will further be elaborated with several examples. The words daivi and asuri are usually translated as "divine" and "demoniac", but these definitions may confuse the minds of people who are burdened with abrahamic cultural superimpositions. In abrahamic ideologies - incorrectly classified as "monotheistic" - Jahveh is presented as the "good god" and Satan as the "bad god", so whatever applies to Jahveh is considered "divine" and whatever applies to Satan is "demoniac", especially his servants that are called demons or devils. According to the abrahamic ideology, a human being can never be demoniac unless s/he is possessed by one of this demoniac beings. In such a case, the behavior of the demonically possessed person is simply characterized by a sort of allergy to everything that is connected to the "good god" - especially the Christian symbols such as the cross etc, which are then used to "exorcise the demon" from the human being.

In the Vedic ideology, however, all individual souls are equally divine because they are amsa (parts) of God (15.7), but they can choose to take shelter (i.e. focus, develop, take action) in the daivi prakriti (divine nature) or in the asuri prakriti (asuric nature) - both potentially present in each individual. When the individual chooses to develop divine qualities and activities that support the progress and happiness of the entire universe, the asuric tendencies become harmoniously engaged in the destruction of obstacles. On the other hand, when the individual chooses to develop asuric qualities and activities that are destructive for the progress and happiness of others, the divine tendencies become eclipsed and cannot be seen any more although they still exist - just like the sun or the moon are temporarily covered during an eclipse. There are no devils or demons proper: those that act as such (as for example in the case of so-called "demoniac possession") are simply individual jivatmas that have developed strong asuric tendencies and continue to act in that consciousness even without having a physical body.

The word a-sura is simply the contrary of sura, the definition for the devas that work in the administration of the universe to support the progress and prosperity of all embodied beings. The Rig Veda samhita (1.22.20) says, tad visnoh paramam padam sada pasyanti surayah, "the suras are those who always contemplate the supreme position of Vishnu". The Padma Purana (Patala khand, 111) states, drau bhuta-sargau loke 'smin, daiva asura eva ca, visnu bhaktah smṛto daiva, asuras tad-viparyaya, "In this world there are two types of beings - the devas and the asuras. The devas are those who are serving Vishnu, and the asuras are those who oppose them."

We should be very careful not to misunderstand this statement, because the devas are not simply servants who are loyal to the side of the "good god", for some kind of sectarian or political allegiance. Vishnu is the name of the Supreme Consciousness, the sum total of all Existence, therefore the devas who are serving Vishnu are serving the interests of the entire community of the beings in the universe, while the asuras are merely interested in their own separatist selfish material advantage. This is confirmed by the Satapatha Brahmana (5.1.1.1) with the description of the creation of the asuras: both devas and asuras were born from Brahma, but the asuras immediately decided to serve only their own selfish interests, by placing offerings into their own mouths. Similarly, in his commentary to Bhagavad gita, Madhva writes, asusu rata asurah, "asuras are those who are (only) attached to their selfish gratification".

In various parts of the Vedic literature, asuras are sometimes called Daityas or Danavas, because traditionally the descendants of Diti and Danu (both wives of Kasyapa Rishi, together with their sister Aditi the mother of the devas or Adityas) followed the asuric mentality. However, this is not necessarily always true, because we see for example the great vaishnava devotee Prahlada, son of Hiranyakasipu, direct son of Diti (10.30). There is some difference in the definition of rakshasa, that is often equated to the definition of asura. Specifically, the rakshasas are described as a particular humanoid race that traditionally prefer the conclusions and the behaviors of asuras. The race of the Rakshasas are the descendants of Pulastya Rishi (like Ravana and his brothers), that are endowed with great mystic/ magic powers and are fond of eating human flesh and blood. However, among the Rakshasa people there were/are/ can be also some very good and saintly individuals, such as Vibhishana, Ravana's brother, who was a devotee of Rama. Some historians claim that Devas and Asuras (and Rakshasas etc) were merely different human populations on this earthly planet, that waged war against each other in pre-Vedic times, and the winners got to "write history" with the opportunity to demonize their opponents. There might be some value in such hypothesis, especially considering the Zoroastrian ideology based on the eternal fight between the "good God" Ahura (or Asura) Mazda and the "bad God" Ariman ("the Enemy"); this vision later developed into the abrahamic faiths. However, this theory does not explain why all over the world, in all cultures, there are consistent tales of a race of black magicians with superhuman powers that perfectly fit the Vedic descriptions of Rakshasas. Although a human being can become an asura in this very lifetime, he usually needs to take another birth in order to become a rakshasa. In both such cases, the individual jivatman takes shelter in the asuri prakriti, "the asuric nature" that is based on a confused state of mind, by which one develops strongly dualistic desires (asa) due to ignorance (ajnana) and then acts on them (karmana) because of lack of proper awareness (vi-cetasah). If these jivatmas were properly aware of their actual nature, and of the fundamental connection between all fragments of consciousness, they would never try to pursue selfish gratification to the expenses of other beings.

महात्मानस्तु मां पार्थ दैवीं प्रकृतिमाश्रिताः । भजन्त्यनन्यमनसो ज्ञात्वा भूतादिमव्ययम् ॥ ९-१३ ॥

mahātmanastu mām pārtha daivīm prakṛtimāśritāḥ | bhajantyananyamanaso jñātvā bhūtādimavyayam || 9-13 ||

maha-atmanah: the great souls; tu: but; mam: me; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); daivim: resplendent/ of the devas; prakritim: in the nature; asritah: taking shelter; bhajanti: they worship/ serve; ananya: undivided; manasah: attention/ meditation; jnatva: knowing; bhuta-adim: the origin of (all) existences/ beings; avyayam: imperishable/ eternal.

"However, o son of Pritha (Arjuna), the great souls take shelter in the divine nature and worship/ serve me with undivided attention, knowing that I am the inexhaustible origin of everything/ all beings."

Again this verse proclaims the reason why Krishna is God: he is the sum total of all existences and beings, the Universal Consciousness, from whom everything becomes manifested. Therefore the devas - from the highest creature in the universe, Brahma, to the ordinary human beings who situate themselves in a favorable position in regard to the Universal Consciousness - are those who take shelter in that same nature of sat, cit and ananda that is the nature of the Supreme Brahman. The first verse of the Gopala tapani Upanishad (1.1) proclaims: om sac cid ananda rupaya krishnaya, indicating that the devas worship and serve Krishna as presented in Bhagavad gita. In practice, this means that the individual jivatmas that have taken shelter in the daivi prakriti become mahatmas ("great minds") expanding their consciousness and awareness and becoming free from all selfishness; this is always accompanied by compassion. The exact opposite of mahatma is duratma ("bad mind" or "difficult mind"), a definition that clearly describes the callousness, insensitivity and cruelty of a selfish person, who does not care about the happiness and progress of others. This is why the true brahmana is called bhu-deva, the deva that lives on earth.

The correct way to remain concentrated on this supreme level of Consciousness is the attitude of sincere service (bhajanam) towards the Supreme, that includes all beings and existences and is eternal (bhuta-adim avyayam) - which is precisely the attitude that characterizes the devas. One cannot claim that he is worshipping or serving God and at the same time callously create sufferings to innocent beings in the pursuit of one's selfish material advantage, either individual or collective, because that is the hallmark of the asuric mentality, as we will see later on in chapter 16. The first and most popular meaning of the expression ananya manasah is "with undivided attention/ meditation" because we should not allow any other concern to obstruct our service; only when we have become free from all material "luggage" and distractions, such as material identifications and attachments, we can really engage in devotional service. Another meaning of the expression ananya manasah refers to the fact that the Supreme includes all beings and existences (bhuta-adim), and can be translated as "without any sectarian mentality, without a dualistic illusion". As Krishna himself states in Bhagavad gita, he is the best friend of all living entities (subridam sarva bhutanam, 5.29, isvarah sarva-bhutanam brid-dese tishthati 18.61) and remains present in the hearts of all beings (sarvasya caham hridi sannivisto, 15.15, sarva-bhuta sthitam, 6.31), without considering the merits or demerits of anyone (nadatte kasyacit papam na caiva sukritam, 5.15).

God does not have a single chosen people - neither the Jews nor the Indians - and actually does not care whether one believes in him or not, or even follows his instructions or not. He equally loves and cares for all living beings, that are like his children (aham bija-pradah pita, 14.4), but he does not interfere with their training, schooling and homework, that are entrusted to Mother Nature.

The word tu, "however", connects this verse with the previous verse, where the confused asuras and rakshasas were described. The context says, "Confused people create problems to the universe, but those who have chosen to develop a divine consciousness worship God". This worship and service to Krishna can be perceived and applied at various levels.

The most elementary level consists in learning about Krishna's teachings and recommendations especially in Bhagavad gita and following them, without being distracted by other concerns - fears, attachments, identifications, etc. In daily life, this worship and service takes the form of ritual ceremonies meant to keep our mind focused on the divine consciousness, and the favorable work that supports the universe and is allotted to us as specific duty in accordance to our guna and karma. This is also called bhubh, the "earthly level", that is accessible at present in a relatively easy way. At the intermediate level, the ritual ceremonies become increasingly internalized because we become more clearly aware of our true spiritual nature, therefore we meditate on the Supreme Personality of Godhead in our heart (om tad vishnob paramam padam) and we effectively become instruments (nimitta matra bhava) or bodily parts (anga or amsa) of God. This is also called bhuvah, the level of the existence of the devas that are the limbs or bodily parts of God in this world. At the advanced level, we become situated in the supreme consciousness, called Krishna Consciousness, and our nature becomes totally spiritualized. It is very difficult to speak about this level, because it cannot be expressed through material logic or examples, therefore a person who is still situated on the level of material consciousness and identification can easily misunderstand and misinterpret it. This supreme level can also be called svah, the real identity of the Self, the atman/ brahman, to whom the oblations of the sacrifice are offered.

The expression ananya manasah can similarly be explained at different levels, from the elementary platform on which the sincere devotee invests attention, intelligence, work and desires, to the intermediate platform on which we perceive ourselves as never separated (anya) from the param atman, the Soul of our soul, to the complete union (visate tad anantaram, 18.55) that constitutes the final word in the teachings of Bhagavad gita. It is important to remember that one should be constantly aware of Krishna as the eternal origin of all beings/ existences (or rasas); the superficial and mechanical ritual worship of a sacred form or image is not sufficient, although of course it can slowly accrue the punya or merits/ credits that will ultimately take one to actual spiritual life.

सततं कीर्तयन्तो मां यतन्तश्च दृढव्रताः । नमस्यन्तश्च मां भक्त्या नित्ययुक्ता उपासते ॥ ९-१४ ॥

satatam kīrtayanto mām yatantaśca dṛḍhavrataḥ । namasyantaśca mām bhaktyā nityayuktā upāsatē || 9-14 ||

satatam: always/ constantly; kīrtayantah: chanting/ singing/ discussing; mam: about me; yatantah: making sincere efforts; ca: and; dṛḍha-vrataḥ: firmly observing their vows; namasyantah: offering their obeisances; ca: and; mam: me; bhaktya: with love and devotion; nitya-yuktah: always engaged (in yoga); upasate: they worship.

"Always speaking (chanting, etc) about me, they engage in firm vows with great determination, they offer me their obeisances and worship me with devotion, eternally connected with me/ in Yoga."

This beautiful verse further elaborates on the meaning expressed in the previous verse as mahatmanah bhajanti mam, "the great souls worship me", and delineates the fundamental requirement for the development of bhakti: the process that starts with śravaṇa and kīrtana (listening and speaking), that blossoms into smarana (remembering, or remaining conscious/ aware), and so on.

Mere superficial ritualistic worship in the temple, without the proper divine consciousness cannot be defined as bhakti or devotion, whereas the discussion about the Supreme Personality of Godhead (his names, forms, qualities, activities, teachings, companions, energies etc) is self-sufficient as a method of worship, and does not need any other ritualistic formality. It is said that in Kali yuga this method of loving discussion on Krishna is the actually appropriate religious practice.

In previous yugas one could successfully engage in the other prescribed religious practices, such as Deity worship (Dvapara yuga), ritual sacrifices and offerings to the fire (Treta yuga) and meditation (Satya yuga), because in those periods people were intelligent and sincere enough to understand that śravaṇa and kīrtana are the foundation for such activities. How can one worship the Deity, perform a yajna or engage in meditation without remembering/ knowing the Supreme Personality of Godhead? It is impossible: if someone tried to practice these religious activities without the proper consciousness, only the external shell of the activity would remain - like an empty box that only appears to be a container of food because it is labeled as such. However, in Kali yuga people actually are stupid, lazy and unfortunate, so they easily delude themselves into thinking that the external practices can really be sufficient to grant success. So they simply go to the temple or to the guru to make a superficial and temporary show of devotion and get some "blessings" in return, expecting God and Guru to magically change their karmic situation and make everything perfectly happy in their material lives. What to speak of those foolish people who believe they are engaging in yoga just because they practice some physical gymnastics for a better health or weight loss or stress relief, without even bothering to observe the fundamental *vrata*s required for yoga, such as the yamas and niyamas. Even some so-called "yoga teachers" are not ashamed of eating meat in their daily life, and we heard some of them state that actually following the instructions of the yoga shastra would be "stupid fanaticism". Considering such situation, we should not be surprised when we find out that some imaginative people have invented things as the "yoga for dogs" or the "yoga for couples" involving ordinary sexual stimulation or intercourse they call "tantra".

As in so many other verses in Bhagavad gita, the word satatam ("always, constantly") indicates that bhakti yoga is not a hobby, a social opportunity or a part-time job, but it is a full-time engagement of senses, body, words, mind, intelligence and soul, requiring full surrender and concentration. A very similar verse will be found in 10.9, where the purpose of the kīrtana will be elaborated further.

The word kīrtana is usually translated as "singing devotional songs", especially together with other devotees, to the accompaniment of musical instruments on the occasion of religious festivals and ceremonies, usually in a temple. However, it also includes the discussion, the study and the teaching of everything that concerns God - the universal Consciousness that contains all existences. The subject of God's teachings, nature, missions, activities, qualities, names, position, etc, is the most interesting and important subject, because when we understand it, we can attain the level of Krishna Consciousness, the origin and foundation of all things, including our own existence and purpose of life. Every evolved human being is naturally attracted by this type of discussion.

In the abrahamic ideologies, the healthy practice of kīrtana is distorted into the mechanical presentation, memorization and repetition of unquestionable dogma, as in the catechism, that is meant to define the allegiance of the congregation and separate its members from other groups. On the other hand, genuine keirtana as discussion about tattvas is also called philosophical debate, and traditionally it was done in public assemblies, so that the people participating to the meeting could profit from the explanations, proper information and examples. The declared purpose of the practice is to reconcile the apparent differences or contradictions, to expand the limited understanding, and to eliminate all misconceptions and false information, including the prejudice and the unfounded popular beliefs called laukika sraddha. To borrow a brilliant definition, "to comfort the confused and to confuse the comfortable".

Another very effective method for keirtana consists in writing articles or books, and publishing them. Bhaktisiddhanta, one of the greatest exponents of Gaudiya Vaishnavism, called his printing press the brihat mridanga, "the great drum" that sustained his sankirtana, or "congregational keirtana", beyond the limits within which an ordinary drum could be heard. There are some asuric people who believe they can solve philosophical disagreements or controversies by banning books, magazines, topics or people, denying permission to speak in assemblies or entrance in public assemblies, functions and temples. They also resort to conducting character assassination campaigns by spreading false accusations or denigration based on bodily identification, or even by physically persecuting, intimidating, threatening, or killing people. This is certainly not the Vedic system or the path of bhakti yoga: those who tolerate such adharmic nonsense are also responsible for its karmic consequences, and should not delude themselves into thinking they are serving God.

The word yatantab ("making efforts") is also important for the seriousness of the process. For most people, who remain on a relatively low level of personal evolution, religion is a mental need for social affiliation, and therefore it is associated with the community of birth, family, and ethnic identity. In a sense, we could say that all religions are same, including Hinduism, because at this level nobody is really interested in understanding the spiritual truths and their application. A little daily prayer, some sentimental devotion, a little cheap morality, pious gatherings for social occasions, and seasonal greetings are not very different from one camp to the other. Even some so-called devotees of Krishna have this superficial approach, but this is not recommended in Bhagavad gita. Krishna's instructions clearly say that his devotees should illuminate each other (bodhayantab parasparam, 10.9) into deeper and wider visions of his Consciousness.

The expression dridha-vratab, "firmly observing their vows", applies to the sadhana or regulated spiritual/ religious practices that the individual is expected to follow as a routine to modify his/ her consciousness for the better. The most popular vrata is the japa vrata, defined by Krishna in Bhagavad gita as the best form of yajna (10.25) because it is by far the easiest, the most effective and the most essential of all religious practices, especially suited for the people of Kali yuga. This is confirmed in the Kali santarana Upanishad (verses 1-11) from Krishna Yajur Veda, in the Brabmunda Purana (Uttara khanda, 6.55-60), Agni Purana, Padma Purana (Svarga Khanda 50.6), as well as the Ananta sambita (Narada Pancharatra), that present the Hare Krishna maha mantra as the most powerful mantra. The most basic form of the Hare Krishna mantra is hare krsna, hare krsna, krsna krsna hare hare. A more elaborated form adds the corresponding names of Rama in this way: hare rama, hare rama, rama rama, hare hare.

The japa vrata consists in softly or mentally chanting the holy Names of the Personality of Godhead or hari nama, arranged in genuine mantras properly received from a realized teacher (preferably in person, but also possibly through the heart). The most popular method works by fingering a rosary (japa mala) of 108 beads plus a bigger bead (meru) that helps the counting (sankhya), but the ancient method utilized 108 small balls made of various pure substances to be moved from one side to another at the completion of each mantra, or counted the mantras on the finger joints of both hands.

The beads of the japa mala can be made from a variety of pure substances, mostly tulasi wood for vaishnavas and rudraksha seeds for shaitaves. Also popularly used are sphatika (clear quartz crystal) beads, chandana (sandalwood) beads or imitations, or padma bija (lotus seeds).

Padma Purana (Brabma Khanda 25.15-18) also details the rules for the chanting of this mantra, and specifically the 10 types of offenses to be avoided. This, together with the sincere and serious observance of the traditional yama and niyama rules, constitutes the basis for the vratas mentioned in this verse. There are several other practices called vrata, such as the special worship offered to Krishna in the month of Kartika and the fasting observed on Ekadasi, but the japa vrata is the best, either performed daily with a prescribed number of repetitions, or with a cumulative number over a period of time.

The particular modalities of the vrata will be personalized according to the needs and abilities of the disciple, and given by the guru after considering all the factors involved. The general principle is that the practice of sadhana should remain su-sukham (9.2) or easily performed with joy, so that the disciple will be inspired and encouraged to continue, rather than developing a more or less subconscious feeling of resentment for what s/he experiences as a difficult burden. There are different levels of sadhana that are more suitable for different mentalities and abilities, also according to the varnas and ashramas, as well as according to time, place and circumstances. Some people prefer to write the holy names instead of chanting them; as the actual emission of the voice vibration is not required in the practice of japa (and rather it is not even encouraged, as mental recitation is much more powerful for individual practice), writing names is as good as a japa mala to support devotional meditation.

The words namasyantab and bhakti refer to the sentiments of surrender, respect and love that a devotee must develop towards the Supreme Personality of Godhead, accepting God's will in the understanding that God's plan is not always easy to see and to understand, but it is always for the better. Indirectly, this also applies to the attitude of a genuine devotees towards other people, because Krishna clearly says that "everyone follows his way" (mama vartmanuvartante, 3.23) and therefore the opinions and beliefs of others should always be respected, as long as they are not adharmic in nature or contrary to the final conclusions of all the vedic scriptures.

ज्ञानयज्ञेन चाप्यन्ये यजन्तो मामुपासते । एकत्वेन पृथक्त्वेन बहुधा विश्वतोमुखम् ॥ ९-१५ ॥

jñānayaજ્ઞેna cāpyanye yajanto māmupāsate | ekatvena pṛthaktvena bahudhā viśvatomukham || 9-15 ||

jñana: of knowledge; yajnena: by the sacrifice; ca: and; apī: certainly; anye: others; yajantah: that perform sacrifice; mam: me; upasate: they worship; ekatvena: in oneness; pṛthaktvena: in the couple; bahudha: in multiplicity; visvatah-mukham: as the universal form.

"Others engage in the sacrifice/ cultivation of knowledge, others worship me through various rituals, as the One, as the Two, as the Many, or as the Universal form."

Krishna continues to elaborate on the method of worship and service to God. After establishing the importance of bhakti - the central subject of the chapters 7, 8 and 9 - and affirming that it must be supported by a constant remembrance and discussion about God, here Krishna explains that the cultivation of knowledge is a sacred act in itself, a yajna, by which the Supreme Personality of Godhead is worshiped and the entire universe is supported. Why? Because the cultivation of knowledge culminates in the raja vidya (9.2), the transcendental science of atman and brahman, by which a human being can truly serve God in divine consciousness. The word upasate ("worship") we saw in the previous verse is repeated again here, and refers to the loving meditation on God, specifically on the form of God that is most cherished by the devotee, and that is called ista devata. The word anyate refers to the different groups of people who prefer to worship God in all such different and genuine forms. These different perspectives are not incompatible or even opposed to each other - actually they complement each other, as the intelligent and knowledgeable people can understand. This is why these various groups are described as engaged in the jñana yajna, "sacrifice of cultivation of knowledge".

Worshipping God in ekatva, "oneness", can be interpreted at different levels. The most elementary level consists in the realization of the atman/ brahman, that gives liberation from material identifications and attachments. Once the individual jivatman realizes its position of fragment, or "part and parcel" of the universal Consciousness (mama ivamso jiva loke, 15.7), it enters (visate, 18.55) into the Transcendental Reality, liberated from all other concerns and feelings of separative duality - that are repeatedly condemned by Krishna in Bhagavad gita. Another interpretation of ekatva is offered by some vaishnava groups that have embraced a type of monotheism resembling the abrahamic image of one Supreme Lord that excludes the worship or contemplation of all other Personalities of Godhead. We are walking here on thin ice, because in fact Krishna states in Bhagavad gita that the worship of many different forms of Godhead (9.22) is due to a lack of proper knowledge and a diversion from the correct method (avidhi purvakam). Also, there is absolutely nothing wrong in focusing on one specific form of God only, especially if such form is Vishnu or Krishna, as long as one does not commit the tragic and disastrous mistake of actually disrespecting the other forms and Personalities of Godhead - from the various svamsas of Vishnu and his avatars, to the vibhinna devas that are serving and representing Vishnu in the administration of the universe. Here is where the concept of vaishnava aikantika bhakti abruptly separates from its abrahamic look-alike, because it remains non-offensive.

We have mentioned that the Padma Purana cautions bhaktas against the offenses in the chanting of the holy names, and that one of such violations is considering the devas as separate and independent from Vishnu.

However, the worst of all offenses - called the "mad elephant offense" because it totally destroys one's advancement in bhakti just like a maddened elephant utterly devastates all the plants of a garden - consists in vaishnava ninda, "being disrespectful towards a vaishnava". Showbottle affiliates to politically religious institutions are very keen to exploit this idea to escape the questioning about their own bad behaviors and conclusions or those of their associates (claiming such questioning is an "offense" against them), but they do not show any hesitation in openly insulting the devas, who are much greater vaishnavas than any paltry human being. The ekatva described in this verse can be considered as aikantika hari bhakti, but it really needs to remain within the dharmic and ideological guidelines of the sruti and smriti - all the Puranas (not just the vaishnava Puranas) and all the other genuine Vedic texts, otherwise it will not simply be "imperfect": it will become a dangerous nuisance to society.

The meditation called pṛthaktva, "by distinction", may apply to the lilas of the Divine Couple manifested in so many forms through the development of the rasas in devotional relationships, or by the svamsa forms, including those of the avatars.

The meditation called bahudha ("in multiplicity") can be directly connected to its qualifying attribute visvatah-mukham ("as the universal form"), and applies specifically to the visualization offered by Bhagavad gita for our meditation, in 7.7-12 and then again in the next verses 9.16-20. Again on Arjuna's request, Krishna will offer more of the same meditations in 10.19-42, then will actually show the visualization directly in 11.15-30.

Then briefly Krishna will show Arjuna his four-armed Vishnu form and again two-armed Krishna form (11.50), closing the circle and returning to the ekatva meditation, but with a strong warning: contemplation on God's human-like form may appear easier and more comfortable than the visualization of the Visva rupa, but is actually extremely rare to experience in truth, even for the greatest personalities in the universe (11.51-55). Much more emphasis is given to this concept than on the meditation of the form itself. What does that mean? Everybody could see the "normal" two-armed Krishna on the battlefield. What to speak of the great devas, even the asuras that went to try and kill Krishna in Vrindavana could very easily see him. Or could they?

Actually, they could not. Unqualified people remained unable to see the actual Krishna even while he was personally present in front of them as avatars: all they saw was their own mental projection, as it is clearly explained in the Bhagavata Purana episode when Krishna enters the wrestling arena of Kamsa in Mathura and is perceived in very different ways by different categories of people - because they were all projecting their own mental images of Krishna on the true Krishna. This illusory projection is called maya ("what is not"), and as we have seen, it can be favorable to bhakti as yogamaya, or unfavorable to bhakti as mahamaya.

Yogamaya is achieved only through a precise and very demanding method, while mahamaya is easily available to all conditioned souls. Yogamaya brings us closer to the real Krishna and elevates us to the divine level, while mahamaya takes us farther from the real Krishna and keeps us in ignorance and delusion. At any time, we can make the conscious deliberate choice of changing the polarity of this energy, simply by turning our "face" (mukha) towards the inner reality (antah) rather than the external reality (bahir). God is everywhere, always, wherever we turn our face (visvato-mukha), but to see him we need to turn our face in the proper direction, too: this seems a contradiction, but it is not. It is a very specific method that can be considered the origin of the Koan in Zen meditation, meant to expand the greatness of the mind (maha-atmanah) by eliminating its materialistic limitations.

