The word bhavesu ("in which sentiments") is the plural locative of the noun bhava, that conveys the meanings of "emotion", "feeling", "sentiment", "physical thing", "aspect", "existence", "nature". Arjuna is requesting the Lord himself (bhagavan) to explain in which sentiment one should meditate on him; since Arjuna is presenting the request in a personal manner (maya: "by me"), and we know that Arjuna is not an ordinary unevolved person, but a close companion of the Lord, we understand that the meditation recommended to him by Krishna is not meant just for "beginners" or "neophytes".

विस्तरेणात्मनो योगं विभूतिं च जनार्दन । भूयः कथय तृप्तिर्हि शृण्वतो नास्ति मेऽमृतम् ॥ १०-१८ ॥

vistareṇātmano yogam vibhūtiṁ ca janārdana | bhūyaḥ kathaya tṛptirhi śṛṇvato nāsti me'mṛtam || 10-18 || vistarena: in various ways; atmanah: the atman; yogam: the yoga; vibhūtim: the power/ opulence; ca: and; janardana: o Janardana; bhūyaḥ: again; kathaya: describe; tṛptib: satisfaction; hi: indeed; śṛṇvataḥ: hearing; na: not; asti: there is; me: for me; amṛtam: nectar.

"O Janardana, (please) describe the various manifestations of your vibhuti yoga again, because I can never be tired of hearing such nectar."

This is the difference between material subjects and spiritual subjects: spiritual knowledge is always fresh and interesting, and one never tires of hearing about it. Krishna katha means "discussions about Krishna", while gramya katha means "village discussions" - the ordinary talking that ordinary people engage in. Two other very important words in this verse are tripti and amrita. Tripti means "satisfaction", the exhaustion that has removed the hunger or interest for something after having enjoyed sufficient pleasure, like after a very good meal. When we have eaten enough, we lose interest even in the most delicious treats, because we are unable to take anything more. This is because such sense gratification is on the material level. It is material food, and it is a material stomach - and only a certain quantity can be processed pleasurably. After that, eating actually becomes a suffering and our body revolts against it.

On the spiritual level, however, our hunger for happiness is unlimited, and therefore we see that people who seek happiness from the material objects are never really satisfied. This is the difference between tripti ("satiation") and tusti ("contentment"), mentioned in verse 10.5. In material pleasures, a yogi (a person who focuses on the cultivation of consciousness) is content with a reasonable and healthy amount of sattvic pleasure, while a bhogi (a person who focuses on sense pleasure) is never satisfied but always hits the wall of tripti, "satiation". For this reason, the word tripti in this verse is counter-balanced by the word amrita, that is usually translated as "nectar". Its literal meaning is actually "immortal", and refers to transcendental nature: only the spiritual immortal and inexhaustible nectar can satisfy the soul's hunger for happiness, that is also spiritual. This is confirmed by Bhagavata Purana in several verses:

"We shall never be tired of hearing about the activities of the Lord, who is glorified with transcendental prayers, because we relish these sweet sentiments at every step, even by listening continuously" (vayam tu na vitripyana uttama sloka vikrame, yat sṛṇvatam rasa jnanam svadu svadu pade pade, 1.1.19)

"Bless you! Please tell us more about these generous activities (of the Lord). Any person who knows about rasas will never become tired of drinking the nectar of Hari's stories" (ta naḥ kīrtaya bhādrām te kīrtanya udara karmāṇaḥ, rasajñāḥ ke nu tripyeta hari līlāmṛtāṁ pībān, 3.20.6).

"O brahmana, Bhagavan manifests unlimited activities according to his own desires. Who can become tired of listening to such nectar, as his generous activities as a cowherd boy?" (brahman bhagavatasya bhūmnaḥ svacchanda vartināḥ, gopāla udara caritam kar tripyeta amṛta jusan, 10.16.3).

The activities of the Lord are called udara ("generous", "magnanimous") because they are manifested in this world with the purpose of attracting and inspiring the conditioned souls towards the spiritual level.

हन्त ते कथयिष्यामि दिव्या ह्यात्मविभूतयः । प्राधान्यतः कुरुश्रेष्ठ नास्त्यन्तो विस्तरस्य मे ॥ १०-१९ ॥

hanta te kathayisyāmi divyā hyātmavibhūtayah | prādhānyataḥ kuruśreṣṭha nāstyanto vistarasya me || 10-19 ||

sri: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvāca: said; hanta: yes; te: to you; kathayisyāmi: I will speak; divya: divine; hi: indeed; atma-vibhūtayah: the potencies of the self; prādhānyataḥ: the most notable; kuru-sreṣṭha: o best of the Kurus; na: not; asti: there is; antaḥ: the end; vistarasya: of the variety; me: mine.

The wonderful Lord said, "Yes, o best of the Kurus, I will tell you about the divine potencies of the Self, but only about the most prominent, because there is no end to the variety (of my glories)."

The word banta, that could be translated as "yes, now", is still used in Indian languages (in its prakriti form han) to indicate affirmation, agreement, approval, etc. It is interesting to note that a similar sound - albeit spontaneous and not considered as a word proper - is also popular in many other languages to express this same sentiment, and is intuitively understood by anyone provided it is modulated with the proper intonation.

The word pradbhanyatah, meaning "the main", "those excellent among", and "supreme position", is from the same root as pradhana, that refers to the primeval non-differentiated aggregate of material nature.

In the process of spiritual realization and study of transcendental science, the most important factor is the proper communication between the teacher and the student. Krishna in Bhagavad gita gives the perfect example of the teacher who is always ready to answer all the questions, offer more examples for elucidation, dispel doubts, reconcile apparent contradictions, and destroy misconceptions even with strong words. From his part, Arjuna is also playing his student role perfectly, from the very start of the conversation, when he asks Krishna to drive his chariot in the middle of the battlefield, to see who has come to fight to support the "bad guys", and what work is expecting him in the execution of his duties. Arjuna is not afraid of uncovering his weakness and problems before Krishna, and this constitutes the first and most important step in the relationship with the genuine guru.

Many people labor under the delusional idea that the guru is not supposed to be interested in their problems, or that he already "knows everything" so there is no need to ask questions and present doubts and perplexities. Especially in the case of "superstar gurus", disciples can hardly approach the guru at a personal level for a few minutes of superficial conversation, what to speak of establishing a deep, meaningful and useful relationship to be correctly guided in personal evolution. Yet, such "gurus" demand total, unquestioning, and exclusive allegiance to their particular person, as well as worship and profit of some kind, and expect the disciples to keep pledging their immense and inexpressible gratitude for their debt towards their "lord, master and savior" lifetime after lifetime. This is unfair, as it puts the entire load of responsibility and duties on the students, who by definition are less qualified to sustain the weight of the relationship. A genuine guru is very well aware of the responsibility of accepting a disciple, and of the fact that the guru will have to come back, lifetime after lifetime, until all the disciples have either attained the desired goal, or have explicitly rejected the guru. For this reason, the genuine guru is always very interested in understanding any problem the disciples may be going through, and answer all their questions. The service that the disciples offer to the guru is a reciprocation and an expression of gratitude for the guru's actual help; a guru who simply acts as a representative for someone else, and does not answer to any responsibility, or is not able to give proper explanations and knowledge, is not a real guru.

Bhagavad gita is very clear about this issue: "You should learn this (knowledge) by approaching those who directly contemplate the Truth, asking them many questions and offering them service. Those who have the knowledge will initiate you (into this science)" tad viddhi pranipatena pariprasenena sevaya, upadekshyanti te jñanam jñāninas tattva-darsinah (4.34).

अहमात्मा गुडाकेश सर्वभूताशयस्थितः । अहमादिश्च मध्यं च भूतानामन्त एव च ॥ १०-२० ॥

ahamātmā guḍākeśa sarvabhūtāśayasthitaḥ | ahamādiśca madhyam ca bhūtānāmanta eva ca || 10-20 ||

aham: I (am); atman: the atman/ Self; gudakesa: o Gudakesa; sarva-bhuta: of all beings; asaya sthitaḥ: situated/ established in the heart; aham: I (am); adib: the beginning; ca: and; madhyam: the middle; ca: and; bhutanam: of the beings; antah: the end; eva: certainly; ca: as well as.

"O Gudakesha, I am the atman situated in the hearts of all beings. I am the beginning, the middle and the end of all beings as well."

The words param atman mean "the atman of the atman", where atman is translated as "self". The meanings of "self" can be applied to different levels according to the sense of identity or identification of the person who speaks. Materialistic people who identify with the body will interpret "self" as the body, while those who mostly live on the mental platform will - like Descartes - say "cogito, ergo sum" ("I think, therefore I exist"). A spiritualist will understand the "self" as the individual atman. When Krishna, the supreme Consciousness, talks about the atman, he means the adhyatma, the param atman, that is pure consciousness and awareness at universal level. Of course, for Krishna there is no difference between his spirit, his mind and his body, because his body and mind are manifested by his internal spiritual energy, therefore as a manifestation of pure consciousness, they are not material or limited by material conditions. This is why he is called "non-born" (ajam, 10.12). In the same way as he manifests in his tad rupa/ svayam rupa, svayam prakasa, tad ekatma, prabhava, vaibhava, vilasa and avatara, Krishna also manifests in the shakti avesa and in the ordinary jivas - as Consciousness. As we have already quoted, Bhagavata Purana (1.2.11) confirms that Bhagavan is non-different from Param Atman and Brahman: "Those who know the truth say that Existence is the non-dual knowledge/ awareness called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan" (vadanti tat tattva-vidah tattvam yaj jñanam advayam, brahma iti, paramatma iti, bhagavan iti sabyate, 1.2.11).

When Krishna says that he is the beginning, middle and end (adi, madhyam, antah) of all beings, he speaks about the creation, maintenance, and dissolution of everything. It is easy to remember here the guna avatars Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva who are connected with the creation, maintenance and dissolution of the universe respectively. However, we should look even further, and try to understand more deeply the transcendental and scientific meaning of this. Later, Krishna will reveal himself as Time (11.32), so we can understand that Consciousness is the past, present, and future of all manifestations and all beings. In verse

2.12, at the very beginning of his instructions to Arjuna, Krishna has already declared that each being always existed, and will continue to be: but how? Certainly not in terms of the temporary material bodies, because at each moment the bodies keep disappearing and appearing, in a constant dance of transformation. So what always remains in the past, present of future of all beings, is Consciousness - Krishna as Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan.

आदित्यानामहं विष्णुर्ज्योतिषां रविरंशुमान् । मरीचिर्मरुतामस्मि नक्षत्राणामहं शशी ॥ १०-२१ ॥

ādityānāmahaṁ viṣṇurjyotiṣāṁ raviraṁśumān | marīcirmarutāmasmi nakṣatrāṇāmahaṁ śaśī || 10-21 ||

adityanamr. of the Adityas; ahamr. I (am); vishnuh. Vishnu; jyotishamr. of the lights; ravir. the sun; amsumanr. radiant; maricib. Marici; marutamr. of the Marutas; asmi. I am; nakshatranamr. of the lunar mansions; ahamr. I (am); sasi. the moon.

"Among the Adityas, I am Vishnu. Among the lights, I am the radiant Sun. To the Marutas, I am Marici. To the constellations, I am the Moon."

The descriptions of the these verses connect the principle of Consciousness to the various manifestations of this world, not only to express the greatest, most powerful and most important of every category, but also to refer to their meaning. This is why the verse connects the Moon with the nakshatras ("lunar mansions"), as Krishna knows very well the difference between the Moon and the stars. The word nakshatra refers specifically to stars, and the Vedic science of astrology/ astronomy (jyotisha) clearly teaches that the Moon is the companion or Lord of the stars - not one of them, not even the brightest or most important.

The names of the 27 nakshatras, covering the entire circle of 360 degrees of the sky vault, are as follows: Visakha corresponds to the star Alpha Librae, Jyestha is Antares, Purva asadha is Delta Sagittari and Uttara asadha is Sigma sagittari, Sravana is Alpha Aquilae, Purva bhadra pada is Alpha Pegasi and Uttara bhadra pada is Gamma Pegasi, Asvina is Beta Arietis, Kritika is Eta Tauri (associated with the constellation of the Pleiades), Mrigasira is Lambda Orionis, Pushya is Delta Cancri, Magha is Regulus, Purva phalguni is Delta Leonis and Uttara phalguni is Beta Leonis, Chitra is Vegas or Spica Virginis. Other important stars are Rohini (Aldebaran), Revati (Zeta Piscium), Anuradha (Delta Scorpio), Dhanishta (Beta Delphinum), Ardra (Alpha Orionis/ Betelgeuse), Satabisha (Lambda Aquarius), Aslesha (Alpha Hydrae), Punarvasu (Beta Geminorum), Hasta (Delta Corvi), Svati (Arcturus), Mula (Lambda Scorpionis), Bharani (35 Arietis), Asvayuja and Punarvasu (Castor and Pollux), Abhijit (Vega) etc. On the other hand, it is not clear which contemporary astronomical names correspond to the stars called Radha, Sunrita, Sravistha and Prostha pada. According to the position of these stars, the Vedic calendar lists the 12 months bearing the names of the constellations: the first month (April-May) of the Vedic calendar is called Vaisakha, the second (May-June) is Jyestha, then come Asadha (June-July), Sravana (July-August), Bhadra (August-September), Asvina (September-October), Kartika (October-November), Margasira (November-December), Pausa (December-January), Magha (January-February), Phalguna (February-March) and Chaitra (March-April).

In the Vedic system, nakshatras are considered particularly important in the calculation of the personal horoscope of an individual or of the auspicious moment to begin a specific activity - something that is very interesting because this concept does not exist any more in western astrology (that considers practically only the members of our solar system - the 9 planets, the Sun and the Moon) although people still use expressions such as "being born under a good/ bad star", "what the stars say", and so on.

The 12 Adityas are listed as Dhata, Mitra, Aryama, Rudra, Varuna, Surya, Bhaga, Vivasvan, Pusha, Savita, Tvasta, and Vishnu. This Vishnu among the Adityas is the youngest son of Aditi, named Upendra or Vamana. The mention of the Sun just after the Adityas is significant, as Surya is the Sun. In fact, all the Adityas are considered manifestations of the Sun - the greatest power in the universe, next to the brahmayjoti or transcendental light of the spirit (Brahman).

Equally if not more intriguing are the Marutas or Maruta ganas, usually associated with wind, storm, or air (including the breathing in human beings), close companions of Indra. Actually the Marutas were sons of Diti - the mother of the Daityas, enemies of the Adityas - but as explained in chapter 18 of canto 6 of the Bhagavata Purana, Indra came to know that Diti was planning to generate a son who would be his enemy, and he managed to enter Diti's womb to kill the embryo by cutting it to pieces. However, by the power of Diti's austerities, each of the pieces continued to live independently as an individual child, so after the original embryo had cloned itself into 49, Indra decided to befriend him/ them, and considered him/ them as his brothers, sa-udara ("who have been in the same uterus").

The 7 main Marutas are listed in Vedic literature as Avaha, Pravaha, Vivaha, Paravaha, Udvaha, Samvaha, Parivaha; it is then obvious that Marici (literally, "ray of light") is not the most prominent among these sons of Diti - and it does not even seem to be the original embryo. The only famous Marici is the Marici Rishi, that is the manasa putra of Brahma and one of the Sapta Rishis, who became the father of Kasyapa Rishi, the father of all the other creatures of the universe.

Kasyapa married several of Daksha's daughters: Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kastha, Arista, Surasa, Ila, Muni, Krodhavaśa, Tamra, Surabhi, Sarama and Timi. Aditi became the mother of the Adityas (the main Devas), while Diti became the mother of the Daityas (the traditional enemies of the Adityas) and Danu the mother of the Danavas. Arista became the mother of the Gandharvas, Muni of the Apsaras, Surasa of the Rakshasas. Vinata became the mother of Garuda (Vishnu's bird carrier) and Aruna (Surya's charioteer), while Kadru became the mother of all the serpents, except the dandasukas, who were produced by Krodhavaśa. Surabhi was the mother of all the cows, the buffaloes and similar animals. Kastha produced the horses, Tamra the great birds of prey and Patangi all the other birds, Timi the aquatics, Sarama the fierce carnivores such as lions and tigers, and Yamini the locusts. Ila produced all the various trees and plants. This should make us understand that this type of "motherhood" does not refer to the ordinary reproduction of human beings, but it refers to symbolic principles of the creation of the universe.

The connection of Marici Rishi with the Marutas is not immediately clear if we remain on the superficial "mythological" level of genealogical descriptions, so we need to dive deeper into their scientific symbolic significance. At this level, we find that Maruta is the Vedic definition of space/ wind, as 49 varieties of forces or vibrational frequencies, not connected to light, sound, magnetism, or gravity, that are listed separately.

वेदानां सामवेदोऽस्मि देवानामस्मि वासवः । इन्द्रियाणां मनश्चास्मि भूतानामस्मि चेतना ॥ १०-२२ ॥

vedānām sāmavedo'smi devānāmasmi vāsavaḥ । indriyāṇām manaścāsmi bhūtānāmasmi cetanā ॥ 10-22 ॥

vedanamr. of the Vedas; sama-veda: the Sama Veda; asmi: I am; devanamr. of the devas; asmi: I am; vasava: the ruler; indriyanamr. of the senses; manab: the mind; ca: and; asmi: I am; bhutanamr. of the beings; asmi: I am; cetana: the consciousness.

"Of the Vedas, I am the Sama. Of the devas, I am Vasava. Of the senses, I am the mind. In living beings, I am consciousness."

The Sama Veda is the most elaborate and artistic of the four sambitas, and it is meant to be sung (rather than chanted) in the rituals to call the devas. The musical tunes of the Sama Veda are mathematical combinations of the basic notes, so they add extra power to the hymns of the Rig and Yajur. We know that in ancient times mathematics was highly respected as the perceivable expression and manifestation of the supreme spiritual realities, and strictly connected to music; some fragments of that knowledge have survived from the teachings of Pythagoras and other great thinkers.

Colonial indologists have done their worst to trivialize the tremendously deep symbolic and scientific knowledge contained in the Vedas, but the hidden power of these immensely ancient texts is still very much present and can be unlocked by those who have developed the required level of realization. The name Vasava (generally referred to Indra) literally means "of the vasus", that are the subtle material elements of the cosmos, and as personifications they are one of the main group of devas, together with the Adityas and Rudras. As we mentioned in commentary to verse 7.9, the Vasus are the eight principles of the cosmic manifestation, sometimes referred as the "material elements", but that definition creates confusion because they can be mistaken for the 8 elements previously mentioned by Krishna (7.4) as bhumih apah analah vayuh kham manah buddhib abankara.

The personifications of these Vasus are: fire as Agni ("burning") or Anala ("lively"), earth as Prithivi ("wide") or Dhara ("that which supports"), wind as Vayu ("wind of life") or Anila ("breath of life"), space as Antariksha ("what is seen in the middle") or Aha ("pervading"), the sun as Aditya ("eternal") or Pratyusha ("he who follows dawn"), the sky as Dyaus ("luminous") or Prabhasa ("radiant") also connected to sunset, the moon as Chandra ("illustrious") and Chandramasa (the lunar month) or Soma (the rejuvenating plant). Nakshatra (the aggregate of constellations) is also strictly connected to Dhruva (the pole star) and with the Sapta Rishis (the Seven Sages) that compose the most famous constellation in the sky: the Great Dipper or Ursa Maior. Dhruva is also known as Svetadvipa, the prapancika vaikuṇṭha planet in each universe. The primary principles of the universe are also categorized in a slightly different way as the Adityas, that are 12 aspects of the sun: Mitra, Aryaman, Bhaga, Varuna, Daksha, Amsa, Tvastri, Pushan, Vivasvat, Savitri, Sakra and Vishnu. The third meditation in this verse is very direct: Krishna is the consciousness or awareness (cetana) among all states of beings and in all living entities; as we have already elaborated quite often, Brahman is pure transcendental consciousness.

रुद्राणां शङ्करश्चास्मि वित्तेशो यक्षरक्षसाम् । वसूनां पावकश्चास्मि मेरुः शिखरिणामहम् ॥ १०-२३ ॥

rudrāṇām śaṅkaraścāsmi vittiśo yakṣarakṣasām । vasūnām pāvakaścāsmi meruḥ śikhariṇāmaham ॥ 10-23 ॥

rudranamr. of the Rudras; sankarab: Sankara; ca: and; asmi: I am; vitta isab: the Lord of wealth; yaksha-rakshasamr. of the Yakshas and Rakshasas; vasunamr. of the Vasus; pavakab: the fire; ca: and; asmi: I am; merub: the Meru; śikharinamr. of the mountains; aham: I (am).

"Of the Rudras, I am Shankara. Of the Yakshas and Rakshasas, I am the Lord of wealth. Of the Vasus, I am fire, and among the peaks, I am Meru."

The theme of the Vasus returns in this verse. Krishna has already mentioned the Adityas. Here Krishna brings the principle of Fire as the most important and primeval constituent of the universe - fire as the heat created by the fast and powerful movement of the smallest particles of matter, that expand into creation, like the warm breath of Narayana exhaling the universes.

Agni - fire - is the messenger who carries our offerings to all the devas. He is the purifier, destroyer and giver of life, and the primeval teacher for all human beings, that gives knowledge and realizations in a spontaneous and elemental way, and on the highest level as well. As we mentioned in the commentary to 7.9, the other group of categories of the universal principles, called the 11 Rudras, are the aspects of Shiva or the Purusha principle: Atma ("Self", "the individual soul"), Ananda ("happiness"), Vijnana ("knowledge"), Manas ("the mind"), Prana ("the vital energy"), Vac ("the faculty of speech"), Isana ("the dominating principle"), Tatpurusha ("that activating principle"), Aghora ("nothing is horrible"), Vamadeva ("pleasant Lord") and Sadyojata ("appearing quickly"). All these are personifications of the conscious principle in each of the manifestations that gives them their names. According to the Brihad aranyaka Upanishad (3.9.4), the Rudras are personifications of the senses, including the mind. The collective name Rudra literally means "violent", "fierce", "wild", and derives from the root rud, meaning "to howl". This is certainly not a negative meaning, but simply indicates a very powerful and overwhelming force that is intrinsic in the manifestation of consciousness in the material world. Within the universal plan, such manifestations are meant to fuel the momentum of creation that brings the inevitable destruction, which in turn establishes the necessary conditions for a new creation. Shankara is a famous name for Shiva Mahadeva, who is the origin of all the Rudras; although he is not one of these 11 (who are his expansions), he is also called Rudra, especially as the manifestation of the Sun that is among the 12 Adityas.

The Yakshas and Rakshasas are two humanoid races that have greater powers than human beings and are known to interact with them quite often, even establishing permanent settlements or bases on Earth. Especially the Yakshas like to live in mountain caves and tunnels, where they sometimes accumulate treasures of gold and other valuable things. The capital of the Yakshas on Earth is Alakapuri, in the Himalayan mountains. The Lord of wealth mentioned in the verse is Kuvera, the king of the Yakshas and "brother" of Shiva Mahadeva. Mount Meru (also called Sumeru) is mentioned here as the greatest and most important of all mountain peaks, because it is the center of the universe, the axis around which the cosmos revolves. Its roots reach down into the lower planetary systems and its summit touches Brahmaloaka. It represents the spinal column of the universal body, therefore it is also called Meru Danda, where danda means "column", "pillar", "rod". Several people have attempted to identify mount Meru with visible mountains, but this is not the Vedic perspective, as the Meru is the divine subtle axis on which the planet revolves, and that gives it the proper orientation in connection with the rest of the universe.

पुरोधसां च मुख्यं मां विद्धि पार्थ बृहस्पतिम् ।

सेनानीनामहं स्कन्दः सरसामस्मि सागरः ॥ १०-२४ ॥

purodhasām ca mukhyam mām viddhi pārtha bṛhaspatim | senānīnāmaham skandaḥ sarasāmasmi sāgarah || 10-24 ||

purodhasam: of the priests; ca: and; mukhyam: the chief; mām: me; viddhi: you should know; pārtha: o son of Pritha; bṛhaspatim: Brihaspati; senānīnam: of the generals; aham: I (am); skandaḥ: Skanda; sarasam: of the lakes; asmī: I am; sāgarah: the ocean.

"O son of Pritha, know that among the priests, I am the chief, Brihaspati. Among the generals, I am Skanda. Among the lakes, I am the ocean."

A purodhasa is a professional priest who performs the ritualistic ceremonies for the benefit of the family or the kingdom he works for. It is important here to understand that a brahmana never depends financially on anyone, and does not receive a salary, because that would be dangerous for his integrity. No brahmana should ever compromise on dharma or vidya to please the wealthy or materially powerful people, and thus obtain some personal profit. Therefore the relationship between the purodhasa (or purohita) and his karta (the "doer" of the sacrifice, for whose benefit the ritual is performed) is like the relationship between the guru and the disciples. In fact, the purodhasa gives a particular diksha to the karta every time a major ritual is performed, and the dakshina ("compensation") he receives is a gift that must be offered with gratitude and humility. There is a famous story about Indra once disrespecting Brihaspati, because he got the idea that his priest was a member of his court working for him like the others; as a result, Brihaspati abandoned him and the Devas, and the Devas ended up being defeated by the Asuras and losing their kingdom.

Brihaspati, son of Angira Rishi, was granted the position of preceptor of the Devas by the blessing of Shiva as a reward for his religious practices at Prabhasa tirtha (Somanatha). He is also identified with the beneficial planet Jupiter (called Guru or Brihaspati in Vedic astronomy/ astrology) and has 3 wives - Subha, Tara and Mamata. Skanda or Kartikeya (also called Subramanyam or Sanmukha) is Shiva's son, born out of fire. He is associated with the planet Angaraka or Mars - ruling over war and martial arts. Traditionally, his worship is very popular in south Indian culture, where he is honored by the famous festival of Thaipusam. Probably the greatest version of this festival is the one held by the Hindu Tamil community at the Batu caves, in Malaysia, attended by several thousands of people.

The word sara or sarovara means "lake", "pond", and also applies to man-made lakes or large tanks where people take bath for purification. The ocean (sagara) is the greatest among all bathing places, the purest and the most powerful.

महर्षीणां भृगुरहं गिरामस्म्येकमक्षरम् ।

यज्ञानां जपयज्ञोऽस्मि स्थावराणां हिमालयः ॥ १०-२५ ॥

maharṣīṇāṁ bhṛguraham girāmasmyekamakṣaram | yajñānām japayajño'smi sthāvarāṇām himālayah || 10-25 ||

maha rishinam: of the great Rishis; bhṛiguh: Bhṛigu; aham: I (am); giram: of the words; asmī: I am; ekam akṣaram: the one syllable; yajnanam: of the yajnas; japa-yajnah: the japa yajna; asmī: I am; sthavaranam: of the established; himalayah: the Himalayas.

"Of the great Rishis, I am Bhṛigu. Among the words, I am the one syllable. Of the sacrifices, I am the japa. Among the established things, I am the Himalaya."

Bhṛigu is one of the Sapta Rishis, and was born from the mind of Brahma (manasa putra). Buddha (Siddhartha Gautama) recognized him as a genuine authority, together with Visvamitra, Atri, Valmiki, Vamadeva, Yamadagni, Angira, Bharadvaja, Vasistha and Kasyapa (1.245 Vinaya Pitaka, Mahavagga). Contrarily to what many people believe, Buddha did not reject the authority of the genuine Vedas, but only their manipulated and distorted versions created by unscrupulous degraded brahmins.

The most famous episode about Brighu is about the origin of the special mark called brighupada ("foot of Brighu") that is found on Vishnu's chest: one day the assembled Rishis asked Brighu to establish who was the most elevated Personality of God - Brahma, Vishnu, or Shiva. So the Rishi went to test the patience and generosity of these three great Personalities, stimulating their anger respectively by neglecting to salute Brahma (his father), by throwing insulting words at Shiva, and by actually kicking Vishnu on his chest. Brighu is the father of one incarnation of Lakshmi, named Bhargavi, as well as of Sukracharya (also called Usana), Cyavana Rishi, and the two brothers Dhata and Vidhata. As the greatest authority on astrology/ astronomy, Brighu compiled a database of about 45 million templates with all the possible positions of the planets and stars, covering all past, present and future lifetimes of all human beings. Unfortunately most of these texts were lost during the Islamic invasions, especially with the destruction of the university and library of Nalanda, where most of his writings were collected.

The "one syllable" (ekam aksharam) mentioned in this verse is the sacred syllable om, that is undoubtedly the most fundamental of utterances or discourses (the literal meaning of gita). In chapters 3 and 4, we have elaborated on the meaning of yajna as sacred action or sacrifice, by which a human being participates to the support of the universe. Here Krishna states that among all acts of sacrifice, he is the japa yajna - the sacred religious action of softly chanting the Names of God. The japa yajna is the only act of worship that can be performed in all places and circumstances, and does not need any external paraphernalia; it is very simple and yet it is the most effective of all religious practices, capable of bringing enormous benefits both at spiritual and material levels. In fact, the chanting of the Names of God constitutes the fundamental basis of all religious practices, because there is no ritual that can dispense with the preliminary action of calling the Deity to accept our worship, offerings and praise. According to the instructions and the example of the greatest teachers of the Bhakti tradition, the chanting of the Names of God - any of the innumerable genuine Names we find in the scriptures - is the best and most intimate way to connect with the transcendental Personality of God, because it establishes a personal relationship. We can see it also in our ordinary experience: even more than exchanging food, gifts or compliments, calling the name of a loved person attracts the direct attention and elicits an affectionate response between lovers. So all forms of ritual worship to the Personality of God start from calling the Name of the Deity to be present personally either temporarily (avahana) or permanently (prana pratistha). Then various pleasing items are offered (fresh water, scents, auspicious substances, nice clothes, ornaments, flower, incense, lamps etc), then food is offered (bhoga or naivedya), and finally prayers and praise (vandana).

The Himalayas are not exactly immovable, as they keep growing in height from the corrugating pressure of the tectonic plate of the Indian subcontinent pushing into the Asian land mass. However, the word sthavaranam, "stable", refers to the fact that the Himalayas "will not go away" but remain permanently, as they are the most considerably established feature of the planet, that can be easily seen even from outer space.

अश्वत्थः सर्ववृक्षाणां देवर्षीणां च नारदः । गन्धर्वाणां चित्ररथः सिद्धानां कपिलो मुनिः ॥ १०-२६ ॥

aśvatthaḥ sarvavṛkṣāṇāṁ devarṣīṇāṁ ca nāradaḥ । gandharvāṇāṁ citrarathaḥ siddhānāṁ kapilo munīḥ ।। 10-26 ।।

asvatthaḥ: the Asvattha banyan tree; sarva-vrikshanam: of all the plants; devarshinam: of the Rishis among the devas; ca: and; naradaḥ: Narada; gandharvanam: of the Gandharvas; citrarataḥ: Citraratha; siddhanam: of the Siddhas; kapilab: Kapila; munib: the silent sage.

"Among all the plants, I am the asvattha. Among the Rishis of the Devas, I am Narada. Among the Gandharvas, I am Citraratha. Among the Siddhas, I am Kapila Muni."

The asvattha (also called pipal or bodhi) is a particular type of banyan tree that does not always have aerial roots from the branches. Its fruits and leaves and even the bark are edible and have medicinal properties (including relieving toothache, asthma, thirst, diseases of blood and heart, gout, ulcers, and menstrual problems). Due to its beautiful shape, this tree is often planted for decorative purposes, and the leaves are used as canvas for small artistic paintings. Sometimes its seeds germinate over other trees, so it appears that the asvattha was born directly from the host tree. Its botanical name, Ficus religiosa, derives from the fact that the Buddha - Siddhartha Gautama - sat and meditated under this tree, as it has always been the tradition in ancient times, as the asvattha is considered a sacred plant, worthy of worship. And in fact the asvattha has been sacred to Vedic peoples since time immemorial. In some Harappan seals, we find the characteristic leaves of this tree crowning the buffalo horns of the "Pasupati", the bearded male sitting in meditation and surrounded by several wild animals. On other Harappan seals, we see the asvattha tree itself at the center of the image, together with 7 matrikas or forms of the Goddess; in some of such images the matrikas have bird faces, in others they have human faces but bird characteristics, such as feathers wings.

Devarshi Narada is a very special personality, a Rishi among the Devas, direct son of Brahma at the beginning of creation. He is the famous author of the Narada bhakti sutras, and he is always listed among the great Rishis present at the various important occasions all over the universe, but especially on Earth. His role in the Krishna lila described in Bhagavata Purana (10th canto) is crucial, and he appears several times in the narration. In Bhagavata Purana (1.5.23-39, 1.6.1-36) Narada himself tells about his previous life while speaking with Vyasa, highlighting the importance of devotional service and especially of the company of self-realized souls who discuss about Krishna (kersna katha, 1.5.26) and the leftovers of the food that was offered to God (1.5.25). Interestingly, Narada compares devotional service to homeopathy (1.5.33), meaning that attachment, desire and identification with one's actions (when engaged in devotional service) are the medicine that will cure the conditioned soul from attachments, desires and identifications with material things.

Although in that previous lifetime Narada had been a mere 5 year old boy, son of an unmarried maidservant (that we could call a sudrani or low caste woman), he was immediately able to attain the level of Brahman realization (1.5.25, 26, 27, 31) because of his good behavior, sincerity and attentiveness (1.5.24). After the sudden death of his mother, the child started traveling like a sannyasi, until he finally reached a sacred and solitary place, near a river lake, and sat under a pipal tree (the sacred ficus religiosa mentioned just before) to meditate until he obtained the full darshana of the transcendental form of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. Narayana spoke to him, saying that he would not get another opportunity for such darshana in that lifetime, but that he should consider this as a greater blessing, because the feeling of separation (vipralambha) and hankering (lalasamyi) for God is the greatest form of meditation, that keeps the heart completely free from all material contamination. After several years spent in traveling and remembering God, the child left his body and remained in a transcendental body (suddha tanum, 1.6.28), and at the beginning of the subsequent creation, he was born from Brahma, to travel freely in the spiritual and material worlds to carry out his preaching work on behalf of the Lord.

Citraratha (literally, "beautiful chariot", referred to his vimana or airplane), is considered the king and the best singer among the Gandharvas, the upadevas or subordinate devas on the higher planetary systems that are famous for their performing arts. He is mentioned several times in puranic episodes, including one (Bhagavata Purana 9.16.3) in which his handsomeness fascinates the mind of Parasurama's mother Renuka, who saw him playing in the river with the Apsaras and totally forgot that she was supposed to be fetching water for an important religious ritual performed by her husband Jamadagni. Citraratha also became the dance teacher of Arjuna, and out of affection, he gifted him with beautiful white horses that could move swiftly both on earth and in the sky and were invulnerable in battle. In Mahabharata we find a chapter entitled Citraratha parva, describing the early encounter between Arjuna and Citraratha (in which Citraratha is defeated in a duel), and another episode in the Ghoshya yatra parva, where Citraratha (there called Citrasena) punishes Duryodhana for his impudence, and delivers him as a prisoner to Yudhisthira and Arjuna. Kapila is the famous teacher of the Sankhya darshana (philosophy), based on the analysis of the components of the universe, including the fundamental principles of purusha and prakriti. The Bhagavata Purana recognizes him as an avatara of Vishnu (2.7.3) together with Dattatreya (2.7.4). Verse 3.24.17 mentions his characteristic golden hair. Several chapters of the Bhagavata Purana (3.24.8-47, 3.25.1-44, 3.26.1-72, 3.27.1-30, 3.28.1-44, 3.29.1-45, 3.30.1-34, 3.31.1-48, 3.32.1-43, 3.33.1-37) are totally dedicated to the story of Kapila and his teachings to his mother Devahuti.

The Siddhas ("perfect beings") are a category that is often mentioned in the lists of divine beings, and it is said they reside in a particular dimension of this universe. They have become perfect in yoga, and therefore their bodies can spontaneously manifest the siddhis ("perfections") that we have already mentioned as anima, mahima, laghima, vasitva, prapti, isitva, kamavasayita, prakamya and so on. The word muni literally means "silent", and is used often to refer to Rishis and Self-realized souls who are very grave and serious in the concentration of their awareness, and therefore do not engage in idle gossip and ordinary social conversations. Beginners on the path of yoga are advised to practice mauna, "silence", by maintaining strict control over what they talk about and avoiding unnecessary conversations. Unfortunately, some people had been mistakenly led to believe that a Self-realized soul never speaks (or should never speak) at all, and that those who teach/ preach must therefore be unqualified cheaters. So they claim "those who know, do not speak, and those who speak, do not know" - instantly demonstrating how, according to their own diktat, they should not be given any consideration as they do not know anything, because they are definitely speaking. This foolish idea of a "never speaking sage" encourages the ignorant and sentimentalists to worship actual cheaters who pose as great sages simply by remaining silent (which is not so difficult) and to discredit the very process of teaching and preaching and discussing about transcendental topics - that as we have abundantly seen in Bhagavad gita and many other texts, is essential in Self-realization.

उच्चैःश्रवसमश्वानां विद्धि माममृतोद्भवम् ।

uccaiḥśravasamaśvānāṃ viddhi māmamṛtodbhavam | airāvataṃ gajendraṇāṃ narāṇāṃ ca narādhipam || 10-27 |

uccaiḥśravasam: Uccaiḥśrava: asvanam: of the horses; viddhi: you should know; mam: me; amrita udbhavam: risen from the nectar; airavatam: Airavata; gajendranam: of the kings of elephants; naranam: of the human beings; ca: and; nara adhipam: the chief.

"Among the horses, I am Uccaiśrava, born from the nectar. Among the kings of elephants, I am Airavata. Among the human beings, I am the chief/ king."

In the history of the long wars between Suras and Asuras, we find a very interesting and famous episode called samudra manthana ("the churning of the ocean"), that also gave origin to the popular festival called Kumbha mela. As related in several texts (Ramayana, Mahabharata, Bhagavata Purana, Vishnu Purana, and especially Matsya Purana), Vishnu suggested that Devas and Asuras should ally and cooperate to produce the nectar of immortality, by churning the ocean of milk on which Kshirodakasayi Vishnu reclines. Vasuki was employed as the rope and mount Mandara as the churning rod; after the poisonous black froth (halabala or kalakuta) was removed by Shiva, the nectar (amrita) started to form, like butter when yogurt is churned, and several wonders (called ratnas, "jewels") also appeared. One of such wonders was Uccaiśrava, a beautiful and divine white horse, who was given to Bali Maharaja on the advice of Vishnu (Bhagavata Purana, 8.8.3).

Right next, the great elephant Airavata appeared (Bhagavata Purana, 8.8.4) - a large white pachiderm with 4 tusks, who became the foremost of the Guardians of the Directions in the universe. Together with him, the other 7 great dik gajas appeared (Pundarika, Vamana, Kumuda, Anjana, Puspadanta, Sarvabhauma, Supratika) as well as 8 female elephants headed by Abhramu.

After that the ocean produced the Kaustubha mani, the Padmaraga mani and the parijata flower, and finally the nectar of immortality, carried by Dhanvantari, the avatara who taught the science of Ayur Veda. At that time, Devas and Asuras started to quarrel about which party would get to drink the nectar first, and so Vishnu intervened again, taking the form of the female avatara Mohini, to distract and confuse the Asuras, and give the nectar to the Devas first.

In the process, a few drops of the nectar fell on Earth, in the places known as Har Ki Pauri at Haridvara ("the door to Hari") in Uttaranchala on the Ganga (and all subsequent tirthas on the Ganga down to the Bay of Bengal), and Prayaga ("the site of yajnas") at the confluence of Ganga, Yamuna and Sarasvati. The other two sites are Nasik (Maharashtra) on the Godavari (where the Triambakesvara jiyotiṅga resides) and Ujjain on the Shipra river (Madhya Pradesh, where the Mahakalesvara jiyotiṅga resides).

The precise times for the bathing in these places are: at Haridvara when Brihaspati (Jupiter) is in Kumbha rasi (Aquarius) and Surya (the Sun) is in Mesha rasi (Aries), at Prayaga when Brihaspati is in Vrishha rasi (Taurus) and Surya is in Makara rasi

According to the positions of other planets and stars, the assemblies are held once every 4 years or 12 years. The festival held every year in each of these sacred location is called Magha mela. It is believed that all the Devas and 88,000 Rishis, as well as about 350 million residents of the higher planets, come to bathe in these sacred rivers at the auspicious times in various forms, visible and invisible. The tradition of Kumbha mela was officialized by Adi Shankara to revive the Vedic dharma in his times after the Buddhist revolution had weakened the tradition.

The word adhipam literally means "the chief", and can be applied to all varieties of kings as leaders of human beings. Natural leaders have a special charisma, a radiating energy (tejas) that distinguishes them from ordinary men, and that is found in all cultures and societies. Monarchy is the best government system because the king is directly responsible for the protection and well being of the prajas (subjects), and is expected to sacrifice himself for the kingdom in all possible ways.

आयुधानामहं वज्रं धेनूनामस्मि कामधुक ।

प्रजनश्चास्मि कन्दर्पः सर्पाणामस्मि वासुकिः ॥ १०-२८ ॥

āyudhānāmahaṁ vajraṁ dhenūnāmasmi kāmādhuk | prajānaścāsmi kandarpaḥ sarpāṇāmasmi vāsukīḥ || 10-28 ||

ayudhanam: of the weapons; aham: I (am); vajram: the vajra; dhenunam: of the cows; asmi: I am; kama dhuk: the wish-fulfilling cow; prajanah: of those who generate offspring; ca: and; asmi: I am; kandarpah: Kandarpa; sarpanam: of the snakes; asmi: I am; vasukih: Vasuki.

"Among the weapons, I am the Vajra. Among the cows, I am the Kamadhenu. Of those who generate offspring, I am Kandarpa. Of the serpents, I am Vasuki."

The word ayudha means "weapon" but also "insignia", therefore it mainly applies to the weapons held as symbols by the various forms of the Personalities of God, signifying the nature of their specific powers. The word vajra means "lightning" and also "diamond" (see for example Bhagavata Purana 3.15.29) and is considered the hardest and strongest material, unleashing immense power. The association of meanings between the lightning and the diamond calls for the piezoelectric properties of crystals, that can produce electricity. Piezoelectricity, already studied by Carl Linnaeus and Franz Aepinus, was demonstrated in 1880 by Jacques and Pierre Curie. It is the electric charge that accumulates in crystals, such as amber and quartz, topaz and other gems, some kinds of ceramics, as well as in cane sugar, bone, various proteins and DNA itself. The piezoelectric effect is defined as the linear electromechanical interaction between the mechanical and the electrical state in crystalline materials with no inversion symmetry. It is presently used in the production of ultrasonic sound waves and other electronic frequencies (as in the Sonar), as well as for the ignition of gas lighters for example in cooking ranges. Vedic civilization, like several other ancient cultures, had a deep knowledge about the properties of crystals and used them extensively. It is said that Atlantis - the lost continent mentioned by Plato and others - was destroyed because of an ill-fated incident from tampering with its power-center working with crystals. Lightning is another very important universal symbol of power, revered as divine not only by Hindus and Buddhists, but also by the Roman, Greek and Hellenistic cultures and the pre-aboriginal Canaanite culture, where the King of Gods - called respectively Jupiter, Zeus, and Baal (literally, "the Lord") - were iconically represented holding the lightning bolt. Specifically about Baal, we can mention here that his worship in the Mediterranean was centered around the ancient city of Baal-bek in Lebanon, later renamed Heliopolis. It was originally built before 9000 BCE with huge stones estimated to weight 800 to 1500 tons each, perfectly shaped and arranged to form a very big platform - something that even the most advanced contemporary technology (or "western" type) is unable to do. Vasuki, the Nagaraja, is Shiva's snake, and his sister (i.e. female manifestation) is Manasa, a form of the Mother Goddess. He is one of the 8 great Naga kings, together with Nanda, Upananda, Sagara, Takshaka, Balavan, Anavatapta and Utapala. He is also revered in Chinese and Japanese traditions, which have a deep connection with the Nagas or celestial Dragons, of whom the Chinese emperor was considered to be a direct descendant. As we have already mentioned, Vasuki is also one of the protagonists of the samudra manthana (the churning of the ocean) that produced the nectar of immortality.

Kandarpa, also called Kamadeva, Ananga and Madana, is the God of erotic love. He holds a bow and arrows made with flowers, rides a parrot and is accompanied by his wife Rati ("attachment"). The parrot - a very romantic and affectionate creature - also appears as a symbol in the iconography of Matangi (a form of the Mother Goddess worshiped in Sri Vidya rituals) and Radha/Vrinda Devi. Krishna, too, is identified with Kamadeva in the famous Kama gayatri. The Tantraraja tantra says that Matangi, the Mother Goddess, manifested as the six forms of Krishna known as Kamaraja Gopala, Manmatha Gopala, Kandarpa Gopala, Makaraketana Gopala and Manobhava Gopala. The fundamental principle of erotic love represented by Kandarpa is essential in the sexual act of procreation (considered perfectly moral and even sacred in Vedic culture) and therefore it represents Krishna as the essence of existence.

अनन्तश्चास्मि नागानां वरुणो यादसामहम् । पितृणामर्यमा चास्मि यमः संयमतामहम् ॥ १०-२९ ॥

anantaścāsmi nāgānāṁ varuṇo yādasāmaham | pitṛṇāmaryamā cāsmi yamaḥ saṁyamatāmaham || 10-29 ||

anantah: Ananta; ca: and; asmi: I am; naganam: of the Nagas; varunah: Varuna; yadasam: of those who are connected with water; aham: I (am); pitṛinam: of the Pitris; aryama: Aryama; ca: and; asmi: I am; yamah: Yama; samyamatam: of the enforcers/ controllers; aham: I (am).

"Of the Nagas, I am Ananta. Of the aquatic principles, I am Varuna. Among the Pitris, I am Aryama, and among the law enforcers, I am Yama."

There seems to be a superimposition between the sarpas of the previous verse (10.28) and the nagas of this verse, with Vasuki and Ananta Sesha mentioned respectively. This could be explained by considering that the category of sarpas also includes ordinary snakes, so it is fitting to be topped by a divine Naga like Vasuki. On the other hand, the Nagas are all divine serpents, with powers far exceeding those of human beings, and Ananta Sesha Naga cannot be called a mere sarpa (serpent). It is a different and higher level. Chapter 25 of the 5th canto of the Bhagavata Purana is all dedicated to elaborations about Ananta Sesha. An important point we should make in this regard is that Ananta Sankarshana is said to support all the planets with his many heads. The word sankarshana literally means "that which attracts together", and effectively expresses the natural law known as gravity. Ananta, also called Sankarshana, is a direct emanation of Mahavishnu in the first chatur vyuha (Vasudeva, Sankarshana, Pradyumna, Aniruddha) and is not different from Shiva. On this point, different groups feel differently: some fundamentalist vaishnavas believe that Shiva is simply a devotee of Sankarshana, while fundamentalist shaitvites see Sankarshana as an emanation of the Shiva principle - identifying Mahavishnu as Sadashiva, the origin of all material universes. We can happily solve this conundrum by applying the brilliant perspective (darshana) offered by Chaitanya, and called acintya bheda abheda tattva ("inconceivably simultaneous difference and non-difference"). This vision has a long and very popular tradition that spans centuries if not millennia before the appearance of Chaitanya, who simply offered it as the conclusion of the debate on vedic perspectives that had started with Adi Shankara and then continued with Ramanuja, Nimbarka and Madhva.

In fact, especially in Orissa but also in many other regions we find the worship of Hari-Hara (the composite form of Hari and Hara - Vishnu and Shiva as one person) and Madhava ("the husband of the Mother Goddess"). The identification or strict connection of Ananta with Shiva is confirmed as the end of Brahma's day, it is the fire from Ananta's thousand mouths that consumes the universe (Bhagavata Purana 3.11.30, 4.24.36). Some extremist vaishnavas, who have not realized the meaning of the tattva (especially its darshana called acintya bheda abheda), claim that worshiping Shiva or chanting his name constitutes an offense against Vishnu, and they quote the list of 10 offenses to be avoided in the chanting of the holy Names. The original text of Padma Purana (Brahma Kanda, 25.15-18) says: sivasya sri-vishnor ya iba guna-namadi-sakalam, dhiya bhinnam pasyet na khalu hari-namahita-karah. The translation offered by the vaishnava extremists is as follows: "The holy Name of Krishna is source of all auspiciousness. The name, form, qualities of Vishnu are all transcendental. Therefore it is offensive to separate God, the Supreme Person (Vishnu) from his holy name, form, or transcendental qualities and pastimes, considering them material."

Although this is one of the valid translations of the verse, it becomes ambiguous with the addition that is sometimes presented as the second part of the translation: "Similarly, it is blasphemous to think that the names of the demigods such as Shiva, Brahma etc are on the same level of the name of Vishnu, or that the demigods are equal to Vishnu."

This invented meaning (in which bhinna, "separate" or "different" is taken to mean its exact opposite, i.e. "equal") is compounded by the use of the improper term "demigod", that literally means "half god" - a word created by abrahamic academia to discredit the ancient Deities of pre-abrahamic religions by implying that they were not really God, but merely some powerful beings like angels - specifically the "fallen angels" such as Satan and his companions. We need to remember here that the "flavor" of English taught in British colonial schools in India (including the Scottish College in Calcutta) was certainly not supportive towards the indigenous culture and religion, and although students were not required to formally convert to Christianity, their use of language was intentionally poisoned from the very start of their schooling, when their innocent minds were taught false and belittling linguistic equivalences. Another famous example is the word "idol", that unfortunately is still used by a majority of Indian Hindus to indicate their own ista devata.

To clarify any possible misunderstanding about that verse from Padma Purana, we therefore offer a complementary (not opposite) translation as follows: sivasya sri-vishnor ya iba guna-namadi-sakalam, dhiya bhinnam pasyet na khalu hari-namahita-karah, "To contemplate, in one's meditation, any difference/ separation between the holy names, qualities etc, of Shiva and Vishnu: this certainly destroys the benefits of chanting the name of Hari." Here is the dictionary meaning of the words: sivasya: of Shiva; sri visnor: of Sri Vishnu; yah: s/he; iba: here/ certainly; guna-namadi: the qualities, names etc; sakalam: everything; dhiya: in meditation; bhinnam: separated; pasyet: sees/ considers; na khalu: most certainly not; hari-nama: the name of Hari; hita: benefit; karah: that does.

Brihad Bhagavatamrita (1.2.86) very clearly confirms this meaning by stating: krasnac chivasya bhede ksa maha-dosa-kari mata, ago bhagavata svasmin ksamyate na sive kertam, "One who sees some difference between Krishna and Shiva is committing a great offense. Krishna may excuse someone who commits aparadha to his own lotus feet, but will never excuse one who commits aparadha at the lotus feet of Shiva".

Krsna himself in Bhagavata Purana (10.88.38-39) addresses Shiva as jagat guru, and says, "If someone commits aparadha to such a mahajana and jagat guru as you are, they will never get any auspiciousness". In this context, we may remember that in Bhagavata Purana Krishna recommends: acharyam mam vijaniyan navamanyeta karhicit, "One should know that the spiritual teacher is non-different from me." (11.17.27)

It just does not make sense to say that equating jagat guru Shiva Mahadeva with Krishna constitutes one of the most serious offenses in devotional service. Chaitanya himself always offered respectful and loving worship to Shiva, as we can see from the complete story of his life (that we have summarized in another publication). Also, we can refer to the Shivastakam prayers (text 7), quoted by Murari Gupta in his Chaitanya Charita Mahakavya, where Chaitanya says: sivaya sarva-gurave namo namah; "I repeatedly offer my obeisances to Shiva, who is the guru of everyone."

This verse also mentions Varuna and Aryama, in connection to the yadasas and the pitris respectively. The yadasas are divine/ elemental personalities controlling the waters, comparable to the nymphs of the sacred stories of ancient Europe; among them Varuna is certainly the supreme, as he is the personification of all waters including the ocean, and is listed as one of the 12 Adityas. Aryama is also one of the 12 Adityas, and therefore he is considered a manifestation of Surya. He resides on Pitriloka, the planet or dimension accessible to those great personalities who have perfectly fulfilled their duties in their lifetime on Earth, and as such, he is called as witness during marriages. Following the thread of associations, next Krishna mentions Yama, the Deva who could be described as the highest magistrate of the supreme court of the universe. Yamaraja also resides on Pitriloka, but he is primarily concerned with judging the conditioned souls who have committed serious crimes during their life as human beings; his servants, the Yamadutas, can be equated with a special police force, who pick up the culprits at the time of death and take them to court for the sentence.

प्रह्लादश्चास्मि दैत्यानां कालः कलयतामहम् । मृगाणां च मृगेन्द्रोऽहं वैनतेयश्च पक्षिणाम् ॥ १०-३० ॥

prahlādaścāsmi daityānām kālah kalayatāmaham | mṛgāṇām ca mṛgendro'haṁ vainateyaśca pakṣiṇām | | 10-30 | |

prahladab: Prahlada; ca: and; asmī: I am; daityanam: of the Daityas; kalah: time; kalayatam: of the conquerors/ measuring parts; aham: I (am); mṛiganam: of the animals; ca: and; mṛiga indrab: the king of animals; aham: I (am); vainateyab: the son of Vinata; ca: and; pakshinam: of the birds.

"Among the Daityas I am Prahlada. Among the conquerors I am Time. I am also the king of the animals among the beasts, and the son of Vinata among the birds."

In the Bhagavata Purana, Prahlada's story and teachings occupy all the 15 chapters of the 7th canto, and his name comes up very frequently as an example of a great divine personality. Some translate daityas as "demons", but this can cause considerable confusion. According to the English dictionary, a demon is an evil spirit; in abrahamic cultures this definition is equated with the devil, and refers to the various manifestations of Satan the "bad God", similar to the jinns or diabolic ghosts that can enter the bodies of living beings and possess them. In ancient Greece, the daimon was a powerful spirit that could either protect or harm human beings, and it was often depicted in a serpent form (that we would call Naga). However, anyone who has heard Prahlada's story will agree that there is/ was absolutely nothing evil or demoniac in him - on the contrary, he is/ was a very saintly person and deeply devoted to Vishnu. He is actually one of the 12 mahajanas, the highest authorities on spiritual science and devotional service to Vishnu. So, a better translation of the word daitya is in order, for us to understand the example offered by Krishna in this verse. The Daityas are simply the sons of Diti, descendants of Kasyapa Rishi just like the Devas (also called Adityas or sons of Aditi). True, the cultural tradition of the Daityas keeps them in opposition against the Devas and therefore they can generally be called Asuras, but applying such definition to Prahlada would be a seriously wrong prejudice based on birth.

The word kalayatam is a tricky one. From the point of view of grammar and etymology, it means "of those who are connected with kala" (with a short "a"). Now, kala (with a short "a") means "part", "measure", "flow", and obviously the word that refers to time, kala (with a long "a") is related to it as "what is measured" or "which flows". Therefore we could translate the passage as "among those who calculate and control time, I am Time (itself)". Previous commentators have chosen to translate kalayatam as "among the subduers", "among those who conquer", or "among those who destroy". This is also correct, because destruction is nothing but the end of the calculated time allotted to a particular material manifestation, and those who can destroy a thing are also in control of it. The name Kala (with a long "a") indicating Time is also translated as "black", and is applied to the names of fierce manifestations of Godhead such as Kala Bhairava (an aspect of Shiva) and Kali Bhairavi (an aspect of Shakti) - both associated with the destruction of the universe, as Time obviously is.

The word mṛiga, "animal", is generally applied to mammals - and not to birds or reptiles or fish, for example. The expression mṛiga indra literally means "the king of animals", and it could be applied to the lion, or to any other powerful animal. In any case, the sense of the statement is clear.

Vainateya, "the son of Vinata", is Garuda, the carrier of Vishnu. He is depicted as a powerful being, half human and half eagle, but his body is in constant and direct personal touch with Vishnu, therefore it cannot be ordinarily material; this is confirmed by the descriptions according to which the movement of Garuda's wing vibrates the Vedic hymns. Garuda is popular also as in several other cultures, and especially in Mongolian shamanism we find him clearly mentioned as Han Garid, the Thunderbird - the gigantic eagle that is able to fly in outer space. Through early migrations, the Mongolian tribes carried their faith to north America and this is how we find Garuda on many totem poles in Native American tribal traditions.

पवनः पवतामस्मि रामः शस्त्रभृतामहम् । जषाणां मकरश्चास्मि स्रोतसामस्मि जाह्नवी ॥ १०-३१ ॥

pavanah pavatāmasmi rāmah śastrabhṛtāmaham | jhaṣāṇām makaraścāsmi srotasāmasmi jahnavī | | 10-31 | |

pavanab: Pavana; pavatam: of the purifiers; asmī: I am; ramab: Rama; sastra-bhritam: of those who carry weapons; aham: I (am); jhaṣanam: of the fish; makarab: the shark/ alligator; ca: and; asmī: I am; srotasam: of the flowing rivers; asmī: I am; jahnavi: the daughter of Jahnu.

"Among the purifiers, I am Pavana. Among those who carry weapons, I am Rama. Among the water creatures, I am the makara. Among the flowing rivers, I am Jahnavi."

Pavana ("the purifier") is another name of Vayu, the wind. In this regard we may remember one of the famous names of Hanuman, son of Vayu, as Pavana suta. The wind can never really become contaminated for a long time, although it effectively carries away bad smells, dust, germs, smoke and so on. As soon as its speed slows down in some open space, the wind drops the contaminants back to earth and lets them be washed away by rain, to be recycled within nature. At a deeper level, we could contemplate the purifying effect of breathing (such as in pranayama) over the mind and especially over emotions. Even simply getting a bit of fresh air or taking a few deep breaths will clarify the mind from the fumes of intoxication or from the influence of bad company.

The Rama mentioned in the verse could be Ramachandra, the great archer, the valiant warrior prince that is universally recognized as an avatara of Vishnu. However, there is another famous weapon carrier by the name of Rama - Parasurama, "the Rama of the axe", also recognized as a Vishnu avatara. The entire Ramayana is dedicated to the wonderful story of Ramachandra, but both avataras are described in 9th canto of the Bhagavata Purana (respectively chapters 10 to 11 for Ramachandra and 15 to 16 for Parasurama).

The word jhasa does not refer exclusively to fish (called mina), but includes all aquatic animals. For example, it is used to describe the crocodile that attacked Gajendra (3.19.35). The definition of makara is sometimes translated as "shark" and sometimes as "crocodile", but looking at the traditional depictions we see that it is quite different from both - a sort of monster with the head similar to a crocodile's and the tail of a fish.

Sometimes the head's picture resembles an elephant's, with a trunk that could also be a long snout like a boar's, or even a goat's or a deer's horn. The makara is especially famous because it represents one of the zodiac signs (makara rasi), corresponding to the western Capricorn - an extraordinary animal that is generally represented having a fish tail and a goat's head. It is very much possible that such an animal really exists, or existed, hidden in some mysterious abysses below the surface of the ocean, like so many other creatures that have been considered mythological or extinct because they show themselves only rarely.

Jahnavi is another name of Ganga, the Ganges river. It originates from a puranic episode regarding the descent of the holy river to Earth. The Ganges is believed to be created by the waters of the Karana Ocean, that leaked through the covering of the universe when Vamana's foot pierced it. Ganga remained in the heavenly planets for a very long time, then (as described in Bhagavata Purana, chapter 17 of canto 5, and chapter 9 of canto 9) she agreed to descend to Earth to bless Bhagiratha for his long austerities. For this reason, Ganga is also known as Bhagirathi. When the rushing Ganges swept the land, she arrived at the ashrama of Jahnu Rishi, who was concerned about the disasters caused by the flood. The Rishi simply opened his mouth and swallowed the entire flow of the river. When Bhagiratha requested him to release the river, so that his own ancestors could be purified from their bad actions, Jahnu let her flow out of his ear - that is considered a clean part of the body as it is purified by the hearing of sacred mantras. This is the reason why dhijas - the twiceborn who wear the sacred thread - hang it on their ear when they go to the bathroom. Since the Ganges came out from Jahnu's body, she is considered his daughter.

अध्यात्मविद्या विद्यानां वादः प्रवदतामहम् ॥ १०-३२ ॥

sargāṇāmādirantaśca madhyaṁ caivāhamarjuna | adhyātmavidyā vidyānāṁ vādah pravadatāmaham || 10-32 ||

sarganamr. of creations; adib: the beginning; antab: the end; ca: and; madhyamr. the middle; ca: and; eva: certainly; ahamr. I (am); arjuna: Arjuna; adhyatma-vidya: the knowledge of the original Self; vidyanamr. of sciences; vadah: the conclusion; pravadatamr. of the discussions; ahamr. I (am).

"Of all creations, I am the beginning, middle and end. O Arjuna, among the sciences I am the science of the atman, and in all discussions I am the conclusion."

The word sarga ("creation", "manifestation") is used here in the plural form, therefore it indicates a variety of creations all along the manifestation of the universe. Everything we know in this world has a beginning, an intermediate period and an end, because this is the rule for all material things - situations, experiences, bodies, enterprises, buildings, and even empires.

Adhyatma is the original transcendental Self, the atman of the atman, so the adhyatma vidya is the spiritual science that makes us understand both ourselves and God - as we are of the same nature. The science of the Self is the most important form of knowledge, because it gives meaning to all the rest. We have already mentioned this point in reference to verse 9.2, that described Krishna's teachings as raja vidya, "the king of all knowledge". Knowing the Self means understanding the subject of all knowledge, by which the very concept of knowledge becomes actually relevant. Without the knower, there is no meaning to the idea of knowledge. In this connection, it might be interesting here to remember Werner Heisenberg, the father of quantum physics, who formulated the principle of uncertainty, according to which the observer influences the observed system by the simple fact of observing it. So when we try to measure a system, the system behaves differently. According to the Vedic knowledge of the adhyatman, the entire Reality is solely based on Consciousness, and everything else is created by it. This adhyatma vidya is the central part of Vedic knowledge, and is extensively explained in Bhagavad gita, as well as in the Upanishads and in the Vedanta sutras. We are humbly trying our best to bring such an invaluable treasure to the attention of all classes of people, by presenting it in such a way that it can be understood in practice as well as in theory.

Such work requires a tireless, patient, enthusiastic, selfless and determined engagement in debate or discussion, as there is no other way to establish knowledge. In present times, however, people are often confused about the idea of debate or discussion, especially because of the popular misconception that wants to give "equal opportunities" to all. Therefore we often find people who believe that all opinions should be equally considered valid, no matter how unfounded they are. Some particularly confused people become angry and envious when a better proposition is presented, and accuse a good teacher of being arrogant for trying to defeat sheer ignorance. Of course there are also many people who engage in discussions with ill motives, without any actual desire to discover and understand the truth and the facts (and the conclusion) - which as we find in this verse, constitutes the very purpose and essence of the discussion. To better understand the meaning of the term vada, it is useful to compare it with the other modalities of discussions listed in the Nyaya shastra (the science of logic, attributed to Akshapada Gautama Rishi). Vada is the genuinely correct debate, the open minded discussion, while the other (faulty and invalid) methods are called vitanda (wrangling), hetvabhāsa (illogical argument), chala (changing the topic or "beating around the bush", so to speak), avayava (syllogism), jati (false generalization), nigraha sthana (stalling position) and jalpa (pointless arguments). Other possible positions are tarka (hypothetical reasoning), nirnaya (compromise) and samsaya (doubt). The other categories (padarthas) contemplated by Nyaya are the all-important pramana (proof or evidence), prameya (objects of knowledge), prayojana (purpose) and dristanta (example).

A correct application of vada (also called vagvada, or "spoken discussion") is aimed at sincerely establishing the tatva (substance) and siddhanta (perfect conclusion), by presenting different perspectives of the same Reality in order to deepen the vision and expand the minds of the participants.

अक्षराणामकारोऽस्मि द्वन्द्वः सामासिकस्य च अहमेवाक्षयः कालो धाताहं विश्वतोमुखः ॥ १०-३३ ॥

akṣarāṇāmakāro'smi dvandvaḥ sāmāsikasya ca | aham evākṣayaḥ kālo dhātāhaṁ viśvatomukhaḥ || 10-33 ||

akṣaranam: of the letters; a-karo: the letter A; asmi: I am; dvandvaḥ: the double word; samasikasya: of compound words; ca: and; aham: I (am); eva: certainly; akṣayaḥ: imperishable; kalah: time; dhata: the creator/ destiny; aham: I (am); viśvato-mukhaḥ: (the one) whose faces are everywhere.

"Of the letters, I am the A. Of the compound words, I am the dvandva. I am Time eternal, the creator, and the omnipresent (consciousness of the universe)."

An identical statement is found in Bhagavata Purana (11.16.12) in Krishna's instructions to Uddhava: akṣaranam akaro smi, "Among the letters I am the A". The Sanskrit devanagari script is a special alphabet system, where all consonants are built "modularly" on the support of the simple straight line/ basic sound that constitutes the letter A. The concept of akṣara unites both meanings of "letter" and "syllable": unlike the Latin alphabet, where each consonant is standing alone (B, C, D, M, G etc), Sanskrit has each consonant accompanied or supported by a vocalic sound that enables its pronunciation (normally, A). Therefore when we refer to the consonants in Sanskrit, we call them Ba, Ca, Da, Ma and so on. Actually the same thing happens, albeit not officially, also in the European languages, because the consonants by themselves are spelled as Bi, Ci, Di, eM, Gi, and so on. Sanskrit/ Devanagari scientifically applies this instinctive concept and codifies it precisely: this already shows us the type of mental structure that is the basis of Vedic knowledge - the precise understanding and the scientific formulation of the natural universal laws instinctively known and applied by everyone. The Sanskrit alphabet includes 15 vowels and 34 simple consonants, 4 of which (Ra, Ya, La, Va) are considered "semi-vowels" and according to the laws of sandhi ("euphonic ties") they can transform into their vocalic counterparts or in special consonantic groups with a particular graphic configuration. The number of composite letters/ syllables is very large - a tribute to the appreciation of unity in diversity demonstrated by Vedic culture.

A samasa or samasika is the nominal compound (union of more words in the same grammatical case) where only the final element receives the case inflection. The various forms of samasikas are: avyayibhava ("unchangeable", or indeclinable, where the first word has primacy), tatpuruṣa ("determinative", where the second word has primacy either as vyadhikarana or "instrumental" or karmadharaya or "descriptive of the action"), upapada samasa (union with noun and verb), bahuvrihi ("possessive" or "qualifying by attributes"), amredita (iterative), aluka samasa (compound where both words express the case declination), and dvandva ("coordinative"). The dvandva type connects words logically united by the copulative or coordinative conjunction ("and").

The second part of the verse marks a pause in the comparative series, offering three distinct and independent statements, that can also be connected together to evoke a multi-dimensional vision of the essence of Reality. Time eternal is the origin of the material creation, and is the continuum on which everything is based. The name dhata ("the giver") means both "creator" and "destiny", as well as "provider" and "providence". The expression viśvato mukhaḥ literally means "whose faces are everywhere".

मृत्युः सर्वहरश्चाहमुद्भवश्च भविष्यताम् ।

कीर्तिः श्रीर्वाक् नारीणां स्मृतिर्मेधा धृतिः क्षमा ॥ १०-३४ ॥

mṛtyuḥ sarvaharaścāhamudbhavaśca bhaviṣyatām | kīrtiḥ śrīrvākā nārīṇāṁ smṛtirmedhā dhṛtiḥ kṣamā || 10-34 ||

mṛtyuḥ: death; sarva-harah: of all those who take away; ca: and; aham: I (am); udbhavaḥ: the act of creation; ca: and; bhaviṣyatam: of the future things; kīrtiḥ: good fame; śrīḥ: beauty and opulence; vak: speech; ca: and; narinam: of women; smṛtiḥ: memory; medha: intelligence; dhṛtiḥ: determination; kṣama: patience.

"Among those who take away things, I am death. Of future things, I am the fulfillment. In women, I am fame, splendor, eloquence, memory, intelligence, determination and patience."

Hara means "who takes away", and applied to God, it refers both to the removal of the devotee's sufferings and difficulties, and to the need of developing complete dedication in devotion - relinquishing all other attachments.

In Bhagavata Purana (10.88.8), Krishna is quoted to have stated: yasyaham anugruhnami harisye tad dhanam sanaih, tato adhanam tyajanti asya svajana dukkha dukkhitam, "When I want to show special favor to someone, I gradually take away all his material assets, so that he is abandoned by everyone, and suffers a setback after another". The logic of this statement is that only after becoming disillusioned with material attachments, the conditioned soul starts questioning himself about the purpose of life, and turns towards a higher dimension of awareness. As we can remember, this is also the starting point of the discussion between Krishna and Arjuna in Bhagavad gita.

Among all the losses we can face in this world, death is certainly the most radical, as by leaving the body we also lose everything that was related to the body - wealth, relationships, home, social position, attainments, identifications, and so on. However, death is simply a passage that will take us to a future life, just like any loss is simply a pre-requisite for the attainment of something better and more valuable - if we are able to see it, appreciate it and seize it at the proper time. The word udbhava means "creation", "completion", "production", "fulfillment", and "success", indicating the process of something becoming a reality. Therefore, it is also used to mean "prosperity", and even "change"; however, such change is not necessarily about increasing possessions or identifications. The 6 changes (udbhavas) are listed as: birth, growth, maturity, reproduction, decline, and death. The word bhavisyatam literally means "of the things that will be/ become".

The second part of the verse lists a series of special qualities that according to Krishna are to be considered the epitome or perfection of femininity. The misogynist propounders of the "patriarchal model" in Hinduism superimpose - more or less unconsciously - the idea of modesty with the typically abrahamic mentality of absolute submission of the women, that should be generally considered a mere extension of their husbands. But Krishna does not speak here of submission, shyness, abnegation, silence, or capability to breed. This is because Vedic culture has always appreciated the eloquence of women, starting from Sarasvati, the form of the Mother Goddess that is worshiped by all as she personifies knowledge, learning, and the power of speech. Another name of Sarasvati is Vak ("speech"). Another name still is Sarada ("giving the essence") while Sarasvati means "knowing the essence". And this does not simply concern the Goddesses, but includes all the women as well. In the marriage hymn of the Rig Veda (10.85.26) it is said that the bride "addresses the assembly like a general addresses the army". Then Rig Veda continues (10.159.2) describing the position of a married woman in the words of Sachi Paulomi: "I am the banner. I am the guide. I possess excellent eloquence; my husband cooperates with me and follows my will."

The name Sri ("beauty and opulence") is also honored as a major form of the Mother Goddess - Lakshmi, also called Kamala or Padmavati, because she holds lotus flowers (the symbol of the Sun) besides being seated on a lotus. The word sri is regularly added - to signify the beneficent presence of Lakshmi - to the names of all respectable and glorious personalities, not only the divine Personalities such as Sri Vishnu, Sri Krishna, etc, but also ordinary human beings in everyday dealings. In Orissa, this custom is even more explicit, as married men are addressed as sri-yukta ("united with Sri"), signifying the mystical union of the male principle to the female principle during the marriage ritual. Similarly, the new bride is worshiped ritually and addressed as Lakshmi herself when she enters the house of her husband. If all Hindus really practiced what their tradition teaches, the world would be a much better place, especially if girl children were encouraged and supported to stand up to such a high role in family and society. Besides eloquence and opulence, the other qualities listed by Krishna as essential characteristics of femininity are intelligence (medha) and memory (smriti), determination (dhriti) as well as patience/ tolerance (dhriti), qualities that ensure that women will not misuse their position in family and society. More specifically, medha indicates the ability to apply knowledge to practical situations, while dhriti conveys the meanings of courage, fortitude and endurance, as well as support for all, exemplified by Bhumi, Mother Earth. The word kirti ("good fame") comes from the same root of kirtana, and refers to people speaking highly of the qualities and activities of women - who definitely should not be hidden or segregated within the ladies' apartments or behind veils. Kirti is also considered as another name of Gayatri, the Mother of the Vedas. It may be interesting to note here that in the symbolic genealogical tables described in the Puranas, Kirti, Medha, Dhriti, Smriti and Kshama are the names of prajapati Daksha's daughters, who married great personalities such as Dharma (Kirti, Medha, Dhriti), Angira (Smriti) and Pulaha (Kshama). In the same line, Sri was the daughter of Bhrigu and Khyati (daughter of Daksha) and married Vishnu. Thus another interpretation of the verse could refer to these great ladies rather than simply to the qualities they represent.

बृहत्साम तथा साम्नां गायत्री छन्दसामहम् । मासानां मार्गशीर्षेऽहमृतूनां कुसुमाकरः ॥ १०-३५ ॥

bṛhatsāma tathā sāmnaṁ gāyatrī chandasāmaham । māsānāṁ mārگاśīrṣe'hamṛtūnāṁ kusumākaraḥ ।। 10-35 ।।

brihat-sama: the Brihat Sama; tatha: as well; samnam: of the (hymns) of the Sama; gayatri: the Gayatri; chandasam: of poetic metrics; aham: I (am); masanam: of the months; marga-sirshab: the month of Margasirsha; aham: I (am); ritunam: of the seasons; kusuma karah: the maker of flowers.

"Among the hymns of the Sama Veda, I am the Brihat Sama. Among the forms of poetry I am the Gayatri. Among the months I am Margasirsha. Among the seasons, I am the one that brings flowers."

The name brihat literally means "great", so we can easily understand the high fame of this particular hymn in the Sama Veda sambhita, sung by the udgatar rtivik during the soma yajna to summarize the entire purpose of the hymns of the Veda sambhitas accompanying the performance of rituals. It is the 7th hymn in the second book (Ugaganas) of the traditional collection; it is dedicated to Indra and its translation goes as follows: "Since very ancient times we have sung the hymns of prayers to Indra. (Our ancestors) have sung this Brihat in many rituals, expressing the sentiments of worshipers. Indra has given us great wealth, and both the worlds, and the Sun. Therefore we mix milk with the pure and radiant juice of the soma for Indra's pleasure."

The Gayatri - the "Mother of the Vedas" - is the most famous mantra in Vedic tradition, and it represents the entire corpus of Vedic knowledge that is transmitted by the guru to the disciple together with the sacred thread at the time of diksha (initiation), also called upanayana samskara. The Gayatri mantra is the sacred thread (sutra) that binds together the evolved human beings with the other suras ("divine beings") who are engaged in supporting the progress and well being of the universe, both materially and spiritually. The original Gayatri, quoted in Rig Veda 3.62.10, Yajur Veda 3.35, 36.3, 22.9 and Sama Veda 1.462, is: om bhuh bhuvah svah, tat savitur varenyam bhargo devasya dhimahi dhiyo yah nah prachodayat, "Om! Bhuh! Bhuvah! Svah! That Divine Supreme (Existence) is radiant and purifying like the Sun. May our intellect receive inspiration from it."

From this original Gayatri, the Rishis have created more versions dedicated to the meditation on Ganesha, Surya, Vishnu, Narayana, Nrisimha, Rama, Krishna, Shiva, Durga, Lakshmi, Radha, Sita, Sarasvati, Hanuman, Brahma, Indra, Chandra, Yama, Bhumi, Varuna, Tulasi, Hamsa and Hayagriva. So important and famous is the Gayatri mantra, that it gave its name to the first and foremost metric form in Sanskrit poetry, composed by 3 padas (verses, literally "positions" or "feet") of 8 syllables each of precise length (matra). The other metric forms (chandasa) of Sanskrit poetry are the Ushnika, with 4 padas of 7 syllables, the Anustubha with 4 padas of 8 syllables, the Brihati with 4 padas of 9 syllables, the Pankti with 4 padas of 10 syllables, the Tristubha with 4 padas of 11 syllables and the Jagati, with 4 padas of 12 syllables.