So the ekatra, prithaktra, bahudha and visvatah-mukham mentioned in this verse can be explained variously according to the level of evolution of the devotee - we can make the example of the series of 7 musical notes that repeat themselves with different sound pitches and produce different melodies, but are still the same fundamental sacred syllable omkara, the unheard subtle vibration of life and power that is the actual basis of reality in all its different manifestations. In this musical science of God there is no inherent contradiction but there can be wrong sequences that create superficial dis-harmonies, that we call ignorance and adharma; we need the guidance of an expert teacher to avoid becoming mistakenly attached to some cacophony that we may call music but is not (ma aya, "not this"). Although it may appear strange, ekatra can indicate both Brahman and Bhagavan realizations (at two different "sound pitches", like the same note played an octave higher), while prithaktra can indicate both Paramatma and madhurya rasa realizations (in the contemplation of the Divine Couple and their rasa for each other), and bahudha can indicate Bhagavan and Brahman again in the reverse order. This is because in the very intimate relationship that Krishna Syamasundara is manifesting with each and every one of his closest devotees like in the rasa lila, he takes a very great number of equal forms to dance with each and every one of his gopis exclusively, or in the mind of the gopis that could see Syamasundara everywhere, and everything reminded them of Syamasundara (visvato mukhab). This is the deepest sense of the bahudha form meditation, while the easiest meaning is the variety of powerful and majestic material manifestations in the universe that Krishna wants us to meditate on. Without actually going through this level according to Krishna's orders, it will be almost impossible to penetrate the inner meaning.

All we would be able to see then is our own cheap mental projection of a blue (black, bluish, grayish, whitish, pinkish, etc) boy with a peacock feather on his head and a flute in his hand: not any different from what you could easily see at a costume party or in any TV serial, cheap calendar or incense stick wrapping, especially in India. Such a "vision" does not make us any special or advanced at all, because there is no real devotion involved - at most some sentimentalistic attraction (just like the one people feel for cute dog puppies, especially the photoshopped ones) or ethnic folkloristic or regional identification... just like for mutton hyderabady biryani or bengali fish curries. It is a beginning - much better than worshiping some Bollywood or cricket idol, or their western equivalents - but it's only the beginning.

अहं क्रतुरहं यज्ञः स्वधाहमहमौषधम् ।

मन्त्रोऽहमहमेवाज्यमहमग्निरहं हुतम् ॥ ९-१६ ॥

aham kraturaham yajñah svadhāhamahamausadham | mantra'hamahamevājyamahamagniraham hutam || 9-16 ||

aham: I (am); kratuh: the Vedic ritual; aham: I (am); yajnah: the sacred action; svadha: the offerings to the Pitris; aham: I (am); aham: I (am); ausadham: the medicinal herb/ the psychotropic substance; mantra: the mantra; aham: I (am); aham: I (am); eva: certainly/ also; ajyam: the oblation of clarified butter; aham: I (am); agnih: the fire; aham: I (am); butam: the offering itself.

"I am the kratu, I am the yajna, I am the svadha, I am the ausadha, I am the mantra, I am the clarified butter, I am the fire and I am the act of offering."

In this new series of visualizations, Krishna gives us plenty to meditate about, starting with the first established link of connection between the macrocosm and the microcosm at the beginning of creation: the act of sacrifice (3.10-16) as a deliberate offering to feed the root of the universe, and thus contribute to the task of supporting the universe.

In the previous verse, Krishna spoke about the jñana yajna, the sacred act of cultivating knowledge, and about the meditation on God as one, two, many, and everything. Yet, these are the chapters dedicated to the description of bhakti. Obviously, genuine bhakti is much more than the superficial sentimental devotion and social religiousness that usually goes under such name.

Kratu is the religious ritual proper (the act of meditation and worship), yajna is the sacred selfless performance of one's duties, and svadha (also called tarpana or sraddha) is the relation of family kinship that connects the virtuous personalities at all levels of the universe. Through the basic concepts of kratu, yajna and tarpana mentioned in this verse, a human being actively contributes to the support of the entire universe, therefore these acts are called dharma. In the category of kratu (personal religious duties for purification) we can include the nitya karma, that are the mainly the daily agnihotra and sandhya performed daily by all dvi-jas ("twice born"), those who have received the sacred thread at the time of initiation as brahmanas, kshatriyas or vaisyas (with specific requirements according to their level of capability). We also include some naimittika karma or instrumental religious rituals such as the many samskaras - from the garbhadhana (conception) to the vivaha (marriage) - and the karma karma or optional rituals performed to obtain a particular blessing or purpose. Some specific rituals, such as the agnistoma or jyotistoma (that includes the preliminary prayascitta or atonement) are meant to purify and redeem a person who had fallen from the proper position in his duties to society, or in any case start a religious life in the Vedic tradition.

In the category of yajna (payment of one's debts to the universe) we find the panca maha yajnas called brahma yajna (study of the scriptures, meditation for Brahman realization, practice of sadhana and yoga), pitri yajna (also overlapping the category of svadha), deva yajna (worship to the Deity), bhuta yajna (consisting in giving food and other beneficial and pleasurable things to the ghosts and lower animals, and practicing non-violence), and nri yajna (consisting in hospitality, charity, social cooperation towards human beings). These duties also include the observance of the seasonal festivals all along the calendar year, the offering of various good things as tokens of gratitude and affection to the devas, and some naimittika karma that include one's honest professional occupational duties and family duties, the regular cleaning of the house and temple, and the daily bathing activities. In connection with these two groups of religious activities, the invocation svaha is called to present the offerings to the Personalities of Godhead - the devas, personifications of the principles of the universe and not ordinary individual souls.

The invocation svadha, on the other hand, is addressed to the pitris - ordinary individual souls who have qualified as virtuous personalities during their lives on earth, and that are honored by the devas and cooperate with them for the administration of the universe and often for the guidance of the deceased souls during the period between incarnations. Mostly the svadha is connected with food offerings, called sraddha or pindi.

A mantra is a very characteristic component of the Vedic religious tradition and way of life, so much that the definition has leaked into the dictionaries of several languages even on a metaphorical level, sometimes assimilated with words such as "slogan", "motto", etc. However, the actual meaning in Vedic culture refers to a sacred formula consisting of names of God, that is repeated (usually silently) as a sadhana for one's purification and meditation, as we have already mentioned in commentary 9.14 about the japa yajna. The oblation of the clarified butter, called ajyam, refers to the completion of the action, that gives the desired result. It is also considered to indicate success and victory (jayam).

Regarding ausadha, the offering of burning incense - called dhupa or agarbatti or jhuna - is considered an essential ingredient in all religious rituals, and sometimes the participants inhale clouds of incense smoke, but in this case, too, the beneficial effects depend on the composition of the incense. Traditionally, the resin used was guggul (Commiphora Mukul), a very powerful medicinal herb that Ayurveda recommends for treating all vata and kapha imbalances, including paralysis, arthritis, joint pains, rheumatism, atherosclerosis, high cholesterol and lipid levels in the blood, heart diseases, skin disorders, acne, sore throat, sinusitis, allergic rhinitis, cold and bronchitis, renal stones, urinary tract infections, erectile dysfunctions, dysmenorrhea, allergies and fungal infections, piles, excess bile, constipation, difficulties of digestion, diabetes, hypothyroidism, lympho-adenopathy, obesity, etc. Its application promotes the union of bone fractures. It is immuno-stimulant, tonic, anti-inflammatory, analgesic, disinfectant, and strengthens the body. Its neutralizers are alcohol, excessive physical exercise, standing in the heat for a long time, and the consumption of sour and pungent foods (such as onion and garlic). Unfortunately, today incense sticks are made of coal powder, generic sawdust powder, some type of chemical glue and synthetic perfumes - and inhaling their smoke is not exactly a recommended method to improve one's health. The best that can be said about them is they can help in keeping mosquitoes away. It is still possible to create healthy incense sticks with different beneficial herbs, but they are not easy to find.

Another medicinal ingredient used in traditional worship is the very aromatic camphor or Cinnamomum camphora (called karpura in India) that is burned in the arati lamp and sometimes also sprinkled on offerings. The original camphor has a direct effect on the brain and spinal cord and is used in extremely low dosage to treat mental disorders including hysteria, depression and obsessive anxiety. Its properties are analgesic, anti-spasmodic, cardiac, carminative, diuretic, hypertensive, insecticide, laxative, and stimulant. It will produce a strong anesthetic effect, reduce swelling of the body (for example in case of rheumatism and arthritis) and blood pressure, treat sprains, stimulate circulatory and nervous system, facilitate sleep, treat epilepsy, relieve gout and rheumatism, treat eye diseases, heal chapped lips, calm inflammation and spasms (especially in bronchitis), soothe respiratory tracts and sinuses, improve digestion, kill internal parasites, revive people from faints, treat wounds, and even reduce flatulence and teeth plaque. Unfortunately it has become very rare, just like the genuine guggul, and in its place people use a sort of soft and greasy plastic dust that never evaporates spontaneously and does not even have any good smell. Similarly, sandalwood - chandan - is a very valuable Ayurvedic medicine, both for external and for internal use, with cooling, calming effects. It is mostly used for skin damage.

Two other famous ausadhas used in Vedic religious rituals are soma and bhanga. Soma is the non-fermented juice of a very beneficial plant called Ephedra, that is known to contain a good alkaloid used even today to boost physical and mental performance, and so effective that its concentrated extracts have been banned in professional competitive athleticism. Soma is at the center of several types of yajnas and is offered to Indra and the devas; its medicinal properties are too many and too important to be dismissed in a few lines, so we will give some more space in the commentary to 9.20.

Bhang is offered only to Shiva Mahadeva, but it also has important medicinal properties as well as psychotropic properties, that in ancient times were considered perfectly legitimate, normal and desirable effects, that were pursued with the proper consciousness and modalities. Nobody smoked ganja to get stoned stupid during the weekend, or ate funny mushrooms just to see the pretty colors and have a laugh with friends. The consumption of alcoholic drinks was considered normal and even medicinal when done within limits and by people who knew how to deal with it, such as the well trained kshatriyas, but it was never meant for drinking oneself into a stupor to forget one's problems. Excesses were extremely rare and unintentional damage to people and property due to drunk behavior was unheard of.

The fire and the act of offering mentioned in this verse are the other essential factors in all religious performances, worship, purification and meditation.

Now, Krishna states that he is all this - such consciousness can help us in two ways: first of all it will make us appreciate more and more all these factors and components of religious activities, and focus our awareness better, which will give much better results. The second way is when our consciousness is firmly and genuinely fixed on Krishna consciousness: then all the external aspects of religious activities become secondary and can be substituted by a more intense spiritual awareness.

पिताहमस्य जगतो माता धाता पितामहः । वेद्यं पवित्रमोकार ऋक्साम यजुरेव च ॥ ९-१७ ॥

pitāhamasya jagato mātā dhātā pitāmahah । vedyam pavitramoṅkāra ṛksāma yajureva ca ॥ 9-17 ॥

pita: the father; aham: I am; asya: of this; jagatah: universe; mata: the mother; dhata: the supporter/ maintainer; pitamahah: the grandfather; vedyam: the object of knowledge; pavitram: perfectly pure; omkara: the sacred syllable om; rik: the Rig Veda; sama: the Sama Veda; yajur: the Yajur Veda; eva: certainly; ca: as well.

"I am the father of this (world), I am the mother, the supporter, the grandfather, I am the object of knowledge, I am the source of purification, I am the Omkara, and the Rig, the Sama and the Yajur (Vedas)."

As in the previous verse, Krishna is personally giving us the precise type of meditation we must perform on his Personality - meaning that all the factors mentioned represent Krishna and therefore must be honored and kept in the center of our lives, but also meaning that on a higher level, meditation on his Personality is automatically fulfilling all the benefits usually given by the other factors.

Materialistic simpletons (prakṛita sahajiyas) prefer to skip this type of passages in the shastra and to forget Krishna's divine glories to jump directly into the contemplation of the amorous pastimes narrated in the panchadhyaya ("5 chapters") from 29 to 33 of the 10th canto of Bhagavata Purana that deal with the rasa lila, but the "rasa" ("taste") they derive from such recitation is not spiritual, but material. It is true that the gopis liked to see Krishna simply as their handsome boyfriend, but they were not ignorant fools or even ordinary persons - they were direct manifestations of God's internal potency, and their younger friends and assistants the sakhis were great liberated sages. They knew very well that Krishna was the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and they reminded him and each other about that, too. This is why the acharyas sternly warn us against skipping the first 9 cantos of Bhagavata Purana and directly going to the amorous pastimes in Vrindavana: without properly studying and realizing the transcendental science and the immense glories of God, we will remain unable to perceive the real Krishna, and we will simply see a naughty but attractive cowherd boy who is adored by some young, romantic and simple minded village girls. Any ordinary good looking boy could play this part, and indeed many not-so-good looking boys play it as well, because all silly girls are more than ready to get a crush on boys, and make a big entertaining story out of it. Thousands of love stories are told by novels and movies, or from one friend to another, but hearing or reading them does not give the same effect of hearing and reading the Krishna rasa lila with the proper knowledge and consciousness. There is a very famous verse from the Mahabharata that says, tvam eva mata ca pita tvam eva, tvam eva bandhus ca sakha tvam eva, tvam eva vedyam ca dravinam tvam eva, tvam eva sarvam mama deva deva, "O Great God! To me, you are mother, father, friend and family. You are my knowledge, my Veda, my wealth, you are everything for me". It is a deeply touching, very personal prayer that can never be called "impersonalistic" - a point confirmed by the fact that a very similar prayer is offered in Bhagavata Purana (1.11.7) by the residents of Dvaraka when Krishna returns to his city after the Kurukshetra war.

Another very similar verse is expressed by Ramanuja: tvam eva mata ca pita tvam eva tvam eva bandhus ca gurus tvam eva, tvam eva vidya ca dravinam tvam eva, tvam eva sarvam mama deva deva. The Varaha Purana states, prapitamaho me bhagavan iti sarva janasya tu, gurub sri brahmano visnub, suranam ca guror gurub, "People in general honor Vishnu as their prime ancestor/ great-grandfather, the guru of all the devas". Naturally father and mother are the first and most important influences in one's religious life. Here Krishna not only presents himself as the father, but as the mother, too, so we should not think that there is some contradiction in meditating on Krishna as the Mother Goddess, in a feminine form: attributing physical limitations to God is always wrong.

Here we must understand what is the position of mother and father in the genuine Vedic culture: Bhagavata Purana (5.5.18) says, gurur na sa syat sva-jano na sa syat, pita na sa syaj janani na sa syat, daivam na sa syan na patis ca sa syan, na mocayed yab samupeta-mrityum, "One should not become a guru, a companion, a father, a mother, a deva, or a husband, without being able to liberate (others) from further deaths." In order to be a real father or mother it is not sufficient to have sex and give birth to a baby, without properly fulfilling the responsibilities required by the role. A materialistic attachment to non-civilized family life, filled with lust and greed, quarrel and envy, jealousy and revenge, does not represent Krishna at all. However, when the parenting role is fulfilled properly (which can be done even by adoptive parents), the child benefits immensely and develops a healthy, balanced, strong, self-sufficient and responsible personality. In our days there is a lot of controversy about gay marriages and adoptive parenting, and we should be careful not to let ourselves be dragged into some sort of abrahamic-styled puritanism and try to interfere in the private lives of other people - something that Vedic culture always avoids. Even those who have disgraced themselves by actually committing aggression against innocent good people, or criminal actions contrary to the principles of dharma (truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness and self-control) or seriously neglecting their duties to family and professional occupation, should simply be ostracized by their particular community but they should remain free to join another less demanding community, or move to a different city or kingdom (no need for passports or visas), or perform the required purification and be welcomed again in their original community. Per se, consensual gay unions based on the same principles of ordinary heterosexual marriages cannot be defined as aggression, criminal action or infringement on family or professional responsibilities. They are simply a personal matter of choice that should be respected, and if one or two persons (irrespective of their sexual orientation) want to lovingly accept, feed and raise a child that would otherwise remain abandoned in the hands of impersonal institutions, they should be commended and praised, not obstructed, just like heterosexual individuals who do the same.

The word dhata means "supporter/ maintainer", as well as "creator", "ordainer" as in "boss", or "employer". With the suffix vi (vidhata) it is used to refer to Destiny or Providence as the universal plan of the supreme Consciousness.

The word pītamahā, "the grandfather", is often applied to Brahma, the first creature of this universe, from whom all other living beings were generated: thus he is the true ancestor of everyone, the original teacher and guru, the original ancestor that established the proper dharmic tradition for the family, and he should always be respected and honored. The word vedyam, "the object of knowledge", has a great depth of meaning. Krishna (as the supreme universal Consciousness) is the purpose of the Vedas (15.15) and the knowledge we all seek to understand ourselves, the universe, and the purpose of life. In 9.2 Krishna used the word dharmyam, "the object of dharma", to describe the Yoga of the supreme Consciousness: both vidya and dharma should always go together.

The word pavitram, "perfectly pure", refers to something that has the power to purify the things it touches - like the wind, the sunlight, fire, and so on. All such things are considered religiously sacred because of their power of purification.

The omkara, the sacred syllable om, is mentioned several times in Bhagavad gita and in many other Vedic texts, because of its great importance and power. Patanjali's Yoga sutras state, tasya vacakah pranavah, "The pranava is his sound" (1.27), and taj-japas tad-artha-bhavanam, "the chanting of the omkara is done with the understanding of its meaning and scope" (1.28), meaning that the japa sadhana of a mantra will automatically bring the realization of its significance, but that one should chant the mantra purposefully and attentively, trying to concentrate on its meaning. Mere mechanical repetition has much less effects.

The Vedas mentioned in the verse are the sambitas or collections of hymns known as Rig, Sama and Yajur. Some commentators explain that the word ca indicates the Atharva, the fourth Veda.

गतिर्भर्ता प्रभुः साक्षी निवासः शरणं सुहृत् । प्रभवः प्रलयः स्थानं निधानं बीजमव्ययम् ॥ ९-१८ ॥

gatirbhartā prabhuḥ sāksī nivāsaḥ śaraṇam suhṛt | prabhavaḥ pralayaḥ sthānam nidhānam bījamavyayam || 9-18 ||

gatiḥ: the goal; bhartā: the nourisher; prabhuḥ: the Lord; sāksī: the witness; nivāsaḥ: the abode; saraṇam: the shelter; suhṛt: the friend; prabhavaḥ: the creation; pralayaḥ: the destruction; sthānam: the maintenance; nidhānam: the storage; bījam: the seed; avyayam: that is never destroyed.

"I am the destination, the nourisher, the Lord, the witness, the abode, the shelter, the friend. I am the origin, the end, the foundation, the resting place and the seed that never perishes."

The word gati has a number of meanings, mostly "destination, goal, purpose, end of a journey". Some commentators say that in this verse it refers to the result of karma that ultimately is attained, but we can also raise this meaning to higher levels, and specifically to the ultimate goal and purpose of life, that is liberation from material illusion, attainment of spiritual realization and pure love for God - that will be mentioned in 9.32 as param gatim. In a deeper devotional sense, Krishna is the ultimate destination and the purpose of all actions for the devotee, who constantly meditates on him and only desires to attain him. The surab ("devotees, divine personalities") always keep their vision on Vishnu, who is the supreme destination: om tad visnōḥ paramam padam sada paśyanti surayaḥ diviḥ cakṣur atātāṃ visnōḥ yat paramam padam. This is the verdict of the Rig Veda sambita (1.22.20), repeated in several Upanishads (Paingala, 4.30-32, Subala, 6.6, Tara sara, 3,9, Tripura tapani, 4.13).

In his instructions in Bhagavata Purana (7.5.30), Prahlada mentions that the persons who identify with their family (grha vrataḥ) and do not control their senses (adanta gobhīḥ) walk into a dark path (visatam tamisram). In the subsequent verse (7.5.31) he continues to explain: na te viduḥ svartha gatim hi viṣṇum, durasaya ye bahir artha manināḥ, adha yathandhair upaniyamanas, te 'piṣa tantryam uru damni baddhāḥ, "They do not know that Vishnu is the goal of life, and thus they cultivate high egotistic ambitions and consider the external things to be actually valuable in themselves. They are just like blind people led by other blind people, strongly tied up by the power of God." The same point will be established by Krishna later in Bhagavad gita 16.23: na sa siddhim avapnoti, na sukham, na param gatim, "they cannot achieve perfection, happiness or the ultimate purpose".

The word bhartā means "nourisher, maintainer", and therefore it refers to a person who lovingly takes care of his dependents, like a husband or an employer - someone in the category indicated by the Bhagavata Purana (5.5.18) as guru, father, mother, deva and so on. Such a person, who is only concerned with our good, deserves all our respect and affection. In verse 13.23 Krishna will again mention the quality of bhartā as one of the main characteristics of God (bhartā, bhokta, mabesvarah, paramatma, parama puruṣa, upadrashta, anumanta).

The word prabhu, "lord", is from the same root of prabha, "power". It is used to refer to God and sometimes also to refer to powerful personalities, saints and devotees. Its deep meaning can be understood from the description of Svetasvatara Upanishad (3.17): sarvasya prabhum isanam sarvasya saranam brihat, "Isana, the Lord, has power over all, and is the immense shelter for everything and everyone."

The word sāksī, "witness", appears in many places to describe Bhagavan, of whom Paramatma is an expansion. Bhagavata Purana (4.20.7) describes this supreme Self as ekah suddhah svayam jyotiḥ, nirguṇo 'sau guṇasrayah, sarva go 'navṛitah sāksī, niratmatma atmanah parah, "The One/ All, pure, effulgent in itself, free from all designations but origin of all qualities, omnipresent (going everywhere), never covered (by material identification), the witness, selfless self of the self - totally spiritual."

It refers to the fact that Krishna is the Soul in the heart of all beings, but remains detached observing the activities of the individual soul. What is exactly this presence? It is simply Consciousness: the pure awareness that transcends the limitations of time and space and phenomenon. It is the eternal, blissful, and awakened state of being that we are, when we overcome the identification and the movements or modifications of the mind and body. This is what Patanjali describes in his sutras as the purpose and meaning of Yoga, and therefore one of the earliest practices of meditation consists in becoming conscious of ourselves as the detached and blissful witness of the movements and activities of our body and mind.

Several famous and beautiful prayers address the Lord as sakshi. Narada Muni thus addresses Krishna after the killing of the Kesi asura in Vrindavana: tvam atma sarva bhutanam eko jyotir ivadhasam, gudho guha sayah saksi maha purusa isvarah, "You are the Self in all the beings, the One, hidden in the cave of the heart like the radiant light of fire in the kindling wood. O great purusha, o isvara, you are the witness" (10.37.11). Similarly, king Bahulasva of Videha prayed, bhavan hi sarva bhutanam atma saksi sva drg vibho, atha nas tvat padambhojam smaratham darsanam gata, "Your Grace is the Self of all being, the witness, that sees itself/ self illuminated, the powerful. You have shown yourself to us, because we are always remembering your lotus feet" (10.86.31).

The word nivasah, "abode", is applied to Krishna in several other verses of Gita and especially in the description of the universal form of God (11.25, 11.36, 11.45), but also in 12.8, and is echoed by the synonym dhama (8.21, 10.12, 11.38, 15.6) and similar words (visanti, 8.11, 11.21, 11.26, 11.29, visate, 18.55). It is also the root for Vishnu's name Srinivasa, "the abode of Sri". In Bhagavata Purana we find this definition in the description of Devaki while pregnant with Krishna: sa devaki sarva jagan-nivasa nivasa bhuta nitaram na reje, "The womb of Devaki had become the abode of the abode of everything, but she kept that radiance to herself." (10.2.19)

The word saranam means "one who delivers others from danger" and therefore "protection, shelter, refuge", and is used very frequently in prayers by which the devotees surrenders to God seeking his protection. Krishna also uses the word in 2.49 when he speaks about "taking shelter in intelligence", and recommending to "take shelter" in God as in 18.62 saranam gaccha, and 18.65 saranam vraja. A synonym is prapannam ("surrender") as in 2.7.

Krishna also describes himself as the supreme friend (subrit) of all beings, not only here but also in 5.29. Another synonym is sakha, that is used specifically to refer to the relationship between Arjuna and Krishna (4.3, 11.41, 11.44).

The word prabhava means "creation, origin of existence, manifestation, beginning of things", while sthanam means both "maintenance, conservation, continued existence" and "position, background, basis". It is directly connected with pralayah (the destruction) and sthanam (the maintenance), that is also connected to the name nivasah.

The word nidhanam means "treasure, store for the future, savings, investment", and is mentioned in 2.28 in reference to the living beings or states of existence that are "stored" into God in the period of non-manifestation. It is also found in Arjuna's prayers to the universal form (param nidhanam, 11.18, 11.38).

Closely related to this meaning are the two other words bijam ("the seed") and avyayam ("that is never destroyed"). The supreme Consciousness is the seed that contains the existence of the entire tree of the universal manifestation, in which innumerable seeds are produced (7.10, 10.39, 14.4). This is an extremely powerful meditation, to be practiced every day to remind ourselves what we are supposed to do, and why, in the course of our daily activities. Whatever we do, eat, sacrifice, endure, or give away (9.27), we must remember that Krishna is the purpose we want to attain (gati), the strength that carries us across, the witness of everything that happens, our friend and shelter, the power that brings beginnings and ends, and the imperishable bank account where we store all our merits. When we are able to remember this, every day is a success, irrespective of what we have been able to accomplish on the gross material level.

तपाम्यहमहं वर्षं निगृह्णाम्युत्सृजामि च । अमृतं चैव मृत्युश्च सदसच्चाहमर्जुन ॥ ९-१९ ॥

tapāmyahamamaham varṣam nigṛhṇāmyutsṛjāmi ca । amṛtaṁ caiva mṛtyuśca sadasaccāhamarjuna ।। 9-19 ।।

tapami: I heat up; aham: I; aham: I; varṣam: the rain; nigrihnam: withhold; utsrijami: send forth; ca: and; amritam: immortality; ca: and; eva: certainly; mṛityub: death; ca: and; sat: sat; asat: asat; ca: and; aham: I (am); arjuna: o Arjuna.

"I am the origin of the heat (of the sun), I pour down or withhold the rains. I am immortality and death as well. I am sat and asat, too, o Arjuna."

All the world cultures recognize the Sun as the original Deity, from whose immense power everything is created and destroyed. The Sun bestows both life and death, and therefore manifests both the "good" and "bad" aspects of power - the fierce and the benevolent, defined in Sanskrit as saumya and asaumya. The words sat and asat are difficult to translate because they contain many levels of meanings, all in the category of opposites or polarities: spiritual and material, permanent and temporary, good and bad, higher and lower, and so on. The path of progress leads from asat to sat (asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mṛityor ma amritam gamaya - Bṛihad aranyaka Upanishad 1.3.28), "from ignorance lead me to truth, from darkness lead me to light, from death lead me to immortality".

However, to really appreciate God we need to understand that God is the source of everything - not only the things we consider good, but also the things that appear bad. Everything that exists has a purpose, and is arranged by the universal intelligence according to precise and perfect laws, meant for the progress and support of all. What we consider bad is just the absence of good, just like darkness is just the absence of light. However, darkness too is created by the sun, in daytime because of clouds (created by the sun by evaporating water) and in the night because the mass of the earth (also created by the sun when the planets were separated from the original mass, and moved in its orbit by the gravitational pull of the sun) remains between our eyes and the sun itself.

The abrahamic ideologies we often mention as a wide-spread cultural contamination at global level are closely related to the Parsi ideology created by Zarathustra - depicting two rival Gods: Ahura Mazda and Ariman. Once Zarathustra had chosen Ahura Mazda as his "good God", Ariman automatically became the Enemy, "the God of the others" (as in "the other peoples who are our enemies and we must vanquish"). As a consequence, a strange theology developed, according to which "the good God" created all the good things and whatever bad or evil things exist in the world were created by Satan, the enemy of God. Both satan and ariman literally mean "the enemy".

In the Bible, Satan was originally Lucifer (a Latin word literally meaning "the bringer of light"), who entered the Garden of Eden and tempted the first two human beings - Adam and Eve - to disobey God (Jahweh) and eat the apple of knowledge. Jahweh did not want them to eat the fruit of knowledge because by actually becoming able to tell good from evil, they would become as powerful as him. Eve ate the apple and gave it to Adam, and Jahweh kicked out both from his garden, cursing them to suffer for everything in life, from growing their food to giving birth. However, somehow the descendants of these two people prospered and built a great civilization; Jahweh did not like it and killed almost all of them, including all animals, with the Great Flood - only Noah was spared because Jahweh tipped him beforehand and told him to build a big boat. Some time later, when people had recovered from that mass slaughter and developed another great civilization, God chose a man called Abraham and told him to become his follower. In exchange he promised him many descendants and domination over all the lands. As evidence of their allegiance to Jahweh, Abraham and all the males of his family would have to practice genital mutilation and animal sacrifices, because what pleases Jahweh most is the blood and pain of the innocent... so much that, thousands of years later, in order to "save the entire mankind", Jahweh will organize for the brutal torture and death of "his only son" Jesus, and by the blood and pain of Jesus, Jahweh would be appeased. From the recorded history of the last 2000 years, however, it seems Jesus' sacrifice was simply not sufficient, and much more blood and sufferings were required.

This is the basic theology of what is called "abrahamic monotheism", that means "only accepting one God" and fighting against all the other Gods. On the other hand, Vedic monotheism means "accepting that there is one God that manifests in many forms"; as Krishna confirms in this verse, he is sat and asat at the same time, and yet he is not limited by them.

But who created Satan in the first place? If God is all-knowing and all-powerful, he must have calculated the nature of Satan to work exactly as it worked, and in the worst case, God should have destroyed Satan as the asuras are systematically destroyed along the course of history. Since abrahamics say he hasn't, the entire abrahamic theology remains built on the inherent ontological duality between good and evil, creating a deep imbalance - a sort of fundamental schizophrenia - in the minds of the followers, because this so-called enemy God lives within each and every human being, in the form of the material body, the world, nature, or the feminine hemisphere of the brain connected to the left side of the body. The imbalance caused by the hostility towards nature and by the intention to defeat, oppress and dominate it, creates fear and aggressiveness against everything feminine (like nature and like the origin of the body), and the natural duality (called sat and asat, and that must be overcome by transcending it on a higher level of consciousness) becomes an obsessive never-ending war rather than the joyful, graceful and passionate sacred dance it is supposed to be. In the eyes of the abrahamics, spirit and matter become antagonists and enemies to each other, and man and woman can never be friends or cooperate with each other.

The victory of armored patriarchy, that became firmly established with the abrahamic ideologies, caused the bondage of women in various degrees of oppression because women as a class represent nature and the beauty of material things - bodies, sex, children, pleasure, sweetness, tenderness, and so on. Rape appeared for the first time in human history as an instrument of oppression. Previously, in dharmic human societies, there had been sexual acts dictated by the passion of the male, but because of the general ethical values of society and human nature, they had been mostly physical discharges of lust, devoid of the intention to hurt and humiliate the woman who had become the target of the sexual urge. It was more similar to the animals' sexual encounters than to the rape as we have known it for the last 3000 years - an act that is more similar to the mentality of rakshasas, the asuric beings who enjoy the sufferings of other people.

Rape always goes together with slavery and torture, because all these are based on the idea that the victim has no rights to decide on her/ his own life and to oppose what others want to do with her/ his body. This of course deeply changed the dynamics of family, because women lost all decisional power in the matter of marriage and children, so the system of arranged marriages started and marriage itself became just a form of institutionalized and legalized rape. In the same period we also observe the beginning of wars, crude iron weapons among the uncivilized tribes, use of horses and chariots for the hostile invasion of peaceful territories, pillaging, reducing animals and land to objects of private property (without inherent rights of the animals and land to proper use), mistreatment of children, painful bodily modifications (circumcision, mutilation, cranial elongation, feet shrinking etc), unnecessary felling of trees, destruction of property (such as houses etc), division of society in classes, hereditary of social positions (especially in priesthood), male priesthood, etc.

Hopefully, we are coming to the end of this horrible parenthesis in human history, and the last throes of the monster can be less disastrous if we have been able to attract more people to the sanity and beauty of dharmic ideologies. Unfortunately, Hinduism too has been poisoned by such alien infiltrations at conscious and subconscious collective level so that a lot of confusion has been created; we have the mission to clean the mess up. Our greatest hope is Bhagavad gita.

There are fools who are questioning the "relevance of Gita for our times", but they simply have not understood anything about the Gita, and are very confused about the problems that we are to face at this moment in time. Just this one verse of Gita offers the perfect solution to the ideological schizophrenia of eternal conflict: God is the sum total of everything that exists, the place where all dualities are overcome because they unite and reconcile. God is sat and asat at the same time - existence and non-existence, spirit and matter, cause and effect, heat and rain, death and immortality. Fear is thus immediately vanquished, and when fear vanishes, a human being really starts to live.

त्रैविद्या मां सोमपाः पूतपापा यज्ञैरिष्ट्वा स्वर्गतिं प्रार्थयन्ते ।
 traividyā māṁ somapāḥ pūtapāpā yajñairiṣṭvā svargatim prārthayante । ते पुण्यमासाद्य सुरेन्द्रलोकं अश्नन्ति दिव्यान्दिवि देवभोगान् ॥ ९-२० ॥ te puṇyamāsādy surendralokaṁ aśnanti divyāndivi devabhogān ॥ 9-20 ॥

trai-vidya: those who know the 3 Vedas; mam: me; soma-pap: drink the soma rasa; puta: purified; papa: wrongful actions; yajnaib: with sacrifices; istva: by worshipping; svab-gatim: attainment of Svarga; prarthayante: they pray for; te: they; puṇyam: virtuous/ meritorious; asadya: attaining; sura-indra-lokam: the planet of the King of the devas; asnanti: they eat; divyam: divine; divi: in heaven; deva-bhogan: the pleasures of the devas.

"Those who know the three (Vedas), who drink the soma and who are purified from all wrongs through the (acts of) sacrifice, worshipping me (in this way) pray to attain Svarga. After reaching the pious (planets) of the King of the suras (Indra) in heaven, they enjoy the celestial pleasures of the devas."

Krishna speaks here of the trai vidya, "the three forms of knowledge", and we might easily conclude that he is referring to the three main Vedas called Rig, Sama and Yajur, that deal with the same hymns and the same understanding of the universe, and are focused on the glorification of the devas. The fourth Veda, called Atharva, is considered slightly different as it contains various specific formulas to solve daily problems such as dealing with controlling natural and atmospheric calamities, neutralizing environment pollution, fighting ghosts and hostile spirits, and alleviating the negative influence of the planets. Another interpretation of the trai vidya reference is the triad of sruti, smriti and agama, which form the foundations for a genuine engagement in religious life. It can also refer to the knowledge of the three levels or dimensions of existence, called Bhu, Bhuvah and Svah - the earthly or material levels, the intermediate subtle levels, and the higher or spiritual levels.

Svah or Svarga is already considered almost spiritual because it is the residence of the devas, the limbs and representatives of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, in charge of the administration of the universe. Indra himself is considered to be a direct manifestation of Vishnu, so much that in this verse Krishna says, mam istva, "by worshipping me" referred to the offerings of soma and the invocations to the King of the devas.

This higher planetary system is said to be composed by the planets Mahar, Jana, Tapa and Satya, that is the abode of Lord Brahma, the architect of the universe. Those who have properly studied Vedic scriptures cooperate with the devas in the proper administration of the universe, by dutifully performing their karmas and by serving dharma as prescribed. In the course of their religious ceremonies, these saintly persons become purified by the performance of their duties and by drinking the famous soma rasa. Some commentators believe that this reference to the soma is symbolic and stands for the power of intelligence, but even a literal meaning is not out of place. However, we need to clarify some misunderstanding regarding the soma rasa, the juice of the soma plant or soma lata. Colonial scholars explained that the soma rasa was the milky juice of the Sarcostemma viminalis (or Asclepias acida) turned alcoholic with the fermentation with flour and butter - but this procedure does not correspond with the original texts in regard to the preparation or to the beneficial and purificatory effects described in the traditional texts. On the other hand, the ancient Ayurvedic tradition identifies the soma lata with the Ephedra Gerardiana, the Indian variety of the ubiquitous Ephedra, a very popular medicinal herb that grows spontaneously in Asia, Europe and America, where it is called Mormon Tea and Squaw Tea. The Susruta samhita (which is part of the Ayur Veda) lists those places where the soma lata grows spontaneously in two varieties: the mountain and the marsh. Ephedra contains a bland alkaloid called ephedrine, comparable to the "good caffeine" of guaranà and yerba maté, used in Ayurvedic medicine as a stimulant at the mental and physical level, for curing headaches, allergies and rheumatism, and improving metabolism and digestion. Its active principles stimulate the natural production of adrenaline, and in fact it is very popular among sports people and students during the exam periods, and also for the purpose of burning off excess weight. Synthetic ephedrine is catalogued by the International Olympic Committee and by the World Anti-Doping Agency among the banned substances in professional sports, so much that some athletes have been disqualified in some competitions. Hymn 4 of mandala 9 of Rig Veda (completely dedicated to the soma rasa) prays, "may we obtain agility, strength and mental power, to win and repel our enemies, and to become better persons."

This, in the Vedic culture, is considered true purification; some enemies of Vedic culture have concocted cruel and gruesome fantasies about the concept of purification and have inserted them into manipulated texts of the Manu samhita, for example, and simpletons have even gone as far as to believe them, but Gita is very clear about this subject, both here and later (17.5-6, 17.14-19). In the various descriptions of the Rig Veda we also find the important information that the soma plant does not have leaves or bark, but smells like pine and tastes rather bitter. Depending on the variety and the age of the plant, the color goes from bright green of the evergreen to green with golden or dark red hues. The stems are pressed with special stones, then the juice is filtered and left to macerate for one night: a procedure that is normally used in herbal medicine to extract the active principles, but does not imply alcoholic fermentation, which would require a longer time. It is interesting to see that Soma as the juice of the plant is identified with the Deity Soma (the Moon) and the other way around, and that in traditional iconography it is represented as a bull, a bird or a human embryo.

The word asnanti in this verse is particularly interesting because it focuses on the fact that in this material world, eating always remains the greatest pleasure, and trying to deny oneself the healthy and sattvic pleasure of the tongue will simply twist around the natural pleasure propensity towards more dangerous directions. Even the devas enjoy their foods - and sattvic food is the best.

ते तं भुक्त्वा स्वर्गलोकं विशालं क्षीणे पुण्ये मर्त्यलोकं विशन्ति ।

te taṁ bhuktvā svargalokaṁ viśālaṁ kṣīṇe puṇye martyalokaṁ viśanti ।

एवं त्रयीधर्ममनुप्रपन्ना गतागतं कामकामा लभन्ते ॥ ९-२१ ॥

evaṁ trayīdharmamanuprapannā gatāgatam kāmakāmā labhante ॥ 9-21 ॥

te: they; taṁ: that; bhuktvā: enjoying; svarga-lokaṁ: of Svargaloka; viśalaṁ: great; kṣīṇe: after having exhausted; puṇye: the virtuous merits; martya-lokaṁ: on the planet of mortal people; viśanti: fall down; evaṁ: thus; trayī-dharmam: of the three *dharma*s; anuprapannaḥ: following; gata-āgatam: coming and going; kāma-kāma: desire for desires; labhante: obtain.

"After a long time spent in the enjoyment of Svargaloka, those who have exhausted their virtuous merits fall down again to the level of mortals. In this way, following strictly the path of the three *dharma*s, they develop a lust for desires and they continue to take birth and die."

In verse 9.19, Krishna mentioned that he is death and immortality at the same time, and in these subsequent verses there seems to be some sort of overlapping of the two concepts when we speak of Svargaloka, the world of the devas as opposed to Martyaloka, the world of mortal human beings. Actually, Svargaloka too is a place reached by death, although the duration of life there is different for different degrees of devas. Besides the main Personalities of Godhead there - the 12 Adityas, the 8 Vasus, the 11 Rudras, the 2 Asvini kumara and the 49 Maruts - there is a large population of devas and upadevas (Gods and "under-Gods") that is usually calculated around the tune of 33 million people. There are innumerable administrative posts to be filled in the universal government capital, and only the most qualified are appointed there by dint of their own personal puṇya, or virtuous merit. This is indicated by the expression trayī-dharmam, "by the three *dharma*s", that can be translated in a variety of ways just like the expression tray-vidyā (9.20) - the three dimensions of Bhu, Bhuvah and Svah, as well as the knowledge of the three main Vedas (Rig, Sama, Yajur). Thus trayī-dharma refers to the dutiful performance of one's work on the three levels of existence (earthly, subtle and religious/ spiritual), or to the three main *sva-dharma*s in the varṇa system of brahmanas, kṣatriyas and vaiśyas, because sudras are not expected to perform the yajnas for the higher planets. The word dharma means "duty", therefore it can apply here to family, society and mankind, and also to the pursuance of the cultivation of dharma, artha and kāma, in the cycle of death and rebirth. These are the dharman (in the plural) Krishna will mention in 18.65, when he will say that one should abandon all such identifications and simply surrender to the supreme universal Consciousness to attain permanent liberation.

Non unlikely the noble souls that have reached the Pitrilokas and are maintained there by the credit of the śraddha offered by their descendents, the residents of Svargaloka attain and maintain their positions by credits. If they do not distinguish themselves by their selfless and careful work in their particular post, at some point they exhaust their credits and must return to earth, just like men who live in a very expensive luxury residence hotel but are not earning sufficient money will eventually have to leave and find a more modest accommodation. Similar verses are found in Bhagavata Purana, for example in 3.32.1-4, where Kapila explains that grihamedhis (people attached to family life) perform many religious duties (dharman, in the plural) while living at home and enjoying dharma, artha and kāma, and engaging in ceremonies (keratī) to worship devas and pitṛis, without being interested in the pure Krishna Consciousness (bhagavat-dharma). By drinking the soma rasa during such worship, these people will attain the higher planets but will ultimately fall down again, if not earlier, by the time Mahaviṣṇu withdraws the universe into his body.

Another series of verses is found in Bhagavata Purana (11.10.22-26), where Krishna explains to Uddhava that those who properly perform the Vedic duties without any mistake are elevated to Svarga, where they enjoy the same pleasures of the devas. Shining with the power of their virtuous merits, they travel around in wonderful airplanes, surrounded by beautiful women and glorified by the Gandharvas' songs. Then, when their old merits are exhausted, they are forced to leave those wonderful places and to return to earth to work. Here we clearly see that the problem is not pleasure in itself, or even desire in itself, but rather the deliberate choice to cultivate desires for sense gratification as the purpose of life. This constitutes a major distraction because it is simply impossible to achieve real satisfaction through sense gratification - one simply wants more and more - and in the process one completely forgets the purpose of human life, the realization of the Atman. These people who cultivate the desire for desires (kāma-kāma) use Svarga simply as a luxury vacation resort and not as a service post, and therefore they miss the great opportunity offered by the company of such great Personalities, choosing simply to enjoy their pleasures.

अनन्याश्चिन्तयन्तो मां ये जनाः पर्युपासते । तेषां नित्याभियुक्तानां योगक्षेमं वहाम्यहम् ॥ ९-२२ ॥

ananyāścintayanto māṁ ye janāḥ paryupāsate । teṣāṁ nityābhīyuktānāṁ yogakṣemaṁ vahāmyaham ॥ 9-22 ॥ ananyāḥ: with no other; cintayantaḥ: thought/ concern/ interest; māṁ: me; ye: those; janāḥ: people; paryupāsate: perfectly worship; teṣāṁ: to them; nityā-abhīyuktānām: always engaged favorably/ constructively; yoga-kṣemam: what is required for their service; vahāmi: I carry; aham: I (personally).

"Those who are interested only in me and my worship are always favorably/ constructively engaged. I personally carry what they need."

A householder carries the burden of the maintenance of his family - the father maintains his children, and the grown up son maintains his elderly parents - and similarly the Lord takes personal care of his family or samsara, therefore he is called bhakta vatsala, very affectionate and sensitive to the needs of his devotees. The word vahami derives from the same root of vahana ("carrier") and literally means "carrying, transporting". There are many beautiful episodes, in ancient and in more recent times, of the Lord personally appearing in various forms to practically demonstrate the truth of this statement; as for example in the story of Madhavendra Puri and Kshirachora Gopinatha (who stole a pot of rice pudding for him), a devotee of Jagannatha named Bandhu Mohanty (whose entire family was fed by a mysterious black boy who gave them a huge golden plate filled with food), to Bilvamangala (who was daily fed with milk by Krishna in Vrindavana). There was also that famous Gita Panda (named Arjuna Mishra) who was studying this very same verse and became perplexed about it. When the Panda went to take bath, his wife was visited by a black-complexioned boy who was carrying a heavy load of food for him as a gift. In this last incidence, the identity of the mysterious donor was highlighted by the fact that he had a deep red scratch across his chest, which the Panda recognized later as a same scratch he had done with his pen on the verse that had left him so dubious.

Another similar example is Draupadi's sari, that Krishna kept supplying out of thin air to protect her dignity when she was being disrobed by the order of evil Duryodhana in the assembly of the Kurus. We can also remember the story of the brahmana Sudama, narrated in the 10th canto of Bhagavata Purana, who returned home without asking anything from his friend Krishna, but found his house had been instantly filled with immeasurable wealth. But there are also every day miracles we can observe in our own lives when we totally devote them to the service of God, without any other consideration.

These necessities not only apply to the material ingredients or maintenance, but also to the spiritual realizations and inspiration to continue in our service. The previous verse was speaking about ordinary virtuous people, who engage in the three types of duties, and after attaining the higher planetary systems and spending some time there, must return to the earthly platform to earn new merits. Such people are not selfish, because the influence of sattva guna keeps them free from egotism and exploitation: they are simply concerned about their own maintenance and the maintenance of those who depend on them. Here Krishna reassures his devotees that they do not need to be worried about anything: he will take care of them personally at every step of the way, for each and every necessity. However, we should not forget the required qualifications that entitle the devotee to the personal attention of Krishna: 1) exclusive concern with Krishna's service, 2) perfect performance of worship, 3) continued, regular and consistent favorable engagement.

Exclusive concern with Krishna's service means that the devotee is not interested in his/ her own pleasure or benefit, and rather s/he is ready to sacrifice everything and engage everything in Krishna's service, following to Krishna's explicit instructions and not some imaginative plan that is not in accordance to the principles of dharma and the conclusions of the shastra. Ananya means "no other", and refers to the total surrender of the devotee, who has no mental reservations in his dedication to God. The perfect performance of worship does not refer to the particular technical details, which can be adjusted from time to time according to the circumstances. It rather refers to the purity of the desire to serve Krishna, and the love and devotion that is engaged in the process. The concept of continued and consistent favorable engagement refers to the identification of the devotee as Krishna's servant only; the pure devotee completely depends on Krishna and surrenders everything to him, without remaining attached to any expectation or identification. We should be careful not to misinterpret this verse to mean that we can just do some little puja to Krishna, without actually working sincerely to perform our duties, and expect that Krishna will take care of everything for our maintenance. The tendency of a lazy person is to expect everyone else to work for him, but the characteristic of a devotee is exactly the opposite: he works for Krishna, and performs his duties sincerely and carefully, including those to society and family, because he sees everyone and everything as belonging to Krishna, and he turns all actions into a service to God.

The expression nitya abhi yuktanam indicates a perfect constant union in yoga, the highest level of success in the pursuance of the evolution of Consciousness. The words yoga and kshema respectively apply to what is necessary to connect with God and what is required for one's protection and maintenance.

येऽप्यन्यदेवताभक्ता यजन्ते श्रद्धयान्विताः । तेऽपि मामेव कौन्तेय यजन्त्यविधिपूर्वकम् ॥ ९-२३ ॥

ye'pyanyadevatābhaktā yajante śraddhayānvitāḥ । te'pi māmēva kaunteya yajantya vidhipūrvakam ॥ 9-23 ॥

ye: those; api: also; anya-devataḥ: other devas; bhaktāḥ: the devotees; yajante: worship; śraddhayānvitāḥ: with that faith; te: them; api: also; mam: me; eva: certainly; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); yajanti: they are worshipping; a-vidhi: not according to the knowledge/ rules; pūrvakam: previous.

"O Arjuna, those devotees who worship the devas separately with that faith, are actually worshipping me only, but they are acting in a way that is not in accordance with the proper knowledge."

This is the famous verse used as evidence by those who claim that worshipping "the demigods" is contrary to devotional service and amounts to an offense towards Krishna. The other evidence they give is the verse from Padma Purana (Brahma Khanda 25.15-18) that lists, second among the 10 main offenses to be avoided in the chanting of the holy names, sivasya sri-vishnor ya ibha gunamadi-sakalam dhiya bhinnam pasyet sa khalu hari-namahita-karah, "separating Vishnu from Shiva (and their names, qualities etc) by considering Shiva as different and independently existing from Hari".

The other verse of Bhagavad gita quoted as "condemning demigod worship" is 7.20: kamais tais tair brita-jnanah prapadyante 'nya-devatah, tam tam niyamam asthaya prakritya niyatah svaya, "Those whose knowledge is confused by a variety of desires approach other devas, and according to their nature they follow the (specific) regulations." However, usually the next verse is forgotten: yo yo yam yam tanum bhaktah sraddhayarcitum icchati, tasya tasyacalam sraddham tam eva vidadhamy abam, "Whatever form the devotee wishes to worship with faith, I (Krishna) strengthen the determination by which s/he will become established (in that method)." (7.21) So it is Krishna himself who is encouraging such worship. Happily enough, there are no verses in Bhagavad gita "condemning" (what to speak of "prohibiting") the worship offered to the devas. At most, Krishna says that it is done without the proper awareness of the supreme Unity of the Transcendental Consciousness. To begin with, verse 9.23 does not exactly say that one should not worship "other devas" - or even that a devotee of Krishna should stop other people from worshipping the devas, as several confused persons have been led to believe. This would be in contradiction with other passages, especially 3.10-14, where Krishna clearly says that one who does not offer sacrifices to the devas in gratitude for their gifts is just a thief.

This verse (9.23) simply says that the worship offered separately to the devas actually reaches Krishna, but without the knowledge of the worshiper. It is amazing how some people can carve out such offensive hostility against the devas from this terse, neutral and simple statement of Krishna. We would better understand this problem if we examine the basic abrahamic ideology, in which "the other god" is nothing less than Satan himself, the Great Enemy that man must oppose and destroy in all possible ways (including by killing cats and dogs) because Jahweh is not capable or willing to do it himself. If we want to actually understand and apply Vedic knowledge, we need to get rid of these faulty and damaging cultural superimpositions.

The proper way (vidhi purvakam) in Vedic culture is to always show respect to the devas as limbs and representatives and servants of the Supreme Consciousness. Not worshipping them as "competition Gods", and also not disrespecting them: both these attitudes would be wrong.

During the meditation on the Supreme Lord, we offer worship to the various limbs of his body, beginning with his feet, and then we honor the Lord's companions and intimate servants, at various levels and degrees. The devas are not separate from the Lord, rather they are his limbs - his dear companions and assistants - and the Lord personally intervenes to help them and save them from the asuras, as we see in innumerable episodes in the Puranas. This is also confirmed in Bhagavata Purana 10.40.9-10: sarva eva yajanti tvam sarva devamayesvaram, ye 'py anya-devata bhakta yady apy anya-dhiyah prabho, yathadri prabhava nadyah parjanya-puritam prabho visanti sarvatah sindhum tadvat tvam gatayo 'ntatah, "Everyone actually worships you, Lord, because you are the sum total of all devas, even if devotees meditate on the other forms separately from you. Just like the rivers are born from the mountains where the rainwater is collected, and then end up into the ocean, all paths ultimately attain you, Lord."

The problem lies only in the minds of the worshipers who delude themselves into thinking that they can cut some corners in life by bribing some lower-rung minister in the government and obtain benefits without having actually earned them. This is explained in verses 7.23 ("Persons of lesser intelligence seek temporary benefits") and 4.12 ("Those human beings who desire to achieve perfection in their actions worship the devas in this world, because in this way perfection can quickly be attained through one's efforts."). There is nothing wrong in respectfully making friends and associating with the devas - just like there is nothing wrong in making friends with powerful virtuous personalities in the government - because by associating with them we can learn to work and live like them on a sattvic and responsible platform, and cooperating with them for the support of the society and the universe is always required by the proper established system.

The mistake would be considering them as authorities in themselves, as separate and independent from the Government, and expecting them to support and protect us even if we engage in illicit and illegal activities, or to give us what is not lawfully destined to us. A famous example in this regard is offered by Bhagavata Purana (4.31.14): yatha taror mula nisekanena tripyanti tat skandha bhujopasakha, pranopaharac ca yathendriyanam tatbaiva sarvarbanam acyuteja, "Just like by watering the root of a tree all its branches and twigs are satisfied, and by feeding the prana all the senses are nourished, by worshipping Acyuta, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, one can please everything (in the universe)." This example is particularly suitable because intelligent people are able to understand that, besides watering the roots and feeding the prana in the body, it is always good to wash the leaves of the tree to remove the dust that obstructs the proper functions of the photosynthesis, as well as to brush one's teeth, apply eye balm and proper hair and skin massage oils or ointments.

अहं हि सर्वयज्ञानां भोक्ता च प्रभुरेव च । न तु मामभिजानन्ति तत्त्वेनातश्च्यवन्ति ते ॥ ९-२४ ॥

aham hi sarvayajñānāṁ bhoktā ca prabhureva ca । na tu māmabhijānanti tattvenātaśchyavanti te ॥ 9-24 ॥

aham: I (am); hi: certainly; sarva-yajnanam: of all the yajnas; bhokta: the beneficiary; ca: and; prabhuh: the Lord; eva: certainly; ca: and; na: not; tu: but; mam: me; abhijananti: they know; tattvena: in truth; atah: therefore; cyavanti: (they) fall down; te: they.