In the Vedic calendar, time are calculated according both systems - the solar and the lunar - adjusting the differences with the addition of one special month (Purushottama adhika) every few years. The solar months, however, do not correspond each to the western months because they are calculated to start from the sankranti, the day in which the Sun enters each of the Zodiac signs. Western astrology calculates these around the 21 of each month (as they were in ancient times), but since Vedic astrology contemplates the notion of the variable represented by the precession of the equinoxes, it calculates the sankranti days in their actual present positions, that fall around the middle of the western months.

Marga sirsha or Marga sira ("the head of the road") is also called Agrahayana ("ahead of the journey") and corresponds to November-December. In India it is harvest time, and still today the celebration of the offering of the first grains (called Pongal in south India) marks the beginning of an important cycle in the year. On the higher planets, this time marks the start of the "working day" for the Devas, who have awakened on Hari utthapana ekadasi (the 11th day of the waxing moon in the previous month of Kartika) and have now completed their morning rituals. We may remember here that one complete year on Earth equals to one single day on the higher planetary systems.

Seasons (ritus) are calculated according to the inclination of the Earth in respect to the Sun; it is interesting to note that in the Vedic calendar there are six seasons instead of the four seasons usually considered in the European calendar (winter, spring, summer, autumn). The six Vedic seasons are: 1. Vasanta Ritu (spring) comprising the two months of Chaitra and Vaisakha (also called Madhu and Madhava), 2. Grishma Ritu (summer) comprising the two months of Jyestha and Ashada (also called Sukra and Suci), Varsha Ritu (rainy season) comprising the two months of Sravana and Bhadra (also called Nabhas and Nabhasya), Sarada Ritu (autumn) comprising the two months of Ashvina and Kartika (also called Isha and Urja), Hemanta Ritu (winter) comprising the two months of Margasirsa and Pausa (also called Sahas and Sahasya), and Sisira Ritu (dewy season) comprising the two months of Magha and Phalguna (also called Tapas and Tapasya). The most pleasant season is certainly spring, that brings flowers and sweetness - in fact madhu means "honey".

द्युतं छलयतामस्मि तेजस्तेजस्विनामहम् । जयोऽस्मि व्यवसायोऽस्मि सत्त्वं सत्त्ववतामहम् ॥ १०-३६ ॥

dyūtaṁ chalayatāmasmi tejastejasvināmaham | jayo'smi vyavasāyo'smi sattvaṁ sattvavatāmaham || 10-36 ||

dyutam: gambling; chalayatam: of the cheaters; asmi: I am; tejab: radiance; tejasvinam: of all that is radiant; aham: I (am); jayah: victory; asmi: I am; vyavasayah: of ventures; asmi: I am; sattvam: virtue; sattva vatam: of the virtuous; aham: I (am).

"Among cheaters, I am gambling. Of all that is radiant, I am the power that radiates. Of all ventures, I am victory. Of everything good, I am goodness."

The word dyuta includes all forms of gambling, that constituted a popular pastime in Vedic times, so much that casinos or gambling houses (dyuta sadanas) are mentioned in Bhagavata Purana (11.25.25) as examples of residence under the influence of ignorance (tamas) and one of the four places granted by king Parikshit to the personification of Kali yuga (1.17.38) together with gold hoarding, drinking and smoking and chewing (extravagant foods) and those womanly pastimes that may lead to adharma.

Vedic culture does not condemn these activities as sinful, but warns us that they easily stimulate material desires, attachments and identifications, and the power of these material urges can carry the mind away from dharmic considerations. A man who falls victim to the fascination of gold, to the uncontrolled pleasures of the tongue, to sex addiction or to gambling will easily lose his good judgment and become a hopeless slave of illusion and need, suffering immensely and destroying all the good things he had in life - including wealth, health, family relationships, friends, career, respect from society, and even their own life in this world and in the next. This inevitably happens in all cultures.

Gambling is particularly dangerous because it is based on the cheating delusional hope of easy gains obtained without any real work - on the roll of a dice. Nobody really ever wins at gambling, even those who "hit the jackpot" from time to time: otherwise the gambling houses would not be able to thrive on their clients. Sooner or later, gamblers lose everything they had obtained, and usually more than that. What gamblers actually buy is "fun and excitement". The excitement produced by the conflict of hope and fear for gain and loss respectively stimulates the adrenal glands and the resulting rush of adrenaline - a powerful endorphine - has a physical effect that is not much different from the results of dangerous drugs such as cocaine etc. Adrenaline junks do not purchase narcotics on the market, but they are often even more damaging to society than other addicts, because they normally endanger themselves and others while seeking their "kicks" in extremely dangerous situations.

The word tejas is explained as deriving from the root tij, meaning "point of flame", as in the rays of the flaming aura we can see in many iconographic images of Devas. The word tij also contains the meanings of "to excite", "to stir up", and refers to the impact that tejas has on people. This concept has already been elaborated in the commentary to verse 7.9; it includes all forms of power, from the light and heat of the sun and the fire, to the charisma of great leaders, warriors and saints. Similarly, sattva includes the concepts of virtue (in the general sense, as "good quality") and goodness and can be applied to all the manifestations of the universe and especially to the activities and choices of human beings, as we will see extensively in chapter 14 of Bhagavad gita, dedicated to the guna traya vibhaga yoga, the yoga of differentiating between the gunas.

Tejas and sattva are closely linked as symbols of spirit and divinity, as expressed in Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad (1.3.28): asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrityor ma amritam gamaya, "from what is temporary lead me to what is eternal, from darkness lead me to the light, from death lead me to eternal life".

The word jaya conveys the meaning of excellence achieved through effort, while vyavasayah ("venture", "enterprise") conveys the meanings of perseverance and deliberate effort applied with the proper discrimination. These are also characteristics of sattva, or goodness. A similar verse is found in Bhagavata Purana (11.16.31): vyavasayinam aham lakshmib, kaitavanam chala grabha, titikshunam, sattvam sattvatvam aham, "Of those who work well and hard, I am prosperity. Among the thieves, I am gambling. I am tolerance in tolerant persons, and the goodness in good people". Of course, this means that gambling includes all the cheating tricks meant to get easy money without really producing anything useful for society - frauds of all types, stock market gambling, interest banking on loans, usury, robberies and so on, that create heavy karmic debts that will have to be paid in the future.

As we may remember, the word vyavasayah was already used in verse 2.40 referring to the quality of intelligence (vyavasayatmika buddhi) that is resolute and well focused on the purpose, and sustains hard good work that is productive and beneficial for society.

वृष्णीनां वासुदेवोऽस्मि पाण्डवानां धनञ्जयः । मुनीनामप्यहं व्यासः कवीनामुशना कविः ॥ १०-३७ ॥

vṛṣṇīnām vāsudevo'smi pāṇḍavānām dhanāñjayaḥ | munīnāmapyahaṁ vyāsaḥ kavīnāmuśanā kavīḥ || 10-37 ||

vṛṣṇinam: of the Vrishnis; vasudevah: Vasudeva (with long "a"); asmi: I am; pandavanam: of the Pandavas; dhananjaya: the conqueror of wealth; muninam: of the Munis; api: although; aham: I (am); vyasah: Vyasa; kavinam: of the scholars/ poets; usana: Usana; kavi: Kavi.

"Among the Vrishnis I am Vasudeva. Among the Pandavas, I am Dhananjaya. Among the munis, I am Vyasa, and among the scholars I am Kavi Usana."

The name Vasudeva (with a long "a") in this verse literally means "son of Vasudeva", and therefore it can be applied to both Krishna and Balarama. At the ontological level, the word means "all-pervading", and therefore it indicates the appearance of Krishna from the all-pervading supreme Consciousness.

Krishna and Arjuna (Bhagavata Purana, 4.1.59, 10.69.16, 10.89.59) are Nara and Narayana Rishis, the two great spiritual teachers to whom homage is paid before starting to study the scriptures (1.2.4, 5.19.11, 8.16.34, 10.86.35, 11.5.29-30, and the entire chapter 8 of canto 12). They appeared as the twin sons of Dharma and Murti, daughter of Daksha (1.3.9, 11.4.6) and according to Bhagavata Purana (12.4.41) they taught all the Puranas to Narada, who in turn transmitted them to Vyasa. The Vrishnis are a branch of the Yadu dynasty where Krishna appeared; his grandfather king Ugrasena reigned over the Vrishnis, Bhojas, Satvatas and Dasarhas. Vrishni was a great king, the elder of the 100 sons of king Madhu, who descended from Yadu through Jayadhvaja, one of 5 sons of Kartavirya Arjuna who survived the slaughter by Parasurama. Yadu was one of the two sons of Devayani (daughter of Sukracharya) by king Yayati, second son of Nahusha, who had ascended the throne when his elder brother Yati chose to retire in the forest to fully dedicate to spiritual life. Nahusha was a descendant of Pururava and the Apsara Urvashi - like Visvamisra Rishi, the river Kaushiki (previously Visvamisra's sister named Satyavati) and Parasurama. The first origin of this Soma vamsa (lunar dynasty) starts from Atri, manasa putra of Brahma; Atri was the father of Soma/ Chandra (the Moon), who eloped with Brihaspati's wife Tara, generating Budha (planet Mercury). Budha became the father of Pururava at the end of Satya yuga.

The name Dhananjaya ("conqueror of wealth") is used to address Arjuna in several verses of Bhagavad gita. As we mentioned in the commentary to verse 1.15 it refers to the campaign by which Arjuna traveled in various regions to collect funds from allies in order to build their new capital Khandavaprastha and perform the Rajasuya yajna. Again Krishna addresses Arjuna with this name especially in 2.49 and 9.9 to make a contrast between the ideal position of the yogi and the sad position of those misers who act only for their materialistic interest. Arjuna is not the eldest of the Pandava brothers, but he is certainly the most valiant protagonist in the adventures of the sons of Kunti. He is the one who wins the hand of Draupadi in marriage, the one who goes on a quest for special divine weapons up to the capital of Indra, the one who goes alone to fight against the Kurus to defend Virata's kingdom, and leads the Rajasuya campaign to establish Yudhishthira's prominence over the greatest possible area.

Veda Vyasa is the greatest among all those who silently contemplate the vast expanse of Vedic knowledge, and the teacher of all the Rishis that compiled and expanded the Vedic scriptures. Interestingly, he is also a relative of Arjuna, as Vyasa was the first son of Satyavati, who later on married king Santanu, the grandfather of Pandu, the father of the Pandavas, and more importantly, Vyasa was the biological father of Pandu, as he was called by Satyavati to give sons to the widows of his impotent half-brother Vicitravirya. In this regard, the word muni used to indicate Vyasa in this verse can be particularly significant, as Vyasa loyally and humbly obeyed the order of his mother Satyavati, strictly avoiding to reproach or blame her for the unnecessary difficulties that she had created to the royal succession in the Kuru dynasty. When Satyavati was asked in marriage by king Santanu, she should have contented herself of becoming the queen and the foster mother of Bhishma, the perfectly qualified heir apparent to the throne, who was the direct son of Ganga Devi. Instead, she demanded that Bhishma irrevocably renounced all his succession rights in favor of her own future descendants - a disastrous choice that caused immense sufferings to innumerable people.

The word kavi literally means "intellectual", "thinker", and is often translated as "poet" because of the remarkable amount of attention and learning required to compose poetry in the Vedic tradition. Unlike modern western arts, that are often whimsical and do not follow any rule (in poetry, as well as in figurative arts such as painting etc) to the point of utter absurdity, all the Vedic arts are extremely precise and carefully codified. Usana is another name of Sukracharya, a great strategical thinker and poet, the traditional preceptor of the Daityas, who skillfully performs all the required rituals to support their astounding military power and luxurious lifestyle. He is famous for having obtained from Shiva the sanjivani mantra, that can bring the dead back to life, provided that the bodies have not been critically mutilated (Bhagavata Purana 8.11.47). Just like Brihaspati (the preceptor of the Devas) is identified as the planet Jupiter, Sukracharya is identified as the planet Venus. Puranic genealogical lore, that is charged with deep symbolic meanings, states that Sukracharya is a descendant of Brighu - one of the Sapta Rishis and manasa putras of Brahma, mentioned in verse 10.25 as the greatest among the Rishis. Brighu's wife Khyati had two sons (Dhata and Vidhata) and one daughter, Sri, a direct manifestation of Lakshmi. Dhata and Vidhata generated respectively Mrikanda and Prana; Mrikanda became the father of the famous Markandeya Rishi, while Prana's son became the father of Usana/ Sukracharya. Sukra's son Chanda and Amarka were the school teachers for Prahlada, the son of Hiranyakasipu; Sukra also had a daughter called Devayani, who married king Yayati, the father of Yadu - so we can safely say that Krishna is still talking about "family".

Sukracharya is also famous for his Nitis, or compilations about good conduct. Here are some examples:

"A King should never lust after the wives of others or the properties of others, or punish his subjects in an angry mood. The lusty attraction towards the wives of others has been the downfall of many great men such as Indra, Dandakya, Nahusha and Ravana. Similarly, one who acts hastily without thinking about the consequences of his actions will only get sorrows. Good actions give good results and bad actions give bad results: so it is very simple, one should engage in good actions and avoid bad actions."

"A kshatriya is a brave man who cleverly protects his subjects, controls his own senses and has a natural tendency to oppose wrong doers. One should recognize good qualities even in one's enemies and respect them for that reason; however, bad qualities should be condemned even in one's own son or teacher. In this world nobody is a brahmana, kshatriya, vaisya or sudra by birth, but only through karma and samskaras."

"One must never show indifference towards his wife, child, diseases, servants/ subordinates, domestic animals, wealth, knowledge and studies, and serving the good people. One should maintain secrecy about 9 things: his own age, wealth, house problems, practice of mantras, sexual intercourse, consumption of medicine, acts of charity (given or received), and acts of respect and disrespect (given or received)."

दण्डो दमयतामस्मि नीतिरस्मि जिगीषताम् । मौनं चैवास्मि गुह्यानां ज्ञानं ज्ञानवतामहम् ॥ १०-३८ ॥

daṇḍo damayatāmasmi nītirasmi jigīṣatām | maunaṁ caivāsmi guhyānāṁ jñānaṁ jñānavatāmaham || 10-38 ||

dandaḥ: the use of force; damatayamr: of the curbing; asmi: I am; nītib: ethics; asmi: I am; jigīṣhatam: of those who seek victory; maunam: silence; ca: and; eva: certainly; asmi: I am; guhyanamr: of the secrets; jnanam: the knowledge; jnanavatamr: of the learned; aham: I (am).

"Among the subduers, I am the use of force. Of those who seek victory, I am ethical behavior. Of secrets, I am silence. Of those who have knowledge, I am knowledge itself."

Danda (literally, "the stick", i.e. the use or simply the threat of force) is one of the categories of action contemplated by the codes of government against enemies, as the last resort after the failing of the other categories of action - sama (not fueling low level dangers by giving them real importance), dana (offering of gifts or benefits to turn enemies into allies), and bheda (creating divisions among enemies).

The use of force should be avoided as much as possible, but it is not negative in itself - rather it is perfectly legitimate and even sacred, as Krishna expresses in this verse. The concept of ahimsa does not mean that the use of force is adharmic in itself: it means that it should be applied without hatred. Also, it is very important here to understand who is the enemy that we must subdue.

Only an aggressor is an enemy. Vedic civilization does not mistake dissenters for enemies, and does not interfere with the individual's private life, professional occupation, beliefs, or freedom of expression. The government (the kshatriyas) intervene only when an innocent individual is subject to an aggression that s/he is unable to prevent or stop - this is the true demonstration of the famous motto "to serve and protect". There is no need for the government to issue or enforce many laws and rules to restrict the liberties of the people: the only thing that the government/ kshatriya/ police should do is to protect the people (innocent human beings and innocent animals) from any form of violence.

In the Vedic system there are no jails or lawyers. Any individual has the right to fight back all categories of aggressors (atatyinab): those who attack with any type of deadly weapon, or who set fire to a house, give poison, attack (rape or abduct) a girl or woman, break into a house to steal or destroy/ damage property, or encroach land or property. Thus any individual has the right to own suitable defensive weapons and is responsible for their proper use. The kshatriya (police) should only intervene to protect a victim of aggression that is unable to protect himself/ herself sufficiently. If the aggressor surrenders and atones/ pays for his crime by compensating the victim appropriately, he is allowed to go free; repeat offenders are immediately exiled. If the aggressor does not surrender but escapes, the kshatriya has the duty to pursue him and bring him to justice to the full satisfaction of the damaged party - which by the way is the victim of the aggression, and not the government itself. However, all such dealings should be moderated by ethical considerations, especially in the behavior of the most powerful and responsible persons concerned - those who pursue victory, as clearly stated in this verse. It is important to understand the meaning of the word niti, that implies wisdom, ethical values, integrity, responsible conduct, and so on. In Vedic literature, niti shastras are the texts that teach all this. Revenge is not condemned or forbidden in itself, but those who behave within the restraint of wisdom and compassion are blessed with a virtuous victory that represents Krishna.

Keeping silence about secrets or hidden things is not only a legitimate choice, but even a commendable or sacred course of action. It is true that truthfulness is a great virtue, but that does not mean that we are supposed to disclose everything to the wrong people, or at the wrong time and place, or circumstances. In any case, when a secret is spoken about, it's not a secret anymore - it has lost the essence of its existence. Jnanam is knowledge, or in other words, the perception and memory of an objective fact. Without knowledge, learning has absolutely no meaning or existence: this confirms the pragmatic and honest approach of Vedic civilization in regard to reality. It does not matter how many academic titles, advertisement, certificates and stamps one can obtain from so-called registered authorities: the only evidence of knowledge is the knowledge itself.

यच्चापि सर्वभूतानां बीजं तदहमर्जुन । न तदस्ति विना यत्स्यान्मया भूतं चराचरम् ॥ १०-३९ ॥

yaccāpi sarvabhūtānām bijam tadahamarjuna | na tadasti vinā yatsyānmayā bhūtaṁ carācaram || 10-39 ||

yat: whatever; ca: and; api: certainly; sarva-bhutanam: of all existences/ beings; bijam: the seed; tat: that; aham: I (am); arjuna: Arjuna; na: not; tat: that; asti: there is; vinā: without; yat: that; syat: there can be; mayā: by me; bhutam: of (all) beings; chara acharam: moving and non-moving.

"O Arjuna, I am the seed of all existences, of all beings - moving and non-moving. Without me, nothing could ever exist."

The comparison with the seed (bija) has already been mentioned in verse 7.10 (bijam mam sarva-bhutanam viddhi partha sanatanam, buddhir buddhimatam asmi tejas tejasvinam aham, "O Partha, know that I am the eternal seed of all existences/ all beings. I am intelligence in the intelligent, and I am the powerful radiance in the powerful"). In the commentary to that verse, we elaborated on the basic concept of seed as the principle or essence of everything, the blueprint of existence, the information from which things manifest and develop. On the spiritual level, this is represented by the bija mantras, the "seed sounds" that contain the personal presence of the Deity.

In verse 14.4, Krishna will give another statement that completes these two: sarva-yonishu kaunteya murtayah sambhavanti yah, tasam brahma mahad yonir aham bija-pradah pita, "O son of Kunti, whatever form they will develop, in whatever matrix, all (beings) are born from the supreme matrix of Brahman, and I am the father, that gives the seed."

The broad categorization between moving beings and non-moving beings, offered by the Vedic tradition, is more practical than the conventional classification of animals and plants, because it is functional and not ontological. Therefore it does not have "gray areas" such as the sea anemone and the carnivorous plants, and it can be verified empirically and directly by anyone. As we have already mentioned in several commentaries, the word bhuta literally means "being", so it can apply both to living beings and to the conditions of being or circumstances in life. This interpretation is perfectly in line with the series of examples presented by Krishna in this thread of conversation.

This last statement summarizes the meaning and purpose of all the previous examples, and closes the thread.

नान्तोऽस्ति मम दिव्यानां विभूतीनां परन्तप । एष तूद्देशतः प्रोक्तो विभूतेर्विस्तरो मया ॥ १०-४० ॥

nānto'sti mama divyānām vibhūtinām parantapa | eṣa tūddeśataḥ prokto vibhūtervistaro mayā || 10-40 ||

na: not; antaḥ: end; asti: there is; mama: my; divyanam: divine; vibhutinam: powers; parantapa: o scorcher of the enemies; eshah: (all) this; tu: but; uddesataḥ: examples; proktaḥ: told (by me); vibhuteḥ: of glories; vistarah: the scope; mayā: by me.

"O Parantapa, there is no end to my divine powers. This (series of statements in the previous verses) that I have spoken about, was just to exemplify the scope of my glories."

The word divya is applied here to the vibhuti - glories, powers, opulences - of the Supreme Personality of God, Krishna. We have already mentioned that the root of the word divya ("divine") is div, from which we have other words such as deva ("God"), diva ("day"), and so on. The word div contains the meanings of "resplendent", "powerful", "radiant".

Another word for "divine" is daiva, as we will see later in the chapter entitled daivasura sampad vibhaga yoga, the yoga of the difference between deva and asura. Its meaning is slightly different, as it derives not directly from div, but from deva, therefore it refers to a quality that is manifested personally by a deva like the noble personalities in charge of the administration of the universe. On the other hand, the concept of divya develops at a primeval level, at a point that is the origin of the devas and of all other manifestations as well - the Supreme Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. Here Krishna addresses Arjuna calling him

Parantapa ("scorcher of the enemy"), which implies the fact that Arjuna, too, manifests a part of Krishna's *divya vibhūti*s, most notably through his extraordinary valor in fighting.

We could continue forever talking in the thread of the divine powers manifested in this creation, as the universe is full of wonderful and powerful things in many dimensions. Krishna has spoken of things that human beings can easily understand, but there are many more things on the higher and subtler levels of reality, in what we could call "other dimensions".

This is the reason why the extent of the compilations of the Vedic scriptures varies considerably from age to age, and from place to place, as it is presented in a manner that is suitable for the understanding of the people it is meant for. On other planets (or in other dimensions, if we prefer) the devas can avail of much larger compilations, and even on our own planet/ plane of existence, the collection of Vedic teachings was much larger in previous ages, such as Dvāpara, Treta and Satya.

Mainstream conventional historians believe that civilization started only about 5000 years ago with the "invention" of the art of writing, but according to the Vedic tradition, exactly the opposite was true. People knew very well how to write even in previous ages, but they simply did not give it much importance because memory, intelligence and the other faculties of human beings were much sharper and stronger than we can find in Kali yuga. They remembered what they needed to do without having to note down a "to do list". To make a crude example, we can apply the same principle to the situation of an old man who is afflicted by senile dementia, Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's, or a similar decrease in mental faculties, who starts wearing a bracelet where his own home address is written. This does not mean that he has "evolved" and now he has become able to write his name and address on his personal ornaments. It means that his memory has become so weak that he needs to read his bracelet to find his way back home, otherwise he will be lost.

यद्यद्विभूतिमत्सत्त्वं श्रीमदूर्जितमेव वा । तत्तदेवावगच्छ त्वं मम तेजोऽसम्भवम् ॥ १०-४१ ॥

yadyadvibhūtimatsattvaṁ śrīmadūrjitameva vā | tattadevāvagaccha tvaṁ mama tejo'sasambhavam || 10-41 ||

yat: whatever; yat: whatever; vibhūti mat: that has powers; sattvam: existence/ virtue; śrīmat: beautiful/ wonderful; urjitam: glorious; eva: certainly; va: or; tat: that; tat: that; eva: certainly; avagaccha: (you) should come to; tvam: you; mama: my; tejaḥ amsa: a part of the radiance; sambhavam: come to existence.

"Anything that is good, powerful, wonderful, or glorious, you should encounter, has come to existence as a part of my radiance."

The word tejas is used here to indicate the origin of the *vibhūti*s: we can better understand the meaning by comparing the two terms with the radiance of the sun and the sun rays respectively. The rays are emanations from the original radiance, that is the power of the Sun. Similarly, the *vibhūti*s manifested in this universe of which Krishna has spoken to Arjuna are the emanations from the original tejas or radiance (brahmajyoti) of the Supreme Brahman. The examples listed up to here refer to things that Arjuna (or a human being living on this planet) might have come to encounter (avagaccha) and is therefore able to understand. There is no end to such wonderful manifestations, because they are not limited to the natural phenomena but also include the creations of the human intellect, which is also a creation of God. So all the great artistic products of all living beings can be counted among the *divya vibhūti*s of the Supreme Personality of God - the pyramids, great temples and other magnificent buildings, jewels and ornaments, paintings, sculptures, and so on.

Anything that takes our breath away in awe and wonder - and inspires a sense of worship even in the most primitive human minds - is giving us a glimpse of God's divine powers. Krishna has spoken about the "most prominent" (pradhanyataḥ, 10.19) of such things, that are the most easily macroscopic, visible and famous in Vedic civilization. However, there are endless other wonders even on this Earth, that are not considered very extraordinary by many people - a mighty waterfall, a powerful cyclone, a sunlit meadow, a forest of majestic trees, delicate flowers, or even the beauty of animals. What to speak of the wonders of the atoms and sub-atomic particles, even a mere grain of sand seen through a strong magnifying device or the multicolored designs on the wings of a butterfly can inspire great admiration in those who are sensitive to the beauty of the universe. This means that we can constantly remain conscious of Krishna wherever we turn our eyes, even on the "material" things, provided we look at the world with the respect, admiration, love and sense of worship that is the sentiment of religious/ spiritual meditation, as stated by Arjuna (10.17). Actually, for a person who is truly Krishna conscious there is nothing "material" - everything is spiritual, because it is a manifestation of Krishna's glories. It is all a matter of consciousness (chaitanya).

The Upanishads and especially the Svetasvatara Upanishad, confirm the import of these verses. The chapters 4, 5 and 6 declare that God can be perceived in fire, in the sun, the moon, the stars, in any woman, man, boy, girl, or a thundercloud. God can be perceived in the beauty of the seasons, of blue butterfly and the green parrot. Everything is manifested from God's svabhava (Svetasvatara Upanishad, 5.5).

अथवा बहूनैतेन किं ज्ञातेन तवार्जुन । विष्टभ्याहमिदं कृत्स्नमेकांशेन स्थितो जगत् ॥ १०-४२ ॥

athavā bahunaitena kiṁ jñātena tavārjuna | viṣṭabhyāhamidaṁ kṛtsnamekāṁśena sthito jagat || 10-42 ||

atha va: or also; bahuna: many; etena: by these; kim: what; jñātena: by knowing; tava: your; arjuna: Arjuna; viṣṭabhyā: pervading; aham: I (am); idam: this; kṛtsnam: entire; eka: one; amsena: by a part; sthitah: established; jagat: the universe.

"O Arjuna, what more should we say about these things that can be known? I pervade and establish this entire universe simply by one partial manifestation (of myself)."

The expression ekamsena sthita, "established from one amsa", refers to the fact that the Personality of God that establishes and pervades all the material universes is known as Kshirodakasayi Vishnu, the form of the Paramatma that resides in Svetadvipa in the ocean of milk within this universe. As explained in the Bhagavata Purana (1.3.1, 3.7.22, 11.15.18) this is the third expansion of the purusha avatara that penetrates the material energy to manifest the universes.

The first form of this purusha avatara is Karanodakasayi, also called Maha Vishnu or Narayana, who rests on the Causal Ocean (karana means "cause", udaka means "ocean" and sayi means "reclining") also called Viraja. All the universes emanate from the pores of Karanodakasayi at each exhalation, and are withdrawn again into his body at each inhalation. After exhaling the universes, the purusha avatara enters each one of them as Garbhodakasayi (garbha means "embryo", "fetus" or "uterus"), who rests at the bottom of the universal egg (brahma anda) on the Garbha ocean. From the water contained within his navel, a lotus flower (that is, a form that we can compare to a lotus flower) grows, and in the middle of this blooming lotus, Brahma is born. The third form of the purusha avatara resides in prapancika vaikuntha, also called Svetadvipa, that is located on the pole star (also called Dhruvaloka), and from there he establishes a direct connection within the heart of each being and each atom of the universe.

The expression atha va bahuna etena kim jnatena ("what more things can be known") should be understood correctly. Krishna is not saying that there is no need to speak about such glories, otherwise he would not have recommended to Arjuna to meditate on them. He is rather saying that Arjuna must have understood the point, and can find other examples by himself. Ideologies that teach a fundamental opposition between spirit and matter tend to create a dangerous confusion in the minds of people, to the point of demonizing the material manifestations in the universe and preaching that we need to fight against nature and subdue it as an inferior and negative power. This is not the Vedic perspective.

True, there is a distinction between the para and apara prakriti, the "supreme" and "not supreme" functions of nature, but there is no condemnation in such definition - just the expression of a different type of manifestation. So although we are advised to move our consciousness from the temporary material manifestations to the eternal existence of consciousness (spirit), nevertheless we need to offer our sincere respect and worship to the Divine in material manifestations as well.

The word vistabhya includes the meanings of "pervading", "supporting", "being situated in", "accepting the form", "controlling" - all of which can help us to better understand the nature and activities of God. The word kritsnam, meaning "entire", applies here to the universal form of which Krishna has been speaking in these last chapters. The same meaning is conveyed by the words jagat, akbala, and visvam, also used extensively in Bhagavad gita and other Vedic texts. However, this amazing universal form, so full of great, glorious and majestic manifestations, is simply one fraction of God's creation. It is called ekapada, "one pada", where pada means "foot", "position" or "measure", as in the metric measurement of poetic verses.

There is another and greater expanse of vibbutis, called the tri-pada-vibbuti, that consists of the glories and wonders of the spiritual world, that is eternal and unlimited by time or space. This tripada vibbuti is mentioned as tripadasyamritam divi ("the 3 divine imperishable padas") in several traditional scriptures, such as the Purusha sukta in Rig Veda (10.90.3) and the Taittiriya Aranya Upanishad (3.12.3). Why three? When we speak of innumerable universes, and the unlimited expanse of the spiritual world, saying that the spiritual world is three times greater than all the material universes together, we are dealing with quantities that are not in the scope of ordinary human calculation. Who can count even only the stars in this one universe? Yet, Vedic rishis speak of a proportion - not a quantity - of something much greater, with the same confidence and clarity they show when they speak of the astronomical duration of the entire life of Brahma, itself containing a great number of cycles of creation and dissolution of the universe, and then compare it to a mere breathing cycle of Narayana.

Only ignorant people can dismiss such information as mere mythology. Many great physicists working at the cutting edge of the exploration of the mysteries of the cosmos have shown great admiration for the extraordinary vision of the Vedic Rishis. Werner Heisenberg, Robert Oppenheimer, Brian David Josephson, and other famous scientists and writers such as Fritjof Capra and Alan Watts are only a few of such people, that we have quoted in our book Introduction to Vedic Knowledge.

Chapter 11

Visva rupa darshana yoga

The yoga of contemplation of the universal form

After speaking about the glories of the universal form, Krishna is now going to show it directly to Arjuna, on his request. Arjuna knows that the supreme Consciousness can connect directly to his mind and give him a direct perception of its vibbutis, just as if he was looking at it physically. What would be the difference anyway?

What is sense perception? A micro electrical transmission in the nervous system, carried by the electro-magnetic power of consciousness, and received from other sources of transmission that use waves of various frequencies, such as light, sound, motion, heat, etc. When the consciousness leaves the body, or where the nervous system wiring is interrupted by tissue damage, there is no more sense perception.

Conversely, when the consciousness expands outside the range of the physical senses (sight, hearing, touch, smell, taste), it can perceive other things in what many call ESP (extra sensorial perception). Also, there is a "6th sense" of subtle perception of magnetic energy, that we can feel for example when we are within someone else's magnetic sphere of the body (called aura), and we can perceive their emotions - such as fear, lust, joy, anger, etc. Conventional academy says it is about pheromones - a type of hormones produced by the gland system in our bodies, that give off a particular smell, but if our perception is clear enough, we can directly experience a flow of energy, like an electrical current, that has nothing to do with smell. In this regard, we may note that according to the Vedic system, the mind is called the 6th sense. Furthermore, the mind can independently create sensory perceptions through visualization, memory, and even hallucination - that are increasingly powerful manifestations with varying degrees of deliberation, knowledge and awareness, depending on the individual experiencing them.

Popular mainstream culture has developed a sort of duality of love-hatred for these powerful functions of the mind, on one side ridiculing and condemning day-dreaming and hallucinations, and on the other side praising genius in creative imagination. The actual difference between the two sides is the strength of awareness and understanding. The lack of knowledge and clarity among the general population usually lead people to think that the problem is about conventional reality versus subjective illusion, and to rely on established official authorities to tell the difference between the two. However, the boundary between what is acceptable and what is not acceptable can be easily misplaced by ill-motivated leaders that take the position of authorities in spite of their lack of ethical qualifications. This generates serious problems at many levels - individual and collective - and inevitably sufferings appear whenever the natural order becomes unbalanced and the purpose of life is derailed. Vedic knowledge gives us a complete and scientific method of directly verifiable experiences, that can be repeated consistently by different individuals in exactly the same way, with the precisely same procedures and results. This is why it is so important for any student of Vedic knowledge to follow the requirements with the greatest precision and sincerity possible, because even a small inconsistency or disruption in the programmed protocols will vitiate the process and make it unsuccessful. Thus, academic indology is intrinsically doomed to fail to understand Vedic knowledge, because it does not give any importance to the actual key that can open its doors.

Modern medical research has admitted that a large part of the human brain (between 65% and 85%) remains unused by most people in contemporary society. The ancient science of yoga is precisely meant to train individuals to the full utilization of the human body-mind set, consciously engaging those faculties that sometimes manifest spontaneously in phenomena that modern science cannot explain, and that have been defined as telepathy, telekinesis, clairvoyance, and so on.

arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; mat anugrahaya: for kindness towards me; paramam: supreme; guhyam: secret; adhyatma: of the original atman; saṅjñitam: understanding; yat: that; tvaya: by you; uktaṁ: said; vacab: words; tena: by that; mohab: confusion; ayam: this; vigatab: is gone; mama: my.

Arjuna said, "My confusion has been removed by the teachings that you have kindly explained to me about the supreme secret of spiritual science."

The transmission of this intimate knowledge is motivated by kindness and compassion, as Bhagavad gita has already mentioned before (10.11). This is because the only real problem in the world is ignorance, or the absence of proper knowledge and realization, that is causing all types of sufferings. Ignorance is the only real enemy to be defeated, both at individual and at collective level, and the only means to defeat it is knowledge. For this reason, the Supreme Consciousness descends in human form into this world from time to time (paritranaya sadbunam vinasaya ca dushkritam, dharma samsthapanarthaya sambhavami yuge yuge, "I manifest myself yuga after yuga, to protect the good people, destroy the evil doers and to establish dharma", 4.8), and/ or empowers individual souls (shakti avesā) to carry on the mission of transmitting Vedic knowledge. It is the most important job in the entire universe, and it can really change the history of mankind.

True, life in the material body is inevitably marred by the inherent pains of birth, disease, old age and death, but these sufferings can be reduced to almost nothing by applying the proper knowledge offered by the genuine and original Vedic tradition. It's not just about the medical, social, or technological fields, that can greatly improve the quality of life: above all, it is about the fundamental knowledge of the Self, that dispels the illusion (moha vigata) clouding the natural and fundamental happiness (ananda) that is the nature of the Self. The adhyatma is the original Self, the atman of the atman, the soul of the soul. It is individual and at the same time, it is beyond individuality, because all Consciousness is connected: this is the supreme secret, the paramam guhyam, that Krishna has been explaining (9.1-2, 15.19, 18.63-64, 18.67, 18.74).

Conditioned souls waste their time and energy running after the whims and desires of their minds, hoping to find happiness in the external objects of sense gratification, when actually the real happiness is already eternally (sat) present within the Self. The key to actually experiencing this happiness is knowledge or awareness (cit).

Here Arjuna is confirming this realization for us, and expressing gratitude towards Krishna for this wonderful gift. We know that Arjuna is simply playing the role of the student for our benefit, because he is not an ordinary ignorant person. So the gratitude he expresses for Krishna's kindness applies also to recognizing his affection in including him into the compassionate plan for the dissemination of the transcendental science among the conditioned souls. This declaration concludes the first part of the Bhagavad gita, that started when Arjuna, apparently overwhelmed by confusion, requested Krishna to dispel his doubts (1.28, 2.7-8). In this first part, Arjuna asked many questions (2.54, 3.1, 3.36, 4.4, 5.1, 6.33, 6.37, 8.1). After contemplating the universal form, Arjuna will ask more questions, albeit on a higher level of understanding (12.1, 13.1, 14.21, 17.1, 18.1), giving Krishna the opportunity to elaborate more on the practical aspects of devotional service. At the conclusion of the conversation, in 18.73, Arjuna will again state that confusion has been destroyed (nasto mohah) and the memory regained (smritir labdha) thanks to the kindness of Krishna (tvat prasadam). In that last verse (18.73) Arjuna's words can be referred to the confusion of the general people, and also to his memory of the mission in which he was meant to engage by Krishna's side. Thus we should be extremely grateful for all the opportunities we are offered in this world to come in touch with spiritual knowledge.

भवाप्ययौ हि भूतानां श्रुतौ विस्तरशो मया । त्वत्तः कमलपत्राक्ष माहात्म्यमपि चाव्ययम् ॥ ११-२ ॥

bhavāpyayau hi bhūtānāṃ śrūtau vistaraśo mayā | tvattaḥ kamalapatrākṣa mātmyamapi cāvyaṃyam || 11-2 ||

bhava: the coming to existence; apyayau: and the dissolution; hi: indeed; bhutanam: of (all) beings/ existences; srutau: (that I have) heard; vistarasho: the elaboration; mayā: by me; tvattah: from you; kamala patra aksha: o lotus-eyed; mahatmyam: the glorification; api: although; ca: and; avyayam: imperishable.

"O lotus-eyed (Lord), I have heard from you the explanation about the manifestation and the withdrawal of all existences/ beings, and the glories of the imperishable (spirit)."

The word apiya means "withdrawing", and refers to the time of the dissolution of the universes (Bhagavata Purana, 10.87.12), when all the worlds again enter into Narayana's body (sva sristam idam apiya sayanam saba shaktibhibh, "having absorbed this world, that was originally created by him, he reclines together with his energies").

We have often elaborated on the meaning of bhava, as "existence", or "appearance", as in "becoming". This word applies to the transformations of material nature, and together with the idea of dissolution of the material manifestation, it creates a contrast with the eternal imperishable existence (avyayam) whose *vibhūti*s manifest within the creation and make it glorious. Yet, the two elements - spirit and matter - are not in opposition, but rather they are contemplated in their fruitful union, motivated by the divine compassion for the individual souls who will thus obtain the opportunity to evolve and develop up to the perfect spiritual realization.

The word srutah, "heard", refers to the direct process of the acquisition of knowledge, from the mouth of the guru and from the original Vedic scriptures, called sruti, that are as valid as the process of direct hearing from the realized souls (tattva darsis, 2.16, 4.34) or having a direct personal perception (darshana, 5.18, 6.29, 11.4, 11.5, 11.9, 11.10, 11.45, 11.46, 11.47, 11.50, 11.52, 13.9, 13.12), that is precisely the subject of this chapter. The recognized sruti scriptures are the Veda sambitas, the Brahmanas, Aranyakas, Upanishads, and the Vedanta sutras. Many also recognize the Puranas, the Mahabharata and the Ramayana as traditional sruti. The other scriptures, that constitute the commentaries to the original srutis, are called smritis ("about remembering") because their compilers wrote them by remembering the srutis. The word vistara conveys the meanings of "elaboration", "enumeration", "explanation", "evaluation", "measurement", "expansion", "expanse", "scope", and so on. Of course, as Krishna has clearly said, the description in these chapters is only meant to give a glimpse of a subject that is truly unlimited and always expanding.

The expression kamala patra aksha, "lotus-eyed", is also significant here. The lotus flower is not simply a symbol of beauty, freshness and elegance, but also of extreme purity; although it grows in muddy ponds, the flower is always perfectly fresh and pure, crispy clean and emanating a sweet fragrance, even under the scorching rays of the sun. Therefore the example of the lotus flower is applied to the divine Personalities that appear in this material world but are never tainted by any material contamination - rather they bring their purity, freshness, beauty and sweet scent to the conditioned souls who live in the muddy pond. We often find the lotus example in descriptions of the form of divine Personalities, referred to various parts of the body. The lotus eyes refer to the function of seeing, and indicate that divine Personalities have a pure vision (darshana) and are not distracted by temporary manifestations like conditioned souls are. The yogi that rises to the platform of divine Consciousness naturally develops the same purity of vision (5.18, 6.29, 11.4, 11.8, 11.9, 11.46, 11.47, 11.50, 11.53, 13.9, 13.12).

The lotus feet represent the purity of the teachings of the divine Personality and the service that is offered to such teachings. Bhagavata Purana (6.3.19) states that Bhagavan directly appears to establish dharmam (dharmam tu saksad bhagavat pranitam), and this is also confirmed in Bhagavad gita (4.8). This means that the mission of innovation and reformation in religious tradition needs a very clear and solid realization (darshana) of the supreme Consciousness - that is substantially the position of Bhagavan himself. Here we need to understand that Bhagavan is a state of consciousness; individual jivatmas can also be Krishna conscious (attaining the Bhagavan quality or level of consciousness), although their individual "quantity" of consciousness remains limited. This is why the name Bhagavan is also used for great personalities such as Narada etc.

At the spiritual level there is no difference between vapu ("form") and vani ("message"), and in fact the vani is much more important than the vapu. To understand this point, we can bring the example of a good servant who eagerly follows the orders of the master, and is more pleasing to the master than another servant who is just sitting and looking at him without doing anything. The lotus hands metaphor refers to the purity of action, as we can observe for example in the loving play between Krishna and the gopis.

Ordinary materialists, afflicted by bodily identification and base lust, remain unable to see how Krishna's caressing the intimate parts of the cowherd girls' bodies can be a purely spiritual action. The secret to this understanding is the difference between love and lust. While lust is selfish and wants to get pleasure for oneself and a feeling of possession and domination, love is selfless and wants to give happiness and pleasure only. In this perspective, even (genuine) love between two individual souls must be respected as spiritual. This is why Krishna has already declared (7.11) that sexual desire is sacred and divine when it is in accordance to the principles of dharma. The word mahatmya refers to the description of the glories. The origin of the word comes from maha atman, "great personality", but since in Vedic tradition all glorious manifestations are considered personalities, it applies also to holy places, scriptures, etc. Thus we find the Gita mahatmya, the Dhama mahatmya, and so on. One of the most famous mahatmyas is the Devi Mahatmya, from chapter 81 to chapter 93 of Markandeya Purana.

एवमेतद्यथा त्वमात्मानं परमेश्वर । द्रष्टुमिच्छामि ते रूपमैश्वरं पुरुषोत्तम ॥ ११-३ ॥

evametadyathāttha tvamātmānam paramēśvara | draṣṭumicchāmi te rūpamaśvaram puruṣottama || 11-3 ||

evam: thus; etat: this; yatha: as it is; attha: has been spoken; tvam: you; atmanam: Self; parama isvara: supreme Lord; drastum: to see; ichami: I wish; te: your; rupam: the form; aisvaram: majestic/ divine; puruṣa uttama: o supreme Purusha.

"O supreme Lord, I also wish to see you as you have described your self - that majestic form of the supreme Purusha."

In other words, Arjuna is saying, "what you have spoken about yourself, I wish to see directly".

We should be careful not to trivialize the meaning of this verse by bringing it down to a material challenge. Materialistic people want to see "miracles" but these are not to be considered actual evidence of divinity, because there are so many tricks that can be used to bamboozle the senses and the minds of ordinary people. Simple hypnotism can already make us believe we are seeing or perceiving things that do not really exist in tangible reality, or make us fail to perceive what is actually existing, as it has been amply demonstrated by clinical hypnosis, that is even used as anesthetic in surgical operations. Illusionists also have their own craft secrets, especially if they can work in their own special environment, or with suitable instruments. Besides these cheap magicians, there are also genuine yoga adepts that have developed real magic powers, and can manifest wonders to impress their followers. Flying or walking on water, producing fire without fuel, controlling the weather, materializing physical objects, traveling in subtle dimensions and other similar feats are perfectly within the reach of any human being, provided that the proper process is followed. Some humanoid races - such as the Siddhas, Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Yakshas, Nagas, etc - are naturally capable of manifesting these functions without being trained. But that does not prove they are God. On the other side, we can see that a genuine divine Personality may simply refuse to grant such a request, saying that we do not have the required vision (dīnya chakshu), as Krishna says in 11.8. So we cannot rely on the "request for miracle" asking people to show their universal form to verify their divinity, because they can always reply that we are not qualified to see it. We need to be more intelligent than this, and to develop the proper knowledge and realization that are required to recognize a genuine divine manifestation.

Arjuna's request is not an idle one. He is not looking for some entertainment, or legal evidence, or the satisfaction of material curiosity: he wants to put theory into practice, and actually experience the meaning of divine Consciousness. This should also be our purpose. Theoretical knowledge will not be sufficient to take us to the liberated platform or further up to the level of transcendental relationships: we need to take the big leap into full dedication to practicing spiritual life. The tradition of bhakti literature explains that there are 3 levels in spiritual progress - the kanistha, the madhyama and the uttama. The kanistha level is characterized by a certain measure of theoretical knowledge, that enables one to understand that spiritual and religious life is about worshipping God and observing certain rules and regulations in one's activities. This is the position where most religious people stand, in all the different faiths and ideological traditions; they mostly rely on the instructions given by their specific religious authorities or recognized holy books. They attend or perform religious rituals in temples/ churches/ mosques/ holy or sacred places of various types, and show respect and adoration to sacred symbols such as images, statues, etc.

If their religious authorities are genuine, and the followers are sincere enough to listen to their own conscience, everything is well, because the universal and eternal principles of religion can be perceived spontaneously and naturally by any human being. Also, the symbolic language of the subconscious is common to all human beings in all cultures, so anyone can appreciate and understand (more or less consciously) the iconography and the meaning of the universal archetypes that are connected to the Divine. We will elaborate more on this point in another publication, specifically dedicated to the subject. Here we can simply mention that God is naturally and spontaneously perceived as the supreme Father and/ or Mother, and associated with the fundamental elements of power that we can observe around us - such as the Sun, etc.

मन्यसे यदि तच्छक्यं मया द्रष्टुमिति प्रभो । योगेश्वर ततो मे त्वं दर्शयात्मानमव्ययम् ॥ ११-४ ॥

manyase yadi tacchakyaṁ mayā draṣṭumiti prabho | yogēśvara tato me tvam darśayātmānamavyayam || 11-4 ||

manyase: you think; yadi: if; tat: that; sakyam: capable; maya: by me; drastum: to be seen; iti: like this; prabho: o Lord; yoga isvara: o Lord of yoga; tatah: then; me: to me; tvam: you; darshaya: let me see; atmanam: the Self; avyayam: imperishable.

"O Lord, supreme master of yoga, if you think that I am capable of seeing it, then please let me have the direct vision of your imperishable self."

The expression sakyam maya drastum means "I have the power to see", where sakyam comes from the same root as sakti (shakti). Krishna has already declared (2.25) that the atman cannot be perceived by material senses: avyakto 'yam acintyo 'yam avikaryo 'yam ucyate, "It is said that this (soul) is invisible to material eyes, inconceivable to material intellect, and not affected by change". This "invisibility to material eyes" was defined by the word acintya, literally meaning "inconceivable". The point here is that the eyes can see only what the mind is able to take in: a mind still wrapped in material identifications and projections can barely see beyond the veil of matter. Physically speaking - as we have already mentioned - sense perception is nothing but a micro-electrical current that travels along the nervous system, and it can be easily be replicated for example by electronic equipments that are used to experience virtual reality in computer simulations.

A few verses later (2.29) in the second chapter, Krishna had stated that it is indeed possible to see the atman: ascarya-vat pasyati kascid enam ascarya-vat vadati tathaiva canyah, ascarya-vat cainam anyah srinoti srutvapy enam veda na caiva kascit, "Some see this (atman) as amazing, some others describe it as amazing. Some hear (of it) as amazing, and some remain unable to understand it even after hearing about it." This basically means that spiritual reality, constituted by spiritual bodies (tad rupa or svarupa) and spiritual objects (siddha vastu) can indeed be directly perceived by our physical senses, provided that our mind is adequately pure and tuned into the required level of consciousness. This is a radical concept, challenging the popular misconception according to which, as a definition, matter is tangible and real, while spirit is intangible or abstract. According to this Vedic vision, the direct experience of spiritual reality is perfectly scientific and can be empirically verified by anyone. As a consequence, spirituality is perceived objectively, and not only subjectively: therefore it is not a matter of opinion only.

The sincere spiritualists progress by following the instructions and guidance of the voice of conscience (the antaryami paramatma) and the genuine religious authorities and scriptures, and thus reach the intermediate level of madhyama, where they become able to apply the transcendental science in their daily life without the threat of punishment or the promise of rewards. On this level, we directly experience the divinity within ourselves and in the other living beings, and in the glorious manifestations that Krishna has described in these chapters. We thus acquire the divine vision (divya chakshu) or in other words, we can see through the eyes of the scriptures (shastra chakshu) with the same vision of those who compiled them. In fact, our understanding of the genuine scriptures increases and deepens, and we become able to distinguish between spirit and matter, divine and asuric characters, and the different modes and qualities of nature. We continue to see and worship the Deity in the temple and in the sacred symbols, but we are able to understand that divinity is not bound or restricted by material limitations of time and space.

When our perception and realization attain the uttama level, we become able to directly see and worship the Divine in everything, because our consciousness is fully connected to the supreme Consciousness. This can only happen when we realize that we are simply a fragment, a part, of that supreme Consciousness, and we are subordinate to the supreme. Humility is required, as demonstrated by Arjuna who says, "if you think I can do it". Krishna is not obliged to reveal himself to anyone, and the supreme Consciousness can be perceived only by the power of the supreme Consciousness, not by the limited power of the limited consciousness.

Of course, the individual soul will never be able to experience the entire expanse of the supreme Consciousness simultaneously, because the jiva is anu atma, while Krishna is param atma, so the consciousness of the jiva is anu chaitanya, while the consciousness of Krishna is vibhu chaitanya. But still, the consciousness of the individual will be perfectly full. We can make the example of the ocean - that represents the supreme Atman - and our cup of water. Although the water in our cup is much smaller as a quantity than the water that is in the ocean, still it is of the same nature, and it perfectly fills our cup, making it complete and happy.

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

पश्य मे पार्थ रूपाणि शतशोऽथ सहस्रशः । नानाविधानि दिव्यानि नानावर्णाकृतीनि च ॥ ११-५ ॥

paśya me pārtha rūpāṇi śataśo'tha sahasraśaḥ । nānāvidhāni divyāni nānāvarnākṛtīni ca ॥ 11-5 ॥

srī: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; pasya: see; me: my; pārtha: o son of Pritha; rūpāṇi: the forms; śataśaḥ: hundreds; atha: as well as; śahasraśaḥ: thousands; nana: various; vidhāni: ways; divyāni: divine; nana varna: various colors; akṛitīni: manifestations; ca: and.

The wonderful Lord said: "O son of Pritha, look: these are my forms, hundreds of thousands, all different, of various colors, but all divine."

The word akṛitini literally means "made", "manifested", where akṛitya means "form". A synonym is sṛista, "created" (4.7, sṛijyami aham, "I manifest myself"), that Krishna also uses to speak about material manifestations (5.14, 9.7, 9.8). Although these divine forms are eternally existing within the supreme Consciousness, in this world they become manifested at a particular time and place through the agency of Yogamaya. The "making" of such forms is not on the same level with the creation of the material forms, that are under the agency of Mahamaya.

The universal form was already present before Arjuna became able to see it. There are hundreds and thousands of true forms of God, and they have different shapes and colors - some human, some non-human, some male and some female. Some are composite forms with animal characteristics (especially faces) that symbolize special qualities, worthy of respect and admiration. All the powerful and majestic forms worshiped as manifestations of God by various cultures all along the recorded history are contained within the universal form of the Consciousness, and even more are there. Whatever a human mind can conceive, it has already been conceived by the universal Consciousness, and will remain there forever, to be contemplated and worshiped by those people who choose it as their ista devata.

Philosophers and theologians from conventional academia have tried to categorize the various perspectives on divinity, labeling them as monotheism, polytheism, pantheism, enotheism, and so on. Unfortunately, they present such perspectives as separated, independent and even opposite paths, all subjective and therefore all having the same value, or we should say, the same lack of value. For such theoretical thinkers, a monotheist cannot be a polytheist, or any of the intermediate ideological positions more or less superficially identified as recognized and followed by various cultures and individuals. In such a thwarted and miopic line of thinking, there can never be any sincere agreement or understanding among the followers or believers of these different ideologies. This problem has been created by the abrahamic model of so-called monotheism, that we have partially analyzed in several other occasions. It is not real monotheism, because by definition monotheism means "believing in one God", and the abrahamic model presents a fundamental dichotomy between the "good God" and the "bad God", i.e. Satan, that in turn is believed to manifest in a variety of other demoniac personalities considered "false Gods". In such faiths the devotee needs to pledge exclusive loyalty (with a pact or covenant) to the "good God" and total and blind obedience to his representatives (priests, mullahs, etc), and especially fight in all possible ways against all other faiths. In this perspective, the Absolute Truth is one of the many possible truths that somehow or other wins over the others, destroying all traces of them - temples, books, teachers, holy places, entire populations - down to the very memory of them having ever existed, or distorting their memory to demonize them. But this is a very negative mentality, based on violence, fear, deceit, oppression, and ignorance.

The Vedic perspective is radically different: the Absolute Truth is seen as the greater picture in which all the relative truths can be contained, reconciled and harmonized, in a multi-dimensional vision that can truly bring peace and good will among all the people on the planet. Indeed, there is no other way to save the human species from the impending disaster.

Genuine atheism - that is the denial of any relevance of a personal form of God over human affairs and universal creation - is not actually dangerous to genuine religion, because by definition it does not try to force people to believe in something or adhere to rules that are not simply those of natural and universal ethics. This is perfectly acceptable from the point of view of sanatana dharma, that is also based on the natural and universal ethics, and has a much broader vision about the concept of divinity. Therefore Vedic tradition respects materialistic atheism as a legitimate perspective (or lack thereof) about God, and lists its ancient form (taught by Charvaka) among its recognized philosophical ideologies, as one of the three nastika ("agnostic") darshanas, together with Buddhism and Jainism.

nāntaṁ na madhyaṁ na punastavādīṁ paśyāmi viśveśvara viśvarūpa ॥ 11-16 ॥

paśya: see; adityaṁ: the Adityas; vasuṁ: the Vasus; rudraṁ: the Rudras; asvinau: the two Asvinis; marutab: the Marutas; tatha: as well as; bahūni: many; adrista: unseen; purvāni: previously; paśya: look; ascaryāni: the wonders; bharata: o descendant of Bharata.

"Look at the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the two Asvinis, the Marutas, and also at the many other forms that have not been seen before. O descendant of Bharata, look at all these wonders."

In the commentaries to the previous verses, we have elaborated on the divine Personalities listed in this verse - the 12 Adityas, the 8 Vasus, the 11 Rudras, the 2 Asvinis, and the 49 Marutas (7 in each group of 7). To summarize, we can say that the Adityas are manifestations of the Sun as the source of all the power in the universe, the Vasus are the main elements that constitute the cosmos, the Rudras are the dissolution principles that eliminate the obstacles, the Asvinis are the healing principle that brings balance back wherever it was lost, and the Marutas are the principles of movement such as waves, frequencies, etc.

The Devas described in Vedic literature are universal archetypes whose existence is not limited by time and space, therefore they can be recognized spontaneously by persons belonging to any culture, provided they are open to listen to their subconscious. Of course the strong blind belief in the impossibility to perceive such universal and eternal archetypes will prevent one from actually perceiving them, but that is simply a superimposed obstacle that can be removed, not a real inability. The same thing can be applied to the unlimited number of avatars (forms in which the Divine descends in this world to carry out specific missions), as confirmed in many scriptures, especially in the Bhagavata Purana, as stated by the Bhagavata itself (12.12.7). Here are some important verses in this regard:

avatara hy asankhyeya bahav sattva nidher dhijah, yatha avidasinah kulyah sarasah syuh sabasratah, "O brahmanas, the avatars of Hari - the ocean of goodness - are innumerable, just like the myriad of rivulets that originate from a great lake" (1.3.26)

bhavayaty esa sattvena lokan vai loka bhavanah, lila avatara anuratab deva tiryan nara adisu, "The creator of the world maintains all this (universe) through the quality of sattva, assuming the role of various lila avatars, from among the devas, the animals, and the human beings" (1.2.34)

yasyavatara karmāni gayanti hy asmad adayah, na yam vidanti tattvena tasmai bhagavate namah, "We offer our respect to Bhagavan, whose avatars and activities are recited by people like us, who still cannot fully know him" (2.6.38)

avatara anucaritam bares casya anuvartinam, pumsam isa kathah proktah nana akhyana upabrimbitah, "The discussions about God concern the many stories of the avatars and the activities of Hari, as well as those of his followers/ devotees" (2.10.5)

keridan vidhatte dvija go suranam ksbemaya karmāny avatara bhedāib, mano na tripyaty api srinvatam nah susloka matules charita amritani, "Our mind is never satiated even by constantly hearing about the wonderful immortal/ nectarine stories about the Lord, who manifests different avatars and activities for the benefit of the twice born, the cows and the devas" (3.5.7)

yah idam deva devasya harer adbhuta karmānāib, avatara anucaritam srinvan yati param gatim, "One who listens to the wonderful (stories of the) avatars and activities of Hari, the God of the Gods, whose deeds are extraordinary, will attain the supreme destination" (8.23.30)

raksba acyuta avatara iba visvasya anu yuge yuge, tiryan martya risbi devesu hanyante yaiḥ trayi dvisah, "Age after age, the infallible Lord protects (the world) by descending in this universe among animals, human beings, rishis and devas, and killing the enemies of the three" (12.7.14).

The import of this verse is confirmed in the famous Purusha sukta (Rig Veda, 10.90):

sahasra sirsa purusha sahasraksha sahasra pat, sa bhumim visvato vritvati atisthad dasangulam, "The Purusha has thousands of heads, thousands of eyes and thousands of feet. He contains the Earth and the universe, and yet he is established beyond that, in a space of ten fingers", purusha evedam sarvam yad bhutam yac ca bhavyam, utamritatvasyesano yad annena tirohati, "The Purusha is the entire universe, everything that was and everything that will be. He is immortal, and sustains all".

As we can see, the universal form, the Virat Purusha, is the Paramatman, the supreme Atman that is present in all material manifestations, within the bodies of the conditioned living entities and also within each and every atom - as well as outside them. The mention of the "ten fingers" as the measurement of the form of the Purusha refers to the comparative size of the Paramatman within the embodied beings. Of course it is not a material measurement, as it applies to the individual perception of the individual soul, so we cannot really go around with a measuring tape trying to size up the Paramatman along the body of someone.

इहैकस्थं जगत्कृत्स्नं पश्याद्य सचराचरम् । मम देहे गुडाकेश यच्चान्यद् द्रष्टुमिच्छसि ॥ ११-७ ॥

ihaikastham jagatkṛtsnam paśyādya sacarācaram । mama dehe guḍākeśa yaccānyad draṣṭumicchasi ।। 11-7 ।।

iba: in this; eka stham: one place; jagat: the universe/ all the people; kṛtsnam: entire; paśya: see; adya: now; sa cara acaram: both moving and non-moving; mama: my; dehe: in the body; gudakesa: o Gudakesa; yat: that; ca: and; anyat: other; drastum: to see; icchasi: you wish.

"O Gudakesa, see now in this one place the entire universe, with all the moving and non-moving beings and much more, all contained within my body, as you have wished to see.

The expression iba eka stam, "in this one place", shows the extraordinary nature of the experience of awareness that Krishna is offering to Arjuna. It would not be very extraordinary to see the different beings of the universe normally spread over the vast expanse of time and space, but to perceive all of them at the same time in the same place in a focused flash of awareness is truly a special experience. We could describe this difference as ordinary light compared to the concentrated laser beam that can cut through thick steel. Such an experience cannot be explained through words or even understood intellectually, but it can be perceived at a subtler, spiritual level.

Krishna is addressing Arjuna as Gudakesa, where gudaka means darkness or tamas, to highlight the key factor of the experience: the spiritual vision is clouded by ignorance, therefore we must dissipate all traces of ignorance through the proper application of knowledge and goodness - sattva. At that level, we become able to perceive the spiritual reality, that is even subtler than the mental reality. The conditioned soul that is covered by the darkness of ignorance is defined as mudha (7.15, 9.11, 14.15, 15.10, 16.20, 17.19, but also 3.6, 3.27, 3.29) and remains unable to approach the spiritual level. This point is clarified not only in the above mentioned verses in Bhagavad gita, but in the Bhagavata Purana as well. For example, in the description given by Narada about his mother in his previous life (yosit mudha ca kinkari, "a simple-minded maidservant", 1.6.6). Although the servant girl had the opportunity to listen to the bhagavat katha and served the Rishis as her child did, she was simply not interested in spiritual things. Another useful verse in the Bhagavata Purana says, maya javanikacchannam ajna adbhoksbajam anyayam, na laksyase mudha drisa, nato matyadharo yatha, "You remain hidden by the veil of maya for the ignorant people, as you are transcendental and beyond material perception. Foolish observers cannot see you, just like they cannot recognize an actor under his costume" (1.8.19).

Again we read, sa tram mamaivasya mada plutasya kertagasas te avidusah prabhavam, ksbantum prabho atbarbasi mudha cetasaḥ, maivam punar bhun matir isa me asati, "Intoxicated with my own exalted material position, I have committed a serious offense against you, not recognizing your actual power. O Lord, I beg you to forgive me, and bless me so that my consciousness will never be so grossly ignorant again. O Lord, I feel contaminated." (Bhagavata Purana, 10.27.8).

The expression cara acara is often used to describe all embodied beings, as we have already seen, for example in verse 10.39 (yac capi sarva-bhutanam bijam tad aham arjuna, na tad asti vina yat syan maya bhutam caracaram, "O Arjuna, I am the seed of all existences, of all beings - moving and non-moving. Without me nothing could ever exist."). In our commentary to that verse, we already mentioned that the broad categorization between moving beings and non-moving beings, offered by the Vedic tradition, is more practical than the conventional classification of animals and plants, because it is functional and not ontological, therefore it can be verified empirically and directly by anyone at any time. The Vedic system, however, goes beyond the immediately visible characteristics of the objects surrounding us, and takes us deeper into the atomic and sub-atomic realms, stating that among the "non-moving" beings there are not only plants but minerals as well. This amazing scientific knowledge is based on the fundamental equation that connects life with consciousness or knowledge: this consciousness or knowledge is manifested in minerals, too, by the consistency and perfection of structure in crystals, as well as in molecules, atoms and sub-atomic particles. The deeper and subtler we go, the more our perception expands to include a wider understanding of the universe - still, the Vedic categorization remains a solid anchorage, based on the functional distinction between moving and non-moving. Thus the vibrating quanta of energy formations that we find in sub-atomic dimensions take us beyond the duality of the definition, as they are simultaneously moving and non-moving (being the most basic constituents of so-called inert matter). Therefore the expression cara acara (and its equivalent sthavara-jangama, 13.27) can also be applied as the description of the simultaneous existence of two apparently opposite characteristics within the same object, affirming the fundamental unity of all existence, described in Vedic scriptures as Brahman. Two other verses of Bhagavad gita specifically focus on this point:

mayadhyaksena prakritih sruyate sa-caracaram, hetumanena kaunteya jagad viparivartate, "O son of Kunti (Arjuna), under my order this prakriti manifests everything, both moving and non-moving; by this cause the universe revolves/ functions/ is created cyclically" (9.10), javat sanjayate kincit sattvam sthavara-jangamam, kshetra-kshetrajna-samyogat tad viddhi bharatarshabha, "O best of the descendents of Bharata, you should know that whatever is generated and whatever exists, moving and non-moving, comes from the union of the kshetra and the kshetra jna" (13.27).

न तु मां शक्यसे द्रष्टुमनेनैव स्वचक्षुषा । दिव्यं ददामि ते चक्षुः पश्य मे योगमैश्वरम् ॥ ११-८ ॥

na tu mām śakyase draṣṭumanenaiva svacakṣuṣā | divyaṁ dadāmi te cakṣuḥ paśya me yogamāiśvaram || 11-8 ||

na: not; tu: but; mām: me; śakyase: you will be able; draṣṭum: to see; anena: with these; eva: certainly; sva-cakṣuṣa: own eyes; divyam: divine; dadāmi: I give; te: to you; cakṣuḥ: eyes; paśya: look; me: my; yogam aiśvaram: the wonders of yoga.

"However, you will not be able to see me with your physical eyes, therefore I am giving you divine eyes. Look at the wonders of my yoga power."

Krishna clearly states here that the vision of the universal form is not something that we can see with physical eyes; rather, it is something we can see through the eyes of our intellect - buddhi - or with a spiritual vision. Buddhi is the bridge between matter and spirit, that takes our vision beyond the level of the physical eyes. What is the difference between spiritual and divine? The Devas are called divine, yet they have a material body, as they are born and die (or better, their bodies are born and die).

However, the Devas are not on the same level with the ordinary conditioned souls, because they have developed the clear perception of their identity as limbs of the Supreme: this is the spiritual level of consciousness, and therefore we can say that they are spiritual personalities, and not material personalities. The same applies for any jiva who has overcome the gross material identifications and attachments, and has the clear perception of its own nature as part of the body of God (mamaivamso jiva loke, jiva bhuta sanatanah, 15.7). These realized souls are called jivan muktas.

Katha Upanishad (1.3.12) states: "The atman is hidden in all beings and its radiance can be perceived only by those who are able to see subtle things by focusing buddhi". The fact that we cannot see the universal form with our ordinary material eyes does not make it less real - it simply puts it on a different level, just like the perception of ideas. What to speak of spiritual realities or the subtle mental level... even among ordinary sense objects, there are some that escape our range of perception, like for example the ultraviolet and infrared light rays, or the ultrasounds. The evolution of consciousness in the individual soul carries from the material level to the spiritual level, gradually removing more and more boundary walls created by our gross material identifications and limitations, and rising our awareness to contemplate wider horizons. In this individual evolutionary journey, our vision becomes more and more penetrating. At some point, the boundary between material and spiritual becomes so subtle that it's just a question of consciousness, and they can turn into one another instantly.

The universal form is called divine, and divine eyes are required to contemplate it, because it is beyond the limits of time and space (eka stham). It is the divine vision of the Devas, who can see through their consciousness and not just through the gross material sense organs as ordinary human beings do. The expression sva cakṣu is particularly interesting in this regard, because it implies a separation or differentiation based on material identification; a similar example can be shown in the expression sva dharma as opposed to sanatana dharma. Sva dharma refers to the temporary duties towards society and family, based on bodily identification, while sanatana dharma belongs to the sat ("eternal") identity of the atman. Krishna has already shown the virat rupa before. We see that happening two times in Vrindavana to mother Yasoda, once while breast-feeding (Bhagavata Purana 10.7.34-

37) and once when little Krishna was caught eating mud (Bhagavata Purana 10.8.32-39). Also in the Mahabharata, before the armies arrived on the battlefield of Kurukshetra, Krishna manifested the virat rupa in the assembly of the Kurus, when Duryodhana attempted to arrest him for trying to bring reconciliation with the Pandavas. However, no contemplation of the virat rupa can be exactly the same for different persons, because of the fundamental spiritual nature of the experience, that is based on perception.

The expression yogam aisvaryam is very interesting. Literally, yoga means "union", "connection", and aisvarya means "power", indicating something great, impressive, majestic, glorious. Unfortunately, the idea of yoga has been trivialized to the level of some exotic or folkloristic physical exercise ("stretch and relax"), so when we speak of yoga powers, most people will think of getting in a better physical shape. Those who have heard about the yoga siddhis may think of some magic powers that can be developed through some secret practice of mantras and breathing exercises. However, the yoga siddhis are not the purpose of yoga, but simply a side effect of the expansion of consciousness - the real power of yoga. In this light we can better understand Krishna's statement: the universal form is certainly the vision of the greatest and highest possible level of expanded consciousness.

एवमुक्त्वा ततो राजन्महायोगेश्वरो हरिः । दर्शयामास पार्थाय परमं रूपमैश्वरम् ॥ ११-९ ॥

evamuktva tato rājanmahāyogeshvaro hariḥ । darśayāmāsa pāthāya paramam rūpamāiśvaram ॥ 11-9 ॥

sanjayah: Sanjaya; uvaca: said; evam: thus; uktva: said; tataḥ: then; rajan: o king; maha yoga isvarah: the great Lord of yoga; harib: Hari; darśayam asa: showed; parthaya: to the son of Pritha; paramam: supreme; rūpam: form; aiśvaram: majestic.

Sanjaya said, O king, saying these words Hari, the great Lord of yoga, showed the supreme majestic form to Arjuna.

We are reminded here that Arjuna is not the only person who is about to see the universal form. At least Sanjaya is watching everything that happens on the battlefield and narrating it to king Dhritarastra: this is the "container" in which the conversation between Krishna and Arjuna is held. The first two verses of Bhagavad gita, in chapter 1, introduced us to this dialog between Sanjaya and Dhritarastra, who were sitting in the royal palace in Hastinapura. Dhritarastra asked Sanjaya to describe the activities of his sons (mamakāḥ) and the sons of Pandu (pandavāḥ), and Sanjaya started by describing how Duryodhana had approached Drona to discuss about the arrangements of the two armies. Sanjaya's ability to watch the events developing at Kurukshetra from such a great distance is also extraordinary, but not as much as the vision of the universal form that he will soon describe in this chapter. It is said that such power of clairvoyance was granted to Sanjaya by his guru Veda Vyasa, and we will see in 11.22 that the Rishis, the Siddhas and the Devas, but also the Yakshas and the Asuras are able to contemplate the universal form as shown to Arjuna.

The word rishi comes from the same root of darshana, and means "those who see". The definition is not far from the meaning of clairvoyant, although the perception of the rishis is much more scientific and deeper in comparison to the vague perceptions of untrained and sentimentalistic psychics, who can merely get impressions from the etheric level without really understanding what they are seeing. Again this verse reminds us about the real meaning and purpose of yoga - the awareness or consciousness of reality at the original transcendental level, from which all the material manifestations come into being. Another important point in this verse is highlighted by the expression darśayam asa, "showed". Darshana, or direct perception of a transcendental spiritual reality, is not an ascending process, but a descending process, a revelation that is granted from a higher level, out of kindness and as a blessing.

Sanjaya is addressing Dhritarastra as "king" out of politeness and loyalty, but Dhritarastra is in fact only a regent, because blindness - physical as well as mental and spiritual - such as Dhritarastra's automatically disqualifies one from occupying the throne. Arjuna is here called Partha, "son of Pritha", because of Krishna's affectionate and strong relationship with his aunt Kunti, also called Pritha, who is the mother of Arjuna. Krishna is thus highlighting the close ties he chose to establish with Arjuna in this avatara, and encouraging him to get through the extraordinary experience with the proper attitude and confidence.

The virat rupa, or universal form, is here called parama aisvarya rupa ("the supreme majestic form") in relation to the things that we can experience in this world. After the universal form, Krishna will show Arjuna his four-armed form of Vishnu and then his intimate form of Krishna again. The aisvarya or vibhuti form does not manifest in intimate lilas but it is always fully present, as we are constantly reminded in the genuine shastra and by the genuine guru. Many superficial pretenders like to entertain their followers by telling stories on the intimate lilas manifested by Krishna especially in his Vrindavana period, but that should be done by following the original authentic text of the Bhagavata Purana, especially in the 10th canto, that describes such stories.

The genuine text keeps reminding us that Krishna is Brahman, so that we do not take him lightly; see for example verse 10.12.11 (brahma sukha anubhūtya, "the origin of the transcendental happiness", para deva, "the supreme Lord", kṛita punya punjab, "had accumulated lots of religious credits (previously)").

अनेकवक्त्रनयनमनेकाद्भुतदर्शनम् ।

अनेकदिव्याभरणं दिव्यानेकोद्यतायुधम् ॥ ११-१० ॥

anekavaktranayanamanekādbhutadarśanam । anekadivyaābharanam divyānekodyatāyudham ॥ 11-10 ॥

aneka: many; vaktra: faces/ mouths; nayanam: eyes; aneka: many; adbhuta-darśanam: wonderful to see; aneka: many; divya abharanam: divine ornaments; divya: divine; aneka: many; udyata: raised; ayudham: weapons/ symbols.

"So many faces, so many eyes - an amazing sight. So many divine ornaments, and so many divine symbols raised (in that form)."

The first impact of the vision shown to Arjuna is about the innumerable faces and innumerable eyes of the many forms of God. This puts the emphasis on the personal nature of the relationship with God, as God manifests so many faces and eyes to interact with us - to look at us and to be looked at. When we sincerely and intensely address a person, we look at his/ her face and eyes, because we want to establish a deep contact and sense of communication. There are several reasons why one does not look an interlocutor in the face or eyes: fear, lack of sincerity, excessive humility, lack of confidence. All these feelings are obstacles to the development of a genuine relationship with God.

There are some who believe that religion should inspire people with the fear of God, but that's not Krishna's idea. Only asuras need to fear God, and even in their case, their meeting with God will be beneficial because they will be purified from their crimes and misconceptions, and therefore will attain a better status. In any case, God will allow them to look at his face and eyes and do their best to engage in fight, as a part of his playful activities as we see in so many episodes of the Puranas etc.

It is said the eyes are the windows to the soul, and looking into God's eyes is certainly an extraordinary experience. We can have this feeling when we look into the eyes of the installed Deity when we serve him/ her with sincere love and devotion, and we have developed sufficient sensitivity to spiritual reality. At that level, we will be able to easily tell the difference between ordinary food and sanctified food offered to the Deity, and between an ordinary statue and the installed murti of the Deity, and also between an ordinary person and a genuine self-realized soul. The word vaktra, like mukha, can refer both to "face" or to "mouth". In this second case, the emphasis is given to the two main functions in the relationship between God and the devotee - the feeding or offering of food or oblations, and the transmission of the sacred sound or teachings.

The various forms of God hold many divine symbols or weapons, called ayudha, and this verse describes them as udyata ("raised", "uplifted") because they constitute the emblems of the divine powers. There is a difference between these ayudhas and ordinary weapons, that are usually called astras or sastras (with a short "a") as described in the texts composing the Dhanur Veda. Conventional "human" weapons (called manava sastra) are described as dhānūr (bow) and sara or bana (arrows, including small rockets called agnibana), kunta (spear), khagda or asi (sword), churika (knife or dagger), gada (mace), chakra (disc), while more sophisticated weapons (called divya astra) entail the conscious control of vibrational frequencies and electro-magnetic fields that are able to alter the state of matter. Among these, we can mention the Brahma astra (a nuclear missile), the Agneya astra, the Vayuva astra, and the Narayana astra, Pasupata astra and Naga astra, that had effects still unparalleled by modern mainstream technology. On the other side, the ayudhas are generally symbolic weapons - for example the sword indicates cutting material bondage, etc.