"I am the Lord and beneficiary of all yajnas. Those who do not understand my tattva will have to take birth again."

Again, this verse repeats that all sacred actions should be dedicated to the Supreme Consciousness, that is the ultimate and true beneficiary, as we had already seen in verse 3.9.

The downfall mentioned in this verse is the cycle of births and deaths, in which the conditioned soul keeps revolving, even when he qualifies for a position in the higher planets and the company of the devas - that are temporary manifestations of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. As we have seen explained in several verses, those who aspire simply to attain the higher planets for better sense enjoyment will have to fall back again when their virtuous merits have been spent, while those who consistently make an effort in yoga to attain a level of transcendental consciousness become liberated - whether they continue to perform their ordinary religious duties to society and family, or they enter the order of renunciation.

A deep lack of understanding of this verse is the cause of the old and bitter controversy between the exponents of smarta brahmanism based on the ritualistic karma kanda path on one side, and the shankarite sanmyasis who follow the path of renunciation and a more philosophical interpretation of Vedic knowledge on the other side, as we mentioned in commentary to verse 3.1. Only after properly studying chapter 3 (and remembering it) we will be able to understand chapter 9, otherwise we will simply perpetuate the misunderstanding. For someone who has really read and understood the instructions of Krishna until this point of Bhagavad gita, it should be already very clear that this verse does not prohibit or minimize the importance of the yajnas or the worship to the devas, but simply states that - as for everything else - all our actions should be performed on a higher level of awareness, not simply to obtain some material benefits but to actively participate to the universal Consciousness.

The devas do not have any animosity or competition feelings towards the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and if sometimes there appear to be some disagreements, they are meant to create a lila that will enthrall the attention of human beings as a wonderful story of adventures - just like the actors of a same troupe will play out different scripts to make their repertoire more interesting. In the end, all the devas always cooperate with each other and they always worship the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Vishnu, who is called deva deva, "the God worshiped by the Gods". In this understanding, we can read the many verses from the vaishnava shastra where Vishnu is presented as the Supreme, without remaining confused by the illusion of duality typical of so-called monotheism.

In recent times, there has been a controversial theory according to which the concept of reincarnation is not an original idea in Vedic culture, because the Veda sambhitas - considered by mainstream western academia as the most ancient part of the Vedic scriptures - do not speak about reincarnation at all. It's like saying that because in the texts about mathematics and calculus there is no mention about cooking recipes, mathematicians never eat food, or do not believe in eating food.

The Rig Vedic hymns are meant to worship the devas and to raise the consciousness of the worshipers to a divine level, to bring him into the personal company of the devas. That is precisely to avoid reincarnating on a lower level. Reincarnation is never the purpose of Vedic knowledge: such an idea is never expressed in any Vedic text, ancient or more recent. The purpose is to achieve moksha: reincarnation is just the mechanism by which those who fail in one lifetime can try again in a next birth. The Rig Vedic hymns are meant to worship the devas and to raise the consciousness of the worshipers to a divine level, to bring him into the personal company of the devas. That is precisely to avoid reincarnation on a lower level.

One of the main problems is that non-Vedic academia wants to demonstrate that Vedic knowledge/ culture is a "work in progress", and that it started from a primitive level. This obviously is an attempt to show that in the course of time, one should "progress beyond Vedic knowledge" and arrive at the "superior knowledge of the mainstream academia". Trying to give an interpretation of Vedic scriptures according to some hypothetical "linear historical development" is futile, as the Vedic scriptures themselves clearly state that the entire corpus of Vedas - Sambhitas, Brahmanas, Aranyakas, Upanishads, Puranas, Mahabharata - was compiled at the same time by Vyasa about 5000 years ago at the beginning of Kali yuga. Also, there is no evidence that disproves this statement of the Vedic scriptures: absence of proof is not proof of absence, especially when so much evidence supporting the Vedic version has been destroyed by the opponents of Hinduism. These academics that date Vedic scriptures only according to the manuscripts in their possessions are practically telling you that your grandmother did not exist, because there are no documents about her identity. The simple fact is that grandmother did not need passports or certificates to prove that she existed. Also, we all know that passports and certificates can be falsified by dishonest persons, so they don't have much value anyway.

यान्ति देवव्रता देवान्पितृन्यान्ति पितृव्रताः । भूतानि यान्ति भूतेज्या यान्ति मद्याजिनोऽपि माम् ॥ ९-२५ ॥

yānti devavratā devānpitṛnyānti pitṛvratāḥ । bhūtāni yānti bhūtejyā yānti madyājino'pi mām ॥ 9-25 ॥

yanti: they go; deva-vratāḥ: those who dedicate themselves to the devas; devan: to the devas; pitṛin: to the pitṛis; yanti: they go; pitṛi-vratāḥ: those who dedicate themselves to the pitṛis; bhutan: to the ghosts/ beings; yanti: they go; bhuta-ijyah: those who sacrifice to the ghosts/ beings; yanti: they go; mad-yajinah: those who sacrifice to me; api: certainly; mam: me.

"Those who dedicate themselves to the worship of the devas will go to the devas, those who worship the pitṛis will go to the pitṛis, those who worship the ghosts and other beings will join them. In the same way, those who sacrifice for me will come to me."

Whatever level of consciousness we have developed during the time allotted to us for this lifetime, we will be able to retain it at the time of death, and whatever we remembers at the time of death will be our next destination (8.6). It is not a reward for an allegiance, but the development of a natural attachment, of the tendencies and qualities that are most suited for a particular level of consciousness, that will automatically attract us to our next destination. The vidhi or niyama specific for each different type of worship is meant to stimulate certain qualities and tendencies: worship to the devas for the purpose of attaining their planets lead to developing sattvic qualities in sense enjoyment, and a conditioning to material joy and power. What is worship? Association.

When we worship the devas by remembering them, calling them to accept our offerings, and talking about them - their names, their activities, their qualities, etc - we are associating with them and therefore we develop the same characteristics, thus automatically qualifying ourselves to reside with them and to become their personal companions and assistants in their valuable service to God. We will not - as some fools have dared to say - go to hell or fall to a lower level of life.

On the other hand, worship to the pitris means full dedication to family and society life in the karma kanda system, with a strong attachment to tradition; when the ancestors worshiped were virtuous people worthy of attaining the dharmic planet of Dharmaraja, the worshipers also develop the same qualities and ultimately attain the pitris' planet or in the very least they obtain rebirth in the same family among the same people. Also in this case, honoring and worshiping the ancestors will take us higher, and not lower - provided of course that our worshiping is performed according to the principles of dharmā. Also, such ancestors must have been actually qualified as civilized human beings, or even saintly personalities who actually reside in Pitriloka, and not asuric people who became ghosts or reincarnated in a lower form of life. In Kali yuga, this path is becoming increasingly distorted and difficult because people are unable to actually follow it, and therefore they only keep the externals, or simply the identification label, with no actual substance - of course, this is not sufficient to grant access to the higher planets.

These are the two paths that Krishna had already described in verses 8.23 to 8.27 as deva ayana and pitri ayana, for those who have cultivated the knowledge of Brahman. However, there is also another path, that does not take higher but remains within the earthly level or even lower than that, and keeps the individual soul in the world of harsh conditions.

Worship to the bhutas refers to the dedication to the worship of conditioned souls on the earthly level or even lower levels (subterranean, or lower planetary systems), whether they are embodied or not. This also includes the worship to materialistic conditioned people, such as movie stars, professional sports stars, music stars, politicians, or other popular or cultural icons that become true idols and gods in the eyes of their fans. At the time of death, their most loyal and passionate fans will follow them in whatever destination they have attained. Many people in India claim to be tantric worshipers devoted to the Mother Goddess or Shiva in their terrifying forms, but in fact they associate with those servants of Bhairavi or Bhairava that are in the categories of dakṣiṇis, vinayakas, vitalas, yakshas, and pisacas. Whenever a tantric worships with impure substances (such as liquors, meat, blood etc) the offering is accepted not by Bhairavi or Bhairava, but by their followers and companions, the ghosts.

Often simple-minded people are strongly attracted to these creatures because of the power they can manifest on the subtle level, and because of the favors they can render to their human associates; there is a fine line between honoring them as servants of the Mother or Father, and actually establishing a personal relationship with them or even entering into some pact with them. By doing so, one inevitably develops similar characteristics and tendencies.

In modern times, ghost worship has taken a new dimension through the popular culture of horror movies - zombies, vampires, ghosts, serial killers, dark mystery etc - and also due to the sharp increase of suicides, violent deaths, drug abuse and mental illnesses, that are all connected to the ghostly world and qualities. A sensitive person will immediately feel when the people around him/ her have developed this particular tamasic character, and will avoid their company. On the other hand, those who constantly think about Krishna as the Supreme Personality of Godhead - Bhagavan, Paramatma, Brahman - will enter that dimension of consciousness and at the time of death they will not need to take another birth in this material world.

पत्रं पुष्पं फलं तोयं यो मे भक्त्या प्रयच्छति ।

तदहं भक्त्युपहृतमश्नामि प्रयतात्मनः ॥ ९-२६ ॥

patraṁ puṣpaṁ phalaṁ toyam yo me bhaktyā prayacchati | tadahaṁ bhaktyupahṛtamaśnāmi prayatātmanah | | 9-26 | |

patram: one leaf; pushpam: one flower; phalam: one fruit; toyam: some water; yah: one who; me: to me; bhaktya: with love and devotion; prayacchati: asks to accept; tat: that; aham: I; bhakti-upahritam: (because it is) presented with love and devotion; asnami: I eat; prayata-atmanah: sincerely dedicated/ in purity of mind.

"If someone, with sincere love and devotion, offers me even one leaf, one flower, one fruit or some water, I will accept the offering because of that love and devotion."

This verse is also very famous and important, and needs to be understood properly.

In all personal relationships, food constitutes a very strong bond and an intimate exchange. The affection between mother and child develops through feeding, especially breast feeding, so bottle-feeding, restricted feeding times, or wet-nurse feeding of infants is going to weaken the connection with the natural mother, especially in the first days after birth, and create the basis for an emotionally frustrated adult. An asuric culture based on compulsive emotional consumerism and mind control through manipulation of low self-esteem of the public will certainly obstruct a healthy and natural relationship between mother and child. When a boy and a girl fall in love, they enjoy eating together and exchanging chocolates or candies, or cooking for each other. It is also common knowledge that the best way to a person's heart is through the stomach, so a good wife should train herself to become a good cook and put love in her cooking. When we go to meet someone important we bring a gift of food - sweets, a bottle of drink, etc - and seasonal and festival gifts were originally based on food, either cooked, or uncooked. Similarly, when devotees visit temples, they bring food offerings especially in the form of fruits and sweets. Flowers are also an all-popular gift in all affectionate relationships. The "essence of flowers" is often presented in the form of perfumes, scents, after-shave lotions, scented candles etc, which brings us back to the flower idea. Thus, the very popular offering of incense and flower garlands in temples perfectly fit in the "puspam" definition given in this verse.

The patram (leaf) mentioned in the verse mainly refers to the leaves of sacred plants, especially tulasi, that is considered the best offering for Krishna for several reasons. The tulasi plant grows easily and wildly in many places, especially those places that have been purified by some religious/ spiritual activity or by the presence or passage of a great soul, therefore an offering of tulasi leaf is easily affordable for everyone. Even more important, tulasi (Ocimum sanctum), has extraordinary medicinal properties, fighting infections, fevers and contaminations of all kinds. In a wider sense, the leaf, flower and fruit mentioned in the verse refer to a sattvic vegetarian diet, as there is practically no violence, no killing, involved in collecting leaves, flowers and fruits from plants, and they can be consumed without even cooking. This is the perfect yoga diet, free from karma, and it becomes perfectly spiritualized when such ingredients are offered to God in sincere love and devotion. For those who are unable to follow this strict diet, there are provisions for other sattvic vegetarian ingredients, such as food grains and pulses, roots vegetables, nuts and seeds of various types and their derivatives.

In a proper environment and society, milk is obtained without causing any suffering to the animals, and as cows are honored like mothers, a positive direct relationship is developed between the cow and the human beings who drink her milk. Just like in humans, a mother cow can produce more milk than what is actually needed by the newborn, and the flow of milk increases with the deepening of affection and the requirement of feeding - of course, within reason. Genetic manipulation, artificial insemination and other unnatural practices in dairy farms, and even more so the forced separation of the calves from their mothers, create an asuric condition by which milk becomes contaminated by bad karma and thus generates diseases in the human beings that consume it. In such conditions, it is better to opt for a vegan diet.

In commentary to verse 2.64 we have already discussed about the prasadam, the sanctified pure vegetarian food offered to God. Here we may add a few more considerations.

First of all, the most important factor in the offering of foods to God is bhakti. Without sincere love and devotion, God is not bound or forced to accept anything - not by government or institutional order, by political appointment of the priest, by dint of the priest's ancestry, or even by complicated ritual procedures or regulations, or because of the material value of the food that is being offered. We should remember the episode when Krishna went to Hastinapura and refused to attend the royal banquet prepared by Duryodhana, but was happy to eat the very simple food offered lovingly by Vidura. Also, we should remember the humble gift that the brahmana Sudama had carried to Krishna's house; on that occasion, Krishna speaks this very same verse (9.26) to Sudama (Bhagavata Purana 10.81.4).

God is not a "prasada vending machine", to which you supply the bhoga, click away with the correct alphabetical sequences, sprinkle some water, and presto! the prasadam is ready. If there is no bhakti, God does not accept any offering. In some exceptional cases, God may accept the offering even if the priest is not qualified, but only because there are sincere devotees outside who are hoping to obtain the sanctified food and will honor it properly. Also, bhakti means total dedication (prayata atmanah). One should not offer simply a leaf or a fruit to Krishna, and eat a big feast himself without offering it to Krishna.

The expression prayata atmanah can be better understood by reading in Bhagavata Purana (8.16.62) the instructions of Kasyapa explaining to Aditi how to perform the paya vrata: tasmat etat vratham bhadre prayata sraddhaya acara bhagavan paritusta te varan asu vidbasyati. The Lord is pleased when a devotee is bhadra (benevolent, gentle, friendly to everyone, wishing good for everyone), sraddhavan (sustained by consistent and strong faith in God), and behaves (achara) according to the rules of yoga (yama and niyama) and the requirements of sincere bhakti. There must be dedication and consistency in consciousness, and purity of heart.

Some commentators believe that this purity refers to the body, therefore people of the "wrong caste" and women, especially during their menstrual periods, cannot offer anything to Krishna. This is incorrect. Of course when we speak about institutionalized religion, official temple worship aimed at social aggrandizement, and appeasement of materialistic and ignorant people, it might be useful to maintain some professional priests and establish some elaborate grandiose rituals and build an impressive temple that could add prestige to the enterprise, but that has no relevance to direct bhakti, because Krishna does not care for such externals. The only justification for such theatrical trappings is the limited value of their attractiveness in the eyes of the ignorant masses, that can somehow be inspired by the idea of the entertainment provided, and will acquire some ajñata-sukṛiti (unconscious merit) by seeing the gorgeously decorated Deity in the temple and assisting to some emotionally charged, folkloristic, solemn, grandiose and expensive ceremony.

Purification is already guaranteed by the mere remembrance of the Lord, as we are reminded constantly by the popular mantra from the Garuda Purana: om apavitrah pavitro va sarvavastham gato 'pi va, yah smaret pundarikakam sa bahyabhyantarah sucib, "One who remembers the lotus-eyed Lord immediately becomes purified internally and externally, no matter whether s/he has performed the prescribed ablutions or is in an impure condition of any type." Now: either we believe in the statements of the shastras, or we don't. If we repeat mantras without actually believing what we say, we are not better than ignorant animals who just parrot what they heard without understanding. Of course, this should not be an encouragement to become lazy and simply avoid taking bath or observing the rules of cleanliness: it is all in the sincerity of the heart. The most important purity is the purity of the heart.

Bhagavata Purana (4.31.21) confirms: na bhajati kumanisinam sa ijjam harir adhanatma-dhana priyo rasa-jnah, sruta dhana kula karmanam madair ye, vidadhati papam akincanesu satsu, "The Lord never accepts any offering or sacrifice from persons who have a dirty mind/heart. He is dear to those who have abandoned all identifications and attachments to material things, and simply depend on the Atman. On the other hand, those who are arrogant by dint of their ancestry, learning, wealth and great deeds are simply sinful people, who mistreat the devotees."

The word prayaccha means "asking". When we offer something, we are asking Krishna to accept our offering, because it is a favor that Krishna is doing to us, not the other way around. Krishna does not need our offerings. He does not need food or worship, because he is already perfectly satisfied in himself, and he can get unlimited pleasures and valuables from his own internal shaktis - those same shaktis that create the entire universe. When we offer something to God, the only merit we accrue is the result of our bhakti.

यत्करोषि यदश्नासि यज्जुहोषि ददासि यत् । यत्तपस्यसि कौन्तेय तत्कुरुष्व मदर्पणम् ॥ ९-२७ ॥

yatkaroṣi yadaśnāsi yajjuhoṣi dadāsi yat । yattapasyasi kaunteya tat-kuruṣva madarpaṇam ॥ 9-27 ॥

yat: whatever; karosi: you do; yat: whatever; asnasi: you eat; yat: whatever; jubosi: you sacrifice; dadasī: you give in charity; yat: whatever; yat: whatever; tapasyasi: you endure as austerity; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); tat: that; kurusva: you (should) do; mad-arpāṇam: for my sake.

"O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me."

Krishna does not require complicated rituals or great deeds: it is sufficient that we remember him with love and devotion all the time, in every action we do. We do not need to constantly remember the līlas of Syamasundara playing the flute or dallying with the gopīs; it is sufficient that we realize that Krishna is the sum total of the entire Consciousness, and we remain tuned in on the proper frequency of awareness - the spiritual, transcendental existence of Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. Bhagavata Purana (1.5.5) confirms this point in the instructions of Narada to Vyasa: kurvāna yatra karmāṇi bhagavac cābhikṣayaśakrit, grīṇanti guṇa nāmāni kṛṣṇaṇusmaranti ca, "One should perform one's duties properly, as instructed by Krishna, and at the same time s/he should always remember Krishna's names, qualities, etc." Again in 11.2.36, we find: kāyena vaca manasendriyair va buddhyatmana vanusṛta svābhavat, karoti yad yat sakalam paraśmai naraṇaṇyati samarpayet tat, "Whatever activities one performs according to one's true nature by body, speech, mind and intelligence, one should be focused on the ātman and offer everything to Narayana."

Our daily work in our professional occupation should be offered to Krishna, because Krishna has given clear instructions that we should perform our duties in the best possible way, albeit without personal selfish attachment. Our activities in family and society should be offered to Krishna because all the people we interact with are children and servants of Krishna, and Krishna lives in their hearts and is their best friend. Whatever we do for fun or relaxation, including simple sleep, or to keep our bodies and mind in shape as required by our work, should also be offered to Krishna because our bodies and minds belong to Krishna, and we must take proper care of them to be able to utilize them in his service. Whatever we eat should be offered to Krishna - either officially, with the proper ritual and mantras, or unofficially, with a simple mental offering by which we remember Krishna's presence within us, and his supreme Consciousness as the leader of our individual consciousness. Thus the very act of eating - for pleasure and for nourishment - becomes a sacred act of sacrifice.

Adi Shankara wrote in his Soundarya lahari: japo jalpa śilpam sakalam āpi mudra virācana, gatiḥ pradakṣiṇya kṛmāṇam āsanādya abhūti vidhiḥ, prāṇamah samvṛṣa sukham ākīlam ātmaṛpaṇa dṛṣa, śāparya paryāyas tava bhavatu yaṁ me vilasitam, "Let every sound I pronounce be a prayer to you and a repetition of your holy name, let every work and movement of my hands be ritual gestures in your worship. Let each step I take be a pradakṣiṇa - a mark of homage - to you, let my eating and drinking be sacred offerings in the fire of your reality, let my laying down to rest be a prostration to your feet, and let whatever gives pleasure to my life become a sacred offering to you."

The meritorious acts of ritual ceremonies (yajna), distribution of charity (dāna) and the voluntary facing of difficulties in pursuance of a higher purpose (tapas) are considered fundamental religious duties, and they are listed in this verse as jubosi, dadasī and tapasyasi. We have already discussed about the various types of yajnas, especially in 3.9 to 3.16, and 4.23 to 4.34; here we may simply add that traditionally, even those who are most strongly attached to the karma kanda path always pronounce the mantra sri kṛṣṇāya samarpaṇa astu, "I am offering this to Sri Krishna", indicating that the ultimate purpose of the ritual is to please Krishna.

There are a lot of misconceptions about charity and austerity, and they will all be cleared later by Krishna in chapters 16, 17 and 18.

शुभाशुभफलैरेवं मोक्ष्यसे कर्मबन्धनैः ।

संन्यासयोगयुक्तात्मा विमुक्तो मामुपैष्यसि ॥ ९-२८ ॥

śubhāśubhaphalairēvaṁ mokṣyase karmabandhanaiḥ । saṁnyāsayogayuktātmā vimukto māmupaiṣyasi ॥ 9-28 ॥

subha: auspicious/ favorable; asubha: inauspicious/ unfavorable; phalaih: the results; evam: thus; mokṣyase: you will become free; karma-bandhanaiḥ: from the bondage of activities; saṁnyasa-yoga: in the saṁnyasa yoga; yukta-atma: engaging your self; vimuktaḥ: liberated; mam: me; upaiṣyasi: you will attain.

"O Arjuna, by engaging in the saṁnyasa yoga (the principle of renunciation), you will become free from the bondage of activities, and from the favorable and unfavorable results of actions. Thus you will attain me."

The principle of renunciation (saṁnyasa) has been already amply elaborated in chapter 5, entitled specifically Saṁnyasa Yoga. To summarize it, we can quote the famous verse 2.47: "You certainly have the right to perform actions but never (the right) to enjoy the fruits of your actions. Do not (try to) become the cause of the fruits of the action, but do not become attached to inaction."

Some foolish and ignorant people suggested that Bhagavad gita is outdated and irrelevant today, because Krishna says, "Do your duty without being concerned about the results of your activities". In their foolishness and ignorance, they interpret this instruction to mean that one should be irresponsible and callous towards the effects of one's actions, like a reckless driver that does not care for the safety of other people on the road. But this is not Krishna's instruction. Krishna said (2.47) that one should perform the proper duty selflessly, not for the personal benefit that one can derive from it, but out of a spirit of sacrifice. Rather than comparing the buddhi yogi to a reckless driver, we should compare it to a benevolent gardener, who plants virtuous and useful trees in in public places to benefit everyone, without planning to keep the fruits for himself only. Without this spirit of selfless social service to the community, people become selfish and greedy and end up suffering from their own miserliness, because nobody gets any fruits as nobody plants trees. The Bhakti literature (Bhakti rasamrita sindhu 2.255) offers a valuable key to understand this concept in the light of the higher consciousness of service to Krishna as the Sum total of all Consciousness and Reality: anasaktasya visayan yatharham upayunjatah, nirbandhe krsna-sambandhe yukta-vairagyam ucyate, "Yukta vairagya, or yoga vairagya, is the quality of detachment and renunciation by which one carefully and sincerely engages in one's prescribed duty, considering it a service in relationship with Krishna Consciousness."

Genuine renunciation does not mean abstaining from good actions, but it is about engaging in proper work with a selfless spirit, as it is repeated many times in Gita: 2.71, 3.4, 3.5, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.18, 3.19, 3.30, 3.33, 4.17, 4.18, 4.20, 4.21, 4.22, 4.23, 4.41, 5.2, 5.3, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.9, 5.10, 5.11, 5.12, 5.13, 5.14, 6.2, 6.3, 18.2, 18.5, 18.6, 18.7, 18.8, 18.9, 18.10, 18.11, 18.12, 18.23, 18.24, 18.25, 18.48, 18.49. Renouncing egotism and selfishness (also called ahankara and mamatva) covers both the good results and the bad results (gain or loss, victory or defeat, joy or sorrow) that may come from the proper performance of one's duty: yo na brisyati na dvesti na socati na kanksati, subhasubha-parityagi bhaktiman yah sa me priyah, "A devotee who is not distracted by joys or sorrows, worries or aspirations, and is detached both from positive and negative circumstances, is very dear to me" (12.17). The point is that a devotee performs his/her duty without being hampered by his/ her own emotions or other distractions due to his/ her own body or mind. All these emotions are simply circumstances created by the material body and mind, and are temporary like the appearance and disappearance of heat and cold during the various seasons, and they should simply be tolerated (2.14, 6.7, 12.16) while we continue to perform our duty in the best possible way. This is the only way to attain moksha (liberation).

समोऽहं सर्वभूतेषु न मे द्वेष्योऽस्ति न प्रियः । ये भजन्ति तु मां भक्त्या मयि ते तेषु चाप्यहम् ॥ ९-२९ ॥

samo'ham sarvabhūteṣu na me dveṣyo'sti na priyaḥ । ye bhajanti tu mām bhaktyā mayi te teṣu cāpyaham ॥ 9-29 ॥

samah: equally disposed; aham: I (am); sarva: (towards) all; bhutesu: the living beings; na: not; me: for me; dveṣyaḥ: (someone who is) hated; asti: there is; na: not; priyaḥ: (someone who is) dear; ye: those; bhajanti: offer sincere service; tu: but; mam: me; bhaktiya: with devotion; mayi: in me; te: them; tesu: in them; ca: and; api: certainly; aham: I (am).

"I am equally disposed towards all living beings. I do not hate anyone, and I do not favor anyone. Yet, when someone offers me a sincere service in devotion, they are in me and I am in them."

This verse presents two extraordinary points, that can totally change our ideas on religion.

The first point is God's personal impartiality towards all beings. There is no chosen people - neither Jewish, Indian, Hindu, Islamic or Christian, American, Bengali, Tamil, Brijabasi or Puribasi. There is no chosen group: no high caste or dalits/ Harijans, no special family or ethnic background or any other denomination. There are no favoritisms to white, brown or black, men or women, or people affiliated to a particular organization or group, or another. Even the idea of "caste vaishnavas" is a totally unfounded superstition that is not confirmed by any genuine scripture, because Vishnu reciprocates his devotees individually, for the personal devotion that each one of them sincerely and genuinely offers to him, and not for the merits of some distant ancestors.

In fact, God equally loves all living beings, those who are super-human and those who are sub-human, and wants them all to progress and find the ultimate happiness. Therefore God does not condone any unnecessary violence or disrespect towards his creatures, and allows each and every individual to make their choices and learn from the consequences. All the time, he remains everybody's hearts as the Paramatma, the most benevolent and intimate friend, even when they fall into the most degraded forms of life. The sun equally shines over everyone, and we can choose whether to appreciate it or not. Lotus flowers bloom in their full splendor and perfume under the sun, while bats go to hide in dark places until sunset. God is benevolent even towards the asuras, those human or over-human people that choose to act against the progress and benefit of others and against the order of the universe. Sometimes God appears personally to engage in battle with them, and then by his direct contact the asura is instantly enlightened and becomes liberated.