Another meaning of aneka adbhuta darshanam is "many wonderful realizations", and it can be applied to the deep understanding and knowledge that is expressed through these divine forms - that are concentrated forms of consciousness and knowledge. As we know, the word darshana also means "perspective", as in the definitions of the various philosophical schools. In this sense, the verse we are analyzing is a glorious affirmation about the amazingly comprehensive nature of the pluralistic approach typical of the Vedic system.

दिव्यमाल्याम्बरधरं दिव्यगन्धानुलेपनम् । सर्वाश्चर्यमयं देवमनन्तं विश्वतोमुखम् ॥ ११-११ ॥

divyamālyāmbaradharaṁ divyagandhānulepanam | sarvāścāryamayam devamānantam viśvatomukham || 11-11 ||

divya: divine; malya: garlands/ necklaces; ambara: clothes; dharam: wearing; divya: divine; gandha: scents; anulepanam: anointed with; sarva: all; ascarya mayam: consisting of wonderful majesty; devam: radiant/ God; anantam: unlimited; viśvato mukham: whose face is everywhere.

These wonderfully majestic forms of God were unlimited, and looking in all directions. They were wearing divine clothes and garlands/ necklaces, and were anointed with divine scents.

The innumerable heads and faces of the effulgent virata puruṣa are also mentioned in the Nrisimha maha mantra: ugram viram maha viṣṇum jvalantam sarvato mukham, nrisimham bhisanam bhadram mrityor mrityur namami aham, "I pay my homage to the fierce and valiant Mahaviṣṇu, whose radiant face is omnipresent, Lord Nrisimha who is unlimitedly benevolent. He is the death of death."

Why God's face is omnipresent? Because his consciousness is alert everywhere, at all times. In our human experience, the face or the head of the body normally functions as the "central operative room" of consciousness, where the brain receives and elaborates the information from the chief sensors (eyes, ears, nose, mouth, all in the head) and prepares the orders for action to be sent all around the body, including the communication and relationship interactions with the external world, especially with other people.

The many forms within the virata rupa are decorated with various ornaments, and this shows that such forms are devoutly worshiped by sincere spiritualists. They can be also simple ornaments, made of flowers or other inexpensive materials, but in all cases for God to have accepted them, they must have been offered with love and devotion, because God is only interested in bhakti, not in the materialistic showing off of proud and arrogant people. This is why they are called divine (divya): anything offered through bhakti immediately becomes spiritual.

The traditional worship system is based on the devotional and ceremonial offering of various pleasurable items to the image of God; among these, clothes (vastra), necklaces (malya) made with flowers or various other materials, scents (gandha or sugandha), ornaments (abharana) are characteristic in many cultures, not only in the Hindu/ Vedic tradition. Another meaning of the ornaments decorating the body of God refers to his shakti and his devotees, who never want to leave him even for one moment, and who highlight his beauty by constantly glorifying him and speaking about his amazing qualities. In this regard, we need to note that in the spiritual world, everything is made of consciousness, therefore even apparently inanimate things are conscious personalities - Krishna's flute, the jewels that decorate the Lord's body, and everything else.

The word ambara ("clothes") is a synonym for vastra, and is found in several Names of God. Pitambara means "dressed in yellow". Visvambara means "dressed by the universe" (a poetic expression to mean "naked"), similar to Digambara ("dressed by the directions") and it is a name of Shiva. The sweet scent mentioned in this verse is an intrinsic quality of the divine presence; when a divine Personality appears or manifests (even remaining invisible to the eye) we can often perceive his/ her presence through the inexplicable appearance of a wonderful scent, or sweet sounds similar to music, ringing bells or sacred chants. These perceptions have been proved as being real and not mere hallucinations or figments of one's imagination, as they can be clearly experienced by several people at the same time.

In Bhagavata Purana we find numerous descriptions of the Virata Rupa, offered as the fundamental meditation on the glories of the Lord: for example in 2.1.23-39, 2.5.34-41, 3.6.1-40, 3.26.50-73, 5.16.3, and so on. In verse 3.26.72 this meditation is even applied to one's self (atmani): tam asmin pratyak atmanam dhiya yoga pravrittaya, bhaktya viraktya jnanena, vivicya atmani cintayet, "Meditating on him, the supreme Soul, in this (universal form), the yogi should apply devotion, detachment and knowledge to perceive him within one's self".

दिवि सूर्यसहस्रस्य भवेद्युगपदुत्थिता । यदि भाः सदृशी सा स्याद्भासस्तस्य महात्मनः ॥ ११-१२ ॥

divi sūryasahasrasya bhavedyugapadutthitā | yadi bhāḥ sadṛśī sā syādbhāstasya mahātmanah || 11-12 ||

divi: in the sky; surya sahasrasya: of thousands of suns; bhaved: there would be; yugapat: at the same time; utthita: risen; yadi: if; bhah: the light/ splendor; sadṛśī: in the same way; sah: that; syat: would be; bhasah: radiance; tasya: of that; maha atmanah: the great Atman.

If thousands of suns were rising simultaneously in the sky, that radiance would be similar to the radiance of the great Atman.

The light of the universal form is described here as sahasra surya utthita, "the rising of one thousand suns". It is a bright but pleasing light, that inspires and comforts all, while a comparison with the blazing midday sun would have laid the emphasis on fierceness. The expression yadi syat means "if it were", "it might be". The virat rupa is called here mahatma - maha atman, the "great atman", a synonym of paramatma or param atman. Sometimes the name mahatma is superficially applied to some famous material personality, as a kind of honorific title. However, we should not forget that the word atman actually refers to the spiritual identity of the self, and it should not be used lightly, otherwise people may be misled into incorrect beliefs about what makes a person great. As we have mentioned already, spirit and light are closely connected. The Bṛihad Aranyaka Upanishad (1.3.28) establishes the standard in this regard: asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mṛtyor ma amritam gamaya, "From what is temporary lead me to what is eternal, from darkness lead me to the light, from death lead me to eternal life". The light of the atman is the light of the brahmajyoti, that is the origin of all sources of light in the universe (jyotisham ravir amsuman, 10.21, jyotisham api taj jyotis tamasah param ucyate, 13.18, prabhasmi sasi-suryayoh, 7.8, jnana-dipena bhasvata, 10.11, yad aditya-gatam tejo jagad bhasayate 'khillam, yac candramasi yac cagnau tat tejo viddhi mamakam, 15.12, asmi tejas tejasvinam abam, 7.10, asmi tejas tejasvinam abam, 10.36, tvam dipta-bhutasavaktram svatejasa visvam idam tapantam, 11.19).

In the paranyoma, the spiritual sky, there is no need for such secondary sources of light because the primary light of the brahmajyoti is all pervading: na tad bhasayate suryo na sasanko na pavakah, yad gatva na nivartante tad dhama paramam mama (Bhagavad gita, 15.6). This is also confirmed by Katha Upanishad (2.2.15): na tatra suryo bhāti na candra tarakam, nema vidyuto bhanti kuto agni, "There is no sun radiance, no moon or star, or lightning/ electricity or fire".

The word bhah, "effulgence", is a synonym of jyoti and tejas. From bhah, or bhar, we derive the word bhargah as in bhargo devasya dhimahi, the famous line from the original Gayatri mantra (Rig Veda 3.63.20, Yajur Veda 3.35 and Sama Veda 6.3, 10.1): om bhuh bhuvah svah, tat savitur varenyam bhargo devasya dhimahi dhiyo no nah prachodayat, "We meditate on God, who is the three worlds (bhuh, bhuvah, svah). He is the radiant divine Light. May our intelligence be inspired by him."

The components of the Gayatri mantra have many layers of meanings, but they are all based on the light of the Brahman, and apply to the contemplation of the universal form. The three worlds Bhuh, Bhuvah, Svah, are the physical, subtle and causal levels of existence, that manifest at cosmic level as the Earth, the intermediate planets/ dimensions, and the higher planets. Applied to the divine existence, Bhuh is described as the vital energy (Shakti as prana or vayu), Bhuvah as the destruction of sufferings and sorrows (Hari and Hara), and Svah is the source of happiness (Rama).

The word tat is a pronoun ("that"), of which tasya (mentioned in this verse in the singular referring to the maha atman or param atman) is the possessive/ genitive form ("of that"). Tat is the root for the word tattva, or Reality. The concept of Transcendence, tat or tattva, is described as Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan: vadanti tat tattva vidad tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti bhagavan iti sadyate, "Those who know Reality say that Transcendence is Reality, the non-dualistic Knowledge that is called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan" (Bhagavata purana, 1.2.11). In our commentary to verse 5.17, we have listed the most important verses of Bhagavad gita in which this word is used to define God: 2.17 (tat viddhi), 3.19 (tat artham), 4.39 (tat parah), 5.5 (tat yogaih gamyate), 5.16 (tat param), 5.17 (tad-buddhayas tad-atmanas tan-nishthas tat-parayanah), 7.1 (tat srinu), 8.21 (tat dhama paramam), 10.39 (tat aham), 11.37 (tat param), 13.13 (tat pravakṣyami), 13.14 (tat sarvataḥ), 13.16 (tat avijneyam), 13.17 (tat jneyam), 13.18 (tat jyotiḥ), 15.4 (tat parimargitanyam), 15.5 (tat padam avyayam), 15.6 (tat dhama paramam), 15.12 (tat tejah), 17.23 (om tat sat), 17.27 (tat arthiyam), 18.5 (tat yajnam danam tapah), 18.20 (tat jnanam), 18.55 (tat anantaram), 18.62 (tat prasadaḥ), 18.77 (tat samsmṛitya). By and large, the word tat is meant to indicate the Supreme, Brahman, the transcendental Spirit, as we see in the important mantra "om tat sat" (17.23, 24, 25, 26, 27) and in the famous maha vakya "tat tvam asi" (Chandogya Upanishad, 6.8.7). The tat identified with om, the universal form of God in the first part of the Gayatri, is further associated with Savitur, another name of Surya (the Sun), that gives his name to Gayatri mantra herself (as Savitri).

The word varanyam means "supreme", "best", but also "worshipable", "giver of blessing". Bhargo means "radiance", and devasya ("of God") refers to the divine nature of Bhagavan, Paramatma, Brahman. The word dhiya ("intellect") comes from the same root as dhyana ("meditation").

तत्रैकस्थं जगत्कृत्स्नं प्रविभक्तमनेकधा ।

अपश्यदेवदेवस्य शरीरे पाण्डवस्तदा ॥ ११-१३ ॥

tatraikastham jagatkṛtsnam pravibhaktamanekadhā | apaśyadevadevasya śarīre pāṇḍavastadā || 11-13 ||

tatra: there; eka stham: in one place; jagat kṛtsnam: the entire creation; pravibhaktam: in so many different ways; anekadha: into many; apaśyat: could see; deva devasya: of the God of the Gods; śarīre: in the body; pandavah: the son of Pandu; tada: at that time.

Then, in that one place, the son of Pandu could see the entire universe with its innumerable manifestations, within the body of the God of Gods.

Verse 11.7 also stated, with almost exactly the same words (iha eka stham jagat) that the perception of the universal form was focused in one single place in space and time, in a concentrated "here and now" that is the essence of existence and eternity. However, this fundamental unity of Reality is full of unlimited variety - viśeṣa - of forms (rūpa) and qualities (guṇa) that are created by Prakṛti: the material variety produced by Mahamaya, and the spiritual variety produced by Yogamaya. Thus it is said that Reality or God is one and many, categorized into direct or primary manifestations (amsas) and secondary manifestations (vibhinnamsas). The concept of variety as division or categorization is also expressed by the word pra-vibhaktam, that comes from the same root as vibhakta, vibhaga and vibhūti.

We can find references in this regard also in Bhagavata Purana (guṇa pravahena vibhakta viryah, "the various potencies as per their qualities") in verses 3.33.3 and 4.11.18. Yet, Bhagavad gita (13.17) clearly affirms that Reality is undivided (avibhakta): avibhaktam ca bhuteshu vibhaktam iva ca sthitam, bhūta-bhartri ca taj jneyam grasishnu prabhaviṣhnu ca. Again, we find ourselves facing the apparent contradiction of the acintya bheda abheda tattva, the simultaneous and inconceivable unity and diversity or separation, between Bhagavan and Shakti. Chapter 13 is specifically entitled Prakṛiti puruṣa vibhaga yoga, "the yoga of the difference between prakṛiti and puruṣa". However, the most interesting thing is that in that chapter the conclusion is that there is actually no vibhaga and no bheda - no separation and no difference. The word anekadha, "of many different types", can be applied to the various cosmic manifestations as "innumerable diverse planets of different compositions", which includes not only planets proper, but the subtle dimensions as well, and also the various types of bodies in which the jīvas live, as all living entities are within the universal form (7.12).

The universal form or virata rūpa is a manifestation of Vishnu, the Supreme Personality of Godhead. The definition deva deva (or its equivalent deva isa) is found not only in Bhagavad gita (10.15, 11.13, 11.25, 11.37, 11.45), but also in other scriptures. Naturally the Bhagavata Purana is expected to be on the first line in recognizing the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Hari and Hara, and we can consult the relevant verses at 1.7.26, 1.8.9, 1.9.24, 2.5.1, 3.1.12, 3.7.20, 3.15.4, 3.16.17, 4.5.5, 5.3.15, 6.4.10, 7.3.6, 7.10.26, 8.7.21, 8.7.45, 8.12.4, 8.18.28, 8.22.21, 8.23.30, 9.3.33, 9.6.14, 9.6.35, 9.11.1, 9.14.47, 9.16.20, 9.18.48, 10.1.20, 10.40.9, 10.41.16, 10.51.29, 10.54.33, 10.59.25, 10.64.22, 10.64.27, 10.71.39, 10.72.5, 10.73.8, 10.80.44, 10.81.18, 10.81.39, 10.86.54, 11.4.14, 11.6.42, 11.31.27, 12.9.4, 12.13.22.

Then Arjuna was overwhelmed by awe and wonder. His hairs standing on end, he bowed his head in homage to God, and with folded hands, he began to speak.

The direct experience (prakāśa) of genuine connection to the supreme Consciousness is overwhelming. Even at a lower level, when the individual's consciousness suddenly shifts to a higher or wider perspective, getting a clear vision of some relative truth or knowledge that was previously unperceived, it is a shock often compared to being struck by lightning. It is a paradigm shift, an epiphany, that instantly changes all our perspective of the entire world, and often drastically rearranges our priorities in life. To make crude examples, this consciousness revolution may happen when we discover that we have been viciously betrayed by a person we deeply loved and trusted, or we have a close shave with death and become aware of the fragility of the human body, or we see the demonstration of a totally unknown scientific or technological wonder. This intense emotion is basically wonder or amazement (vismaya), although it can be mixed with fear, pleasure, happiness, or pain, according to the circumstances and the type of revelation.

The period in which we live, the dawn of the 21st century, is particularly significant regarding the change of consciousness or paradigm shift, at many levels. Many have stated that as a human species, either we radically change our priorities and attitudes, or we will face some extreme situation of degradation and destruction, because the non-sustainable model of development that man has carried on for the last few centuries has reached a critical level. So from many sides and many perspectives, men and women of good will are trying to inspire and help this important passage in collective evolution, often compared to the birth of a new age consciousness. Vedic knowledge offers an immense wealth of theoretical and practical resources to facilitate this passage, both at individual and at collective level, because the evolution of consciousness is the central theme and the very purpose of Vedic civilization. Arjuna is experiencing here such a paradigm shift, as we can easily recognize from the symptoms described.

The word vismaya, "amazement", applies to one of the rasas (emotions, feelings) contemplated by the science of bhakti. Another similar word is adbhuta ("wonder", "amazement"). Adbhuta is one of the secondary or indirect rasas, together with hasya (amusement, laughter), virā (heroism, chivalry), karuna (compassion, pity), raudra (anger, fierceness), bibhatsa (disgust, repulsion), bhaya (fear). These emotions are indirect because they are not focused on Bhagavan (as the rasa visaya alambana or object of worship) but on the interactions of Bhagavan with other persons or on the attending circumstances. The devotee (as rasa asraya alambana) feels these sentiments, for example, while contemplating Krishna who is apparently in danger when fighting with the Kaliya serpent, or seeing another devotee who is in some difficult and painful situation. In this science of emotions, the perception of the situation (as in this example, the vision of the universal form) is the stimulus (uddipana) to the arousal of the mood or attraction (rati), that in the case described in this verse is called vismaya rati. From this feeling, the sentiment (rasa) is developed as adbhuta rasa, that fuels love for God (prema). The ensuing ecstasy (or peak of emotion) is called bhava, or "existence" of consciousness. The direct emotions or primary rasas are santa (quiet admiration), daya (service), sakhya (friendship), vatsalya (motherly/ fatherly affection) and madhurya (erotic), which in turn can be classified further into svakiya (legitimate, as in one's marital relationship) and parakiya (outside the marriage conventions). As some readers may not be familiar or comfortable with the concept of eroticism in the religious connection of the devotee with God, it will probably help to spend here a few more words on the subject. Erotic love is fundamentally different from lust, although externally it might be difficult to distinguish the two. Also, an external observer may have difficulties in understanding dharmic heroism, and may confuse it with ordinary anger. Dharmic heroism is that emotion of indignation and combative spirit that rises when we see injustice.

The difference between love and lust, and heroism and anger respectively is simple: the absence of ahankara and mamatva, the fundamental roots of ignorance, keeps the consciousness on the spiritual level of selflessness and true happiness, that benefits all the persons involved. Otherwise, the power of the emotion in itself is raw energy, neutral like electricity that can be channeled to create heat or cold, respectively in heaters and refrigerators. The results of the emotions will depend on how it is channeled by detached and pure consciousness, and illuminated by knowledge and wisdom (jnana and vijnana). Emotions are like powerful horses: they cannot be kept immobile all the time (repression is extremely dangerous), but they can certainly be tamed, bridled and directed in a sattvic way or even in a transcendental way.

The science of devotion is essentially the science of emotions directed towards God; in the Vedic system every natural function is respected as the perfect result of the supremely intelligent plan on which the entire universe is engineered. The secret consists in the proper utilization of each and every creation, according to time, place, circumstance, subject and object. Thus in the cultivation of a personal relationship with the Godhead, the existing set of human emotions is applied in a favorable manner (anuvrittya, as described in Bhagavata Purana 1.3.38) towards Bhagavan. Apparently negative emotions, such as disgust and fear, will be properly applied in the indirect form, to those factors that appear as opposed to the love for Bhagavan. The only emotions that are excluded from such application are the asuric transformations of basic emotions such as hatred, malice, envy, avarice, lust, etc, from which a devotee must become free as a preliminary requirement even before starting to engage in sadhana bhakti, what to speak of raganuga bhakti.

The most intense emotion of direct attraction and attachment is the erotic feeling, based on love (that is divine) and not on lust (that is asuric). And among the various hues of erotic love, the most intense is the secret love that is enhanced by some sort of difficulty, such as separation (vipralambha), that makes each encounter (sambhoga) even more thrilling. Of course, the same applies to the other primary rasas, such as vatsalya (as in Devaki and Yasoda), or sakhya (as in Sudama or other friends of Krishna who lived far from him). The experience of separation (vipralambha) greatly intensifies the feelings wherever it is applied.

This verse also describes the anubhava, the physical manifestation of bhava (ecstasy, or heightened state of consciousness or existence) that expresses the rasa (sentiment). The development of bhava is described as sattvika bhava (actual spiritual feeling), sanchari bhava (temporary manifestation of spiritual emotions), and finally sthayi bhava (permanent manifestation of spiritual emotions). Arjuna feels his hairs standing up (hrista roma), which is a typical symptom of ecstasy or strong emotion, caused by the agitation of the pranas in the body. We may remember that Arjuna manifested a similar strong feeling in verse 1.29, when he was shocked at the idea of the imminent fratricidal battle, in which practically all the valid kshatriyas of the planet were going to sacrifice their lives for the evil schemes of Duryodhana. At that time, Arjuna's feelings of amazement (adbhuta) were mixed with disgust (bibhatsa) and compassion (karuna). Readers may find useful to review the commentary to that verse.

More about rasas (emotions, feelings) in bhakti literature can be found for example in Rupa Gosvami's Bhakti rasamrita sindhu (4.2.1), or in Sanatana Gosvami's Hari bhakti vilasa (especially for direct and indirect application of rasas, verse 11.676).

Arjuna said, "O Lord, in your body I can see all the Devas and also all the various types of beings. I see Lord Brahma, sitting in the lotus flower, and the Rishis, and the divine Urugas."

The ecstatic feelings of nismaya and adbhuta that were overwhelming Arjuna did not stop him from expressing his appreciation of the wonderful vision. The previous verse used the word abhasata, "addressed", "started to speak", that belongs to the same etymological family of the word bhasa, "language". By this, we understand that Arjuna is expressing his ecstatic feelings through language, although we may easily imagine that his voice faltered and choked in the first words, to grow steadier and stronger as his glorification of the Lord successfully channeled his sentiments. Arjuna is addressing Krishna, but his first words are for our benefit only, as he describes what he is seeing (paśyami). We must always remember that Arjuna is not a conditioned soul or even an ordinary devotee, but he is an expansion of Krishna himself, and an eternal lila companion who descends with him to assist the divine mission of disseminating spiritual knowledge.

The vision described by Arjuna truly encompasses everything: not only all the devas, but also (tatha) all the different beings as all the different levels of consciousness experienced in this world (bhuta visesa). They are all contained within the body of the Lord as the universal form: once again, this shows that Paramatma, Purushottama, is omnipresent - simultaneously within the heart of each being and atom, and all around them, containing all the manifestations of existence. This confirms that all levels of existence and reality are contained together (sanghan) within the supreme Consciousness: once again, we are reminded that in the Vedic perspective, inert matter is nothing but the expansion of the consciousness of the living beings.

The highest level of embodied consciousness in this universe is Brahma, the first created being, of whom the various planets represent the physical body, measuring merely seven cubits, or spans of his own forearm (sapta vitasti, Bhagavata Purana, 10.14.1). The cubit is an ancient measure based on the inherent proportions of the human body; it could vary between 8 and 11 inches (20 to 28 cm), on which one could calculate a total body height of 4'8" to 6'6" (140 to 196 cm) about respectively.

The word brahmanam here has a long "a" in the second position and refers to Brahma. The word isa ("the Lord") mentioned immediately afterwards is sometimes translated as referred to Shiva, but it can also indicate Brahma himself, especially in this verse, where we see a clear reference of the lotus seat (kamala asana), that is characteristic of Brahma and not of Shiva. Some commentators explain that the lotus seat mentioned in this verse is mount Meru, the subtle (karana) body of the entire universe, the axis around which the cosmos revolves. The mountain itself is described as the stem of the lotus, along which the 14 planetary systems or dimensions are located. At the top of the Meru there is a 80,000 yojana square surface called Devaloka, topped by Brahmaloaka or Satyaloka. According to the Devi Bhagavata Purana, that is the residence of Devi; it is interesting to note that at times the figure of Brahma overlaps the figure and functions of the Mother Goddess, as Laksmidevi, too, is portrayed as sitting on the lotus. According to the orthodox vaidic brahmins, Subhadra in the Jagannatha Puri triad is Padmayoni Brahma. Under Satyaloka, there are the residences of Indra and the other chief Devas. Then mount Meru tapers down to a circumference of 20,000 yojanas, at the height of 40,000 yojanas above the sea (Garbhodaka). At that point the girth of the mountain expands again into a series of terraces; the first is the abode of the four great Kings respectively of the Nagas, Yakshas, Gandharvas and Kumbhandas, and the subsequent terraces are the residences of their subjects. Arjuna is seeing all these peoples (sanghan), as well as the Rishis, and everything else.

"I see your innumerable arms, bellies, faces, and eyes everywhere. There is no beginning, end nor middle to this unlimited form, o Lord of the universe, who are the universe itself."

Arjuna continues to describe his vision for our benefit, and addresses Krishna as visva isvara ("Lord of the universe") and visva rupa ("form of the universe"). As such, he has no beginning, middle or end, but he covers the entire span of Reality. It is said that God is the Sum total of Reality or existence, and that he is simultaneously and inconceivably one and distinct from his energies (shaktis) consisting in the various stages of the supreme Nature (para prakriti). Once we declare that someone or something is inconceivable (acintya), or beyond the capacity of the senses (adbhoksa), obviously any ensuing description or declaration must be considered only indicative and not exhaustive - especially those statements that appear to be affirming a sharp distinction or difference between the terms that have been preliminarily defined as "inconceivably one and distinct". Already Bhagavad gita (8.9) has clearly stated that God's form is inconceivable (acintya rupam). Similarly, Bhagavata Purana (8.5.26) states that the nature of Bhagavan is indefinable (aniruktam) and impossible to discuss (apratarkyam). Such statements must be kept in the proper perspective, otherwise we may end up in the foolish position of having to reject even the Bhagavata Purana itself and all the other scriptures that actually contain so many descriptions, definitions and discussions about God.

The important point here is that the Reality/ Nature of God is not so easy to understand or explain, and our efforts in engaging in such discussions must be supported by the utmost honesty, humility and open-mindedness. This is certainly not a place for sectarianism or materialistic motivations of any other kind. After clarifying this point, we may elaborate on the need of reconciliation between the two apparently different (or even opposite) perspectives called vivartavada and parinamavada. Originally, the propounders of such perspectives were striving to present mutually complementary visions of the same inconceivable Reality, and their public debates were aimed at clarifying misconceptions and facilitating the proper perception. However, especially in Kali yuga the genuine acharyas rarely find worthy successors that will continue to present their teachings in the proper way. Usually after one or two generations the original message already becomes distorted and tainted by the materialistic projections of unqualified followers who present themselves as the "empowered" (and often even "exclusive") representatives of the original acharya from whom they arrogantly and foolishly claim they derive their authority. Since such "descendants" usually control the materially impressive inheritance of temples, ashramas, etc, left by the original acharya, they are able to attract the innocent or ignorant masses and mislead them. The same problem is observed in the conventional academia, in which the transcendental Vedic knowledge and the teachings of the great acharyas are presented by non-realized professors who have no faith in the scriptures and no interest in actually realizing their true meaning, but stand on the material prestige of the institutions to which they are affiliated. Actually, the genuine Vedic system requires individual realization - guna and karma - for any qualification, material or spiritual. It never accepts "qualification by proxy", as by seminal descent, legal inheritance, vote, or rubber-stamped certification or any kind. Each and every individual must personally attain the required level of realization, otherwise he is not considered qualified. By honestly following this genuine and original method, we will happily overcome all the delusional hostility, dualism and sectarianism that prevent people from attaining the transcendental level of realization.

It is certainly possible to reconcile the two perspectives known as vivartavada and parinamavada, but only by the grace of the Mother Goddess Yogamaya, the cit shakti or para prakriti through which we can connect to the supreme Consciousness. Now, according to the conventional academic view, Shankara's vivartavada theory claims that the universe is not a transformation of God/ Brahman, but only an appearance/ illusion (maya); the universe is therefore adhyasa, a superimposition over the changeless Existence. This is summarized in the famous aphorism brahma satya jagan mithya ("Brahman is true, the universe is illusion"). On the other side, the Shakta perspective called parinamavada claims that God is simultaneously immanent and transcendent, as he transformed into the existence of the universe. In the words of the Chandogya Upanishad (6.2.3), eko bahu syat: "the One became many", through his own kriya shakti (the "will power"). But where is the contradiction? All misgivings can be dissolved instantly when we understand that Brahman is avyakta, "non-manifested", and only manifests a form - spiritual or material - through the agency of his shakti - spiritual or material. The same applies to the definition of nirguna, used to describe the Brahman, that is also called avikarya (changeless). Already in the very beginning of Bhagavad gita (2.25) the atman was described as avyakta (non-manifested), acintya (inconceivable), and avikarya (changeless). If we accept the fact that the jivatman or anu atman, that is so small and subject to the power of Maya, is changeless, inconceivable and non-manifested, we should also logically understand that the Brahman is changeless, inconceivable and non-manifested, too. The spiritual forms and qualities of Brahman are manifested by his internal energy, antaranga shakti, that is also called para prakriti or Yogamaya. The external energy, called bahiranga shakti, apara prakriti or Mahamaya, is in charge of the material manifestations.

But what is the real difference between Yogamaya and Mahamaya? Actually, they are one and the same person, just like Hari and Hara are one and the same person: only the functions (or actions, which are a characteristic of prakriti) are different. We have already elaborated on this topic within the commentary to verse 7.7, where we also quoted the famous Invocation at the beginning of the Upanishads of the Sukla Yajur Veda. including the Isa Upanishad: om purnam adah purnam idam, purnat purnam udacyate, purnasya purnam adayah, purnam eva avasisyate, "Each and every emanation of God is complete and perfect in itself, yet the Supreme remains complete and perfect (even after emanating them)". God does not lose his separate existence in his many expansions: on the transcendental level of eternal existence, one minus one is still one.

Vedanta sutra (2.1.14) declares: tad ananyatvam arambhana sabdadibhyah, "the differentiation in the Supreme began by sound etc", and Chandogya Upanishad (6.1.4) adds, vacarambhanam vikaro namadheyam, "transformation is done through the giving of names". The complete quote of the Chandogya Upanishad verse is as follows: yatha saumy ekena mrt pindena sarvam, mrimayam vijnatam syad vacarambhanam, vikaro namadheyam, mrityikety eva satyam, "From the same one clay all the earthen pots are originated. The transformations of clay/ earth are known through the process of giving names (to objects), that begins the differentiation between manifestations. However, the earth/ clay is the real substance."

kirīṭinam: of crowns; gadinam: of maces; cakrinam: of discs; ca: and; tejah rasim: the powerful radiance; sarvataḥ: everywhere; dīpti mantam: illuminating/ radiating light; paśyāmi: I see; tvam: you; durnirīkṣyam: difficult to look at; samantat: all encompassing; dīpta: luminous; anala: fire; arka: the sun; dyutim: the rays; aprameyam: immeasurable.

This description of the virata rupa continues to give us the opportunity to better understand the concept of shakti and shaktiman ("energy" and "he who has the energy"), the universe and the Lord of the universe. Another important quote that can help us in understanding the process of transformation/ creation to reconcile the various perspectives is from Vishnu Purana (1.3.2): saktayah sarva bhavanam, acintya jnana gocarah, yato 'to brahmanas tas tu, sargadya bhava saktayah, bhavanti tapatam srestha, pavakasya yathosnata. "The energies in all creations are inconceivable for the human capacity of knowledge. They emanate from Brahman, but manifest the creation and all the rest. Such creative energies are comparable to the heat emanating from fire."

This is precisely the meaning of the word tejah rasim, "the radiance of power", that expands everywhere (samantat). Like a fire produces heat, light, sparkles, and even smoke, the Supreme Consciousness has many apparently different energies (parasya shaktir vividhaiṇa sruyate, svabhariki jnana bala kriya ca, Svetasvatara Upanishad, 6.8). Such energies have many names - Sri, Bhu, Lila, Hladini, Bhakti, Murti, Vidyavidya, Maya, Samvit, Sandhini, Kriya, Kanti, Kirti, Tusti, Gir, Pusti, Satya, Jnana, Jaya, Utkarshini, Vimala, Yogamaya, Prahvi, Isana, Ila, Anugraha and so on - but they are all manifestation of the one supreme energy, the cit shakti, called para prakriti, or daivi maya. By taking shelter in this daivi prakriti, the mahatmas become able to understand the mystery of the acintya bhedabhedata tattva and to properly serve God: mahatmanas tu mam partha daivim prakritim asritah, bhajanty ananya-manaso jnatva bhutadim arjyam, "However, o son of Pritha (Arjuna), the great souls take shelter in the divine nature and worship/ serve me with undivided attention, knowing that I am the inexhaustible origin of everything/ all beings" (9.13).

Bhagavata Purana (3.28.40) also confirms the example of fire: yatholmukad vishpulingad, dhumad vapi sva sambhavat, apy atmattrenabbhimatad, yathagnih prithag ulmukat, "Fire is distinct from the blazing flames, from the sparks and from the smoke, although all these are intimately connected by nature and produced from the fire itself."

The concept of the jivatmas as sparks of the great fire of Bhagavan/ Brahman is further confirmed by Brihad aranyaka Upanishad (2.1.20): yathagneh ksudra visphulinga, "just as tiny sparks of fire fly in all directions", and Isa Upanishad (7): yasmin sarvani bhutany, atmaivabhad vijanatah, tatra ko mohah kah soka, ekatvam anupasyatah, "One who knows that all these beings/ existences are created by and from the atman, will not be overcome by illusion or anxiety, because he correctly sees that everything is one".

We have also mentioned this in commentaries to verses 2.12, 2.23, 7.5, 7.7, and will do again in verse 15.2, discussing of the original transcendental light of Brahman (jyoti) that shines through the sun, the moon and the fire in this universe. The important concept of tejas has also been discussed in the commentaries to verses 7.9 and 10.36, where we have quoted the famous verse from Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad (1.3.28): asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrityor ma amritam gamaya, "from what is temporary lead me to what is eternal, from darkness lead me to the light, from death lead me to eternal life".

This dazzling light (jyoti, tejas, etc) of the Brahman constitutes only the rays, or the emanations, from the Supreme Personality of Godhead, manifesting his majestic glories (aishvarya vibhuti). However, such radiance is difficult to contemplate (durnirīkṣyam) for the embodied souls; this will be clearly stated in verse 12.5 (kleso 'dhikataras tesham avyaktasakta-cetasam, avyakta hi gatir dukkham devavadbhir avapyate). Therefore, Isa Upanishad (15) prays, hiraṇmayena patrena, satyasyapibitam mukham, tat tvam pusann apavruṇu, satya dharmaya dristaye, "O sustainer (of life), the face of Truth is covered by a golden veil. Please remove it, to show yourself to the true dharma (a devotee who is dedicated to truth and therefore personifies dharma)".

tvam: you; akṣaram: eternal; paramam: supreme; veditavyam: to be known; tvam: you; asya: of this; viśvasya: of the universe; param: supreme; nidhanam: the foundation; tvam: you; avyayaḥ: imperishable; sasvata dharma: eternal dharma; gopta: protector; sanatanah: eternal; tvam: you; puruṣah: the Purusha; matah me: my belief.

"I believe you are the imperishable Reality, the supreme object of knowledge, the supreme foundation of this universe, the protector of the eternal unchangeable dharma. You are the eternal Purusha."

Arjuna's words are turning from the description of his vision and penetrating its meaning. The particular metric of these verses is beautifully suited to express the wonder, power and majesty of the universal form, and the ecstatic feelings that a devotee experiences in its presence.

The word aksharam, "eternal", is often used to indicate the sacred syllable om, that is the sound manifestation of Brahman, the akshara tattva, and in the specific expression of this verse (aksharam paramam veditaryam) it declares that the universal form, the eternal Purusha, Krishna, is the Param Brahman, the origin and the entire expanse of Vedic knowledge. Yet, here Arjuna directly connects this mind-blowing realization with the word tvam, "you", that is exquisitely personal. There is nothing "impersonal" in Brahman: one who has attained the correct realization experiences rather an "over-personal" or "trans-personal" existence, containing unlimited personalities at the same time. This was already clearly confirmed in verse 7.24: avyaktam vyaktim apannam manyante mam abuddhayah, param bhavam ajananto mamanyayam anuttamam, "Those who are not intelligent believe that the non-manifested has evolved by becoming manifest. They do not know my supreme existence/ nature as the highest imperishable (reality)."

When Arjuna repeatedly addresses the universal form as "you", he is speaking directly to the supreme Personality of God, that includes and contains all other personalities. Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.9) states: sa karanam karana adbhira adbhira na casya kascijanita na ca adbhira, "The supreme Personality is the cause of all causes, and there is nothing and no one who is superior to him or greater than him". This concept is also expressed in this verse by the words visvasya param nidhanam, "the supreme foundation and place of dissolution of the universe". Those who see a contradiction in these verses must be blinded by the limitations of gross material bodily identification, because the knowledge of Atman/ Brahman is very clear and consistent. This is the supreme knowledge, the supreme consciousness, that we all seek in our evolutionary journey, and that can truly change our life for the better. God is the eternal Purusha (sanatana purusha), but he kindly descends into the world among us (4.8) for the purpose of disseminating this knowledge and destroying the darkness of ignorance (10.11, jnana dipena). This is the meaning of the expression anyaya sasvata dharma gopta, "the imperishable protector of the eternal principles of religion".

The entire text of the Bhagavad gita is an amazingly skillful and beautiful journey into the transcendental knowledge. From the first chapter (arjuna visada yoga, the yoga of Arjuna's grief) the stage is set to present the perfect opportunity for the analysis of the human condition (sankhya yoga, the yoga of enumeration) and the indications on how to begin one's evolution through wise choices and proper engagement (karma yoga, the yoga of action). A sincere seeker who passed the preliminary test of selfless engagement in duty and service will be introduced to the fundamental knowledge on the purpose of life (jnana yoga, the yoga of knowledge) and to the real meaning of detachment (sannyasa yoga, the yoga of renunciation). From this level, the sadhaka becomes totally dedicated to spiritual evolution (dhyana yoga, the yoga of meditation), (vijnana yoga, the yoga of applied knowledge), (taraka brahma yoga, the yoga of liberating spiritual existence). With the 9th chapter, the student enters in the contemplation of the transcendental Personality of God (raja guhya yoga, the yoga of the supreme secret), that is not limited by time and space like the embodied jivatmas we meet every day. To expand this understanding, Bhagavad gita offers us the best meditation exercise (vibhuti yoga, the yoga of powers), (visva rupa darsana yoga, the yoga of contemplation of the universal form), (bhakti yoga, the yoga of devotion). The trained mind of the sadhaka becomes increasingly able to contemplate the idea of God as simultaneously immanent and transcendent, personal and above-personal, power and powerful, same and different from the individual jivatman.

Each concept is presented gradually, along the logical thread of conversation, with questions and answers, and examined under different perspectives, in what could appear as repetitions but only to a superficial and distracted mind. In fact, there is no imperfection in Bhagavad gita: its teachings are expressed in a wonderfully consistent way, and made extremely easy to understand for a sincere student. The 11th and 12th chapters are developing the foundations for the all important question of the oneness and difference of God and the world in regard to the cultivation of love and devotion towards the supreme Personality of God. Then in chapter 13 the issue will be explored fully (prakriti-purusha-viveka yoga, the yoga of understanding nature as distinct from the personal principle). The last chapters of Bhagavad gita supply the missing links that are required to bring the transcendental knowledge into practice, in our daily life in the big and small choices. In order to attain moksha (in the 18th chapter) we need to transcend the material gunas, and that is precisely what the 14th, 16th, 17th chapters are all about (guna traya vibhaga yoga, the yoga of differentiating between the gunas), (daivasura sampad vibhaga yoga, the yoga of differentiating between the characteristics of the divine and the demoniac personalities), (sraddha traya vibhaga yoga, the yoga of differentiating between the three forms of faith). In between these practical instructions, the brief 15th chapter shines to remind us about the ultimate goal (purushottama yoga, the yoga of the Supreme Person).

anadi: without beginning; madhya: middle; antam: end; ananta viryam: infinite prowess; ananta bahum: infinite arms; śasi: the moon; surya: the sun; netram: eyes; paśyami: I see; tvam: you; dīpta: blazing; huta: flames of fire; vaktram: mouth/ face; sva tejas: (your) own radiance; visvam: universe; idam: this; tapantam: heating/ scorching.

"Without beginning, middle or end, your prowess is unlimited. Your arms are innumerable, and your eyes are the Sun and the Moon. I can see your face blazing with flames of fire from your own radiance, scorching the entire universe."

The first word of the verse, anadi, "without beginning", is strictly connected to the other two parts of the three word compound (adi, madhya, antam) to which the privative "a" is applied. Arjuna's words in this verse are also found in other previous verses, but this repetition is not a literary flaw; rather, it reinforces the emotion and the importance of the revelation he is expressing. In Vedic tradition, when a statement is repeated (usually 3 times) it is called tri satya, "three times true". See for example in Narada bhakti sutra (81), tri satyasya bhaktir eva gariyasi, bhaktir eva gariyasi, "bhakti is most glorious: this is tri satya, fully established truth", or the famous declaration by Chaitanya, harer nama harer nama harer namaiva kevalam, kalau nasy eva nasy eva nasy eva gatir anyatha, "The Name of Hari, the Name of Hari, the Name of Hari only. In the age of Kali there is no other way, there is no other way, there is no other way." Repetition is considered useful to facilitate understanding and memorization; for example it is said that all shastras should be studied at least 3 times, as exemplified by Brahma himself (Bhagavata Purana, 2.2.34). The practice of japa yajna is eminently based on the repetition of the same mantra for a prescribed number of times, so that the impression created by the contact with the sacred Names can sink deeply into the mind and the heart. Also on the natural platform, we see that we all tend to express our happiness, surprise or love by repeating the name of a loved one or some particular word - as this gives us great happiness. Alliteration, that is simply the repetition of the same sound or similar sounds in different words within a sentence - is a popular poetic figure in several languages, and many songs and poems contain a refrain that is purposefully repeated to stress the most important concepts that are to be expressed. In this way, we see that Arjuna is particularly impressed by the infinity and by the radiance of the visva rupa, two characteristics that are certainly extraordinary in this world and connected universally to the divine nature.

The expression ananta virya, "unlimited prowess", refers to the heroic power of warriors, the charisma of great leaders, and is a fitting tribute to Krishna from one of the greatest kshatriya of his times. Also the expression ananta bahum ("endless/ innumerable arms") reinforces this figure; in this regard just consider how many times in the conversation of the Bhagavad gita Krishna and Arjuna have called each other maha babo, "of powerful arms".

After the homage from the kshatriya, comes the appreciation that a brahmana could express: dipta hutasya vaktram, "whose mouth is the blazing sacred fire of the agni hotra". Hotra is a technical definition to indicate all those ritual sacrifices that require oblations into the sacred fire (abutis), generally consisting of clarified butter (ghi) and grains. Still today, this particular type of Vedic ritual remains the most popular, if not the only known and practiced form of traditional sacrifice ceremony among Hindus. Again we find here the image of the immense cosmic fire that radiates and heats the entire universe, but this time it is described as a sacred fire, the supreme homa in which all actions and all objects are sacrificed, knowingly or unknowingly.

Here are some relevant quotes from other verses in Bhagavad gita:

yajnarthat karmano 'nyatra loko 'yam karma-bandhanah, tad-artham karma kaunteya mukta-sangah samacara, "Actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage (and further) actions. Therefore, o son of Kunti, you should perform your activities for that (purpose of sacrifice), remaining free from (material) association." (3.9)

bhoktaram yajna-tapasam sarva-loka-mahesvaram, subridam sarva-bhutanam jnatva mam santim ricchati, "(One who) knows me as the enjoyer/ beneficiary of yajna (sacrifice) and tapas (austerity), the great Lord of all the worlds /all people, and the dearest friend of all beings, attains peace." (5.29)

aham hi sarva-yajnanam bhokta ca prabhu eva ca, na tu mam abhijananti tattvenatas cyavanti te, "I am the Lord and beneficiary of all yajnas. Those who do not understand my tattva will have to take birth again." (9.24)

ye yatha mam prapadyante tams tathaiva bhajamy aham, mama vartmanuvartante manushyah partha sarvasah, "O Partha, as much as they surrender to me, in the same way I reciprocate with them. All human beings follow my path." (4.11)

daivam evapare yajnam yoginah paryupasate, brahmagnav apare yajnam yajnenainopajuhvati, "Some yogis perform the yajna by perfectly worshiping the devas, others perform sacrifice in the fire of Transcendence by offering sacrifice itself (as sacred action) as an oblation." (4.25)

srotradinindriyany anye samyamagnishu juhvati, sabdadin vishayan anya indriyagnishu juhvati, "Others offer (the activities of) the senses, such as the hearing etc, in the fire of regulated activity, others offer the objects (of the senses) such as the sound etc in the fire of the senses as an oblation." (4.26)

sarvanindriya-karmani prana-karmani capare, atma-samyama-yogagnau juhvati jnana-dipite, "Others offer all the activities of all the senses and the activities of the prana, and the oblation is constituted by the control of the self in the fire of yoga in the light of knowledge." (4.27)

dravya-yajnas tapo-yajna yoga-yajnas tathapare, svadhyaya-jnana-yajnas ca yatayah samsita-vratah, "Others sacrifice their wealth, or perform austerities as a sacrifice, or engage in yoga as an act of sacrifice, or perform sacrifice by the study of the scriptures and the cultivation of knowledge, or by engaging in strict vows." (4.28)

apane juhvati pranam prane 'panam tathapare, pranapana-gati ruddhva pranayama-parayanah, "Others sacrifice the apana in the prana, and the prana in the apana, controlling both prana and apana: this method is called pranayama." (4.29)

apare niyataharah pranam praneshu juhvati, sarve 'py ete yajna-vido yajna-kshapita-kalmashah, "Others sacrifice the prana into the pranas by fasting/ suspending breath. However, all these are known as acts of sacrifice, that cleanse (the person from) the negative reactions (of actions)/ one who knows about these sacrifices, purifies his negative reactions through the power of the sacrifice (itself)." (4.30)

In this regard, it is very interesting to note the description of the development of the virata rupa offered in Bhagavata Purana (3.26.52-72), from the conception as an egg to the birth from the amniotic waters of the Garbhodaka. This series of verses ends with the recommendation to meditate on the paramatma as present in this very body yet simultaneously distinct from it. Also, in

Bhagavata Purana (3.25.32) we learn from Kapila that the subtle senses of the human body are non-different from the devas that govern/ represent them (devanam guna linganam).

"From the sky to the earth and in between/ and the outer space, everything is pervaded by you alone in all the directions. O great Atman, by contemplating this amazing and terrifying form of yours, the three planetary systems are shaken."

Dyau and Prithivi are the Sky and Earth, the primeval Father and Mother of the world of human beings, in all cultures. The sky above us is the support for the Sun, the Moon and all the stars; it supplies light, rain, heat, and the coolness of the clouds. Beyond the planet's atmosphere, the sky expands unlimitedly, and includes and supports innumerable planets and other celestial bodies. Yet, the sky is ever unchanged, free, and untouched by all the manifestations we can see. Its color is a temporary superimposition due to atmospheric gases and particles of various elements, as well as the optical effects of the reflection or refraction of the light. The name dyau is the origin of the Greek name Zeus (referred to the Father of all the Gods) and the Latin Deus, normally translated as "God". Mother Earth is the womb from which all creatures rise, by which they are nurtured, and to which all creatures return in the end. She gives forms, and in fact she is the constituent of all forms - supporting, filling and binding the other gross elements (water, air, fire, ether). The expression dyau a-pṛthivyoh idam antaram includes all directions - space, earth, and "in between". This antaram ("in between") is the antariksha, the outer space of our solar system, or also the "intermediate" space or subtle dimensions that cannot be observed with our ordinary eyes, and where we usually travel between incarnations. This "intermediate" dimension is described in detail in the Garuda Purana. It is the same territory called Bardo Thodol in the famous Tibetan Book of the Dead, and "afterworld" in many cultures, including the ancient Egyptian, from which we have also inherited a version of the Book of the Dead. According to Vedic tradition, there are 10 directions in the universe; thus besides the 2-dimensional north, south, east and west, and the attendant north-east, north-west, south-east and south-west, we introduce the 3-dimensional perception with the up and down, or above and below. The loka trayam, "three planetary systems" mentioned in this verse are the higher planets of the devas and upadevas, the intermediate planet Earth, and the lower planets. Other commentators mention these lokas as bhu, bhuvah, svah, that correspond to the physical, subtle and causal dimensions.

The definition ugra, "fierce", "terrifying", "destructive", "angry", is normally used to refer to the fierce aspect of a Deity or Personality of God, while the same Personality in his/ her benevolent, kind, and sweet aspect is called saumya or bhadra. This does not mean that there are evil Deities and benevolent Deities: the Personality of God contains both aspects, and manifests them in different situations. Even the sweetest Personalities of God can manifest a terrifying attitude in battle against the asuras, while they will be compassionate and loving towards the devotees and the good people. What is this terrifying form that is scaring all the inhabitants of the universe? It is Time, Kala.

svastītyuktvā maharṣisiddhasaṅghāḥ stuvanti tvāṁ stutibhiḥ puṣkalābhiḥ ॥ 11-21 ॥

amī: all these; hi: indeed; tvam: you; sura sanghah: the hosts of suras; visanti: enter; kecit: some of whom; bhitah: fearful; pranjalayah: with folded hands; grinanti: offer prayers; svasti: may everything be well; iti: thus; uktva: saying; maha risib: the great Rishis; siddbah: the Siddhas; sanghah: the hosts; stuvanti: they pray/ glorify; tvam: you; stutibhiḥ: by prayers; puskalabhiḥ: by Vedic hymns.

"All of these hosts of Devas are entering into you. Some of them, terrified, offer prayers with folded hands, invoking auspiciousness. The crowds of the great Rishis and Siddhas sing your glories by chanting the Vedic hymns."

Arjuna continues here to describe the vision of the visva rupa. He sees the hosts of devas entering the fearsome cosmic form as its limbs and functional parts: the devas are personifications of the archetypal and elemental functions and components of the universe, and as such they must take their sacred job very seriously. This attitude is confirmed by Taittiriya Upanishad (2.8.1), bhisasmad natah parate, bhisat eti suryah, bhisasmad agnis cendras ca, mṛtyur dharati panchamah, "Out of fear of him the wind blows, the sun shines, Agni and Indra do their jobs, and the five forms of death run around (on their errands)."

Bhagavata Purana also repeats the same concept almost identically in two verses from 3rd canto (3.25.42 and 3.29.40): mad bhayat vati vato 'yam, suryas tapati mad bhayat, varsatindro dahaty agnir, mṛtyus carati mad bhayat/ yad bhavati vati vato 'yam, suryas tapati yad bhavat, yad bhayat varsate devo, bha gano bhati yad bhayat.

However, we need to properly understand what the shastra mean by "fear" in this regard. It is not the senseless panic that oppressed servants feel when they approach a tyrannical and cruel ruler, who vents his anger and frustration at random. The fear the devas experience is like the emotion that rises in the minds and hearts of expert electricians when they approach the very high voltage transmission lines to do their work - they know they are dealing with an immense power that could instantly destroy them if they behave carelessly, so they must be extremely attentive and avoid all mistakes. So more than "fear", we could describe it as awe and respect, and complete alertness and concentration to engage in an important work for the benefit of the entire universe. This is why they chant the invocation "svasti" ("auspiciousness") while contemplating the universal form and engaging within it, while the Rishis and Siddhas support and encourage them by singing the Vedic hymns. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that every time we perform the agnihotra yajna and chant the Vedic mantras in honor of the devas, we are joining the hosts of the Rishis and Siddhas who perform the very same activities to support and encourage the mission of the devas. In this way, civilized human beings that belong to the category of dvijas ("twice born") are also participating directly to the proper functioning of the universal administration, and thus they are also called suras.

Other commentators have explained that ami sura sangah ("all these hosts of virtuous people") can also refer to the warriors that were assembled on the battlefield with the purpose of defending dharma, and that before the fighting are praying God for auspiciousness and dedicating their work and self-sacrifice for the benefit of the world. In this line of translation, the Maharishis and Siddhas are offering their blessings and invoking auspiciousness while watching the momentous battle at Kurukshetra. The Vedic hymns they are singing are certainly from the original collections called sambhitas - Rg, Yajur, and especially Sama Veda; these are to be chanted or sung in all auspicious occasions, and also in difficult times to invoke auspiciousness. By vibrating the śabda brahman ("spiritual sound vibration"), the Rishis and their followers became intimately connected to the supreme Consciousness and harmonize themselves with it. Unfortunately, in Kali yuga it is practically impossible to find someone who is actually able to chant or sing such mantras in the correct way, therefore we should choose the humbler but much simpler and safer option of chanting or singing the holy Names of God, that are non-different from the traditional original Vedic hymns, and actually pack much more spiritual power because they are more essential and concentrated. The word svasti, "may everything be auspicious", is not to be confused with the similar blessing santi, "may everything be peaceful".

"The Rudras, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Sadhyas, the Visvedevas, the Asvinis, the Marutas, the Usmapas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Asuras, the Siddhas - all these crowds are contemplating you in amazement."

All the various categories of devas - administrators of the universe - are amazed, contemplating the immense and powerful visva rūpa of which they are parts and parcels. In previous commentaries (10.21, 10.23, 10.26, 11.6) we have discussed about most of the categories of suras or devas mentioned in this verse, explaining how they are actually personifications of elemental energies in the cosmos. For example, the Vasus are water, the pole star, the moon, earth, wind, fire, dawn and space/ radiance.

The collective name Visvedeva ("all the devas") applies to a broad category of second-tier administrators, that are remembered as a class as descendants of Visva, one of the consorts of Yamaraja. The Sadhyas, too, are a class of similar cosmic officers, considered the descendants of Sadhya, another of the consorts of Yamaraja. In this verse these two categories of devas are mentioned together with the Usmapas ("who eat hot food"), another class of Pitris or devas residing on the planet of Yamaraja.

This particular information offers the opportunity to elaborate on the difference between the ritual ceremonies offered to the Pitris and the ordinary cult of the ancestors - or worship of the dead - that is found in all natural/ primitive cultures and religions. It is perfectly natural for materially identified people to feel the desire to pay homage and offer something to the departed spirits of their family members, relatives and friends. Some bring flowers and light a candle at a tomb in a cemetery, others do the same thing to a portrait they keep at home, but the idea is the same: they remember the dead, feel their absence or subtle presence, and wish to please them - out of affection, compassion or sometimes even fear.

The respectful and loving offering of pleasing articles - such as flowers, garlands, lamps etc - is called "worship" in the Vedic/ Hindu tradition, and is normally offered not only to God, but also to any person or even object that is considered worthy of respect and recognition. Sometimes ignorant people who do not understand this approach end up criticizing Hindus for "worshipping cows" or "worshipping trees", when they see the ritual ceremonies in which people offer their appreciation, respect and affection to these important elements of their lives. The same spirit of appreciation is expressed in the formal veneration or worship of sacred books, sacred rivers, or sacred images of various types, as well as to one's respected elders - such as parents - including the deceased ones.

However, the Pitris are not simply "dead people". Not all those who die become Pitris: only those great souls who attained the realization of Brahman (brahma-vido janah), perfectly performed all their duties and lived strictly according to dharma during their opportunity in the human form of life. This seriously restricts the number of likely candidates even among the descendants of the most prominent gotras among the contemporary "high caste" Hindu brahmins. We have discussed about this point already in the commentaries to verses 8.24 and 8.25, that described the uttarayana and dakshinayana paths into the subtle dimension at the time of death. The Pitris drink the soma rasa with the devas, help the confused departed souls and even astral travelers and shamans by giving counseling and guidance, and gather in assembly to discuss the events of the universe and how they can influence the people on earth in a positive way. They also have the power to visit earth in various shapes - as birds, as human beings etc - to test human beings and offer them blessings or curses, but they never engage directly in any conflict, either between human beings or between devas and asuras. At the end of their allotted 10,000 years, they return to this earthly dimension to take a new material body and complete their service to the Lord and mankind by spreading their wisdom and knowledge, then they get another opportunity to leave the material dimension and attain Brahman.

The word usmapah mentioned in this verse is generally interpreted as one particular class of Pitris, who "eat hot food". This meaning can apply to the fact that the food offerings presented to the Pitris should be cooked on the spot; this interpretation is supported by the fact that the wife of the karta, or head of the family, is the one who is in charge of cooking the pinda (food offerings) for the Pitris, and her husband immediately presents the food in the ceremonial ritual.

Another meaning could refer to the fact that the feast of food cooked on the occasion of the śraddha ceremonies should be consumed only by truly qualified brahmanas, who can withstand the "heat" and burn the negativities connected to the departed souls by eating their food without being contaminated by it. Where it is not possible to find such qualified brahmanas, the food cooked for the Pitris should be fed to the birds, who are often considered messengers from other dimensions.

rupam: the form; mahat: very great/ universal; te: your; bahur: many; vaktra: faces; netram: eyes; maha babo: o mighty armed one; bahur: many; bahur: many; urur: thighs; padam: feet; bahur: many; udaram: bellies; bahu damstra: many teeth; karalam: fierce; dristva: seeing; lokah: all the people; pranyathitah: shaken; tatha: as well as; aham: I (am).

"O mighty Lord, seeing this immense form of yours, with so many faces and eyes, legs, feet, bellies and teeth, everyone is shaken - including me."

The words pranyathitah ("agitated") and karalam ("scary") express the overwhelming feelings of amazement and fear (or awe) that everyone experiences in the contemplation of the immense universal form, that is so powerful and radiant.

The expression rupam mahat can be connected to the definitions of mahat tattva or pradhana, that designate the total aggregate of the material elements prior to the manifestation of the various bodies and objects in the universe. Usually these are considered direct forms of Shakti, Nature, rather than manifestations of the Purusha, but in this case we see that the focus of the teachings of Bhagavad gita has moved to the oneness between Shakti and Shaktiman. There is a popular image in traditional iconography that illustrates this concept. It is the ardhanarisvara form, usually depicting Shiva and Shakti: literally half male and half female (ardha = half, nari = woman, isvara = Lord). There are also other similar images about Radha and Krishna, as two bodies united in a tight embrace, with two arms (one Krishna's and one Radha's) holding the flute.

Here lies the greatest mystery of creation, both at the spiritual and at the material level: the acintya bheda abheda tattva perspective (darshana) explains that purusha and prakriti are inconceivably one and different. Its practical application is demonstrated in the person of Chaitanya, the great teacher who propagated the sankirtana movement. Chaitanya is described by his agiographers and followers as the "combined form of Radha and Krishna" and in fact although he appeared in a male body, he developed the emotional sentiments called parakiya srngara mahabhava that are the exclusive characteristic of Radha in her love for Krishna. It is the most intense erotic love, but it is solely directed to Krishna as the only real male in all the material and spiritual universes; therefore Chaitanya's intense erotic emotions have nothing to do with the ordinary lust between conditioned souls - either heterosexual or homosexual.

To all effects, Chaitanya is Radha, and suitably enough, he is Krishna as well, although Krishna's presence in Chaitanya's body is eclipsed by the overwhelming emotions of Radha and therefore appears to be absent, triggering the intense feelings of separation (vipralambha). How can this be? Only through Yogamaya, the "illusion" that enables the union between God and Shakti (especially in the form of the tatastha shakti, or the individual jivatmans). For this reason, the sadhaka needs to engage in the process of Yoga, that is amazingly described in Bhagavad gita. Its explanation in a nutshell is found in verse 9.13: mahatmanas tu mam partha daivim prakritim asritah, bhajanty ananya-manaso jnatva bhutadim ayyayam, "However, o son of Pritha (Arjuna), the great souls take shelter in the divine nature and worship/ serve me with undivided attention, knowing that I am the inexhaustible origin of everything/ all beings."

All we have to do is to take shelter in Yogamaya, the divine prakriti called cit shakti, bladini shakti and Bhakti Devi, and engage sincerely and lovingly in the service of the Supreme. The first step consists in understanding that material consciousness is limited and unable to fulfill our deepest thirst for happiness. Then we must realize our own transcendental identity (as purusha) and nature (as prakriti) as the atman, that is male and female at the same time. We must overcome the identification with the gross material body in which we travel around, as clearly explained by Krishna in the 2nd chapter of Bhagavad gita.

This is because ordinary conditioned souls who are still on the material platform of gross material bodily identification will never be able to actually understand and appreciate the spiritual activities of Bhagavan. To overcome this delusional bodily identification, we need to surrender to the Divine: daiṁi hy esa guṇa-mayī mama māya duratyaya, mam eva ye prapadyante mayam etam taranti te, "This divine energy of mine, manifesting as the three gunas, is very difficult to overcome but those who take shelter in me (can) cross over this illusion." (7.14).

Prakṛiti ("Nature") is the inherent potency of Brahman, and also manifests in the Atman. She is described as sat, "existence", cit, "awareness" and ananda, "happiness". But she is also rūpa, "form", śakti, "power", vidyā, "knowledge", buddhi, "intelligence", trishṇa, "aspiration", tushti, "satisfaction", kṣanti, "benevolence", dāya, "generosity", śanti, "peace", jala, "water" and mātri, "the Mother". (Dēvi mahatmya, 5.9-80).

Delusional conditioned souls, hopelessly enslaved by the shackles of abankara and māmatva, only take shelter in their ego and endless desires: they never take shelter in Māya, but they try to dominate and possess her. Foolish and confused people believe they can "conquer the witch Māya" - usually by insulting Nature and especially the feminine form that represents it - but that is impossible: they will just get beaten more and more severely. The only way to cross the ocean of the material gunas and finally land on the beach of transcendence, beyond the Virāja river, is to actually surrender to the Divine Mother - Tarini, Vidyā, Bhakti, Buddhi, Vedamata, Yogamāya - and take shelter in her. She is the only one who can take us across.

"O Vishnu, I feel shaken and I have lost my mental balance and peace, looking at this (immense) radiance of yours, of so many colors, reaching up to touch the sky, with immense gaping mouths and fierce glowing eyes."

Arjuna recognizes that the universal form (the virata puruṣa) is Vishnu himself, the transcendental non-manifested existence (Brahman) that appears as this world in this world. In the previous verse, he has also recognized Krishna as Vishnu, the visva rūpa and visva īśvara, and in the subsequent verses he will beg forgiveness for his informal behavior within their friendly relationship.

The direct perception of the meditation recommended by Krishna is a shocking realization, required to trigger the paradigm shift in consciousness towards the level of Transcendence, but it is not meant to be a constant focus. Embodied beings, who must work through the limited set of senses (including the mind, called the 6th sense) afforded by a material body, cannot concentrate on such a vision for a long time. To understand this point, we can offer the example of a high voltage power-line, into which we can plug our machinery to get it kick-started: if we tried to keep it connected to that voltage, our system would quickly burn out. Like a defibrillator (resuscitation electrical paddle) discharge, it must be maintained only as long as strictly required to bring the proper effect on our system, otherwise it will damage us.

After living the experience described here by Arjuna, many (called "impersonalists") remain engaged in yoga on the level of jñāna: ye tv akṣharam anirdesyam anyaktam paryupāsate, sarvatra-gam acintyam ca kuta-stham acalam dbruvam/ sanniyamyendriya-gramam sarvatra sama-buddhayah, te prapnuvanti mam eva sarva-bhuta-bite rataḥ, "Those who worship me correctly and sincerely as the akṣhara (Brahman/ Omkara), indescribable, non-manifested, all-pervading, inconceivable, unchanging, never moving and eternal Existence, will achieve me by controlling their senses, remaining equally disposed to all, and working for the benefit of all beings." (12.3-4) This is confirmed in verse 12.5: kleso 'dhikataras tesham anyaktasakta-cetasam, anyakta hi gatir duḥkham devavadbhir avapyate, "For the embodied beings it is very difficult to make progress if they remain mentally attached to the non-manifested (anyakta)".

To avoid or minimize such difficulties we must develop bhakti, devotion to the Personality of God: Bhagavad gita offers plenty of valuable teachings about bhakti, what it is, and how to engage in it. Just as Krishna has demonstrated the visva rūpa after describing it to Arjuna, in the next verses Krishna will manifest his intimate and sweet form, the natural object of love and devotion for all the jīvas. The overwhelming experience of Brahman realization will leave its permanent effects on our consciousness, and we will truly be able to see the intimate human-like form of God as he really is (neti tattvataḥ, 4.9, 7.3, 10.7, 18.55).

दंष्ट्राकरालानि च ते मुखानि दृष्ट्वैव कालानलसन्निभानि ।

daṁṣṭrākarālāni ca te mukhāni dr̥ṣṭvaiva kālānalasannibhāni ।

दिशो न जाने न लभे च शर्म प्रसीद देवेश जगन्निवास ॥ ११-२५ ॥

diśo na jāne na labhe ca śarma prasīda deveśa jagannivāsa ॥ 11-25 ॥

daṁstra: teeth/ fangs; karālāni: fierce; ca: and; te: your; mukhāni: (many) faces; dṛiṣṭva: seeing; eva: certainly; kala: time; anala: the fire; sannibhāni: looking like/ similar to; disaḥ: the directions; na: not; jane: I know; na: not; labhe: I can get; ca: and; śarma: grace; prasīda: be pleased/ placated; deva īśa: o Lord of the Gods; jagat nivāsa: o abode/ shelter of the universe.

"O Lord of the Gods, o abode of the universe, be pleased and grant me grace. I am lost (having lost the sense of direction), seeing the fierce fangs of your mouths that look like the fire of time."

As we have seen also in previous verses, the universal form described by Arjuna is the perception of the non-manifested Brahman when it manifests as this world in this world. It is purusha and prakriti at the same time, and its terrifying and radiant forms are compared to fire, especially to the mouth of fire where he oblations are offered. Now gradually Arjuna is leading us to another amazing realization: this sacred universal fire is Time and Death. Everything is ultimately sacrificed into this final fire, that consumes everything: for this reason God is also called Hari and Hara ("who takes away"). If we do it consciously, we obtain greater benefits. The name kala ("time") also means "black". The name krishna, too, means "black", but the difference between kala and krishna is like the difference between the terrifying universal form and the intimate and sweet form of Syamasundara. They are one and the same, yet inconceivably different.

All our sufferings in this world are caused by the illusory dissociation of personality that conditioned souls apply both to God and to themselves, and that is mentioned many times in Bhagavad gita as a major obstacle (2.45, 4.22, 5.3, 7.27, 7.28, 15.5). This delusional approach of duality is a characteristic of the asuras; the name of the mother of the asuras, Diti, literally means "cutting off", "dividing". The Bhagavata Purana (11.2.37) confirms: bhayam dvitīyabhinivesataḥ syad isad apetasya viparyayo 'smṛtiḥ, tan mayayato budha abhajat tam, bhaktyaikāyasaṁ guru devatatma, "Fear arises when the consciousness is focused on duality (dvitīya). One who separates himself from the Lord is confused by illusion and forgetfulness (ignorance). Therefore intelligent people offer a devotional worship to the Lord, who is the atman of the guru and the devas."

Fear of death and time is only due to the illusory identification with the material body (Bhagavata Purana 3.26.16), because the spirit is eternal (śaśvata) and not subject to change (avikara). The fearsome fangs of mother tiger are only dangerous for her prey, while young tiger cubs are not afraid at all, because they are surrendered and affectionate to their mother. The expression jagat nīvasa ("abode/ shelter of the universe") refers to the fact that the entire universe rests on the supreme Brahman, and will again be absorbed into him at the time of dissolution. This same expression will be used in Bhagavata Purana 10.2.19 to refer to Krishna's advent, the wonderful līla in which the shelter of the universe takes shelter in the womb of Devaki.

Arjuna prays the powerful Vishnu (the name viśṇu literally means "powerful") to be pleased or placated (prasīda) and to grant him grace (sarma). The word sarma or sharma means not only "grace" but also "happiness", "comfort", and is traditionally referred to the role of brahmanas in society, as they are expected to comfort and give happiness to the confused conditioned souls, helping them to overcome the ignorance of material identifications and attachments and the unlimited sufferings and ills that derive from it. Unfortunately, with the degradation of the original system, the name Sharma has become a mere family name for "high caste Hindu brahmins" like Goswami, Acharya, etc, and the people called by such name can hardly be expected to live up to it. Yet, this would be the only true salvation for traditional Hinduism.

bhīṣmo droṇaḥ sūtaputrastathāsau sahāsmadiyairapi yodhamukhyaiḥ ॥ 11-26 ॥

ami: these; ca: and; tvam: you; dhritarastrya: of Dhritarastra; putrah: the sons; sarve: all; saha: together; eva: certainly; avani pala: of warrior kings; saṅghaiḥ: with the hosts; bhishmaḥ: Bhishma; dronaḥ: Drona; suta putrah: the son of the suta; tatha: also; asau: that; saha: together; asmadiyaiḥ: our (own); api: although; yodha-mukhyaiḥ: the most famous warriors.

"All these sons of Dhritarastra, together with the many warrior kings, and Bhishma, Drona, Karna, and the most famous warriors of our own army as well,"

The word avani means "earth" and pala means "protector", therefore the avani palas mentioned in this verse are the warrior kings from the various territories of the planet, who were participating to the Kurukshetra war. In the Pandavas' army, besides the 5 brothers and their 5 sons from Draupadi, we also find Abhimanyu (the 16 year old son of Subhadra and Arjuna), Iravan (son of the Nagini Ulupi and Arjuna) and Ghatotkacha (son of the Rakshasi Hidimbi and Bhima). There was the entire family of Draupadi - Drupada king of Panchala, Dhristadyumna the son of Drupada specifically born for that war, Sikhandi(ni) the adopted son of Drupada, and the other sons of Draupada named Dhristaketu, Yudhamanyu, Satyajit and Uttamauja. There were king Virata of Matsya desa with his sons Sveta, Uttara and Sankha, Kuntibhoja (Kunti's adoptive father) and his son Purujit, Dhristaketu son of Sisupala and king of Cedi, Sahadeva son of Jarasandha and king of Magadha, and Satyaki and Cekitana of the Yadavas.

On the Pandavas' side there were also the king of Kasi (Varanasi) who was a vassal of the kingdom of Koshala (Ayodhya), Sarangadhvaja the king of Pandya (with capital at Madurai, south of the present Tamil Nadu, from river Kaveri to Kanyakumari), the king of Telinga or Telangana (presently Tamil Nadu) and 5 princes of Kekaya, headed by the eldest Brihadkshatra, who had been exiled from their kingdom. There were also the generals of Parama Kamboja (present Tajikistan) who did not have a king; they belonged to the "external" territories or Bahlikas that did not follow the Vedic system (Kirata, Gandhara, Barbara, Yavana, Saka, etc). The Pandavas' army had 7 *akshauhini*s or batallions for a total of 1,530,900 warriors, plus a non-specified number of non-organized troops coming from the barbarians' provinces. One akshauhini consisted of 21,870 war chariots, 21,870 war elephants, 65,610 horses and 109,350 foot soldiers.

In the army of Duryodhana, that commanded 11 *akshauhini*s (2,405,708 warriors) there were also his 99 brothers with their sons. There was the old and extremely powerful warrior Bhishma, and there were also his uncle Bahlika (Santanu's brother), Somadatta son of Bahlika and Bhurisrava son of Somadatta. There were Drona and his son Asvatthama, and Kripa the brother of Drona's wife. Sakuni (brother of Gandhari the mother of Duryodhana) was there with his son Uluka and several other relatives from the Gandhara kingdom, and there was also Sudakshina of Kamboja (brother of Duryodhana's wife). All Duryodhana's friends were there, beginning with Jayadratha the king of Panjab, Sindhu and Sauvira (Abhira) and Sibi (this is why he was also called Saibya), Bhagadatta the king of Pragjyotisha with his war elephants, Susharma of Trigarta with his brothers and their sons, Brihadbala and Vatsaraja of Kosala, king Nila of Mahishmati, the other Kekaya princes that were the rivals of Brihadkshatra, and Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti in Madhyadesa. King Salva of Madra, brother of Madri, had been forced to join the Kauravas, while Kritavarma and his son Matrikavat had been instructed by Krishna to fight in favor of Duryodhana leading Krishna's personal army, called Narayani sena and consisting of 1 million cowherd men coming from the district of Mathura. Among the other supporters of Duryodhanas there were the Rakshasas called Alambusha and Alayudha, the tribal king of Kalinga, and several chieftains of the barbarians' territories, such as Kamboja, Yavana, Saka, Mahishaka, Tushara, Dravida, Usinara, Pulinda and Kolisarpa. Karna king of Anga, his son Vrishasena and the other sons of Adiratha took part in the battle only after Bhishma's fall.

In this verse Karna is called "the son of the suta", where suta refers to a particular class of sudras serving the kshatriya warriors as charioteers and chariot makers. We know that actually Karna was the direct son of Surya, the Sun God, the most powerful warrior and first forefather of the Suryavamsa, but he was born from princess Kunti before her marriage, and was abandoned at birth. He was rescued by the charioteer Adiratha and his wife Radha, who accepted him as their son, therefore he developed a very deep affection for them and considered himself their son to all effects. This posed a serious problem in Karna's social identification, because by guna and karma he was certainly not a sudra, and could never renounce his true nature as a kshatriya.

वक्त्राणि ते त्वरमाणा विशन्ति दंष्ट्राकरालानि भयानकानि ।

vaktrāṇi te tvaramāṇā viśanti dāṁṣṭrākārālāni bhayānakāni ।

kecidvilagnā daśanāntareṣu sandṛśyante cūrṇitairuttamāṅgaiḥ ॥ 11-27 ॥

vaktrāṇi: the mouths; te: your; tvaramāṇā: rushing; viśanti: they enter; dāṁṣṭra: the teeth; kārālāni: fierce; bhayānakāni: terrifying; kecit: some of them; vilagnā: trapped; daśana antareṣu: between the teeth/ lips; sandṛśyante: can be seen; churnitaiḥ: smashed/ crushed; uttama angaiḥ: the upper part of the bodies.

"They are rushing into your fierce mouths and between your terrifying teeth. I see some of them having their heads crushed between your jaws."

The word daśanantareṣu literally means "in the gaps (between the teeth/ lips)", and vilagna means "stuck", "trapped". This verse repeats the reference to the fearsome teeth of Time (dāṁṣṭra kārālāni), and we are powerfully reminded of the fierce form of Kali or Chamunda, who grinds everything between her teeth (Aparajita stotra, chapter 7 verse 9.22 of Devī mātmya). Coincidentally, the name kālī is the feminine form of kālā, that means "time" as well as "black". We also find a very peculiar verse in Bhagavata Purana in which Mother Kali is explicitly identified as Kala, or eternal Time (kālā saṁnam tādā devīm, bibhras chakṛim urukramah, trayorvimsati tattvanam ganam yugapad avisat, "Then the Goddess, known as Time, the amazing Power of destruction, simultaneously entered in all the 23 tattvas", 3.6.2).

Like moths are inexorably attracted to a blazing fire and throw themselves into it to their deaths, all people and all things constantly run towards their end, one moment after the other, whether they are aware of it or not. And the more they try to delay death or time by using the wrong means - materialistic and adharmic - the faster and deeper they slide into suffering.

We could say that everyone starts to die at the very moment they are born: the clock starts ticking, so to speak. Traditionally, it is said that the duration of life for each person is measured by a specific number of heart beats and breathing cycles, that have been already ordained as a result of each person's previous activities. This is why in the physical practices of yoga, the sādhakas strive to slow down and even stop the breathing in order to prolong the duration of their lives; however this practice will not be possible without a conscious effort in overcoming the identification with the material body.

By repeatedly going through births and deaths, we finally come to understand that we are not any of the bodies we have acquired and lost so many times, and we turn our consciousness to the transcendental level. Nothing is ever lost, just like all the various exercises and tests we face at school are not important in themselves but they are only useful as instruments for learning what we need to realize.