However, God is not interested in killing or protecting anyone (Bhagavata Purana 8.5.22), in neglecting or glorifying anyone: he simply engages his nature (maya sakti) for the creation, preservation and dissolution of the material manifestations, for the benefit and progress of all. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana 8.16.14, for example, where Aditi speaks to Kasyapa Rishi, who says that he is equally benevolent to all his sons, devas and asuras, just like the Supreme Personality of Godhead, who lovingly serves his devotees. This sentiment of God towards his devotees is called bhakta vatsalya, indicating that he is "affectionate to his devotee like a cow loves her calf". Another confirmation is found in Bhagavata Purana 10.86.59, where God is called bhakta bhaktiman, "devotee of his devotees".

Human beings cannot anger God by insulting or disobeying him, or bribe him by praising or worshiping him. This is explained in Bhagavata Purana 6.17.22: "God has no kith and kin, no relatives or friends, no chosen people, as he does not favor anyone over others. This is because he is not touched by the transformations and fluctuations of material nature, by joy or sorrow, by attachment or by anger." We can only please God by our sincere devotion, that can be expressed in several ways detailed scientifically in the Bhakti literature, that we have already mentioned in previous comments. Talking and listening about God's names, qualities, activities, teachings, and remembering them is the most important of all, because it brings us closer to the Transcendental Consciousness that is our real original nature.

Pada sevana, "serving the feet of God", is a symbolic expression for following the instructions offered by God, but this will work only when it is done with sincere devotion, and not in a mechanical or sycophantic way. The definitions of bhajan and bhakti ("worship and serve with devotion") also include the others of the nine forms of devotional service, namely offering pleasurable objects (as in arbhana), offering sincere homage and prayers (vandana), remaining always ready to serve God (dasya), becoming close friends with God (sakhya) and dedicating oneself fully to God (atma nivedana). And when we establish such sincere loving personal relationship with God, the most wonderful thing happens: God reciprocates with us exactly in the same way. Krishna does not say that he will bless us, or reward us: he says he will also worship his devotees and serve his own devotees with sincere devotion (bhajami aham, 4.11).

अपि चेत्सुदुराचारो भजते मामनन्यभाक् । साधुरेव स मन्तव्यः सम्यग्व्यवसितो हि सः ॥ ९-३० ॥

api cetsudurācāro bhajate māmananyabhāk | sādhuveva sa mantavyaḥ samyagvyavasito hi saḥ || 9-30 ||

api: even; cet: if; su-dura-acarab: very bad behavior; bhajate: offers sincere service; mam: me; ananya-bhak: without any other attachment or concern; sadhu: a good person; eva: certainly; saḥ: s/he; mantavyaḥ: must be considered; samyak: completely; vyavasitab: situated; hi: indeed; saḥ: s/he.

"When a person is fully immersed and engaged in true devotional service, without any other concern or desire, must be considered a sadhu, even if he shows a very bad behavior. This is because his/ her position is completely different."

The expression su-dura-acarab especially applies to behaviors that are contrary to virtuous social conventions, such as the violation of the rules of civilized life expected from a yogi and an arya - especially those regarding food and other personal life habits. It is an expression similar to duratma ("bad person"), but while duratma refers to a person's nature, duracara only refers to the external behavior. A bhakta normally shines with high sattvic qualities demonstrated consistently in his/her behavior, as described for example in Bhagavata Purana 1.16.26-30, or in Madhurya kadambini, a Bhakti manual written by Visvanatha Chakravarti where it is said, sarvair gunais tatra samasate surab, "a genuine devotee shows all the good qualities of the devas". For example, s/he is always peaceful, meek, kind and mild, does not quarrel with anyone, talks pleasantly and tactfully, and is only interested in spiritual topics, with a strong disinterest in material affairs. However, sometimes we also find great devotees or even divine Personalities that, for some reason, exhibit a behavior that does not exactly correspond to these expectations, and this creates ripples in social interactions and conventions. Such apparent defects are instrumental to the particular mission of those devotees, because a sincere and genuine devotee, completely immersed in pure devotional service as clarified in this verse, has no other concern and certainly no personal attachments or identifications to accommodate.

It is said that the true mission of a reformer is to "comfort the disturbed and disturb the comfortable", because both extremes of the mental condition in a human being create a blockage that prevents progress in spiritual realization. Sometimes a devotee comes to shake the boat and wake up the sleeping souls, even if that might be perceived as a social disturbance or subversion of the established order. For example we see that Vasistha Rishi ate the asura Vatapi, and Ganga drowned her own children. Shiva lives in crematoriums and drank the balabala poison. Rama killed Vali. Krishna danced with the married gopis, abducted Rukmini and organized the abduction of his sister Subhadra (both girls were very happy about the abduction, though), and gave the Pandavas apparently questionable instructions on how to defeat their enemies.

As confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (10.33.29): dharmā vyatikramo drsta isvaranam ca sabasam tejiyasam na dosaya vabneh sarva-bhujo yatha, "Sometimes we see that greatly powerful personalities appear to transgress the conventional religious or moral principles, but one should not dare imitate them artificially, because they are like fire, that can devour everything and still remain pure." This concept is described in the verse under study with the expression samyak vyavasitab, "they are in a very special position", because they have no personal selfish interest in such actions, either individual or collective. If we carefully analyze the actual motivations and effects of such apparently questionable actions, we find that they were always aimed at a greater benefit, both for the people that were directly involved in the action and for the universe in general.

Here is a crude example about this higher level of dharmā that appears to break the conventional idea of dharmā: let's say that we are sitting at the door of our house, when an innocent and terrified child comes running desperate to find shelter, as she is pursued by a criminal who wants to harm her. We watch as the child hides out of sight, and in the meantime the criminal arrives on the scene. When the criminal asks us if we saw a little girl running away, what should we say? Should we be fanatically loyal to the fundamental principle of dharmā - truthfulness - and reveal the hiding place of the little girl? Certainly not. We should give the criminal some false information that will keep him running in the wrong direction long enough to ensure the protection of the innocent girl. Yet, truthfulness and honesty is the most important principle in religious and spiritual life, without which it is not possible to make any advancement or even to maintain the position one has already reached. Therefore we should be very careful to always remain free from all selfish motivations, identifications and attachments, because this idea "for the greater good" can be dangerously twisted by a mind that is not perfectly pure yet.

Some people abuse this verse by taking it as an authorization to continue to commit illicit activities or even serious crimes on the strength of their so-called "devotion" to God, sometimes even claiming that they are indulging in their violent, immoral and/or dishonest activities as a form of devotional service, usually to defend their own material, social or political position and prestige, or the material interests of some institution or organization to which they are affiliated. Such misinterpretation is not substantiated by any scripture or genuine acharya.

Nowhere Krishna has stated or implied that one can use violence or dishonesty in devotional service, either in the preaching of his glories and teachings, or in any other devotional method of worship. It is ok to be bold and straightforward in speaking up about the scriptures and their application, and engage in debates and discussions, but there can be no physical violence or aggression under any circumstance, either against persons or against books or images etc, or to harm dissenters or people who ask difficult questions. The use of force is only allowed in self defense and the defense of innocent and good people when some aggressors literally come forward with dangerous weapons such as guns and knives, fire, etc; otherwise a devotee must not get into physical fights or brawls or engage in persecution or harassment of any type. Krishna certainly does not condone the cynical behavior of false devotees who deliberately continue to engage in wrongful acts, counting on their fake devotion to neutralize their karmic effects: this is clearly an offensive attitude, and listed among the 10 main offenses to be carefully avoided in devotional service. If by any chance we happen to meet so-called devotees who secretly or openly - or even boastfully - commit criminal actions, we should very carefully avoid any association with them and keep a distance, albeit without showing disrespect.

क्षिप्रं भवति धर्मात्मा शश्वच्छान्तिं निगच्छति । कौन्तेय प्रतिजानीहि न मे भक्तः प्रणश्यति ॥ ९-३१ ॥

ksīpṛaṁ bhavati dharmātmā śaśvaccchāntiṁ nigacchati | kaunteya pratijānīhi na me bhaktaḥ praṇasyati || 9-31 ||

ksīpṛam: very quickly; bhavati: s/he becomes; dharmā-atma: totally dedicated to dharmā; śaśvat: permanently; santim: peace; nigacchati: s/he attains; kaunteya: o son of Kunti (Arjuna); pratijānīhi: (please) declare; na: not; me: my; bhaktah: devotee; praṇasyati: is destroyed.

"My devotee quickly becomes fully dedicated to dharmā and attains a permanent peace. O son of Kunti, you can (safely) say that my devotee is never destroyed."

In verses 4.36 and 9.30, Krishna had already stated that sincere engagement in devotional service can purify anyone, irrespective of his or her past activities. We have seen the special case of greatly powerful personalities that exhibited apparently questionable behaviors; now we will examine the case of an ordinary devotee who happens to accidentally fall down on the path to perfection.

Sometimes it is not easy to distinguish one category of devotees from another, because often great personalities present themselves very humbly, as ordinary individuals, and declare that they have committed some mistake or offense, although the action was obviously instrumental to the Divine plan. In this case a devotee could manifest a bad behavior due to a weakness that is ascribed to some previous bad habits, a curse, and/ or very difficult circumstances, that cause a temporary downfall to a lower level of consciousness. Maharaja Parikshit became distracted by fatigue, thirst and hunger, and unwittingly offended an innocent brahmana. Entering the ashrama of Samika Rishi he hoped to receive a decent welcome and at least some water, but the Rishi was deeply immersed in meditation and did not even notice the king's arrival. Parikshit suspected that the brahmana was only pretending to be in a trance to avoid taking care of his guest, so he tried his patience by hanging a dead snake around the neck of the brahmana, in a mock imitation of the image of Shiva meditating. When the young son of Samika, named Srungi, returned home, he saw Parikshit leaving and discovered the bad joke at the expenses of his father, so he cursed Parikshit to die within 7 days. Informed about the curse by a concerned Samika, Parikshit recognized his fault and accepted to submit to the curse. Another example is Bhishma, considered one of the 12 mahajanas or greatest spiritual/ religious authorities of the universe, who became confused by the material affection for his father Santanu and for the wayward Duryodhana and sided with him against the Pandavas. At the end of the battle, making ready to die on his bed of arrows, Bhishma consoled Yudhisthira and the other Pandavas by saying that they should not be sorry for his death, as he had deserved it by his own bad choices. Visvamitra Rishi broke his meditation and austerities several times, falling prey to the power of kama and krodha. Every time he recognized his fault and atoned for his bad behavior, engaging in even more rigid austerities until he had completely conquered his senses. And there are also other examples of good devotees who committed mistakes due to some particular circumstances. The story of the Syamantaka jewel is all centered on a miraculous gem that Satrajit accused Krishna of having stolen. While searching for the gem, Krishna was faced with Jambavan who fought him off until he recognized him. As soon as they realized their mistake, both Satrajit and Jambavan begged forgiveness and offered Krishna their daughters in marriage, with great happiness of the concerned girls.

We may legitimately believe that such actions were actually organized by Krishna according to the Divine plan, because in all instances greater good came to all the concerned and to the universe at large, but since these devotees explicitly recognized their bad behavior and atoned for it, we must understand that they were setting the example for us to follow - recognizing our defects and mistakes, and humbly accepting to pay the price for them. As long as we have a material body, we are subject to the 4 material defects: the possibility of making a mistake, the limitations of our sense perception, the attraction of illusion, and a tendency to cheat - to choose a vision of reality that is more subjective than objective. However, true devotees are ready to recognize their faults, defects or mistakes, striving to atone and reform themselves. They accept the consequences of their actions, knowing that karma must take its course, and they do not try to escape or beg their way out. The most common pitfalls created by bad habits or difficult circumstances consist in irregularities in diet (wrong food, too much food, impure food, food eaten without the proper consciousness), sex (any violation of the brahmacharya rules), intoxication (any activity that creates an artificial state of consciousness), dishonesty (any misappropriation or lack of truthfulness), and lack of self control (anger, etc).

All this simply refers to the external and occasional behavior of a person, and not to his/ her normal nature, because a person that is normally and deliberately engaged in harmful and immoral activities cannot truly be a devotee of God. Krishna clearly says (7.28) that the devotees who worship him are liberated from the illusion of duality, have accumulated pious activities and abandoned all bad activities. Those who are duskṛitinaḥ, "evil doers" will never be able to approach Krishna truly (7.15).

Two famous verses from the Bhagavata Purana are often quoted in this regard:

sva pada mulam bhajata priyasya, tyaktanya bhavasya barib paresab, vikarma yac cotpatitam kathancid, dbunoti sarvam brdi sannivistam, "One who has given up all other interests and is engaged in serving the lotus feet of Hari is very dear to him. If he accidentally commits some bad action, the Lord that resides in his heart removes all impurities." (11.5.42)

yadi kuryat pramadena yogi karma vigarhitam, yogenaiva daved amho nanyat tatra kadacana, "If a yogi should commit some bad action because of momentary confusion, the practice of yoga itself will burn the negative consequences. There is no need of seeking other remedies." (11.20.25)

मां हि पार्थ व्यपाश्रित्य येऽपि स्युः पापयोनयः । स्त्रियो वैश्यास्तथा शूद्रास्तेऽपि यान्ति परां गतिम् ॥ ९-३२ ॥

mām hi pārtha vyapāśritya ye'pi syuḥ pāpayonayāḥ । striyo vaiśyāstathā śūdrāste'pi yānti parāṁ gatim ।। 9-32 ।।

mam : me; hi: indeed; partha: o son of Pritha (Arjuna); vyapasritya: have taken full shelter; ye: those; api: even; syuḥ: if they are; papa-yonayab: born from impure sexual intercourse; striyab: women; vaisyab: business people; tathā: also; sudrab: manual workers; te: they; api: also; yanti: attain; param: the supreme; gatiḥ: destination.

"O Arjuna, those who have completely taken shelter in me will attain the supreme destination, even if they were born from impure intercourse, women, business people and traders, or manual workers."

This verse is often misused by misogynists who claim that women are impure by birth and therefore they should not be allowed to study Vedic knowledge or engage in religious activities.

Some commentators translate papa-yonayab associating it with striyab and giving it the meaning of "prostitutes", but this does not seem to be Krishna's intention, first of all because the Vedic model of prostitution was not considered a sin. Still in Krishna's time we can see the examples of Kumbja (Trivakra) and the ganikas of Dvaraka that were great devotees like all the other residents of Krishna's city (Bhagavata Purana 1.11.19-21). The idea of prostitutes as "sinners" came to India only with the infiltration of the abrahamic ideologies, while in Vedic times (any time before the first islamic invasions) the ganikas ("women who associate with the public") or svarinis ("independent women") were very respected and their presence was considered auspicious, so much that they were regularly invited to various religious functions for family and society to bless the participants with their presence. Still today an echo of this tradition remains with the habit of transexual males who dress as women. We may remember in this regard that the presence of a real sinner is considered so contaminating that even seeing his face calls for a complete bath and change of clothing.

Another reason is purely grammatical. This verse is divided into two lines, and the expression papa-yonayab belongs to the first part, while the second half of the verse lists the other categories, in descending order of purity or importance. Obviously sudras are less qualified than vaisyas, so we must conclude that since Krishna has a reason for the order in which he lists the various categories, women should be considered more qualified than vaisyas. If we wanted to stretch the meaning of the verse to mean that all the categories described are "of sinful birth", we should accept the idea that vaisyas are born in a sinful condition - something that is certainly not supported by any other declaration in Vedic scriptures. Thus, the papa yonayab must be a separate category, that does not include the other categories listed in the second part of the verse. We could even say that the category described as papa-yonayab is considered by Krishna as more qualified than ordinary women (as well as than vaisyas and sudras), and this interpretation makes perfect sense if we apply it to all those individuals who were born from "impure intercourse", or from sexual unions that were not properly purified by the samskara prescribed by Vedic culture for the higher categories of civilized human beings: the garbhadhana samskara.

The definition itself - papa yonayab - refers to children who have been conceived without the proper purificatory rituals called garbhadhana samskara. All the dvi-jab (brahmanas, kshatriyas, vaisyas) that are in the grihastha (family) ashrama are expected to regularly perform a number of purificatory ceremonies, starting from the vivaha or solemnization of the marriage of the parents, to the garbhadhana ("giving the embryo") at the time of conception. After conception and before birth, the child is purified through the pumsavana and the simantonayana samskaras, then at birth the jatakarma is performed. After 6 months from birth, the name is given (nama karana), then the first grains are fed to the baby (anna prasana), then around 2 years of age the hair is cut (chuda karana). The karna bheda (wearing ear rings) is done only for brahmanas. The next samskara is the upanayana (accepting the sacred thread) and is followed by a number of minor rituals for the student life purification, all categories under the name prajapatyam. Next comes the vivaha or marriage.

The "purification of the womb" that removes the papa from the yoni - the ritual called garbhadhana - is meant to ensure that a sattvic, civilized, progressive and ethically and religiously inclined soul will be attracted to take birth from that specific sexual intercourse. When the fecundation and conception is done through a whimsical act of mere animal lust, or worse, the child generated is called papa yonayab, and is not considered as a legitimate member of the varna to which the parent belong. This also applies if the two parents were legally married; the papa ("negativity") does not refer to social considerations, but rather to the level of consciousness at the time of the intercourse and conception.

Such papa-yonayab are simply the antyajab, all those persons who were born outside the original system of varnas and ashramas, irrespective of their actual natural guna and karma - which could make them suitable candidates even for the highest positions in society. To tell the truth, it is extremely difficult if not impossible to find today someone who was born from a purified womb through the garbhadhana samskara, even among the highest castes of traditional orthodox Indian Hindus.

According to the original Vedic system, those antya-jah or papa-yonayah who possess the required guna and karma can become full-fledged members of the higher varnas - brahmanas and kshatriyas - simply by undergoing the prescribed purificatory ceremonies called prayascitta and vratyastoma or suddhi, and receiving the appropriate upanayana diksba from a qualified guru. This is unequivocally confirmed in several passages of the scriptures, for example in Bhagavata Purana 2.4.18, kirata hunandbra pulinda pulkasa abhira sumbha yavanas kbasadaya, ye 'nye ca papa yad apasrasrayah sudhyanti tasmai prabhavishnave namah, "Kirtas, Hunas, Andhras, Pulindas, Pulkasas, Abhiras, Sumbhas, Yavanas, Khasas etc, even those who were born in still more degraded cultures, are immediately purified when they put themselves under the guidance and protection of those who have taken shelter in Vishnu. Therefore I offer my homage to the all-powerful Sri Vishnu", 3.33.7: aho bata sva-paco 'to gariyan yaj-jihvagre vartate nama tubhyam, tepus tapas te juhuvub sasnur arya brahmanucur nama gmanti ye te, "It is wonderful to see how those who have accepted to invoke your holy name are immediately glorified as civilized persons (aryas) and are called brahmanas, even if there were born in uncivilized families. The very fact that they call your name qualifies them for the performance of sacrifices and austerities according to tradition" and 11.14.21, bhaktiyaham ekaya grahyah sraddhayatma priyah satam, bhaktih punati man-nistha sva-pakan api sambhavat, "Only devotion enables one to attain me. The devotees who serve me with faith and transcendental attachment are completely purified through their devotion, even if they had been born in uncivilized families." Even the historical chronicles and archaeological findings confirm that often individuals or entire populations of foreign origin chose to become part of Vedic society, adopting Sanskrit names and the rules of the varna ashrama, like for example the Scythian kings who became known as Satyasimha and Rudrasena.

The women (striyah) described in this verse are ordinary women, those who are mainly interested in family and social affairs, a good husband and nice children, a beautiful house and a prosperous life full of beauty and pleasure, palatable foods, elegant clothing and ornaments, and so on. The Vedic system does not despise this nature, because it tends to create a safe, pleasurable, affectionate, beautiful and sweet environment for the earliest experiences of children, which in turn will help the new generations grow without the physical and psychic damage and chronic dissatisfaction that is conducive to criminality. The caring and loving support of a good woman is also important for men in general, as they become able to achieve more in their professional and social life with the cooperation of their good wives. A woman must be a good administrator of the house, a good organizer of the servants and a good caretaker of all the people in the family and clan, and especially educate the children to the higher values and principles in life. Compared to a good wife's, the duty of the vaiśya is certainly easier and requires less qualifications and effort, because it is simply about managing laborers, animals, plants, land, money, and inanimate objects such as minerals and other merchandise. By definition, sudras are less qualified than vaiśyas because they cannot even take care of themselves and organize their own survival, therefore they depend on other more intelligent people who will give them instructions and provide to their maintenance.

किं पुनर्ब्राह्मणाः पुण्या भक्ता राजर्षयस्तथा । अनित्यमसुखं लोकमिमं प्राप्य भजस्व माम् ॥ ९-३३ ॥

kim punarbrāhmaṇaḥ puṇyā bhaktā rājarṣayastathā । anityamasukham lokamimam prāpya bhajasva mām ॥ 9-33 ॥

kim : what/ how much; punah: again; brahmanah: the brahmanas; puṇya: endowed with religious merits; bhaktā: endowed with loving devotion; rajarshayah: the saintly kings; tatha: also; anityam: impermanent; asukham: devoid of real happiness; lokam: world; imam: this; prāpya: have come to; bhajasva: being immersed in devotional service; mām: to me.

"What to speak of the brahmanas, (the virtuous devotees) and the saintly kings (who are rich in religious merits and devotion), and who are immersed in a service of devotion to me even in this impermanent and unsatisfactory world."

After listing the categories that are less qualified in regard to social position and religious inclinations, Krishna compares them to the two remaining categories in the Vedic social order: the brahmanas and the kshatriyas, that are properly qualified as per guna and karma. The comparison is meant to indicate greater expectations; in the previous verse Krishna declared that even those who are papa-yonayah can attain the highest perfection of life, so for more qualified people should be even easier. The expression kim punah means "what to speak of/ no need to say more". What are these qualifications? Guna means "qualities" and karma means "activities" or "performance of duties": both these requirements for these two higher varnas are amply described in the scriptures. In verse 4.13, Krishna has already stated very clearly that categorization in one of the varnas depends on the guna and karma, and not on jati (birth). A child who was born according to the proper purificatory system (garbhadhana samskara) in the higher varnas of society is not a papa-yonayah, but his guna and karma must be ascertained thoroughly and he must be trained by a responsible guru before he can be recognized as a true and functional member of the varna of his parents. Therefore the varna system is not hereditary, as misinformed people believe. In 18.42, Krishna says, samo damas tapah saucam kshantir arjavam eva ca, jñānam vijnanam astikyam brahma-karma svabhava-jam, "Equanimity, self-control, austerity, purity, tolerance, honesty, knowledge, wisdom and religiousness - these are the natural qualities determining the duties of the brahmana." The Mahabharata confirms: dharmaś ca satyam ca damas tapas ca, amatsaryam hris titikṣanasuya, yajnas ca danam ca dhṛtiḥ śrutam ca, vratani vai dvadasa brahmanasya, "(A brahmana) must always behave in accordance to dharma (the ethical principles that constitute the foundations of religion). First of all he must be truthful and able to control his own senses. He must be austere, detached, humble and tolerant. He must not envy anyone. He must be expert in the performance of sacrifices and distribute his possessions in charity. He must be seriously determined in the study of Vedic scriptures and in religious activities: these are the 12 fundamental qualities of a brahmana." Again in the Mahabharata (Vana Parva chapter 180) we find: satyam danam ksama-silam anṛsyamsam tapo ghrna, drsyante yatra nagendra sa brahmana iti smṛtāh, "A person who is truthful, charitable, forgiving, sober, kind, austere and free from hatred is called brahmana."

In the Bhagavata Purana (7.11.21) Narada Muni states: samo damas tapah saucam santosah ksantir arjavam, jnanam dayacyutatmatvam satyam ca brahma-laksanam, "The qualities that characterize a brahmana are the control of one's mind and senses, austerity and tolerance in the face of difficulties, cleanliness, contentment, tendency to forgive, simplicity, knowledge, compassion, truthfulness, and complete surrender to the Supreme Personality of Godhead." One who does not show such qualities cannot really be considered a brahmana. In the Mahabharata (Vana Parva chapter 180), Maharaja Yudhishthira states: sudre tu yad bhavel-laksma dvije tac ca na vidyate, na vai sudro bhavet chudro brahmano na ca brahmanah, "If these qualities (listed as the characteristics of the brahmanas) are found in a sudra (i.e. a person born in a sudra family), such a person must never be called a sudra, just like a brahmana (i.e. a person born in a brahmana family) is not a brahmana if he lacks these qualities."

Again the Mahabharata gives further clarifications in this regard (Anusasana Parva 163.8, 26, 46), where Shiva tells Parvati that society should be progressive: stbito brahmana-dharmena brahmanyam upajivati, ksatriyo vatha vaisyo va brahma-bhuyah sa gacchati, ebhis tu karmabhir deva subhair acaritais tatha, sudro brahmanatam yati vaisyah ksatriyatam vrajet, etaih karma-phalair deva suddhatma vijitendriyah, sudro'pi dvija-vat sevyo iti brahmabravat svayam, sarvo'yam brahmano loke vrttina tu vidhiyate, vrtte sthitas tu sudro'pi brahmanatvam niyacchati.

Here is the translation: "If ksatriyas or vaisyas behave like brahmanas and engage in the occupations of brahmanas, such persons attain the position of brahmana. In the same way, a sudra can become a brahmana and a vaiya can become a ksatriya. O Devi, thanks to the performance of these activities and by following the instructions of the Agamas (Vedic scriptures that contain the instructions for the rituals) even a person born in a family of sudras devoid of qualifications can become a brahmana. In this world, a person is born in a brahmana family as a result of his tendencies, therefore a sudra that manifests the tendencies of a brahmana and acts as a brahmana, automatically becomes a brahmana."

Another verse of the Mahabharata (Anusasana Parva 143.50) explains even more precisely: na yonir napi samskaro na srutam na ca santatib, karanani dvijatasya vrttam eva tu karanam, "Neither birth, nor purification rituals, scholarship or ancestry constitute legitimate qualifications for the position of brahmana. Only the behavior as brahmana constitutes the basis for the position of brahmana."