There is a famous folk tale about a soldier who had been foretold his imminent death in three days; he immediately fled to another city, where he reached exactly three days later - only to find that he was indeed destined to die precisely in the place where he had sought shelter. All his efforts had only made his end even more certain than ever. This does not mean that we should not defend ourselves when we are attacked, or that we should not protect the good and innocent people from aggressions. Rather, it means that we should only fight for such good causes, and remain detached from the result of the battle. As Krishna has already stated in verse 2.38: sukha-dukhe same kṛitva labhalabbau jayajayan, tato yuddhaya yujyasva naivam papam avāpsyasi, "If you fight this battle while remaining equally disposed (unattached and prepared) to joy and sadness, gain and loss, victory and defeat, you will never be touched by sin."

This description of the destruction of all the warriors may seem horrible to the faint-hearted, but it is not different from the descriptions of Narasimha tearing Hiranyakasipu's body in two, disemboweling it and even wearing its intestines as a garland. Or Ravana vomiting blood after being struck by Rama's arrow, or the nine lakes filled with blood by Parasurama after killing the sons of Kartavirya Arjuna, Balarama crushing and smashing heads and bodies with his club while fighting against Rukmi and his allies (Bhagavata Purana 10.61.38), or the battle of Krishna with Jarasandha attacking Mathura (Bhagavata Purana 10.50.20-28) with the ghastly scenes of bodies chopped to pieces, rivers of blood with floating hands and heads looking like fish and turtles.

Krishna's childhood activities in Vrindavana are no less ghastly - Bakasura's body bifurcated in two starting from the beak, or the various asuras vomiting blood after being hit by Krishna or Balarama (Kaliya, Pralamba, Arista, and so on). However, these combative activities manifested by Krishna are not less spiritual or worshipable than his love exchanges with the gopis, and in fact they are enhancing the attraction felt by the gopis towards Krishna, as such lilas are remembered by them again and again.

यथा नदीनां बहवोऽम्बुवेगाः समुद्रमेवाभिमुखा द्रवन्ति ।

yathā nadīnām bahavo'mbuvegāḥ samudramevābhimukhā dravanti ।

तथा तवामी नरलोकवीरा विशन्ति वक्त्राण्यभिविज्वलन्ति ॥ ११-२८ ॥

tathā tavāmī naralokavīrā viśanti vaktrāṇyabhivijvalanti ॥ 11-28 ॥

yatha: just like; nadinām: of the rivers; bahavah: many; ambu: of water; vegah: the impact/ the current; samudram: the ocean; eva: certainly; abhimukha: towards; dravanti: are drawn; tatha: like that; tava: your; ami: all these; nara loka: of the human species; virah: the heroes; visanti: they enter; vaktrani: the mouths. abhinijvalanti: blaze radiantly.

"Just like the masses of water from the rivers rush into the ocean, all these people are drawn into you, and the great warriors enter into (your) blazing mouths."

The expression ambu vega means "waves", "force of water", "current of rivers", while the word drava indicates flowing, dropping into the ocean as attracted by the law of gravity, and it is also used in connection with the act of drinking liquids. Rivers cannot avoid rushing towards the ocean, as this is a natural law of the universe. Similarly, all things and bodies in this world must face destruction, at the destined time and place as a result of their combined previous activities.

The opportunity constituted by a human life is extremely valuable and just as fragile. At any time we can be called into the blazing mouth of Time, so we should always be ready, and keep our consciousness on the proper level. Death is also a wonderful opportunity to move on towards a better situation. As Krishna has already explained in Bhagavad gita:

esha brahmi sthitih partha nainam prapya vimuhyati, sthitvasyam anta-kale 'pi brahma-nirvanam ricchati, "O son of Pritha, this is the spiritual level. A person who has attained this level never becomes confused, and by remaining in that position, he attains spiritual liberation at the end of his time." (2.72)

sadbibbutadhidaimam mam sadbhijaynam ca me viduh, prayana-kale 'pi ca mam te vidur yukta-cetasah, "They know me and simultaneously they know the principle of material manifestation, the principle of the archetypes governing it, and the principle of sacred action. Thus they will also know me at the time of (their) death, because their consciousness is connected (with me)." (7.30)

anta-kale ca mam eva smaran mukta kalevaram, yah prayati sa mad-bhavam yati nasy atra samsayah, "One who, at the end of time (of this life), remembers me while leaving his/ her body attains my nature. There is no doubt in this." (8.5)

yam yam vapi smaran bhavam tyajaty ante kalevaram, tam tam evaiti kaunteya sada tad-bhava-bhavitah, "O son of Kunti (Arjuna), whatever state of existence/ nature one remembers at the time of leaving the body, s/he attains (precisely) that state of being/ condition, (because) of always contemplating that existence." (8.6)

prayana-kale manasacalena bhaktiya yukto yoga-balena caiva, bbruvor madhye pranam avesya samyak sa tam param purusam upaiti divyam, "One who, at the time of death, (remembers the Lord) without any distraction of the mind, with devotion and powerfully connected through yoga, and perfectly keeping the prana between one's eyebrows, attains that divine/ radiant supreme Person." (8.10)

The image of the rivers rushing into the ocean brings to our mind the concept of daivam - usually translated as "destiny" or "fate", or even "providence" - as something inevitable, the plan of a higher intelligence and divine will. For example, in Bhagavata Purana (1.9.17), we find this verse: tasmad idam daiva tantram vyavasya bharatarsabha, tasyanuvibito 'natha, natha pahi prajah prabho, "All this is due to the power of destiny, that is according to his will. Now you should take care of those who have remained without protection".

And again (3.3.23): daivadbhinesu kamesu, daivadbhinah svayam puman, ko visrambhena yogena, yogesvaram anuvratah, "The living entities are controlled by destiny in their lives and their sense enjoyment. So only those who have been serving the Lord of yoga through yoga can really develop faith in God."

However, the Vedic idea of destiny is about karma (action) and kala (time) and not about the "lot in life" incomprehensibly assigned by a tyrannical God to each individual at birth, and that must be accepted without discussion and without attempting to improve one's situation. Karma is not some inevitable sentence, a sort of punishment that we simply need to storm out in a passive and fatalistic way. Rather, it is constantly changing with each action (or inaction) we perform in this or any of our subsequent lifetimes, and it can even be neutralized or transformed by new and suitable actions. For those who want to improve their situation in the material world, the scriptures recommend pious activities such as sacred rituals of purification (prayascitta), worshipping God, going to pilgrimage, bathing in sacred tirthas, distributing charity to deserving persons, selflessly performing good deeds for the benefit of all, sacrificing one's possessions for good causes, and engaging in austerities (such as fasting etc).

यथा प्रदीप्तं ज्वलनं पतङ्गा विशन्ति नाशाय समृद्धवेगाः । yathā pradīptam̐ jvalanam̐ pataṅgā viśanti nāśāya samṛddhavegāḥ ।

 tathaiva nāśāya viśanti lokās- tavāpi vaktrāṇi samṛddhavegāḥ ।। 11-29 ।।

yatha: just like; pradīptam: burning; jvalanam: of flames; pataṅga: moths; viśanti: they enter; naśaya: to their destruction; samṛddha vegah: with great force/ speed; tatha: just like; eva: certainly; naśaya: to their destruction; viśanti: they enter; lokah: the worlds/ the people; tava: your; api: although; vaktrāṇi: the mouths; samṛddha: full; vegah: the force.

"Just like moths rush at full speed to their destruction, inexorably attracted into the burning flames, so the worlds/ the people fall at tremendous speed into your mouths."

The tiny insects are forcefully pushed by paramatma's mahamaya towards the fire of their deaths because their time in those bodies is over. Each particular species of life has its pre-ordained duration of bodies: for some it may be hundreds of years (as for some big trees) and for others just one single day (as for some insects), in which they live a full experience of birth, growth, attainment of maturity, reproduction, decline and death. On other planets, the devas live still longer lives: one of their days lasts one full year on the planet Earth. The highest place in the universe, Brahmaloka, has a longer day still, calculated as 1000 cycles of yugas on the planet Earth, estimated at 8 billion 600 million of our years.

Yet, all the embodied creatures only have a limited span of time to complete their work in a particular body. Foolish conditioned souls waste the valuable opportunity of a human life to engage in materialistic activities like the lower animals like the moths and other insects - eating, sleeping, having sex and defending themselves - until their allotted time has elapsed, and they are drawn into the fire of death. They do not know the purpose of their life, and most of them are not even interested in asking questions about it, so they leave this world without any real gain. Bhagavata Purana (2.3.17) says, ayur harati vai pumsam, udyann astam ca yann asau, tasyarte yat ksano nita, uttama sloka vartaya, "Every sunrise and sunset take away a piece of the duration of life for a man, (which is lost without gain) except for those who use time to understand the Lord". Bṛihad aranyaka Upanishad (3.8.10) says, yo va etad aksaram gargy viditvasmal lokat praiti sa brahmanah, etad aksaram gargy aviditvasmal lokat praiti sa kripānah, "A brahmana is one who leaves this world with the knowledge of the Brahman, while a kripāna ("one to be pitied") leaves this world without learning anything about Transcendence".

The moths are throwing themselves into the fire because they are totally fascinated by it. They are thirsty for beauty and splendor and warmth, because deep inside their forgotten memory they hanker for happiness. Similarly, human beings keep running after the ideas of happiness, love, beauty, splendor and glory that resonate with their innermost nature, but because they seek them in the wrong place - in material identifications and attachments - they end up burning their time, their energies, their enthusiasm and their lives, without attaining their ideal. Then they become cynical and start to believe that no ideal can exist. But this problem is due to ignorance only: what they are seeking is not out there, but it truly exists within their own soul. Bhagavata Purana 3.31.42 says, tam atmano vijaniyat, paty apatyā grhatmakam, daivopasaditam mrityum, mrgayor gayanam yatha, "The jiva (who has taken birth as a woman) should know that her life centered on husband, children and home making has been arranged by destiny for her destruction, like the sweet songs of the hunter (that attract the animals)." Of course the same applies to those jivas who have taken birth as men - simply the attachments may be a little different, but they are always outside their own atman, and therefore illusory. Bhagavata Purana (1.5.18) says, tasyaiva hetoh prayateta kovido, na labhyate yad bhramatam upary adbhah, tal labhyate dubkharavad anyatah sukham, kalena sarvatra gabhira ramhasa, "An intelligent person should only endeavor for what cannot be obtained by traveling around, because sorrows as well as joys will come in the course of time, wherever we are staying, and even coming to us unexpectedly." In Vedic times, the basic necessities of life were easily available for everyone. Sukadeva (Bhagavata Purana 2.2.3-5) clearly says that one could freely live in mountain caves, drink water from the rivers, eat plenty of fruits from public trees, wear abandoned old clothes or tree bark garments. Of course today this is much more difficult, because of the disgraceful degradation of society and especially because of the legislative hypertrophy created by overpaid politicians who need to show their voters they are actually doing something.

लेलिह्यसे ग्रसमानः समन्ताल्- लोकान्समग्रान्वदनैर्ज्वलद्भिः ।
 lelihyase grasamānaḥ samantāl- lokānsamagrānvadanairjvaladbhiḥ । तेजोभिरापूर्य जगत्समग्रं भासस्तवोग्राः प्रतपन्ति विष्णो ॥ ११-३० ॥ tejohbirāpūrya jagatsagramaṁ bhāstavogrāḥ pratapanti viṣṇo ।। 11-30 ।।

lelihyase: you are licking; grasamanah: the devoured; samantat: from all sides; lokan: the people/ the planets; samagram: all; vadanaih: with the mouths; jvaladbhib: blazing; tejobhib: with radiance; apūrya: covering; jagat: the universe; samagram: all; bhasah: the rays; tava: your; ugrah: fierce; pratapanti: are burning (everything); viṣno: o Vishnu.

"From all sides you are licking these devoured people/ worlds into your mouths, whose blazing light covers the entire universe. O Vishnu, your fierce radiance is burning everything."

The world loka, here in the plural (lokan), applies to a multitude of people and is normally used to refer to inhabited planets, planetary systems or dimensions, such as Satyaloka, Janaloka, etc, down to Patalaloka in the lower regions of the universe. In the previous verse it was said that "the lokas" were rushing into the blazing mouths of the universal form, while in verse 28 the expression used was nara loka virah, "the great warriors from naraloka/ among the human beings".

Nothing escapes the blazing mouths of Time: Death reaches out with licking flames to draw everything in, and consumes all. The word grasa ("devour") is often used in propitiatory prayers for protection (generally called karaca, "armor"), in which the devotee prays God's power to devour all inauspicious things. For example, we find in Bhagavata Purana 5.18.8, the prayer offered by Prahlada Maharaja to Narasimha: om namo bhagavate narasimbhaya, namas tejas tejase avir avirbhava, vajra nakha vajra damstra karmasayan, randhaya randhaya tamo grasa grasa, om svaba, abhayam abhayam atmani bhuyistha, om ksraum, "Om! I offer my homage to Bhagavan Narasimha! I bow to you, o power of all powers! Please appear to us in a visible form! You have nails like diamonds/ thunderbolts. You have teeth like diamonds/ thunderbolts. Please destroy our materialistic desires! Please devour/ destroy ignorance! Om! I offer worship to you. May you appear in my mind as fearlessness. Om! Ksraum!"

A similar description is found in the Devi mahatmya in Skanda Purana, especially in chapters 7 and 8, where Mother Kali slays the asuras Chanda and Munda and many others, crushing the Daitya warriors between her teeth and devouring all the weapons thrown at her. In chapter 8 she faces the asura called Raktabija ("blood seed"), who was particularly difficult to kill because every drop of his blood that touched the earth produced a new clone of the asura, possessing the same strength as the original. So Mother Kali (called Chamunda after she had killed Chanda and Munda) shot her tongue out to catch every single drop of blood before it fell down, and the asura Raktabija was finally singled out and killed.

The word ugra means "fierce", "terrifying", and is also used to refer to all the ferocious forms of God, male and female, including of course Kali and Narasimha. Sometimes such forms are worshiped secretly in temples behind doors by a small group of intimate servants, while their saumya or bhadra counterpart is made accessible for darshana in the next room. When exploring the ancient traditions of Devi worship in India, we discover that in remote times the female equivalents of the various male Personalities of God were extremely popular - Narasimhi, Varahi, Mahesvari, Brahmani, Kaumari, Vaishnavi, Aindri, Vignesvari (also called Ganeshani) and so on.

It is important to understand that such divine Personalities are not the consorts or wives of their male counterparts, but rather the "sisters", having exactly the same powers of their male equivalents. This knowledge (Sri Vidya) went underground - so to speak - and became secret during the age of Kali, because of the patriarchalist influences that became more and more prominent in India, especially during the Islamic dominations and the Victorian British colonialistic regime. As many among the general people vaguely remembered their worship and missed their presence, various unqualified individuals started some imaginative approximation of the ancient rituals, becoming easy targets for the cheap ridicule and demonizing propaganda spread by the invaders. It is now time to clean the misconceptions up.

Particularly interesting are the Personalities of Pratyangira and Sarabha, still known only to a relatively small group of people even among the Indian Hindus. Both these Personalities are strictly connected to the Vishnu avatara Narasimha, as well as with the Sri Chakra. The tantric tradition that still preserves this knowledge says that when Narasimha (Vishnu appeared as the half-human half-lion form) had killed Hiranyakasipu and his Daitya warriors, and drank their blood, Shiva appeared to remove the excess anger from Narasimha's form. The particular avatara of Shiva in this regard is a combination of human and bird (very similar to Garuda), and his two shakti wings are called Sulini and Pratyangira. When Sulini ("she who holds the trident") was unable to appease Narasimha, Pratyangira ("beautifully proportioned") came forward to absorb Narasimha's ferocious mood by manifesting satiya and dharma, thus restoring Vishnu's bhadra form.

The word samagram has been explained by previous commentators as a compound of saba ("with") and agrena ("from the beginning").

आख्याहि मे को भवानुग्ररूपो नमोऽस्तु ते देववर प्रसीद ।

ākhyāhi me ko bhavānugrarūpo namo'stu te devavara prasīda ।

विज्ञातुमिच्छामि भवन्तमाद्यं न हि प्रजानामि तव प्रवृत्तिम् ॥ ११-३१ ॥

vijñātumicchāmi bhavantamādyam na hi prajānāmi tava pravṛttim ॥ 11-31 ॥

akhyahi: (please) tell; me: to me; kab: what; bhavan: you; ugra rupah: terrifying form; namah astu: all homage: te: to you; deva vara: o best of the devas; prasida: be pleased; vijnatum: to understand; icchami: I wish; bhavantam: of you; adyam: the beginning; na: not; hi: indeed; prajanami: I know; tava: your; pravrittim: work/ mission/ engagement.

"Please tell me, Lord, what is this terrifying form. I offer my respects to you, o greatest of the Devas! Be gracious to me! I wish to understand, but I do not know your mission or your origin."

The word bhavan is a very respectful address, and although we can translate it simply by "you", it would not be out of place to render it with "your grace", or "Lord". As we have already mentioned, the expression prasida ("be pleased") is often used in prayers to express the desire for auspiciousness and protection. It is a respectful request, and certainly not an order. It derives from the same root as prasanna ("satisfaction") and prasanta ("pacified"). Later, in chapter 17, Krishna will use the expression mana prasada to indicate the peace of mind that comes from inner satisfaction. Similarly, the word prasada (referring to the sanctified food offered to God) implies a meaning of satisfying one's senses and needs through the consumption of sacred food, that carries no impurity or karmic consequence. The senses and the mind are difficult to tame, like wild tigers, and it is not wise to either starve them completely or to give them complete freedom to prey on anything they want: the solution consists in pacifying them with prasadam, so they will become automatically purified. For more about this subject, we can refer to verses 2.64, 2.65, 6.14, 6.27, 18.37, 18.54, 18.56, 18.58, 18.62, 18.73, 18.74.

The word pravṛtti literally means "activity", and includes the meanings of "purpose", "mission", and applied to the human sphere, "duty". Of course God does not have any selfish purpose in performing his activities, still he acts dutifully, as Krishna states very clearly in verses 3.22-24, and as confirmed by Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.8): na tasya karam karanam ca vidyate, na tat samas cabhyadbikas ca dryate, parasya saktir vividhaiva sṛyate, svabhaviki jnana bala kriya ca, "He has no duty to perform, and there is no one who is equal to him or greater than him. We have heard that the Supreme has many shaktis, and out of his nature come knowledge, power and action."

It is rather curious to see Arjuna declaring "I do not know your mission or your origin" (bhavāntam adyam nabi prajānami tava pravṛttim) after having expressed in so many previous verses the clear realization of the supreme Personality of God, and calling him anadi, "without beginning" (11.16, 11.19) and having heard the same from Krishna (10.3).

This means that the vision of the universal form changed while Arjuna was contemplating it. At first it was simply a majestic and powerful expanse of divine forms, radiating with the pleasing splendor of the rising sun. Then the innumerable divine faces opened as immense gaping mouths of blazing fire, and like the midday sun in its most scorching summer best, started to heat up the cosmos as at the time of the annihilation. Then again, a sort of vortex appeared, the fiery wind of death, to draw the mighty warriors into the blazing mouths. At this point, Arjuna perceives that this particular manifestation of the universal form must have some specific purpose (pravṛtti), and this must have some beginning or origin (adi). Furthermore, it is also apparent to Arjuna that such mission must be related to the war of Kurukshetra, as he has clearly seen the sons of Dhritarastra, Bhishma, Drona, Karna, and many others of the great warriors assembled on the battlefield before him.

His perspective is therefore changing dramatically: at the beginning, in the first chapter of Bhagavad gita, he expressed the feeling that he would somehow be held responsible for the disastrous effects of the war. However, the perception of the immense universal form has now broadened his horizon, and by tapping into the supreme collective Consciousness, he is coming to realize a much greater plan behind the appearances. But what is his part in this plan? Krishna has already told him to engage in the battle (2.18, 2.31, 2.38, 3.30, 4.42, 8.7) explaining that his duty of kṣatriya requires him to protect the prajas. However, from this greater level of consciousness, things appear in a different light, and Arjuna can perceive there is much more in all this than simply engaging in his social duty.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

कालोऽस्मि लोकक्षयकृत्प्रवृद्धो लोकान्समाहर्तुमिह प्रवृत्तः ।

kālo'smi lokakṣayakṛtpravṛddho lokānsamāhartumiha pravṛttaḥ ।

ऋतेऽपि त्वां न भविष्यन्ति सर्वे येऽवस्थिताः प्रत्यनीकेषु योधाः ॥ ११-३२ ॥

rte'pi tvāṁ na bhaviṣyanti sarve ye'vasthitāḥ pratyānīkeṣu yodhāḥ ।। 11-32 ।।

sri: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; kalah: Time; asmi: I am; loka: the worlds/ the people; kṣaya krit: who puts the end; pravṛddha: the greatest; loka: the peoples/ the worlds; samāhartum: to destroy; iha: here; pravṛtta: engaged; rite: without; api: although; tvam: you; na: not; bhaviṣyanti: they will become; sarve: all; ye: those; avasthitah: situated; prati anīkeṣu: on the opposite sides/ armies; yodhah: the warriors/ combatants.

The wonderful Lord said, "I am Time, the greatest destroyer of all. My mission is to put an end to these people here. Except for you, all these warriors arrayed in both armies will be destroyed."

The expression loka kṣaya krit means "(he) who destroys the worlds/ the people" and is similar to samāhartum, "to withdraw", or "to dissolve". The word pravṛddha means "very ancient", "grown in stature", "developed in fullness", while pravṛtta means "engaged", "acting", "working". The expression rite api tvam "but without/ except you", means that all will die except Arjuna; Krishna is saying that even if Arjuna chose to withdraw from the battle, still all the warriors will be destroyed anyway.

The expression na bhaviṣyanti means, "they will not be", indicating that they will disappear, or in other words, their present bodies will cease to exist.

Bhagavata Purana confirms that God is Time:

manye tvam kalam isanam, anadi nidhanam vibhum, samam carantam sarvatra, bhutanam yan mithah kalih, "I believe that you are the Lord, Time, without beginning or end, all-pervading, equally disposed to all and available to all. Any quarrel among the living beings is only due to their own exchanges." (1.8.28)

sarvam kala krtam manye, bhavatam ca yad apriyam, sapalo yad vase loko, vayor iva ghanavaliḥ, "I think that all this is the work of time, that controls everything and everyone, including you and all the kings, and whatever bad things happen to us all is just like when the wind carries all the clouds." (1.9.14)

pratikeriya na yasyeha, kutascit karhicit prabho, sa esa bhagavan kalah, sarvesam nah samagatah/ yena caivabhipanno 'yam, pranaih priyatamair api, janah sadyo viyujyeta, kim utanyair dhanadhibibh, "There is nothing we or anyone else can do about it, when Bhagavan arrives upon us in the form of Time. When one is overtaken by him (Time), one must give up his life airs, that are the dearest thing to everyone, what to speak of other things, such as material possessions." (1.13.19-20)

so 'yam adya maharaja, bhagavan bhuta bhavanah, kala rupo 'vatirno 'syam, abhavaya sura dvisam, "This same Bhagavan, the creator of all beings, has descended into the world in the form of Time to eliminate those who are envious of the suras." (1.13.49)

The principle of destruction should not be seen as evil, because it is simply the other face of creation. Krishna has already stated: jatasya bi dbruvo mrytyur dbruvam janma mritasya ca, tasmad aparibharye 'rthe na tvam socitum arhasi/ anyaktadini bhutani vyakta-madhyani bharata, anyakta-nidhanany eva tatra ka paridevana, "Because one who has taken birth must necessarily die, and one who has died will again be reborn. There is no point in despairing over something that is inevitable. O descendant of Bharata, all the living entities/ states of being are initially non-manifested, then they become visible in an intermediate stage and then again disappear in the end. What is the point of lamenting about that?" (Bhagavad gita, 2.27-28)

Kala, Time, is one of the most important and primeval factors of creation. It is called eternal because it exists permanently as a continuum, in which past, present and future co-exist in their subtle form.

Time is linear only in the experience of the material bodies, that inevitably undergo the 6 transformations (birth, growth, attainment of maturity, reproduction, decline and death) but the subtle consciousness is able to access all the different dimensions of time, called tri nemi or kala nemi (Bhagavata Purana 3.8.20). On the gross level, time can be calculated starting from the movements and aggregation of atoms (Bhagavata Purana 3.11.3-7) and controls the development of the creation of the universe (Bhagavata Purana 3.10.10-14).

On the subtle level, Time exists eternally just like the mahat tattva or pradhana. Under the power of Time, the static balance of the pradhana is agitated and the gunas start moving. From the continued movement of the gunas, the activities (karma) are created as both cause and effect, and the atman becomes jivatman (jiva literally means "active"). From this activity on the causal and subtle levels, the elements (bhutas) and the bodies are created/ manifested. It is said that Bhagavad gita elaborates about 5 subjects, namely: 1) Isvara, the supreme Personality of God, 2) the jivas or jivatman, that are the subordinate purushas or isvaras, 3) prakriti or nature, 4) kala or time and 5) karma - action and reaction, the only non-eternal factor among these.

तस्मात्त्वमुत्तिष्ठ यशो लभस्व जित्वा शत्रून् भुङ्क्ष्व राज्यं समृद्धम् ।

tasmāttvamuttiṣṭha yaśo labhasva jītvā śatṛūn bhuṅkṣva rājyaṁ samṛddham ।

मयैवैते निहताः पूर्वमेव निमित्तमात्रं भव सव्यसाचिन् ॥ ११-३३ ॥ mayaivaite nihataḥ pūrvameva nimittamātraṁ bhava savyasācin ॥ 11-33 ॥

tasmat: therefore; tvam: you; uttistha: get up; yaśaḥ: fame; labhasva: gaining; jītvā: achieving victory; śatṛūn: the enemies; bhuṅkṣva: enjoy; rājyaṁ: the kingdom; samṛddham: prosperous; maya: by me; eva: certainly; ete: all these; nihataḥ: killed; pūrvam: already/ previously; eva: certainly; nimitta: instrument; mātraṁ: only; bhava: become; savya sacin: o excellent archer.

"So, get up, o great archer, and achieve fame by your victory against the enemies, and then enjoy the prosperity of the kingdom. I have already killed all these (warriors): you (should) become just the instrument (of the victory)."

Many people have been led to believe that the perfection of spiritual life consists in withdrawing from the activities of the world and just meditate on theoretical philosophical technicalities or idyllic visions of beautiful dancing cowherd girls in enchanted forests. They have failed to understand the real meaning of the scriptures that encourage the devotee to fully dedicate to spiritual life, sacrificing their ordinary duties by performing them in Krishna Consciousness. The evidence is in this verse and in many other verses of Bhagavad gita, where Krishna clearly says after his teachings on renunciation and transcendental consciousness, "therefore, you should engage sincerely and dutifully in your work in society: so now get up and fight".

The word uttistha literally means "get up", "stand up", "wake up", and it is also used in the prayers during the Deity worship, to invite the Deities to wake up in the morning - as in the famous Venkatesvara suprabhatam: kausalya supraja rama purva sandhya pravartate, uttishta narasardula kartaryam daivamanikam, uttistottistha govinda uttistha garuda dhvaja, uttishta kamala kantha trai lokyam mangalam kuru, "O worthy son of Kausalya, Rama! Dawn has come, please get up. O great among men, divine ornament (of your family/ of the world), it is time to attend to your daily duties. Please get up, o Govinda, whose banner carries the image of Garuda! Please get up, o lover of Lakshmi, and bring good fortune to all the three worlds."

The expression yaśo labhasva ("become famous") implies that fame or good reputation is not a bad thing. One should not be attached to it or make it the motivation for one's actions, but there is nothing wrong in being recognized for one's good work. Conquering the enemies is not contrary to the principles of religion, either. It is true that a devotee does not see anyone as an enemy, but there are still envious people who will behave as enemies even against the most peaceful and tolerant saint. Yudhisthira was called ajata satru ("one whose enemy was never born", indicating that he was nobody's enemy) but he was forced on the battlefield of Kurukshetra after many years of persecution, including various assassination attempts against him and his brothers. And he did not step back from his kṣatriya duty, either.

The famous Argala stotra in Devi Mahatmya prays the Mother Goddess to help the devotee achieve these two - good name and victory over envious people - as well as long life in a suitable body (rupam) and the good things of life (bhogam): rupam dehi yaso dehi jayam dehi bhogam dehi dvisho jahi. Krishna also recommended Arjuna to pray Durga before the battle, to get her blessings for victory. The stotra is found in Mahabharata, Bhishma Parva, 23.4-16, and we have included it in the appendix to this work.

The expression bhuktsva rajyam samriddham refers to the enjoyment of the good things in life, not only for Arjuna, but for all the prajas in the kingdom. This is actually the most important thing in the end - the highest duty and responsibility for a kshatriya. We should never forget that the true kshatriya only fights for the protection and prosperity of the prajas: all the others are just war-mongers and criminals of various statures. Some ignorant people may be convinced that they can procure prosperity and wealth for their own people through the adharmic aggressions and exploitation of other innocent and good living beings, but that is a truly disastrous course of action, and the brahmanas are responsible for the required clarifications about dharma and karma, the hidden costs of unethical choices and actions, and the complex network of negative consequences for the entire society. If there are no qualified brahmanas, or if the brahmanas are not properly respected and followed, disaster becomes inevitable, sooner or later.

Samriddhi literally means "perfect prosperity"; we may remember here that Siddhi and Riddhi are the names of the two consorts of Ganesha - personifying success respectively in spiritual and in material life. The two things are not necessarily incompatible - in fact they complete each other.

The expression nibata purva ("already killed") indicates that time is not linear but it is a continuum where past, present and future are all existing simultaneously, and can be accessed by those who are free from the limitations of a gross material body. It is true that the future is constantly changing due to the choices we all make at each moment, but there is a critical mass of karmic consequences beyond which a particular situation cannot be avoided altogether. Another extremely important expression here is nimitta matram bhava sayasacin - a frequently quoted passage, that summarizes the approach that the devotee should keep in working in devotional service. The name saryasacin literally means "ambidextrous archer", one who is able to shoot with both hands.

द्रोणं च भीष्मं च जयद्रथं च कर्णं तथान्यानपि योधवीरान् ।
 droṇam ca bhīṣmaṁ ca jayadratham ca karṇam tathānyānapi yodhāvirān । मया हतांस्त्वं जहि मव्यथिष्ठा युध्यस्व जेतासि रणे सपत्नान् ॥ ११-३४ ॥ mayā hatāṁstvam jahi mavyathiṣṭhā yudhyasva jetāsi raṇe sapatnān ॥ 11-34 ॥

dronam: Drona; ca: and; bhishmam: Bhishma; ca: and (also); jayadratham: Jayadratha; ca: and; karnam: Karna; tatha: as well as; anyan: the others; api: although; yodha viran: heroes in battle; maya: by me; hatan: (have been) killed; tvam: you; jahi: destroy/ conquer; ma: do not; vyathista: be shaken/ waver; yudhyasva: (you should) engage in the fight; jeta asi: you are victorious; raṇe: in the battle; sapatnam: opponents.

"Drona, Bhishma, Jayadratha, Karna and all the other warriors in this battle have already been killed by me. So do not hesitate to defeat them. Engage in the fight, because you will conquer over your opponents."

The enemies mentioned in the previous verse are those warriors who have come to the battlefield of Kurukshetra to attack the Pandavas and their allies, in spite of all their attempts of reconciliation. Here they are called yodha viran, "the heroes who want to engage in battle", to indicate that - just like the moths that rush into the fire to their death - they have come willingly, impelled by the results of their previous activities and choices, to be killed on the battlefield.

According to the Vedic rules for dharmic fight, only active combatants may be attacked in a battle; if the enemy surrenders or is unarmed, unconscious, or unable to fight back, the use of force is condemned as asuric. However, it becomes justified against an enemy that has already broken the ethical rules of combat. For example, a cunning criminal may pretend to surrender, and then escape and attack again under stealth or deceit: in this case, the kshatriya is authorized to overlook the ordinary rules and deal with the situation as required to protect the prajas. Rules are meant to help and serve us in the performance of our duty, and not the other way around; an honest and wise person can understand how dharma can be better served, as Krishna himself demonstrated several times in the Mahabharata. Foolish and envious people sometimes claim that Krishna was a clever politician and manipulated the rules to the advantage of his family, but if we actually examine the circumstances, the facts and the results we will see that all the persons involved in the action obtained the greatest possible benefit.

Drona was the greatest expert in martial arts of his time, and for this reason he had secured the job of official trainer for the royal princes of the Kuru dynasty; Arjuna had learned everything from him, and he was seriously intimidated at the idea of having to fight against his old teacher. Bhishma was easily the strongest and greatest kshatriya there - the direct son of Ganga Devi, he had obviously superhuman strength and prowess, comparable to the powerful current of the river that was his mother. He had even defeated Parasurama, the brahmana warrior avatar of Vishnu.

Jayadratha was feared by all because of a curse that his powerful father had placed on anyone who killed him; he who would cause Jayadratha's head to fall to the ground would die instantly. Karna was Arjuna's arch-enemy, and being the direct son of Surya, his personal radiance (tejas) and prowess in battle were legendary; Duryodhana had made him king of the Anga region (present Bengal). However, Krishna is saying here that all these famous and powerful warriors have already been killed by him - by Time and destiny. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (1.9.35), in Bhishma's prayers on his death bed: sapadi sakehi vaco nisamy madhye, nija parayor balayo ratham nivesya, sthitavati para sainikayur aksna, bṛtavati partha sakehe ratir mamastu, "Let my loving attachment be directed to (Krishna) Arjuna's friend, who diminished the duration of life of the warriors of the opposite army simply by looking on them. On the request of his friend, he entered the battlefield in the middle of the two armies, and positioned the chariot there."

All these great warriors would have to pay the price of their adharmic choice to support the evil Duryodhana, even when he had offended the innocent Draupadi in the assembly of the Kurus. In the Sabha Parva, the dramatic chapter of the Mahabharata where Yudhisthira is cunningly dragged into a rigged dice game, stripped of all his properties and rights, and cruelly insulted, we see how the various persons present in the assembly react to the injustice. Among the sons of Dhritarastra, only Vikarna protested against the disgraceful behavior of Duryodhana: as we will see later in the story, he is the only one who will survive the battle, because he will remove himself from it. Duhsasana and even Karna eagerly participated in abusing and torturing the Pandavas and Draupadi, a deeply adharmic act generating the consequences that will ultimately cause their destruction.

Even after the miracle of the unending cloth, when it became apparent to all that Draupadi and the Pandavas were protected by God, and even after the ominous oaths of revenge pronounced by Bhima, Duryodhana's supporters continued to keep their disastrous course of action. Vidura loudly protested, but he was insulted by Duryodhana, too, and he had no other choice but to leave the assembly. Drona and Bhishma, who were also present at the disgraceful assembly, failed to take proper action, and thus they signed their own death sentence. Bhishma tearfully recognized that the evil actions of the Kurus would soon bring their destruction - actually they already looked dead. Dhritarastra feebly tried to patch up the situation, but he did not stop his evil son. All he could do in his fear was to offer a warning, declaring that Duryodhana was already as good as dead, Silence in front of injustice constitutes an indirect and passive approval of the injustice - as Vidura clearly explained to the assembly, quoting the discussion between Prahlada and Kasyapa on the subject. "One who is called as a witness and does not answer, out of fear or anger, deserves punishment. When a good person goes to the assembly to ask for help and relief from injustice, it is the duty of every man present to take the required action: if they fail to do so, they will have to suffer the same karmic consequences."

sanjayah: Sanjaya; uvaca: said; etat: that; śrutva: hearing; vacanam: the speech; keśavasya: of Kesava; kṛtāñjalih: with folded hands; vepamānaḥ: trembling; kīrīṭi: Arjuna; namah kṛitva: offering respect; bhūyah: again; eva: certainly; aha: said; kṛṣṇam: to Krishna; sa gadgadam: feebly/ stuttering/ with faltering words; bhīta bhītab: full of fear; praṇamya: prostrating.

Sanjaya said, Arjuna listened to the words of Kesava, and trembling, with folded hands, he offered his respects. Then he again addressed Krishna with faltering words, throwing himself to his feet, full of fear.

Arjuna's strong emotions of fear (bhīta bhītab, vepamāna, gadgadam) are not due to some supposed cruelty in God. They come from the perception of the immense sufferings of the conditioned beings who hopelessly revolve in the frightening wheel of samsara - material life in this world - enslaved by their own identifications, attachments and desires. Later in the discussion, Krishna will declare that a wise person is one who can see the sufferings intrinsically connected with the samsara (janma-mṛityu-jara-vyadhi-duḥkha-doshanudarsanam, 13.9). Arjuna is overwhelmed by the perception of the sufferings and loss of all the warriors that are going to die in the war, and terrified by the relentless crushing wheel of Time and Death.

In his famous Bhaja Govindam song, Adi Shankara writes, punar api jananam punar api maranam punar api janani jathare sayanam, iha samsare babu dustare kṛpaya 'pare pahi murare, "Not having to be born again! Not having to be dying again! Not having to lie in a mother's womb again! O Murari, please protect me, by your compassion, from this horrible cycle of birth and death!"

Adi Shankara also refers to the dreadful samsara in many verses of his Lakshmi Nrisimha stotra, praying for deliverance and protection. Both śruti and smṛiti describe the samsara - the cycle of births and deaths - variously as a burden, a dangerous ocean, a whirlpool, a thick forest, a forest fire, steep rocks or cliffs, prison or captivity, poison, a blind well, or an entangling tree grown out of the seed of ignorance consisting of bodily identification. The example of the tree - samsara vriksha - is mentioned in Muktika Upanishad (2.2.32-37) and Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.6), and introduces the theme of the banyan tree of material existence described in chapter 15 of Bhagavad gita, entitled Purusottama yoga. The Tree of Life is a well known symbol to all the cultures of the world, because it constitutes a powerful archetype of Reality, a figure for the Mother that manifests herself as the form of the spiritual world as well as the form of the material world. In the spiritual world she is the Kalpa Vriksha, the "wish-fulfilling tree" that produces everything is required for the service to the Supreme, while in the material world she is the illusory phantasmagoria of the ever-changing growth of material phenomena, enticing the conditioned souls to keep toiling and running after the proverbial carrot at the end of the stick.

Yet, in spite of the fear and loss and pain we all suffer in this samsara, a devotee, a self-realized soul, can perceive God in the experience of the material world, as Krishna has explained and then directly demonstrated especially in these last few chapters. This is the true thrill of joy (prabrisyati, 11.36) and ecstatic emotion we can find when we establish ourselves in the divine Consciousness, the happiness (ananda) that all beings are instinctively seeking, and that is only found within the atman. We are now approaching the most mysterious part of Krishna's teachings in Bhagavad gita, so deep and difficult to perceive and understand that most commentators choose to remain on the surface of the meanings. Here logic and reason fail to carry us, and must be left on the threshold: only emotion - bhakti - is able to take us across. This is the significance of the iconography of the Mother Goddess - Sri Vidya - in her Chinnamasta form, holding her own severed head in her hand.

What does it mean that God is beyond sat and asa? Already simply this one statement should make us understand the inconceivable depths of the ocean we are going to venture into, and the need to overcome the materially intellectual platform to attain the "wisdom of the heart". To prepare our minds for this paradigm shift, we need to remember that according to the Vedic scriptures themselves, the present version of the shastra - both smṛiti and sruti - was specifically compiled for the people of Kali yuga, while previously Vedic knowledge was transmitted and discussed at much greater depths, of which we can now only find hints and clouded references. Even Krishna is presenting the Bhagavad gita to Arjuna in this perspective, so he is making things as easy and simple as possible for us neophytes to understand, realize and practice Transcendence in the correct way. This will be particularly apparent in the 15th chapter, in which Krishna will instruct us to cut the mighty banyan tree of Vedic knowledge, but it was already surfacing in 2.42 to 2.46 when talking about the veda vada rata and how they are missing the point.

Certainly Krishna is not condemning Vedic knowledge, as in the same chapter (15) he will state, vedais ca sarvair aham eva vedyo vedanta-krid veda-vid eva caham, "I am he who knows all the Vedas, I am he who created the Vedanta, and I am the object of knowledge of the Vedas" (15.15).

Vishnu is the source of the Vedic knowledge, having transmitted it to Brahma (the first created being), and he always descends in this world as avatara to save or rescue the Vedas when they appear to be lost or endangered. From time to time, he takes various forms and presents the Vedic teachings in accordance to the specific circumstances and the particular audience, and to a superficial observer it may seem that such teachings vastly differ from one instance to another. The various paths known as bhakti, yoga, tantra, upasana all stem from that place that is far beyond the ordinary experience of our contemporary lives in Kali yuga.

All the shastras repeat that bhakti - devotion - is the only path to enter into this higher dimension, and great acharyas have distributed this bhakti freely to the masses without material discriminations, through the chanting of the holy Names, activities, qualities, forms, etc, of the Personality of God, and the personal dedicated service that is beautifully explained by Krishna in Bhagavad gita. Yet, we know that bhakti is also a very secret path (rahasya) and that its science is detailed in specific collections of knowledge from a tradition that existed long before the beginning of this Kali yuga and before the compilation of the present Vedic scriptures. These scriptures are called Tantras or Agamas, and contrarily to the misled opinion of ignorant and foolish people, they are not about having better sex, but about experiencing a direct contact with God, who is simultaneously and inconceivably distinct as Vishnu, Shiva and Shakti, and is present within our own body with all the worlds - material and spiritual. This is the true foundation of upasana, or ritual worship.

arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; sthane: (proper) position; hrishikesa: o Hrishikesha; tava: your; prakirtya: the glories; jagat: the universe; prabrisyati: is rejoicing/ is thrilled; anurajyate: is becoming attached; ca: and; rakshasas: the Rakshasas; bhitani: terrifying; disab: in all directions; dravanti: are drawn; sarve: all; namasyanti: offer their respects; ca: and; siddha sangha: the hosts of Siddhas.

Arjuna said, "It is very proper, o Hrishikesha, that the universe is attracted to you and rejoicing in your glories. The Rakshasas are scared and wiped away in all directions, and the hosts of Siddhas offer you their respects."

The verse begins with the word sthane, "position", that establishes the foundation for the mind-blowing experience of genuine tantra. The word can also be translated as "it is proper", "it stands".

The word tantra means "power", and after contemplating the visva rupa in all these verses, and meditating on the meaning of tejas, we should have come to the point of understanding that God is shakti and shaktiman, "power" and "powerful". This is the first basic truth on which all the other names of God are manifested. Bhagavan means "having all powers - i.e. strength, wealth, beauty, fame, etc. Krishna means "all-attractive", which in the mind of a physicist easily translates into "powerful": the attraction itself is the power that pulls together. The name Hrishikesha, "Lord of the senses", also refers to the power that controls and activates the senses, at material and spiritual level. It is all about power.

So the position, or foundation, of this experience, is the knowledge of the glories of God (prakīrtya) as power and powerful. We should never underestimate God or minimize his/ her position, because this automatically and immediately destroys the foundations of our divine experience and sends us sliding into its materialistic and illusory reflection. In this light, we can easily understand why the Bhagavata Purana keeps reminding us about the inconceivable power of Krishna, even in his most intimate - and apparently ordinary - līlas. The second point is about the senses. The Narada Pancharatra, quoted in Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, clearly states: sarvopadhi vinirmuktam, tat paratvena nirmalam, hrībīkesa hrībīkena sevnam bhaktir ucyate, "Bhakti is defined as serving the Lord of the senses by engaging one's senses. (This must be done) without any designation/ label/ denomination (upadhi), and in a perfectly pure way." This perfect purity and freedom from designations obviously applies to the crucial pre-requisite mentioned so many times in Bhagavad gītā and in all other scriptures: the overcoming of the ignorance constituted by ahankāra and mamātva, bodily/ material identification and attachment/ possession/ affiliation. The Bhagavata Purana (10.84.13) states: yasyatma buddhib kunape tri-dhatuke sva-dhib kalatradisu bhauma ija-dhib, yat tirtha buddhib salile na karhicij janesv abhijnesu sa eva go-kharah, "Those persons who identify the self as the gross material body, who maintain a sense of belonging to their family, who worship their native land, and who visit the sacred places simply to take a bath, are not better than animals like cows and donkeys (even if they appear to be human beings)."

It is totally impossible to actually engage in tantric sadhana if we remain on the platform of ahankāra and mamātva - that tantric (and non-tantric) texts define as pasutva, "animal consciousness". Such nara pasus must never be initiated in the tantric knowledge and worship, because they will cause damage to themselves and to others by faulty understanding and application; it would be like allowing foolish and ignorant people to access high voltage electrical lines to "play with them" like animals do with their bodies, senses and minds to obtain cheap pleasure. Therefore the true tantric sadhana requires strict sexual abstinence, as well as severe restrictions on all types of sense gratification. The practice of genuine yoga is required as a technical support for this sadhana, so the two are often indicated as a single practice, of which yama and niyama constitute the first steps. We will elaborate on this subject more specifically in another dedicated publication, because this requires a considerable volume in itself.

The words hrīsha ("joy") and anuraga ("attachment, attraction") clearly refer to the ecstatic immersion in the devotional meditation/ service to Shakti and Shaktiman. However, we must be very careful not to slide into their illusory material reflections - something that is much easier than it seems.

It is said that this sadhana is like the blade of a sharp knife, or the point of a needle, and even the slightest distraction will shift the focus from the divine to the animal level. Due to this reason, the sadhaka should not disclose the secrets of the sadhana to people who are not qualified or even speak about it with others (except with one's guru). Usually, tantric teachers who compile books or give lectures purposefully omit important parts in their explanations, so that foolish unqualified people will not be able to access the actual practice. In fact, there is a lot that can be told to the public, especially to dispel the many gross misconceptions and dangerous misinformation circulated by cheap pretenders and exploiters.

One of the best explanations comes from the Kashmiri Shaivite tradition, in the form of the Spandakarikā ("sacred ecstatic tremor"). In front of this supreme Consciousness, all other levels of consciousness bow and surrender. The Siddha level of consciousness offers homage, and the Rakshasa level of consciousness dissolves.

कस्माच्च ते न नमेरन्महात्मन् गरीयसे ब्रह्मणोऽप्यादिकर्त्रे ।

kasmācca te na nameranmahātman gariyase brahmaṇo'pyādikartre ।

अनन्त देवेश जगन्निवास त्वमक्षरं सदसत्तत्परं यत् ॥ ११-३७ ॥

ananta deveśa jagannivāsa tvamakṣaram sadasattatparam yat ॥ 11-37 ॥

kāsmat: why; ca: and; te: to you; na: not; nameran: they should offer respects; maha atman: o great Atman; gariyase: you are the most glorious; brahmanah: than Brahma; apī: even; adi kartre: the first creator; ananta: unlimited; deva īsa: o Lord of the devas; jagan nīvasa: abode of the universe; tvam: you; akṣaram: imperishable; sat asat: sat and asat; tat: that; param: superior; yat: because.

"Why shouldn't they offer their respects to you, o great Atman? You are more glorious than Brahma, the first creator (of this universe). O Lord of the Devas, abode of the universe, you are imperishable, because you are above the cause and the effect."

Why not, indeed? God is within ourselves, and everything is actually spiritual, as we can perceive when our consciousness is on the spiritual level. When ahankāra and mamātva are dissolved by the immense power of Consciousness, only pure Consciousness remains, in the form of Shakti and Shaktiman. This is the level called tat paratvena nirmalam, "supreme purity". We do not need to lose our individuality in this ecstasy: we simply must liberate it from all material designations and limitations. We "enter" (visate, visanti, 8.11, 18.55) into this Consciousness and we find it full of variety, inconceivably one and different, but without the constraints of time and space. Everything eternally is, in the same "time and place", and we find that we are simultaneously shakti and shaktiman, atman and brahman, visaya and asraya. We are then so closely connected with the param atman, the maha atman, that we totally channel our consciousness into the Supreme: this is the actual Krishna Consciousness. At this level brahma tattva, jīva tattva, prakṛitī tattva are inconceivably one and distinct, eternally, beyond the scope of cause and effect.

What is the meaning of the expression sad-asat tat param ("above sat and asat")? We have already elaborated on the various meanings of sat and its opposite asat. For example, in 2.16 we explained that sat means "existence, reality, goodness, permanence, spirit", and in its adjective form means "actual, real, true, good, right, eternal, spiritual, transcendental". Its opposite asat therefore means "non-existent, illusory, false, wrong, impermanent or temporary, material".

After carefully teaching us how to distinguish sat from asat, now Krishna is taking us beyond this final duality, to a platform where only very advanced spiritual intelligence can stand without falling into the abyss of disaster. We can make the example of mathematics here: in primary school we first learn that one cannot subtract a larger number from a smaller number, but then after becoming learned enough, we are told that it is actually possible to do that in algebra - only we will get a negative number. Similarly, in the beginning of spiritual development it is essential to differentiate between sat and asat, but after establishing ourselves firmly in sattva, we can take the final leap and fly up to visuddha sattva. If we try to make this passage artificially, without really understanding it and without having the required strength and stability, we will simply crash into rajas and tamas, with considerable damage. On the visuddha sattva level we will be able to really understand the teachings of the Upanishads, such as sarva khalv idam brahma ("all this is Brahman", Chandogya Upanishad 3.14.1,) and neha nanasti kinchana ("nothing else exists", Katha Upanishad 2.2.11, Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad 4.4.19). So Brahman is not only spirit, but matter as well, and yet beyond both.

The word gariyase means "you are greater/ more glorious", and here it applies to the relationship between the creator and general manager (adi karta) of this universe - Brahman - and the Brahman from whom he originates.

The word akshara ("imperishable") applies to the original sabda brahman, the syllable om, the form of the primeval Shakti and Shaktiman, who is the abode and foundation not only of this universe, but of all universes.

त्वमादिदेवः पुरुषः पुराणस्- त्वमस्य विश्वस्य परं निधानम् ।

tvamādivēḥ puruṣaḥ purāṇas- tvamasya viśvasya paraṁ nidhānam ।

वेत्तासि वेद्यं च परं च धाम त्वया ततं विश्वमनन्तरूप ॥ ११-३८ ॥

vettāsi vedyam ca paraṁ ca dhāma tvayā tataṁ viśvamanantarūpa ॥ 11-38 ॥

tvam: you; adi devaḥ: the first deva; puruṣaḥ: the purusha; purāṇas: the most ancient; tvam: you; asya: of whom; viśvasya: of the universe; paraṁ: supreme; nidhānam: shelter; vettā: the knower; asī: you are; vedyam ca: and also the object of knowledge; paraṁ: supreme/ transcendental; ca: and; dhāma: the abode; tvayā: by you; tataṁ: pervaded; viśvam: the universe; ananta rūpa: o endless form.

"You are the primeval God, the most ancient Purusha, the supreme shelter of the universe, the knower and the object of knowledge, the supreme abode. O endless form, the universe is pervaded by you."

The expression adi deva is very interesting. All the devas are originated and guided by the supreme Personality of Godhead in the aspects of Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan. At a more intimate level, we can say that the devas are limbs in the body of the supreme Personality of God, Narayana, Vishnu, as manifested here by Krishna. Just like all the cells of our body develop gradually from the original stem cell, all the devas appear from the universal form of God - first Brahman, and then all the other devas. This is also indicated in this verse by the expression viśvasya paraṁ nidhānam: God is the matrix of everything and everyone, simultaneously Mother and Father of all.

It is not easy to understand the nature of the supreme Personality of God, and similarly it is not easy to understand the Personalities of the devas, that are eternal archetypes in the blueprint of the universe - administrative positions, if we may say so. Except for Vishnu and Shiva and Adi Shakti (and their direct emanations), any other such administrative position in the universe can be occupied by an individual jiva that has developed the required qualifications, because everything is based on consciousness. However, this concept should not encourage anyone to disrespect or underestimate the devas and their positions, because they are way beyond the comprehension of conditioned souls. All individual jivas are amsas, or "parts" of God (mamāivamso jīva loke, 15.7) and as such they have exactly the same nature or "quality" of God, although they cannot have the same "quantity". When we speak of the individual jivas as a category, we should not think that they are all the same in their degree of development and manifestation of powers. All the jivatmas start as anu atmas, with the same potential, but due to their choices they develop in a different way. Some jivas choose to develop a spiritual consciousness immediately and therefore they become siddhas without the need of going through the conditioned state: these are called nitya siddhas, or akshara (dvav imau puruṣau loke kṣaras cakṣhara eva ca, 15.16). The supreme Personality of God is beyond these nitya siddhas (uttama puruṣah tu anyathā, paramatma, 15.17), as he is the origin of them all (adi deva). Such nitya siddhas have always been conscious of being limbs of the Supreme and have deliberately and harmoniously engaged in the functions required in the service of the Supreme.

Some other jivas choose to have the material experience, and they develop a material ego instead of a spiritual personality. After exhausting their experience in the material world, they become liberated (sādhana siddhas or kṛpā siddhas) and thereby attain the same position of the nitya siddhas. At that point, they can consciously function as limbs of the Supreme, exactly as any nitya siddha. We can remember the example of the cells or organs of our body: as long as they are connected and directed by the superior consciousness, in a healthy state, they will be simultaneously individuals and a collective body, and will be able to perform functions that are characteristic of the superior consciousness. For example, a hand by itself cannot do much. When it is properly connected to the body, it can already perform so many activities and functions, even instinctively - for example it can feel/ perceive temperature etc. When the hand is closely guided by a superior intelligence and knowledge, it can create artistic masterpieces or technological wonders, or write sublime poetry. Can we dismiss its work, by saying that "it is just a hand"?

Here Arjuna clearly confirms this point, by adding the further quality of puruṣa purāṇa. We have already mentioned that the definition puruṣa applies to consciousness, as the nature of the atman/ brahman; puruṣa is the principle of perception as opposed/integrated by prakṛiti as the principle of action. Specifically, the word puruṣa implies the meaning of "living in the pura", the city of the body. This pura ("city") can be the body of some unicellular organism or atom, the large body of a whale, and also the immense body of the Virata Puruṣa, the cosmic form. In addition, this puruṣa is vetta asi vedyam, "the knower and the object of knowledge" and tatam visvam, "pervading the entire universe".

The entire universe is God's body. As jīvatmas, we are the cells or organs of God's body, where there are innumerable faces, eyes, mouths, arms, bellies, and legs. There is no limit to the number of organs that God's body can have: all the jīvatmas are amsas, "limbs", or "parts" of God's body. According to their individual level of development, each jīvatma can be or/and function as a limb or another, so the devas are the higher functions of God's body - the heads, the hands, the mouths.

The expression vetta asi vedyam indicates that God is simultaneously subject and object, as his Personalities are unlimited and can interact without any limitation. God is Consciousness, and can manifest in innumerable forms and functions.

namo namaste'stu sahasrakṛtvah punaśca bhūyo'pi namo namaste ॥ 11-39 ॥

vayub: Vayu; yamab: Yama; agnih: Agni; varunab: Varuna; sasa ankab: Chandra; prajāpatib: the Prajapati; tvam: you; prapitamahab: the forefather; ca: and; namah namah te: my homage to you again and again; astu: there be; sahasra kṛtvah: a thousand times; punah ca: and again; bhūyab: again; api: although; namah namah te: I offer you repeated obeisances/ salutations.

"You are Vayu, Yama, Agni, Varuna, Chandra, and Prajapati the ancestor (of all beings). I offer my respect to you again and again, a thousand times, again and again."

The divine functions mentioned in verse are closely connected to each other in a deliberate way. Vayu is life and Yama is death; Vayu is not only the wind and the air in the atmosphere, but also the pranas or subtle life airs within the body, that sustain and move the consciousness in the body. Yama and Agni are connected because death consumes everything like fire, and fire kills and destroys bodies (as we have seen in previous verses).

Agni is fire and Varuna is water: two apparent opposites, between which everything else is contained, as when we describe some wave lengths of light as infrared and ultraviolet we are also implicitly remembering all the wave lengths or frequencies of light we can see in the rainbow, from red to violet. Chandra is connected to Varuna because the moon moves the waters - from the tides of the oceans to the lymph of the plants and to the flows within the human body, especially the sexual fluids. Chandra and Prajapati are also connected, as they are both generating and sustaining life in all beings; Chandra is also called Soma, and in his manifestation as the plant somalata he constitutes the focus for many religious rituals meant to increase the mental and physical vigor of human beings and of devas as well.

The Prajapati mentioned in this verse is Brahma, the first created being, the ancestor of all the beings in the universe, who equally bestows his blessings on all, like the rays of the moon that shine over the great and the small alike. To give his authoritative example for us to follow, Arjuna offers his respect to the devas and to their origin and collective body as the Virata Puruṣa. To each and every divine manifestation of Consciousness, he offers his respect again and again, a thousand times, to each and every divine form. These repetitions (punah bhūyab, "again and again") are specifically meant to impress us with the realization of divinity as a living, acting experience, and not just as some theoretical philosophical dream.

Knowledge is extremely important in the development of spiritual realization, but it should not remain theoretical only, otherwise it can even become an obstacle to progress, because in that case it deteriorates into material scholarship due to the inevitable influence of maya (7.15) and generates material pride, thus turning sattva into tamas. The method to upgrade jñana into vijnana ("theoretical knowledge" into "applied knowledge") is simple, and clearly described in practice by Krishna in verses 13.8 to 13.12. In this regard, we need to note that many people have developed a curious misconception about the meaning of amanitvam ("not caring for honors") and anahankara ("being free from false ego"). Discussing the spiritual science and sharing one's realizations and experiences does not amount to being egotistic. There are some imbeciles who will accuse you of being arrogant simply because you truthfully say that you are actually following the principles of dharma and teaching what you have learned and realized.

At the same time, they drink the footwash of someone who openly says he has no qualifications, but still demands worship and total obedience and personal service because he claims to represent his guru, who in his eyes was qualified only because his guru was qualified.

This distorted idea of humility comes - guess from where - from the abrahamic concept by which all human beings are inherently sinners, and can never develop any real knowledge or qualifications in spiritual life, therefore their only hope is to be "saved" by a "prophet/ Christ" and his representatives the priests/ mullahs etc in exchange for their blind allegiance and obedience. The Vedic idea of humility is very different. In the Vedic perspective, all human beings are parts and parcels of God, equal in quality, and they only need to realize it to elevate themselves to the level of perfection. This is why it is called "self-realization"

namaḥ: I salute; purastat: at the front; athā: as well as; pṛṣṭhataḥ: at the back; te: you; namaḥ astu: there be salutations; te: you; sarvataḥ: from all sides; eva: certainly; sarva: all; ananta vīrya: of unlimited prowess; amita vikramah: of unsurpassable deeds; tvam: you; sarvam: all; samapnoṣi: you are encompassing; tataḥ: therefore; asi: you are; sarvaḥ: everything.

"I salute you from the front and from the back. My homage to you from all sides! Your prowess is unlimited, and your deeds are without compare. You are encompassing everything, therefore you are everything."

Arjuna is offering respects to God from all sides, because God is present everywhere, covering all directions and the entire expanse of the universe. Traditionally in ritual ceremonies one starts from the front (purastat) or in the east (pūrva, literally meaning "first"), as the most visible manifestation of God in this world is the Sun, the greatest power that sustains life. Thus we offer our respect and meditation to Savitar from various directions at the different times of day - sunrise in the east, noon above, and sunset in the west. Vedic tradition also includes the primeval and universal homage to the Sun, but takes it to a very high level, as the Savitri Gayatri mantra constitutes a meditation on the power of divinity so that we can raise ourselves to the divine dimension of consciousness. It is a search for inspiration towards personal perfection - not an expression of fear or propitiation, or glorification as we can see at more primitive levels, where the worshiper makes a huge difference, and puts a great distance, between him/herself and God.

The Bṛihad Aranyaka Upanishad (1.4.10) states very clearly, "those who worship the Gods thinking, 'He is one, I am another', does not know the facts, and he is like an animal to the devas". So we can attain true bhakti, the supreme bhakti (mad bhaktim labhate param, 18.54) only when we have realized our divine transcendental nature, dissipating the illusion of material bodily identification. At that point, we have a dīnya or siddha deha by which we will be able not only to see (dīnyam cakṣuḥ, 11.8) but also to associate with Bhagavan personally in his intimate abode. This siddha deha is not something that we get from outside: it is simply the spiritual form of our evolved consciousness, of which the atomic seed has always existed. Of course the individual soul (jīvatman) will never achieve exactly the same greatness of God, because constitutionally it is simply an amsa, a "part". As Arjuna declares yet again in this verse, God is ananta-vīrya and amita-vikrama, characterized by unlimited strength/ power and unique deeds, because the Whole will always be greater than the parts.

There is no offensive way to show one's respect and love for God, because God eagerly accepts the bhakti from a devotee even when it is expressed clumsily or with some superficial mistakes. It is said that when visiting Indraprastha, Krishna was invited to a State banquet by Duryodhana, but he chose to have lunch at Vidura's house instead. Vidura was so overwhelmed by the emotions of love and happiness that in his confusion, he was offering him banana peels instead of the fruits. Krishna happily ate them, moved by his devotee's love. In the same way, Krishna snatched Sudama's bag to eat the cheap and damaged broken rice that he was carrying, as Sudama had not been able to find any better gift for his beloved friend. In verse 9.26, Krishna clearly says that he will be delighted (prayatatmana) to actually eat (asnamī) whatever a devotee offers with genuine love (bhakti upabṛitam). We have also seen this principle demonstrated quite a few times. Of course a loving devotee will only offer to Krishna things that he considers good, and will naturally try to find out what Krishna likes best, so that the offering will be as pleasing as possible.

However, God does not need our offerings, worship, or even respects or allegiance, because he is self-sufficient and independent. Whatever we offer him is for our benefit only, to develop a sentiment of love and affection towards the Supreme, so that we can establish the only perfect relationship possible, and attain the happiness we all seek. This of course does not mean that we should become sloppy or careless in our relationship with God; it is always better to remain attentive and humble and do one's best.

Traditionally, after performing formal worship, one is supposed to beg forgiveness for any impropriety or mistake: mantra binam kriya binam bhakti binam janardana, yat pūjitam maya deva paripurnam tad astu me, "O Lord, whatever I have done to worship you, make it perfect and complete, correcting all faults in the chanting of mantras, performance of actions, or scarcity of devotion", yad datta bhaktimatrena patram puṣpam phalam jalam, aviditam nivedyam tu tat grhananukampaya, "Please, out of your kindness, accept what I have offered out of devotion - leaf, flower, fruit, water and food", ajnanad athava jnanad asubham yan maya kertam, kṣantum arbasi tat sarvam dasyenaiva grhana mam, "Whatever mistake I may have committed, knowingly or unknowingly, please forgive it and consider me as your humble servant".

ajānatā mahimānaṁ tavedaṁ mayā pramādātpṛaṇayena vāpi ॥ 11-41 ॥

sakha: friend; iti: like this; matva: thinking; prasabham: presumptuous; yat: whatever; uktam: said; he krishna: o Krishna; he yadava: o Yadava; he sakha: o my friend; iti: like this; ajanata: ignorant; mahimanam: of the glories; tava: your; idam: this; maya: by me; pramadat: because of madness; pranayena: with dedication; va: or; api: although.

"Presumptuously thinking of you as a mere friend, I addressed you informally, as 'Krishna', 'Yadava', 'my friend', because I was unaware of your glories. I have done so out of carelessness, but with love."

Whatever formal imperfection one could find in Arjuna's behavior with Krishna, it is due simply to their loving relationship as friends and relatives and close companions. Therefore Arjuna here says, pranayena, "out of dedication", or absorption in the personal relationship. As we have already mentioned, Krishna/ God does not take formalities so seriously when the devotee is acting out of love, and in fact he prefers intimate and simple exchanges directly from the heart, rather than pompous and presumptuous official worship, no matter how materially impressive. Arjuna, however, reminds us that simple and direct or informal worship, too, can be superficial, presumptuous and careless (prasabha), and that we should never take God for granted. The fact that we (or our predecessors) have installed the Deity in our home or temple or city does not mean that God is bound or forced to remain there for our benefit, even if we become careless or selfish or otherwise offensive.

Offenses can be forgiven (kshamasva) when they are committed accidentally, unwittingly, or because of some overpowering circumstances. Cynicism and selfishness are very serious obstacles, that invalidate any plead for forgiveness, because they make it insincere. God is not stupid and is not obliged to accept our prayers or to forgive us simply because we are telling him to do so. If we continue to commit offenses out of arrogance even after asking forgiveness, and we refuse to reform our behavior and improve our spiritual position, a mere mantra or formula will not bring any relief from the bad consequences of our actions. The same applies for the offerings of food or any form of ritualistic worship: the only guarantee that God will accept our offering is in the love and devotion that we are putting into it. God does not care at all for high caste birth, government appointment, social position, wealth, or even scholarship and excellence in following the details of a procedure: without genuine love and devotion, no offering will be accepted.

We should also be careful in our relationships with devas and bhaktas, and treat them according to their level of consciousness and not on the basis of bodily identification or other material considerations. In Bhagavata Purana (4.4.13) Sati comments about her father Daksha's offensive mentality towards Shiva: nascaryam etad yad asatsu sarvada, mabad vininda kunapatma vadisu, sersyam mahapurusa pada pamsubhir, nirasta tejahsu tad eva sobhanam, "I am not surprised about all this. Bad people, who identify with their material bodies, always deride the great souls because they are envious of God. It is very good that such materialists lose their glory and merits (tejas).". Out of pride for his own material position, Daksha had disrespected Shiva, criticizing him and demeaning his character, ignoring his spiritual glories. In Bhagavata Purana (10.88.38-39) Krishna addresses Shiva as the guru of the entire universe, saying, "If someone commits aparadha to such a mahajana and jagat guru as you are, they will never get any auspiciousness".

Again in Bhagavata Purana (11.17.27) Krishna says, acaryam mam vijaniyam, navamanyeta karhicit, na martya buddhyasuyeta, sarva deva mayo gurub, "One should consider the acharya as my self and never disrespect him by considering him an ordinary human being, because the guru is the manifestation of all the devas". Of course if the "guru" is teaching his disciples to disrespect, abuse and insult the devas, he should not expect any better treatment for himself. But we are talking here of the genuine acharya, not of the fake ignorant pretenders that present themselves as gurus in order to get cheap adoration, followers, and profit.

The word acharya means, "one who teaches by example", or "one who puts theory into practice by his behavior", and is here closely connected with the definition guru, "teacher". A person should be considered the genuine representative of the devas and of Krishna (who speaks this verse to Uddhava in Bhagavata Purana) only if he is truly functioning as guru and acharya, or in other words if he is actually taking care of his disciples and guiding them effectively and expertly on the journey of self-realization and devotion to God, and is demonstrating the goal with his personal behavior and life. The best way to avoid committing offenses to devotees, guru, deva or Bhagavan is to rise above the level of material bodily identifications and attachments/ affiliations. This is sufficient to protect us from the consequences of the fundamental ignorance that is the root cause of envy. However, there is nothing offensive in familiar dealings with devotees, guru, deva or Bhagavan when these are based on affection - we just need to know where the line lies.

यच्चावहासार्थमसत्कृतोऽसि विहारशय्यासनभोजनेषु ।

yat: whatever; ca: and; avahasa artham: to have a laugh; asat kṛitab: done at a material level; asi: you are; vihara: while strolling; sayya: lying down; asana: sitting; bhojaneṣu: while eating; ekah: alone; atha va: or also; api: although; acyuta: o Acyuta; tat samakṣam: in the presence of others; tat: that; kṣamaye: I am begging forgiveness; tvam: you; aham: I; aprameyam: unfathomable.

"O Acyuta, your greatness is inconceivable. Whatever impropriety I may have committed while joking, strolling together, lying down, sitting, or eating with you, alone or in the presence of others, I beg forgiveness."

When we speak about offenses, we don't mean avoiding someone, or refusing to worship him or to submit to him, or discussing his verified factual behavior, asking questions about his statements, noticing his inconsistencies and mistakes, or behaving informally with him. These are not offenses. An offense - aparadha or ninda - consists in deliberately hurting or damaging a person with some type of aggression, such as verbal or physical insults. These also include whatever could target him/ her by mocking, dirty allusions or ridicule based on his/ her bodily appearance, slandering him/ her with false rumors and allegations, stealing or destroying his/ her property or what s/he requires for service. None of these are relevant to ethical, philosophical or spiritual points, and can only cause damage to all. This is particularly bad when the offense is directed towards a person who has helped us and guided us in our personal development, such as the guru, or a good parent or respectable well-wisher (also considered on the same level of the guru), to whom we should be grateful. This crime is called guru droha, where droha means "hostility", "hatred", "becoming an enemy", and "enviousness", and destroys the merits and good fortune of the offender. It is inevitably caused by the ignorance of bodily identification and shows a serious lack of spiritual realization and knowledge. A decent person (what to speak of a devotee) does not cause harm deliberately to anyone, as this is one of the first requirements in sadhana (yama and niyama), what to speak of harming or killing one's guru and benefactors. In verse 2.5, such act was heavily condemned.

Actually, Arjuna has never done anything offensive towards Krishna. Simply, his behavior has sometimes seemed casual and familiar, as it is normally between friends; this is perfectly all right, because Krishna's internal potency, Yogamaya, arranges for the devotees to superficially overlook the aisvarya (power) of Bhagavan, so that the loving exchanges with his companions and devotees can develop with great sweetness, for Krishna's pleasure. Similarly, other intimate companions of Krishna are happy to see him as their lover, husband, son, friend, and only temporarily they remember his greatness in a flash of realization, just like Arjuna is showing here. Such a moment of bewilderment is not disrupting their loving relationship and exchanges, but rather it enhances them because it makes them proud and increases their attachment to Krishna, just like a loving mother is thrilled to see her beloved son rise to some important position in society or achieving some extraordinary success, but at that time she can remember his sweet childhood activities even more keenly. This feeling is described by Kunti in his prayers (Bhagavata Purana 1.8.28-31) and is found in many passages of the 10th canto of the Bhagavata Purana, describing the childhood activities of Krishna in Vrindavana with the remembrance of his divine glories, as seen by the intimate devotees there. The more intimate is the loving relationship, the greater will be the amazement and happiness of the devotee, and consequently the pleasure of Bhagavan. The fact is that God is pleased when his devotees joke with him, walk with him, sit or lie down with him, eat with him and so on, because they are expressing their love for him - the thing that Krishna loves best.

Similarly, Arjuna's regret for his great familiarity with Krishna will not last long - it will remain only as long as necessary to appreciate his glories and greatness (mahima) and describe them in his prayers for our benefit. Soon enough, he will ask Krishna to show his sweet human-like form again, and his natural loving feelings will return (11.51). This intimate relationship with God is an exclusive feature of Vedic tradition, as it is not found in any other religious culture.

The two names by which Arjuna is addressing Krishna in this verse are Acyuta, that means "not fallen", and Aprameya, that means "inconceivable", where prameya is the "object of knowledge".

पितासि लोकस्य चराचरस्य त्वमस्य पूज्यश्च गुरुर्गरीयान् ।

na tvatsamo'styabhyadhikah kuto'nyo lokatraye'pyapratimaprabhāva ॥ 11-43 ॥

pita: the father; asi: you are; lokasya: of the universe; carācarasya: of the moving and the non-moving; tvam: you; asya: of this; pūjyah: to be worshiped; ca: and; guru: the (supreme) teacher; gariyān: glorious; na: not; tvat samah: equal to you; asti: there is; abhyadhikah: greater; kutah: how (it will be possible); anyah: other; loka traye: in the three worlds; api: although; apratima: beyond compare; prabhava: power.

"You are the father of all beings, moving and non-moving. You are worthy of worship, as you are guru, and even more glorious than guru. There cannot be anyone equal or greater than you. How can anyone, in all the three worlds, compare with your power?"

The word apratima means "immeasurable", as the definition pratima means "measure", "comparison", "equal to". It complements the word aprimeya from the previous verse, meaning "not to be known or learned".

The word idyam means "to be worshiped". Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.7) states, tam isvaranam paramam mahesvaram, tam devatanam paramam ca daivatam, patim patinam paramam parastad, vidama devam bhuvanesam idyam, "We know God, the Lord of the universe, the supreme master, who controls everything, the supreme Deity worshiped by the Gods, who protects all those who give protection to others, greater than the greatest."

The word gariyan means "greater", "more glorious", "worthier of being praised"; it is a comparative term referred here to the position of guru, indicating to a teacher or respected elder. Krishna is the supreme guru, the antaryami paramatman, of whom all the gurus are simply representatives. In Bhagavata Purana, Narada instructs Dhruva to meditate on the guru of all gurus (abhidhyayet manasa guruna gurum, 4.8.44); similarly king Satyavrata addresses Vishnu as his guru (8.24.50) and Prithu tells his subjects that Hari is the supreme guru (4.21.36). Again in Bhagavata Purana Kapila tells his mother that his devotees consider him as son, friend, guru, and ista daivam (3.25.38), and Kavi Yogendra confirms, guru devatatma, "the atman of the guru and the devas", 11.2.37). Brahma, too, describes Vishnu in the same terms: tad visva guru adhikritam bhuvanaika vandyam "the universal guru, who is the original maker, worshiped by all" (3.15.26).

At the dawn of this creation, Brahma received the Knowledge directly from Narayana (tene brahma brida, "revealed to Brahma through his heart", 1.1.1), but anyone can also be blessed in the same way: brdi stithah yacchati jnanam sa tattva adbhigamam, "situated in the heart, he gives the knowledge by which one can understand the truth" (3.5.4), and brdy antah stho hy abhadraṇi vidhunoti, "situated within the heart, he destroys all bad things" (1.2.17). Particularly enlightening is verse 4.28.41, that shows how directly realizing transcendental knowledge from Bhagavan ensures it is free from sectarianism: saksad bhagavatoktena guruna barina nripa, visuddha jnana dipena, sphurata visvato mukham, "as directly explained by Bhagavan, Hari, who is the original guru, radiating with the light of pure transcendental knowledge, from all perspectives". Therefore he is the greatest teacher of all: jagat guru tamah, "the supreme guru of the universe", (10.69.15).

Another beautiful verse is expressed by Sudama, Krishna's childhood friend: kim asmabbir anirvritam, deva deva jagat guro, bhavata satya kamena yesam vaso guror abhut, "O God of the Gods, o universal guru, what will be impossible to achieve for us, when we have been living in the same school with him whose desires are always fulfilled?" (10.80.44). In this particular verse, besides the intimate lila meaning of Krishna living in the gurukula of Sandipani Muni, we can also see the realization of the universal and eternal truth taught by the Upanishads and the Bhagavad gita, about the "two birds sitting on the same tree". The statement about Krishna being the father of all beings is also found in other verses of Bhagavad gita.

In 9.17 Krishna says, pitaham asya jagato mata dhata pitamahab ("I am the father of this (world), I am the mother, the supporter, the grandfather"), and in verse 14.4 he says, sarva-yonishu kaunteya murtayah sambhavanti yah, tasam brahma mahad yonir aham bija-pradah pita ("In whatever form of matrix they appear, all beings are children of the supreme Mother (brahma mahad yoni) and I am the father, who gives the seed.")

A popular devotional song prays, tvam eva mata cha pita tvam eva, tvam eva bandhus cha sakhas tvam eva, tvam eva vidyam ca dravinam tvam eva, tvam eva sarvam mama deva deva, "You are my mother and my father, my family and my friend, my knowledge and my wealth: o God of the Gods, you are everything to me". Bhagavata Purana confirms in several more verses:

bhavaya nas tvam bhava visva bhavana, tvam eva matattha subrit patih pita, tvam sad gurur nah paramam ca daivatam, yasyanuvrttya keritino babhuvima, "O creator of the universe, please take care of us. You are our mother, benefactor, husband and father. You are our guru, our supreme Deity, and by following you we achieved success" (1.11.7), jane tvam isam visvasya, jagato yoni bijayoh, sakteh sivasya ca param, yat tad brahma nirantaram, "O Lord of the universe, I know you as both the mother and the father of the universe - the supreme eternal Brahman that includes Shiva and Shakti at the same time" (4.6.42), ksetra jnaya namas tubhyam, sarvadyaksaya saksine, purusayatma-mulaya, mula prakertaye namah, "I offer my respect to the you, the Knower of the field, the witness, who controls everything. I offer my homage to the supreme Purusha, the root of the atman, and to the supreme Prakriti" (8.3.12), yuvayor eva naivayam, atmajo bhagavan barih, sarvesam atmajo hy atma, pita mata sa isvarah, "This Bhagavan Hari is not your son only. He is the son of all, the atman of all, as well as the father, the mother and the ruler" (10.46.42), narayanas tvam na hi sarva dehinam atmasy adhisakhila loka saksī, narayano angam nara bhu kalayanaṭ tac capi satyam na tavava maya, "O Narayana, are you not the atman of all the embodied beings, the supreme Lord of all the planets and the witness (conscience/consciousness)? Narayana is your angam (limb), because from his human-like body he manifests the waters of creation: he is real, and not a product of your illusion" (10.14.14).

tasmat: therefore; pranamyā: offering respects; pranidhaya: prostrating; kayam: the body; prasadaye: seeking mercy; tvam: you; aham: I (am); isam: to the Lord; idyam: to be worshiped; pita: father; iva: like; putrasya: of a son; sakha iva: like a friend; sakhyuh: of a friend; priyah: a lover; priyayah: the beloved; arhasi: you should/ you are able to; deva: o Lord; sodhum: to tolerate/ forgive.

"For that, I offer my humblest respects, throwing myself at your feet and seeking your mercy. O Lord, you are worthy of being worshiped! Please bear with me, like a father (is tolerant) with his son, a friend with a friend, and a lover to the beloved."

Such is the power of the intimate loving relationship with God, that it cannot be forgotten even in the most difficult moments. Arjuna is clearly seeing the terrifying vision of God as eternal Time devouring everything, and has already contemplated the vastness and wonder of the unlimited universal form, and he directly realizes the unfathomable divine glories of Krishna and understands that his familiarity is technically out of place. Yet, he still sees Krishna as his beloved friend, because this is what gives most pleasure to Krishna. The perception of the mahima (glories, opulence, powers) of Krishna is not really absent from the devotee's mind: it is simply brushed aside from time to time, so that service to God can be more effective.

Similarly Krishna's personal servants restrain their feelings of ecstasy because tearful eyes and trembling hands are distracting them from effectiveness in their duties. Everything is based on pure love: in verse 11.41 it was Arjuna's love for Krishna (pramadat pranayena) that caused his familiarity, and in this verse it is Krishna's love for Arjuna that finds tolerance and indeed pleasure in such familiarity.

We have already mentioned that the 5 primary rasas in loving devotion are santa (tranquil admiration), dasya (service), sakhya (friendship), vatsalya (affection towards a younger person) and sringara (erotic love). The sentiment expressed by a disciple towards the guru is a mixture of sakhya and dasya, and this is what we find expressed here. Arjuna's relationship with Krishna is clearly in the friendship mode (sakhya), but already in the second chapter (2.7) he had submitted himself to Krishna as a disciple (siṅgyas te 'ham tvam prapannam). This means that Arjuna has always been very aware of Krishna's divine nature and position.

God is extremely tolerant, and never gets angry when someone is trying to offend him. In Bhagavata Purana 10.89.3-12 we have read the famous story of Maharishi Bhrigu who went to visit the three highest and most powerful authorities in this universe - Brahma, Shiva and Vishnu - testing each of them with increasingly insulting behaviors, with mind, words and body. Vishnu did not become offended at all even when Bhrigu kicked him hard in the chest, and rather showed concern for the well-being of the Rishi, considering that Bhrigu's foot might have been hurt. Of course Vishnu's body is totally transcendental and does not suffer any pain or damage, but the tolerance and kindness demonstrated in that episode are amazing. Yet, this is God's nature, because among the 6 perfections (bhagas) of Bhagavan we also find the perfection of renunciation. Projecting one's own ideas and defects on God is called anthropomorphism, and it tends to confuse people who have not overcome the ignorance of material bodily identification. The followers of anthropomorphic doctrines hear that men are made in God's image, or about the human-like activities of God when he appears in this world, and they automatically (and mistakenly) conclude that God is also a person like us, with lots of defects and limitations. Some degraded and confused people even construe a projection of God in such a way that, if such a person really existed in society, he would be considered a dangerous psychopathic criminal and would be immediately committed to some high security mental facility.

adr̥ṣṭa: not seen; pūrvam: before; hr̥ṣita: overjoyed; asmi: I am; dr̥ṣṭva: by seeing; bhayena: by fear; ca: and; pravyathita: shaken; mano: the mind; me: my; ta: that; eva: certainly; me: me; darśaya: let see; deva rūpaṁ: the form of the Lord; prasīda: be pleased; deva īśa: o Lord of the devas; jagat nīvasa: o abode of the universe.

"Contemplating this extraordinary form, my mind is thrilled with joy and shaken with fear at the same time. O Lord of the Devas, abode of the universe, please let me see the form of God."

The expression adr̥ṣṭa pūrvam, "not seen before", applies to the particular experience described by Arjuna, that cannot be repeated in exactly the same way. As we have already mentioned, Krishna had already shown the universal form on various occasions during his activities, so Arjuna's reference is not about the general concept of the universal form or Virata Purusha. Other commentators have interpreted this expression to indicate that God is without compare, as stated in so many passages of the scriptures, and quoted specifically in Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.8) that declares, na tat samas cabhyadbikas ca dryate, "it is impossible to see/ find one who is equal or greater (than God)".

The word hr̥ṣita, "thrilled", refers to the physical symptoms experienced by Arjuna; it specifically indicates the standing of hairs, or harsa roma. As we have already seen, Arjuna's emotional symptoms are not actually about fear of God but rather amazement and awe in front of his immense power. We could compare it to the thrill, fear and joy that people experience for example on a high speed car race, or looking up a sheer cliff while free climbing it, or other similar experiences.

The revelation of the glories of Krishna and the vision of the universal form are the stimulus (uddīpana) to the devotional feelings in Arjuna's sakhya rasa, and not simply to the adbhuta rasa, that is an attendant feeling and not the permanent and preminent taste in the relationship between Arjuna and Krishna. Amazement and fear (vismaya rati, adbhuta rasa) are a very useful ingredient also in many other activities of divine Personalities. This is why God mixes extraordinary deeds even to his very intimate and sweet love exchanges that appear to be based on a very simple and familiar perception of his Personality - for example with the young gopis and with Yasoda and Nanda, Krishna's foster parents in Vrindavana. Krishna's lifting the Govardhana hill, fighting with the great Kaliya serpent, devouring the forest fire, and killing the many asuras attacking him are all examples of intimate līlas that introduce amazement, fear, and the perception of Krishna's immense power, with the purpose of enhancing the intimate loving exchanges with his devotees. In fact God could have solved such problems without exhibiting such extraordinary deeds (uru vikāma), but then there would not be much to be impressed about, or to talk about. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana: kṛitavāṁ kīla karmāṇi sāha ramēna keśavāḥ, atimāṛtyāṇi bhagavān gūḍhāḥ kēpātā manusāḥ, "Together with Balarama, Bhagavan Kesava manifested many superhuman activities, under the guise of a human being" (1.1.20), and anugrahaya bhaktāṇāṁ manusāṁ deha asthitaḥ, bhajate tadṛśiḥ kṛida yāḥ śrutva tat paraḥ bhavet, "The Lord manifests a human-like form out of kindness for his devotees, as one will become attracted to God by listening to the stories of his playful activities" (10.33.36).

A very interesting expression in this verse is deva rūpam, "the form of God". Arjuna has been eminently contemplating God's forms both in meditation and in direct vision, but the universal form is not singular in number: in fact, it includes unlimited forms. Now Arjuna wants to see the "form of God", that is the four-armed form of Vishnu or Narayana, a single form expressing the unlimited powers of God, but in a pleasing saumya ("benevolent") aspect. The expression tatha eva, "as that", indicates that the four-armed Vishnu form is still powerful and majestic - aśvarya - yet all the traditional scriptures recommend the sadhakas to meditate and contemplate on this form.

किरीटिनं गदिनं चक्रहस्तं इच्छामि त्वां द्रष्टुमहं तथैव ।

kiriṭinam gadinam cakrahastam icchāmi tvāṁ draṣṭumahaṁ tathaiva ।

tenaiva rūpeṇa caturbhujena sahasrabāho bhava viśvamūrte ॥ 11-46 ॥

kiriṭinam: with the crown; gadinam: with the mace; cakra hastam: holding the disc in (your) hand; icchāmi: I wish; tvam: you; draṣṭum: to see; aham: I; tatha: like that; eva: certainly; tena: by that; eva: certainly; rūpeṇa: by the form; catur bhujena: with four arms; sahasra babo: (you who have) thousands of arms; bhava: become; viśva mūrte: o form of the universe.

"O Visvamurti, who have thousands of arms, I wish you to be(come) the four-armed form, holding the disc and the mace in your hands, and wearing a crown. I wish to see you in that form."

Krishna will show Arjuna the divine forms as he asked because he is pleased (prasannena tava, 11.47); earlier he asked to see the universal form (11.3), now he is asking to see Vishnu. However, Krishna is also going to manifest his sweet human-like form (11.50) without Arjuna explicitly asking for that: it was sufficient to remember their affectionate and intimate relationship of friendship and kinship. At the spiritual level, the devotional sentiment is non-different than the form or body manifested by Krishna or his devotee; of course this is difficult to understand for a person who is still immersed in material bodily identification, but existence and form are originally pure consciousness.

As consciousness can instantly transform and manifest any form, Krishna can easily manifest the universal form, the four-armed form of Narayana/ Vishnu, and the most intimate human-like form of Krishna, by which he relates with his closest devotees. The four-armed form of Narayana or Vishnu is the primary focus of all traditional Vedic scriptures, as the form of Krishna became object of meditation and worship only in these last 5000 years after his appearance, mostly based on the Bhagavad gita and Bhagavata Purana. Before that, Vedic scriptures narrated the stories of Vishnu's avatars, such as Matsya, Kurma, Varaha, Nrisimha, Vamana, Parasurama and Rama.

Colonial indology and the subsequent conventional academia believe that the presently existent Vedic texts have been composed rather recently, in a supposed "evolution of thought" that goes from the sambitas (Rig Veda, Sama, Yajur) to the Upanishads and the Puranas, that in spite of their name (literally meaning "ancient") would have been created well into the current era. This is certainly not the verdict of the Vedic scriptures themselves. All the knowledge contained in all the Vedic scriptures already existed much earlier, and it has been collected in specific compilations from time to time according to the requirements of the circumstances. The texts called Tantras or Agamas (two names that mean respectively "power" and "scriptures") are even more ancient in origin than the presently studied Vedic texts, and they are specifically focused on Vishnu and his Couple manifestation in this universe, known as Shiva and Shakti.

The sambitas (Rig Veda, Sama, Yajur, Atharva) speak of Vishnu only marginally because they are collections of hymns in praise of the various Personalities of God controlling this universe, meant to be chanted and sung at the ritual ceremonies to which such Personalities were remembered and called. The philosophical and theological elaboration of such hymns is contained in the commentaries, compiled in the same period and with the same vision - Brahmanas, Aranyakas and Upanishads. Although the number of hymns dedicated specifically to Vishnu is limited, everyone agrees that Vishnu - Yajna - is the ultimate purpose, foundation and personification of all the religious ceremonies. Similarly, in all groups of scriptures, Vishnu appears both as avatara and manifestation within this universe (and as such he is counted among the Devas) as well as the origin of all the Devas, the Personality of the supreme Brahman. These two dimensions of Vishnu's presence are found all over the Puranas, Upanishads, and in Bhagavad gita too, as we have been contemplating in these last few chapters.

The scripture that focuses most on Krishna, the Bhagavata Purana, explicitly recommends to meditate on the four-armed Vishnu form; we can see for example the instructions given by Krishna himself to Uddhava, considered a sort of spiritual testament left by Krishna just before his disappearance (11.11.46, 11.14.37, 11.27.38), and the instructions of another great teacher avatara, Kapila (3.28.12-21, 27). Krishna manifests the four-armed form of Vishnu in many passages of the Bhagavata Purana, as for example in the Asvatthama episode (1.7.52), to Brahma who is meditating on him (2.9.16), to the Devas who pray for his help at the appearance of Vritrasura (6.9.28) and especially when he takes birth and appears to Vasudeva and Devaki (10.3.9), and to Aditi (8.17.4-6), and also to Nabhi, the father of Rishabhadeva (5.3.3-5). Krishna manifests this form for Rukmini (10.60.26). He also appears as Vishnu to Muchukunda and separately to Kalayavana (10.51.24 and 10.51.2) during the war against Jarasandha. The four-armed form of Vishnu also appears to Parikshit before his birth (1.12.9), and is the object of meditation recommended by Sukadeva to Parikshit during his final fasting (2.2.8-13). The same meditation on the four-armed Vishnu is recommended by Narada to young Dhruva (4.8.43-53) and in this form Vishnu appears to Dhruva to bless him. Shiva personally instructs the Pracetas to meditate on this form in 4.24.45-53, and this is how Vishnu appears to them in 4.30.5-7 (albeit with 8 arms). The eight-armed form of Vishnu also appears after Daksha's successful yajna (4.7.19-23) and after being called by Daksha's Hamsa gya prayers (6.4.40). He is also the object of meditation of the Narayana kavacha (6.8.12) taught by Visvarupa to Indra.

The pancha upasana form of worship and meditation, summarized by Adi Shankara, already existed for many thousands of years. It focuses first and foremost on Vishnu/ Narayana as the supreme Brahman, the origin, foundation and sum total of all the divine Personalities and forms. This transcendental, non-manifested (avyakta) supreme Personality of Godhead, the One, manifests in many (eko bahu syam, "I will become many", Chandogya Upanishad, 6.2.3) starting by two - the divine Couple of Shakti and Shaktiman. In the material manifestation, this Couple is known as Durga and Shiva - the other two main Personalities of God traditionally worshiped, as the Mother and the Father of the cosmos, known under various names.

The other two Personalities of God in this pancha tattva ("five realities") meditation are Surya and Ganesha, who have been worshiped since time immemorial and express an immense wealth of symbolic meanings and forms of consciousness. Surya is the Sun, the universal manifestation of the power of God, that everybody can see and perceive every day; the most brilliant examples of Surya worship are given by Ramachandra, the Vishnu avatara, who chanted the famous hymn Aditya bridayam, and by Krishna, who instructed his son Samba to worship Surya in order to regain full health. The divine Personality of Ganesha, also called Ganapati and Vinayaka, is not easy to understand. He is most popular among virtuous materialists who worship him to propitiate success in business and wealth, but he is remembered and honored at the beginning of all enterprises, both material and spiritual, because he personifies the destruction of obstacles from the path of progress. According to the Skanda Purana, Avanti kanda, quoted in Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, among the offenses to be avoided in devotional service, we find "to worship the Deity without worshipping Vaikuntha deities like Ganesha".

The wonderful Lord said, "To make you happy, I am now showing you this supreme form, made of splendor, manifested by my own yoga/ shakti, unlimited and primeval like the universe, that nobody has seen before you."

The expression tava prasannena arjuna, "for your satisfaction, Arjuna", indicates that the Lord is happy to give happiness to his devotee. This is the actual meaning of love.

God does not need anything. He does not need to accept any offering, or to perform any activity, but he always thinks about the benefit and the happiness of the devotees. This is not favoritism, because the Lord also thinks constantly about the benefit of all creatures. Krishna had already declared: samo 'ham sarva-bhuteshu na me dveshyo 'sti na priyah, ye bhajanti tu mam bhakṣya mayi te tesu caṇy aham, "I am equally disposed towards all living beings. I do not hate anyone, and I do not favor anyone. Yet, when someone offers me a sincere service in devotion, I reciprocate with love." (9.29) and ye yatha mam prapadyante tams tathaiva bhajamy aham, "O Partha, as much as they surrender to me, in the same way I reciprocate with them." (4.11)

And also: ananyas cintayanto mam ye janah paryupāsate, tesham nityabhiyuktanam yoga-kṣhemam vahamy aham, "Those who are interested only in me and my worship are always favorably engaged. I personally carry what they need." (9.22)

The supreme form mentioned in this verse is the four-armed Vishnu form. Just like the Visva rupa, this form is extremely popular and recommended as the object of meditation for all the yogis and bhaktas, therefore its description is found many times in several scriptures, especially in the Puranas focusing on Vishnu, such as the Bhagavata, Vishnu, Padma, Narada, Brahma vaivarta, Varaha, Matsya, and Kurma. In these texts, we find that several persons actually obtained the darshana of Vishnu in his four-armed form.

So when Krishna says, "nobody has seen this form before", the meaning of his statement must be deeper, just like when it is said that God has no material qualities (nirguna): the secret is revealed in this verse itself, where we read tejomayam visvam anantam adyam, "the original form, without beginning and without end, made of light, that encompasses the universe".

The four-armed Vishnu form seen by Arjuna is ever fresh, nava yauvanam, and although it is unchanged eternally, it is eternally new. The expression tejo mayam, "made of light", is very interesting. We have already elaborated on the meaning of tejas as splendor, heat and light, and power. The transcendental body of Vishnu, or Narayana, is not an ordinary body made of gross material elements, but it is pure consciousness, manifested as light.

From Narayana all the jivas emanate, at first in the form of light or anu atma (atomic souls): just like an atomic explosion produces a blinding flash of light when atoms are dissolved and sub-atomic particles are exposed, we can understand that spirit is a sub-atomic manifestation of energy, that is naturally as bright and radiant as the sun (brahma maya arka varnah, Bhagavata Purana, 10.46.32). This was also stated in a previous verse in this chapter: divi surya-sahasrasya bhaved yugapad utthita, yadi bhah sadrisi sa syad bhasas tasya mahatmanah, "If thousands of suns were rising simultaneously in the sky, that radiance would be similar to the radiance of the great Atman." (11.12). It is reported that while watching the first modern nuclear explosion at the Trinity Test in New Mexico, on 16 July 1945, Julius Robert Oppenheimer (1904-1967), famous as the "father of the atomic bomb", emotionally quoted this verse from the Bhagavad gita.

This transcendental form of Vishnu is manifested through God's internal Yogamaya, or atma yoga, the cohesive spiritual vibration that constitutes the higher energy or shakti. On the spiritual level, everything is radiant and manifested as pure energy - from the transcendental body of the Personality of Godhead to the siddha svarupa of the individual souls, to the siddha vastu of the environment, so much that all existence is self-effulgent and radiant, and there is no need for sun, moon, or electricity.

This is confirmed in Bhagavad gita (15.6, na tad bhasayate suryo na sasanko na pavakab) as well as in Katha Upanishad (2.2.15, na tatra suryo bhati na chandra tarakam, nema vidyuto bhanti kuto 'yam agnih).

evamrūpaḥ śakya ahaṁ nṛloke draṣṭum tvadanyena kurupravīra || 11-48 ||

na: not; veda yajna: by the Vedic sacrifice(s); adhyayanaiḥ: by the study of the scriptures; na: not; danaiḥ: by giving charity; na ca: not even; kriyābhiḥ: by kriyas; na: not; tapobhiḥ: by austerities; ugraiḥ: very severe; evam rūpaḥ: this very form; śakyaḥ: (one) can; aham: I; nṛi loke: among the human beings; draṣṭum: to see; tvat: than you; anyena: by others; kurupravīra: o greatest among the Kuru warriors.

"O greatest among the Kuru warriors, I have allowed no other human being except you to see this form. One cannot (see it) by the performance of Vedic sacrifice, or by the study of the scriptures, or as the result of giving charity, engaging in yoga kriyas/ sadhana, or even engaging in great austerities."

The expression tvad anyena means "other than you", and implies that the four-armed Vishnu form manifested by Krishna specifically for Arjuna is very intimate. As we know already, Arjuna is not an ordinary human being, but he is a manifestation of the Lord himself for a particular mission, an eternal expansion and companion of Vishnu, so his particular perspective must be special indeed.

We have seen from several examples related in Puranas that sincere devotees obtained the darshana of Vishnu after engaging in austerities (like Dhruva and the Pracetas), performing Vedic sacrifices (like Prithu and Daksha), and so on; therefore Krishna's statement in this verse indicates that such meritorious religious activities in themselves are simply the container or vessel for the really essential ingredient - that is bhakti, pure love and devotion for God. Of course we should not conclude that these auspicious religious activities are not recommended or useful, because in fact they constitute the preliminary preparation that purifies our hearts and minds from material contamination. They are required, but they are not sufficient to give us the final result. The auspicious actions listed in this verse can be summarized as jnana and vairagya, the two liberating factors that Krishna has been describing in Bhagavad gita from the very beginning, from the statement gatasun agatasums ca nanusocanti panditah, "Those who really know the truth do not grieve for the dead or for the living" (2.11). The first teaching offered by Krishna is that we should learn the difference between the temporary material body and the eternal spirit soul - the sum and substance of knowledge. The sthita prajna, or the person who is solidly on the level of knowledge, is presented as the example to be followed in 2.54, 2.55, 2.57, 2.58, 2.61, 2.67, 2.68. The entire chapter 4 is dedicated to explain jnana, and the importance of jnana is specifically highlighted in verses 3.3, 3.26, 3.33, 3.39, 3.40, 3.41, 4.10, 4.19, 4.23, 4.27, 4.28, 4.33, 4.34, 4.36, 4.37, 4.38, 4.39, 4.41, 4.42, 5.15, 5.16, 5.17, 6.8, 7.2, 7.16, 7.17, 7.18, 7.19, 9.1, 10.11, 13.12, 13.18, 13.28, 13.35, 14.1, 14.2, 14.11, 15.10, 15.15, 18.18, 18.50, 18.63, 18.70, 18.72.

The particular type of jnana that comes from Vedas is also called vidya, and it is praised in 5.18, 6.23, 9.2, 9.20, 10.17, 10.32. As long as one is immersed in the contaminating ignorance of material identification and attachment, it will be impossible to have the real darshana of the Lord, even if we are daily in contact with his image in the temple or in our house. In fact, one of the most notable scholars in the bhakti tradition, Rupa Gosvami, writes in his Bhakti rasamrta sindhu (1.2.101): sruti smṛti puranadi pancaratra vidhim vina, aikantiki harer bhaktir utpatayaiva kalpate, "so-called exclusive devotion to Hari is simply a disturbance to society when it is not solidly based on the knowledge contained in sruti, smṛiti, Puranas and all the other scriptures."

Similarly, vairagya (6.35, 13.9, 18.52) and tyaga (18.1, 18.2, 18.4) are amply discussed in Bhagavad gita, especially at its conclusion, as a fundamental principle that we need to understand very clearly and practice correctly, and the entire chapter 5 is dedicated to sannyasa. Bhakti, devotion, is the inner motivation that must sustain jnana and vairagya, otherwise they will be simply expressions of pride and arrogance. When yajnas are performed to show off one's opulence or advancement in religion, or simply to obtain a material benefit, they cannot produce bhakti and please God. Similarly, when one studies the scriptures and explores the science of self realization merely for theoretical and academic scholarship, to get a degree or social recognition, or even simply increase one's personal pride (individual or collective, as in sectarian considerations), the door to the direct experience of God remains closed.

When there is no bhakti, even charity offered selflessly to meritorious persons is still incomplete and does not attract God's personal attention. Krishna has already explained that one should offer all such activities directly to him (yat karosi, yad asnasi, yaj juhosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya, tat kuruva mad arpanam, "'O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice in yajnas, whatever you give in charity, whatever you endure in the name of austerity - do it for me." 9.27). When we perform our duty for God in a sentiment of devotion, we still get benefits from the results of our actions, but we also purify ourselves from the ahankara and mamatva that prevent us from actually perceiving God.

ma: do not; te: for you; vyatha: fear/ disturbance; ma: do not; ca: and; vimudha bhavah: confusion; dristva: seeing; rupam: form; ghoram: horrible; idriḥ: like this; mama: my; idam: this; vyapeta bhiḥ: free from all fear; prita manah: pleased mind; punah: again; tvam: you; tat: that; eva: certainly; me: my; rupam: form; idam: this; prapasya: look.

"Look at this form of mine, and let your mind become satisfied and free from fear. Do not be perturbed and confused by the vision of my terrifying form."

The key words in this verse are vyatha ("fear"), vimudha ("confusion") and vyapeta bhiḥ ("free from fear"). God is not interested in terrorizing us into blind obedience and submission, even if this fear is caused simply by the contemplation of his powerful Virata rupa (ghoram rupam) and his/ her majestic glories as Time eternal (kala or kalī). Our surrender should be motivated by love, not by fear. It should be the blissful abandon by which a parent submits to the whims of his/ her small child while playing, or a lover to the intimate desires of the lover, or a trusting child or disciple to the expert guidance of a venerable elder.

The first word in the verse is ma, "do not", and expresses the affectionate concern of Krishna for his dear friend Arjuna: "do not be upset", "do not be perturbed". When we actually realize God, we find that everything is happiness and peacefulness there - all the upsetting conditions of material existence disappear, and we truly feel home at last. This peacefulness is not the stillness and detachment that we may experience in this world due to material sattva, that quickly turns into tamas as inertia and oblivion. It is rather a bubbling fountainhead of happiness and love, that inspires us to unconditional and constant devotional service. In that consciousness, we directly participate to the supreme Consciousness and therefore we perceive the sufferings of the conditioned souls in their true meaning - as the dark nightmare of confused souls who just need to wake up in order to find their perfect happiness. Therefore, just like God descends as avatara to carry the knowledge of dharma for the benefit of the good people (paritranaṇa sadbhunam vinasaya ca dushkritam, dharma-samsthapanarthaya sambhavami yuge yuge, 4.8), the self-realized soul, the pure devotee, also walks in this world among the confused people to bring the light of knowledge and consciousness. This work must never be done through violence or fear, because rajas and tamas actually lead the souls in the opposite direction. Violence and fear can be properly used only to stop physical aggression against innocent and good people, because they are required to counteract the violence and fear perpetrated by criminals of all kinds. This is why kshatriyas (who protect the people from aggressions) and brahmanas (who teach and guide people in spirituality, religion and ethics) are two separate groups that cooperate but never encroach on each other's work. Only asuras resort to material repression and coercion in the name of spirituality and religion, to pressurize people to engage in a type of worship or confession of belief - that they foolishly mistake for actual belief and religion. Such distorted ideologies and practices do not deserve the name of dharma, because they are fundamentally adharmic and deeply sinful. The Vedic path to religion and spirituality is blissful attraction (prita manah), that is expressed through beautiful divine forms, activities, names, qualities, as well as songs, dance, flowers, colors, lights, sweet scents, delicious food, and loving service not only from the devotee to the Lord, but also from the Lord to the devotee, and from devotees to devotees, and even to all other people and beings - because God lives in the hearts of all (sarva-bhutatma-bhutatma, 5.7), (subridam sarva-bhutanam, 5.29), (samam sarveshu bhuteshu tishthantam paramesvaram, 13.28), (mamaivamso jiva-loke jiva-bhutat sanatanah, 15.7), (sarva-bhuta-sthitam yo mam bhajatya ekatvam asthitah, 6.31), (aham atma gudakesa sarva-bhutasaya-sthitah, 10.20).

This characteristic of friendliness and affection towards all beings becomes increasingly important in Krishna's instructions in Bhagavad gita. It starts with equanimity, that is freedom from foolish discriminations based on bodily prejudice: vidya-vinaya-sampanne brahmane gavi hastini, suni caiva sva-pake ca panditah sama-darsinah, "The panditas (wise learned persons) look with equal (friendliness) to the brahmana who is learned and gentle, to the cow and the elephant, as well as to the dog and to the (uncivilized) dog eater" (5.18), and sarva-bhuta-stham atmanam sarva-bhutanam catmani, ikshyate yoga-yuktatma sarvatra sama-darsanah, "One who is connected through Yoga contemplates the atman that is situated in all living entities and all the living entities as situated in the atman, therefore s/he is equally disposed towards everyone." (6.29)

However, in later verses Krishna clearly indicates that equanimity is not enough: we must actively work for the benefit of all beings, overcoming all sense of duality (chinna-dvaidha yatatmanah sarva-bhuta-bite ratah, 5.25), and renouncing all forms of enmity and not only of attachment (mad bhaktah saiga-varjita nirvairah sarva-bhuteshu, 11.55). A real devotee is recognized because s/he does not hate any living being, but s/he is friendly and compassionate towards all: because s/he is free from abankara and mamatva, s/he is tolerant and balanced in all circumstances (adveshita sarva-bhutanam maitrah karuna eva ca, nirmamo nirahankarah sama-dubkha-sukhab kshami, 12.13). Again the next verse says that he works actively for the benefit of all beings (sarva-bhuta-bite ratah, 12.4), and he is compassionate and kind to all (ahimsa satyam akrodhas tyagah santir apaisunam, daya bhuteshu aloluptvam mardavam hrir acapalam, 16.2).

āśvāsayāmāsa ca bhītamenam bhūtvā punaḥ saumyavapurmahātmā ॥ 11-50 ॥

sañjayaḥ: Sanjaya; uvāca: said; iti: like this; arjunam: to Arjuna; vasudevah: the son of Vasudeva; tatha: then; uktvā: speaking; svakam: his own; rūpaṁ: form; darśayam āsa: he showed; bhūyaḥ: again; asvasayam āsa: he comforted; ca: and; bhītam: frightened; enam: him; bhūtvā: becoming; punaḥ: again; saumya: sweet/ kind; vapur: body; maha atma: the great Atman.

Sanjaya said, Thus speaking to Arjuna, Vasudeva manifested again his original form, comforting and relieving him from all fears. The great Atman again appeared in his sweetest body.

The word mahatma, or maha atman ("great self") is used here as the equivalent of param atman ("supreme self"), indicating the supreme Consciousness. This meaning has been applied already in previous verses of this chapter (11.2, 11.12, 11.20, 11.37) while it had been used to indicate individual souls in 7.19, 8.15, 9.13.

It will be used again at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita, in verse 18.74, applied to both Krishna and Arjuna.

We can therefore understand that atman is the quality of the self, maha atman is the quality of the realized self, and param atman is the quality of the supreme self - Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan. There is no contradiction or opposition between the individual and the Supreme: any such opposition is merely due to illusion (mahamaya), that turns the consciousness or jivatman "outside" (bahir mukha) instead of "inside" (towards the self). Of course, this does not make any sense for those who are convinced that they are the body, because when we speak of "self" they immediately think about the material coverings they are wearing. They cannot perceive themselves as the consciousness, because such consciousness is colored by the gunas or material qualities that constitute the body and all the objects around them.

The expression svakam rūpaṁ is equivalent of svayam rūpaṁ, "own form", and refers to the particular form in which Krishna relates with Arjuna. On the spiritual level, the rūpa (form or body) is non-different from the bhava (sentiment, feeling or consciousness) generally expressed through the rasa or relationship. This applies both to God and to the individual soul. On the level of the supreme Brahman (Bhagavan), the differences between the various forms are not contaminated by material considerations of hierarchy, therefore there is no real difference between Vishnu and Krishna. At the same time, we can say that the form of Krishna is more intimate, and therefore more difficult to perceive and relate to, because the devotee must be totally free from all impurities. While for a conditioned soul it is relatively easy to remain respectful towards the powerful and magnificent form of Vishnu, he can easily underestimate the sweet and familiar form (saumya vapuh) of Krishna and therefore fail to understand his actual nature. However, the intensity of feeling (bhava) that a devotee can experience in the intimate relationship with Krishna is much deeper and stronger than we can find in the awed and respectful admiration and veneration for Vishnu, that keeps us at a certain distance. This is the key to understand why in the tradition of bhakti, Krishna is considered most important, even more than Vishnu or Narayana: the Supreme Personality of God. The greatness of God is the greatness of Consciousness, and the stronger and more intense and complete this Consciousness is, the "more completely divine" we come to perceive it. However, Krishna and Vishnu continue to be the one and same Personality of God.

dṛṣṭvetaṁ mānuṣaṁ rūpaṁ tava saumyaṁ janārdana । idānīmasmi samvṛttaḥ sacetaḥ prakṛtiṁ gataḥ ॥ 11-51 ॥

arjunah: Arjuna; uvāca: said; dṛiṣṭva: seeing; idam: this; manusam: human-like; rūpaṁ: form; tava: your; saumyam: sweet; janardana: Janardana; idanim: presently; asmi: I am; samvṛtataḥ: settled; sa cetah: with my consciousness; prakṛitim: natural; gataḥ: (I have) come.

Arjuna said, "O Janardana, by seeing this human-like form of yours, that is so sweet, I am now pacified and my consciousness has returned to its natural state."

The saumya vāpu (sweet and serene form) of Krishna that is manifested to Arjuna is a human-like form (manusam rūpam), benevolent, unassuming and familiar, that does not inspire awe or reverence. The feeling or bhava of such form is love and affection and it can be obstructed by awe and reverence, therefore the Yogamaya of the Lord is covering his majestic glories and presenting a lovable boy or young man, who inspires affection and intimacy instead of fear and awe. In particular circumstances the bhava or rasa can be perturbed by events, visions, thoughts, and memories that are in contrast with it, but for a pure devotee this is just a temporary situation, usually provided by the Lord precisely to stimulate the emotions of the devotee. At a more primitive level of understanding of spiritual and religious life, a devotee expects a relationship with God to give material prosperity and success, good health, respect from society, and fulfillment of material desires. However, this is not sufficient to help the devotee progress in spiritual realization and bhakti, because once he has obtained his desired boons or blessings, an ordinary person normally loses interest in religion and forgets about God. Therefore in Bhagavata Purana (1.8.25) we find queen Kunti saying, vipadāḥ santu taḥ sarsvat, tatra tatra jagad guru, bhavato darsanam yat syad, apunar bhava darshanam, "O jagat guru, we don't mind having to face difficulties in life, because at such times we (most easily) find you, and this means that we will not have to take birth again."

Later (10.88.8) Krishna himself will say, yasyāham anugriṇāmi harisyē tad dhanam sanaiḥ, tato adhanam tyajanty asya svajana duḥkha duḥkhitam, "When I want to favor someone, I gradually take away everything he owns, so that he loses all relationships and goes through disappointments and troubles." As we can easily remember, this place of grief, disappointment and perplexity towards material life was precisely the starting point of Bhagavad gita - Arjuna's viśada. This does not mean that we should become crazy and suicidal masochists and hope to get more and more troubles in life: suffering is not a value in itself, and certainly we should not aspire to loss, difficulties and failures. Rather, we should develop a positive attitude, approaching difficulties as opportunities to grow and evolve, and setbacks as valuable lessons to better understand what we need to do to improve. As they say, failure can be the pillar of future success. At a more intimate level of rasa, this consideration becomes irrelevant, and the difficulties in life take a totally different dimension, called vipralambha or separation, in which the ordinary perception of life disappears and the devotee is totally immersed in the ecstasy of remembering God. We can see this transcendental madness in Radharani, as well as in mother Yasoda and mother Devaki, who undoubtedly represent the closest and most intimate relationships with Krishna. Krishna Chaitanya, too, manifested a similar ecstasy, at a level that ordinary people cannot possibly access or understand. The apparent sufferings of these great spiritual personalities are in fact a source of ecstatic happiness, in which the distinction between the lover and the loved totally disappears. However, to a superficial observer, who is identified with the material body and sense gratification, such expression of ecstasy will appear material, and even grotesque or degraded.

This is the reason why we should always be extremely careful to avoid judging the actual position of other people in regard to spirituality and religion, based on the external observation of their personal activities. Of course, this only applies to personal activities that do not cause harm, suffering or damage to others: the madness of spiritual ecstasy can cause erratic personal behaviors and in extreme case even self-inflicted damage, but it will never cause any harm, suffering or damage to others.

The word prakṛitīm, "nature", refers to the natural inclination of the consciousness, that produces a comfortable feeling of balance and peace of mind. The word prakṛiti can be understood from its fundamental components, pra-kṛiti, meaning "making at first", or "creating". In this particular context, it can be explained at various levels. At an ordinary level, Arjuna's nature is the human perspective that is familiar with a sweet and affectionate human-like form, his friend and relative, with whom he has shared so many intimate moments (11.41-42). At a deeper level, it refers to the para prakṛiti, transcendental nature, known as Yogamaya, who manifests the loving sakhya rasa that connects Arjuna with Krishna.

srī: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; su durdarsam: very difficult to see; idam: this; rūpam: form; dristavan asi: (that) you have seen; yat: that; mama: my; devah: the devas; api: even; asya: of this; rūpasya: of the form; nityam: always; darsana-kankṣinah: desiring to see.

The wonderful Lord said, "This form that you are contemplating is extremely difficult to see. Even the devas always aspire to obtain its darshana."

The intimate human-like form of God is certainly not more ordinary than the other divine forms. In fact, it is even more extraordinary and difficult to understand than any other form, because it remains covered by Yogamaya (7.15, 7.25) in a way that confuses less intelligent people. This magic is so amazing that it can show exactly the opposite of what really is: paradoxically, the highest level in the spiritual dimension then appears to be the lowest, so as to lead the ill-motivated persons deeper into the spell of illusion.

Vishnu is hidden - avyakta, "non manifested" - in more than one sense. In the second chapter of Vedānta sūtras (aphorism 11) we find that Brahman and Atman (atmanau, "the two Atmans") enter into "the cave" (guhā) of the material body or the cosmos, that is the material body of the Virata Purusha, and Brahman in the form of Paramatma (antaryami, "that is inside", aphorism 1.2.18) supports the existence of the body and of all the elements, although it remains invisible to the human eye.

In the conversation between Yama and Nachiketa we find in Katha Upanishad, Yama says, "One who is intelligent focuses the mind to know the Atman, that is difficult to perceive, hidden within the cave of the heart, the supreme primeval Lord. Such a person goes beyond the level of joy and sorrows." (1.2.12). Again in Katha Upanishad (1.3.1) we find the following statement: ritam pibantau sukritasya loke guham pravistau parama parardhe, chayatapau brahmavido vadanti pancagnayo ye ca tri-nacitekah, "Those who know the Brahman, who perform the five fire sacrifices and honor three times Nachiketa's sacrifice, speak about light and shadow, the two (Atmans) who have entered inside the body, the innermost cave of the heart, that is the supreme abode."

Narada Muni thus addresses Krishna after the killing of the Kesi asura in Vrindavana: tvam atma sarva bhutanam eko jyotir ivadhasam, gudho guha sayah saksi maha purusa isvarah, "You are the Self in all the beings, the One, hidden in the cave of the heart like the radiant light of fire in the kindling wood. O great purusha, o isvara, you are the witness" (10.37.11).

Krishna appears to Devaki and Vasudeva, and then he is immediately transferred to Gokula Vrindavana, to hide him from the evil Kamsa. There he remains hidden as a simple cowherd boy, playing with the village people, occasionally exhibiting amazing feats that remain like brief flashes of lightning in the peaceful and refreshing night of his daily activities and relationships.

The peak of Krishna's lila in Vrindavana is the rasa dance with the gopis - again, a secret and intimate episode protected by the veil of the moonlit night in the beautiful forest on the bank of the Yamuna river. At the height of the rasa lila, again Krishna becomes hidden even from his dearest gopis, creating the climax of excitement and ecstasy that fuels the emotions of love in separation.

After leaving Vrindavana, Krishna continued to act generally like an ordinary human being, while his occasionally extraordinary deeds could easily remain unnoticed by envious or ignorant people, who often underestimated him. To understand why Krishna would want to act in this way, we may bring the example of a very great and famous personality, who chooses to travel incognito to avoid wasting time and energy with undeserving curious people, and revealing himself only in special circumstances, and only to carefully selected persons, for the sake of loving exchanges. This is precisely the case of Arjuna and his brothers.

In Bhagavata Purana (7.15.75) we find this statement: yuyam nr loke bata bhuri bhaga, lokam punana munayo abhiyanti, yesam grihan avasatiti saksad, gudham param brahma manusya lingam, "You Pandavas are most fortunate among human beings, because many great saints, who can purify the entire world, have visited your house as guests. Indeed, the supreme Brahman, appearing in the form of a human being, has been residing confidentially in your house".

na: not; aham: I; vedaiḥ: by the study of Vedas; na: not; tapasā: by austerities; na: not; danena: by charity; na: not; ca: and; ijyaya: by performing ritual worship; śakyaḥ: (one becomes) capable; evam: and; vidhaḥ: in this way; drastum: to see; dṛṣṭavan asi: you are seeing; mam: me; yatha: like this.

"One cannot see it in this way as you are contemplating it, not even by the study of the Vedas or through austerities or charity, or the performance of ritual worship."

This verse is almost identical to 11.48, where Krishna stated: "O greatest among the Kuru warriors, I have allowed no other human being except you to see this form. One cannot (see it) by the performance of Vedic sacrifice, or by the study of the scriptures, or as the result of giving charity, engaging in yoga kriyas/ spiritual sadhana, or even engaging in great austerities." While in verse 11.48 Krishna was speaking about the four-armed form of Vishnu, now he is speaking about his human-like form, apparently ordinary and unassuming, that is so familiar to Arjuna as his intimate friend and close relative.

As we have observed several times, repetition in Vedic scriptures is not considered a literary flaw, but it is used purposefully to show the particular importance of a statement or concept. Therefore we can conclude that these two verses constitute a key passage in the revelation offered through Arjuna about the meditation on the form of God. In chapters 10 and 11 Krishna has manifested his universal form, the Virata Rupa, to help us understand that God is not limited by matter, time, space and individuality. Now that we have (hopefully) cleared such ignorant misconceptions, artificially built on our own material bodily identification, Krishna has returned to the apparently easier forms of Vishnu and Krishna, but he is repeatedly stating that such forms are even more difficult to see and understand than the amazing and majestic Virata rupa.

Materialists are perplexed and sometimes even horrified at the image of God having thousands, hundreds or just dozens of arms, so when the number of arms is reduced to four or to a normal-looking single pair, their minds become pacified. But that peacefulness is totally different from the feelings of Arjuna or any other genuine realized devotee, because it is based on the reinforcement of the old prejudice of bodily identification. A material human body with four arms is not a divine miracle, but a monstrous deformity, that impairs movements and causes lameness and malfunctions, and needs to be addressed through medical procedures to ease the suffering of the patient. Therefore when a materialist moves his attention from the four-armed form of Vishnu to the two-armed form of Krishna, he feels better because his mind can return to its material antropomorphic vision of God as a regular person who merely has some more power than others. On the other hand, a jnani (a person who has the proper knowledge) sees the many-armed forms of God as the expression of his/ her multiple powers (paraśya śaktir vividhaiva śrīyate, Svetasvatara Upanishad, 6.8) that appear simultaneously and not in contradiction to each other. It is easier to see these forms as manifesting a greater power and mystery than we can find in ordinary material bodies - a concept that anthropologists and psychologists have explored in the field of symbolic language.

However, the deceiving simplicity of Krishna's two armed form presents a greater challenge to the average mind, because it can be truly appreciated only through the depth of vision that is afforded by transcendental knowledge and devotional attachment. Anything less, and the observer will remain on the surface of the mystery, with the danger of being led astray in labeling Krishna as an exaggerated historical personality or an "Indian mythological figure" like the characters in fairy tales and fictional novels or comics. This temptation has already produced misleading presentations of the Gods honored in ancient cultures, and is attacking many divine Personalities from the Hindu tradition, reducing them to fictional characters in fantasy films, cartoons, and TV serials, for the purpose of entertainment and commercial profit. Too often such productions are controlled by people who are utterly unqualified spiritually, or even ill-motivated just like the colonial indologists of mainstream academia.

Ignorant and simple minded people are unable to detect the dangerous and misleading contents of such productions, and sometimes even consider them commendable because they "propagate Indian culture". They cannot understand how the pure nutritious nectar of God's lilas has been poisoned, like milk touched by the lips of a venomous serpent, and the teachings originally carried by such sacred stories have been distorted or completely lost.

भक्त्या त्वनन्यया शक्य अहमेवविधोऽर्जुन । ज्ञातुं द्रष्टुं च तत्त्वेन प्रवेष्टुं च परन्तप ॥ ११-५४ ॥

bhaktiā tvananyayā śakya ahamevaṁvidho'ṛjuna | jñātum draṣṭum ca tattvena praveṣṭum ca parantapa || 11-54 ||

bhaktiā: through bhakti; tu: but; ananyayā: nothing else; śakya: capable; aham: I; evam vidha: in this manner; arjuna: o Arjuna; jnatum: to know; drastum: to see; ca: and; tattvena: in truth; praveṣṭum: to enter; ca: and; parantapa: o Arjuna.

"O Arjuna, only through bhakti it is possible to know and to see me truly, and to enter into me."

Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.23) explains that bhakti is the key that unlocks the understanding of God (yasya deve para bhaktir yatha deve tatha gurau, tasyaite kathita hy arthab prakasante mahatmanah). This love and devotion should be directed towards God and also towards the spiritual teacher, who is dedicated to helping us attain God. But what is bhakti? In a world where the meaning of love and the meaning of devotion have been muddled and confused by so many cheap applications and superimpositions, we need to return to the basics. Love is not lust or superficial sentimentalism, and devotion is not sectarianism or blind allegiance and belief. Neither of them consists in cheering louder than others, or managing to get in the front row in the photo opportunity or parades. Actual love is a sincere and selfless service and attention to the happiness to the person we love, which obviously includes making serious efforts in trying to understand and tune in with his thoughts and feelings and desires - with his consciousness, his true self. Actual devotion means dedicating all one's energies, resources, time, and purpose of life to the service of the cause we are supporting. We can easily understand that knowledge and renunciation are required to progress in love and devotion, but they are not sufficient to attain the ultimate purpose. Constant meditation and service can be sustained only by sincere love, that gives us the strength to overcome any obstacle - and love is the means and the end, because love is Consciousness. In Bhagavata Purana Krishna instructs Uddhava about the science of bhakti:

bhakti aham ekaya grahyah sraddhayatma priyah satam, bhaktib punati man nistha sva pakan api sambhavat, "I can be obtained only through pure bhakti, by those faithful saints that are in love with me. Love and firm faith in me can even purify a chandala from the contamination of his birth." (11.14.21)

yam na yogena sankhyena dana vrata tapo adbhvaraih, vyakhyaya svadhyaya sannyasaih prapnyad yatnavan api, "(This realization) cannot be attained through yoga, sankhya, charity, vratas and tapas, Vedic sacrifices, study of Vedic scriptures or teaching Vedic knowledge to others, or by accepting the order of sannyasa - not even with great efforts." (11.12.9)

Kapila's teachings on bhakti, occupying a considerable section of Bhagavata Purana (3rd canto, chapters 25, 28 and 29), also confirm the same truth: asevayayam prakriter gunanam, jnanena vairagya vijrimbhitena, yogena mayy arpitaya ca bhakti mam pratyag atmanam ibharundhe, "This (person) does not engage in the service of the material gunas, but develops jnana and vairagya through the practice of yoga, offering (everything) to me with devotion. Such a person attains me, the supreme Atman, in this very lifetime/ body/ world." (3.25.27)

The same idea had already been expressed by the ladies of Hastinapura, who were contemplating Krishna as he was preparing to depart to return to Dvaraka: sa va ayam yat padam atra surayo, jitendriya nirjita matarivanah, pasyanti bhakti utkalita amatmana nanv esa sattvam parimarstum arhati, "This same (Krishna) who is here (in this place) can be seen through bhakti by those suras (dharmic persons) who have conquered their senses and perfected themselves to the full purity of the self. Only this (bhakti) has the power to totally purify the mind/ existence." (Bhagavata Purana, 1.10.23).

The statement in this verse is confirmed by a verse at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.55), that reads: bhakti mam abhijanati jayan yas casmi tattvatah, tato mam tattvato jnatva visate tad-anantaram, "One can truly know me, as I am, only through bhakti. Then s/he enters into me as a result."

The two words praveṣṭum ("to enter") and visate ("enters") are indeed extraordinary in this context, as they cannot be used with reference to an ordinary person who has a material body, but make perfect sense if we apply them to the supreme Personality of God as the sum total of all Consciousness.

There is no contradiction between the concept of Brahman and the concept of Paramatma and Bhagavan, for those who have actually attained that level of realization. God is neither "impersonal" or "personal" (in the limited sense that most people give to this definition): he is "trans-personal", or "omni-personal", as he contains all beings and existences and is the source of them all.

In mainstream scientific terms, we could say that God is a sort of magnetic field created by consciousness or constituted by consciousness. Consciousness means intelligence, knowledge and will power. It can never be impersonal or void, otherwise it would not be conscious, therefore God is a person, but not limited to a material body. He can manifest any body/ form according to his will and control it perfectly, and his most intense and intimate form is naturally the Personality that is fully engaged in loving exchanges, as love is the highest expression of the unity of consciousness.

As individual jiva atmans, we can enter into this Consciousness field and thus become "Krishna Conscious". This complete union with the Absolute does not require the loss of our spiritual individuality or transcendental personality, because these constitute our inherent nature and cannot be destroyed (2.12). Only the material individuality and personality are dissolved in the process, but this is not a loss because they were always temporary and fictitious anyway. It is not easy to explain the sublime position of the liberated atman that enters into the supreme Existence and Consciousness, because our ordinary dealings in this material world constitute a totally different paradigm, except for a few special moments in which we experience the thrill of ecstasy that makes us forget about ourselves in love and happiness.

निर्वैरः सर्वभूतेषु यः स मामेति पाण्डव ॥ ११-५५ ॥

matkarmakṛṇmatparamo madbhaktaḥ saṅgavarjitah | nirvairah sarvabhūteṣu yaḥ sa māmēti pāṇḍava || 11-55 ||

mat: my; karma kṛin: worker; mat paramah: (seeing) me as the Supreme; mat bhaktah: my devotee; sanga: from attachments; varjitah: free; nirvairah: without enmity; sarva bhutesu: towards all beings; yaḥ: that (person); sa: s/he; mam: to me; eti: comes; pandava: o son of Pandu.

"My devotee is engaged in working for me, and sees me as the supreme (reality). S/he has abandoned all association/ affiliation/ identification, and has no enmity towards any being. (In this way, my devotee) comes to me, o son of Pandu."

The greatest demonstration of love and devotion is practical service, or sincere work for the benefit of the object of our love. The word karma kṛit is the equivalent of the word karmachari, often used in Hindu religious groups or organizations to refer to activists who do not live in the ashrama but work for it in some way, by offering voluntary seva.

However, just working is not sufficient: a devotee should work with the proper consciousness, intelligence and transcendental realization. Gopala Tapani Upanishad (1.1) elaborates on this point: sac cid ananda rupaya krisnayaklista karine, namo vedanta vedaya gurave buddhi sakshine, "I offer my respect to Krishna, the form of Existence, Consciousness and Happiness, who removes all sorrows. Knowing him is knowing the purpose of the Vedas. He is the (supreme) guru, and the witness of intelligence."

As we have seen, bhakti is sustained by jnana and vairagya. The knowledge and awareness of the transcendental nature of God enable the devotee to transform his sincere work into genuine devotional service to the Supreme, and to recognize God's presence in all living beings. As we elaborated in the commentary to verse 49, the devotee perceives God in the hearts of all (Bhagavata Purana, 5.7, 5.18, 5.29, 6.29, 13.28, 15.7, 6.31, 10.20). This is also confirmed in Kapila's teachings on bhakti (3.28.42, 3.29.41-34), especially in the following verses:

aham sarvesu bhutesu bhutatmatavasthitah sada, tam avajanya mam martyah, kurute arca vidambanam, "I am always (living) within the self of all beings. If a man disrespects me in that (paramatma), any Deity worship he may perform will remain useless." (3.29.21)

yo mam sarvesu bhutesu santam atmanam isvaram, hitvarcam bhajate maudhyad bhasmany eva juhoti sah, "If someone disregards my presence in all beings as the Lord of all creatures, and then performs ritual worship, he is an idiot (like one who) pours oblations into the ashes (where there is no fire)." (3.29.22)

dvisatab para kaye mam manino bhinna darsinah, bhutesu baddha vairasya na manah santim ricchati, "One who offers obeisances to me but is hostile towards the bodies of others, seeing these beings as separate (from me/ from himself), can never attain peace of mind, because of his hatred towards my creatures." (3.29.23), atmanas ca parasyapi yah karoty antarodaram, tasya bhinna driso mrtuyur vidadhe bhayam ulbanam, "For one who makes discriminations between himself and others based on bodily identification, I am terrifying death." (3.29.26), atha mam sarva bhutesu bhutatmanam kriticalayam, arhayed dana manabhyam maitryabbinnena caksusa, "Therefore one should worship me as the self of the self in all creatures, by offering respects, gifts and friendship, and seeing everyone with an equal vision." (3.29.27)

This is also confirmed in Bhagavad gita 5.25, 11.55, 12.13, 12.4, 16.2. In this verse, Krishna very clearly states that one should relate with other living beings by remaining free from attachment and enmity. Being friendly to all creatures does not mean that we need to seek their companionship or engage in materialistic pursuits or activities just to make them happy. We should remain sanga varjitah - free from the bondage of belonging and possessions, personal attachments, affiliations, groups, organizations, and so on. At the same time we must be nirvairah - free from all sense of enmity and hostility.

Chapter 12

Bhakti yoga

The yoga of devotion

In the first part of the Bhagavad gita, Krishna has already given Arjuna all the necessary instructions to overcome the illusion of material identifications and attachments, and to perform his duty in full renunciation and in a spirit of religious sacrifice, constantly thinking about the Supreme Consciousness.

In the second part, Krishna has elaborated on this Supreme Consciousness, explaining that the purpose of life and meditation is to establish oneself on that level (sthitā prajña). When one attains the consciousness of Brahman, Paramatma, and Bhagavan, liberation is automatically achieved, and one does not need to take birth again in a material body.

This meditation and selfless service to the Supreme Consciousness is also called Bhakti, or devotion.

Already in the previous chapters (7, 8, 9, 10, 11) Krishna has offered a series of meditation visualizations that enable us to develop a genuine appreciation for God's glories and powers, and therefore give a solid meaning to our devotional sentiments. This is an essential preliminary step for those who are sincere devotees and want to avoid the pitfall of simplistic and sentimentalism, that is based on a material perception of Bhagavan. The problem of a primitive, materialistic concept of God is a widespread and cross-cultural phenomenon, because ignorance and material identification are natural tendencies in untrained persons. Of course, the problem becomes much more serious when the individual lives in a society that reinforces such ignorant delusions, or even teaches them as genuine and legitimate religious precepts.

The last few chapters of Bhagavad gita should have cleared any misconception in this regard, so now the text presents us with the chapter specifically named after Bhakti. Focusing the individual consciousness on the most intimate and loving level of the Supreme Consciousness is the highest form of meditation, and it should not be taken cheaply. To reach this level, one needs to develop gradually, often along a number of lifetimes (bahunam janmanam ante, 7.19), and Krishna clearly indicates here the stages of this journey. The first step is the acquisition of knowledge, that enables us to practice genuine meditation (vijñāna) and pursue Self realization. This applied knowledge will help us to become detached from the fundamental delusion of ahankāra and mātmā, and to perform our duty selflessly, offering the results to the Supreme. By dedicating all our actions to the Supreme, we become able to engage in vaidhī bhakti - the regulated practice of devotional service, and gradually our service becomes spontaneous devotion.

In the previous chapters Krishna was glorifying bhakti, while in this chapter he will explain specifically how to engage in devotional service.

arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; evam: like this; satata: always; yuktaḥ: engaged; ye: those who; bhaktah: the devotees; tvam: you; paryupāsate: (they) worship properly; ye: those; ca: and; api: also; akṣaram: eternal/ transcendental; avyaktam: non-manifested; teṣam: to them; ke: who; yoga vit tamah: the best of those who know yoga.

Arjuna said: "The devotees worship you in complete dedication, while others (meditate) on the non-manifested eternal (Reality): which (of these two approaches) is the highest understanding of yoga?"

The word yukta indicates the engagement of the senses in the service of the Supreme: this is the definition of bhakti, as offered by the Narada Pancharatra: brishikesha brishikena sevanam bhaktir ucyate.

However, we also know that yukta is from the same root from which the word yoga has developed. The fundamental meaning of yoga is therefore stated as the constant engagement in a higher and deeper level of consciousness. When bhakti, or loving devotion, is added to the practice of genuine yoga sadhana, we attain the perfection of life. It is important to understand that the definition of yoga does not refer to an "alternative" path or method that is not bhakti - in fact, yoga ("union") requires bhakti in order to attain perfection.

Krishna has applied the definition of yoga innumerable times in Bhagavad gita, and each chapter is entitled specifically after a different perspective on the multi-dimensional layers of meaning of the word "yoga". Therefore we should be careful not to minimize the import and scope of this definition. Other commentators have highlighted the importance of bhakti by opposing it to yoga, karma and jñāna, but we need to understand that such distinction is only instrumental, and not ontological. For this reason, the same commentators speak of bhakti yoga as compared to jñāna yoga and karma yoga, but they also translate all these definitions as "devotional service" (see for example verse 5.4). Specifically karma yoga is explained as "the practice of devotional service", and buddhi yoga is said to be "depending completely on God". Also, Krishna has already explained early in the text that jnana yoga (sankhya) is non-different from karma yoga (sankhya yogau prithag balah pravadanti na panditah, ekam apy asthitah samyag ubhayor vindate phalam, yat sankhyaibh prapya sthanam tad yogair api gamyate, ekam sankhyam ca yogam ca yah pasyati sa pasyati, 5.4-5).

The word satata ("always", "constantly") means that such service covers all aspects of life and activities, as Krishna has already stated before (yat karosi, yad asnasi, yaj juhosi dadasi yat, 9.27).

By explicitly using the definition of bhakta in reference to a specific level of yoga, Krishna is establishing the fact that bhakti (genuine devotion to the Supreme) is the highest level of yoga, and not an "alternative path" opposite to yoga itself. When he speaks about bhaktas and bhakti, he is unequivocally referring to the sentiment of devotion in a personal relationship of love (rasa), so we understand why in this verse Arjuna makes a distinction between the bhakta and the sadbhaka who meditates on the akshara - the abstract eternity and existence feature of Reality. We have already seen that akshara is a definition for the sacred syllable AUM, the primeval and transcendental sound vibration that is the origin and the foundation of the entire universe. As in the previous chapters Krishna has recommended meditation on the transcendental essence of the universe, in the contemplation of the Virata rupa, some people may equivocate and conclude that God should be worshiped only in its abstract form of majesty and power, as the existence in all existences. This is the Brahman realization, in which we clearly perceive that God is not limited by time, space or individuality.

In this verse, this non-manifested aspect of Reality is called aksharah, "unchangeable" or "changeless". Other synonyms often used to describe the non-manifested (avyakta) Brahman are nirvishesa ("without variety", "without differences") and nirakara ("formless"). Of course these definitions apply to the non-material quality of the existence of Brahman as the Universal Consciousness. In Vedic scriptures, Brahman or brahmayoti is compared to the rays of the sun, while Paramatma is comparable to the solar disc visible in the sky over everybody's head, and Bhagavan is the actual Sun, the original source of all the light, heat and power. Krishna states this fact very clearly: brahmano hi pratistha aham (14.27, "I am the foundation and origin of the Brahman"). Some people think that the path of bhakti developed later in history, during the Kali yuga, as opposed to the previous religious methods of yoga meditation, ritual sacrifice, and temple worship. This is not a fact. Bhakti, devotion, is the essential ingredient in all such religious and spiritual methods, and it has always been. The yuga dharma for the age of Kali is the discussion (glorification, recitation etc) about God, which includes names, forms, qualities, activities, teachings, and so on. Bhakti is the main factor for the proper application of this method, but also in Deity worship, ritual sacrifice and yoga meditation. In fact, in Bhagavad gita Krishna says that a genuine bhakta is the greatest yogi (yoginam api sarvesam mad gatenantaratmana, sraddhavan bhajate yo mam sa me yuktatamo matah, 6.47), (bhaktiya mama abhijanati yavan yas casmi tattvatah, 18.55), (man mana bhava mad bhakto mad yaji mam namaskuru, 18.65).

The expression yoga vit tamah ("the highest knower of yoga") is the superlative degree of the quality of knowledge referred to yoga, while the comparative degree would be vit tarah. Since in this verse the comparison is made between two degrees of knowledge of yoga, the use of the superlative expression should be taken to mean that all the other aspects of yoga are included, like we usually see in the suffix adi (equivalent to our "et cetera").

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

मय्यावेश्य मनो ये मां नित्ययुक्ता उपासते । श्रद्धया परयोपेताः ते मे युक्ततमा मताः ॥ १२-२ ॥

mayyāveśya mano ye mām nityayuktā upāsatē । śraddhayā parayopetāḥ te me yuktatamā matāḥ ॥ 12-2 ॥

srī: the wonderful; bhagavan: Lord; uvaca: said; mayi: to me; avesya: focusing/ entered; manah: the mind; ye: those who; mam: me; nitya: always; yuktah: united; upasate: worship; sraddhaya: with faith; paraya: supreme/ transcendental; upetah: attained; te: they; me: me; yukta-tamah: the most (intimately) united; matāḥ: considered.

The wonderful Lord said: "Those who are always keeping their mind in me and worship me with faith, always united with me, have attained the supreme level and I consider them as the most intimately/ highly united/ connected."

The statement in this verse is confirmed also at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.55), that reads: bhaktiya mam abhijanati yavan yas casmi tattvatah, tato mam tattvato jnatva visate tad-anantaram, "One can know me, as I truly am, only through bhakti. Then s/he enters into me as a result." Already in the previous chapter (11.54) Krishna had stated, bhaktiya tv ananyaya sakeya aham evam-vidho 'rjuna, jnatum drastum ca tattvena pravestum ca parantapa ("O Arjuna, only through bhakti it is possible to know and to see me truly, and to enter into me").

In that verse, the word pravestum ("to enter", equivalent to the visate of verse 18.55) had established the difference between the omnipresent and unlimited Bhagavan and the ordinary living entities who are limited by space and individuality. Here we find another synonym, avesya, that also means "entering into". In this verse Krishna clearly states that a bhakta, a devotee, always keeps his/ her mind inside God (the Supreme Consciousness) and is always engaged practically in worship. We may remember here that the upasana kanda is defined as that part of the Vedic scriptures that deals with the worship rituals, as opposed to the karma kanda (the performance of prescribed duties) and the jnana kanda (the pursuance of knowledge).

The word upasana specifically indicates worship as meditation, as in "approaching and sitting", that is the literal meaning (upa asana). In this sense, nitya could mean "regularly", as in the regulated sadhana that we perform every day before starting our ordinary activities. However, the qualification expressed by the word yukta (nitya yukta upasate) indicates that such "constant worship" does not refer merely to the ritualistic ceremonies called arcana or pujana and centered around the offering of various substances and services to the Deity. This cannot be done by "constantly connecting/ engaging".

Arcana is only one of the nine angas ("limbs") of devotional service: sravana, kirtana, smarana, arcana/ pujana, vandana, pada sevana/ paricarya, dasya, sakhya/ sakhi jana, and atma nivedana. Therefore we must understand that here upasana extends to all the other forms of worship: hearing and speaking (that also includes reading and writing) about God, remembering God, offering ceremonial worship, paying homage, following the instructions, always being ready to serve, developing a friendly attachment, and trusting God completely. While the first three steps (sravana, kirtana, smarana) can be focused also on the akshara and anyakta aspect of the Supreme, the second group of three (arcana, vandana, pada sevana) can be applied to the Virata rupa or the immanent manifestation of the Supreme in this world, described by Krishna in the previous chapters as the form of the Param Atman, the Supreme Soul living in the hearts of all beings. However, the last group of three (dasya, sakhya, atma nivedana) refers to a very personal relationship with the Supreme under the direct control of Yogamaya or Bhakti Devi. We should not think that it is impossible to have a real practical relationship with God as a Person, because Bhagavan includes both Paramatma and Brahman, and is even more than that. This union in devotion becomes possible through an act of faith (sraddha), by which we accept to humbly consider ourselves as simple parts of the sum total of Reality. Contrarily to what happens in some other ideologies based on dogma, the faith required in the process of bhakti is not blind acceptance prompted by allegiance, but an initial working hypothesis or trust, by which we shift our perception from self-centered to God-centered. It is the essential paradigm shift if we want to find a permanent center of gravity (sankarshana krishna) in the universe, because as long as the consciousness of reality is fragmented like rays of light pointing to different directions, each of the tiny "self-centered" beings will fight with all the others trying to conquer a central place in the universe.

As soon as we re-focus our consciousness on the actual center of the universe (Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan), we find our balance and proper orbit, like so many planets sailing in space through a perfect course around the Sun. All the factors must be present then: the constant consciousness of the universal presence of God in which we exist, the focusing of the mind and its functions, the practical engagement in worship and service, the faith that enables us to follow the method properly and correctly, and the direct personal connection with Bhagavan ("me"). In this regard, we should observe that the word upeta means "working hard", "making efforts", and "fully dedicated". Bhakti yoga or devotional service is not some sort of hobby or entertainment, or a part time interest that gives us some good opportunities for social interactions on Sunday afternoons or on festival days. It is a full time pursuit that demands complete dedication and constant effort - also highlighted here by the expression nitya yukta upasate.

ये त्वक्षरमनिर्देश्यमव्यक्तं पर्युपासते ।

सर्वत्रगमचिन्त्यञ्च कूटस्थमचलन्ध्रुवम् ॥ १२-३ ॥

ye tvakṣaramanirdeśyamavyaktaṁ paryupāsate | sarvatragamacintyañca kūṭasthamacalandhruvam || 12-3 ||

ye: those; tv: but; akṣaram: eternal/ transcendental; anirdeśyam: not visible (to the senses); anyaktam: non-manifested; pari upasate: worship in complete dedication/ correctly and sincerely; sarvatra: everywhere; gam: present; acintyam: inconceivable; ca: and; kuta stham: unchanging; achalam: non-moving; dhrumam: established.

"Those who offer their worship in complete dedication/ correctly and sincerely to the the akshara (Brahman/ Omkara), indescribable, non-manifested, all-pervading, inconceivable, unchanging, never moving and eternal Existence,

This verse is often studied together with the subsequent verse (12.4) as two halves of one statement. The complete statement reads: "Those who worship me correctly and sincerely as the akshara (Brahman/ Omkara), indescribable, non-manifested, all-pervading, inconceivable, unchanging, never moving and eternal Existence, will achieve me by controlling their senses, remaining equally disposed to all, and engaging in work for the benefit of all beings." (12.3-4)

The word kuta is particularly interesting here, as it has a number of different meanings that can add various levels of interpretation. The fundamental meaning is "motionless", as in a mountain; we can see the application of the term in the word annakuta, the hill of rice and other grains that is cooked and offered to the Deity on the auspicious occasion of Govardhana puja. It also means "center", as the permanent gravity center we were mentioning in our commentary to verse 12.2.

Another meaning is "unchanging". Later (15.16) Krishna will use this same expression (kutastho akshara ucyate, "it is said to be unchangeable and permanent") while describing the position of the living beings (bhutam) in the spiritual world, or at the spiritual level. In that verse, the expression kuta sthah suggests a permanent existence in which nothing changes because everything exists simultaneously.

However, the same word kuta can also have a more sinister meaning, as we see for example in 4.25.6, where Prahlada speaks of the delusional duties of materialistic family life based on bodily identification and possession/ belonging: grihesu kuta dharmesu putra dara dhanartha dhib, na param vindate mudho bhrāmyam samsara vartmasu, "These fools always remain meditating on the deceptive duties of family life, such as children, wife, and acquisition of wealth, and are unable to see anything more important or higher than that. Thus, they continue to run around on the various paths of the material world."

A similar derivative of kuta is kaitava, a word that is used at the beginning of the Bhagavata Purana (1.1.2) to indicate deceptive or false religiosity (dharmā projjhita kaitavo atra paramo nir mātṣaranam satam, "here (in this Purana) the false religiosity is completely rejected, and (only) the supreme (worshiped by) of those sattvik people who are completely free from envy (is discussed)").

In this application, the meaning of kuta is shifted from the comforting stability of eternal existence to the damaging stubbornness of the materialistic attachments and identifications. It is a dire warning: if we commit the fatal mistake of superimposing our material identifications and attachments to the practice of spiritual / religious life, we will be lost and crushed into a darkness that is even worse than simple ordinary selfish materialism.

Isa Upanishad (mantra 9) also warns us in the same way: andham tamah pravisanti ye avidyam upasate, tato bhuya iva te tamo ya u vidyayam ratah, "Those who worship/ serve ignorance enter into blind darkness, but those who choose to remain attached to (theoretical) knowledge (for its own sake) fall into an even greater darkness."

Sometimes a pretender cynically exploits the good name of spirituality and religiousness to pursue some materialistic goals, such as position, distinction, adoration, fame, name, profit, power over disciples and resources, etc. This disastrous choice leads to even greater darkness because these materialistic intentions harden the heart and make it cynical, heavy and deeply rooted into deceit and illusion. In this way the definitions offered in the verse as kuta stham ("unchanging"), achalam ("non-moving") and dhrwam ("established") become the rocky mountainous masses of the ego that crush the deluded jiva into complete immobility deep in the darkest hell. Nischala is also a synonym for achala, and dhrwa ("established", "fixed") is also used to indicate the Pole Star, the only fixed light in the sky vault, around which all other stars and planets travel.

सन्नियम्येन्द्रियग्रामं सर्वत्र समबुद्धयः । ते प्राप्नुवन्ति मामेव सर्वभूतहिते रताः ॥ १२-४ ॥

sanniyamyendriyagrāmam sarvatra samabuddhayaḥ | te prāpnuvanti māmeva sarvabhūtahite ratāḥ || 12-4 ||

sanniyamya: regulating/ controlling; indriya: the senses; gramam: the complete set; sarvatra: everywhere; sama buddhayaḥ: with balanced and stable intelligence; te: they; prapnuvanti: attain; mam: me; eva: certainly; sarva bhuta: of all beings; hite: for the benefit; rataḥ: concerned.

(they) can attain me if they strictly control their senses and remain balanced and undisturbed in all circumstance, and especially if they are (sincerely) interested in the benefit of all beings."

A pretender engaged in kuta dharma (false religiousness) in the pursuance of some materialistic motivation is unable to control his senses and to remain happy and undisturbed in all circumstances. The fundamental interest of a materialistic person is sense gratification, which can be at an ordinary gross level as attraction towards sex etc, or on a dangerously subtle level as attachment to position, distinction, adoration, and power over persons and resources. A certain amount of healthy sattvik sense gratification, necessary to keep the mind and body in good working conditions, is naturally obtained by consuming sanctified foods offered to God and enjoying the other forms of bhagavat prasada - nice flowers and scents, clothing, etc.

For those who wish to have an active family life, there is also the legitimate and sattvik provision of marriage, that remains perfectly pure and spiritual when our family members and our home are seen and treated as God's servants and properties, and not as our own servants and properties.

However, a pretender will usually make a big show of renunciation by formally accepting the order of sannyasa and exhibiting some kind of superficial external austerity to impress the gullible public. His real motivations will become apparent when he engages in dirty institutional politics, viciously fights against opponents for position and control over disciples and mathas/ashramas, cynically exploits followers without giving anything in return, disrespects and mistreats people on the basis of bodily identification (caste, gender, etc) and so on. We have often seen that such exploitation and disrespect can even turn into emotional, physical and/or sexual abuse especially against the most vulnerable victims. The cheater may keep such criminal activities either overt and public, or covert and hidden, but a sensitive person can perceive these negative qualities even at some distance. The only medicine for such a terminal disease is offered here by Krishna: sama buddhaya ("undisturbed consciousness in all circumstances") and sarva bhuta hite ("working actively for the benefit of all beings").

In cases like this, it is even better for the fake sannyasi to step down from such an artificial position and get regularly married to re-educate himself to a healthy sense of honesty and responsibility. Krishna had clearly stated in verses 3.6 and 3.7: "One who (makes a show of) controlling the senses but continues to remain attached to sense objects is called a fool and a hypocrite. One who regulates the senses through the mind, engaging the senses of action through karma yoga without attachment is much better."

This "satyam treatment" is also the only medicine that will heal the "age-old" disillusionment of many Hindus towards official, traditional and organized religiosity, where such abuse and criminal behavior have become most common.

क्लेशोऽधिकतरस्तेषामव्यक्तासक्तचेतसाम् ॥ अव्यक्ता हि गतिर्दुःखं देहवद्विरवाप्यते ॥ १२-५ ॥

kleso'dhikatarasteṣāmayakṭāsaktacetasām || avyaktā hi gatirduḥkhaṁ dehavadbhiravāpyate || 12-5 ||

klesah: difficult; adbika tarah: much more; tesam: of/ for them; avyakta: non-manifested; asakta: attached; cetasam: the mentality; avyakta: non-manifested; hi: indeed; gatih: the goal; duhkham: without happiness; deha vadbbih: those who have a body; avapyate: is achieved.

"Embodied beings find much more difficult and painful to make progress if they remain mentally attached to the non-manifested."

The science of yoga contained in Bhagavad gita is perfectly logical and explained most skillfully by Krishna. In this verse we find the reason why a jnani must be careful in regulating his sense activities, remain balanced in all circumstances and work tirelessly for the benefit of all beings: because the jnani still has a body, he needs to relate to his own body and to the bodies of other beings.

Meditation on the non-manifested Transcendence, the akshara brahman, does not give a sense of solidity to the embodied being, because the center of gravity is immensely distant and yet so intimately hidden within one's own self (tad dure tad v antike, Isa Upanishad, 5). It is the same sensation of being in space, with no "up" or "down", but rather floating around a powerful center of gravitation and light, that remains the only stable thing while everything else is moving and keeps changing position in space and time. In space, we are completely detached and free, a feeling that can be exhilarating for some but scary for others, who are unable to let go of their attachments. Therefore embodied beings need ties - connections, relationships, common interests, and engagement. If they cannot find such things on the spiritual level, they will inevitably fall back to the material level. Bhagavata Purana (10.2.32) declares this truth in the prayers offered by the Devas to Krishna at the time of his appearance: ye anye aravindaksa vimukta maninas, tvay asta bhavad avisuddha buddhaya, aruhy krcchrena param padam tatah, patanty adho anadrita yusmad anghrayah, "O lotus-eyed Lord, those who consider themselves liberated (as in sannyasa) but have no devotion for you fall back from their lofty position even if they engage in superficial austerities, as their intelligence has not been purified and they are not blessed by (the connection to) your lotus feet."