The position of brahmana is particularly delicate because brahmanas are responsible for the proper material and spiritual progress of society; they must teach, train, inspire, direct and purify the other varnas and even the antya-jah, those who were born outside the varna system. If they do not perform such duties, or they disgrace such duties by awarding the sacred thread irresponsibly to unworthy people without any training, they should be exposed and ostracized from the community of brahmanas. We should not take these matters lightly. The position of ksatriya is also very important and only qualified people should be allowed to occupy it. A true ksatriya is a rajarshi, a saintly warrior that is totally dedicated to the protection of the prajas and especially of the good people and the sacred places. The definition is composed by the two words raja ("king") and rishi ("self-realized sage") and refers to the deep knowledge and realization of the transcendental science.

Some misinformed people believe that any fighter can be called a ksatriya - including bullies, criminals, and warmongers - but this is wrong. Krishna in 18.43 describes the qualities of a ksatriya: sauryam tejo dbritir dakshyam yuddhe capy apalayanam, danam, isvara-bhavas ca kshatram karma svabhava-jam, "The natural qualities determining the duties of the ksatriya are: loyalty to the ethical principles (sauryam means "the quality of suras", referring to the devas who support and protect the universe), radiance/ charisma/ personal power (tejas), determination (dbritib), expertise/ resourcefulness (dakshyam), courage and stability in battle (yuddhe capy apalayanam), generosity (danam), and the ability to direct and manage people (isvara-bhava)."

The words punya ("who have virtuous merits") and bhakta ("devotees") could be applied to the rajarshi, or it could also be interpreted as a category in itself. In this case it refer to virtuous and devotional persons that do not identify with any particular varna but simply dedicate themselves to sadhana and personal spiritual development, such as the sannyasis.

मन्मना भव मद्भक्तो मद्याजी मां नमस्कुरु ।

मां वैष्णवी युक्तैवमात्मानं मत्परायणः ॥ ९-३४ ॥

manmanā bhava madbhakto madyājī mān namaskuru | mānevaiṣyāsi yuktvaivamātmanam matparāyaṇaḥ || 9-34 ||

mat: of me; manab: think; bhava: become; mat: of me; bhaktab: devotee; mat: of me; yaji: a worshiper; mam: to me; namah kuru: offer respect; mam: me; eva: certainly; eshyasi: will come/ attain; yukta: connected; evam: therefore; atmanam: the atman; mat-parayanah: devoted to me.

"Always think of me, become my devotee and my worshiper. Offer me your respect and dedicate yourself to me. You will attain me because of this connection.

The word yukta here refers to the path of yoga, or "union" with the Supreme, that is the constant motif of Bhagavad gita. This union is achieved through the proper meditation, or consciousness, and therefore it is also called Krishna Consciousness.

This is one of the most famous and important verses in Gita, establishing the preminence of devotion (bhakti) in spiritual progress and God realization. We have already mentioned that the chapters 7, 8 and 9 are the central focus of Bhagavad gita and present the great importance of bhakti; however, an attentive and intelligent study of these chapters will help us understand that such bhakti is not the mere superficial sentimentalism of social or folkloristic religiosity. Being able to tell the difference between sentimentalism and devotion is not so difficult: one is material, and one is spiritual. A person who is still identified on the material level is unable to understand Bhagavan, therefore it is very unlikely that s/he will actually have genuine devotion. Some people try to justify sentimentalism by labeling it as "intimate/ familiar" devotion, but a real rasika devotee is never a materialist identified with the gross body or attached to personal sense gratification.

The expression prakṛita sahaṁjīyas indicates a category of people who superficially imitate the gopīs or utilize the līlas of Krishna as a form of cheap and titillating entertainment. Because the intimate līlas of Krishna with the gopīs are based on the erotic mood (called śṛṅgāra or madhurya rasa), some people may come to think that prakṛita sahaṁjīya refers to some type of "yogic sex", but that idea is not correct.

The words prakṛita sahaṁjīya actually mean "materialistic" and "simpleton" respectively; the definition applies to people who take "devotion" as a form of entertainment for the public, expressed usually through the superficial recitation of the most popular stories of Krishna, mostly in the śṛṅgāra rasa but also in vatsalya rasa, as in the episodes of Krishna's early childhood. Sentimentalist people "love baby Krishna because he is so cute and is stealing butter", and so they keep pictures of a faintly bluish chubby baby with a peacock feather on his head (the imaginative or artistic projection/ interpretation of what they consider to be Krishna). But cats are cute, too, and they are perfectly able to steal and eat butter as well, and their pictures are put on calendars and postcards and Facebook pages, exactly in the same way.

Teenager Krishna is even more popular, because everybody likes a nice love story, especially when it involves some period of separation or some secrecy, some sad romantic longing of unfortunate young and passionate lovers. All along history, there have been thousands of poems, songs, novels, dramas, tales, paintings, and more recently also films about this type of stories. No story can attract the public if it does not contain a bit of romance, and if the relationship becomes physically sexual and its consummation is described in lyric tones, it becomes even more popular. What to speak about deliberate entertainment business - even the private romantic and sexual lives of ordinary people are attractive for lusty gossipers and peeping toms.

Of course reading or singing about the superficial external vision of the love games between what people call Krishna and the girls of Vrindavana is better than getting engrossed in the romance stories of fictitious or historical ordinary people, but for the prakṛita sahaṁjīyas it is still a manner of material entertainment to attract people through material sense gratification and not through devotion. Bhaktivinoda strongly condemned this tendency to entertaining oneself or the public with Krishna's stories. Bhaktisiddhanta did not like his Bengali followers to launch into virtuoso performances with their singing and playing mṛdāṅga, so in order to disrupt their delusion, he used to start banging the karatalas to a different rhythm.

Genuine Bhakti literature, such as the Bhakti rasamṛta sindhu (1.2.101) compiled by Rupa Gosvami, clearly points out that devotion is never cheap and ignorant: sruti smṛiti purāṇādi pañcharātri vidhim vīna, aikāntiki harer bhaktir utpatayaiva kalpate, "so-called exclusive devotion to Hari is simply a disturbance to society when it is not solidly based on the knowledge contained in sruti, smṛiti, Purāṇas etc". This ignorant sentimentalism is particularly dangerous when such superficial entertainment "devotion" is presented by professional reciters - that is to say, by persons or groups that commercialize the process for the materialistic purpose of monetary gain, fame, name, adoration, and so on, even to the point where they consider themselves the sole depositories of a sort of monopoly (by caste or by "succession") that they would like to be legally enforced to their exclusive profit. The superficial readings and dramatic renditions of Krishna's transcendental līla (which we see for example in many Indian tv and movies) certainly do not give the actual results of the genuine meditation as per the actual Krishna Consciousness. The Names themselves will only manifest as a shadow of the real thing, for those who do not have the sufficient attitude and realizations.

We should not think that simply by imagining oneself to be a gopī, one will be actually situated on the level of gopīs. The gopīs were not ordinary people or stupid village girls. They were direct manifestations of Krishna's internal śakti, and their assistants (the sakhīs) were great liberated saints and sages. If we actually read the chapters of the Bhagavata Purāṇa where the rasa dance is described, this point is repeated again and again.

Chapter 10: Vibhūti yoga

The Yoga of powers

The word vibhūti contains many meanings, such as "powers", "opulences", "glories", "magic".

Every living being has some of such "magic powers" - a special ability, or strength, or beauty - but not everyone has the same powers, or a power to an absolute degree. Among the materially embodied beings, such powers are always conditioned by circumstances and exhausted when they are used.

Through the correct practice of yoga, a sādhaka can develop special vibhūtis up to the level of siddhi ("perfection"), usually listed as being able to become extremely small (anīmā siddhi), extremely large (māhīmā siddhi), extremely light (laghīmā siddhi), reconfiguring the patterns of material atoms (vaśitā siddhi), materializing things by attracting atoms from other places (prāpti siddhi), controlling the minds of others (isitā siddhi), assuming any shape or form (kāmaśayitā siddhi), and manifesting all kinds of wonders (prakāmyā siddhi). Another of such powers consists in entering and controlling the body of another, living or dead (parakāya praveśa). Also, the knowledge of genuine yoga enables the serious sādhaka to control the material elements (such as fire, water, air etc), control the weather (call or dispel storms and lightning, bring or withhold rain, etc), travel in different dimensions and planets without any vehicle, call the dead back into their old body (usually temporarily), and so on.

In verse 7.25, Krishna, the original teacher of yoga, declared that the human-like body that he manifests in his adventures is fundamentally different from the material bodies of ordinary individuals, because it can take any form and intrinsically possesses all the qualities of mystic perfections (siddhis). He said, "I do not show myself to everyone, but I remain veiled by my own yoga-maya. Foolish people remain unable to understand that I am unborn and eternal."

In this chapter, Krishna elaborates more on this particular point, offering many examples, so that we can become able to really understand his supreme nature of Bhagavan, manifested by his shaktis particularly in this material universe, of which we all have some direct experience. The Bhagavad gita is meant to instruct - through Arjuna - the people living in this world so that they will learn to know, worship and serve God and elevate themselves to the spiritual world. Therefore it offers terms of comparison chosen from the manifestations that we can find in this universe, but highlighting the fact that the divinity is not in the specific manifestations themselves, but rather in their characteristic of preeminence or superiority in respect to other things.

The word bhagavan - "having all bhagas" - is explained by Parasara Rishi as "perfect in the 6 opulences, that are beauty, fame, wealth, strength, knowledge and renunciation". In this sense, sometimes the definition is applied to great saintly Personalities that are representing God as his manifestations, avatars, or direct servants in the administration of the universe. These are called the vaibhava prakasa of God and include all the avatars, amsas etc.

The word bhaga also means "parts", as a synonym of amsa. In this sense, Bhagavan is he who possesses or emanates "parts" or secondary manifestations, and/ or has "quotas" of power. In Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, Rupa Gosvami elaborates on this point, stating that Krishna is 100% Bhagavan, while Narayana is 94%, Shiva is 84% and all jivatmas - starting from Brahma downwards - are only up to 78% of Bhagavan. Vaishnavas often quote verse 1.3.28 of Bhagavata Purana in this regard: ete chamsa kalah pumsah krishnas tu bhagavan svayam, "All these (avatars) are amsas and kalas (emanations and emanations of emanations), but Krishna is the supreme Bhagavan." The measure of such "Godhead" is expressed in bhagas, or vibhutis.

But Krishna is not simply a greater and more powerful being, that excels the others in powers. God is supreme, but not simply because he is more powerful than anyone else in the universe: he is the very essence of supremeness, therefore his Personality cannot really be compared to other personalities. People who have not realized the meaning of transcendence (Brahman) remain unable to understand Paramatma, and it is totally impossible for them to even start to imagine what Bhagavan really is, so they simply project their own limited material concepts and they create a "God" that is in their likeness or image, and that agrees with their limited understanding. But that is not really God.

God is not merely an exceptional person: he is the characteristic of exceptionality that gives such powers to the individual souls. He is their transcendental DNA, so to speak: pure Consciousness that has the power to manifest any form and any opulence. And Krishna is the supreme "concentration" of such transcendental identity, from whom all other transcendental existences emanate.

In this chapter Krishna himself, on the specific request expressed by Arjuna, continues to describe how one should meditate on him as the Supreme Consciousness and the Sum total of all Reality, source and foundation of everything that exists. Whatever is great, glorious, wonderful, beautiful, powerful, constitutes a prominent manifestation of the Supreme, for the very fact that it is supreme among all things. This thread was started in chapter 7 and will culminate in chapter 11, where Krishna manifests the direct vision of the universal form of Consciousness as requested by Arjuna.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

भूय एव महाबाहो शृणु मे परमं वचः ।

यत्तेऽहं प्रीयमाणाय वक्ष्यामि हितकाम्यया ॥ १०-१ ॥

bhūya eva mahābāho śṛṇu me paramam vacaḥ । yatte'haṁ priyamāṇāya vakṣyāmi hitakāmyayā ॥ 10-1 ॥

srī: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; bhuyah: again; eva: certainly; maha-baho: with mighty arms; srinu: listen; me: to me; paramam: supreme; vacaḥ: speech; yat: that (which); te: to you; aham: I; priyamanaya: considering you dear; vakshyami: I will tell; hitakamyaya: for your benefit.

The wonderful Lord said, "O mighty armed Arjuna, listen to me. I will tell you the supreme explanation (about Transcendence). I will do this for you, because you are very dear to me/ it gives great pleasure to me."

The expression hita kamyaya ("desiring the benefit") may be applied both to the benefit of Arjuna's understanding, or - at a deeper level - to the benefit of all those who will study Bhagavad gita in the future, including us. Because Arjuna is very compassionate to conditioned souls, Krishna is offering him the opportunity to become the medium and cause for the distribution of such transcendental knowledge. This is confirmed by Adi Shankara (avatara of Shiva) in his Gita mahatmya ("Glorification of the Bhagavad gita") when he says, sarvopaniṣado gavo dogdha gopala-nandanah, partho vatsah sudhir bhokta dugdham gitamritam mahat, "Comparing all the Upanishads as a cow, Krishna the son of the cowherd chief is the milkman, Arjuna the son of Pritha is the calf, and the intelligent people will enjoy the great nectar of Bhagavad gita as the milk."

Arjuna is also Shiva's avatara and eternal companion of Krishna. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana for example in 4.1.59: tav imau vai bhagavato harer amsav ibagatau, bhara vyayaya ca bhuvah, krishnau yadu-kurudvahan, "That same Bhagavan Hari has appeared in a twin form together with his emanation, to alleviate the burden of the world, as the two Krishnas: the best of the Yadavas and the best of the Kurus." There are also other verses in Bhagavata Purana in this regard, that we will examine more thoroughly in the commentary to verse 10.37. The word priyamanaya ("taking delight") further clarifies this point. It can apply both to Krishna and Arjuna, who are very compassionate and extremely pleased to deliver the transcendental science to the people in this world. This is certainly the highest devotional service that one can render to God, and the greatest source of pleasure for the devotee as well, compared to which all the material pleasures of this world simply become dim and disappear. The expression bhūyah eva ("yet again") refers to the fact that Krishna has already presented a similar description, starting from chapter 7, where he stated, mattah parataram nanyat, "there is nothing superior to me" (7.7).

Krishna describes these examples as paramam vacah, "the supreme explanation", or "the supreme teachings", although they do not describe his human-like form of the Vrindavana lila. After clearly saying that a devotee should worship him only in his tad rupa ("direct form"), Krishna is here describing his *vibhūti*s as a higher instruction, because we need to understand very clearly that God

न मे विदुः सुरगणाः प्रभवं न महर्षयः ।

अहमादिर्हि देवानां महर्षीणां च सर्वशः ॥ १०-२ ॥

na me viduḥ suragaṇāḥ prabhavaṁ na maharṣayaḥ | ahamādirhi devānāṁ maharṣīṇāṁ ca sarvaśaḥ || 10-2 ||

is never cheap.

na: not; me: me; viduḥ: (they) know; sura-gaṇaḥ: the hosts of devas; prabhavaṁ: the manifestation; na: not; maharṣayaḥ: the great Rishis; aham: I; adib: the origin; hi: certainly; devanām: of the devas; maharṣinām: of the great Rishis; ca: and; sarvasaḥ: in everything.

"Not even the Devas and the great Rishis are able to ascertain my origin, because I am the origin of everything, including the Devas and the Rishis."

This verse is confirmed by the first text of Bhagavata Purana (1.1.1): janmady asya yato 'mayad itaratas carthesv abhijnah svarat, tene brahma hrda ya adi kavaye muhyanti yat surayah, tejo vari mrdam yatha vinimayo yatra tri sargo 'mrsam dhamna svena sada nirasta kubakam satyam param dhimahi, "I offer my respect to Bhagavan Vasudeva, from whom the creation/ birth etc of this (universe, body, manifestation) proceeds. He is fully independent, fully conscious of purpose, directly and indirectly. He inspired brahman (Vedic knowledge) in the heart of the first poet (Brahma). His nature/ existence/ energy of illusion overpowers even the suras (devas and rishis), (just like) with the optical illusions created by heat, water and earth. In this way by action and reaction he always manifests himself as the 'almost reality' of the three creations and all their objects/ places of existence. I meditate on (him), the supreme truth, always self-sufficient, of whom illusion is just the absence of perception."

The devas and the rishis mentioned in this verse are the most advanced beings in the universe, as they constitute the highest concentration of consciousness/ awareness that can be attained by an individual soul. All the jivatmas start from the same basic level as anu atmās ("atomic souls") and then develop gradually through the cultivation of knowledge and consciousness. As their level of consciousness and knowledge rises, they are able to build and manage more and more sophisticated bodies, endowed with greater powers (*vibhūti*s or bhogas). In all the original cultures of the world, such greatly evolved beings are called Gods and worshiped or honored in some religious rituals. Human beings who have a lower level of personal development and understanding are only able to see such Gods in their individual forms, as greatly powerful beings and even personifications of the powers of nature, or teachers and well wishers capable of granting various types of blessings. However, the more one associates with such great beings, the more one develops the same qualities and tendencies (guna and karma), and at some point in our eyes the Gods even become models and ideals to be followed, and then we become able to see them as manifestations of a greater and more transcendental Reality - Consciousness, the origin and container of all *vibhūti*s.

When Krishna says na te viduḥ, "they do not know", obviously he is meaning that devas and rishis cannot know him fully - they cannot perceive his origin, because he is beyond time and space - but they do know him at least partially, and that is why they worship him as their supreme Self. This is why in verse 10.14 Arjuna will declare that the word of the Rishis and the Devas about God is the most authoritative.

From the level of transcendental Brahman realization, genuine bhakti can really develop (18.54), because we can really know Krishna "in truth" (janma karma ca me dīyah... vetti tattvataḥ, 4.9) and not as some folkloristic mythological fairy tale. Krishna had already explained his transcendental identity and nature of pure Consciousness in verse 4.6: ajo 'pi sann anyayatma, bbutanam isvaro 'pi san, prakṛitīm svam adbhīstaya, sambhavamī atma mayaya, "Although I am unborn and imperishable, and although I am the Supreme Lord of the creatures/ states of being, I am present in/ I control this prakṛiti that belongs to me, and I manifest myself out of my own power".

He will reiterate it in verse 10.8: aham sarvasya prabhavo mattah sarvam pravartate, "I am the existence of everything, and from me everything emanates". Krishna is thus the origin and foundation of everything: he is Existence and Reality himself. The "great rishis" mentioned in the verse are a category to which the most evolved personalities among the sages can be added. The sapta rishis ("seven rishis") that inhabit the higher planetary system also known as the Great Dipper are chosen among the famous Angirasa, Bhṛigu, Kandu, Markandeya, Mudgala, Pippalada, Digatasama, Atri, Kratu, Vasistha, Vyasa, Pulastya, Marici, and several others. For more about this, see the commentary to verse 10.6.

The devas are the incarnation of the elements that constitute the universe. We call them "personalities" rather than "persons" because each of their identities constitutes a position that could be covered from time to time by different persons (individual souls). This difference that we apply between the two words "personality" and "person" also explains how, at the human level, there can be multiple personalities within the same one person.

यो मामजमनादिं च वेत्ति लोकमहेश्वरम् । असम्मूढः स मर्त्येषु सर्वपापैः प्रमुच्यते ॥ १०-३ ॥

yo māmajamanādīṁ ca veti lokamaheśvaram । asammūḍhaḥ sa martyeṣu sarvapāpaiḥ pramucyate ॥ 10-3 ॥

yab: a person who; mam: me; ajam: non-born; anadim: without origin; ca: and; veti: (s/he) knows; loka maha isvaram: the great ruler of all planets/ people; asammudhab: free from illusion; sab: s/he; martyeshu: among the mortal beings; sarva-papaiḥ: from all faults; pramucyate: becomes free.

"A person who knows/ understands/ realizes me as the Reality that is non-born and without origin, (sees me as) the great ruler and controller of all the planets and people. Such a person, although still living in a mortal body, is free from all illusion and becomes purified from all negativities."

Pure Consciousness is never born. In conditioned beings who live in a material body, consciousness existed before birth, and continues after birth and after death: it merely moves from one body to the other. In Krishna, who is the supreme Consciousness without any material limitations, there is not even such passage from one body to another, because the supreme Consciousness simultaneously contains and controls all forms at all times and in all places, beyond the scope of time and place.

Krishna's bodies are not controlled by the laws of material nature, but they are manifested directly by the spiritual nature of consciousness. We study in nuclear physics that all matter is composed of sub-atomic particles that are a condensed form of energy, vibrating at different frequencies and densities, and thus forming atoms of the various material elements. Such sub-atomic particles are sensitive to magnetic fields, including those created by life or consciousness; the stronger the consciousness is, the more it can control the alignment and movements of matter. Even ordinary souls can develop this power through the correct practice of yoga, and thus manifest what are known as yoga siddhis.

Krishna - God, the Supreme Brahman - is the most powerful Consciousness, and perfectly controls all manifestations, spiritual and material. Spiritual manifestations are called para, "superior", because they are a form of greater and more powerful consciousness, while material manifestations are characterized by more dullness.

A person who comes to understand this totally transcendental nature of Krishna as the supreme Consciousness is immediately freed from illusion and contamination, because consciousness is also the transcendental nature of the jiva. One who realizes his/ her own identity and nature as pure consciousness cannot be conditioned by the material body or by material considerations. Even if s/he still lives in a material body, s/he does not need one any more, so at the time of death s/he will not take another one, but will remain as a fully developed spiritual body. The same point was already stated in 4.9: janma karma ca me divyam evam yo veti tattvataḥ, tyaktva deham punar janma naiti mam eti so 'rjuna, "O Arjuna, one who truly knows the divine nature of my births and activities does not have to take another birth after leaving this body, but comes to me."

In this view, we will be better able to understand verse 5.29 as the description of the supreme Consciousness that is present in - but not limited to - all beings: bhoktaram yajña-tapasam sarva-loka-mahesvaram, subridam sarva-bhutanam jnatva mam santim ricchati, "(One who) knows me as the enjoyer/ beneficiary of yajna (sacrifice) and tapas (austerity), the great Lord of all the worlds /all people, and the dearest friend of all beings, attains peace."

Less evolved forms of religion cannot bring peace into the world because they are unable to teach that God is simply Existence itself, present everywhere as Consciousness. This is the definition of Brahman, and its nature is existence, consciousness and happiness. Of course this understanding is difficult to achieve for those who identify with the material body and mind, so the real path of religion starts with the genuine study of the transcendental science of atman/ brahman. From the beginning, Bhagavad gita (2.29) clearly says, ascarya-vat pasyati kascid enam ascarya-vad vadati tathaiva canyah, ascarya-vac cainam anyah srinoti srutvapy enam veda na caiva kascit, "Some see this (atman) as amazing, some others describe it as amazing. Some hear (of it) as amazing, and some remain unable to understand it even after hearing about it."

Understanding the atman is the foundation for understanding the brahman. Verse 2.25 says, avyakto 'yam acintyo 'yam avikaryo 'yam ucyate, tasmad evam viditvainam nanusocitum arhasi, "It is said that this (the soul) is invisible to material eyes, inconceivable to material intellect, and not affected by change. Therefore, knowing this (soul), you should not worry."

And also:

nasato vidyate bhavo nabhavo vidyate satah, ubhayaḥ api drishṭo 'ntas tv anayos tattva-darsibhiḥ, "Those who see the truth know that what is illusory/ temporary/ bad will not (continue to) be, while what is real/ eternal/ good will never be destroyed. They have carefully observed both things and reached this conclusion." (2.16)

avinasi tu tad viddhi yena sarvam idam tatam, vinasam avyayasyasya na kascit kartum arhati, "Know that it is an imperishable (spirit) that pervades all this (universe of bodies). And no one will be able to destroy what is imperishable." (2.17)

na jayate mriyate va kadacin nayam bhutva bhavita va na bhuyah, ajo nityah sasvato 'yam purano na hanyate hanyamane sarire, "(The soul) never takes birth and never dies at any time. It eternally exists, without beginning or end. This (soul) that is in the body is unborn, eternal, imperishable, immensely ancient, and cannot kill or be killed." (2.20)

na tv evaḥam jatu nasam na tram neme janadhipah, na caiva na bhavishyamah sarve vayam atah param, "Certainly there was never a time when I did not exist, and you and all these chieftains of men have always existed as well. Also, none of us will cease to exist in the future." (2.12)

This is also the message contained in the center of the Bhagavata Purana, also called the chatur (4) sloki Bhagavata, that consists of 4 verses (2.9.33, 34, 35, 36) and that is often connected to the central verses of Bhagavad gita, called the chatur (4) sloki Gita. We will quote them in the commentary to verse 10.11.

बुद्धिर्ज्ञानमसम्मोहः क्षमा सत्यं दमः शमः ।

सुखं दुःखं भवोऽभावो भयं चाभयमेव च ॥ १०-४ ॥

buddhirjñānamasammohaḥ kṣamā satyaṁ damaḥ śamaḥ । sukhaṁ duḥkhaṁ bhavo'bhāvo bhayaṁ cābhayameva ca ॥ 10-4 ॥

buddhiḥ: intelligence; jñānam: knowledge; asammohaḥ: freedom from confusion; kṣama: forgiveness; satya: truthfulness; damaḥ: self-control; śamaḥ: mental balance; sukha: joy; duḥkha: sadness; bhava: existence; abhava: non-existence; bhaya: fear; ca: and; ābhaya: freedom from fear; eva: also; ca: and.

"Intelligence, knowledge, freedom from confusion, forgiveness, truthfulness, self-control, mental balance, joy, sadness, existence and non-existence, as well as fear and freedom from fear (are arranged by me)."

This verse and the next one are usually studied together because the verb supporting both is contained in the second one. The qualities and principles listed here are not all "positive" or "desirable" in their conventional practical application: for example sadness, non-existence and fear. In the next verse, ayasah ("infamy") will also be mentioned. However, a little more meditation on these two verses will lead us to wonder why Krishna has deliberately chosen to list them together with other more "positive" and "desirable" qualities and concepts, that are also requirements for progress in spiritual life.

We may remember that in the very first chapter of Bhagavad gita, Arjuna expressed his sadness about the situation created by Duryodhana and the need to engage in the horrible fratricidal battle. On that occasion, Krishna expertly utilized Arjuna's concern and anguish to direct his mind towards a higher level of consciousness, thus creating the scene for the wonderful discussion of the Bhagavad gita. In the commentaries to that chapter, we observed that dissatisfaction with the material world - that has been specifically created as a place of misery and impermanence (duḥkhalayaṁ asvatam, 8.15, anityam asukam, 9.33) - is the beneficial wake up call that we need to become detached from illusion. Only a person that has realized the suffering caused by the defects inherent to the process of birth, death, old age and disease can really overcome the attractiveness of the good and pleasurable sattvic life offered by Vedic society and attain detachment and freedom from material identifications. This is confirmed in verse 13.9: indriyartheshu vairagyam anabankara eva ca, janma-mrityu-jara-vyadhi-duḥkha-doshaṇudarsanam, where Krishna describes the factors that constitute knowledge (jñanam). This does not mean that we should deliberately try to increase our sufferings, or that the principle of suffering is characteristically spiritual or religious, while the principle of pleasure is characteristically material. Such extremist ideas are never entertained by the rishis and acharyas that compiled the Vedic scriptures and offered their valuable teachings to mankind. According to abrahamic ideologies, pain and suffering are glorified as "penance" and considered indispensable for the purification of the soul from material contamination, therefore a religious person is expected to strictly avoid all sense gratification and pleasures, to the point of sensory deprivation and even self-torture.