This is the only way to overcome the need of engagement on the material level. Another verse in Bhagavata Purana (4.22.39) confirms: yat pada pankaja palasa vilasa bhaktya, karmasayam, grathitam udgrathayanti santah, tadvan na rikta matayo yatayo api ruddha sroto ganas tam aranam bhaja vasudevam, "True spiritualists have uprooted the hardened desires for selfish activities by tasting the happiness of devotion to the petals of the Lord's lotus feet. However, those who do not have the appropriate mentality are unable to do so, in spite of their great efforts to control the senses. Therefore (o king Prithu), you should serve Vasudeva, who is the true shelter." This verse mentions "embodied beings" as deha vadis ("those who follow the body"), and not dehinah ("those who have a body"). The real problem is not about "having a body", but about identifying with the body and being attached to it, making it the most important thing in one's life. Because materialists equate form with matter, they cannot overcome their own material identification and vice versa, they are attached to the non-manifested (anyaya asakta) because they foolishly think that form must be matter. This prevents them from actually appreciating the spiritual form of the Personality of Godhead.

We have already mentioned how kuta also means "cheating". Here we find yet another level of meaning, referring to the elegant way in which the false spiritualists become cheated in turn, as they delude themselves about being situated in the brahmananda (spiritual bliss) of the nirviesa brahma, but in fact they only get only sufferings (klesa) and sadness (dukham).

ये तु सर्वाणि कर्माणि मयि संन्यस्य मत्परः । अनन्येनैव योगेन मां ध्यायन्त उपासते ॥ १२-६ ॥

ye tu sarvaṇi karmāṇi mayi sannyasya matparaḥ | ananyenaiva yogena mām dhyāyanta upāsate || 12-6 ||

ye: they; tu: but; sarvaṇi: all; karmāṇi: activities; mayi: to me; sannyasya: renouncing; mat paraḥ: dedicated to me; ananyena: without other concerns; eva: certainly; yogena: with yoga; mam: me; dhyāyantaḥ: meditating; upāsate: worship.

"But those who have surrendered all their activities to me, and are dedicated to me without any other attachment, certainly worship me through the meditation in yoga."

Krishna had already made a similar statement in verse 4.11: ye yatha mam prapadyante tams tathaiva bhajamy aham, "O Partha, as much as they surrender to me, in the same way I reciprocate with them." The Supreme Brahman offers himself as the permanent and blissful center of our loving exchanges, because the sum total of all Consciousness is certainly conscious and capable of reciprocating our sentiments. The word upāsate is mentioned again in this verse as the focus of our relationship with the Supreme. We have already mentioned in previous comments how the natural propensity (dharma) of each being consists in serving in a sentiment of love. A healthy person feels happy when he has done something that brought happiness to his loved ones - child, wife, parent, friend, and so on - or has successfully performed an important service to society, humanity, or the world at large. Those who cannot engage in such service end up serving their own mind and senses, or some animal, or some impersonal mechanism from which they cannot escape: but we all engage in service. Worship (upāsana) is nothing but respectful service, and attains its perfection when love and affection (bhakti) make it more personal and blissful.

Some people believe that Adi Shankara, the great acharya, was an impersonalist or taught a sort of impersonal sadhana or siddhanta, but that is not a fact. Adi Shankara wrote many devotional prayers, including the Gita mahatmya and the famous song known as Bhaja govindam, and installed many Deities and temples, including Jagannatha at Puri. Probably this misconception is due to the fact that Adi Shankara recommended the sadhana (spiritual practice) known as pancha upasana or worship of the panca tattva, namely Vishnu, Shiva, Shakti, Surya and Ganesha. To a mind that has been influenced by the exclusivist and intolerant monotheistic concept, it may seem that equally worshipping these apparently different forms indicates a lack of clarity in a personal relationship with the Supreme, but this is not a fact. Even the strictest advaitin will recognize that such Personalities of Godhead are aspects of the same Supreme Transcendental Reality, and therefore they do not contradict each other.

In this regard we need to properly understand the concept of ista devata ("desired Deity"), as the form of the Godhead that is most attractive for each devotee in a particular situation and according to the particular rasa or devotional sentiment. The best definition of Reality has been conclusively given by Chaitanya as acintya bheda abheda, or "inconceivably same and different", referring to the fact that spiritual Reality is not limited by any material definition of place, time and individuality.

In this verse Krishna is mentioning the word sannyasa again, to help us understand the real meaning of renunciation. As he had already declared (5.30), the real sannyasi is not someone who does not perform any practical activity, but rather one who works hard and selflessly for the benefit of all beings (sarva bhuta hite ratah, 5.25). Working for the real benefit of all beings means working for the Supreme: not only God is the sum total of all existences, he is also the loving friend of all beings (5.29).

Therefore, it is a very serious mistake to translate this verse (12.6) to mean that one should stop all activities and responsibilities, in a false external show of renunciation, and live as a mindless parasite priest, encroaching on the spiritual and religious life of others by posing as a legally established intermediary between the individuals and God. In the Vedic system, brahmanas perform ritualistic activities for the benefit of their students, but merely in a position of guides and assistants, as they could never replace the yajamana. The idea that one's spiritual or religious progress can be delegated to a priest is typically abrahamic, and has nothing to do with the Vedic system. If entertained or spread among Hindus, it can only have the disastrous effect of encouraging degradation and irresponsibility, moving people from the rajas level to the tamas instead of the sattva. In later chapters, we will see many practical examples of this ignorant confusion, and we will be offered the instruments to avoid falling in the trap.

Krishna has declared very clearly and repeatedly in Bhagavad gita that one should never stop performing one's dharmic duty: renunciation means dedicating all actions to the Supreme (mat parah).

तेषामहं समुद्धर्ता मृत्युसंसारसागरात् । भवामि नचिरात्पार्थ मय्यावेशितचेतसाम् ॥ १२-७ ॥

teṣāmaḥ saṁuddhartā mṛtyusaṁsārasāgarāt | bhavāmi nacirātpārtha mayyāveśitacetasām || 12-7 ||

tesam: of them; aham: I; samuddhartā: the one who raises; mṛtyu: of death; samsara: of material life; sagarat: from the ocean; bhavami: I become; na: not; cirat: after a long time; pārtha: o son of Pritha; mayi: on me; avesita: focused; chetasam: the consciousness.

"O son of Pritha, for those who keep their consciousness in me, I soon appear to uplift them from the ocean of repeated deaths."

A famous previous commentator has quoted here a similar verse from the Varaha Purana, that says: nayami paramam sthanam arcir adi gatim vina, garuda skandam aropya yathecham anivaritah, "For those who are very determined in their desire (of me), I will come (personally) on Garuda's back, to take them to the supreme abode, to the light that has no beginning".

This is a very comforting verse for all those devotees who are facing difficulties in this life, and for those intelligent persons who realize the intrinsic suffering caused by the impermanent conditions of this world. However, we should be particularly careful here to avoid artificial cultural superimpositions to the meaning of the verse. Abrahamic ideologies are based on the concept that every human being is inherently a hopeless sinner, fallen into a world of sufferings (as a punishment for the "original sin" of his ancestors), and whose only salvation consists in being rescued or reclaimed by a divine figure of prophet or messiah, to whom he must pledge total allegiance. Therefore a human being can only pray and surrender to God, and in return he will be instantly purified from all sins and made perfect, and directly transported to heaven, where he will enjoy eternally. If he does not resort to God in this way, he will die and be cast into eternal hell, where the devils will torture him for his lack of obedience.

The concept expressed in Bhagavad gita is quite different. First of all, the ocean of repeated deaths is not a punishment (as a multiple death sentence), but a figure of speech for the impermanence of all things in this world. The perspective of Vedic tradition presents the material world as a place where suffering is merely due to impermanence; still the Vedas present the four purusha arthas ("the four purposes of human life") as dharma, artha, kama and moksha, without demonizing the world as an evil place. Secondly, the consciousness of the devotee is described in this verse as avesita cetasam, "entered/ focused" on the Personality of Godhead: it is this same Consciousness that lifts the devotees out of the impermanence of the material world. This verse does not refer to the moment of death, but to a change of consciousness that can occur at any time during one's life. The idea that a person can be magically rescued by God at the time of death simply on the basis of sectarian allegiance is merely a myth. Each one of us must work seriously on his/ her spiritual development during this lifetime and attain a stable level of consciousness, permanently abandoning all material identifications and attachments, otherwise at the time of death we will simply move on to take another body.

Hoping that somehow or other we will be able to "become liberated" by dint of our allegiance to a particular religious tradition is a dangerous delusion. Even Ajamila - who suddenly called out to Narayana on his deathbed and was miraculously "rescued" by the Vishnudutas - simply got another chance at reforming his consciousness, with a life extension sufficient to change his habits and activities.

मय्येव मन आधत्स्व मयि बुद्धिं निवेशय । निवसिष्यसि मय्येव अत ऊर्ध्वं न संशयः ॥ १२-८ ॥

mayyeva mana ādhatsva mayi buddhiṁ niveśaya | nivasisyasi mayyeva ata ūrdhvaṁ na saṁśayaḥ || 12-8 ||

mayi: on me; eva: certainly; manah: the mind; adhatsva: focus; mayi: on me; buddhim: intelligence; nivesaya: apply; nivasisyasi: you will always live/ remain; mayi: in me; eva: certainly; atah urdhvam: hereafter/ after that/ rise higher; na: no; samsayah: doubt.

"Keep your mind focused on me and apply your intelligence accordingly. In this way you will always reside in me, and thus you will be elevated. There is no doubt about this."

The expression nivasa indicates a permanent residence, a place of consciousness where our mind always lives and functions. This verse confirms the fact that by meditating on God, serving and worshipping, our consciousness will become purified and elevated, due to the constant contact with the Supreme Consciousness. Many times in Bhagavad gita Krishna has stated the paramount importance of intelligence and personal effort in pursuing enlightenment, realization, liberation, and devotion. Here again he repeats that we need to apply our intelligence to the cultivation of such transcendental meditation or tuning of the consciousness. Previous commentators explain that atah urdhvam means "after the fall of the body". In fact this was confirmed in verse 8.5: anta kale ca mam eva smaran mukta kalevaram, yah prayati sa mad-bhavam yati nasy atra samsayah, ("One who, at the end of time (of this life), remembers me while leaving his/her body attains my nature. There is no doubt in this.")

However, the next verse (8.6) immediately clarified: yam yam vapi smaran bhavam tyajaty ante kalevaram, tam tam evaiti kaunteya sada tad-bhava-bhavita, ("O son of Kunti (Arjuna), whatever state of existence/ nature one remembers at the time of leaving the body, s/he attains (precisely) that state of being/condition, (because) of always contemplating that existence.")

We must be very careful to avoid the trap of simplistic sentimentalism by which one deludes himself into thinking that death will automatically solve all problems and instantly supply us with all the realizations that we did not bother to pursue during the time of our life. When we find out it's not going to happen, it will be too late: a very sorry state of affairs indeed.

अथ चित्तं समाधातुं न शक्नोषि मयि स्थिरम् । अभ्यासयोगेन ततो मामिच्छाप्तुं धनञ्जय ॥ १२-९ ॥

atha cittam samādhātum na śaknoṣi mayi sthiram | abhyāsayogena tato māmichchāptum dhanañjaya || 12-9 ||

atha: therefore; cittam: the consciousness; samādhātum: to establish; na: not; śaknoṣi: you are able; mayi: in me; sthiram: steadily; abhyāsa-yogena: by the practice of connection; tataḥ: then; mam: me; iccha: desire; āptum: to obtain; dhanañjaya: o Dhananjaya.

"However, o Dhananjaya, if you are unable to firmly establish your consciousness in me, then you should practice yoga with the desire to achieve me."

Dhananjaya ("conqueror of wealth") is a name of Arjuna, that Krishna has used several times to address him during the conversation of Bhagavad gita. Here this name is referred to the acquisition of the greatest treasure, or parama purusha artha, that is prema, or pure devotion to Godhead. Vedic scriptures mention four main purusha arthas, or "goals of life for human beings", namely dharma ("development of ethical conscience and behavior"), artha ("acquisition of wealth"), kama ("sensual pleasure") and moksha ("liberation from material conditionings").

However, the gupta ("hidden", "secret") knowledge of the Bhagavad gita shows us a pancama purusha artha ("fifth goal of human life") that is also the highest and most important, and that can be attained only after becoming established on the liberated platform. The conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.54) will confirm this: "(A person who is situated in the) Brahman realization is always satisfied in the self, never complaining or running after desires. S/he is equally disposed toward all beings and states of being, and thus attains my spiritual devotion" (brahma bhuta prasannaatma na socati na kankasati samah sarvesu bhutesu, mad bhaktim labhate param).

The word citta means "consciousness" in the sense of the quality of the activities of the mind - the things we think about, the contents of our thoughts, desires, and sentiments (as in an active mode). From the same root we have the word caitanya, that means "consciousness" in the sense of awareness, alertness, and feelings (as in a passive mode). When the devotee engages his/her active consciousness or meditation on the Supreme, all actions become devotional service. This is wonderfully described by Adi Shankara in his prayers: japo jalpah, silpam sakalam api mudra vicarana, gati pradaksinya kramanam, asanady abuti vidibih, pranamah samvesah sukham akhilaam atmarpana drsa, saparyaparyayas tava bhavatu yan me vilasitam, "Let every word of mine be a prayer to you, every movement of my hands be a ritual gesture to you, every step I take be a mark of respect for your image, every morsel of food I eat be a ritual sacrifice to you, every time I lay down be a prostration at your feet, and every act I perform be an act of worship to you" (Soundarya Lahari, verse 27). This is also called samadhi, the final and highest stage of yoga in which meditation on the Supreme becomes firmly established and constantly undisturbed. From the same root we have the word samadhatum, mentioned in this verse.

The word śaknosi ("you are able to") derives from the same root of the word śakti (or shakti, "power"). This etymological connection contains an important teaching: the power or ability to do something resides in the Prakriti, that manifests as the para prakriti or supreme nature supporting Isvara, and the apara prakriti as the material nature supporting the jiva. While Isvara is always in control, the jiva is always controlled. This Shakti or power exists eternally, and constitutes the active agent in all activities, while the Purusha (both the individual and the supreme) is the consciousness factor, expressed as knowing, feeling, and willing. The correspondent energies or śaktis are described in Svetasvatara Upanishad: (parasya śaktir vividhaiva sruyate, svabhaviki jnana bala kriya ca, 6.8).

The śakti called bala is also called iccha, or "will power". By taking shelter in Mother Shakti, we make the deliberate choice to desire to attain the spiritual level of consciousness. Even if we are completely devoid of any qualification, we can still desire: just through this sincere desire we will be blessed with success. Another definition for this desire is lalasa, often quoted in bhakti literature as the fundamental requisite to engage in the process of regulated devotional service. This means that spiritual or religious life must be a spontaneous choice, sincerely desired by each individual, and should never be imposed externally or artificially, because no benefit will come from such attempt. You cannot force anybody to love.

The expression abhyasa yogena means "by regular or long practice in yoga", where yoga means "connection", as in the tuning of the individual consciousness with the supreme Consciousness. Krishna had already stated (6.35) that such abhyasa yogena is the only way to control the restless mind: asamsayam maha-baho mano durnigrham calam, abhyasena tu kaunteya vairagyena ca grihyate, "O mighty armed (Arjuna), certainly the mind is restless and very difficult to manage, but it can be controlled by practice and detachment, o son of Kunti."

अभ्यासेऽप्यसमर्थोऽसि मत्कर्मपरमो भव । मदर्थमपि कर्माणि कुर्वन्सिद्धिमवाप्स्यसि ॥ १२-१० ॥

abhyāse'pyasamartho'si matkarmaparamo bhava | madarthamapi karmāṇi kurvansiddhimavāpsyasi || 12-10 ||

abhyase: with practice; api: even if; asamartha: unable to; asi: you are; mat-karma: work for me/ service to me; parama: dedicated to; bhava: become; mad-artam: for me; api: even if; karmāṇi: activities; kurvan: performing; siddhim: perfection; avāpsyasi: you will achieve.

"If you are unable to practice regulated meditation, then dedicate your life to me and work for me. In this way you will achieve perfection even while performing your (normal) activities."

The highest position for a yogi is to be constantly focused in the supreme Consciousness, in which every gesture and activity becomes perfectly aligned with the divine plan and in harmony with the entire universe. It is a position of supreme happiness, eternal and full of knowledge and awareness. Before becoming firmly established on this level of consciousness, called samadhi, one needs to practice meditation (dhyana) for a sufficient time, with sufficient intensity. In his Yoga sutras (1.21-22) Patanjali clearly states that the time required to achieve success is inversely proportional to the effort invested: tivra-samveganam asannah ("Those having an intense desire for it attain (asamprajnata samadhi) quite soon", 1.21), mridu-madhyadhimatratvat tato 'pi visheshah ("Such (desire) is variously defined as mild, medium and intense", 1.22).

It is this desire (iccha aptum, 12.9) that supports the sadhaka in his/ her yoga practice. Patanjali clearly explains this: tatra sthitau yatno 'bhyasah, "It is the practice (consisting of) being firmly established in one's own effort", 1.13), sa tu dirgha-kala-nairantarya-satkara, sevito dridha-bhumih, "Practice (abhyasa) becomes firm when it is done for a long period of time without interruption and with devotion (towards the aim in sight)", 1.14).

The expression sevita ("service", "devotion") in this sutra is echoed in verse 1.23: isvara pranidhanad va, "or, (success can be obtained through) devotion to God". The alternative indicated by the word va ("or") applies to the sentiment of surrender in full humility rather than making a personal effort through one's own will power (tivra iccha). We will remember here that isvara pranidhana is the final and supreme requirement among the yama and niyama rules or life habits.

Especially in Kali yuga, when human beings are facing so many disadvantages and weaknesses, it is certainly advisable to simply and humbly dedicate oneself to Isvara and take shelter in the supreme Ichha Shakti rather than trying to control it. In very unfavorable circumstances, we may be unable to make the required effort intensely and constantly, therefore Krishna is suggesting that instead of artificially trying to practice meditation, we should engage practically in working for the Godhead (mad artham).

The same concept had already been expressed in verses 11.55 (mat karma kṛit, "working for me") and 4.18 (sa yukta kṛtsna karma kṛit, "although engaged in working"). In verse 3.5 Krishna had clearly stated that in fact nobody can stay without performing actions even for one moment (na hi kascit ksanam api jatu tisthati akarma kṛit), so if one is unable to engage in active meditation (dhyana), it is better to engage in some practical work (karma) that is dedicated to the Supreme.

Such work is active engagement in devotional service, for the benefit of all beings: mat-karma-kṛin mat-paramo mad-bhaktah sanga-varjitah, nirvairah sarva-bhuteshu yah sa mam eti pandava, "My devotee is engaged in working for me, and see me as th supreme. S/he has abandoned all association/ affiliation/ identification, and has no enmity towards any being. (In this way, my devotee) comes to me." (11.55).

Service to Krishna is a full time job and gives better results when it is not hampered by adharmic stains, such an unbefitting professional occupation (where one is forced to perform actions that are contrary to the principles of ethics), violent or impure life habits (eating of non vegetarian foods, recreational consumption of alcohol or other drugs, unethical sexual relationships, lack of cleanliness), offensive behavior against innocent and good people (both humans and animals, what to speak of Devas), and so on.

When a devotee sincerely wants to engage in bhagavat dharma, Bhagavan will directly offer suitable opportunities for maintenance and professional occupation, so that the devotee can really be a full time karmachari working for Krishna. This job can be in the fields of education (teaching, writing, preaching, giving courses and seminars, etc), food production and distribution (vegetarian prasadam restaurants and catering etc), managing or assistance (temples or ashramas, spiritual or environmentally friendly hospitality/ tourism sector etc), where devotional service can be very direct and intense. A devotee can also dedicate his/ her professional activities to Bhagavan in other fields, either self-employed or working under other genuine devotees - in social management and protection (the kshatriya work), agriculture and animal protection, production and trade of ethical objects, providing ethically valid assistance services of various kinds, and so on.

Land, capital, organization, labor, knowhow and marketing will be provided by Bhagavan through various and sometimes unexpected opportunities. However, the karmachari who works for Krishna must clearly understand what is his/ her job description and what Krishna will not provide: there will be no space for material identifications or attachments, fear, doubt, laziness, selfishness, and other negative luggage, technically called anarthas ("things without value").

अथैतदप्यशक्तोऽसि कर्तुं मद्योगमाश्रितः । सर्वकर्मफलत्यागं ततः कुरु यतात्मवान् ॥ १२-११ ॥

athaitadapyasakto'si kartuṁ madyogamāśritaḥ । sarvakarmaphalatyaḡam tataḥ kuru yatātmavān ॥ 12-11 ॥

atha: however; etad: this; api: even; asaktab: unable; asi: you are; kartum: to do; mad-yogam: in connection/ union with me; asritab: taking shelter/ aiming; sarva-karma: all activities; phala: the results; tyagam: renunciation; tataḥ: then; kuru: do; yata atma van: making efforts to focus on the Self.

"If you are not even able to do that, you should confide in me and become detached from the results of all your actions, making efforts to establish yourself on the level of Self realization."

The beauty of the Vedic system, epitomized by the instructions of Bhagavad gita, is that it offers a suitable personalized approach for each and every individual, by which anyone can be properly engaged and situated comfortably and progressively, enjoying material happiness and spiritual development at the same time. Some people, influenced by abrahamic concepts, have come to believe that spiritual or religious life requires complete renunciation to the "material world", spite and hatred for all the beautiful and joyful things of life, especially for the material body, to the limit of masochism and self-torture. Such people invariably develop the typically abrahamic tendency to disrespecting and mistreating women, confusing misogyny with the genuine idea of sannyasa. Unfortunately, this negative attachment will not help them to attain the level of liberation: in fact, they will have to take another birth, generally as a female, and in particularly serious cases even as animals, because their lusty tendencies will not disappear but will become stronger and distorted by getting superficially repressed and thus pushed deep down into the animal level of the subconscious. This is how the otherwise healthy and sattvik desire (kama) is separated from any higher level of consciousness and creates disastrous consequences. We have seen many strictly "moralistic" and self-righteous religionists, thundering against innocent romance and affectionate relationships, turn into beastly perverts addicted to sexually abusing women and children, and still try to retain their artificial positions.

It is important to understand that such an attitude is totally contrary to the principles of Sanatana Dharma (that we may call Hinduism or Vedic culture). Krishna has already stated that it is much better to engage in regulated sense enjoyment (3.6-7) than to become such a criminally stupid cheater: karmendriyani samyamya ya aste manasa smaran, indriyarthan vimudbatma mithyacarab sa ucyate, yas tv indriyani manasa niyamyarabhate 'rjuna, karmendriyaiḥ karma-yogam asaktab sa viśiṣyate, "One who (makes a show of) controlling the senses but continues to remain attached to sense objects is called a fool and a hypocrite. One who regulates the senses through the mind, engaging the senses of action through karma yoga without attachment is much better."

This verse repeats the same point: it is better to perform "all activities" (sarva karmani) in a spirit of renunciation, than to pretend to be already renounced. What is this "spirit of renunciation"?

It is not very easy to correctly understand the expression phala tyaga, especially because in Kali yuga almost all people are foolish, lazy, irresponsible, arrogant, and convinced of their own great cleverness. Thus, when phala tyaga is translated as "renouncing the fruits (of action)", they imagine it is about the artificial and superficial acceptance of the order of sannyasa, considering it as a very convenient opportunity to get free food and accommodation, and often even luxury and "executive class lifestyle", enjoying respect and adoration, name, fame, and political power. They consciously or unconsciously identify these "fruits" as marriage and family, as in the "agricultural" expressions "the fruit of one's loins" (referring to children) and "tilling one's field" (referring to sexual intercourse with wife). Consequently, they think that if they have sex with children, there will be "no fruit" in the form of pregnancy, or cultivation of a fruitful relationship. The objects of such sexual exploitation are then used and dumped, like disposable commodities, without any consideration or remorse, in the extreme delusion that in this way, the sannyasi will be able to continue to protect and preserve his "renunciation".

The real meaning of phala tyaga is exactly the opposite: it is about giving up expectation and selfishness, and acting in a spirit of love and service, in which one is able to see all creatures as children of Bhagavan and treat them accordingly with respect and affection. On a side note, we can mention that the instructions contained in this chapter formed the core of the teachings given by Krishna Chaitanya to one of his foremost followers, Sanatana Gosvami.

श्रेयो हि ज्ञानमभ्यासाज्ज्ञानाद्ध्यानं विशिष्यते । ध्यानात्कर्मफलत्यागस्त्यागाच्छान्तिरनन्तरम् ॥ १२-१२ ॥

śreyo hi jñānamabhyāsājñānāddhyānaṁ viśiṣyate । dhyānātkarmaphalatyaḡastyāḡacchāntīranantaram ॥ 12-12 ॥

śreyah: better; hi: indeed; jnanam: knowledge; abhyasat: than practice/ sadhana; jnanat: than knowledge; dhyanam: meditation; visiṣyate: is better; dhyanat: than meditation; karma-phala-tyagah: renunciation to the fruits of action; tyagat: from renunciation; santib: peacefulness; anantaram: thereafter.

"Knowledge is better than regulated sadhana (in devotional service), meditation is better than mere cultivation of knowledge, and renunciation of the fruits of action is better than meditation, because detachment brings peace."

This verse does not contradict the previous ones. Verse 12.8 declared that full Krishna Consciousness is the highest platform of existence, because the yogi is constantly connected to the supreme benefit of the entire universe. Such consciousness is perfectly full of happiness, intelligence, clear awareness, knowledge and transcendental continuity, and therefore enables the yogi to remain detached from material designations and bondage. It is the purest form of detachment (karma phala tyaga) to which this verse (12.12) refers, and it brings lasting peace.

As explained in verse 12.8, Krishna Consciousness means engaging ones' intelligence (buddhi), that is equivalent to the buddhi yoga of which Krishna has been speaking from the beginning (2.39, 2.49, 2.50, 2.51-53, 2.65, 3.1, 6.43, 10.10). To attain this platform, we need to train ourselves and control our mind, because as long as we are exposed to material sense signals, we can become distracted and confused, and lose sight of the proper consciousness. Krishna has already stated that the mind is restless by nature (canalabhi manah, 6.34) and therefore it needs to be trained patiently, with constant practice and detachment (abhyasena tu kaunteya vairagyena ca grihyate, 6.35). Verse 12.9 repeats that constant practice (abhyasa yoga) supported by a sincere desire (iccha) is a fundamental requirement for success. It is required for the acquisition of knowledge (jnana) and it is also needed for the development of the proper bhakti consciousness.

Verse 4.33 stated that jnana yajna, the sacrifice that consists in engaging in the pursuit of knowledge, is better than the dravya yajna, the ritual sacrifice where material substances are offered, because the rituals are meant to lead us to knowledge or transcendental consciousness. Without the proper knowledge, rituals are just mechanical practice, that does not bring very good results. Knowledge of the Supreme is the purpose of svadhyaya and isvara pranidhana, the two conclusive steps of the system of yama and niyama. Jnana or knowledge enables us to practice genuine dhyana, leading to overcoming the ignorance of ahankara and mamatva.

However, anyone who has practiced genuine sadhana will agree that regulated and constant practice is not easy. We are not speaking here of the fake fantasy "meditation" offered by the fancy and trendy therapists who teach you to relax and visualize beautiful sceneries or pretty lights or serene blue skies. Genuine dhyana on the Supreme Consciousness is another thing altogether: it requires the total demolition of the boundary walls of our mind, so that it can "contain" the ocean. How can a mere cup contain the ocean? By removing the separation between the inside and the outside - removing the duality that focuses the attention and desires on selfish and egotic considerations. To visualize this concept, imagine a cube-shaped cup, and after immersing it in the greater reservoir of water, remove the four faces of the cup that function as small walls. The ocean will flood in and fill our being without any separation, yet the space of the cup still exists and continues to exist. Removing these walls can be very scary, because when we become accustomed to identifying with the material body and its extensions, we feel we are going to lose everything that makes us what we are. We are afraid of becoming nothing, of entering some sort of non-existence.

Since the embodied being finds this idea intolerable (12.5), Krishna is offering us the alternative to fully engage our reluctant mind and senses into practical activities (karmani) that are directly connected to his service (mat karma, 12.10, mat-karma-krin 11.55, sa yukta krtina karma krt 4.18, mad-artham api karmani kurvan 12.10).

This working for the Supreme is equivalent to the karma phala tyaga: when we act on behalf of someone else, we are simply performing our duty selflessly, without expectation of any separate gain from the success or failure of the action. Such dutiful service is based on intelligence - the clear understanding of our position in relationship to the position of the Supreme, for whom we are working. And whenever we speak of relationship, we are speaking of bhakti, which is why this chapter is entitled "Bhakti yoga". How does this bhakti yoga concept connect with the concept of karma phala tyaga? As verse 6.1 explained, anasritah karma-phalam karyam karma karoti yah, sa sannyasi ca yogi ca, na niragnir na cakriyah, "The real sannyasi and the real yogi is one who selflessly performs all his duties in society and takes the proper actions where required, without any attachment to enjoy the fruits of his activities - not one who escapes from action in the name of some rules and renunciation."

The word anantaram means "immediately", "as a natural consequence".

अद्वेषा सर्वभूतानां मैत्रः करुण एव च । निर्ममो निरहङ्कारः समदुःखसुखः क्षमी ॥ १२-१३ ॥

adveṣṭā sarvabhūtānāṁ maitraḥ karuṇa eva ca । nirmamo nirahaṅkāraḥ samaduḥkhasukhaḥ kṣamī ॥ 12-13 ॥

a-dveṣṭa: without envy/ hostility; sarva-bhutanam: of all beings; maitraḥ: friendliness; karuṇa: compassion; eva: certainly; ca: and; nir-mamaḥ: without sense of possession or belonging; nir-ahankaraḥ: without sense of material identification, duality or arrogance; sama-duḥkha-sukhaḥ: with equal attitude towards distress and joy; kṣamī: forgiving.

"(One who works for me must) be free from envy or hostility, but rather friendly and compassionate towards all beings. (S/he must be) free from material attachments and identifications, tolerant and ready to forgive, and equally prepared to face joys and sorrows."

A person who is working for the Supreme (mat karma krt) must strictly abide by the following norms: 1. advesa, 2. nirmama and nirahankara, 3. sama duḥkha sukha, 4. kṣama. These are all connected, and develop one from another, starting with advesa.

The concept of dvesa (the opposite of a-dvesa) is very complex and vast. It contains all the meanings of "envy", "malice", "hostility", "hatred", "repulsion", "rejection" (as opposite of raga, "attraction"). This is confirmed by Bhagavata Purana (3.24.47), where the dutiful action in bhakti yoga is defined as free from iccha ("desire", "attraction") and dvesa ("repulsion", "hatred"): iccha dvesa vibhinena sarvatra sama cetasa, bhagavad bhakti yuktena, prapta bhagavati gatih, "(He) attained the destination of Bhagavan by engaging in (genuine) bhakti yoga, equally (benevolent) towards everyone and free from (all) desires and hatred."

The word dvesa does not mean "detachment", because detachment is a neutral position towards the objects of senses, while repulsion or rejection is the other face of the "attraction" or "attachment" coin. One must apply detachment (vairagya, tyaga), in the sense of neutrality and positive attitude towards all beings - living entities and situations of life. This means that one should try to find the good in everything, and engage everything in the best possible way: we could say that a genuine devotee sees opportunities in all difficulties, and is able to find a suitable engagement for anybody.

In this verse, a-dvesa is further qualified as friendliness or benevolence and compassion towards all beings. A genuine spiritualist or religionist is favorably disposed towards all beings because s/he sees the antaryami in all bodies and in all existences (5.18): vidya-vinaya-sampanne brahmane gavi hastini, sumi caiva sva-pake ca panditah sama-darsinah, "The panditas (wise learned persons) look with equal (friendliness) to the brahmana who is learned and gentle, to the cow and the elephant, as well as to the dog and to the (uncivilized) dog eater."

This is expressed by the tradition among spiritualists to greet each other by offering homage to Narayana, Hari, Krishna, or Shiva - namo Narayana, Hari Om, Hare Krishna, om namah Shivaya, jaya Jagannatha etc. By this, we recognize the presence of Bhagavan in the heart of the person who is in front of us, and we offer our respect and devotion accordingly. Some people misconstrue this tradition, believing that such manner of greeting people means that we confuse the jiva (the individual soul) with isvara (Bhagavan), and therefore we are addressing the jiva as isvara, but this is not a fact. Of course, there might be confused people who have this idea, but that has nothing to do with the original tradition.

With the degradation of the system from varna to caste, this benevolent and positive attitude towards all beings has disappeared, and in some cases even turned to mistreatment of the lower castes and the most vulnerable members of society, such as women and children. In the degraded caste system, even brahmins and people posing as sannyasis arrogantly violate these fundamental principles established by Krishna, persecuting and mistreating innocent people they see as obstacles on their path. It is important to understand that such a degraded behavior is not prescribed, endorsed or even tolerated in the genuine Vedic system. In fact, later on in Bhagavad gita (16.14) Krishna will describe it as asuric, "demonic".

True, one has the right and duty to oppose aggressors, asuras and adharmic people, but there should never be any hatred or prejudice. Each and every individual should be considered according to guna and karma, and engaged accordingly. Even unevolved and degraded people can be successfully engaged in some sort of service, that will make them happy, enable them to progress in their personal evolution, and contribute some positive benefit to society at large. A genuine brahmana, who is wise and intelligent by definition, is responsible for this engagement and progress of all the members of society, without compromising on the good results of work for the benefit of society.

A genuine yogi (bhakta, pandita, or servant of the Supreme) does not hate anyone, not even those who hate or envy him/ her: s/he only wishes them well, and feels compassionate towards them. However, this does not mean that s/he should submit to injustice or to behaviors or policies that are adharmic and detrimental to the progress of society. S/he wants the bad people to understand their mistakes and reform, for their own benefit, and if other innocents or society in general are threatened, s/he will take action to stop the evil doers. Yudhisthira was called ajata satru ("whose enemy was never born") to mean that he was equally disposed towards everyone, and free from hostility created by prejudice and selfishness, but that does not mean that he refused to engage in battle at Kurukshetra, when the protection of the praja and the destiny of the kingdom were at stake. Just like Arjuna has shown at the beginning of Bhagavad gita, Yudhisthira was friendly and compassionate towards all, and he would happily have forgiven Duryodhana and the other members of the conspiracy that had repeatedly attempted to assassinate him and his family. However, this friendliness and compassion should not become detrimental to the real benefit of everyone: it is said that good intentions are not sufficient to bring a good result, and often well-meaning people can sometimes cause serious disasters. The key to solve the dilemma rests in the qualities and rules prescribed by Krishna in the previous verses: intelligence and wisdom (buddhi, 12.8), and selflessness (karma phala tyaga, 12.11).

The same consideration applies to the meaning of the word kshama, "tolerance", "forgiveness". A genuine religionist is gentle, compassionate and ready to forgive, but not submitting to injustice or damaging activities, and especially not encouraging others to commit them. These qualities are confirmed in the direct instructions given by Krishna to Uddhava (Bhagavata Purana, 11.11.29 to 32: kripalur akerita drohas titikeshub sarva dehinam, satya saro anavadyat ma samah sarvopakarakah; kamair abata dhir danto mriduh swir akinchana, anibo mita bhuk santah sthiro mac charano munib; apramatto gabhiratma dhratiman jita sad gunah, amani mana dah kalho maitrah karunikah kavib; ajnayavim gunan doshan mayadistan api svakan, dharman santyajya yah sarvan mam bhajeta sa tu sattamah. Here is the translation: "The best person is compassionate (kripalu), never hating/ damaging others, ready to forgive, friendly towards all embodied souls. He is one who lives by truth, free from envy, balanced, always working for the benefit of others, whose intelligence is unmoved by material desires, who controls his senses, gentle, clean, without possessiveness, free from worldly attachments, eating moderately, peaceful, stable, taking shelter in me, thoughtful, cautious, not superficial, determined, having conquered the six defects (hunger, thirst, lamentation, illusion, old age, death), not interested in honors, respectful to others, friendly (maitra), compassionate (karunika), learned, knowledgeable. Such a person offers his duties to me by detaching himself from all qualities - good and bad - and fully dedicates to me, as taught by me."

The word karuna (with long last a) is a noun, meaning "kindness, compassion to suffering creatures", while karuna (with a short last a) is the adjective form.

सन्तुष्टः सततं योगी यतात्मा दृढनिश्चयः । मय्यर्पितमनोबुद्धिर्यो मद्भक्तः स मे प्रियः ॥ १२-१४ ॥

santuṣṭaḥ satatam yogī yatātmā dṛḍhaniścayaḥ । mayyarpitamanobuddhiryo madbhaktaḥ sa me priyaḥ ॥ 12-14 ॥

santustah: satisfied; satatam: always; yogi: the yogi; yata atma: engaged in the self; dridha-niscaya: with firmness and determination; maya: to me; arpita: offering; manab: the mind; buddhib: intelligence; yah: s/he; mat-bhaktah: my devotee; sah: s/he; me: to me; priyah: dear.

"The bhakti yogi is always contented, engaged in the self with firmness and determination, offering his mind and intelligence to my (service). Such a person is very dear to me."

The word santustab ("satisfied, contented") is from the same root as santa ("peaceful"). Previously (2.66) Krishna had already stated that happiness can be attained only through peace (asantasya kutab sukham), a peace created by renouncing to expectations and selfishness. Selfishness is a manifestation of ahankara and mamatva, the sense of material identification and material attachments and belonging. This means that a devotee and a yogi is always focused on the transcendental consciousness (yata atma). This is confirmed in the famous atmarama verse of Bhagavata Purana (1.7.10): atmaramas ca munayo nirgrantha apy urukrame, kurvanty abaitukim bhaktim, ittham bhuta guno harih, "Those who find happiness in the atman, including the munis and those who have gone beyond book learning, offer a loving service to Hari, whose qualities and activities are so wonderful."

The same is confirmed in 3.27.26 (evam vidita tattvasya prakritir mayi manasam, yunjato napakuruta atmaramasya karbicit, "One who knows Reality constantly meditates on me, and as s/he finds happiness in the self, s/he is not obstructed by material (circumstances)."

Also we find similar descriptions in other verses of the Bhagavata Purana - 4.22.14, 5.19.11, 6.16.40, 10.32.19, 10.73.23 - and even applied to Bhagavan as in 10.30.34. Contentment also comes from feeling confident and fearless in all circumstances. This is confirmed by Shiva Mahadeva in the Bhagavata Purana (6.17.28): narayana para sarve na kutascana bibhyati, svargapavarga narakesv api tulyartha darsinah, "The devotees of Narayana are not afraid of anything, and are equally ready to go to Svargaloka and to Naraka".

We had already seen a similar statement in verse 7.17: tesam jnani nitya-yukto eka-bhaktir visisyate, priyo hi jnanino 'tyartham abam sa ca mama priyah, "Of them, the person of knowledge who is constantly engaged (in yoga) and focused in devotion is the best. I am very dear to the jnani, and s/he is very dear to me". However, in this verse Krishna elaborates more on the qualities and activities (guna and karma) that can keep the devotee genuinely engaged in Krishna Consciousness.

In the previous verse (12.13) we have seen that the most important requirement is benevolence - friendliness, compassion and sympathy towards all beings. In the very least, one should avoid unnecessary violence towards innocent and harmless creatures: vegetarianism is therefore a must for all civilized persons, because it helps us follow the fundamental dharmic principles of compassion (daya) and cleanliness (sauca). These are also mentioned later in Bhagavad gita (18.42) as the characteristics of a genuine brahmana: sauca tapas titiksam ca, maunam svadhyayam arjavam, brahmacharyam ahimsam ca, samatvam dvandva-samjnyoh, "cleanliness, self-control, tolerance, dignity, transcendental consciousness, simplicity, purity of thoughts, non-violence, balanced attitude towards life, and freedom from dualistic concepts".

Cleanliness and compassion are two of the basic four principles of dharma described in the shastra, especially in Bhagavata Purana, the specialized text that elaborates on bhagavata dharma. When Maharaja Parikshit detects the arrival of the present age of degradation, he observes that the cow and bull personifying Bhumi and Dharma have been seriously injured: tapah saucam daya satyam, iti padab kerte krtah, adharma amsais trayo bhagnah smaya sanga madais tava, "In Satya yuga all the basic legs of dharma were created - self-control, cleanliness, compassion and truthfulness - but now three of them have been broken by the increase of arrogance, delusion and bad association", (1.17.24). This declaration by king Parikshit implies that satyam, truthfulness, is the only principle of dharma that can still remain functional in Kali yuga: everything is lost when truthfulness is grossly violated by the unqualified descendants of brahmins with the purpose of legitimizing or even extolling the virtues of the open and arrogant violation of the other basic principles of dharma - self control, cleanliness and compassion.

We can see that happening in front of our very eyes, when caste brahmins vociferously declare that according to the "religious authorities on vedic tradition" there is no problem in brahmanas and religious teachers and authorities ordinarily eating meat and other non-vegetarian substances, and continuing to pose as brahmanas, acharyas and pujaris. At the same time, they violently and offensively deny "low caste" people the basic right to study Sanskrit and the religious science or even to enter a public temple for ordinary darshan of the Deities, on the grounds that they "eat objectionable foods", when in fact such "low caste" people may have been strictly vegetarian for many decades. And that is not the only thing we see in front of our own eyes in these very days, and that has been increasingly aggravating the heart of the Mother Goddess from the very beginning of Kali yuga.

Bhumi was crying, and Parikshit correctly understood the reason why: araksyamanah striya urvi balam, socasy atho purusadair ivartan, vacam devam brahma kule kukarmany, abrahmanye raja kule kulagryan, "You are lamenting about the women and children who are left without support, and about the Goddess of knowledge being manhandled by unqualified descendants of brahmana families who follow the same principles/ way of life of rakshasas and engage in abominable activities, and about adharmic people from royal dynasties or from other most prominent families," (1.16.21), and kim ksatra bandhun kalinopasrstan, rastrani va tair avaropitani, itas tato vasana pana vasah snana, vyavayonmukha jiva lokam, "because unqualified people belonging to the families of ksatriyas have messed up with the government, so that people have completely forgotten the regulative principles of a civilized society in the matter of eating, drinking, having sex, taking bath, or other life habits" (1.16.22).

Bhagavata Purana (10.1.4) clearly states that a pasu ghna (one who kills or causes animals to be killed for him) is the only human being that remains unable to truly follow the path of bhagavata dharma, that starts from hearing the glorification of Bhagavan. The verse reads: nivritta tarsair upagiyamanad, bhauvasadbac chrotra mano abhiramat, ka utama sloka gunanuvadat, puman virajeta vina pasu ghnat, "The medicine for the disease of material existence consists in hearing about the fascinating qualities and activities of Bhagavan, who is glorified by wonderful verses. Such discussions liberate the mind from material delusion. Only one who kills animals can refuse to engage in this path."

A modicum of truthfulness (honesty) will help us to understand that the other components of traditional vedic civilization are abstention from the recreational consumption of intoxicants, such as alcoholic beverages etc, and abstention is from engaging in illegitimate sexual activities (or in other words, sex that is not in accordance to the principles of dharma).

A vrata is the observance of a religious or spiritual vow, that consists in avoiding negative activities and regularly engaging in positive activities. If one is unable to engage in positive activities, at least s/he should abstain from committing bad actions. A dridha vrata (7.28) is a person who is serious about engaging in yoga and bhakti: yesam tv anta-gatam papam jananam punya-karmanam, te dvandva-moha-nirmukta bhajante mam dridha-vratah, "Those who have put an end to all bad activities/sins, perform/ have (accumulated) pious/ virtuous activities, and are completely liberated from the delusion of duality and firm in their determination, worship me." Obviously this statement implies that those people who continue to engage in sinful activities - such as eating non-vegetarian things, etc - are actually unable to approach God for worship because God does not accept their worship, even if they maintain strict control over physical access to the temple and the Deity, and they regularly go through the motions of the worship rituals. They are not really worshipping God, but they only see a material form made of stone, marble, brass, wood, panchaloha (a traditional alloy of metals used for religious statues) and so on, believing they are its owners and controllers.

The expression dridha niscayah indicates a strong realization based on intelligence, sincerity, and direct experience, that cannot be confused by false conclusions proposed by opponents, or by unnecessary doubts created by the fear of displeasing aggressive people.

यस्मान्नोद्विजते लोको लोकान्नोद्विजते च यः । हर्षामर्षभयोद्वेगैर्मुक्तो यः स च मे प्रियः ॥ १२-१५ ॥

yasmānnodvijate loko lokānnodvijate ca yaḥ । harṣāmarṣabhayodvegairmukto yaḥ sa ca me priyaḥ ॥ 12-15 ॥

yasmāt: by whom; na: not; udvijate: are agitated; lokaḥ: people; lokat: by people; na: not; udvijate: is agitated; ca: and; yaḥ: s/he; harṣa: excitement caused by joy; amarṣa: distress; bhaya: fear; udvegaiḥ: anxiety; muktaḥ: free from; yaḥ: s/he; sab: one who; ca: and; me: my; priyaḥ: very dear.

"One who does not cause sufferings to others, and is not affected by others, who is not overwhelmed by joy or distress, who is free from fear and anxiety, is very dear to me."

After repeatedly stating the importance of buddhi (intelligence), most recently in verse 12.6, Krishna expects us to utilize it properly to understand his instructions in the correct way. In this world all beings are constantly experiencing joys and sufferings, and are normally faced with causes for agitation, anxiety and fear. This material body is so fragile that a relatively small change of temperature in the environment, the absence of some substance, or many other apparently trivial events can seriously damage it. Similarly, the mind is restless, attached to temporary things that will be lost or destroyed - objects, relationships, positions, wealth, and so on. Especially in Kali yuga, the world is full of adharmic, arrogant, selfish people who do not care for the benefit of others and do not hesitate on trampling on whatever seems to be an obstacle to their materialistic goals.

Also, because we have a material body and we need to feed it and move it around, we will inevitably be responsible for a certain amount of sufferings in other beings. As Bhagavata Purana (1.13.47) confirms, all living bodies need to consume the bodies of other living entities as food in order to survive. A vegetarian diet saves us from the grossest forms of violence, but even the plants have some degree of sensitivity and feel anxiety and pain when they are hurt. Even if we choose to live on totally non-violent foods, such as fruits, leaves and seeds that have spontaneously fallen from the plants, we are still causing a small amount of suffering and anxiety to other beings who may be sitting on these non-violent foods, or standing on the path while we walk to collect our basic necessities. Also, we should understand that the karmic consequences of causing sufferings to other beings will affect us even when we are only "indirectly" involved, as for example when we purchase items produced without consideration of the sufferings caused to creatures. This of course applies mostly to meat and other non-vegetarian items, but in a much lesser degree can also apply to other foods, even vegetarian foods. We may even be hurting small insects and microbes without knowing it, by breathing or by the involuntary action of our immune system.

Stupid and ill-motivated people try to use this argument to prove that it is OK to eat any meat even from factory farms and slaughterhouses, because we cannot completely avoid creating sufferings and anxieties in other beings anyway, so we should not even start to bother about it.

But this is like saying that since we got a little paper cut on our finger, we might as well sign up to undergo a long period of horrible torture until death, because we are already suffering. However, we should not think that Vedic culture or Hinduism have a "taboo" on meat-eating or any other singular action, as it happens in other cultures. In specific cases of emergencies, we are entitled to consume whatever is required to continue to perform our social duties properly, because the sincere work we are contributing constitutes a sacred yajna, and its attending paraphernalia is considered yajna sista, or prasadam.

The Vedic system offers the solution to the ethical problem by teaching that we should accept "our share" (tena tyaktena bhunjitha, Isa Upanishad, 1), that is whatever is really and honestly necessary to keep our bodies and minds working properly so that we can properly engage in cooperating for the benefit of all beings. This is why satyam (truthfulness, sincerity, honesty) is the most fundamental principle of dharma. To help us in balancing our karmic account, Vedic tradition prescribes the pancha maha yajnas (5 great sacrifices), to repay our debts to all other beings, including the animals. This is also commonly called bali, and it is usually offered by regularly feeding crows, dogs and cows, who are particularly useful to human society as scavengers, protectors and providers of nutrition and so many other good things respectively. Another beautiful and popular bali tradition consists in drawing artistic and decorative designs with rice paste, that is eventually consumed by ants and other small insects. Of course with the degradation caused by fake brahmins, this custom has lost its meaning because the drawings are now made with artificial colors that do not give benefit to any being and that may even be toxic and polluting for the environment.

The pancha maha yajnas are:

1. Brahma yajna: the study and the teaching of the scriptures (svadhyaya) and the spiritual practice (sadhana) for the realization of Brahman - to repay one's debt towards the Rishis and the Vedas.
2. Pitri yajna: the offerings to the Pitris (ancestors) during the Agnihotra, the tarpana etc; also, begetting at least one son who will continue the family line, and behaving in such a way to bring glory and good name to the family.
3. Deva yajna: the offerings to the Devas (the administrators of the universe) during the Agnihotra, the ritual worship to the family Deities (upasana), the Sandhya vandana etc.
4. Bhuta yajna: the offering of food to the animals and the living beings in general; this consumes one's past negative karmic reactions created by eating, cooking, lighting fire, drinking and collecting water, cleaning house etc. It also includes the regular practice of nonviolence, compassion and harmony with nature, and even good relationships with ghosts.
5. Nri yajna, that consists in assistance to guests (atithi), a category that includes all travelers, as well as in the regular practice of charity, compassion, tolerance and forgiveness towards other human beings. Of course the performance of our duties towards family and society, especially in the professional field of varnas, is extremely important in this regard and is usually implied as the fundamental requirement.

The word udvijate ("causes sufferings") is derived from udvega, that means "agitation, anxiety", where vega means "impulse". We can understand this verse better by analyzing this etymology: anxiety or suffering is whatever unsettles and creates an impulse for reaction - anger, fear, shock, despair and so on.

The two mutual opposites of harsa and amarsa should also be understood properly. Harsa meaning "elation, thrilling", as in harsa roma, meaning "standing hair" that is seen in some strong emotion. It is a happy, pleasing, enlivening, electrifying and energizing feeling, that we can call ecstasy or pleasure. However, we should not allow ourselves to be confused and sidetracked by happy feelings or by the pleasures of this world; we need to remain focused in our awareness and devotional service. Amarsa is just the opposite. It is the acid corrosive feeling of hostility or impatience towards others, the envy or disappointment in seeing the success of other people, or lamentation and fear about our losing something. It is the fretting and tormenting oneself about things that are actually unimportant. Harsa can cause anxiety or fear because we become addicted to the feeling of pleasure and joy, and we do not want to be left without, but amarsa is directly causing sufferings, anxiety and fear, either by our direct feelings and actions, or by the karmic reaction to our bad activities that made other beings suffer.

अनपेक्षः शुचिर्दक्ष उदासीनो गतव्यथः । सर्वारम्भपरित्यागी यो मद्भक्तः स मे प्रियः ॥ १२-१६ ॥

anapekṣaḥ śucirdakṣa udāsīno gatavyathah | sarvārambhaparityāgi yo madbhaktaḥ sa me priyaḥ || 12-16 |

anapekṣaḥ: detached/ neutral; śucir: clean; dakṣaḥ: skillful; udāsīnaḥ: light hearted; gata vyathah: free from worries; sarva arambha: all enterprises; parityagi: who has renounced; yah: who; mat bhaktaḥ: my devotee; sah: s/he; me priyaḥ: very dear to me.

"Impartial, clean, skillful, light hearted, detached from worries, uninterested in personal achievements: such a devotee is very dear to me."

The word anapeksha or nirapeksha means "indifferent", and it applies to the various conditions of life that we may encounter in our journey. It is very important to avoid misunderstanding the concept, because the degraded tendencies of Kali yuga may tempt us to think that we should become callous towards adharma and ajñana, neglectful in regards to our duties and responsibilities, and insensitive towards the sufferings of others. This would be a huge mistake.

To better understand this instruction offered by Krishna, we should also contemplate the complementary meanings of the word, as "impartial, detached, neutral", and apply them to our personal expectations and sense gratification. In brief, anapeksha here means that we should continue to stoically perform our true duty in the best possible way even in the most difficult and painful circumstances. Also, we should not be scared of going through situations that could be considered inauspicious (asubha, 2.57, 4.16, 9.1, 9.28, 12.17) as we will see in the next verse.

Another important meaning of anapeksha is that we should be free from sectarian prejudices, that is, we should be able to appreciate good and sound arguments and realizations even in people who belong to a different group or culture. Similarly, we should be able to recognize a mistake in our own camp, and a bad behavior in a member of our own family, and take steps to correct them. At the same time we should be able to recognize a dharmic and learned action or conclusion or choice when it is outside our camp or our family, or even among our declared enemies. This is the meaning of "impartial" or "neutral".

This neutrality is also required to avoid the sin of excessive force against the associates of an aggressor, for example his family or the members of his race or community; as Krishna has already declared in verse 13, one should be advēṣṭa, "free from hatred". A competent and ethically healthy surgeon has no negative feelings towards his patients; he only performs the required operation in the best possible way so that the patient can get relief from suffering and disease, and recover health and functions. True, in Kali yuga there are many criminals posing as doctors and surgeons, who perform unnecessary surgeries or work in a sloppy or even cruel way, because they have other selfish interests and do not care for the benefit of the patients, but these should not be considered actual doctors. The actions and the motivations of each person are the real criteria to evaluate and judge people.

The concepts of enemy and friend should be applied through verification of the respective actions and motivations, rather than by their nationality, race, ethnic group, lineage, etc. Even the previous position of a person in actions and intentions can change suddenly, as a friend can betray us and an enemy can have a change of heart, so we need to remain neutral and impartial. There is a famous tale in the Panchatantra, that shows how we need to choose an intelligent and reasonable enemy over a stupid friend. To illustrate the point, the narrator of these beautiful stories brought the twin examples of the merchant and the king, who were respectively saved by an enemy and killed by a friend.

We have already encountered the word suci ("clean") before (6.41) and we will find it even more often later on (16.3, 16.7, 16.10, 17.14, 18.27, 18.42) as Krishna will proceed to explain how a devotee can successfully navigate life in the material world without falling back into the ocean of material degradation. Contrarily to what abrahamic ideologies believe, it is not sufficient to pledge allegiance to a particular religious sect or divine figure to remain always pure: we need to closely watch our activities and choices, and carefully avoid all contamination. This cleanliness is primarily inner cleanliness, or purity of mind and heart. Such purity is usually helped and accompanied by external bodily cleanliness, but it does not necessarily depend on it, especially when circumstances are unfavorable (asubha) and we do not have the power to change them. Let us make an example: in the last few decades, the traditional holy places in India have been seriously damaged by the irresponsible and adharmic behavior of the local residents, who callously discharge their sewage and garbage everywhere.

The measure of the disaster can be seen in the Yamuna river, that in 1984 was still wonderfully pure and fresh, and had sweet clear blue water perfectly fit for drinking, and only 20 years later was declared unfit even for irrigation purposes because of the incredible level of pollution. Also, the rise in availability of consumers' goods and packaging solutions has greatly increased the quantity of non-biodegradable rubbish laying around in the streets and around buildings. The local people, who were used to throw a little dust and kitchen waste in front of their house after sweeping, are now callously doing the same with greater quantities of non-biodegradable waste, including plastic, etc. When the houses of these foolish people are on a major road, the air draft caused by the fast passage of motorized vehicles blows all the dust and impurities back into the house, and the small garbage heap next to the house inspires others to contribute by dumping their own extra garbage in the same place - while there is practically no public garbage removal service. The same happens to the ponds or rivers near these houses, where the foolish local caste brahmins keep taking their "purificatory bath", believing that such exercise is making them "clean" (suci).

Now, when we travel to these places of pilgrimage, we should not let our minds be confused by this situation. We should apply our intelligence with detachment: if we can do something to clean the place up, we should certainly do so, as a service to the holy place (dhama seva). If we cannot, we should just offer our respect to the holy place that is still present under the layer of Kali yuga contamination, in the transcendental dimension beyond the trash and excrements of this material dimension. However, this does not mean that we are required to actually take bath in seriously polluted water, or to remain for a long time in a garbage dump, because that will sooner or later affect our body and mind, and eventually our consciousness, too. So we can simply sprinkle a few drops of the water on our head or body, and offer homage to whatever little portion of ground appears to be clean, and then continue in our journey.

The word dakṣha means "expert, skillful", and refers to jñāna, the knowledge by which we become able to properly utilize the objects of the world and navigate our paths to progress and liberation, while performing our duties in devotional service. An expert person is a highly effective person, because s/he makes the best and most intelligent use of things and opportunities, focusing time and effort, as described for example in many of the popular "self-help" books that are meant to improve your effectiveness in life.

The expression udasīna means "aloof", especially from society. In verse 6.9 it applied to a neutral person, who is impartial between factions, and in 9.9 it was applied directly to Krishna as impartial towards all the various favorable and unfavorable activities that develop in the material world and are performed by people. In verse 14.23, it is used (udasīna vad asino) to describe a person who is established on the level of Transcendence. We find it also in the Bhagavata Purana used in the same way: in 6.16.5 similar to Gita 6.9, in 6.16.11 similar to Gita 9.9, and in 10.54.43 and 10.60.20 similar to Gita 14.23. The Bhagavata Purana is the natural complement to the Bhagavad gita, and is the most popular among the Puranas, traditionally recited and studied in many villages and Hindu communities.

यो न हृष्यति न द्वेष्टि न शोचति न काङ्क्षति । शुभाशुभपरित्यागी भक्तिमान्यः स मे प्रियः ॥ १२-१७ ॥

yo na hṛṣyati na dveṣṭi na śocati na kāṅkṣati । śubhāśubhaparitāgī bhaktimānyaḥ sa me priyaḥ ॥ 12-17 ॥

yab: anyone; na: not; hṛṣyati: becomes overwhelmed by joy; na: not; dveṣṭi: hates; na: not; śocati: laments; na: not; kāṅkṣati: aspires (to some selfish results); śubha asubha: both favorable and unfavorable; paritāgī: completely detached; bhakti-man: one who is characterized by bhakti (devotion); yab: anyone; sab: s/he; me: to me; priyaḥ: very dear.

"A devotee who is not confused by joy, does not hate anything, does not lament and does not aspire to any selfish results, who has become detached from both advantages and disadvantages, is very dear to me."

Krishna continues to elaborate on the transcendental position of a devotee who has overcome the delusion of material identifications and attachments. Such a person is not confused by joys or sorrows, but continues to perform his/ her duty faithfully and responsibly, selflessly, and even heroically.

Pleasure and pain are mechanisms by which our body and mind react to positive and negative situations, in which beneficial and damaging stimuli are created. The survival instincts of an embodied conditioned soul push him/ her to follow the stimuli and enjoy the benefits or escape the damage, but a devotee is ready to sacrifice everything for his/ her duty in the service of the Supreme. At a more ordinary level, intense pleasure or joy can confuse our mind and cloud our intelligence, and this is the first step towards material attachments. Therefore a sober person (dhira, 2.13) is keeping a balanced mind and does not allow his/her emotions to control his/ her actions, so that s/he can continue to work effectively. The same thing applies to the feelings of repulsion (dvesa) or hostility, that can prevent us from performing some unpleasant or dangerous task. Similarly, a selfless devotee does not lament about losses or disappointments, and is not attached to his/ her desires, projections and expectations, because s/he knows that the divine plan is greater than any of our small minds. So many times we find that an apparent setback was actually a blessing in disguise, or a success that we had pursued for a long time brought more problems than solutions. Problems and difficulties may prove to be wonderful opportunities for growth and evolution, and failure often teaches us better than any other type of lesson.

Therefore the ordinary understanding about subha and asubha, "auspicious" and "inauspicious" ("favorable/ unfavorable", "positive/ negative") becomes a merely relative consideration that is only superficially relevant to the organizational and logistical aspects of our work. A disease or another incapacitating physical condition is certainly inauspicious, but we can use it in a positive way - to finish paying some old bad karmic reactions, to get an easy pretext to avoid too much superficial and useless social interaction, or to prove that we cannot travel around. The loss of a near and dear person is certainly painful, but we can use it to become more detached from material circumstances and conditionings, just as Narada did in his previous lifetime (Bhagavata Purana 1.6.10) when he suddenly became an orphan at a very young age.

A transcendental devotee does not become attached to expectations or dreams, and he is not anxious to get disciples or to build temples or great projects. Whatever desires and aspirations s/he has, they are only for the performance of his/ her duty and the service of the Supreme, even if it is only a small part in a great play. This does not mean that we should not be attached to our service or we can perform it sloppily, lazily, or inattentively: we should just be detached from the personal gains and benefits we can derive from it, as well from the disadvantages and difficulties that it entails. This concept is presented several times in Bhagavad gita:

sukha-duhkhe same kṛitva labhalabbau jayajayau, tato yuddhaya yujyasva naivam papam avapsyasi, "If you fight this battle while remaining equally disposed (unattached and prepared) to joy and sadness, gain and loss, victory and defeat, you will never be touched by sin" (2.38), jitatmanah prasantasya paramatma samahitah, sitoshna-sukha-duhkhesu tatha manapamanayoh, sama-duhkha-sukhab sva-sthab sama-lostrasma-kananah, tulya-priyapriyo dhiraḥ tulya-nindatma-samstutih, "Balanced in joy and sorrow, focused on his/ her own (duty), considering mud, stone and gold as equally valuable, impartial towards pleasant and unpleasant, sober, and unmoved when offended or glorified" (14.23),

"The Paramatma/ Supreme Self manifests in/ is accessible to one who has controlled himself and has attained peace/is contented in heat and cold, in happiness and in distress, and in honor/ adoration and dishonor/ spite as well" (6.7), yadriccha-labha-santushto dvandvatito vimatsarah, samah siddhav asiddhau ca kṛitvapi na nibadhyate, "(Such person) is perfectly satisfied with whatever s/he obtains naturally, is free from duality and envy, and is balanced in success and failure. Although engaged in activities, he is never bound (by them)" (4.22), bahya-sparseshv asaktatma vindaty atmani yat sukham, sa brahma-yoga-yuktatma sukham akshayam asnute, "Unattached to the contact with the external (things), s/he finds happiness in the pleasure of the Self. Such a person is engaged in Brahma yoga, and enjoys inexhaustible happiness" (5.21), matra-sparsas tu kaunteya sitoshna-sukha-duhkha-dah, agamapayino 'nityas tams titikshasva bharata, "O son of Kunti, the contact of the senses (with the sense objects) causes joy and distress just like (cold in) winter and (heat in) summer. Such feelings are temporary: they come and go, o descendant of Bharata, and you should just try to tolerate them (without being confused and distracted from your duty)" (2.14), yam hi na vyathayanty ete purusham purusharshabha, sama-duhkha-sukham dhiraḥ so 'mritatvaya kalpate, "O best among men, one who is not distracted by all these (feelings) and is always equally balanced in suffering and in joy, is a sober person and he can aspire to immortality" (2.15), advesta sarva-bhutanam maitrah karuna eva ca, nirmamo nirahankarah sama-duhkha-sukhab kṣami, "(One who works for me must) be free from envy or hostility, but rather friendly and compassionate towards all beings. (S/he must be) free from material attachments and identifications, tolerant and ready to forgive, and equally prepared to face joys and sorrows" (12.13), sva-dharmam api cavekshya na vikampitum arhasi, dharmyad hi yuddhac chreyo 'nyat kṣatriyasya na vidyate, "Considering your own dharmic duty you should not hesitate, because for a kṣatriya there is nothing better than fighting a dharmic battle" (2.31), nirmana-moha jita-sanga-dosha adhyatma-nitya vinivṛtta-kamah, dvandvair vimuktah sukha-duhkha-samjnair gacchanty amudbah padam avyayam tat, "Free from vanity and illusion, having vanquished all bad association, always situated in Transcendence, having dropped all (selfish) desires, free from duality, balanced in joy and sorrow: thus intelligent people attain that position that is eternal" (15.5).

समः शत्रौ च मित्रे च तथा मानापमानयोः । शीतोष्णसुखदुःखेषु समः सङ्गविवर्जितः ॥ १२-१८ ॥

samaḥ śatrau ca mitre ca tathā mānāpamānayoh | śītoṣṇasukhaduḥkheṣu samaḥ saṅgavivarjitah || 12-18 ||

samah: equally disposed; satruṃ: towards an enemy; ca: and; mitre: towards a friend; ca: and; tatha: as well as; mana: in being honored; apamānyoh: as well as in absence of honor; sita: in cold; ushna: in heat; sukha dukkheṣu: in joys as well as in sorrows; samah: equally balanced; sanga vivarjitah: completely free from all association.

"Equally balanced and impartial towards enemies and friends, honor and neglect, cold and heat, joys and sorrows, and completely free from any (material) association,

When a person is situated on the transcendental level, free from selfish motivations and expectations, there is also no prejudice towards enemies or friends. The concept of enmity is only relative to material identifications and attachments, as well as to personal expectations of joys and sorrows, because in the service to the Supreme there is no consideration of enemies or friends, but only of behaviors that are favorable or unfavorable to dharma and to the benefit of the universe. We have already seen how it is better to have a reasonable intelligent enemy than a foolish friend, and that loyalties can change: a person from an opposite camp can come forward and help the cause of dharma, while a person expected to be on our side may actually make disastrous choices that are damaging to dharma and divine service. If we have overcome material ego we will not have any problem in cooperating with favorable persons, or in dropping former friends or family members who have become unfavorable. Similarly, a transcendental devotee is not attached to honors and fame, or afraid of being neglected or even disrespected by the general people. The word mana means "respect", "consideration", and includes all the forms of attention offered to a venerable person. So apa-mana means "lack of respect"; it is not an act of aggression but rather a sort of inaction, omission, or neglect.

It is not a pleasant attitude, but it is certainly less aggressive than ninda ("insult") as we will see in the next verse. Usually respect come from friends and lack of respect comes from enemies, and this is precisely how we are able to distinguish one from the other. A so-called friend who has no respect and affection for us is not worthy of the name, and the same consideration should be applied to family. A blood relative who disrespects us and does not care for us is actually an enemy, especially if his or her behavior creates problems: rina karta pita satruṃ, mata ca vyābhicārini, bhārya rūpavati satruḥ, putraḥ satruṃ apanditah.

Hitopadesha teaches that one might have four enemies in his own home: a father who is addicted to making debts, a mother who likes to go around and see other people, a wife who is too enamored of her own physical beauty, and a son who is an ignorant fool. Of course these are natural defects and not deliberate hostile choices, as such persons may still be favorably disposed towards us, and have no intention of harming us or putting us into difficulties - or to destroy our life and everything we hold dear. The situation will be even more dangerous when some of these family member are actually hostile, envious, resentful or hateful, especially if they have suffered for some injustice or mistreatment.

Women can become very vindictive when they are forced in a difficult situation - into a forced marriage, for example - or when they are subjected to humiliation and emotional damage. This applies also to events that preceded marriage, and not only to negative experiences (as victims of abuse) but also to negative training especially through example, by which they learned to abuse and mistreat others. In Vedic society these situations are extremely rare, but in Kali yuga the conditions of life become increasingly intolerable, and sane decent people actually become the exception. Foolish people tend to generalize and categorize according to the wrong parameters (usually bodily prejudice), therefore men become the enemies of women and women become the enemies of men, old people become the enemies of youngsters and young people become the enemies of elders, siblings fight each other, what to speak about in-laws. Positive relationships, or interactions with persons who are truly favorable to us - family or friends - are extremely beneficial for our life, because they provide emotional and moral support, the warmth of affection and healing, encouragement, and practical help and assistance as well. If we follow the system taught by Krishna in Bhagavad gita, we will be able to enjoy these benefits without becoming selfish and attached (2.47), therefore we will reciprocate in the same way with our friends and family. At a higher level still, when we are firmly established in Krishna Consciousness, all material identifications and attachments will be dissolved, and we will be completely free from any conditioning defined by sanga or association (tad ariṇaṃ karma mukta sanga, 3.9, gata-sangasya muktasya, 4.23, mukta-sango 'nāham-vadī, 18.26, karmāṇi saṅgam tyaktvā, 2.48, karmāṇi saṅgam tyaktvā, 5.10, yogināḥ karma kurvanti saṅgam tyaktvātma-suddhaye, 5.11, sanga-varjitah, 11.55, sanga-vivarjitah, 12.18, nirmana-moha jita-sanga-dosha, 15.5, saṅgam tyaktvā, 18.6, saṅgam tyaktvā pāhāṃ caivā, 18.9, niyatam sanga-rāhitam, 18.20). A clear explanation about the true meaning of detachment is also given in verses 2.51, 2.64, 5.26, 7.28, 15.4.

All along Bhagavad gita, Krishna is very clearly explaining that renunciation and detachment apply only to the fruits or benefits of the action, not to the action itself. Unfortunately, as we will see later on (16.6, 18.32) ignorance, foolishness and a tendency to asuric conclusions and behaviors push people exactly in the opposite direction, to mistake adharma for dharma and vice versa. So we will see delusional people claiming to be religionists or sannyasis or even gurus who remain strongly attached to the results of action (in the form of power, profit, adoration, etc) for themselves and their own faction, and "renounce" the dutiful action that they are supposed to continue doing. To avoid this danger, one should simply give up all associations (sanga vivarjita), as recommended in this verse. Each and every one of us is actually alone, as no other conditioned soul can really help us or remain with us always and in all circumstances. And at the same time, we are never really alone, because the supreme Friend, Father, Mother, Lover, Maintainer and Teacher constantly resides in our hearts, lifetime after lifetime.

तुल्यनिन्दास्तुतिर्मौनी सन्तुष्टो येन केनचित् । अनिकेतः स्थिरमतिर्भक्तिमान्मे प्रियो नरः ॥ १२-१९ ॥

tulyanindāstutirmaunī santuṣṭo yena kenacit | aniketah sthīramatirbhaktimānme priyo narah || 12-19 ||

tulya: balanced; ninda: insult; stutib: glorification; maunī: silent; santustah: satisfied; yena: by which; kenacit: whatever; aniketah: without residence; sthira matib: strongly determined; bhakti man: one who has devotion; me: to me; priyah: dear; narah: a human being.

"Balanced in front of insult and adoration, silent, satisfied with whatever s/he obtains, without residence, strongly determined: a devotee is very dear to me among (all) human beings."

In the previous verse we have seen that a true devotee is balanced and remains detached both from mana ("respect") and apa-mana ("lack of respect"). The word ninda, "insult", is much stronger than apa-mana, and it indicates an active aggression, that can be mental, verbal or even physical, and consists in falsely attributing defects or criminal activities to a person who is innocent and good. Of course when we are calling "thief" an actual thief, there is no question of insult; in fact if this is done in the proper way and with the proper motivation, it could even be a public service and bring a benefit even to the thief himself. Like any aggression, ninda brings negative karmic reactions, especially when it is committed against a genuine devotee (yogi and bhakta) and religious person, who is always working for the benefit of all beings (bhuta hita, 5.25, 12.4, 12.13). A sadhu, brahmana or sannyasi, is usually very respected in Vedic society, as a superior and guide to the entire society. However, such respect is earned and never demanded, because a genuine devotee or religious person is always humble and detached. If you see a religious person who gets angry and revengeful because he believes he has not been adequately honored, he is very likely a fake.

Anyone who wants to make any progress in bhakti, yoga or spiritual life should be extremely cautious and strictly avoid committing any offense towards a genuine sadhu, because the reactions to such crime destroy all the progress and good karmic credits. So religious people can be put to the test, but that should be done within reasonable limits and without personal arrogance from our part, because it is a very risky business. The opposite of ninda is stuti, that means "praise", or glorification. Usually stutis are offered to the Personalities of Godhead, to recite their glories and offer prayers, and often to ask for blessings: all this is done with great veneration, an attitude that is several notches higher than simple respect and consideration. In the Vedic system, ritual worship is offered to all venerable persons and objects, and it acknowledges and expresses their participation to the beneficial and divine qualities and activities of God. This is a natural tendency we can also find in many other cultures and even among atheists, who out of affection and respect offer flowers and lamps to their deceased relatives' picture, and bow to the portraits of their leaders. Nobody is happy when subjected to insult, but we should at least be balanced enough to be detached from criticism or even offense that will inevitably come in life, especially when we are actively engaged in spreading and defending dharma and knowledge. Not many people are intelligent or sincere enough to participate to a debate or other interactions in a proper way, so chances are that we will have to face many attacks, sometimes vicious and unnecessarily personal. One of the most popular tricks used by low class people who run out of solid arguments is to attack the opponent with ad hominem insinuations or accusations, usually totally invented, and often very vulgar and offensive, and to try to apply the various devices of emotional manipulation. That is different from the constructive criticism that we face in a civilized confrontation or debate, when an opponent points out a defect in our reasoning or evidence.

The word muni refers to one who is sober and serious (manana sila), one who is quiet (mauni), an ascetic (tapasvi), one who is following sadhana (vrati), one in the renounced order of sannyasa (yati) and a realized soul who has the direct vision of Reality (rishi). We have already elaborated on the meaning of the definition, that appears in several verses and especially in the following verses:

duhkheshu anudvigna-manah sukheshu vigata-sprihah, vira-raga-bhaya-krodhab sthita-dhir munir ucyate, "A person whose mind is not distracted by sufferings or joys and remains detached, free from attraction, fear and anger, is called a Muni who is able to maintain a steadfast meditation," (2.56)

sannyasas tu maha-babo duhkham aptum ayogatah, yoga-yukto munir brahma na cirendhigacchati, "O mighty-armed (Arjuna), sannyasa (renunciation) without yoga (proper engagement) only produces misery/ is attained with difficulty; one who is engaged in Yoga is a muni (a wise person) and quickly attains Brahman," (5.6)

yatendriya-mano-buddhir munir moksha-parayanah, vigateccha-bhaya-krodho yah sada mukta eva sah, "Controlling the senses, the mind and intelligence, the Muni (the silent sage) who is fully dedicated to moksha (liberation), free from all desires, fear and anger, is certainly always liberated," (5.28).

The word aniketana ("without residence"), too, should be applied in the sense of detachment from abankara and mamatva. The idea of home is the greatest attachment and comfort for all beings, including the birds and other animals, therefore overcoming the need for a fixed residence is a great demonstration of renunciation and austerity. One's home is an extension of our identifications, and so are the concepts of race, nationality, etc. A real yogi is detached from all this: mata ca parvati devi, pita devo mahesvarah, bandhavah siva bhaktans ca, svadeso bhuvana trayam ("my mother is Devi Parvati, my father is Shiva Mahesvara, the devotees of Shiva are my family, and the three worlds are my homeland", Annapurna stotra, 12). Of course a yogi has a special attachment to the holy places of Bharata varsha and considers them his/ her motherland, just as s/he worships Shiva and Parvati as his/ her own parents and family. However, s/he is always ready to move and to settle wherever his/ her service requires, preferably alone (rahasi sthitah ekaki, 6.10 vivikta sevi, 18.52), without attachment for a place over the other, and adjusting to any situation. This is confirmed by the expression yena kenacit, "whatever comes". In Mahabharata (santi parva 245.12) we find confirmation: na kutyani nodake sange na caile na tri puskare nagare na asane namne ca mokshavantu sah - kuti, indaka, sanga, caila, nagare, asana, anna, "One who knows liberation does not become attached to a particular house or village, sitting place, type of clothes, type of food, water reservoir, or even to auspiciousness".

The expression tri puskara literally means "the 3 lotus flowers" and refers to the higher planets (or "heaven"), the traditional places of pilgrimage on earth, and the very auspicious astronomical/ astrological configurations (yoga) that fall on month days 2, 7, 12, on Sunday, Tuesday and Saturday, and under the constellations named Kritika, Punarvasu, Uttara phalguni, Visaka, Uttarasadha, and Uttara bhadra pada.

ये तु धर्म्यामृतमिदं यथोक्तं पर्युपासते ।

श्रद्धधाना मत्परमा भक्तास्तेऽतीव मे प्रियाः ॥ १२-२० ॥

ye tu dharmyāmṛtamidaṁ yathoktaṁ paryupāsate | śraddadhānā matparamā bhaktāste'tīva me priyāḥ || 12-20 ||

ye: they; tu: but; dharma amṛtam: the nectar of dharma/ eternal dharma; idam: this; yatha: as; uktam: said; paryupāsate: worship correctly; śraddadbanah: with faith; mat paramah: totally dedicated to me; bhaktah: devotees; te: they; atīva: very much; me priyah: dear to me.

"Those who worship correctly this eternal dharma as explained by me, totally dedicated to me with faith and devotion, are extremely dear to me."

In this last verse of the chapter, Krishna summarizes bhakti yoga as the dharma amṛta; this definition is extremely interesting as the word amṛta means "immortal", and also "nectar".

According to grammar, the most important part of the expression is the word dharma, of which amṛta is an attribute; we therefore understand that the basis for the process described by Krishna in this chapter is dharma. There is no bhakti yoga without dharma: this is the fundamental truth that we really need to understand, because without a strong foundation in dharma there cannot be any progress in bhakti. It is true that bhakti is completely independent from any other method or qualification, but when we speak of bhakti, we speak of dharma - in this particular case, sanātana dharma, the eternal and universal principles of dharma.

We have already elaborated (2.8, 2.31) on the meaning of dharma, that is often mistranslated as "religion", while in fact it refers to the foundation of reality itself, that supports the existence, the consciousness and the happiness of the entire universe, as well as its progress and proper functioning. In nature, it is also called ritu, which means "rule", "natural law", "cycle", "season", and "orbit" as in the regular movements of the planets. This same ritu is called dharma in human society, and applies to the proper duty that each individual is meant to perform according to guna and karma (qualities, tendencies and abilities).

At a material level, based on the particular body that one is wearing and the relative qualities, tendencies and abilities, each human being is expected to engage in one of the varnas or professional occupations as a limb of the universal body of the Virata Purusha (4.13); this is called sva dharma, or "specific duty". However, on the transcendental level, dharma is sanātana dharma, the eternal and universal duty of all living entities: service to the Supreme and to the totality of Consciousness. This is also called bhagavata dharma, "service to God", that can be translated as "devotional service" or "Krishna Consciousness". Vedic scriptures and especially Bhagavad gita clearly explain that such devotional service must be based on truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness, goodness, freedom from material identification and attachments, enlightenment, selflessness, fearlessness, impartiality, and cooperation among all to support society and universe.

Genuine bhakti will never motivate actions contrary to dharma, because bhakti is dharma itself: svalpam apy asya dharmasya trayate mahato bhayat (2.40), asraddadbanah purusa dharmasyasya parantapa, aprapya mam nivartante mṛtyu-samsara-vartmani (9.3), kshipram bhavati dharmatma sasvac-chantim nigacchati (9.31), iva aryaḥ sasvata-dharma-goṣṭha sanātanas tvam puruṣo (11.18). Also 14.27 and 18.31 will confirm.

The expression mat parama means "having me as the supreme reality", and equals to nirvana paramam (6.15), akṣharam brahma paramam (8.3), paramam puruṣam (8.8), paramam gatim (8.13, 8.21), samsiddhim paramam (8.15), dhama paramam (8.21), paramam bhavan (10.12), paramam guhyam (11.1, 18.67) and paramam vacah (10.1, 18.64), akṣharam paramam (11.18), dhama paramam (15.6). A similar meaning is expressed by the word parayana, "totally dedicated to" (5.17, 9.34), and by the word dharmatma, "totally immersed in dharma" (9.31).

Chapter 13: Prakriti purusha vibhaga yoga

The yoga of understanding nature as distinct from the personal principle

After the scene-setting introduction (chapter 1), the first 4 chapters (2 or sankehya, 3 or karma, 4 or jnana, 5 or sannyasa) of the text of the Bhagavad gita were about the self (about tvam, or "you"), and how to evolve and progress in self realization. Krishna has explained about karma and duty, and how we are supposed to work in this world selflessly, without attachment and material identifications. The second group of 4 chapters (6 or dhyana, 7 or vijnana, 8 or taraka brahma, 9 or raja guhya) were about tat, "That" supreme Consciousness and Reality. Krishna has explained about the meaning and practice of meditation, so from the realization of the atman we can move to the realization of Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan while we are still in this world.

The third group of 4 chapters (10 or vibhuti, 11 or visva rupa darshana, 12 or bhakti, 13 or prakriti purusha viveka) are about tattva jnana, the process of knowledge of Reality, and Krishna explains precisely how to apply and execute bhakti in the genuine way, by appreciating the transcendental nature of God and entering into the supreme Consciousness. The fourth and last group of 4 chapters (14 or guna traya vibhaga, 16 or daivasura sampada, 17 or sraddha traya, 18 or moksha) are about liberation or the ultimate success of the entire process, and their teachings are summarized by the famous aphorism tat tvam asi. Krishna clarifies the dangerous traps on the road to liberation, and how to make the last steps away from material conditionings, because even a liberated soul (jivanmukta) still has to deal with the three gunas as long as s/he lives in this world.

So if we want to summarize the entire Bhagavad gita in four steps, we can describe them as 1. tvam, 2. tat, 3. tattvam, 4. tattvam asi.

Besides the first scene-setting chapter (1, Arjuna visada), there is another atypical chapter in the text of Bhagavad gita: the 15th, that interrupts the thread of discussion to remind us about the mystical aspect of the supreme Personality of Godhead (Purushottama), who is completely independent from the manifestation of this world and even from the knowledge contained in the Vedic scriptures.

In the 12th chapter, Krishna has given the description of the qualities and activities that a devotee must develop in order to engage in transcendental service. In this chapter, on Arjuna's request, Krishna will explain the difficult and deep science of Purusha and Prakriti, the two sides of Brahman, who are the Father and Mother of everything, both in the material and the spiritual world, and within the jivatman as well.

Purusha is the personal principle of perception or consciousness. Some commentators explain the etymology of the word as derived from pura, "city": this means that the purusha is the lord of the "city of the nine gates" (5.13), or the human body. We know that there are two purushas: the two birds described in Svetasvatara Upanishad (4.6) and Mundaka Upanishad (3.1.1) as well as in Bhagavata Purana (11.11.6). Another synonym for the city of the nine gates or the tree of the body is the kshetra or "field of action" described in this chapter. Accordingly, this kshetra is also called Prakriti. The etymology of this word is said to derive from the compound pra-kriti ("made previously"), referring to the first activity of creation.

The definitions of Prakriti and Purusha are not easy to understand, and they become clear only to those who have already established themselves on the level of Brahman realization and have developed bhakti, devotion, to the Supreme. Superficial, ignorant people may believe that the word purusha indicates a mere ordinary human being of male gender, while for them prakriti is simply material nature. Following this materialistic and foolish concept, they conclude that any male human being is the legitimate enjoyer of everything - from women to wealth to resources to the entire world. Conversely, they believe that anything that is not a male human being is not a purusha, and therefore has no rights or title to any enjoyment or even freedom or independence, and should simply be exploited carelessly. This understanding is not approved by Bhagavad gita or Vedic culture; in fact we will see that, in chapter 16, Krishna will call it asuric, or demoniac. Even human beings of male gender (who believe they are supposed to be the enjoyers) live pitifully under this type of distorted and anti-natural ideology, because all of them vainly attempt to individually and materially take the place of the Supreme - a foolish pursuit that causes them to keep fighting and damaging one another.

The faulty materialistic application of the meaning of purusha and prakriti can only bring serious damage and many sufferings to everyone, as we can see in the present situation of global society, after several centuries in which this delusion has been spreading around the world. Demonic (asuric) people project their demonic mentality on nature, "demonizing" it in all its forms, from the Mother Goddess herself to knowledge, earth, women, cows, body, healthy pleasure, and the natural elements. When nature is considered an enemy, the inevitable consequence is that people will try to defeat, repress, conquer, dominate and oppress it, with disastrous results. The more we try to control nature, or to oppose it, the more deeply and painfully we get ourselves in trouble.

Someone could think that since the elements that compose the sense objects, our body, the senses, the mind etc, are made of material nature, when we "control the senses and the mind" we are actually controlling nature. However, this would be mere illusion. We can only engage our consciousness (which is our actual identity) in the modalities of nature - either material or spiritual: this will be the subject of the next chapters of Bhagavad gita, up to the last one.

अर्जुन उवाच ।

arjuna uvāca ।

प्रकृतिं पुरुषं चैव क्षेत्रं क्षेत्रज्ञमेव च ।

एतद्वेदितुमिच्छामि ज्ञानं ज्ञेयं च केशव ॥ १३-१ ॥

prakṛtiṁ puruṣaṁ caiva kṣetraṁ kṣetrājñameva ca । etadveditumicchāmi jñānaṁ jñeyaṁ ca keśava ॥ 13-1 ॥

arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; prakritim: the Prakriti; purusam: the Purusha; ca: and; iva: certainly; ksetram: the kshetra; ksetra jnam: the one who knows the ksetra; eva: certainly; ca: and; etat: this; veditum: to know; icchami: I wish; jnanam: knowledge; jneyam: what is to be known; ca: and; kesava: o Kesava.

Arjuna said: "O Kesava, I wish to know about the Prakriti and the Purusha, the kshetra and the kshetra-jna, the knowledge and the object of knowledge."

The elaboration on these two fundamental concepts will offer new illumination not only on the kshetra (the object of knowledge), but also on the atman as the kshetra jna, on jnana itself, on the jiva atman as compared to the param atman, and on the profound and complex meaning of prakriti. Ultimately, everything is consciousness - the kshetra jna as well as the kshetra and jnana itself - but with the distinction of the prakriti at the beginning of all manifestations (spiritual and material), when the great divine lila or the divine dance started. Therefore we should see that distinction (vibhaga) as complementarity rather than opposition of dualities, as the two sides of the same One.

In the 2nd chapter, Krishna had already explained the difference between body and the atman that lives in the body, saying that the body is temporary while the atman is eternal, and establishing the difference between the spiritual and the material. This is the first, easiest, and superficial meaning of the difference between the purusha and the prakriti: the purusha is the atman, and the prakriti is the body - not only the individual body, but also the universal body. During that preliminary discussion, Krishna had made very clear that the purusha is the same in all bodies, male or female, and even animal or vegetable, while prakriti is the intrinsic nature of their manifestation, from which they can never become separated (3.5, 3.33). At the same time, the jivas can move from the material mode of prakriti (7.4, 9.7, 9.8, 9.10, 9.12) to the spiritual mode of prakriti (7.5, 9.13, 11.51).

Here materialistic people become confused and lose the thread of the discussion, because they believe that the nature of the purusha is what we can call purushatva ahankara or the identification with the quality of the purusha as enjoyer. Then if you try to tell them they are actually prakriti (7.5), they freak out and start behaving like schizophrenics, because they cannot understand how one can be purusha and prakriti at the same time. But it is a fact: Krishna also stated clearly that the jivatmans (the individual beings) are also prakriti, and that the spiritual world and spiritual forms are prakriti, too (4.6). Even the transcendental forms and names of Krishna, that are non-different from him, are prakriti - the most intimate manifestation of the supreme power - para prakriti, or Yogamaya.

In this chapter, Krishna will further explore this mysterious and deep subject, at a subtler level: both purusha and prakriti are intrinsically spiritual, and all differences are simply due to the mode or nature of the consciousness - in Sanskrit terms, the prakriti of the purusha. The additional definition of prakriti and purusha as jnanam and jneyam, "knowledge" and "the object of knowledge", is meant to further deepen our understanding. We know that purusha is the principle of consciousness, therefore on the superficial material platform it would be logical to conclude that the purusha is jnana, or knowledge, while the "field" is the jneya, "what is to be known". But we also know that jnana or vidya is identified as the prakriti or shakti, and the field of knowledge, or jneya, as the purusha (9.17, 11.18, 11.38, 13.18, 13.24, but also 5.29, 7.1, 7.3, 7.10, 7.30, 10.3, 10.15, 10.17, 15.15). We need to pause and meditate on this concept, in order to understand it properly. To facilitate this understanding, we must remember that activity is the characteristic of the prakriti, while perception or consciousness is the characteristic of the purusha. In this light, we will correctly read verses 8 to 12 in this chapter, that describe jnana, or knowledge, as a series of activities of the consciousness (the prakriti of the purusha) that establish the consciousness on the proper level of identification - that is the spiritual level. On the other hand, we will understand that Consciousness (the purusha - Isvara, the param atman, of whom the jiva atman is simply a fragment) is the real purpose and subject of knowledge, because Consciousness is the original blueprint of everything that exists.

The wonderful Lord said: "O Kaunteya, this body is called the field, and one who knows this (body) is called the knower of the field.

To introduce the discussion in this chapter, Krishna takes us back to the beginning in chapter 2, where he had explained the difference between the atman and the perishable material body or śarīra (2.17, 2.18, 2.19, 2.20, 2.21, 2.22, 2.23, 2.24, 2.25, 2.26). To refer to his teachings about the atman, Krishna says tat vidāḥ, "he who knows this". Now Krishna will again connect the concept of material nature with the concept of prakriti, as he had done previously (3.5, 3.33, 7.4) and will do so again (15.7, 18.40).

The word kṣetra is usually translated as "field" and refers to the "field of activity", as prakriti is the source of all activities (3.5, 3.33, 9.10, 13.21), both at the material and at the spiritual level. Another word from the same root is kṣatriya - the position of the royal class that protects the kingdom, that is the field of activity of a king. It is also interesting to note that the word kṣata means "one who protects from injuries", while kṣhi means "perishing" and kṣhar means "decaying". In relationship to the kṣetra, the purusha or consciousness is the kṣetra jña, "the knower of the field". However, this definition only applies to one who has attained the transcendental realization and who knows that the eternal atman is simply wearing the material body. The word jña implies actual knowledge, so a kṣetra jña is only one who knows he is not the body: the conditioned soul who identifies with the body is just ignorant (ajña) and does not know anything.

The knowledge presented by Krishna in this chapter is more advanced than the teachings presented in the previous chapters, and we should not underestimate it. The same knowledge was requested by Brahma at the beginning of creation, as reported in the Bhagavata Purana (2.9.25-30). Specifically in verse 27 Brahma asks, yathātma māya yogena nana saṁkṛty upabrimbitam, vilumpam visṛjan gṛham bibhrad atmanam atmana, "How has your Self, by the Self, through the union with Maya and the ensuing transformations, accepted many śaktis for the purpose of the destruction, the manifestation and the preservation (of the universe)?"

Vishnu replies with the famous catuṣ śloki (2.9.33-36) that constitutes the heart of the Bhagavata Purana, preceded by these verses: jñana parama guhyam me yad vijñana samavītam, sarabasyam tad angam ca gṛhīṇa gaditam māya, yavan aham yathā bhavo yad rūpa guṇa

karmakah, tathaiva tattva vijñanam astu te mad anugrahat, "My supreme knowledge is hidden, and it is applied in practice. Try to understand it while I am explaining it, with its secrets and implications. Let this knowledge be realized by you by my kindness: as it is I who manifest the existence of all forms, qualities and activities." (Bhagavata Purana, 2.9.31-32). As we know that forms, qualities and activities are all produced by Prakriti, according to the direction of the Consciousness or Purusha, we see that it is not possible to divide the two. This deep knowledge is expressed in the following catuh sloki (2.9.33-36):

aham evasam evagre nanyad yat sat asat param, pascad aham yad etac ca yo 'vasisyeta so 'smy aham, "I am that which existed before the creation, and all that will ever exist. I am the sat and the asat (the supreme cause and effect), up to the end (of the universe), and I am what remains after all these (creations) and everything else (are dissolved)", rite 'rtham yat pratiyeta na pratiyeta catmani, tad vidyat atmano mayam yathabhaso yatha tama, "Whatever appears to be of value or without value, is only in relationship with me. You must know that everything (in this world) is just the shadow of my Maya, like darkness is a shadow (of light)", yatha mahanti bhutani bbutasucchavacesv antu, pravistani apravistani tatha tesu na tesv aham, "Just like the elemental powers (ether, air, fire, water, earth) are contained in all beings, both great and small, and at the same time they are not limited to them, similarly I am in all beings, and yet I am not (limited to them)", etavad eva jijnasyam tattva jijnasunatmanah, anvaya vyatikramabhyam yat syat sarvatra sarvada, "This (that I have now said) is the most important subject of transcendental knowledge, the tattva that should be researched directly and directly, at all times and places and in all circumstances".

"O Bharata, you should know that I am also the knower of the field who resides in all fields. Knowing the field and the knower of the field is called knowledge. This is my opinion.

The absolute definition of jñana, "knowledge", is the understanding of the two fundamental factors of Reality: purusha and prakriti, and how they are one and the same, and at the same time they are two distinct tattvas or existences. This very subject has been at the heart of all Vedic knowledge and its commentaries by the great traditional acharyas - from Adi Shankara (kevala advaita) to Ramanuja (visista advaita) to Madhva (visista dvaita) to Nimbarka (dvaita advaita) to Vishnusvami (suddha dvaita) to Krishna Chaitanya (acintya bheda abheda). The fact is that God as Reality is simultaneously and inconceivably one and different from the manifestation of the universe, from his energies, and from the individual souls, too.

This verse has been largely elaborated by advaitins to prove that the ksetrajña is one only, as in the statement "I am also the same ksetra jna". Unfortunately, a faulty line of interpretation among the advaitins has come to conclude that kevala advaita means that conditioned souls are nothing but Brahman that has become subject to maya or illusion. Consequently that movement has come to be known as the mayavada school, as its conclusion implies that material illusion, or ordinary maya, is stronger than Isvara. Such conclusion is contrary to the teachings of Bhagavad gita and all the other genuine shastra, including the Upanishads and the Vedanta sutras. Of course Isvara resides in the heart of every being as param atman, but there is not just one bird on the tree of the body. There are two birds in the same tree: the jivatma and the paramatma. One is conditioned, the other is not - he never has been, and he never will be - because Isvara is above the sat and the asat (15.16). This has already been stated in verse 9.10: mayadhyakṣena prakritih sūyate sa caracaram, hetunanena kaunteya jagad viparivartate, "Under my order this prakriti manifests everything, both moving and non-moving; by this cause the universe is created cyclically."

This mayavadi deviation cannot be ascribed to Adi Shankara, who very clearly stated at the beginning of his commentaries to Bhagavad gita that Narayana is always transcendental (narayanah parah ayyakta). He explains further in his commentary to this verse that the jiva cannot be Isvara, otherwise Isvara would be subject to maya, while we learn from all the shastra that Isvara controls maya, and not the other way around.

What is Isvara and what is maya? Isvara is the supreme Consciousness, and Maya is the illusion, the magic power by which this material world is manifested and the individual souls are covered. If we maintain that Isvara can be subjected to maya, or ignorance, the very definition of Isvara loses all its meaning. In his questions and answers to this verse, Adi Shankara clearly states that Isvara is never subject to maya. If we postulate otherwise, we should conclude that ignorance does not exist at all, and that everything is just a lila of the Supreme that pretends to be covered by ignorance. In a sense, this is true: the material manifestation and the experiences of the conditioned souls are indeed a part of the lila of the Supreme, meant to lead the anu atman through the evolutionary process. But this is not the lila of the anu atman: it is the lila of the param atman. By definition, lila is a blissful activity that is totally free from any material conditioning.

In verse 4.5, Krishna had clearly told Arjuna that he knows all lives and experiences (aham veda sarvani) because his consciousness is unlimited, while the consciousness of the individual soul is limited, even on the liberated level. What to speak of the conditioned soul, that is covered by ignorance.

There is a clear difference (viveka) between vidya and avidya: if we refuse to acknowledge it, we will be forced to come to the untenable conclusion that shastra and sadhana are useless, because they are meant to lead us from avidya to vidya. The scriptures become unnecessary only when the kshetrajna's consciousness has directly entered the consciousness of the paramatma (visate tad anantaram, 18.55), but without the scriptures or jnana, one cannot reach this point. It is not simply a matter of different perception of the same situation: God cannot fall under this tamas of delusion, because he is nirguna - all the scriptures agree on this.

In a sense, also the anu atma is nirguna: material qualities (such as death, decay etc) do not belong to the atman, but are a manifestation of maya or avidya by illusory superimposition to the atman, so the atman is not really affected or bound by ignorance and material identification. Illusion can therefore be compared to a cloud in the sky, that cannot really affect the sky itself, but is simply covering our perception of the sky.

Liberation is the inherent quality and nature of the atman, while avidya is only a superimposition: avidya is therefore illusory, as darkness is the absence of light and has no existence of its own. Specifically, avidya means identification with ahankara and mamata, that we could also translate as "agentship" and "enjoyership".

Defects belong to material body only, to the sense organs that are limited by the four imperfections; blindness concerns the material eyes only, as on the level of liberation there are no defects. However, even on the liberated level, the anu atman or jiva atman can only be conscious of a limited part of the total ksetra, while the param atman is eternally conscious (jna) of the entire totality of all kshetras (sarva ksetresu). So isvara and jiva always remain two different categories.

Svetasvatara Upanishad (1.12) confirms it very clearly: bbokta bhogyam preritaram ca matva, sarvam proktam tri vidham brahmam eta, "Brahman is said to have three aspects: the enjoyer, the enjoyed and the controller of both". So we understand that Brahman is atman, param atman and prakriti: everything that can exist. And all this is fundamentally Consciousness. Bhagavata Purana (8.3.13) clarifies the point: ksetra jnaya namas tubhyam sarvadyaksaya saksine, purusayatma mulaya mula prakritaye namah, "I offer my respect to you, the ksetra jna. You control everything, you are the witness, the purusha, the root of the atman, and the root of the prakriti as well." And again: seyam bhavagato maya yan nanyena virudhyate, isvarasya vimuktasya karpanyam uta bandhanam, "Some say that Bhagavan is illusion, but this is contradictory because Isvara is always liberated, and totally self sufficient. He can never be in bondage" (Bhagavata Purana, 3.7.9).

"Now listen, as I briefly tell you about the field, its transformations, and its power.

Here we penetrate even more deeply into the heart of knowledge as described in the previous verse. The core of all philosophical discussions in Vedic tradition is the correct understanding of the ontological meaning of God compared to the individual and to the world, as we have seen briefly mentioning the most prominent and famous philosophers of these last centuries. Now we will get directly at the root of the issue, by analyzing how the field (prakriti) is simultaneously one and different from the knower of the field (purusha), and how the interactions between the two are creating the entire world.

In this regard, the traditional Vedic academia presents two main perspectives, called vivarta vada and parinama vada, broadly described as "superimposition" and "transformation". We can briefly say that the difference between the two is evaluated on the concept of maya, "illusion", by which the individual soul is confused, so that it cannot see Reality as it is.

The vivarta vada approach is explained by Adi Shankara, who teaches that the manifestation of the universe is not a transformation of God, but only an appearance or illusion (maya) as the products of material energy are temporary and unsubstantial. The technical explanation is that the universe is adhyasa (with a long a in the second position), a superimposition over the changeless Reality of Brahman. In its original presentation, this perspective does not claim that illusion is more powerful than Isvara, as some confused people have come to believe.

Only the individual soul, the anu atman or jiva atman, can fall under the control of Mahamaya because of its tiny size. This is confirmed also in Bhagavad gita and in all the other Vedic texts, and can be easily verified through daily direct experience by observing the delusional state and the sufferings of conditioned persons.

Illusion means that the jivatman confused by maya falsely identifies with the material body and the material objects of this world: this is the original mistake that creates all the other problems, resulting in innumerable fears and sufferings. In this darkness of illusion, the conditioned soul sleeps, identifying with a phantasmagoria of forms and names that appear and disappear inevitably in the course of time. Sometimes the conditioned soul experiences them as pleasurable dreams, sometimes as nightmares, but always forgetting its real, original, and permanent identity as spiritual being.

The parinama vada approach is usually considered a shakta or tantric doctrine, and as such it has been somehow overshadowed during the last centuries because of the increasing influence of patriarchal tendencies on Indian society. However, its contribution to the Vedic heritage of knowledge has continued to be lively and important, especially in the tradition of Deity worship and bhakti. According to this approach, the universe is real, as it is a direct transformation of God, therefore Maya Shakti is not illusion, but Reality itself. From this Maya Shakti - the original Prakriti - all the forms derive, both on the spiritual and on the material level. Strangely enough, this is the perspective that could be defined as the original mayavada theory, as it presents Maya as the supreme power within the universe.

However, the only people who seem to have problems with what they call "the mayavada perspective" (which they identify with the teachings of Shankaracharya) are two particular sects of vaishnavas, both presently claiming to be descending from the lineage of Madhva. One of the two sects is the orthodox Madhva sampradaya, whose members are also called tattva vadis, specifically because Madhva focused all his philosophical arguments against what he called the maya vadis. If we properly investigate, we will find out that Madhva's philosophy is strongly patriarchal, and reduces the importance of bhakti to a minimum. According to Madhva, only Vishnu is Brahman, and only this Brahman is Reality and Existence; Krishna is a temporary or partial manifestation of Vishnu, and Radharani and Lakshmi are merely ordinary individual jiva atmans. In Madhva's perspective, the jiva atmans are divided into two different ontological categories: those who can become liberated, and those who cannot (nitya baddhas). These nitya baddhas continue to take birth in the material world eternally as "bad people" (low caste human beings or asuras) without any hope of escaping illusion and ignorance, because their conditioning is their "eternal nature" and can never be overcome. Of course, this is not a fact and it is not confirmed in scriptures.

Ironically, the other vaishnava sect that continues the "war against the mayavadis" (identified by them as Adi Shankara and his followers) is the Gaudiya vaishnava lineage, claiming to descend from Krishna Chaitanya (who appeared in Gaudadesa, or Bengal). However, Krishna Chaitanya was seen by his contemporaries and especially by the Madhva followers, as a mayavadi himself (as reported in Krishnadasa's Chaitanya charitamrita, Madhya 9.250). In the same Chaitanya charitamrita, considered by the Gaudiya vaishnavas as the most authoritative biography of Krishna Chaitanya, we see that Chaitanya heavily criticized the Madhva lineage in unequivocal terms: karmi, jnani dui bhakti hina tomara sampradaya dekhi sei dui cibna, "I see that in your sampradaya there is an excessive attachment to karma and jnana that is obstructing the development of devotion." (Chaitanya charitamrita, Madhya 9.276). He also says, sabe eka guna dekhi tomara sampradaye, satya vigraha kari' isvare karaba niscaye, "The only good thing I see in your sampradaya is that you are accepting without any doubt the truth of the (spiritual) form of the Lord." (Chaitanya charitamrita, Madhya 9.277).

In the conversation between Chaitanya and the Madhva sampradaya leaders, it becomes clear that Madhva did not give any importance to bhakti, but only to the dutiful performance of social religious duties in the varna ashrama system, that according to Madhva automatically leads the eligible souls to liberation and to the attainment of Vaikuntha, the abode of Vishnu (Chaitanya charitamrita, Madhya, 9.256, 257). In reply, Chaitanya strongly preaches to the Madhva followers about the paramount importance of bhakti and the universal scope of the process of self-realization, by which any human being can attain the highest perfection, as confirmed by Bhagavad gita (9.32, 33) and Bhagavata Purana (6.16.43, 3.33.7, 11.14.21, 10.84.13). The same point is confirmed also by the Upanishad, as for example Svetasvatara Upanishad (2.5), that claims that all human beings are equally qualified as amritasya putras ("children of immortality"), and by the original sambhitas (Rig Veda 5.60.5, Yajur Veda 16.15, Atharva Veda 3.30.1) that affirm the inherent equality of all human beings. In this light, we can better understand the discussion about vivarta vada and parinama vada.

Let us now return to the parinama vada perspective, that gives paramount importance to bhakti and lila, and worships Yogamaya as the all-powerful sister of Krishna, who can even cover Krishna's perception to enhance the ecstatic experience of loving relationships in the lila. According to the parinama vada perspective, God is simultaneously immanent and transcendent to the world, and creates all the things in the world through a transformation of the basic Existence or Brahman.

This is in accordance to what Krishna says in this verse (yat vikari, "transformations of Brahman"), and can be best understood when we remember that kshetra ("the field") is also Brahman or Consciousness, just like the two kshetra jnas - param atman and jiva atman (Svetasvatara Upanishad, 1.12). Also Chandogya Upanishad supports this perspective: yatha saumy ekena mrt pindena sarvam mrimayam vijnatam syad vacarambhanam vikaro namadheyam mrittikety eva satyam, "Earth's transformations are merely verbal creations of the process of naming; the substance earth itself is alone real" (6.1.4).

In the parinama vada perspective, ignorance (avidya) does not have a real existence, but it is simply a temporary and confusing absence of perception of knowledge (vidya) experienced by the conditioned soul. For the liberated soul, who sees things as they really are, there is no ignorance, but simply the manifestation of divine lilas to which we participate consciously or unconsciously, willingly or unwillingly. So, on this level, illusion "transforms" as lila because of the action of Yogamaya, giving a totally new meaning to our perception, as it will be exemplified at the beginning of chapter 15 with the image of the banyan tree whose branches go downwards and whose roots go upwards.

This banyan tree is the prakriti, manifesting as Mahamaya in this world and Yogamaya in the transcendental spiritual world. The spiritual world is the supreme position (pada, dhama) where there is no need of sun, moon, stars or fire because everything is self effulgent. Mahamaya and Yogamaya appear to be exactly the opposite of each other, like a tree and its reflection on a clear water surface: this is because they both stem from the same root - the Consciousness or purusha Brahman, the great treasure that is to be found under the tree.

The main obstacle to this understanding is the widespread misconception that inert matter (jada) is ignorance (avidya). Actually material objects and phenomena, although not conscious in themselves, are prakriti and as such they should be understood as knowledge (jnana); in the macrocosm they are the energies (shaktis) of the Supreme, Isvara, param atman, while in the microcosm they are the objects of the senses (visaya) of the jiva atman. Consequently, the jiva atman has the power to perceive or enjoy them, as his own shaktis, secondary manifestations of the supreme Shakti. If we dig even deeper, we will find that such visayas are projected by the jiva atman through his senses, and therefore the jiva atman possesses and manifests a tiny measure of the inherent quality or nature (prakriti) of Isvara as the creator. In very simple terms, this power has been described by recent New Age psychology as "the law of attraction", by which our thoughts shape our world and attract events and things (positive or negative) into our lives.

Of course superficial and ignorant simpletons will conclude that it is sufficient to visualize money, properties, position etc in our "meditation" for them to magically manifest into our lives, without any work (karma) from our part. Conversely, these deluded people blame failures and losses simply on the "incorrect visualization" that lingers on negative events and things rather than positive events and things.

True, we will not get much benefit from a negative attitude towards life, or the habit of brooding over fears and worries and bad thoughts. In fact, such dark thoughts will distract our mind, preventing us from actually seeing and grasping the positive opportunities to obtain good things, and from rightfully enjoying the good things that we already have. Also, our general demeanor, bodily language, and the energy we project into the environment (as "vibrations" or aura) will reflect this dark and low frequency, subtly attracting people with similar or complementary attitudes and mentality. In other words, we will unconsciously seek people with a negative approach to life, always thinking about fears, disasters, loss, etc, as well as cheaters and exploiters who thrive on the fears of others and take advantage of them.

However, thinking positive, "happy thoughts" will certainly be beneficial to our life, but we will only obtain the good things that we are destined to receive by dint of our good work, performed either in previous lifetimes or in this one. A positive attitude and pleasant smiling face will certainly help a salesman in his work, but he needs to have something valuable to sell, otherwise there will be no income. If he tries to get money without giving anything valuable in return, he will become indebted and will have to pay the karma.

Once we have clarified the possible misconceptions about this issue, we can confidently state that - yes, our reality is determined by the mode of energy (shakti, prakriti) that we cultivate or "take shelter" in. We will see this concept even more clearly in the subsequent chapter explaining about the modes of prakriti, called gunas. By taking shelter in sattva, rajas or tamas, our individual prakriti is modified (vikara) and the consciousness is manifested differently, moving towards the light or the darkness. Our proper position is in establishing ourselves (our consciousness) in the light and then in the supreme and imperishable Transcendence: tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, asato ma sad gamaya, mrtiyor ma amrtam gamaya (Bṛhad aranyaka Upanishad, 1.3.28).

Just as in the apparent contradiction of advaita ("non dual") and dvaita ("dual"), the two approaches of vivarta vada and parinama vada are actually complementing rather than opposing each other, offering a multi-dimensional vision that can be directly perceived by the grace of the Mother Goddess, Sri Vidya - the para prakriti, to whom we must resort and in whom we must take shelter, as recommended by Krishna himself in Bhagavad gita (9.13).

The reconciliation of the vivarta vada and the parinama vada, besides the obviously central factor of bhakti (that is repeatedly and clearly presented by Bhagavad gita as the key to the entire process) is supported by the teachings of the Upanishads. In this perspective, the expression yat vikari, meaning "its changes" or "its transformations", refers to the transformations of maya or prakriti, that, too, is known as Brahman (Svetasvatara Upanishad 1.9, 12).

"(This knowledge) has been repeatedly sung in many hymns by the Rishis. Again it has been presented in the aphorisms of the Vedānta sūtras, with a clear discussion on the causes (and the effects).

Krishna again states very clearly that this knowledge is the most central issue of the entire scope of Vedic teachings, from the original sambhitas (Rig, Sama, Yajur, Atharva) through the Upanishads and to the Vedānta sūtras, in the traditional line of studies prescribed for a genuine student. Unfortunately, due to the degrading influence of the adharmic academic system, the current general opinion is that one should study Vedic knowledge mainly by learning about the presentations of previous "specialized" researchers and scholars (not the original Rishis, though) either in the western-oriented Indology studies, or in the officially recognized Mathas or institutions that claim to be following the teachings of one prominent teacher and scholars as opposed to the others. Whether the claims of such sampradāyas are true or not, the fundamental fact is that such "second-hand" study is simply not the Vedic method: in the genuine Vedic tradition, each and every student is expected to directly realize the tattva from the original śāstra, while the writings of famous āchāryas should be considered simply as support consultation material. This means that each and every student should directly examine the original śāstra, including the sambhitas, the collections of meaning-packed hymns that are chanted and sung during the traditional Vedic rituals.

The original śāstra, compiled by Vyasa himself, include the Vedānta sūtras also called Vedānta, Brahma sūtras, Uttara mīmāṃsa, Brahma mīmāṃsa, Sariraka mīmāṃsa, Nirṇayaka śāstra, Bhikṣhu sūtras or Nyāya prasthāna. Vedānta means "the conclusion of the Vedas", brahma refers to the Supreme Brahman, mīmāṃsa means "pursuit", bhikṣhu refers to sannyāsis, nirṇaya means "investigation", and sariraka means "of the body", intended as a body of knowledge or jnana kanda, as opposed to the treatises on ritual procedures or karma kanda.

The text of the Vedanta is not very large - it is only 555 aphorisms divided into 4 chapters (adhyayas), each consisting of 4 sections (padas), containing groups of sentences (adbikarana). The elaboration offered by the Vedanta sutras about the transformation (yat vikari) of the field (kshetra) or knowledge (jnana), is summarized by verse 1.1.12 (of Vedanta sutras): anandamayab abhyasat, "its nature is constant happiness". Here anandamaya refers to the description of the Upanishads by which the living being is "a body" made of happiness, anandamaya, surrounded by "bodies" that are increasingly grosser, made respectively of intelligence or knowledge (jnanamaya), mind (manomaya), life energy (pranamaya) and gross matter (annamaya) assimilated to the food.

This refers eminently to Taittiriya Upanishad (2.1.2) elaborating on the central issue of knowledge: tasmad va etasmad atmana akasah sambhutat ity adina brahma puccham pratistha ity astenanna mayam pranamaya mano maya vijñana maya ananda mayab panca purusha pathitas tesv annamayadi trayam jada kshetra svarupam, tato bhinno vijñanamayo jivas tasya bhokteti jiva kshetrajna svarupam, tasmac ca bhinnab sarvantara anandamaya itisvara kshetrajna svarupam uktam. Here is the translation: "Among conscious entities, there are 5 gradations of purushas, respectively annamaya (conscious only of food and sense gratification), pranamaya and manomaya: these are the modes of consciousness centered on the inert kshetra. Different is the vijñanamaya purusha, the jiva, who is the knower of the kshetra: he is the secondary or subordinate kshetra jna. Also different is the isvara, the anandamaya purusha, paramesvara, who controls and witnesses everything. He is the original kshetra jna."

The first verses of the Vedanta sutras already clarify what the text studies: atha atah brahma jijñasa, "Therefore, this is the moment to make an effort to understand Brahman" (1.1.1), janmadi asya atah, tat brahma, "Brahman is what originated all this" (1.1.2), shastra yonitvat, "it is the origin of the scriptures" (1.1.3), tat tu samanyayat, "but through the agreement (of the statements of the scriptures)". The subsequent verses or aphorisms, from 5 to 11, confirm that according to the scriptures only Brahman, the intelligent and conscious principle, can be the cause of the manifestation of the universe.

महाभूतान्यहंकारो बुद्धिरव्यक्तमेव च ।

इन्द्रियाणि दशैकं च पञ्च चेन्द्रियगोचराः ॥ १३-६ ॥

mahābhūtānyahāṅkāro buddhiravyaktameva ca | indriyāṇi daśaikam ca pañca cendriyagocarāḥ || 13-6 ||

maha bhutani: the great elements; ahankarah: the sense of doership; buddhib: intelligence; avyaktam: the non-manifested; eva: also; ca: and; indriyani: the senses; dasa ekam: ten plus one; ca: and; panca: five; ca: and; indriya gocarah: the objects of the senses.

"The gross elements, ahankara, intelligence, the non-manifested, as well as the 11 senses, and the 5 objects of the senses,

In verses 6 and 7 (this one and the subsequent), Krishna describes the components of the universe, the kshetra that is manifested by the original prakriti. These elements are not very different from the 24 categories of Sankhya. We already know from verse 7.4 that the maha bhuta ("great beings") are the fundamental elements of matter - bhumi (earth), apah (water), anala (fire), vayuh (air) and kham (ether or space). Of course, when we speak of "earth" we include all solid matter, in "water" we include all liquids, and so on. Verse 7.4 also listed the 3 subtle elements, as ahankara (identification), manah (mind), buddhi (intelligence): together with the 5 gross elements, these constitute the eight-fold manifestation of elemental matter, or "separated prakriti".

This verse here (13.6) lists ahankara and buddhi, but the mind (manas) is included in the 11 senses, while the avyaktam ("non manifested") is the pradhana, the primordial aggregate of the prakriti before the manifestation of the material variety. More specifically, the 11 senses (indriyani dasa ekam) are the 5 senses of action (hands, feet, faculty of speech, anus and genitals), the 5 senses of perception (eyes, ears, mouth/ tongue, nose, skin), and the mind. To these, we need to add the 5 sense objects (indriya gocarab), also called tan matra (internal sense objects) or visaya (external sense objects) such as form, sound, taste, smell and touch.

Everything we see in this world is produced by the transformations of these basic elements, in contact with the kshetra jna, "the knower of the field", that is the consciousness or purusha. However, all activities are always played within the kshetra itself, as the purusha actually only experiences the feelings produced by the activities of the qualities and elements of nature. Such is the conclusion of chapter 13: prakrityaiva ca karmani kriyamanani sarvasah, yah pasyati tathamanam akartaram sa pasyati, "One who sees that all the activities are performed by nature and the self does nothing, is truly seeing" (13.30). This point had already been expressed previously: na kartritvam na karmani lokasya srijati prabhuh, na karma-phala-samyogam svabhavas tu pravartate, "The master (of the city of the nine gates, i.e. the body) is not the cause of the actions performed by others, therefore s/he is not engaged by the results of activities. It is only his/ her nature that acts" (5.14). In this regard, we need to remember here that the kshetra jna is always of neutral gender, both male and female, even when we use the term purusha.

Another important verse stating this concept is: prakriteb kriyamanani gunaih karmani sarvasah, ahankara vimudbatma kartabam iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'." (3.27)

Even earlier, Krishna had presented the same concept at the beginning of his instructions (2.19): ya enam veti hantaram yas cainam manyate batam, ubbau tau na vijanito nayam banti na hanyate, "One who knows this (atman/ brahman) does not consider himself to be killing or being killed: in both (positions) he knows that one does neither truly kill nor is truly killed."

इच्छा द्वेषः सुखं दुःखं संघातश्चेतना धृतिः ।

एतत्क्षेत्रं समासेन सविकारमुदाहृतम् ॥ १३-७ ॥

icchā dveṣaḥ sukhaṁ duḥkhaṁ saṅghātaścetanā dhṛtiḥ | etatḥkṣetram samāseṇa savikāramudāhṛtam || 13-7 ||

iccha: desire; dvesab: repulsion; sukham: happiness; duḥkham: distress; saṅghatab: the aggregate; cetana: the awareness; dhritih: determination; etat: (all) this; kṣetram: the śhetra; samasena: in brief; sa vikaram: together with their products/ interactions; udāhṛtam: as examples.

desire, repulsion, happiness, distress, the aggregate of the symptoms of life, as well as determination: all these illustrate the concept of field and its interactions.

Besides the 24 elements analyzed by sankhya and mentioned in the previous verse, Krishna continues here to list the components of the world, created by the interactions and transformations of the gunas - the three modes of material nature. The word iccha means "desire", as in "attraction", while dvesa means "hatred" as in "repulsion". We will see in later chapters that these two fundamental polarities equally apply to sattva, rajas and tamas, and have the power to bind the consciousness of the jivatman to the delusion of maya. To break this bondage, we need to become detached from both.

The same applies to sukham ("happiness", "joy", "pleasure", "comfort") and duḥkham ("distress", "suffering", "pain", "discomfort"). This sukham type of happiness is different from ananda, the original genuine transcendental nature of the soul, that is not subject to polarity or duality. There is no contrary or opposite to ananda, because ananda is an absolute concept; on the other hand, sukham finds its opposite in duḥkham, and both are applied to the transformations of the three gunas - sattva, rajas and tamas. A jivatman who has taken shelter in sattva will feel pleasure in sattva and discomfort in rajas or tamas, while a jivatman who has taken shelter in tamas will feel pleasure in tamas but discomfort in sattva or rajas, and so on. Pleasure and pain, just like attraction and repulsion, are relative feelings that each particular individual experiences in different circumstances according to the particular mode of objects and activities that s/he wants to experience. A pig will be enthusiastic about eating excrements and remain uninterested in good sattvic food that is suitable for evolved humans. So according to the type or mode of nature we cultivate, we will develop attraction and consequently we will take birth in a suitable body whose senses will better appreciate that mode.

The saṅghatab, "the aggregate", refers to the bodies that are composed of all such elements - gross and subtle - and that are a direct result of iccha, dvesa, sukha and duḥkha. This means that once we become detached from these elements, and we turn our consciousness from cetana to cit, we will not need to take a material body any more, and we will be liberated.

The word cetana is a special technical term derived from the root cit, usually translated as "knowledge", as in the intrinsic and transcendental quality of awareness that composes Brahman, together with sat ("existence" or "eternity") and ananda (absolute "happiness"). Cetana indicates the perception of material existence - the śhetra (field) and its vikaras (transformations). It can be translated as "awareness" and also as "symptoms of life", but on the level of duality and transformation, therefore it is also subject to the coloration of the gunas - sattva, rajas, tamas.

The last factor mentioned in the verse is dhritih, "determination" or "patience", that as we will see in later chapters can also be applied to any of the material gunas - sattva, rajas, tamas - thus producing a number of interactions and reactions. When directed to the ultimate transcendental purpose of life, patience can support and lead us to liberation. Similarly, iccha and dvesa can be applied to aspiring to serve the Supreme and to avoiding everything that is unfavorable to the service of the Supreme. Again, joys and sorrows and the other modes of consciousness or awareness, as well as the gross and subtle material elements, can be suitably engaged in the service of the Supreme, and therefore they will become instruments for our liberation. Therefore we should understand that all these factors can be manipulated and utilized by the jiva atman to experience the śhetra and its varieties, either towards further bondage or towards liberation. When we try to lord it over material nature (apara prakṛiti), they will lead us to bondage, while when we engage them in the service of the Supreme under the tutelage of spiritual nature (para prakṛiti), they will lead us to liberation and to pure bhakti.

The word vikara, "transformation" or "change", is also used to indicate the six stages (śad guṇa) of every manifestation in this world: birth, growth, staying, generation of byproducts, decay, and death.

अमानित्वमदम्भित्वमहिंसा क्षान्तिराजवम् ।

आचार्योपासनं शौचं स्थैर्यमात्मविनिग्रहः ॥ १३-८ ॥

amānitvam adambhitvam ahimsā kṣāntirājavam | ācāryopāśanam śaucaṁ sthairyam ātmavinigrahaḥ || 13-8 ||

amanitvam: not boasting; adambhitvam: lack of arrogance; ahimsa: freedom from hatred; kṣāntih: tolerance; arjavam: straightforwardness; ācārya upasanam: approaching the ācārya; śaucam: cleanliness; sthairyam: steadfastness; ātma vinigrahaḥ: self control.

"Freedom from the desire for honors, lack of arrogance, freedom from hatred, as well as tolerance, simplicity, the act of approaching the ācārya, cleanliness, determination, self control,

The points mentioned by Krishna in these verses are also confirmed in several other passages of the śāstra, for example in Bhagavata Purana (11.10.6), in Krishna's instructions to Uddhava: amany amatsaro daksō, nirmamo drdha saubrdab, asatvaro 'rtha jijnasur, anasyur amogha vak. A good student is not interested in "making a career", but simply in the genuine cultivation and realization of knowledge. This means he does not want to receive special honors or positions, therefore he is not envious of the honors and the positions of others; most notably he is not envious of the position of the guru, and he is not happily anticipating the idea of taking his place. Unfortunately in the course of Kali yuga, almost all major discipic successions have grown into powerful institutions, where materialistic interests find scope in the pursuit of control over funds, properties, and followers. This creates opportunities for attractive careers for impostors and exploiters, especially for those who are clever or mentally imbalanced enough to prefer power games over the healthy ordinary and harmless forms of basic sense gratification that are not contrary to the principles of dharma, starting from truthfulness. In turn, this explains why so many great acharyas who established successful lineages live short lives, sometimes poisoned by their own foremost associates and followers. Of course this scenario can be avoided if the students are properly qualified in ahimsa, or absence of hatred and violence: only a non-violent person can truly acquire knowledge, so we should always be very wary when we encounter "religious" people who are overtly or covertly violent towards innocent creatures.

In his instructions to Uddhava, the words amani and amatsara are very closely connected (and again recalled by the word anashnyuh, "free from envy") establishing the primary qualification of a true and dharmic seeker of knowledge. The word daksha ("skillful", "expert") summarizes in Bhagavata Purana a number of other qualities detailed in these 4 verses of Bhagavad gita, namely simplicity, self control, proper choice of residence and so on - as these are all intelligent decisions whose value was learned from experience.

The word adambhitvam, translated as "freedom from arrogance", is strictly connected to amanitvam or "freedom from the desire for honors". Very often, people are suffering from lack of self esteem and self confidence because they confuse humility with humiliation; we must therefore clarify this misconception.

The word nirmama, "free from sense of possession", equates with Gita's instructions in these verses on vairagya, asakti, anabhisvanga, sama cittatva and nirahankara. By and large, the brahmana (anyone who sincerely pursues knowledge) should remain detached from the ordinary traps of family and society. In the brahmacharya stage, from age 5 to 15 or 17, the student is physically too young to get entangled in social responsibilities and he remains as a son in the house of the guru. After graduation, at the age of 17, the student usually chooses a suitable wife and as a norm generates or adopts at least one son to repay his debt to his own ancestors. However, he does not take pride in producing many children, or flaunting his beautiful and lavishly decorated wife in social gatherings, or in accumulating unnecessary properties or wealth. He does not even like to be an honored guest at public scholarly opportunities, to show off his learning and exalted position: all these are merely distractions, a waste of time and energy. The relationship between the disciple and the guru or acharya should always remain a personal matter, focused on the genuine transmission of knowledge, and free from any materialistic consideration. This is possible only when the disciple is truly detached from attraction to self-aggrandizement and hunger for power.

These five verses of chapter 13 (8 to 12) that describe knowledge (jnana) are very important to study, and we strongly recommend our readers to memorize and quote them as much as possible. Unfortunately, the current general opinion of people about knowledge is quite different, and involves arrogance, conceit, and a strong material identification and attachment for social position. A "learned scholar" especially wants to make a career in academia and society, and obtain titles and recognition, because according to the degraded present academic system, without such official institutional endorsement, one does not have fair chances to engage in his/ her proper occupation. The hypertrophy of government control and financial lobbies has created a sort of mafia that obstructs and prevents independent and unbiased thinking and learning (and teaching). Standardized school education is strictly enforced under the pretext of promoting culture and literacy, but it is actually used to restrict the field of knowledge within politically accepted limits, to better control and exploit the population. This applies to all levels of schools, from primary to the highest levels of university, as well as to the field of publications, because publishing houses are also controlled and used by the System. However, there is a way out - the growing sense of independence and the grass-root spreading of internet communication and social media, that facilitates home schooling, self-employment, self-publishing, alternative education, and free exchange of ideas, including debates.

Traditional academic institutions and commercial publishing houses are losing their power and control, and this means that individuals have now the opportunity to teach/ learn privately in courses and seminars independently from the academic system, and to publish their books privately and make them available to their contacts and to the public, without being limited by the decisions of the political and financial lobbies.

The next step towards freedom in this extraordinary social evolution of our times is self sufficiency for basic requirements such as food and energy, because most genuine intellectuals today are severely limited by their ordinary financial needs, that force them to take up "day jobs" that consume all their time and energies without affording them any opportunity to actually engage in the work that would be their greatest contribution to humanity. This also applies to the ordinary teaching and research jobs - dependent or employed - within the mainstream academic system, that severely restrict the scope of studies and transmission of knowledge by setting commercially oriented and politically acceptable limits. Such jobs only appear to be a proper engagement for intellectuals, but in reality they are not different from all the other servile occupations. In the Vedic system, intellectuals - brahmanas - never depend on anyone else, especially not on an adharmic or asuric government, because the exploration, pursuance, preservation and transmission of knowledge must not be subjected to political control, guidelines or influence. How to re-establish the original Vedic system? We can start by reviewing our life priorities, including the desire for honors and career that push intellectuals into the trap of political subservience. We can give greater importance to simplicity, self control and frugality of life, applying also the other principles of knowledge mentioned in these verses - such as renouncing attachment and gratification (the possession and control of the sense objects), giving less importance to family life and social interaction, and more importance to solitary and peaceful life, where one can totally become dedicated to knowledge.

There is a growing body of resources, know-how and support structure opportunities, to facilitate the self-sufficiency of individuals or very small communities, through permaculture and even urban gardening, home-level renewable energy production (solar, wind, biogas), re-purposing and re-cycling materials and objects, DIY (do-it-yourself) techniques and basic requirements for daily necessities such as bread, jams, preserves, snacks, drinks, cleaning products, cosmetics, clothing and ornaments, toys, etc. It is now possible for most people to start living off-grid and without the need of a regular salary, which means that we are not bound to a regular job and all that is involved in it (social obligations etc), and we can really engage in the true purpose of human life.

इन्द्रियार्थेषु वैराग्यमनहंकार एव च । जन्ममृत्युजराव्याधिदुःखदोषानुदर्शनम् ॥ १३-९ ॥

indriyārtheṣu vairāgyamanahāṅkāra eva ca । janmamṛtyujarāvyaādhiduhkhadoṣānudaśanam ॥ 13-9 ॥

indriya arthesu: in the objects of the senses; vairāgyam: renunciation; anahankarab: freedom from the sense of doership; eva: certainly; ca: and; janma: birth; mṛtyu: death; jara: old age; vyadhi: disease; duhkha: suffering; dosa: the defect; anudarsanam: seeing clearly.

renunciation towards the objects of the senses, freedom from the sense of doership, as well as the clear perception of the inherent sufferings and problems of birth, death, old age and disease,

The importance of detachment from material identifications, possession and gratification continues to be stated in these crucial verses. Any intelligent and sincere person will understand that such material identifications and attachments are the direct cause of further entanglement in the cycle of births and deaths, the root ignorance that causes all sufferings.

Deluded people, who are strongly identified with their material body, fall so deeply into ignorance that they even mistake dharmā for adharma, and adharma for dharmā (18.31-32). According to the delusional and dangerous casteist mentality, birth prejudice is the essence of all dharmā and religious knowledge, and attachment to materialistic society and family life is considered the perfection of religious life for "high caste" Hindus. The concepts of scholarly erudition, seminal or ideological descent ("spiritual lineage"), high birth and parentage, social prestige, position of honor in gatherings and functions, are all manifestations of ahankara ("I am the doer") and as such, they are clear evidence of serious ignorance and confusion.

Ordinary materialistic people celebrate the birth of their children as a happy event, because they consider this physical body as the all in all, that enables one to enjoy sense gratification and all its attending circumstances. In Vedic society there are no unwanted children and there is usually no abortion, because all sexual relationships are automatically treated as marriage and everyone has access to safe herbal preventive contraception. However, even in the most favorable circumstances, birth involves a great amount of suffering for the mother and especially for the child, as described in various texts, for example in Bhagavata Purana (3.31.1-32). The purpose of human life is therefore liberation from the material conditionings that cause reincarnation, and this is done through the genuine realization of transcendental knowledge, as per the instructions of Krishna.

Family life is generally not favorable to spiritual progress because it reinforces bodily identification, as most of its exchanges and interactions are based on physical contact and roles. But all children are born out of sexual intercourse, and sensual gratification is considered totally legitimate and even sacred when pursued in a dharmic way. Also, a genuine devotee of Krishna will remain protected from attachments because s/he sees his/ her family members as servants of Krishna, and her/ his house as Krishna's house; s/he will consume good food and other pleasurable things as prasadam after offering them to Krishna, and worship the Deity of Krishna regularly as the owner and head of the household.

However, it takes a very strong spiritual consciousness to remain detached from bodily identification when our senses are fully engaged in experiencing the greatest pleasures of material life. The danger is very real, and clearly described in many scriptures, especially in the Bhagavata Purana, where we find warnings about material attachments and identifications for example in Kapila's teachings (3.31.29-35, 3.31.39-46) and Pahlada's teachings (7.5.5, 7.6.1-18).

Complete renunciation is not the answer, especially in Kali yuga, when taking sannyasa is a very risky choice, often causing degradation more than purification. Indeed, the artificial and superficial acceptance of the order of sannyasa can truly be the last snare of illusion, therefore it is not recommended at all: asvamedham gavalambham sannyasam pala paitrkam, devarena sutotpattim kalau panca vivarjayet. Brahma vaivarta Purana quoted by Chaitanya as in Chaitanya charitamrita (Adi lila, 17.164) states, "In this age of Kali, five acts are forbidden: the asvamedha yajna, the gomedha yajna, the acceptance of the order of sannyasa, the offering of oblations of flesh to the forefathers, and a man's begetting children in his brother's wife."

In order to actually understand the teachings of Vedic tradition on this and other important issues, we need to remember that the Vedas do not absolutely prescribe or forbid any specific action, because what is medicine for one can be poison for another, and vice versa. There are no "commandments" or blind allegiance in the Vedic system, not even to a guru or spiritual lineage (as in a church, for example), because dharmā and knowledge must be based on personal self realization, and they are dynamic and not static. In abrahamic ideologies, dogma and fatwas are handed down from the politically established "religious authorities" and the general people are obliged to accept and obey them without questioning, because they have nothing to do with intelligence or wisdom, or even with common sense, decency, conscience and fundamental ethical principles. In fact, the litmus test of one's belonging to an abrahamic faith is the willingness to go against intelligence, wisdom, common sense, conscience and ethics, in order to execute the order of the "established religious authorities". The Vedic system, summarized in the teachings of Bhagavad gita, is diametrically opposite. Krishna explains to Arjuna that he should not hesitate to kill his elders and teachers because they are aggressors, having come to the battlefield to wage an unjust aggressive war against him and his brothers. Such misled elders have chosen an adharmic behavior and they cannot be allowed to damage the prajas and the kingdom any further. Arjuna must be ready to overcome his attachments and identification and kill his own family members, but not because the priests are telling him to do so, on the basis of some pseudo moralistic fatwa. He is certainly not going to kill harmless animals, women and children or other innocent civilians, or cartoonists, intellectual dissidents, secular activists, libertarians, non-believers of any persuasion, or anyone who refuses to submit to the priests' unreasonable and adharmic demands. He is also not going to kill or harm anyone on the basis of race, ethnic group, nationality, or any other birth/ bodily consideration. It is very important that we understand that the concept of dharmayuddha has nothing in common with the so called "holy war" or "religious justice" or "moral police" of abrahamics. In the Vedic system, one can only use force against an aggressor - a person who has already started to attack us with dangerous weapons or clearly manifesting the intention to cause harm to us, to our dependents or to good innocent people.

As a general rule, one should also avoid all kinds of foul play even against aggressors. Krishna never told Arjuna to assassinate Duryodhana in secret, even after Duryodhana had repeatedly attempted to kill the Pandavas and their mother by stealth - by poisoning their food, by torching the house where they were sleeping, and so on. In extreme circumstances, when an adharmic aggressor is too powerful, too well protected, or too sneaky to be fought in the normal manner, a dharmic warrior can resort to stealth and extreme strategies. But these must be carefully chosen from time to time, with the utmost attention to preserving the spirit of dharmic action.

असक्तिरनभिष्वङ्गः पुत्रदारगृहादिषु । नित्यं च समचित्तत्वमिष्टानिष्टोपपत्तिषु ॥ १३-१० ॥

asaktiranabhiṣvaṅgaḥ putradāragṛhādiṣu | nityam ca samacittatvam iṣṭāniṣṭopapattiṣu || 13-10 ||

asaktiḥ: freedom from attachment; anabhiṣvaṅgaḥ: without identifying with emotions and situations; putra dara griha adisu: regarding the sons, the wife, the house etc; nityam: always; ca: and; sama cittatvam: equal attitude; iṣṭa: desired; aniṣṭa: unwanted; upapattiṣu: on receiving.

freedom from attachment, detachment from all association, including the sense of belonging towards children, wife, home etc, as well as equal attitude when receiving the pleasant and the unpleasant,

The qualities of knowledge mentioned in this verse confirm the points of the previous verse and the considerations about choosing dharmā above the sense of belonging, possession and identification that are characteristic of bodily relationships with family and society. Krishna insists so much on detachment because bodily or otherwise material identification is the root of all ignorance, and creates the divisive mentality that is characteristic of the asuras. The asuras are those who attack others to impose their own domination and to exploit people and resources; we could also call them "imperialists". When we understand that dharmā consists of the eternal and universal principles of natural ethics (compassion, truthfulness, cleanliness, self-control, etc) and is supported by intelligence (buddhi), we become able to choose dharmā over bodily identifications and attachments, sense gratification, and political loyalties. As we have already mentioned at the close of the previous chapter, transcendental knowledge and bhakti are non-different from sanatana dharmā (dharmā amṛitam idam). So whatever we have discussed in these verses about choosing dharmā over bodily identifications and attachments directly applies to choosing transcendental knowledge and bhakti over bodily identifications and attachments. Transcendental knowledge, or atma vidyā, is non-different from bhakti, because as soon as we realize our true spiritual nature and identity (prakṛiti and puruṣa), we immediately connect to the supreme Consciousness in an attitude of service and belonging, that we can define as love.

To rise to a higher level in the interpretation of these verses according to the bhakti consciousness, we can turn to one of the most famous bhakti literature traditions. In Chaitanya charitamṛta (Madhya, 22.78-80), Chaitanya is quoted to present 26 prominent qualities of a genuine devotee as follows: 1. kṛipalu (kind and accessible to everyone), 2. akṛita droha (not hostile to anyone), 3. satya sara (always dedicated to truthfulness and to the essence of things), 3. sama (equally disposed towards everyone), 4. nidosa (free from bad behavior and bad qualities), 5. radanya (generous, magnanimous), 6. mṛidu (with a sweet disposition), 7. śuci (clean and pure), 8. akinchana (detached from all material identifications and possessions or affiliations), 9. sarva upakāraka (working for the benefit of all creatures), 10. santa (serene and peaceful), 11. kṛishṇaika saraṇa (depending on God only), 12. akama (free from material desires), 13. aniba (selfless), 14. sthira (determined, stable), 15. viṣṭa sad guṇa (having vanquished the six negative tendencies and material demands of the body and mind), 16. mīṭa bhuk (eating frugally), 17. apramatta (free from illusion and delusion), 18. manada (respecting others), 19. amāni (not demanding respect for oneself), 20. gambhīra (deep and thoughtful), 21. karuṇa (compassionate and sympathetic towards the sufferings of others), 22. maitra (friendly), 23. kavi (poetic), 24. dakṣha (skillful or expert), 25. mauni (grave and silent when required).

In this light we can better understand the statement of the Bhagavata Purāṇa (5.18.12): yasyasti bhaktir bhagavaty akīncana, sarvair guṇais tatra samasate suraḥ, harav abhaktasya kuto mahaḥ guṇa, manorathenasati dhavato bahiḥ, "Wherever there is pure devotion to Bhagavan, also all the good qualities of the Devas are found, while a person who has no devotion towards Hari, and runs around pursuing external things under the dictation of the mind, can never have such great qualities". This means that a true devotee is recognized by his/ her qualities as mentioned by the scriptures, and by the lack of interest towards external things such as material identifications, bodily concerns, mundane attachments and so on. On the other hand, a materialistic person may gain so many external possessions and positions, but because s/he is always ready to drop everything to run after the next illusion, all the good qualities and achievements s/he may have obtained become immediately lost and are therefore useless.

मयि चानन्ययोगेन भक्तिरव्यभिचारिणी । विविक्तदेशसेवित्वमारतिर्जनसंसदि ॥ १३-११ ॥

mayi cānanyayogena bhaktiravyabhicārīṇī | viviktadeśasevitvamaratirjanasamsadi || 13-11 ||

mayi: to me; ca: and; ananya: totally focused; yogena: by the connection/ union; bhakti: of devotion; avyabhicārīṇī: uninterrupted; vivikta desa sevītvam: performing service in a solitary place; aratī: without attachment; jana samsadi: to meeting people/ the company of others.

totally and constantly focusing on me through bhakti yoga, performing service in a solitary place, without attachment for meeting others,

Krishna's teachings never lose sight of the crucial requirement of bhakti, the loving connection between the individual consciousness and the supreme Consciousness. We have already seen that the individual jīvatman is unable to control the prakṛiti, but is forced to submit to her, engaging in activities all the time although the puruṣa is not the karta, the "doer" of the action. Verse 3.5 stated: na hi kascit kṣhanam api jatu tiṣṭhaty akarma-kṛit, karyate hy avasah karma sarvaḥ prakṛiti-jair guṇaiḥ, "Never, at any time, can a person remain without acting even for one moment, because he is forced to into action by all the guṇas born from prakṛiti." Again verse 18.40 will conclude: na tad asti prithivyaṃ va divi deveshu va punaḥ, sattvaṃ prakṛiti-jair muktam yad ebhīḥ syat tribhir guṇaiḥ, "There is not even one single person, either in this world or in the world of the Devas, who is free from the influence of the three guṇas created by the prakṛiti". The difference between the deluded souls and the wise souls is the conscious choice to serve the divine Consciousness: mahatmanas tu māṃ partha daivīm prakṛitīm asṛitāḥ, bhajanty ananya-manaso jñātvā bhubudādīm avyayam, "However, o son of Pritha (Arjuna), the great souls take shelter in the divine nature and serve me with undivided attention, knowing that I am the inexhaustible origin of all beings" (9.13).

By directly connecting to the supreme Consciousness in a spirit of service, we will happily be engaged on the transcendental level, because the supreme Consciousness is directing the divine Prakṛiti (4.6, 8.4, 9.8, 9.10). To be able to remain on that level of consciousness without interruption (avyabhicārīṇī), we need to carefully manage our life habits and choices and avoid disruptions caused by others. Living in a solitary place is therefore one of the most important requirements, because everyone needs silence and peace in order to train and engage the mind in the proper way. In this verse this concept is explained with the words vivikta desa sevītvam, that had already been mentioned in verse 6.10. This expression refers to a quiet place, free from disturbances and distractions, pure and clean, and comfortable enough so that our meditation is not interrupted by distress signals from the body and the senses. Also, verse 13.11 specifies that one should not only live in a secluded and peaceful place, but that one should also live alone (ekakī) in order to avoid the disturbances created by people who are not interested in the cultivation of yoga and spiritual life. This will certainly help us to remain amogha vak, free from unnecessary talking or prajalpa.

Again, the expression arati jana samsadi indicates that one should be free from the need or desire to be in the company of others. The attraction or attachment for social life is caused by a fundamental sense of insecurity and fear, by a constant unpleasant chattering and nagging of the mind, that is temporarily covered by louder noise and stronger sensory stimulation. In this way the anxious and confused person seeks the moving crowds, songs, dance, entertainment, fun, and all the various types of sense gratification that distract the mind, as well as the hypnotic effects of intoxication, foolish television shows, and so on.

There is nothing wrong with a little fun or entertainment, that can help us relax the mind and give new strength to the senses, but we should not be attached to it or allow it to control our mind. It should rather be the other way around: we should control our mind, and control the type of entertainment we allow it - sattvic or preferably pure sattvic. As we have already mentioned regarding regulated sense gratification (2.64, 2.65, 2.68, 3.6, 3.7, 3.41, 4.22, 4.26, 5.8-11, 6.16-17, 6.24, 7.11, 9.27), the secret to remaining free from material entanglement is to accept whatever sattvic pleasures we obtain naturally and to offer them to the supreme Consciousness in a spirit of service. The practice of bhakti yoga is also subject to the principles of yama and niyama, the regulated prescriptions and abstentions that protect us from adharmic, rajasic and tamasic contaminations. Such rules are favorable to bhakti, and they are meant to support us in our development and service.

अध्यात्मज्ञाननित्यत्वं तत्त्वज्ञानार्थदर्शनम् । एतज्ज्ञानमिति प्रोक्तमज्ञानं यदतोऽन्यथा ॥ १३-१२ ॥

adhyātmajñānanityatvaṃ tattvajñānārthadarsanam | etajjñānamiti proktamajñānaṃ yadato'nyathā || 13-12 ||

adhyātma: the original soul; jñāna: knowledge; nityatvaṃ: the eternity/ constant existence; tattva: reality; jñāna artha darsanam: the realization of the value of knowledge; etat: (all) this; jñanam: jñāna; iti: like this; proktam: called; ajñanam: ajñāna; yat: that; ataḥ: than this; anyatha: any other.

the constant awareness of the original soul, the realization of the value of knowledge: all this is called jñāna, and anything else is ajñāna."

These two last items in the description of true knowledge summarize its meaning and scope, showing how in fact all the other items in the list are simply expansions of the consciousness of the Supreme Self, characterized by the stability of spiritual awareness. They would be meaningless without the proper consciousness of the transcendental spiritual nature of the Supreme Self or adhyātma.

One who is truly situated in the supreme consciousness is free from abhankara and māmatva, and therefore is never arrogant or hateful, because he knows that all jīvatmans are parts of the paramatman. The awakening of Self realization also produces a strong desire to harmonize with the Supreme in loving service, therefore one spontaneously approaches the great souls to be inspired and instructed and engaged properly. A person established in Self realization remains balanced and conscious in all circumstances, perceiving things as they are in truth beyond the superficial appearances, and keeping proper consciousness and awareness as the first priorities in life. The word adhyatma ("the original soul") is particularly important here because it indicates a level of consciousness that is higher than the individual jivatman. We could call it krishna chaitanya or Krishna Consciousness, but we must be very careful not to misunderstand the definition as a superficial sectarian allegiance to some kind of organized religion. A proper realization of adhyatma is the key to actually understanding the original meaning of Krishna Consciousness - the acintya bheda abheda tattva that reconciles the apparently opposed perspectives of dvaita and advaita.

Adhyatma refers to the pure Consciousness, that is not bound by any material limitation, and that is the origin and the meaning of everything that exists. When the individual atman becomes truly conscious of the adhyatma, individuality shifts from the separatist mentality from the harmonization with the Supreme, and all activities - thinking, feeling, willing, acting - are lovingly focused in the Supreme only. The individual realizes he is simply a shakti of the Supreme, a limb (amsa) of his unlimited transcendental body, and everything else becomes irrelevant. There is no "personalism versus impersonalism" for a truly realized soul: all contradictory dualities become reconciled, because the Supreme includes all realities and all perspectives.

A pure devotee forgets himself or herself in his/ her meditation and service, immersing completely into the consciousness of the Supreme, so in a sense we can say that his/ her individuality becomes lost on the level of consciousness. Simultaneously, individuality continues to exist eternally in the loving exchanges between the bhakta (the devotee) and the bhokta (the object of devotion). There is no point in trying to intellectually understand this simultaneous truth of two apparently opposite concepts, because it is explicitly declared as inconceivable (acintya). People should stop wasting time and energy into childish squabbles over "who is right and who is wrong" on the subject of personal and impersonal perspectives of God.

All differences are automatically solved when one becomes able to directly see (darshana) truth in its greater picture, in a vision that reconciles all apparent opposites; at that point, there is nothing else except engaging in the picture itself, because we realize we are also part of the picture and we have a duty or function to perform there. This is the tattva jnana artha darshana described as the sum and substance at the conclusion of these verses.

Active union with the Great Picture of Reality (yoga) becomes the complete, constant and permanent (ananya) focus of consciousness, precisely because we are already connected with Everything. What else could we desire or need to search? True jnana dissipates or destroys the apparent changes of the kshetra, and our consciousness remains fully absorbed in eternity (sat), cognizance (cit) and bliss (ananda).

jñeyam yattatpravakṣyāmi yajjñātvāmṛtamaśnute | anādi matparam brahma na sattannāsaducyate || 13-13 |

jneyam: what is to be known; yat: which; tat: that; pravakṣyāmi: I will tell; yat: which; jñatva: by knowing; amṛitam: nectar/ immortality; asnute: one tastes; anadi: without beginning; mat: me; param: supreme; brahma: Brahman; na: not; sat: sat; tat: that; na: not; asat: asat; ucyate: is called.

"I will tell you what is to be known, whose knowledge enables one to taste immortality. My supreme Brahman is the beginningless reality, and it is said that it is neither sat nor asat."

The first word of this verse, jneyam, is directly linked with Arjuna's question in the first verse of the chapter (jnanam jneyam ca) and with the very identity of Vishnu, God, as we will see in verses 17 and 18 (ca tad jneyam grāsisnu prabharisnu ca). As explained in verse 19 of this same chapter, a devotee can attain true bhava (devotional absorption, the nature of Brahman as consciousness) only in this realization (mad bhakta etad vijñāya mad bhava upapadyate). This is also reinforced by the word asnute ("s/he tastes") that immediately reminds us of the concept of rasa ("taste"), connected with the various feelings or sentiments within the consciousness, especially in relationships.

How to achieve this level? By listening or hearing the discourse (pravacan) of the great realized souls, the acharyas and the Personalities of God. It is true that normally this hearing process (śravaṇa) develops in the personal presence of the guru, but we need to understand that it is not merely a physical activity. Just like it is not sufficient to look at the pages of a book to actually understand the meaning of its content, it is not sufficient to sit in front of a guru or bhakta and let his/ her voice into our ears in order to actually absorb the teachings. If we do not pay sufficient attention and do not accept the teachings sincerely to apply them in practice, it will take a very long time for such discourses to even make a dent into our thick layers of ignorance, and chances are that the weeds of anarthas (pride, arrogance, power hunger, delusional identifications etc) will actually invade our hearts and prevent any real realization with a toxic overgrowth. On the other hand, a sincere student will be able to listen to the self realized souls and the Personalities of God even without their physical presence, by associating with them on the spiritual level (through a heart connection), on the subtle or astral level, or simply by reading their books. This is certainly more effective than absent-mindedly sitting in front of the physical body of the guru, without the sincere resolution to try to understand and actually practice the teachings. And what should such teachings be about? The most important teachings are those presented by Krishna in Bhagavad gita, the first among the prasthāna traya, the fundamental texts of Vedic knowledge.

The key words in this verse are anādi mat param brahma. They constitute the object of the knowledge announced by Krishna, and described by the two adjoining parts of the verse ("whose knowledge enables one to taste immortality" and "it is said to be neither sat nor asat"). As it often happens in Vedic scriptures, a sentence may contain a number of layers of meanings that can take us deeper and deeper into the realization of Reality. Literally, this sentence means: "me/ mine", "supreme", and "Brahman" (the universal Consciousness). The most popular translation of mat param brahma is "that Brahman of which I am supreme". In the next chapter (14.27) Krishna will state that he is the foundation and origin of the Brahman (brahmano hi pratistha aham), and already in 7.7 he had said, "nothing is superior to me, everything rests on me" (mattah parataram nanyat kecid asti... mayi sarvam idam protam). In this interpretation, the word mat indicates possession or relationship. As we have already seen, the definition Brahman applies both to the supreme purusha and to the supreme prakriti; when it is applied to prakriti it specifically indicates the mahat tattva ("great reality") that is the non-manifested entirety of the cosmic manifestation. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (1.5.20): idam hi visvam bhagavan ivetarah, "all this universe is simply a transformation of Bhagavan". The expression mat param was also found at the conclusion of chapter 11, in verse 55, where it was translated as "me as the Supreme". Here is the verse: mat karma krin mat paramo mad bhaktah sanga varjitah, nirvairah sarva -bhuteshu yah sa mam eti pandava, "My devotee is engaged in working for me, and sees me as the supreme (reality). S/he has abandoned all association/ affiliation/ identification, and has no enmity towards any being. (In this way, my devotee) comes to me, o son of Pandu."

Therefore the next possible translation of this verse would read, "me, as the Supreme Brahman". This interpretation, too, is confirmed by Arjuna (10.12), and indirectly by all the Rishis mentioned by Arjuna to substantiate his realization. It is also found in many verses of the Bhagavata Purana (1.2.11, 3.24.10, 3.29.36, 3.33.8, 4.24.60, 7.1.19, 8.24.38), as well as in other passages of Vedic scriptures (for example, vasudevat paro brahman). Both meaning are reinforced by the word anadi, "beginning-less", or "eternal". The concept of eternity or freedom from death is also contained in the word amrita, that we find in this verse.