The Vedic path is not a punitive one. It does not give suffering an absolute value in itself, but it explains why life cannot be all play and fun. Vedic knowledge offers many remedies to alleviate the pain and increase pleasures - through a comprehensive medical system, scientific arrangements for social harmony, wonderful technology and crafts, and especially a perfect method for karmic success. However, the four fundamental defects of materially embodied life cannot be totally eliminated by materially devised solutions. Still there will be death, albeit a serene and almost painless one. Disease and old age can still leave us reasonably healthy and able to function and enjoy the natural and virtuous pleasures of life. Birth and infancy can be made easier and happier when the parents are more knowledgeable, balanced and responsible. On the higher planetary systems, the devas face only a very minimal version of these sufferings, and yet all material bodies must have a beginning and an end, and a few troubles in between, just to remind us that this universe is not our real home. The same consideration applies to existence and non-existence, and fear and lack of fear: these all serve as a stimulus for progress, to find the answers to the really important questions in life. This does not mean that we should cultivate fear or worship non-existence: it simply means that we should face each problem as an opportunity, and find the ways to use it to our better advantage - like "a blessing in disguise".

In this verse, the word sama (that could also be written as śama, with a slightly different "s" that is a separate letter in the Sanskrit alphabet) means "control" and is different from the similar word sama or samata, meaning "equal vision". This self-control applies to the external and internal sense organs, where dama specifically refers to the external actions and sama to internal (mental) activities.

अहिंसा समता तुष्टिस्तपो दानं यशोऽयशः । भवन्ति भावा भूतानां मत्त एव पृथग्विधाः ॥ १०-५ ॥ ahimsā samatā tuṣṭistapo dānaṁ yaśo'yaśaḥ । bhavanti bhāvā bhūtānāṁ matta eva prthagvidhāḥ ॥ 10-5 ॥

ahimsa: freedom from hatred; samata: equanimity; tuṣṭi: contentment; tapah: austerity; danam: charity; yaśaḥ: good fame; ayaśaḥ: bad reputation; bhavanti: become/ happen; bhava: existence/ natural characteristic; bhutanam: of the beings; matta: by me; eva: certainly; prthag-vidhah: various types.

"Freedom from hatred, equanimity, contentment, austerity, charity, good fame and also bad reputation: all these manifest as the natural situations of the beings, and are devised by me."

The second part of the statement is given in this verse, complete with the verb supporting the sentence. All these different situations are controlled by Krishna.

The exact expression (mattat eva prithak vidbah) means, "are variously divided by me", referring to their assignment of the different situations in life as per "destiny" to each individual in a particular time and place. Why? Because in order to grow and develop, we need to face a number of lessons in life, and a lesson is only useful if it presents the exact amount of difficulty suitable for our particular level of realization. By analyzing these two verses, we will be able to understand what the biggest lessons in life are. Intelligence, knowledge and freedom from confusion are the first and foremost tools in this task, and we definitely need to develop them more and more, as a first lesson that will help us succeed in the rest of the training. The next group of qualities are the second step in personal evolution, and while the first group was connected with the intellect, these are connected with the emotions and the choices of life - forgiveness, truthfulness, self-control, mental balance.

The proper use of intellect and emotional management will enable us to navigate various tests of ups and downs - joy, sadness, existence and non-existence, fear and fearlessness. The duality of existence and non-existence here refers the loss of something (2.38, labha alabhan, "getting and not getting", jaya ajayan, "victory and defeat") and must be kept in the proper perspective with the correct use of the previously acquired tools - those regulating the intellect and those regulating emotions and choices. In this verse we make a further step forward. Abimsa is a compound word consisting of the "privative" a, and the noun himsa, of the same root of the verb himsati, "to hate". The usual translation of "non-violence" is therefore rather simplistic, as it does not explain how a kshatriya can remain perfectly situated in abimsa while he is doing his job of protecting the innocent and good prajas from the aggression of criminals. Coupled with the mythical vision that many uninformed people have about the policies of MK Gandhi, often called "the apostle of non-violence", as well as about the history of India in the last 1200 years, this imprecise rendition of the Sanskrit concept of abimsa can really cause serious misunderstandings. We need to clarify that the Vedic idea of abimsa is not cowardice, absenteeism, irresponsibility, callousness or the delusional hope that "evil" will simply disappear if we choose not to look at it. Real abimsa is directly connected to samata or equanimity: it is about being free from prejudice and hatred, and about looking straight at reality to take the required measures without any selfish motivation.

The next group of characteristics are contentment, austerity and charity, that enable us to live a happy life in this world and in the next, without expecting anything from anyone and therefore without the danger of being frustrated. Tusthi means "contentment", "satisfaction", and is actually a inner quality, measured by how happy we can make ourselves by counting our blessings instead of only noticing what we do not have.

Tapah or austerity simply consists in the voluntary acceptance of those difficulties that come to us spontaneously in the course of our work or journey; it does not mean that we should go deliberately looking for troubles or for sufferings, or worse, torture our bodies and minds with unnecessary deprivations or damage. The most difficult lesson in life consists in becoming able to serenely face good fame and defamation - two things that are not necessarily referred to our actual qualities and deeds. The verse uses the terms yasa and ayasa, "good reputation" and "lack of good reputation", which are synonyms of kirti and akirti, used by Krishna in 2.33, 34, 35, 36 to warn Arjuna about the bad rumors that his enemies would have circulated if he had decided not to engage in the battle. Anyone who has been falsely slandered by envious people knows that bad reputation comes even to perfectly innocent people, as it is demonstrated many times in history. Sometimes it is difficult or impossible to dispel bad rumors, especially when they have been cleverly fabricated by exploiting the prejudice and fears of the ignorant people who will listen to such envious defamation. The very nature of slandering is based on envy, and envy is stimulated by the apparent success of a person: this is why defamation campaigns and bad rumors often appear together with great glorification and appreciation of the same person. Especially if the person in question is very straightforward and seriously engaged in fighting adharma, s/he will have to expect lots of both - insult and praise - and remain untouched by either.

महर्षयः सप्त पूर्वे चत्वारो मनवस्तथा । मद्भावा मानसा जाता येषां लोक इमाः प्रजाः ॥ १०-६ ॥

maharṣayaḥ sapta pūrve catvāro manavastathā | madbhāvā mānasā jātā yeṣāṃ loka imāḥ prajāḥ || 10-6 ||

maharshayah: the great rishis; sapta: the seven; purve: before (them); catvarah: the four; manavah: the Manus; tatha: as well; mat-bhavah: created by me; manasa: from the mind; jatah: born; yesham: of them; loke: in the world; imah: these; prajah: creatures.

"The great seven Rishis, the four (who were born) before them, and the Manus, were all created by me and generated through the mind. All the creatures in this world descend from them."

This verse lists the most prominent early descendants of Brahma, who were generated from his mind with the purpose of expanding the creation of the universe. The Great Rishis had already been mentioned in verse 10.2. The four (Rishis) before them are the chatuh sanah ("the 4 Sanas"), namely Sanaka, Sananda, Sanatana and Sanat kumara, the first generated sons of Brahma. These four great Rishis did not want to engage in procreation to populate the universe, therefore they chose to remain always in a child-like form (hence the name kumaras, "boys"). The Manus mentioned in the verse are the administrators of the planet Earth in the various periods of Brahma's day. There are 14 in the present day: Svayambhuva, Svarocisa, Uttana, Tamasa, Raivata, Chaksusa, Vaivasvata, Savarni, Dakshasavarni, Brahmasavarni, Dharmasavarni, Rudra putra, Rocya or Devasavarni, and Indrasavarni. These are all great and glorious personalities, from whom we should be proud of descending. In fact, it is interesting to think that not only the great gotras of "high class brahmins" descend from these wonderfully qualified personalities, but also all human beings and even all the other creatures of the universe can trace their family lineage directly to them.

Of course in this verse Krishna is speaking about the bodies, and not about the individual jivatmas that go to occupy these exalted positions in the administration of the universe. It is important to understand that such prestigious posts come equipped with a full set of mind/ senses/ body organs meant to execute the required functions; therefore whenever a jiva develops the suitable guna and karma, he can take birth in that situation and perform its duties.

There are apparently contradictory lists of the names of these Sapta Rishis, but this is due to the fact that they can change from one manvantara to the other. In chapter 13 of canto 8 of Bhagavata Purana, we find the description of the future Manus. Under the present one (the 7th), named Sraddhadeva, the main devas are the Adityas, Vasus, Rudras, Visvedevas, Marutas, Asvini kumaras and Ribhus; the seven rishis are listed as Kashyapa, Atri, Vasistha, Vishvamitra, Gautama, Jamadagni and Bharadvaja. The Vishnu avatara assisting the devas is Vamana, the younger brother of Indra.

Under the next Manu (the 8th), named Savarni, the devas will be the Sutapas, Virajas and Amritaprabhas; the post of Indra will be occupied by Bali Maharaja, the son of Virochana, who previously was the king of the asuras - the passage will be performed through a lila manifested by the avatara Sarvabhauma, son of Devaguhy and Sarasvati. The Sapta Rishis will be Galava, Diptiman, Parasurama, Asvatthama, Kripacharya, Rishyashringa and Vyasadeva, who are presently living on Earth. Similarly, under Daksha Savarni Manu (the 9th), son of Varuna, the devas will be the Paras and the Maricigarbhas, the position of Indra will be occupied by Adbhuta, and a new group of Sapta Rishis will be headed by Dyutiman (Bhagavata Purana, 8.13.19). The Vishnu avatara assisting the devas will be Rishabha, son of Ayushman and Ambudhara. In the subsequent verses (up to verse 36, the end of the chapter) the other future sets of devas and rishis are described, up to the 14th and last Manu in this day of Brahma.

एतां विभूतिं योगं च मम यो वेत्ति तत्त्वतः । सोऽविकम्पेन योगेन युज्यते नात्र संशयः ॥ १०-७ ॥

etāṁ vibhūtiṁ yogaṁ ca mama yo veti tattvataḥ | so'vikampena yogena yujyate nātra saṁśayaḥ || 10-7 ||

etam: this; vibhūtim: power; yogaṁ: union; ca: and; mama: my; yo: a person who; veti: knows; tattvataḥ: in truth; sah: s/he; avikalpena: without distraction; yogena: by yoga; yujyate: is engaged; na: not; atra: here; samsayah: (there is) doubt.

"A person who truly understands this, and knows this vibhuti yoga, is certainly engaged in (the proper) meditation, without any doubt."

Here Krishna clearly states that yoga and bhakti must be solidly based on the consciousness of the supreme powers and glories of God, otherwise they will not be performed properly. How and why God is great? Not because he is older, taller or he lives upstairs as a landlord, or because he has the power to kill people or send them to hell. The danger, as we have discussed previously, is to take Krishna cheaply as in prakṛita saṁjāyism, or "materialistic simplism", and to miss the entire scope of transcendental realization. In this regard, we should give special attention to the definition avikalpena, "without distraction" from the purposed goal. This type of distraction normally happens with fairy tales or adventures of great men, because it is not possible to continue indefinitely to concentrate on material stories with the same or greater interest. So the only safe way to remain genuinely fixed in yoga and bhakti is to actually attain the level of brahma bhuta, or transcendental realization, demonstrated by overcoming all material identifications and attachments (abankara and mamatva). At that point, our contemplation and meditation on Krishna will be solidly based on the understanding and realization of his transcendental glories and nature (as described in these precious verses of Bhagavad gita) and thus it will only increase and not decrease.

The bhakti literature clearly speaks of a chaya rati, "shadow attachment" or "reflection attachment", that can be compared to a mirage of water created by the extreme heat on the surface of the desert. This initial artificial/ sentimentalist attraction is beneficial because it will trigger an interest for the process of devotional service and the discussion of the names, qualities and activities of Krishna, but it should not be considered the ultimate goal, because it is not. In Jai va dharma, Bhaktivinoda says through the declaration of his character Raghunatha dasa Babaji, "Kanistha devotees who have limited knowledge and realizations may experience some ecstatic symptoms when they come in contact with holy places or other manifestations of the Lord. Such reflection of ecstasy is called chaya rati abhasa, and is born from previous good merits (punya), but because it is temporary, its waning and disappearance will cause perplexity and suffering."

At this point, when the first reflection of bhakti disappears, we are facing the most important choice in our development: we can become serious and rise to the level of actual transcendental realization (brahma bhuta) through the meditation offered so clearly here by Krishna, and in this direction our journey will take us to the real (para) attachment to Krishna and genuine devotion, through the madhyama and the uttama levels. If we fail to take this very crucial step, and we remain attached to material considerations - identifications, affiliations, possessions, expectations, and duality - we will remain on the kanistha platform, that can easily degenerate into materialistically motivated organized religiousness. As a result, we will become materially proud and arrogant, and we may commit the disastrous mistake of evaluating other persons, especially devotees, according to the wrong parameters - grossly materialistic parameters, based on physical identification such as gender, birth, race, nationality, age, shape of the body, etc, and social position such as wealth, erudition, hierarchical status (or more importantly, lack thereof), etc. As true devotion has nothing to do with material identifications, affiliations, and physical appearances, it is extremely easy to become offensive and therefore lose any chance to progress in spiritual life.

अहं सर्वस्य प्रभवो मत्तः सर्वं प्रवर्तते । इति मत्वा भजन्ते मां बुधा भावसमन्विताः ॥ १०-८ ॥

aḥaṁ sarvasya prabhavo mattaḥ sarvaṁ pravartate | iti matvā bhajante mām budhā bhāvasamanvitāḥ || 10-8 ||

aham: I (am); sarvasya: of everything; prabhavah: the origin of existence; mattah: from me; sarvam: everything; pravartate: emanates; iti: like this; matva: thinking; bhajante: they worship; mam: me; budbuh: the intelligent; bhava-samanvitah: with great attention.

"I am the origin of existence of everything, as everything emanates from me. Intelligent people remember this, and worship me with intense attention."

In verse 10.2, Krishna had already said, aham adir hi devanam, "I am the origin of all the devas". Again Krishna repeats this extremely important point: only those intelligent people who actually realize Krishna's transcendental glories and position will be able to worship him properly, with the required attention and consciousness. The others will simply be licking the exterior of the honey jar and imagine they are tasting the supreme sweetness. There are innumerable texts from various scriptures confirming the fact that Narayana is the origin of everything. The first and foremost source in this regard is the Bhagavata Purana, that speaks almost exclusively of Vishnu/ Krishna, but there are also 5 more vaishnava Puranas (Vishnu Purana, Brahma Purana, Brahmanda Purana and Brahma vaivarta Purana) and 13 vaishnava Upanishads - Vasudeva, Aryakta, Advaya taraka and Tarasara in Sukla Yajur Veda; Kali santarana in Krishna Yajur Veda; Nrisimha tapani, Mahanarayana, Rama rahasya, Rama tapani, Gopala tapani, Krishna, Hayagriva, Dattatreya and Garuda in Atharva Veda. However, also all other Puranas and Upanishads recognize the supreme position of Vishnu, although they do not deal with this topic preeminently. The shaiva Puranas and Upanishads actually refer to Vishnu/ Narayana when speak of Sadashiva ("the eternal Shiva"), because Shiva is a temporary manifestation of Vishnu that descends into the material universe as Param Atman. The Varaha Purana is quoted to say, narayanah paro devas tasmaj jatas caturmukhabh, tasmad rudro bhavad devah sa ca sarva-jnatam gatah, "Narayana is the Supreme deva, from him the four-faced (Brahma) was born, from him Shiva proceeds, and all the devas and all that is worth knowing." The Maha Upanishad (1) says, eko vai narayana asin na brahma na isano napo nagni-saman neme dyan-aprithivi na naksatrani na suryah, "(In the beginning) there was only Narayana - not Brahma nor Isana (Shiva). There was no water, fire, moon, sky, earth, stars or sun." The Narayana Upanishad (1) says, narayanad brahma jayate, narayanad prajapatih prajayate, narayanad indro jayate, narayanad astau vasavo jayante, narayanad ekadasa rudra jayante, narayanad dvadasadityah, "From Narayana, Brahma was born. From Narayana, the Prajapatis were generated. From Narayana, Indra and the 8 Vasus are born; from Narayana, the 11 Rudras and the 12 Adityas were born." The Bhagavata Purana (11.5.33) also shows Narayana worshiped (nutam) by Shiva and Brahma (siva virinci). However, the same Bhagavata (4.7.50) clearly states that there is no difference or separation (avisesa) between these Personalities of God, that are the supreme cause of the universe, the witness and the self-sufficient Lord of the atman (aham brahma ca sarvas ca jagatah karanam param, atmesvara upadrasta svayan drg avisesanah).

मच्चित्ता मदगतप्राणा बोधयन्तः परस्परम् ।

कथयन्तश्च मां नित्यं तुष्यन्ति च रमन्ति च ॥ १०-९ ॥

maccittā madgatapranā bodhayantah parasparam | kathayantaśca mān nityam tuṣyanti ca ramanti ca || 10-9 ||

mat citta: with their consciousness focused on me; mad-gata-pranah: having dedicated their energy and life to me; bodhayantah: help to understand; parasparam: each other; kathayantah: they discuss; ca: and; mam: me; nityam: always; tushyanti: find satisfaction; ca: and; ramanti: find pleasure; ca: and/ as well.

"They concentrate their consciousness on me, dedicate all their energies to me, and always discuss to help each other to better understand (me). In this, they find great pleasure and satisfaction."

There are several important points in this verse. The first and foremost is that the discussion (katha) about Krishna must be accompanied by sincere dedication to his service (gata prana) and by intense concentration (citta). This means that mechanical and superficial recitation by materialistic people will not have the expected effects. The expression mad gata pranah is referring to all pranas, as it appears in the plural; this means that a devotee spontaneously serves the Lord with all the activities of his/ her body and mind. The word citta ("awareness/ attention") shares a common root with the words chaitanya ("consciousness") and chaitya guru (the voice of conscience as the antaryami paramatma that is always ready to instruct us for our benefit). It is a traditional practice among Indian Hindus to attend social gatherings where the lilas of Krishna and Rama are recited or played (especially by actors or dancers), mostly episodes from Bhagavata Purana's 10th canto, Ramayana, or Mahabharata.

While it is always commendable to hear and remember the activities of the Lord, we should be careful not to become confused by the materialistic tendencies of professional reciters and entertainers, who cleverly pick only the passages that can attract most customers and skip over the transcendental instructions that are contained in the original texts. Although the activities of the Lord and his direct servants are always beneficial in themselves, we must remember that they are enacted in this world precisely to attract people to listen to the spiritual teachings and the transcendental knowledge that they contain. On the occasion of the many religious festivals in the Hindu calendar, religiously-minded people assemble in temples or in private homes, sometimes for one entire night, as for example on Shiva ratri. This vigil is called jagrum, and it is meant for such spiritual discussions, as well as for bhajana and kirana etc. We should be careful not to remain stuck on the primitive level of material and social religiosity, where people devoid of sufficient sincerity convince themselves that a little theory is sufficient to keep them in a position of "good standing". This is particularly dangerous when the misunderstanding is compounded by the delusional idea of automatic qualification through some material consideration, such as birth in the caste system, or official affiliation to some registered hierarchical organization. The discussion about God's activities and teachings must always be about practical application as well, as the Vedas clearly and repeatedly recommend: asato ma sad gamaya, "from asat lead me to sat", where asat refers to the temporary and illusory level of material identifications and attachments, while sat refers to the permanent and happy realization of transcendental Reality.

The other important point is that the recitation must include sufficient explanations for the proper understanding and application. The expressions bodhayantab parasparam and kathayanti clearly show that the discussion of the Lord's activities should not be a mere monologue offered by a lecturer, but an interactive program where all the members actively participate.

Of course there are different degrees of participation, based on the levels of knowledge and realization of the devotees who attend the program. From time to time, some will ask questions and elaborations, some will offer different perspectives, and some will debate on the applications and implications. In any case, when the participants are sincere, attentive, and dedicated to the loving service of the Lord, they derive the greatest happiness and satisfaction in discussing about God to understand and make understand his activities and teachings. This is confirmed by another famous verse in Bhagavad gita (2.59), that speaks about the "superior taste" (param drstva nivartate) that will make us forget material pleasures (rasa varjam).

The word ramanti is particularly interesting, as rama is the pleasure of a loving encounter, especially on the romantic level. So the devotees actually fall in love with Krishna, and like all lovers do, they are always anxious to speak and hear about their beloved. We must be extremely careful to avoid confusion on the very delicate issue of the madhurya or sringara rasa, the sentiment of romantic and erotic love expressed especially in the Gaudiya Vaishnava tradition in pursuance of Chaitanya's teachings and example. The danger is that immature people, still trapped by the materialistic concepts of bodily identification, social conventions, duality and sectarianism, will approach the most intimate activities of Krishna with some measure of false pride, considering themselves as "exclusive devotees" members of an elite group or club, simply because of their official affiliation and selective object of meditation. Under the pretext of aikantiki bhakti or exclusive devotion to the most intimate form of the Lord, they claim that they only need to think about his erotic activities with the gopis, and they disregard all the numerous philosophical statements and instructions that accompany the descriptions of such lilas in the genuine scriptures, as well as the other transcendental activities of the Lord in his various manifestations. The solution to this problem is not difficult. We must remain humble and appreciate all the activities and instructions of the Lord, without applying materialistic discriminations of "lower", because on the spiritual platform there is no "lower".

तेषां सततयुक्तानां भजतां प्रीतिपूर्वकम् । ददामि बुद्धियोगं तं येन मामुपयान्ति ते ॥ १०-१० ॥

teṣāṁ satatayuktānāṁ bhajatāṁ prītipūrvakam | dadāmi buddhiyogaṁ taṁ yena māmupayānti te || 10-10 ||

tesam: for them; satata-yuktanam: always united in yoga; bhajatam: worship; priti-purvakam: in a loving way; dadami: I give; buddhi yogam: the yoga of intelligence; taṁ: that; yena: by which; mam: to me; upayanti: (they) approach; te: they.

"To those who are always connected to me by serving me with love and devotion, I give the buddhi yoga, the engagement in intelligence, by which they will come to me."

Krishna gives great value to the exercise of intelligence. He had already mentioned buddhi yoga specifically in several verses of chapter 2 (39, 49, 50, 51, 52), and will mention it again at the end of the Bhagavad gita. The yoga of intelligence is the first description of yoga in Bhagavad gita, and refers to making the proper choices to progress in life and become free from karmic bondage, so that we can become permanently situated in Krishna consciousness (mat cittab satatam bhava, 18.57).

Buddhi, "intelligence", is the highest faculty and includes the powers of understanding, discernment, doubt, determination, reasoning and will. Several more times the text of Gita mentions buddhi ("intelligence") as a crucial factor in spiritual life: 1.23, (2.39), 2.41, 2.42, (2.49, 2.50, 2.51, 2.52), 2.53, 2.63, 2.65, 2.66, 2.73, 3.2, 3.26, 3.40, 3.42, 3.43, 4.18, 5.11, 5.17, 5.20, 5.28, 6.9, 6.21, 6.25, 6.43, 7.10, 7.24, 8.7, 10.4, (10.10), 12.3, 12.8, 12.13, 13.6, 15.20, 16.19, 18.16, 18.17, 18.29, 18.30, 18.31, 18.32, 18.37, 18.49, 18.50, 18.56 (and 18.57). Katha Upanishad (1.3.12) also states: "The atman is hidden in all beings and its radiance can be perceived only by those who are able to see subtle things by focusing buddhi". Bhagavata Purana (4.28.41) clearly states that God is the real guru for everyone, and can directly instruct any person with the pure and enlightening spiritual knowledge.

This is again confirmed by 1.1.1 (tene brahma brida, "revealed to Brahma through his heart"), 1.2.17 (brdy antab stho by abhadrani vidhunoti, "situated within the heart, he destroys all bad things"), 3.5.4 (brdi stithab yacchati jnanam sa tattva adbigamam, "situated in the heart, he gives the knowledge by which one can understand the truth"), 3.15.26 (tad visva guru adbikeritam bhuwanaika vandyam "the universal guru, who is the original maker, worshiped by all"), 3.25.38 (Kapila tells his mother that his devotees consider him as son, friend, guru, and ista dairam), 4.8.44 (Dhruva meditating on Vishnu as the guru of all gurus), 4.21.36 (Prithu telling his subjects that Hari is the supreme guru), 8.24.50 (king Satyavrata addressing Vishnu as his guru), 10.69.15 (jagat guru tamah, "the supreme guru of the universe"), 10.80.44 (Sudama's prayers to Krishna). We may ask ourselves, what is the meaning of the expression "always connected" (satata yuktanam) if only after realization they will be able to approach Krishna? On the material level, one first approaches a person, and then it becomes possible to remain connected to him. But here we are not on the material level. The first approach to God is through the sadhana of meditation on the glories of Krishna, his names, forms, activities, teachings etc. This effectively puts the sincere devotee in touch with God, and through the regular and consistent engagement in cultivating the transcendental knowledge and consciousness, the spiritual intelligence (buddhi yoga) develops and the devotee becomes able to understand Krishna as he really is - and not just an imaginative projection.

तेषामेवानुक्तार्थमहमज्ञानजं तमः । नाशयाम्यात्मभावस्थो ज्ञानदीपेन भास्वता ॥ १०-११ ॥

teṣāmevānukampāṛthamahamajñānajaṁ tamaḥ | nāśayāmyātmabhāvastho jñānādīpena bhāsvatā || 10-11 ||

tesam: for them; eva: certainly; anukampa artham: for the purpose of kindness; aham: I; ajnana-jam: born from ignorance; tamab: darkness; nasuyami: I destroy; atma-bhava-sthab: situated in the existence of their Self; jnana-dipena: with the lamp of knowledge; bhasvata: radiant.

"Out of my kindness for them, I destroy the darkness of ignorance from within their hearts, by (shining forth with) the radiant lamp of knowledge."

The explanation continues: buddhi yoga is the genuine transcendental understanding of the Personality of God, illuminated by the light of true knowledge. The darkness of ignorance is the material mentality, based on bodily identification, that covers the perception of the atman/ brahman, that is the true reality. The atman is the individual soul, that participates to the universal existence of brahman because they are both made of consciousness (cit), transcendental to circumstances and therefore ever existing (sat) and inexhaustible sources of happiness (ananda). There is no qualitative difference between the atman and the brahman: the only distinction is quantitative, as the brahman includes all the jivatmas and more.

The expression atma bhava stha refers to the sentiment of the self identification as it is present in the bhava (existence) of atman. The material self identification is the darkness, and the spiritual self identification is the light; the entire process of Self realization is to move from the material level to the spiritual level: asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrityor ma amritam gamaya, "from what is temporary lead me to what is eternal, from darkness lead me to the light, from death lead me to eternal life". This famous verse from Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad (1.3.28) is the refrain (adhyaroha) of the stutis called Pavamanas.

Krishna states that he will personally enlighten his sincere and dedicated devotee, from within the heart. Now, some lazy and superficial people may imagine that there is no need to actually study, because we can get knowledge directly from inside our hearts, especially since in the shastra we can find several other declarations that give greater importance to bhakti (love and devotion) compared to jnana (knowledge), and that glorify the quality of simplicity and humility condemning the pride and arrogance that often comes with a material attachment to erudition and scholarship.

While it is true that academic qualifications are not relevant in the process of true bhakti, we absolutely need the genuine light (jnana dipa) of transcendental knowledge and realization. Krishna is stating here that he will provide this light to those sincere devotees who are constantly engaged (satata yujanam) in buddhi yoga - the constant effort to better understand Krishna. This fundamental requirement for sincerity and effort automatically excludes lazy and superficial posers, materialistic simpletons, sentimentalistic fools, and all the other delusional imitators.

We should not forget that those passages glorifying simplicity and humility are contained in the scriptures and written in Sanskrit, therefore they are addressed to those who actually study the scriptures and know Sanskrit well enough. They are directed not to illiterate and ignorant people, but to those who could become proud of their scholarship and erudition, therefore they should never be taken as a glorification of ignorance and disrespect towards the scriptures and the genuine guru who teaches them.

This is the last of the four central verses of Bhagavad gita, called chatuh sloki gita (10.8 to 11), that are situated exactly in the middle of the text. For their importance, they are often compared to the chatuh sloki bhagavata (2.9-33-36), that we quote here for reference:

aham evasam evagre nanyad yat sat asat param, pascad aham yad etac ca yo 'vasisyeta so 'smy aham, "I am what existed before the creation, and all that will ever exist. I am the sat and the asat (the supreme cause and effect), up to the end (of the universe), and I am what remains after all these (creations) and everything else (are dissolved)", rite 'rtham yat pratiyeta na pratiyeta catmani, tad vidyad atmano mayam yathabhaso yatha tama, "Whatever appears to be of value or without value, is only in relationship with me. You must know that everything (in this world) is just the shadow of my Maya, like darkness is a shadow (of light)", yatha mahanti bbutani bhutesucchavacesv antu, pravistani apravistani tatha tesu na tesv aham, "Just like the elemental powers (ether, air, fire, water, earth) are contained in all beings, both great and small, and at the same time they are not limited to them, similarly I am in all beings, and yet I am not (limited to them)", etavad eva jijnyasam tattva jijnasunatmanah, anvaya vyatikramabhyam yat syat sarvatra sarvada, "This (that I have now said) is the most important subject of transcendental knowledge, the tattva that should be researched directly and directly, at all times and places and in all circumstances".

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

परं ब्रह्म परं धाम पवित्रं परमं भवान् ।

param brahma param dhāma pavitraṁ paramaṁ bhavān ।

पुरुषं शाश्वतं दिव्यमादिदेवमजं विभुम् ॥ १०-१२ ॥

puruṣaṁ śāśvataṁ divyamādidēvamajaṁ vibhum ॥ 10-12 ॥

arjunab: Arjuna; uvaca: said; param brahma: the Supreme Brahman; param dhama: the supreme abode; pavitrām: purifier; paramam: supreme; bhavan: you; purusham: the Purusha; śāśvataṁ: eternal; divyam: divine; adi devam: the first of the devas; ajam: non-born; vibhum: powerful.

Arjuna said, "You are the supreme Brahman, the supreme abode, the supreme purifier. You are the eternal and divine Purusha, the first of the Devas, non-born and all-powerful."

These prayers offered here by Arjuna express his understanding of the meditation recommended by Krishna, and validate it through references to the teachings of great Rishis that Arjuna deeply trusted.

The definition param brahman indicates that the personal form of Krishna, as sa-guna ("with qualities") brahman, is superior to nir-guna ("without qualities") brahman, or the non-manifested Narayana (narayanah parah anyaktat andam anyakta-sambhavam) from whom the manifested universe has been generated. This is confirmed in 14.27 by the declaration, brahmano hi pratistha aham, "I am the foundation of brahman". This non-manifested form has already been explained in verse 9.4, "All this universe is pervaded by me in my non-manifested form. All beings exist in me, but I am not in them." (maya tatam idam sarvam jagad anyakta-murtina, mat-sthani sarva-bhutani na caham tesv avasthitah).

The expression anyakta murti ("non-manifested form") appears to be a contradiction in terms, but it is not, if we understand the deep meaning of anyakta as "transcendental" as opposed to "manifested on the level of the material senses". This can become easier to understand if we contemplate the meaning of similar expressions such as anyakta mulam, "the invisible root of the universe" (3.8.29) and anyakta lingah (4.4.21, 5.10.20) as applied to Shiva Mahadeva, the manifestation of Vishnu that interacts with the material energy. Further light on the topic is shed by the Bhagavata Purana:

"I offer my respect to the power of scientific knowledge (vijnana virya), that has taken the form of this body, accepting the distinct modality of passion/ action, born from the non-manifested matrix" (namah vijnana viryaya mayaya idam upayuse, grihita guna bhedaya namas te 'nyakta yonaye, 3.15.5)

"The universe is situated within the senses of the supreme brahman through the vishnu maya ("the illusion of Vishnu"); it is separated by time from the non-manifested existence" (visvam vai brahma tan matram samsthitam visnu mayaya, isvarena paricchinnam kalena anyakta murtina, 3.10.12)

"The anyakta brahman is like a great ocean where all the beings rest after the dissolution of the universe; it is like the belly, the heart and the mind of the Virat Purusha" (anyakta rasa sindhunam bhutanam nidhanasya ca, udaram veditam pumso bridayam manasah padam, 2.6.11).

The meditation system offered by Krishna in Bhagavad gita is meant to lead us to the Brahman realization, because only on this level we can truly develop spiritual devotion (para bhakti). This is the conclusion of Gita in verse 18.54: "(A person who is situated in the) Brahman realization is always satisfied in the self, never complaining or running after desires. S/he is equally disposed toward all beings and states of being, and thus attains my spiritual devotion" (brahma bhuta prasannatma na socati na kanksati samah sarvesu bhutesu, mad bhaktim labhate param).

This Brahman realization is not as difficult as one may think: it just boils down to truly abandoning all the false material bodily identifications and attachments (neti neti, "I am not this, I am not that"). This leaves us with the simple, naked and wonderful beauty of our real spiritual identity. From this platform, where we really perceive ourselves as spirit souls, we become able to actually perceive the supreme Spirit - God. Bhagavad gita establishes the importance of this crucial step in God realization:

"One who is constantly serving me in bhakti yoga comes to transcend all the material influences (the gunas) and is elevated to the level of Brahman" (mam ca yo 'vyabhicarena bhakti yogena sevate, sa gunan samatityaitan brahma bhuyaya kalpate, 14.26). The meaning of this verse (14.26) is exactly the same of verse 10.10.

The Bhagavata Purana (4.30.20) also confirms: "Those who are engaged in spiritual consciousness (*brahma vadi*s) experience this Brahman (realization) as always fresh and enthusiastic (narya-vat) and perceive knowledge within the heart (bridaye yat jnab). After attaining this level, one is never confused or worried, or overwhelmed by emotions" (naryavat bridaye yat jnab brahma etad brahma-vadibhib, na muhyanti na socanti na brisyanti yato gatah).

Bhagavad gita speaks at length of this Brahman realization:

"Brahman is the transcendental/ supreme unchanging (existence). The intrinsic nature (of the being) is called Adhyatma. And karma is described as the creative action that causes the states of existence/the bodies/the nature and the birth of the living beings" (sri-bhagavan uvaca, aksaram brahma paramam svabhavo 'dhyatmam ucyate, bhuta-bhavodbhava-karo visargah karma-samjnitah, 8.3).

"The (wise) seers (of Reality) attain the brahma nirvana (because) they have been purified from (all) sins/ faults and have cut off (all) doubts (dualistic illusions), engaging themselves in (work for) the benefit of all living beings" (labhante brahma-nirvanam rishayah kshina-kalmashah, chinna-dvaidha yatatmanah sarva-bhuta-bite ratah, 5.25).

Brahman realization, however, does not necessarily mean Brahman meditation (on the formless). Starting from chapter 7 and up to chapter 11, Krishna is giving us the perfect method of meditation that will enable us to realize how God is the transcendental and eternal Existence and Consciousness, from whom everything comes. Meditation specifically focused on the idea of Transcendence as merely non-limited by material designations (nirguna brahman) is not recommended in Bhagavad gita, because as Krishna says in 12.5, those who are embodied will find that progress is more troublesome to achieve if one remains attached to the non-manifested (kleso 'dhikataras tesam anyakta asakta cetasam, anyakta hi gatir duhkham dehavadbhir avapyate).

Even better is the transcendental form of Bhagavan mentioned in 8.20: "But there is another nature, different from this non-manifested (state), a non-manifested (nature) that is eternal and is not dissolved when all the beings are dissolved" (paras tasmad tu bhavo 'nyo 'nyakto 'nyaktat sananatah, yah sa sarvesu bhutesu nasyatsu na vinasyati).

The Names of God are non-different from his transcendental form: "The transcendental sound is the manifested form of the non-manifested brahman; it remains spiritual although it appears clearly perceivable, and is charged with many different energies that are distributed (all over the universe)" (śabda brahma atmanas tasya vyakta avyakta atmanah parah, brahma avabhāti vitatah nana śhakti upabrimbitah, 3.12.48).

आहुस्त्वामृषयः सर्वे देवर्षिर्नारदस्तथा । असितो देवलो व्यासः स्वयं चैव ब्रवीषि मे ॥ १०-१३ ॥

āhustvāmṛṣayaḥ sarve devarṣirṇāradastathā | asito devalo vyāsaḥ svayaṁ caiva bravīṣi me || 10-13 ||

abuh: they say; tvam: you; rishayah: the Rishis; sarve: all; devarṣibh: the rishis among the devas; naradab: Narada; tatha: as well; asitab: Asita; devalab: Devala; vyasab: Vyasa; svayam: yourself; ca: and; eva: certainly; bravīṣi: you are telling; me: to me.

"All the Rishis say this - Devarshi Narada, and also Asita, Devala, Vyasa - and now you are also telling me, very clearly."

The realization of Brahman, as any other realization, must be verified and confirmed with the genuine shastra and the truly Self realized souls, because the mind can play many tricks, and we may be led to project our idealizations, expectations and hopes beyond the actual facts. The Rishis mentioned in this verse - Narada, Asita, Devala and Vyasa - are all authentic without any doubt, and Arjuna had personally met them on several occasions and heard their explanations about the transcendental science. We know that Vyasa is the son of Parasara and Satyawati, related to the family of Arjuna, and that he is the compiler of most of the presently known Vedic literature. Narada is also very famous as having composed authoritative texts especially on bhakti, such as the Narada bhakti sutras, and is usually portrayed as playing his special vina (stringed musical instrument). He is a direct son of Brahma, and he is known as a tireless space traveler, therefore we find him in almost all the spiritual and religious assemblies all over the universe. The Asita mentioned in this verse is also found in several religious meeting, including the coronation of Yudhisthira and the śarpa yajna performed by Janamejaya (the son of Parikshit). However, there seems to be more than one Rishi going by that name, or it is the same Rishi that also goes under the composite name of Asita Devala - as we find in the Mahabharata, where he is described as the Rishi who narrated the story of Krishna's advent to the Pitris (while Narada narrated it to the Devas, Sukadeva to the Rakshasas and Yakshas, and Vyasa to the human beings). This Asita Devala is said to be a descendant of Kasyapa. Asita (a name that literally means "blue" or "black") is credited with having announced the extraordinary character of the newborn Krishna, as well as the future destiny and mission of Siddhartha Gautama (the historical Buddha).

The word bravīṣi, "you are telling", carries a meaning that goes beyond mere theory. Krishna is not repeating some textbook definitions on the academical level - he is explaining and demonstrating his position through the description of his level of consciousness. This is precisely the method required to obtain transcendental knowledge: we must approach a realized soul and hear the explanations and examples from the level of consciousness that he has actually experienced (4.34). The transmission of spiritual realization is done through the transcendental sound vibration (śabda brahman), that is much more powerful of ordinary material sound - already a considerably strong factor in this world. The faculty of hearing is the most powerful sense, that continues to work even when we are asleep and all other senses are suspended and inert. Sound is also the subtlest of all energies, from which all the elements are manifested in the beginning of creation - something that modern scientists have called "the Big Bang". The vibrations of sound cover a wide range of frequencies, of which presently the human ear can only perceive a limited variety; even within such frequencies, some are so powerful that they can break glass, and can become even more effective through the application of magnetic fields. In ancient Vedic times, the science of sound was so advanced that it was normally applied to many functions that contemporary scientists are still unable to understand - and therefore are labeled as "mythology" or "unexplained phenomena".

सर्वमेतदृतं मन्ये यन्मां वदसि केशव । न हि ते भगवन्व्यक्तिं विदुर्देवा न दानवाः ॥ १०-१४ ॥

sarvam etadṛtaṁ manye yaṁmāṁ vadasi keśava | na hi te bhagavanvaktiṁ vidurdevā na dānavāḥ || 10-14 ||

sarvam: all; etat: this; ritam: the rule of truth; manye: I consider; ya: that; mam: me; vadasi: you are saying; keśava: o Kesava; na: not; hi: certainly; te: your; bhagavan: God; vaktim: manifestation; vidur: they know; devab: the devas; na: not; dānavab: the danavas.

"O Kesava, I consider all this that you have been saying as the (supreme) truth. Certainly neither the Devas nor the Danavas are able to understand your divine manifestation."

The bhagavan vakti, "manifestation of God", mentioned in this verse is the transcendental form of Bhagavan that is the foundation of Brahman, and that is only perceived partially (ekamsena sthito jagat, 10.42) through the vibhūti yoga. The complete form of God is much more difficult to see and to contemplate (11.52-53). This realization is not opposed to the realization of avyakta brahman, but rather it completes it, carrying us to the higher level of Krishna Consciousness (mat cittah, 10.9).

The other crucial word in this verse is ritam, that contains many levels of meanings. It is not just "truth", but also "dharmā", "law", "order", "cycle", and "vṛtya" as revelation or manifestation, as opposite of avyakti. To better understand how all these concepts are connected, we need to relate ritam with sat, a very similar word. Sat also means "truth", and also "existence", "eternity", "reality", "spiritual", "good", "virtuous", as compared to asat, that has all the exact opposite meanings. Narada, Asita, Devala, Vyasa, and the other true Rishis recognize Krishna's divinity, because of his teachings that conform and integrate the consistent realizations of all the Rishis ("those who see Reality"). A person's divinity cannot be demonstrated simply by claiming he performed some miracles and his presence on the planet can be proven historically. The divine status is not awarded to someone because of the entertaining stories circulating on him, more or less verifiably or truthfully.

From a superficial, materialistic point of view, the adventures of Krishna's lila are not more impressive than many other stories told about various personalities and characters. Krishna's divinity is not proven by the fact that some people say that he lifted a hill when he was a child or that he appeared in a four-armed form to his parents. God cannot be limited by such considerations, or even by the mere fact that he says he is God. No material criteria can be used to measure the transcendental spiritual reality - only transcendental consciousness can perceive it. The validity of a teaching is in its intrinsic value and merit, and not in the historical circumstances in which it was spoken, or by the evaluation of the physical appearance of the person who spoke it.

This is why a fool or ignorant can be detected only when he speaks. A famous example is the story of Jada Bharata, narrated in Bhagavata Purana, canto 5, chapters 8 to 13. Because king Rahugana was intelligent, he was able to appreciate Jada Bharata's sublime level of realization after hearing him speak about the transcendental science - although Jada Bharata externally appeared as a very ordinary person, uninterested in social conventions.

स्वयमेवात्मनात्मानं वेत्थ त्वं पुरुषोत्तम । भूतभावन भूतेश देवदेव जगत्पते ॥ १०-१५ ॥

svayamevātmanātmanāṁ vettha tvam puruṣottama | bhūtabhāvana bhūteśa devadeva jagatpate || 10-15 ||

svayam: personally/ yourself; eva: certainly; atmana: the self; atmanam: the self; vettha: you know; tvam: you; puruṣa uttama: o supreme Purusha; bhuta-bhavana: origin of everything; bhuta isa: Lord of (all) beings; deva-deva: God of the Gods; jagat-pate: protector of the universe.

"You certainly know yourself, (as you are) the Param Atman (the atman of the atman). O Supreme Purusha, origin of everything, Lord of all beings, God of the Gods and protector of the universe!"

God is the supreme Consciousness and Existence, therefore the very foundation of the concept of divinity is self-awareness. The Bhagavata Purana declares that Bhagavan is non-different from Param Atman and Brahman: "Those who know the truth say that Existence is the non-dual knowledge/ awareness called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan" (avadanti tat tattva-vidah tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, brahma iti, paramatma iti, bhagavan iti sabdyate, 1.2.11).

We have already explored the meaning of Brahman. Paramatma is the atman of the atman, the soul of the soul - the consciousness of all consciousness, the existence of all existence. It is always present in each and every being - jiva and state of being - and also within each and every atom of the entire creation. These are the concepts expressed by Arjuna in his prayer.

The definition of puruṣa uttama, "supreme Purusha", adds another dimension to our understanding of God. Brahman/ Paramatma/ Bhagavan is Consciousness (chaitanya), and therefore it constitutes the enjoying principle, that perceives the feelings and the sentiments; on the intimate level personified by Krishna, it is called the rasa svarupa, or the "personification of sentiments", or rasa vigraha, "the form of sentiments". Thus, the puruṣa is the passive and stable principle, while prakriti is the active and changing principle.

In the ordinary materialistic sense, the word puruṣa is often used to refer to "man/ male" as opposed to "woman/ female" (stri), as within the ordinary sexual relationship, bodily identified persons naturally take up the masculine or feminine roles according to the type of body they are wearing. In the metaphysical sense, the term puruṣa is complemented by the word prakriti ("nature"), so there is a sort of ideological superimposition area where prakriti is considered as female in nature, and the principle of consciousness (puruṣa) is depicted in a male form, accompanied by his prakriti or shakti in female form.

We need to be very careful here, to avoid projecting a materialistic limited mentality on the symbolic representation of metaphysical realities that are not limited by the dualities of material attributes. God contains both the masculine and the feminine principles, and when there is a differentiation in iconography, the divine Couple should be depicted together: there can be no real separation between the two. More about the principles of puruṣa and prakriti will be found in chapter 13, entitled prakriti-puruṣa-viveka yoga ("the yoga of understanding nature as distinct from the personal principle") and in chapter 15, entitled puruṣottama yoga ("the yoga of the Supreme Person").

The definition bhuta, as in bhuta bhavana and bhuta isa, literally means "what has come to being", or simply "being". Thus it can be applied both to the living beings (the jivatmas, including those who only have a subtle body) and to the states of existence in this created world. Because God is the origin of all beings, he can also control them completely; such complete control is highlighted by the next definition of deva deva, "God of the Gods". However, such control is always benevolent and never tyrannical: Bhagavan protects the universe and cares for all beings, through the agency of prakriti.

वक्तुमर्हस्यशेषेण दिव्या ह्यात्मविभूतयः । याभिर्विभूतिभिर्लोकानिमांस्त्वं व्याप्य तिष्ठसि ॥ १०-१६ ॥

vaktumarhasyaśeṣeṇa divyā hyātma vibhūtayah | yābhirvibhūtibhirlokanimāṁstvam vyāpya tiṣṭhasi || 10-16 ||

vaktum: to say; arhasi: you should; asesena: by endless; divya: divine; hi: indeed; atma-vibhūtayah: by (your) own powers/ opulences; yābhi: by them; vibhūtibhi: powers/ wonders; lokan: all the planets/ all the people; iman: these; tvam: you; vyāpa: pervading; tiṣṭhasi: you remain/ are situated.

"Please tell more about (your) endless divine powers, by which you pervade all these planets and remain situated in them. "

Arjuna is requesting Krishna to continue the description of the vibhūti yoga, by which we can unite (yoga) with the supreme atman through the contemplation of his glories (vibhūti).

The expression vaktum arhasi asesena literally means "you should speak endlessly", where the word arhasi is very respectful and conveys the meanings of "be pleased to", "you are able to", indicating that a superior person is more qualified to perform an action, and therefore by engaging in that action, he will better benefit the universe. It is a word used often in prayers, where the devotee is requesting the Lord to grant some blessing or deliver some important teaching.

The word a-sesa literally means "without end", and indicates that the glories of God are endless - not just very numerous or too many for us to count, but always expanding and therefore unlimited. Even the empirical study of ordinary material things can be mind boggling: how a single seed can contain the genetic information for the production of thousands of seeds, each one of them also possessing the same reproductive power. Everything is contained within information - knowledge, or consciousness. Each atom is a microcosm, containing innumerable sub-atomic particles, and an enormous amount of energy - as we can see, for example, in the process of nuclear fusion or fission. Physicists have been shocked to discover that such sub-atomic particles are actually unlimited - therefore they have been called quanta, "non-measurable quantities".

The definition lokan (plural of lokal) is very interesting as it refers to individuals, peoples and worlds as well. We find it in the names of the various regions of space, such as Bhuloka, Bhuvarka, Svarloka (as the three main dimensions of the universe) as well as Satyaloka, Tapoloka, Janaloka etc, down to the lower systems such as Patalaloka, etc. The interesting point is that the definition is connected to the people inhabiting the place, and not to the physical characteristics of the place: this means that it does not need to be a planet proper, like Earth or Mars. It could even be a subtle dimension that is not to be perceived on the gross level through our material senses; there the inhabitants may have subtle bodies, or bodies that are composed in a different way. Our bodies are mainly composed by water and earth, with a small part of fire and air, as well as ether, mind, intelligence and ego. Other bodies may have a prevalence of fire and air, and very little water and earth, and other bodies are only composed by subtle elements and have the power to arrange and rearrange molecules of the other elements to manifest temporary forms.

The expression dirya atma-ribhutayah, "divine powers of the self", states that we can find the divine presence also in the material universe: ribhuti is the spirit - the consciousness, the knowledge - that manifests all the wonders within the universe.

Abrahamic faiths have created a very damaging rift between religion and science, but Vedic knowledge beautifully integrates them, just how it used to be in pre-abrahamic times in all world cultures. The most advanced contemporary scientific research is confirming the ancient teachings of Vedic scriptures. God is omnipresent in the universe, as he pervades (vyapya) everything in a permanent way (tisthasi), because without the consciousness/ knowledge/ information, that constitutes the subtle blue print of all things, nothing can exist. Therefore he is called visvato mukham, "whose face is everywhere".

कथं विद्यामहं योगिन्स्त्वां सदा परिचिन्तयन् । केषु केषु च भावेषु चिन्त्योऽसि भगवन्मया ॥ १०-१७ ॥

katham vidyāmaham yogiṁstvāṁ sadā paricintayan | keṣu keṣu ca bhāveṣu cintyo'si bhagavanmayā || 10-17 ||

katham: how; vidyam aham: I should know; yogin: o yogi; tvam: you; sada: always; paricintayan: meditating on; keshu keshu: in which (different ways); ca: and; bhaveshu: in the sentiments; cintyah asi: you should be contemplated; bhagavan: God; maya: by me.

"O Yogi, how should I know you through constant meditation? O Lord, in which different ways and sentiments should I contemplate you?"

This is the 5th verse of Arjuna's prayers, starting from 10.12. Arjuna recognized the truth of Krishna's statements, that are in accordance to the explanations that he had heard several times from the Rishis.

Only the direct transcendental perception of Consciousness enables us to understand Krishna's glories, and that does not depend on material qualifications or powers: intellect is not sufficient, because it will merely take us to the theoretical level, while consciousness is something that we must experience in our very soul, at the spiritual level. It is the thrill and the emotion and the union (yoga) and the deep feeling of direct perception, that we also call enlightenment or ecstasy.

This is the nature of bhakti. Verse 18.55 (bhaktya mam abhijanati yavan yas casmi tattvatah, "only through bhakti one can know me as I truly am") will conclude that only the genuine emotion of love and devotion can tune our consciousness to the spiritual level of the supreme Consciousness and experience that eternal existence, awareness and happiness that transcends material limitations.

Arjuna calls Krishna "yogi", to indicate that he is connected to everything. He does not mean to belittle Krishna's position by comparing him to an ordinary yoga practitioner, but rather he is showing his great appreciation and deep understanding of the true meaning of Yoga. This Yogi is also Bhagavan, the personal manifestation of the supreme Brahman.

Meditation in yoga means tuning one's consciousness into the supreme Consciousness, through the contemplation of forms, names, activities, qualities, or powers manifested by the supreme Consciousness. Ordinary meditation - that is not in yoga, "in union with the Supreme" - can focus on any object, as it simply consists in concentrating our attention on something specific, like we do when we study a lesson or we try to solve a problem, or even when we are engrossed in watching some film or remembering some past event or some person. A relaxing meditation can be done by visualizing nice images, such as a sunlight clear sky with some fluffy white little clouds, a beautiful meadow with lush green grass and cute flowers, a majestic forest with light mysteriously filtering down through the branches and leaves, or fresh mountains covered in snow, and so on. But that is not yoga - it's just a pleasing exercise of imagination or fantasy, a nice illusion or day-dream.

Yoga meditation is not about "the void" either. It is true that a little "void meditation" can help us in learning how to quiet our mind, become detached from the compulsive desire to run after whatever thoughts and impressions that flow in, and appreciate silence and peace. Most people are so used to the unending chattering of their minds that they become scared and anxious whenever there is silence - when the TV breaks down, when they do not have noisy people around, when they do not have some work to do, when they can't get on internet, social media, phone, game sites, and so on.

So dropping all these distractions is merely a preliminary stage, called pratyahara, that will gradually enable us to actually concentrate our attention on a single thought (dharana) - the first stage of real yoga meditation; dhyana is the stage of yoga meditation in which we focus on a set of interconnected spiritual concepts or aspects of the Divine (keshu keshu bhavesu). Yoga means "union", by which we deliberately and consciously join in with the supreme awareness and intelligence.