We become able to understand this verse only through the deep meaning of the word param. On the materialistic level, param ("supreme") indicates the most powerful or highest among a number of individual persons or objects, presented in a comparative way. When we say that a person is the greatest, on the material level it means that his greatness (power, knowledge, ability etc) is compared to the greatness of others, and is found superior, while the others are inferior. However, on the spiritual/ transcendental level indicated by this Sanskrit word, the Supreme does not have terms of comparison, because all other existences are part of the existence of the Supreme. We can only understand this point when we give up the dualistic mentality, as confirmed very clearly by Krishna himself in Bhagavad gita (2.45, 4.22, 5.3, 5.25, 7.27, 7.28, 15.5) and in many other Vedic scriptures. Duality is the only source of fear (bhayam dvitiya, Bhagavata Purana, 11.2.37). Only by overcoming duality we become able to taste the nectar of that which is na sat tan na asat, "not sat and not asat" - where the word sat contains the multiple meanings of eternal, spiritual, good, positive, and so on, while the word asat is the exact opposite. A very similar concept was expressed in 9.19: tapamy abam abam varsham ngribnamy utsrijami ca, amritam caiva mrityus ca sad asac cabam arjuna, "I am the origin of the heat (of the sun), I pour down or withhold the rains. I am immortality and death as well. I am sat and asat, too, o Arjuna."

The Supreme Reality, Brahman, contains everything and is the origin and foundation of everything; the perception of this Supreme Reality is simply clouded by the illusory and temporary manifestation of abankara, or material identification, that is based on duality and separation. As stated in the first verse of the Maha Upanishad: eka hi vai narayana asi, "only Vishnu exists".

Another reading of the verse ties anadi and mat in one word only, anadimat, where mat becomes the suffix man, "that which is", in this case, "that which is eternal". In this way, the personal pronoun mam is omitted, although not excluded or denied. Even without repeating it in this verse, we already had sufficient evidence from Krishna himself to the effect of the identity of Krishna as the supreme Brahman.

Another interesting point in this verse is the application of the knowledge to the transcendental realization or attainment that brings immortality (amritam). Of course, immortality does not refer to the indefinite extension of material life in one's body, because that is a dangerous delusion: even the residents of the highest planetary systems will eventually have to leave their bodies at the time of death. True, there are bodies that can last much longer than a human body, but all material forms are inevitably going to dissolve. If we want to live longer, however, we need to take a different type of body, like those born on the higher planetary system, and develop the proper consciousness, mental powers and engagement, otherwise our extended years will just be a prolongation of suffering and disappointment.

सर्वतः पाणिपादं तत्सर्वतोऽक्षिशिरोमुखम् । सर्वतः श्रुतिमल्लोके सर्वमावृत्य तिष्ठति ॥ १३-१४ ॥

sarvataḥ pāṇipādāṁ tatsarvato'kṣiśiromukham | sarvataḥ śrutimalloke sarvamāvṛtya tiṣṭhati || 13-14 ||

sarvataḥ: everywhere; pani: hands; padam: feet; tat: that; sarvataḥ: everywhere; akṣi: eyes; śirah: heads; mukham: face; sarvataḥ: everywhere; śrutiman: possessing hearing/ who listens; loke: in the world/ in people; sarvam: everything; avṛtya: covering; tiṣṭhati: remains.

"That (Purusha) has hands and feet everywhere, eyes and heads and faces everywhere. He listens everywhere, and always resides everywhere, covering everything.

The supreme Brahman is also the Maha Purusha, the Virata rupa or universal form that has been described in so many verses in the previous chapters. By understanding this Purusha we become able to understand how Isvara, Shakti and all the jinas are inconceivably One and individually distinct. Then the illusion of material opposition dissipates, but the loving relationship and bhava of devotional service do not disappear - rather, they become stronger and stronger because intelligence and consciousness are better focused (aikantika bhakti) as Krishna has already mentioned in 2.41 (ryayasayatmika buddhib ekeha).

When the bhakta enters (visate, 8.11, 18.55, pravestum, 11.54) the inconceivable transcendental Body of Consciousness, s/he realizes his/ her nature as limb or body part (anga, amsa) of the Supreme and spontaneously functions as such, serving the Supreme Sum Total of Reality. This is not possible for those who have not attained the Brahman and Paramatma realizations and therefore continue to identify themselves and others on the basis of the material body and mind, and to think that they can obtain happiness by harming someone else. A solid and true Brahman realization will enable us to see Bhagavan as something more than a material projection, and to directly perceive and connect with the Soul of all souls everywhere.

This is why this verse explains that the realization of Bhagavan must include the presence of the Supreme everywhere (sarvatah, repeated several times), in each living being and even in every atom. At the level of Brahman, this presence consists of the eternal existence of consciousness (sat), at the level of Paramatma, this presence is knowledge and realization of the connection of all consciousness (cit), and at the level of Bhagavan, it is pure happiness and love. In Krishna's avatara lila, sat is represented by Balarama/ Shiva, cit is represented by Krishna/ Vishnu, and ananda is represented by the Mother Goddess. Without Radha there cannot be Krishna, without Yogamaya there cannot be Vishnu, and similarly Krishna appears after Baladeva, and the avatars of Vishnu appear (manifest) in this world from the root of Sadashiva, also called Sankarshana. Here the foolish materialists may fall in the trap of illusion and come to think that one of these three must be "more important" or "supreme" in regard to the other two, but that is a big mistake.

There cannot be any opposition or even division among these three; this is why Baladeva, Jagannatha and Subhadra sit on the same throne and are one and the same. Still, they manifest as three distinct Personalities of God to engage their devotees in blissful and loving exchanges (bhava). This will be mentioned in verse 19, where Krishna clearly states that a devotee can attain the perfection of devotional service only through this realization. No intelligent and honest person will say that such meaning supports an impersonalistic (mayavadi) conclusion. A jivatma does not have mouths and hands everywhere, neither individually not collectively; without the Supreme Consciousness that is Isvara, all jivatmas would be limbs in a body where the individual soul is not present. Jivatmas are like cells in a body: cells can have a face, eyes, hands etc only with the collective supreme consciousness within the body; similarly the jiva can have access to greater consciousness only as much as it enters the Krishna Consciousness. Without a clear realization of Brahman and Paramatma Consciousness, a jiva is jada ("inert") and covered by thick layers of dull ignorance in the form of the material mind and body identification (avrihya tisthati, "remains covered"); liberation from such ignorance is a gradual process of dissipation of material identification, and culminates with the total shedding of material body and mind, replaced by the full development of the spiritual body and mind, called siddha svarupa.

Saying that consciousness is only possible in connection with Consciousness sounds like stating the obvious, yet most people remain unable to understand it, because they have never paused to think about the nature of consciousness itself. They continue to identify themselves as bodies and minds, and they believe that consciousness is a mysterious "function" that appears at a certain stage of material evolution; the actual fact is just the opposite - it is the eternally existing consciousness that produces matter from time to time, not matter that produces consciousness at some point along a line of progress.

In such a dangerous delusion, these people keep searching for success or "realization" - happiness, knowledge and permanent existence - in material things, attachments and identifications, and thus they slide disastrously into lower levels of consciousness and even into the asuric state of being, as we will see later. Vedic knowledge offers us the correct perspective, supporting us with many easy and practical examples, and guiding us towards the direct personal experience of this perception of reality (prakasa). Consciousness manifests at a certain degree of complexity of matter only because such matter has become organized by intelligence and is therefore suitable to be used as a vehicle, and for the same reason, consciousness leaves a body when it is no more suitable for such use. If life in a material body was merely due to evolution of matter, bodies would never die but they would "evolve" continuously to become increasingly perfect and powerful, but this is not happening. All bodies - from the tiny unicellular organism to the immense whale - are vehicles for consciousness, and they only develop because of the presence of consciousness; when the consciousness overgrows that particular form, the form is simply discarded.

You can mix together all the chemicals that compose a blade of grass, but you will never be able to make it grow without the presence of consciousness. The only evolution is the evolution of intelligence that organizes matter in increasingly more complex ways and higher functions, and moves out of an old limited body to start building a new and more appropriate body through the process of reincarnation. This means that intelligence does not depend on a physical brain; a brain and a nervous system are merely the instruments used from time to time by the ever-existing intelligence, by which conscious life can express itself and perform actions.

God is described as omnipresent, but most people cannot really understand what this means. However, it is generally felt that if we pray to God, he will hear us, wherever we are. There is actually no real need to go to a temple, because we can talk to God and worship God at any time and in any place. The purpose of a holy place is to absorb the good and spiritual energy of all the spiritual people who assembled there; for this reason temples should be highly spiritual and sattvic places, where conscious recitation of the shastra and loving service to Bhagavan are continued constantly. Desecration of a temple or a Deity does not hurt God in any way, but it can demoralize people and break their strength, courage and dedication, while establishing a new temple constitutes a great encouragement and a fresh source of life and energy.

On another level of meaning in this verse, we see that the Transcendental Reality is described with the help of superimposition (visualization) and refutation (explanation) that spread a golden cover on the invisible (adrista) to make it visible to the material senses of the ordinary people (loke). The Isha Upanishad speaks about this merciful revealing cover, meant to facilitate our approach to the transcendental journey of Self realization. Verse 16 of this Upanishad prays Isvara to remove it and to appear in his sweetest and most intimate essence for his devotee, just like we see in verses 11.46 and 11.50-53 of Bhagavad gita - the very sweet and intimate form that is behind the mind-shattering effulgence contemplated by Arjuna in the vision of the Virat Purusha (8.9, 11.12, 11.17, 11.19, 11.24, 11.30, 13.18). All the forms manifested by the Lord are meant to interact with us, and are created by the Ananda or Hladini Shakti: he appears in a sweet and unassuming form to reciprocate with his intimate devotees, and he appears in majestic and blazing forms to impress those who need to feel such greatness.

It is precisely to interact with us, that the Supreme manifests innumerable approaches and perspectives (sirah, "heads"), visions and sounds (aksib mukham, "eyes and mouths") as well as unlimited forms of actions and service (pani padam, "hands and feet") called karma yoga or devotional service, to engage us in his worship. Yet, all such senses are not material, even if they appear to be so: this is confirmed in Svetasvatara Upanishad (3.19): apani pado javano grabhitam pasyati acbakshub sa srinoti akarnah, "He moves without legs, takes without hands, sees without eyes and hears without ears."

सर्वेन्द्रियगुणाभासं सर्वेन्द्रियविवर्जितम् । असक्तं सर्वभूचैव निर्गुणं गुणभोक्तृ च ॥ १३-१५ ॥

sarvendriyagunābhāsaṁ sarvendriyavivarjitam | asaktam sarvabhūcchiva nirguṇaṁ guṇabhoktr ca || 13-15 |

sarva indriya: all the senses; guna: of the qualities; abhasam: the original source; sarva indriya: all the senses; vivarjitam: devoid of; asaktam: detached; sarva bhūti: who maintains/ supports everything/ all; ca: and; eva: certainly; nir guṇam: without gunas; guṇa bhoktri: the master of the gunas; ca: and.

"(That Purusha) is the origin of all the senses and gunas, but is detached from all senses. He supports everything and everyone, and although he is detached from all gunas, he is the maintainer of the gunas.

The innumerable and omnipresent heads, eyes, mouths, hands and feet of the Lord are not material, or not visible to the ordinary eyes, unless they are covered by the veil of golden effulgence called maya, either Yogamaya or Mahamaya according to our level of consciousness.

As we have seen, the supreme Brahman, the ultimate Purusha/ Prakriti, is beyond sat and asat: he is simultaneously sat and asat, and neither the one or the other; he is the origin and foundation of both, yet he is not bound by them (4.14, 8.21, 9.9, 13.33, 13.33). This means that on the material level there are no words or concepts that can really define the transcendental form: all our dictionaries in all languages are based on the duality of synonyms and contraries, affirmative and negative, therefore they cannot express what is beyond duality. Words and concepts are simply used as a reflection or a covering veil to show a shape that we can understand. So although Brahman is the source of all senses and all qualities, he remains free from the material limitations of the senses and the opposition of the qualities. Specifically, the word vivarjitam indicates the action of "leaving behind", as in renunciation; in this particular case the meaning is that Brahman is completely beyond the realm of material senses and qualities.

The word abhasa is also very important. It includes the meanings of "manifestation, source, radiance, reflection, glimpse, indication, shining, illumination, shadow, projection", which are applied according to the context. Here the immediate sense is "source", as "origin", just like the sun is the source of its light, heat and radiance. The senses of material bodies are originated by the primary Consciousness or perception, and similarly the qualities of material nature are originated by the modes of perception of Consciousness. We will see more about the gunas later in the text.

Another meaning of abhasa is "projection", an interpretation that moves the comparison from the light to the shadow; just like the sun is the source of the sunlight, the sun is also the source of shadows and darkness, by virtue of duality - opposition or absence. The transcendental eternal and unchangeable Brahman creates the distinction between light and darkness, but it is not limited by this duality, because it includes both, supports both (sarva bhūti) and remains untouched or detached (asakta) from both.

The word maya, "illusion", should not be interpreted necessarily in a negative sense. By the action of Yogamaya, each devotee strongly believes that Krishna is their exclusive object of affection and service - lover, husband, friend, son, father, teacher or employer - and forgets everything else. The devotees really think that Krishna needs their service, help, protection, and they even suffer feelings of sadness or despair from a separation that can only be illusory, considering that God is omnipresent by definition. Chaitanya himself demonstrated the supreme power of bhakti by allowing himself to be covered by yogamaya - mistaking a sand dune on the beach in Puri for the Govardhana hill of Vrindavana, seeing an ordinary little boy as Krishna, mistaking the ocean for the river Yamuna, and completely losing all external consciousness during his trance periods. Should we then say that ignorance and materialistic delusion are symptoms of transcendental realization? Certainly not.

This grossly material dimension is just one among many: some dimensions are higher and purer, while some other dimensions are lower and more degraded, and tuning our consciousness into a particular dimension shapes our destiny. As the Vedas teach us, we should go from the bad to the good, from darkness to light, from death to immortality - asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrtyor ma amritam gamaya (Bṛhad aranyaka Upanishad, 1.3.28). It is only from the suddha sattva, or pure goodness, that we become able to really transcend duality.

Later on, chapter 15 will present us with the image of the Purushottama (the supreme Purusha) as the banyan tree of Reality, with branches growing downwards and roots growing upwards. This image illustrates the fact that material consciousness and spiritual consciousness appear as exact opposites, where material consciousness is the mirrored reflection of the true reality of spiritual consciousness. So what appears to be worse, or most degraded, on the material level, is so because the individual has fallen to a lower dimension and lost the consciousness of the higher purpose of life; thus s/he remains covered and absorbed in the slavery to his/ her own senses and mind, losing memory, intelligence and dignity. On the opposite end of reality, a pure devotee also leaves the ordinary material dimension and appears to have lost memory, intelligence and dignity, but it is because s/he has overcome the limitations of the material identifications.

It is said that happiness is only attained by those who are extremely stupid and those who are extremely intelligent, but not by those who are stationed in between. A very stupid person is unable to realize his real position, and his sufferings are dulled by ignorance and insensitivity, enjoying the gross pleasures of life that are available even in the lowest states of existence, while a very intelligent person has found true and permanent happiness beyond the limitations of material existence. The happiness of the fool is very temporary, and slides him down lower and lower into sleep and darkness, into the levels of animal and plant life, or even duller bodies, while the happiness of the liberated soul is transcendently permanent and enables him to engage in the direct association with the Personality of God.

The mind can be used for our best advantage or become our worst enemy (6.5) and similarly we can use the senses (indriya) to carry us to liberation or to slavery: it only depends on the direction we are choosing - dharmā or adharma, vidyā or avidyā, sura or asura.

bahih: outside; antah: inside; ca: and; bhutanam: of the beings; acaram: non moving; caram: moving; eva: certainly; ca: also; sukṣmatvat: the quality of subtleness; tad: that; avijñeyam: that cannot be known; dura stham: remaining distant; ca: and; antike: near; ca: and; tat: that.

"That (Purusha) is outside and inside all beings, moving and non-moving, and because he is extremely subtle, he cannot be known (through the gross material senses). He is very far and very near (at the same time).

The supreme Soul, the Soul of all souls, is called Param Atman. This Param Atman intrinsically exists everywhere, "inside" and "outside" (bahih antah), not only within the hearts of all living beings (from the Devas to the amoebas) and all atoms and subatomic particles (anu and paramanu), but even in the apparently empty spaces between atoms. He is existence itself - what Vedic knowledge expresses with the scientific term sat. Vedic science also tells us that existence itself (sat) is consciousness or intelligence. There is no need to search the planets and the space (or religious beliefs) for some Great Mind that organized the entire creation, because God is existence itself, and existence is intelligence and consciousness.

Foolish materialists become atheists or superstitious bigots because they expect to find some really old man with special powers who plays with human beings and other creatures like a child plays with clay dolls after making them, and therefore they become disappointed or delude themselves into believing that they must take up the jobs that God is unable to do himself - punishing non-believers, converting everyone to a particular type of worship and commands, taking over the domination and exploitation of the planet, and so on. Thus they fall easy prey to clever adharmic propagandists and turn into asuras, destroying and killing and causing immense sufferings to others and even to themselves, as explained in chapters 16 and 17.

This is simply due to their ignorance of the fact that God is existence, and therefore he exists everywhere, as Prahlada explained to his asuric father Hiranyakasipu. Devotional sentimentalists, in their immature understanding of Transcendence, picture God as an ordinary person - albeit bigger, stronger, and with some extraordinary powers - appearing magically to save Prahlada from the repeated assassination attempts committed by his father, and they need to actually see the terrifying form of Narasimha bursting out of the hall pillar to physically pick up the evil Hiranyakasipu and kill him with his own hands. They do not realize that Prahlada had not needed to see this form, because he already perceived the presence of the Lord everywhere, as explained in his exquisite prayers and in many other famous verses in regard to this wonderful episode.

Narasimha did not appear to save his devotee Prahlada, because Prahlada had already been saved from all aggressions, and he was not in immediate danger at that time. Hiranyakasipu had just asked Prahlada to demonstrate Vishnu's omnipresence, and it was the devotee's word at stake, not his life. When Hiranyakasipu hit the pillar with his weapon, he was trying to kill Vishnu, not Prahlada: as Hiranyakasipu, too, was a close companion of the Lord (as Vishnu's doormen Jaya and Vijaya had taken birth as Hiranyaksha and Hiranyakasipu), the Lord responded and appeared to engage him in a fighting match. It was out of love that Narasimha appeared, to show himself to Hiranyakasipu and to liberate him from the awkward position of his asuric life.

Vishnu appeared to protect all the good people of the universe by killing the evil doer, and to establish the truth about the principles of dharmā (4.8); Prahlada, too, appeared for this specific reason, to assist the Lord in his mission by providing the triggering event for the avatara, working as a catalyst in the manifestation of that particular form of Vishnu. Such catalyst is always love: Vishnu appears personally only to reciprocate the sentiments and service of his devotee, and to set him as an example for those who aspire to know God. But for the superficial and simple minded materialists, Vishnu's dramatic appearance is what matters most, and turns them towards the desire to know more about God.

Chaitanya loved to hear the story of Prahlada and often chanted this verse: namaste narasimbhaya, prahlada ahlada dayine, hiranyakasipu vaksah silatanka nakhalaye, itah nrisimbah paratah nrisimbah, yatah yatah yami tatah nrisimbah, bahih nrisimbah bridaye nrisimbah, nrisimham adim saranam prapadye, "I offer my worship to Narasimha, who gives joy to Prahlada, and who tore the body of Hiranyakasipu with his hands. There is no higher reality than Narasimha, and everywhere I go, Narasimha is there. Narasimha is outside as well as inside the heart, and I take shelter in this primordial Existence/ Being, Narasimha."

So why did Narasimha choose to burst out from the pillar, instead of annihilating Hiranyakasipu's body by some kind of subatomic reaction, such as self-combustion, or disintegration, or turning him into a stone, at the very moment the evil king had decided to cause some troubles? Because God wanted the story to be as thrilling and interesting as possible: this is the meaning of the word lila, and the reason for the appearance of the avatars in this world. Narasimha gives pleasure to the devotees like Prahlada, by dramatically and magnificently coming to the rescue, performing such amazing activities that people will continue to talk about the story for hundreds and thousands of years. Why do we watch adventure films? Why do we read entertaining books, like the adventures of Harry Potter or the Hobbit Frodo? Because they are full of dangers and difficulties and even serious sufferings, followed by astounding events that bring an unexpected and stunning solution, filling us with joy and satisfaction. This meditation gives us strength and patience to continue our evolutionary journey, face our tests, solve our problems, and strive for perfection.

Of course the value of the story is greater when it carries good teachings for the audience, whether they are expressed by discussion or by example, and the ability of the story teller is greater when the adventure is rich in subconscious or supraconscious symbolism that can penetrate deep into our hearts and touch us intimately. This is the sum and substance of the meaning of "religion". A true religion is simply the tradition (through books, recitation, ritual re-enactment etc) of divine stories (lila) based on activities performed by Personalities of God or Self realized souls, that contain symbols and paradigms we need to apply to our own lives in order to evolve our consciousness. Everything else is "support material" to help us understand physics and metaphysics, and apply the fundamental evolutionary teachings to our lives, or commentaries and suggested practices to keep us in that consciousness.

In the story of Narasimha, little Prahlada clearly states that God, that is Reality and the supreme Being/ Existence, is present everywhere, even if we are unable to see him, and can perform any action, even if he does not have a conventional material body. His body is too subtle to be perceived by our gross material senses or their mechanical instruments (sukshma avijneya) and he does not need to move around because he is already everywhere (acaram caram). Subtler states of being cannot be perceived by gross instruments. For example, you cannot see a microbe with your naked eye, and similarly you cannot see the air or wind unless you observe its effects on visible objects such as colored dust, a cloth or flag on a pole, and so on. Similarly, you cannot see the mind with a microscope, although you can measure the effects of the mind on its physical vehicle, the brain and nervous system. You cannot see thoughts unless they are expressed in the form of sounds or writing, and you cannot see life unless it moves bodies through breathing, blood circulation, electrical or magnetic radiation etc. Still, what we see is just the effect and not the cause.

The supreme Being is the Cause of all causes, the Existence of existence itself, and as such it cannot be perceived by material senses. This is confirmed by the Upanishads:

tad ejati tan najjati, tad dure tad v antike, tad antar asya sarvasya tad u sarvasyasya bahyatah, "He (Tat) does not walk and yet at the same time he walks, he is very far and very near, as he is within everything and also outside everything", (Isa Upanishad 5), asino duram vrajati sayano yati sarvatah, "he is everything and everywhere, but he remains very far from ignorant people", (Katha Upanishad 1.2.21), durat sudure tad ibantike ca pasyatv ibaivam nibitam gubayam, "he is more distant than any far thing, and nearer than here itself; he cannot be seen because he is hidden within", (Mundaka Upanishad, 3.17).

In this verse of Mundaka Upanishad we find a very important word, nibitam, that means "seated in the middle", "established inside". This is the precise description of the Param Atman, the Soul of all souls, that is within the core of each being or existence.

अविभक्तं च भूतेषु विभक्तमिव च स्थितम् । भूतभर्तु च तज्ज्ञेयं ग्रसिष्णु प्रभविष्णु च ॥ १३-१७ ॥

avibhaktam ca bhūteṣu vibhaktamiva ca sthitam । bhūtabhartṛ ca tājñeyam grasiṣṇu prabhaviṣṇu ca ॥ 13-17 ॥

avibhaktam: without divisions; ca: and; bhutesu: regarding the beings; vibhaktam: divided; iva: as if; ca: and; sthitam: established/ situated; bhuta bhartri: who maintains all beings; ca: and; tat: that; jneyam: to be known; grasissnu: who devours; prabhavisnu: the powerful Vishnu/ developing; ca: and.

"Although undivided, he appears as if he is divided into the (many) beings where he resides. He is the sustainer of all beings, and is to be known as the powerful Vishnu, who devours everything."

This concept is echoed in the verses of the Rig Veda sambhita: ekah santam bahudha kalpayanti, "he is contemplated in various forms, although he is one" (Rig Veda. 1.114.5), ekam sad vipra babuda vadanti, "although he is one, he is described in many ways by the learned" (Rig Veda 1.164.46).

Here the word jneyam ("is to be known") is in perfect juxtaposition to the word avijneyam ("cannot be known") in the previous verse, highlighting a fact that is beyond duality. It is true that God cannot be known through material analysis and research, but he can be known through the perception of his effects on our intelligence and consciousness, that transcend the material level. A very important word in this verse is avibhakta, that means "not divided, not separated", while vibhakta means "divided, separated". It is interesting to note that this chapter is entitled Prakriti Purusha vibhaga yoga, "The Yoga of understanding nature as distinct from the personal principle", but the most extraordinary concept expressed in this chapter is that in reality there is no vibhaga and no bheda, and such divisions or separations are simply apparent and not factual.

The maha vakyas ("great aphorisms") of the Upanishads confirm this very profound truth: sarvam khalv idam brahma, "all this is Brahman" (Chandogya Upanishad, 7.25.2, Nrisimha utara tapani Upanishad, 7), prajnanam brahma, "Brahman is full consciousness/ knowledge" (Aitareya Upanishad, 3.3), as well as aham brahmasmi, "I am Brahman" (Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad 1.4.10), ayam atma brahma, "this Atman is Brahman" (Mandukya Upanishad 2), tat tvam asi, "you are that (Brahman)" (Chandogya Upanishad, 6.8.7) and so 'ham, "I am that (Brahman)" (Narada parivrajaka Upanishad, 6.4).

The word iva, "as if", indicates the illusory appearance or the example by comparison that is only a reflection or image of reality, but it does not contain it fully. At a more intimate level, this apparent separation within the supreme Consciousness refers to the highest and most intense form of yoga ("union") in bhakti, constituted by the vipralambha rasa, or "feeling of separation" by which the devotee is fully and deeply immersed in the supreme Consciousness (Krishna Consciousness) in the desire to attain an apparently missing union with Krishna. This is the greatest and most inconceivable mystery, demonstrated in practice by the ecstatic manifestation of Chaitanya's sentiments, that melt the hearts of the pure devotees and completely confuse the materialists into thinking that Chaitanya was simply a mentally deranged man. Yet, we can all have a similar experience when we miss a person, an object or a situation that we really love or need: the memory of what we have lost brings a feeling of appreciation that is many times stronger than whatever we could have felt before, in the direct physical presence of the object of our love or need. We take air for granted because we breathe it constantly, day and night, so that in general we do not even notice it, but if we suddenly find ourselves without any air - as under water, for example - our awareness and appreciation for the value of air would instantly increase many times.

Again we find in this verse the concept of acintya bheda abheda, or "inconceivably different and non-different". All the innumerable personalities we find in the material and spiritual worlds are nothing but "parts and parcels" of God, Vishnu; they only appear to have a different or separate existence, because of the power of maya (illusion), that acts as Yogamaya in the spiritual dimension and Mahamaya on the material level.

The word bhuta literally means "being", both in the sense of "living entity" and in the sense of "situation or circumstances of existence", therefore we learn here that the three "categories" of isvara, shakti and jiva are actually One Reality, never really separated and never divided, as confirmed in Vedanta sutra (sakti saktimator abheda). So when we say that Brahman is truth, and the material world is false (brahma satya, jagan mithya), certainly we do not mean that Nature (spiritual nature or material nature - meaning forms, names, qualities, activities etc) is non-existent, or delusional, or unworthy of our worship. We mean that such forms, names etc, only seem to change, but in fact they are eternally present in the non-manifested (transcendental, non dualistic or unitarian) state that is Brahman, or Vishnu. Adi Shankara clearly explains this all-important point at the beginning of his commentary to Bhagavad gita: narayana parah anyaktah, "Narayana is transcendental and non-manifested".

Again, we need to be very careful not to fall into the trap of misunderstanding the word anyakta. The popular translation as "non-manifested" is probably not sufficient to help us penetrate its full meaning. We may have noticed that vyakta derives from the same root of the word vibhaga, and literally means "separated, divided", as vyakti means "individual" or "unit". So, when we say that vyakta means "manifested", it does not indicate a coming into existence, and anyakta does not indicate an absence or non-existence or annihilation. Therefore vyakta describes the individuation of a form as distinct from other forms, and implies a measure of illusion (maya), either spiritual or material. However this illusion only covers the subordinate being (the devotee or the materialist): Narayana is never subject to the illusion of separation, because he always contains the entirety of Consciousness. Narayana parah anyaktah really means that the supreme existence of Vishnu is always omnipresent as the foundation of everything, and can never be separated from his shaktis, spiritual or material.

The Upanishads confirm this: yato va imani bhutani jayante yena jatani jivanti yat prayanti, abhisamvisanti tad vijijnasasva tad brahma, "you should know him, from whom all beings are born, by whose support they live, and in whom they enter (in the end)" (Taittiriya Upanishad 3.1)

The presence of Vishnu during all the phases of the cycle of creation, preservation and destruction is highlighted by the words grasissu ("who devours") and prabhavissu ("who develops"). So God is not just the creator, but the preserver and the destroyer as well: this is the description of Time, Kala, that had already manifested in the vision of the Virata Rupa for Arjuna (11.32). This identification of Krishna with Kala/ Kali, on which we elaborated in the commentary to that verse, explains why the bija mantra for Vishnu/ Krishna (klm) is the same bija mantra for Mother Kali, who is also called Narayani.

The third aspect of the cycle of existence - maintenance or preservation - is expressed by the name bhuta bhartri, "who maintains all beings", and refers to Life that provides all nourishment, support, and healing to all beings.

jyotiṣāmapī tajjyotistamasah paramucyate । jñānaṁ jñeyaṁ jñānagamyam hṛdi sarvasya viṣṭhitam ॥ 13-18 ॥

jyotisam: in all the luminaries; api: also; tat: that; jyotiḥ: the light; tamasah: darkness; param: beyond/ higher; ucyate: it is said; jneyam: to be known; jñana gamyam: to be approached by knowledge; hṛdi: in the heart; sarvasya: of everything; viṣṭhitam: established.

"He is described as the light in all radiant things, transcendental to darkness. He is established in the heart of everything, and he is to be known through the cultivation of knowledge.

The theme of light and radiance as the visible form of Atman/ Brahman is repeated in other verses of Bhagavad gita:

kevim puranam anusasitaram anor aniyamsam anusmared yab, sarvasya dhataram acintya-rupam aditya-varnam tamasah parastat, "One should remember the Lord as omniscient, primeval, who controls everything, so small that is contained inside the atom. He maintains everything and his form is inconceivable, as bright as the sun, transcendental to the darkness" (8.9), adityanam abam visnur jyotisam ravir amsuman, maricir marutam asmi naksatranam abam sasi, "Among the Adityas, I am Vishnu. Among the lights, I am the radiant Sun. To the Marutas, I am Marici. To the constellations, I am the Moon" (10.21), dyutam chalayatam asmi tejas tejasvinam abam, jayo 'smi vyavasayo 'smi sattvam sattvatatam abam, "Among cheaters, I am gambling. Of all that is radiant, I am the power that radiates. Of all ventures, I am victory. Of everything good, I am goodness" (10.36), yad yad vibhutinat sattvam srimad urjitam eva va, tat tad evavagaccha tvam mama tejo 'msa sambhavam, "Anything that is good, powerful, wonderful, or glorious, that you can encounter, has come to existence as a part of my radiance" (10.41), divi surya sabasasya bhaved yugapad utthita yadi bhab sadrisi sa syad bhasas tasya mahatmanah, "If thousands of suns were rising simultaneously in the sky, that radiance would be similar to the radiance of the great Atman" (11.12), kiritinam gadinam cakrinam ca tejo rasim sarvato diptimantam, pasyami tvam durnirikshyam samantad diptanalarka dyutim aprameyam, "The luminous radiance of all those crowns, maces, and discs is everywhere, so dazzling that I can barely see you. It is like the rays of the sun or an immeasurable blazing fire" (11.17), anadi madhyantam ananta viryam ananta bahum sasi surya netram, pasyami tvam dipta bbutasa vaktram sva tejas visvam idam tapantam, "Without beginning, middle or end, your prowess is unlimited. Your arms are innumerable, and your eyes are the Sun and the Moon. I can see your face blazing with flames from your own radiance, scorching the entire universe" (11.19), nabhah sprisam diptam aneka varnam vyattananam dipta visala netram, dristva hi tvam pryathitantar atma dbritim na vindami samam ca visno, "O Vishnu, I feel shaken and I have lost my mental balance and peace, looking at this (immense) radiance of yours, of so many colors, reaching up to touch the sky, with immense gaping mouths and fierce glowing eyes" (11.24), lelihyase grasamanah samantal lokan samagran vadanair jvaladbhib, tejobbir apurya jagat samagram bhasa tavograh pratapanti visno, "From all sides you are licking these devoured people/ worlds into your mouths, whose blazing light covers the entire universe. O Vishnu, your fierce radiance is burning everything" (11.30), yad aditya gatam tejo jagad bhasayate 'khalam, yac candramasi yac cagnau tat tejo viddhi mamakam, "Know that the radiance emanating from the sun, that pervade the entire universe, as well as the light of the moon and that of the fire, are mine", (15.12).

A similar verse is found in Svetasvatara Upanishad (3.8): aditya varnam tamasah parastat, "His color is like the radiance of the sun, that is transcendental to darkness."

We also find mention of God's radiance in the most important of all Vedic mantras, the Gayatri (devasya bhargo pracodayat, "may the radiance of God inspire us") and in the famous verse tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, asato ma sad gamaya, mrtiyor ma amrtam gamaya, "From darkness take me to the light, from the impermanent take me to eternity, from death take me to immortality" (Brhad aranyaka Upanishad, 1.3.28). Light, spirit and intelligence are always associated, also at the individual level. Many psychic travelers have described the soul as "a clear white light", and we know that the aggregate of jivatmans is called brahmajyoti, "the radiance of Brahman". The clear understanding or realization of reality is called enlightenment or illumination, because it gives us a clear vision of the world and ourselves; the references to realization as "seeing" are also extremely numerous not only in Bhagavad gita (2.16, 2.29, 2.59, 4.18, 4.35, 5.5, 5.16, 5.24, 5.25, 6.30, 6.32, 9.7, 10.5, 10.11, 11.3-5, 11.52-55, 13.25, 13.28, 13.29-31, 14.19, 15.11) but in all the shastra. Just to make a couple of major examples: the name rishi, indicating one of those wise self-realized souls who contributed their knowledge to the corpus of Vedic knowledge, literally means "one who sees", while the word darshana, indicating a particular ideological perspective on Reality, literally means "vision", as in the act of seeing. It is one step further from mere intellectual understanding: it is a life-changing paradigm shift.

The transcendental and divine nature of illuminating intelligence is also confirmed in Svetasvatara Upanishad:

mahan prabbur vai purusha satvityaaisa pravartakah, su nirmalam imam praptim isano jyotir avyayah, "The Supreme Personality of God is the Purusha, who disseminates transcendental enlightenment. Just to be in touch with him is to be in contact with the indestructible brahmajyoti" (3.12), yo 'ntab-sukho 'ntar aramas tatbantar-jyotir eva, "That (Brahman) is the inner happiness, the inner pleasure, and the inner light", (3.13), tam ha devam atma buddhi prakasam, mumuksur vai saranam abam prapadye, "desiring liberation from conditionings, we surrender to him, the Lord, who illuminates the/ through intelligence", (6.18).

This radiance of intelligence or consciousness is so strong that it supersedes the light of the sun and all the luminaries of this universe (Bhagavad gita 15.6, na tad bhasayate suryo na sasanko na pavakah, "In that abode there is no (need of the) light of the sun, moon or fire/ electricity), na tatra suryo bhati na chandra tarakam, nema vidyuto bhanti kuto 'yam agnih, "There is (no need of) sunlight, or light of moon or stars, what to speak of the light of the fire", (Katha Upanishad 2.2.15).

The Bhagavata Purana (3.28.40) also uses the example of the radiating light and heat to explain that God is non-different from his shaktis: yatholmukad vispulingad, dhumad vapi sva sambhavat, apy atmattvenabbhimatad, yathagnih prithag ulmukat, "The blazing fire is different from the flames, from the sparks and from the smoke, although all are intimately connected because they are born from the same blazing wood." Similarly, the sun is the foundation and origin of light and heat, as well as shadows and darkness. However, darkness does not have existence in itself, but it is merely absence of light or inability to see the light, while the light is ever-existing and can never be extinguished.

The supreme Soul is established not only in all jivas, but inside each atom as well - becoming visible as the blinding blaze of a detonated nuclear bomb. We normally cannot see this light simply because our vision is covered by the darkness of material appearances, but we can observe and perceive its effects through intelligence and scientific knowledge (jnana gamyam). And where is this radiant light located? In the center (bridh): in the heart of every being, of every existence. This is the "beyond" where we should direct our exploration: a revolutionary new paradigm for all those who keep searching for happiness "out there" instead of inside their own hearts.

Here Krishna summarizes his answers to Arjuna's questions. In verses 6 and 7 he spoke about the world or kshetra or field of action (jneya, "the object of knowledge"), in verses 8 to 12 he spoke about the correct process of understanding and interacting with the kshetra (jnana, "knowledge"), and in verses 13 to 18 he spoke about the param atman (jnana gamyam, "that can/ should be attained through knowledge") or the reason for the entire exercise of interaction between the kshetra and kshetra jna. The expression jnana gamyam indicates the purpose, the goal, the destination (pada, dhama) that all individual souls are meant to reach through their evolution; this ultimate success is already contained in each individual in the form of conscience (virtue or goodness, and knowledge), but it must be cultivated deliberately, through an act of choice, to blossom into true love.

Love (bhakti) is the highest reality and the greatest happiness (bladini sakti), and constitutes the real meaning of life - creation, preservation and dissolution of the material bodies, as well as evolution of the consciousness towards perfection. This is why only a devotee can really understand the transcendental knowledge.

At some point in their evolution, all human beings face the same question: what is the meaning of life? Why was the universe created? What is the purpose of all this? All beings instinctively search happiness, knowledge and permanent existence, yet they constantly experience sufferings, confusion and loss, of which death is usually considered the greatest tragedy.

At the animal level, the perception of sufferings is limited to the pain of the body and the mind caused by physical elements and events, especially those that are beyond the normal course of life. For example, a mother will suffer great pain for the premature death of a child, but grown up children will leave the family and may not even come to know about the subsequent death of their old parent. Similarly, a cruel death accompanied by unnecessary torture or mistreatment, as it often happens when animals fall victims to evil minded people, increases the natural sufferings of death to an unnatural level. An animal suffers intensely when trapped, imprisoned or confined, and/ or deprived of natural family or society relationships, and/ or subjected to an imposed artificial way of life. However, this natural life is the extent of the aspirations of animals, that appreciate beauty and love, but have no higher responsibilities or spiritual quests.

The more the individual evolves through increasingly complex forms of animal life, the more sensitive s/he becomes, until s/he finally attains a human form of life. At this point, the lessons in the great school of life become trickier and more difficult, and the individual is required to learn to think beyond the body and mind, beyond the material identification of family, society, or species, and to understand the unity of all life and consciousness. This is why Vedanta sutra says, athato brahma jijñasa: now, in this human life, we must learn about Brahman, the jnana gamyam, that is attained through the correct understanding of his manifestations, activities, qualities, names, forms, teachings, etc.

A human being has already "graduated" from the introductory courses of study on nature that constituted the cycle of animal life, and after becoming qualified on the human level of consciousness, obtains the opportunity to develop higher qualifications in the management of the universe and attaining liberation from conditionings, by expanding his awareness and realization and entering the supreme Consciousness. This is the process of jnana, jneya, jnana gamyam. The choice of definitions for these three subjects, considered together, is truly illuminating, and reiterates the concept expressed in previous chapters about the proper meditation to realize the Supreme, through the visualization and appreciation of the Virata Rupa.

True devotion (bhava) to God can only be achieved through the proper knowledge and consciousness of the transcendental Reality; we must be able to outgrow the false sentimentalist devotion that is based on ignorance - which is clearly described not as a mere lack of proper information, but as the opposite of the principles detailed in verses 8 to 12. One of the most important practices in Yoga is svadhyaya, the direct personal study of Vedic knowledge, that starts from the science of the Self and covers all aspects of existence.

Of course we are not interested in mere material erudition or academic titles, because we must be extremely careful not to fall into the ignorance of arrogant identification and attachment, that carry foolish people away from Reality and deeper into illusion. Those unfortunate people who fall in the ego trap of the "great scholar" or "great religionist" remain unable to really approach God (mayayapahrta jnana, 7.15). Such people are not interested in knowledge, but in the selfish material advantages they could get from knowledge: they are like asuras who want to kidnap the Mother Goddess of Learning and enslave her to their own selfish sense gratification. On the other hand, a true devotee always keeps a respectful and loving service attitude, following in the footsteps of the great acharyas and realized souls, who transmitted the realizations of their predecessors and explained them according to their own realizations, but always recognizing the eternal nature of Knowledge herself. This is why we say that Vedas are eternal.

A true devotee is always eager to hear, study and understand the glories of God, manifested in the spiritual world and in the material world as well: therefore the Vedic scriptures, especially the Puranas and Itihasas, contain so many discussions about material creation and human interactions, as well as many important teachings on how to lead a good life. By honoring the manifestation, the forms, the qualities, and the activities of consciousness, we can truly evolve our individual consciousness and harmonize it through entering the supreme Consciousness, the Soul of all souls. This is a true mark of love. When we love someone, we give full attention to that person's properties and work, and we make sincere efforts to better understand his/ her intentions and ideas, so that we can help and assist him/ her better.

Another important point here is that all such knowledge already exists in the heart of each being, because of the presence of the Param Atman, that includes existence, knowledge and happiness. This knowledge is simply covered by various layers of ignorance in the form of prejudice, false identification, material attachments, false information and beliefs, and all other forms of tamas (ignorance) that we will examine in greater details in the next chapters. The proper method of learning consists in approaching realized souls (4.34) and remaining in their presence through service and exchanges of questions and answers, so that it will become clear to us how to distinguish between knowledge and ignorance - thus developing our viveka or buddhi, the sharp intelligence that can connect our consciousness with the supreme Consciousness.

Some individuals are already born with a favorable disposition, as we will see in chapter 16, by which they are more inclined to perceive the guidance of the Param Atman - that people usually call "the voice of conscience" - and walk the path of self-improvement. This divine-oriented nature of the mind is built through many lifetimes in a human form (babunam janmanam ante, 7.9), and the accumulation of merits (punya karmanam, 7.28); it is not an arbitrary gift from God to favor some people only (9.29), but it is something that anyone of us can earn through sincere effort. If someone was wondering why Krishna and Arjuna have spoken of jnana, jneya and jnana gamyam without mentioning the jnata ("the knower"), we can easily reply that the subject of jnata has been amply discussed from the very beginning, by explaining the nature, qualities, and activities of the atman.

प्रकृतिं पुरुषं चैव विद्व्यनादि उभावपि । विकारांश्च गुणांश्चैव विद्वि प्रकृतिसम्भवान् ॥ १३-२० ॥

prakṛtiṁ puruṣaṁ caiva viddhyanādi ubhāvapi | vikāraṁśca guṇāṁścaiva viddhi prakṛtisambhavan || 13-20 ||

prakṛtiṁ: the prakṛiti; puruṣaṁ: the puruṣa; ca: and; eva: certainly; viddhi: you should know; anadi: without beginning; ubhan: both; api: also; vikāraṁ: the transformations; ca: and; guṇaṁ: the qualities; ca: and; eva: certainly; viddhi: you should know; prakṛiti sambhavan: born from prakṛiti.

"You should know that Prakriti and Purusha are both eternal, and that their transformations and qualities are born from the Prakriti.

Krishna is again stating that both Purusha and Prakriti are Brahman - the eternal, unchangeable and perfect Consciousness that we could call the blueprint of Reality. However, within this unchanging master plan there is ample scope for well orchestrated variety, which implies apparent change or transformation, usually in closed cycles such as creation, preservation and annihilation.

This characteristic of variety is specifically described as a function of Prakriti or Shakti, that is the Mother of all forms and qualities - both spiritual and material. This apparent transformation or change is due to the principle of action; all forms, qualities, names etc are eternally existing in the Consciousness plan of the Brahman, but they become manifested (i.e. differentiated, visible as individual states of being) through the divisions of time (Kala/ Kali) created by action. This even applies to the transcendental appearance of the Personalities of God (avatars) and great liberated souls (jivan muktas), although in their case the "change" is effected by the spiritual Nature Yogamaya, and the characteristics of these bodies remain spiritual, made of pure consciousness, and cannot be easily understood by ordinary human beings, who have limited sensory powers, unable even to perceive subtle matter, what to speak of spiritual bodies.

The ordinary/ material perception of Time is also based on change and action. Past, present and future become distinct from each other simply because of action and change in circumstances or environment, otherwise they would not be distinguishable because Time is actually a continuum and eternally exists as Brahman (11.32). Therefore Kala/ Kali is the original manifestation of creation in the universe: the primordial Father and Mother of all beings. What appears to our ignorant and limited eyes as the velvety blackness of the space is actually filled with the potential of all light and energy, but then again Mother (shakti, as power, energy) is the Boss here, the source of all magic, ordinary and extra-ordinary. All actions are performed by Nature, and the Purusha never really becomes entangled in them (4.14, 5.13): only the conditioned souls are tied by the consequences of their actions because they continue to identify as the doer, as the ego that appears to make a choice and invest the effort in one particular selfishly motivated action. On the other hand, a liberated person will simply guide or direct, through a simple act of consciousness/ awareness, his/ her own nature and engage it in sacred action, yajna, or karma yoga, without identifying him/ her self with the action but simply working as a matter of duty or service, as explained in the early chapters of Bhagavad gita (3.25, etc). What makes action sacred (yajna)? The sacred consciousness: when the individual consciousness is united (yoga) with the supreme Total Consciousness, any activity performed by Nature becomes sacred (4.25-30), even the simplest act of breathing. All bodies (material and spiritual) are made by, and of, Nature (Mahamaya and Yogamaya) and therefore they must engage in activities (3.33, 4.23, 13.21), because it is through activity that we can attain knowledge and realization, and from realization, true love will blossom.

Some commentators interpreted the expression anadi in this verse as "not the primeval cause" instead of "without any previous cause", but if that was the case, we should have to believe that isvara is also created and directly involved in the material creation and transformation, which he is not, because he is unchanging and transcendental to all dualities. Bhagavan always contains both Purusha and Prakriti: this is the reason why male Deities should be worshiped in the company of their female counterparts. Of course even when the image of the male Deity stands alone, the presence of its female component cannot be separated from it, precisely because Shakti is the form itself. Without the presence of Shakti, there would be no form - material or spiritual. At the same time, we need to understand that the forms of Bhagavan are not limited in time and space like our material bodies: they eternally exist within the Brahman, in the spiritual dimension, and can be manifested at any time and in any circumstances by Isvara simply by an act of Consciousness. Consciousness comes before any manifestation of forms, and is not limited by time or space or any material law.

Bhagavata purana (3.7.9) confirms: seyam bhagavato maya, yan nayena virudhyate, isvarasya vimuktasya karpanyam uta bandhanam, "This idea, saying that Bhagavan can be overpowered by illusion, is contradictory, because Isvara is ever liberated, and therefore he cannot be conditioned."

कार्यकारणकर्तृत्वे हेतुः प्रकृतिरुच्यते । पुरुषः सुखदुःखानां भोक्तृत्वे हेतुरुच्यते ॥ १३-२१ ॥

kāryakāraṇakartṛtve hetuḥ prakṛtirucyate | puruṣaḥ sukhaduḥkḥānāṁ bhoktṛtve heturucyate || 13-21 ||

karya: the action to be performed; karana: the origin; kartrive: in the making/ in undertaking action; hetuḥ: cause; prakritib: prakriti; ucyate: is said; puruṣaḥ: puruṣa; sukha duḥkḥānam: of joy and distress; bhoktṛtve: in tasting; hetuḥ: the cause; ucyate: it is said.

"Prakriti is said to be the cause and the origin of the action, while Purusha is the cause of the perception of happiness and distress.

We find a very similar verse in the Bhagavata Purana (3.26.8), in the section reporting the instructions by Kapila: karya karana kartrive karanam prakritim viduḥ, bhoktṛtve sukha duḥkḥānam puruṣam prakriteḥ param, "The (wise) understand that the duties (as guna and karma constituting the body), the subtle body and the kartriva (the development of action) are all caused by prakriti. However, the experience of happiness and distress is in/ from the puruṣa, who is different from/ transcends/ the prakriti."

This description applies to the Principle of Consciousness (the Purusha), therefore to a certain extent it also includes the supreme Purusha (raso vai sah, "he is feeling/ perception", Taittiriya Upanishad, 2.7). In this regard, we can understand the immense importance of the science of rasas, the feelings/ perceptions within the field of bhakti, that is the highest and most intimate form of yoga: puruṣaḥ sa parāḥ partha bhaktya labhyaḥ tv ananyaya, yasyantah sthāni bhūtāni yena sarvaṁ idam tatam, "O Partha, this supreme Person can be attained by undivided devotion. Within him exist all these beings, and he pervades everything", (8.22), bhaktya tv ananyaya sākya aham evaṁ vidho 'rjuna, jñātaṁ drashtuṁ ca tattvena praveṣṭuṁ ca parantapa, "O Arjuna, only through bhakti it is possible to know and to see me truly, and to enter into me", (11.54). Of course the supreme Consciousness, Bhagavan, is beyond the duality of joy and distress, and enjoys all perceptions and feelings in harmony and bliss, even those that appear like sufferings, as in the separation from his devotees during the lilas of the avatars, and the concern for all conditioned souls toiling in the material world. For Bhagavan these are simply different tastes (rasas): not only the sweet tastes of direct loving devotion (madhurya, sakhya, vatsalya, dasya) but also indirectly positive such as compassion (karuna), heroism (virya), amazement (adbhuta, vismaya), humor (hasya), neutrality (santa) and apparently "negative" feelings such as fear (bhayanaka), anger (raudra) and disgust or repulsion (bibhatsa) that create the contrast. The faculty of perception and feeling is always present, but we can choose where to direct and focus it: this is the characteristic of the Purusha. Through the powers (śaktiḥ) called desire (icchā), determination (keriṇā) and knowledge (jñāna), the consciousness (puruṣa) engages the body (rūpa, indriya) and its qualities (guṇas) in transformation (vikāra), thus creating a variety (vaicitra) of feelings (rasas).

The example with the taste of foods is particularly interesting, also considering that in Vedic terminology, the word bhukti indicates all types of "enjoyment", of both sukha and duḥkha, from the sweetest ripe fruits to the sourest grapes. The particular type of taste we are attracted to is determined by our set of senses, created by our previous karma; later on Krishna will explain that the guṇas we choose according to our karma are exemplified by the different types of food and tastes we grow accustomed to, and that life habits can be changed by practice, popularly considered a "second nature". The word bhakti, too, comes from the same grammatical root, and refers to the exchange of "emotional food" or rasas between points of consciousness, ideally between the jīvatma cell (as bhakta) and the supreme Sum total of Consciousness that we call God (as bhokta).

In the macrocosm, this perception or consciousness of the ksbetra is the lila of the Purusha avatars (Karanodakasayi Vishnu, Garbhodakasayi Vishnu, Kshirodakasayi Vishnu), while in the microcosm it appears as a reflection in the activities of the individual jīvatman. Like the supreme Purusha, the small puruṣa "cell" simply focuses his consciousness, and everything is done by nature (3.27): if the consciousness is focused in the material illusory mode of ahankāra and māmatva, bondage and delusion will ensue, while by focusing one's consciousness in the spiritual mode of sacred service, liberation and happiness will be attained through the action of spiritual Nature.

Sometimes ignorant people remain confused by the existence of sufferings in this world, believing that an omnipotent and omniscient God should never allow anything bad to happen to anyone - especially to the innocent, such as children, friendly animals, and so on. Therefore these people become atheists, denying the existence of God or waging a war against the very concept of religion because they conclude that God must be cruel and evil. This is a childish mentality that should be examined dispassionately in the light of the transcendental knowledge. The sufferings inherent to the material world are difficulties set to help us learn our lessons and evolve at individual and collective levels. If we carefully observe and follow the original instructions for living in this world, our problems will be limited to the very minimum, and we will be more than capable of overcoming them by applying just a little patience and proper effort. In fact, faced with the proper attitude and education, difficulties can even become stimulating and bring a pleasant thrill - like a good fight, an exhausting hike, or a challenging obstacle. It is said that a diamond is nothing but a piece of coal that was able to handle pressure exceptionally well by re-organizing itself through a better (more harmonious) configuration: this is fundamentally the task of each and every individual jivatma, as we are all meant to evolve and develop into the highest perfection of consciousness.

Even on the material level, a loving parent will be happy and proud of his/ her child's first attempts at learning something new - from walking to performing more complex activities or studying difficult subjects - even if the child faces a certain measure of discomfort or even suffering. A good parent will help the child to understand that anything valuable is worthy of serious effort and even some sacrifice, and that physical or mental pain is temporary and can be overcome with the correct attitude. This of course does not mean that we should put ourselves or anyone else through disproportionate and unnecessary sufferings and difficulties, or into any procedure that can cause physical or mental damage. It simply means that we need to train to tolerate the inevitable sufferings that are inherent to the material body and mind - adhibhautika klesa, adhyatmika klesa, adbidavika klesa.

All these sufferings are only temporary perceptions, and are due to the contact of the senses with their objects (2.14), and from the real perspective of the atman, they can be compared to illusory nightmares. A good parent will comfort the child who has had a nightmare, explaining the illusory nature of the experience, offering proper advice and instructions on how to overcome the distress, and so on. If we give too much importance to ordinary sufferings, we will only increase the damage by adding fear, anxiety, guilt, uncertainty, and other similar negative emotions; even loss of limb or death itself are not so scary when the consciousness is properly attuned and has become detached from material identifications and ties.

Of course we do not want to go looking for troubles or to create more unnecessary sufferings for ourselves or for others, because the problems that we each naturally face in life, presented by life itself during our journey, are more than sufficient for our evolution. However, we should develop the proactive attitude of seeing each problem as an opportunity for personal growth. In fact, this is the approach that God wants to teach us; if we carefully study the instructions offered by the great personalities and the shastra, sufferings and problems in life will be reduced to the very minimum, and we will be able to utilize them in a positive or constructive way. Most often, people unnecessarily create their own problems by acting against their good conscience and against the instructions of good teachers. The actual bulk of sufferings in this world are the karmic consequence of pain we have foolishly inflicted on others, and that we must pay back sooner or later, in this lifetime or in a next one.

Unfortunately there have been and there are still many confused people who project their own negative material qualities on God, and imagine that God actually wants people to suffer, to punish them for some disobedience or for some similar reason, just like materially attached human beings controlled by passion and ignorance can become angry and vindictive against others. This is another form of illusion, because God is certainly not on that level of consciousness, as Krishna clearly stated already: nadatte kasyacit papam na caiva sukritam vibhuh, ajnanenavritam jnanam tena mubhyanti jantavah, "The (all) powerful (Lord) does not accept /consider the good or bad merits of anyone. It (the problem) is (only due to) the living entities, that are confused because their knowledge is covered by ignorance", (5.15) and samo 'ham sarva bhutesu na me dvesyo 'sti na priyah, ye bhajanti tu mam bhaktiya mayi te tesu capy aham, "I am equally disposed towards all living beings. I do not hate anyone, and I do not favor anyone. Yet, when someone offers me a sincere service in devotion, I also serve them with love and devotion", (9.29).

When we overcome this duality (2.38, 18.9, 18.28, 18.54), we attain the transcendental level of Bhagavan Consciousness. This is the greatest difference between the Vedic religion and abrahamic ideologies, where man is always an insignificant and intrinsically flawed creature, made from lowly dirt, who was insufflated with a mysterious "living soul" from God's breath and is not very good at keeping it, and therefore needs to be "saved" by blind allegiance to God's church and its priests. Thus even the greatest saint can only hope of being admitted in the "kingdom of God" to remain there as a background servant, albeit with considerable job perks; God remains unapproachable personally, a distant king demanding constant blind obedience and feared by his subjects because of his whimsical, unpredictable and often cruel behavior. But even attaining such heavenly position is not easy, because in this world, during one short lifetime, man is tossed around and victimized by God' enemy, Satan, who seems to have almost equal power to God's, and even greater power over material nature and the "things of the world". Abrahamics believe that if by any chance or smallest mistake one fails to meet the stringent requirements for admission to heaven, God will throw him/ her into the eternal fire of hell, where Satan's servants will torture him/ her in very painful, horrible, disgusting and humiliating ways forever. On the other hand, Vedic tradition teaches us that we eternally are all parts and parcels of God, and that we only need to listen to our inner Self and expand our consciousness to attain the same nature of the Supreme. This development is through intelligence and sincere effort, and we have a potentially unlimited number of lifetimes to engage in perfecting ourselves, learning from each and every experience and becoming better persons. All along this evolutionary journey, we receive many messages, instructions, inspirations, opportunities for learning, and even warnings when we are going in the wrong direction; by focusing our consciousness from darkness to light, from temporary to eternal, from death to immortality, we can easily become successful.

The grammatical components of this verse are very interesting. Karya is the action to be performed, or "duty" or "task"; previous commentators reveal that here the word karya refers to the body, that is an effect of action and at the same time the instrument for action, determining the range of activities and choices of the individual. Generally the word karma is used to indicate one's duty, but as a complete action, a process that is already set as a result of previous choices, and that can only be steered by consciousness either in a good or in a bad direction through transformation or modifications of desire (iccha, kriya, jnana). So the difference between karya and karma is the free will that we apply to change the course of our own destiny.

Kriya is therefore the process of creation, by which bodies are created as vehicles for opportunities to perform one's duty in the proper consciousness; this kshetra ("field of action") is created from the mahat, the non-differentiated Brahman, which through the action of Kala/ Kali develops the sense of identity and differentiation, separation or individuality. The very concept of abankara is based on action: aham means "I" and kara means "who acts"; to avoid misinterpretations, we need to remember here that deliberate abstention from dutiful action is also considered an action, albeit negative in form, and brings negative consequences.

From this abankara (or kartritvam), the action of Time develops the tan matra (the subtle schematics of sense perception), and from this blueprint of consciousness applied to action, the karana (the 11 sense organs, including the mind) and the visayas (sense objects and bodies) will develop. All this is caused by Nature, or Prakriti, and actually constitutes the very identity of Prakriti.

So when we say, karya karana kartritve hetuh prakritir ucyate, it means that prakriti is the cause or meaning/ reason/ initiator of the kartritva (capacity of action) in the karana (senses and mind) of the karya (action itself as duty we choose to perform). On another level, the prakriti (as engagement of the qualities of one's body and mind) is the karya (duty), the karana (the cause) and the hetu (the meaning or reason) in the kartritva (principle of action itself, or impetus for creation). On yet another level, the actions (karya, starting with the creation of the universe) are the cause (karana) and the purpose (hetu) for the sense of doership or agency (kartritva) embodied by the various Devas who preside over the functions/ actions within the universe. Accordingly, the second part of the verse will indicate that the purusha experiences the consciousness transformations in the different tastes (sweet, salty, bitter, sour, pungent, astringent) that are variations of sukha (pleasure) and dubkha (pain). On another level, the purusha (as consciousness) is the hetu (origin, cause, purpose) of the tasting (bhoktritva) of the various feelings and experiences. On another level, the supreme Purusha is the supreme Master (bhokta) that is served by all the various personalities in the universe; the good personalities serve him favorably and the bad personalities serve him unfavorably - creating opportunities for lila, for the expression of teachings and the demonstration through examples that can be useful for other developing souls. So even the most rebellious asuras are actually playing in God's hands, and they are fully controlled by Prakriti through action.

पुरुषः प्रकृतिस्थो हि भुङ्क्ते प्रकृतिजान्गुणान् । कारणं गुणसङ्गोऽस्य सदसद्योनिजन्मसु ॥ १३-२२ ॥

puruṣaḥ prakṛtiṣṭho hi bhuṅkte prakṛti-jāṅgūṇān । kāraṇaṁ guṇasaṅgo'sya sadasadyoni-janmasu ॥ 13-22 ॥

puruṣaḥ: the purusha; prakṛiti sthah: situated in the prakṛiti; hi: indeed; bhuṅkte: enjoys; prakṛiti jan: born from the prakṛiti; gunan: the gunas; karanam: the origin; guna sanga: contact with the gunas; asya: of him; sat asat: good and bad; yoni: matrix; janmasu: in (various) births.

"The Purusha is situated in the Prakriti, and tastes the gunas that have originated from the Prakriti. Due to the contact with these gunas, he takes birth in various matrixes, good or bad.

The Purusha can never be separated from the Prakriti.

Consciousness exists only through the cognition of existence, and existence is the kshetra, as we have seen at the beginning of this chapter. The purusha is the kshetra jna, the consciousness that perceives the kshetra, but this kshetra also includes jnana (knowledge), jneya (the object of knowledge), and jnana gamyam (the purpose of knowledge). It is obvious that Arjuna's questions were very wisely chosen, and this indicates that he already knew the answers and the subject perfectly well.

So when Krishna replies, "the kshetra is the body and the kshetra jna is the soul", we must be very careful not to get merrily simplistic about the subject. The subsequent elaborations offered by Krishna are illuminating for those who keep their minds open, because in 13.16 and 13.17 he says that Vishnu is the jneya and jnana gamyam, the "object" of knowledge, although he is not kshetra but rather kshetra jna. So we understand that this knowledge of the field (kshetra jnana) applies to action (prakṛiti), as well as to perception (purusha), that must also be perceived and known. This also helps us to understand the difference between the two kshetra jnas - the jivatma and the paramatma. The param atma knows all kshetras or fields of action (bodies, etc): ksetra jnam capi mam viddhi sarva ksetresu bharata, ksetra ksetrajnaya jnanam yat taj jnanam matam mama. "O Bharata, you should know that I am also the knower of the field who resides in all fields. Knowing the field and the knower of the field is called knowledge. This is my opinion", (13.3).

The paramatma, the Soul of all souls, is the real bhokta, the cause (hetu, karana) of the bhoktritva for all jivatmas, while the acceptance of rasas by the individual souls is simply a reflection or imitation or "ripple" of the rasas in the supreme Consciousness. We can make a practical example with the activities of a group of children who are helping Mother prepare food in the kitchen; only if they work in the proper consciousness, following the instructions and for a higher purpose, they will be able to produce something useful, otherwise they will have to eat their own unpleasant mess. Father may enjoy having a taste of their food even if it is tasting horrible, or he may already know the taste because of his vaster knowledge, but he is not attached to it and therefore does not need to eat it all, while the conditioned souls are egotistically identifying with their action and therefore they have to eat it up and mop the plate, even if they have to cry for that. Another very interesting point revealed by previous commentators is that the purusha never actually enjoys the sense objects (visaya) but only the gunas (qualities) associated with such sense objects. In the case of the supreme purusha, these gunas are the transcendental qualities that create variety of tastes from the three basic elements of sat (existence), cit (awareness) and ananda (happiness), while in the case of the conditioned individual purusha, the three gunas are the fundamental qualities of material nature (sattva, rajas, tamas), that will be described in detail in the next chapters. To summarize them, we can say that sattva is goodness and happiness, rajas is effort and pain, and tamas is illusion and ignorance.

Consequently, as the verse says (karanam guna sango 'ya sad asad yoni janmasu), by the association with these qualities or gunas, the purusha is "caused" by the subtle body to take birth in a yoni or matrix. In the case of the parama purusha, the matrix is the spiritual form, manifested by the combination of qualities connected to the specific action or mission, that can appear as saumya (benevolent) or asaumya (terrifying), or even sat (eternal) or asat (temporary, as in avatars that appear for a particular mission only and then disappear). The jivatma itself is one of such avatars, specifically described as vibhinna ("distinct limb"), or shaktyavesa ("invested with power"), although of course it is only an atom (anu atma).

Similarly, the use of the word janma has previously been applied to the svamsa avatara appearance of the transcendental Lord (janma karma ca me divyam, "my divine birth and activities", 4.9, bahuni me vyatitani janmani, "many have been my births", 4.5, and also in 4.3, aparam bhavato janma, "you were born more recently"). Even the use of the word sristi as in srijami aham, "I create (my form)", (4.7) is applied to the appearance of the Lord, and this gives us a glimpse on the idea that everything is actually spiritual (including what appears to be material) and everything could indeed be directed by pure consciousness.

The cause (karana) for identification (kartriva) is action. In the parama Purusha, such action is lila, detached and blissful manifestation that is perfectly conscious and deliberate, and thus never failing (acyuta) or subject to actual suffering. Both purushas are situated (stha) in prakriti, but while the parama purusha controls the prakriti, the jiva purusha is controlled by the prakriti because of his tiny size and incomplete consciousness.

उपद्रष्टुमन्ता च भर्ता भोक्ता महेश्वरः । परमात्मेति चाप्युक्तो देहेऽस्मिन्पुरुषः परः ॥ १३-२३ ॥

upadrastānumantā ca bhartā bhoktā mahēśvaraḥ | paramātmēti cāpyukto dehe'sminpuruṣaḥ paraḥ || 13-23 ||

upadrasta: the witness; anumanta: the one who gives permission; ca: and; bharta: who maintains; bhokta: who enjoys; mahesvara: the great Lord; paramatma: the supreme Self; iti: like this; ca: and; api: even; uktah: it is said; dehe: in the body; asmin: this; puruṣaḥ paraḥ: the supreme Purusha/ the transcendental Purusha.

"However, it is said that within this body also dwells the supreme Purusha, the Paramatma Mahesvara. He is the one who witnesses the action and allows it to be performed, supports it and enjoys it.

Because the definition of Purusha, as pure eternal consciousness, can apply both to the supreme Lord and to the individual jivatma, particularly in relationship to action, qualities, forms, etc as explained in the previous verses, here Krishna elaborates on the difference between the anu atma (infinitesimal soul) and the param atma (the supreme soul).

The sectarian academic mentality divides the study of knowledge in opposite factions, creating the confused and delusional idea that we need to "pick a side" in the field of ideologies and fight against all other groups, rejecting their arguments a priori, out of our allegiance to our "own camp". The Vedic system, based on honoring truth (satyam) above all, uses philosophical debate simply to improve and expand everybody's realizations, and not for the aggrandizement or "victory" of a particular camp above the other. In this tradition, the Absolute Truth is that perspective in which all relative truths are contained and reconciled, forming a multi-dimensional vision that is the closest possible to the Sum total of Reality.

Therefore there is no need to be afraid of impersonalism versus personalism: the two perspectives can and should complement each other, because Reality is multi-dimensional. The various schools of thought that have elaborated on the subject in the last 2000 years or so have presented various perspectives that are not at odds with each other, but are meant to complement each other into a greater picture. The most recent perspective, expressed by Krishna Chaitanya, is called acintya bheda abheda, "inconceivably one and distinct", establishing that God is at the same time one with, and distinct from, his energies - the world and the individual souls.

The realization of the unity of all Consciousness is called Brahman realization; this Brahman is simultaneous awareness of all beings, individual souls and elements of nature, and is eternally full of happiness and peace, totally transcending all darkness of ignorance. The realization of Paramatma is one step further; this supreme Consciousness is also individual - a supreme Personality that is our conscience, and is immensely more intelligent and wiser than us. Krishna has stated from the very beginning: na tv evaṃ jatu naṣam na tvam neme janadhipah, na caiva na bhavisyamaḥ sarve vāyam atah param, "Certainly there was never a time when I did not exist, and you and all these chieftains of men have always existed as well. Also, none of us will cease to exist in the future", (2.12). This is also confirmed in Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.13): nityo nityanam cetanas cetananam, "he is (the supreme) eternal among all eternals, (the supreme) conscious among all the conscious".

When we attain the Paramatma realization, we are not alone any more. Just sitting next to us, on the tree of our body, we find the greatest friend and lover - not simply a Great Universal Mind, containing all knowledge and awareness, but the Soul of our soul, our innermost Self, who perfectly understands us but is not limited by our weakness.

The Bhagavata Purana (11.11.6) confirms: suparnav etau sadrisau sakhyau, yadricchayaitau krita nidau ca vrikse, ekas tayoh khadati pipplanam anyo niranno 'pi balena bhuyan, "Two friend birds somehow nested on the same banyan tree; one is eating the fruits, the other is not eating any food, but he is the strongest."

This beautiful image is also found in the Upanishads (Svetasvatara Upanishad 4.6, Mundaka Upanishad 3.1.1): dva suparna sayujya sakbaya samanam vrikksam parisavajate, tayor anyah pippalam svadv atty anasnann anyo 'bhichakasiti.

One could remain confused by trying to reconcile the idea of the Paramatma as the bird who is not eating the fruits of the tree, with the idea of the Paramatma being the bhokta, or the supreme enjoyer as stated in this verse. The explanation is not difficult: the supreme Soul is on a higher level of consciousness, a sacred consciousness, where all actions are performed as yajna and tapas: bboktaram yajna tapasam sarva loka mahesvaram, subridam sarva bbutanam jnatva mam santim ricchati, "(One who) knows me as the enjoyer/ beneficiary of yajna (sacrifice) and tapas (austerity), the great Lord of all the worlds/ all people, and the dearest friend of all beings, attains peace", (5.29), aham hi sarva yajnanam bhokta ca prabbur eva ca, na tu mam abbijananti tattvenatas cyavanti te, "I am the Lord and beneficiary of all yajnas. Those who do not understand my tattva will have to take birth again", (9.24).

The individual soul can also enter this dimension of consciousness by tuning in accordingly:

yat karosi yad asnasi yaj jubosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kuruva mad arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me", (9.27), brahmany adbhaya karmani sangam tyakva karoti yah, lipyate na sa papena padma patram ivambhasa, "Connecting/ dovetailing all activities to the Brahman, giving up all (identifications and) associations, one is never affected by the negative consequences, just like a lotus leaf is never affected by water", (5.10), na mam karmani limpanti na me karma phale spriha, iti mam yo 'bhijanati karmabhir na sa badhyate, "I am not affected by action and I am not touched by the results of the action. One who really understands this (fact) is not bound by actions either", (4.14), na ca mam tani karmani nibadhnanti dhananjaya, udasina vad asinam asaktam tesu karmasu, "O Dhananjaya, I am not bound by such actions, as I am situated neutrally, without any attraction for such activities", (9.9), janma karma ca me dnyam evam yo vetti tattvatah, tyakva deham punar janma naiti mam eti so 'rjuna, "O Arjuna, one who truly knows the divine nature of my births and activities does not have to take another birth after leaving this body, but comes to me", (4.9).

So the bird that is not interested in eating the fruits of the tree is atma rama ("taking pleasure in the self") and in more than one sense. First of all, he is self-sufficient and can find all happiness and satisfaction within himself. Secondly, he is enjoying the jiva atman - perceiving the feelings and perceptions of the individual souls, and guiding them towards the transcendental happiness that is bhakti. We can make a very simple example in this regard: mouth, tongue, stomach are all eating, but it is the "I" of the body that is primarily benefitted (bhokta), although all the parts of the body obtain pleasure and nourishment, too.

Narada pancaratra teaches: brishikena brishikesha sevnam bhaktir ucyate, "bhakti is defined as using one's senses to serve the Lord of the senses". The more we adjust the focus of our consciousness towards happiness and love, the more Paramatma is pleased enjoying these feelings in the heart of the jiva; conversely, Krishna will explain (17.6) that asuras practice austerities that cause pain and damage to the mind and the body, and the Paramatma feels them too (mam ca iva ... sarira stham) although he always remains detached from them and focused on the immense happiness of Brahman (brahma ananda). This is confirmed in Gopala tapani Upanishad (uttara 97): sakshi cetah kevalo nirgunas ca, "the Witness is pure Consciousness, free from all material qualities". When we learn and apply this "witness meditation" approach to our own life, we can also establish ourselves in that nature (bhava):

apuryamanam acala pratistham samudram apah pravrisanti yadvat, tadvat kama yam pravrisanti sarve sa santim apnoti na kama kami, "The ocean does not move from its position, no matter how much water enters to fill it. A person who similarly (withstands the flow) of desires entering (his mind) achieves a peace that is not (achieved) by one who wants (to cultivate) desires" (2.70), naiva kincit karomiti yukto manyeta tattva vit, pasyan srinvan sprisan jigbrann asnan gacchan svapan svasan, "One who is a yogi thinks/ should think, 'I am not the doer of anything'. One who knows the truth (engages in) seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, going, dreaming, breathing, (etc)", (5.8), ye hi samsparsa ja bhoga duhkha yonaya eva te, ady antavantah kaunteya na tesu ramate budbah, "Those pleasures that derive from contact with (the sense objects) are the cause for future sorrow because they have a beginning and an end. Therefore, o son of Kunti, an intelligent person does not seek happiness in them", (5.22).

On another level of meaning, the Paramatman is perceived as the prana vayu, the life air that sustains all the other pranas in the body, and keeps us alive. This prana vayu is explicitly identified as the omkara, the primeval sound vibration, that is also called pranava ("as/ of the prana"). More about this concept in chapter 17.

The two attributes of upadrasta and anumanta, described in regard to the Paramatma, are closely connected. The supreme Soul is the eternal witness and understands everything, therefore he guides us to fulfill our desires and to enter circumstances that will help us progress in our evolution, also reminding us about all such events - either within this lifetime, or between lifetimes, or in a next lifetime - whenever we need and want to know.

Because our awareness is limited by our individual mind structure, we cannot remember everything at the same time, therefore the "superconscious" (the supreme Self) gives us messages and hints from time to time, in the form of inspiration, sudden memories, impulses and even dreams, as well as teachings and comments we hear from other people. When we become more sincere and dedicated to our spiritual evolution, we become more sensitive and open to such messages, and to the "voice of our conscience".

The next two attributes of the Paramatma described in this verse are bharta and bhokta, accompanied by the name mahesvara, "great Lord". We should never forget that our conscience is the voice of God - the beneficiary of all activities, the owner of all planets, and the well wisher of all beings: bhoktaram yajna tapasam sarva loka mahesvaram, subridam sarva bhutanam jnatva mam santim ricchati, (5.29).

It is also very interesting to notice that the name Mahesvara is normally used to refer to Lord Shiva, the form of Vishnu that engages material nature and begets all souls in this world. Mahesvara is thus Paramatma, the supreme Self of the self - a special position that is technically called shiva tattva in the bhakti literature. For those who consider themselves as vaishnavas followers of Krishna Chaitanya, it will be interesting to notice that Sadashiva ("the eternal form of Shiva") is described as directly Narayana, or as exemplified beautifully by the characteristic iconography, is depicted as Hari Hara.

The word bhara means "burden", as in something that we carry or sustain, as in expenditures etc. So bharanam means continuance of the functions, support, sustenance, and bharta means "sustainer", applied to all relationships where a powerful person maintains, supports and protects others. For example, Vishnu is called Indrabharta, "the sustainer of Indra". Also, bharta is usually applied to the husband in a marriage relationship.

Krishna had already mentioned some of these attributes (sakshi is a synonym of upadrasta) in verse 9.18: gatir bharta prabhuh saksi nivasah saranam subrit, prabbavah pralayah sthanam nidhanam bijam avyayam, "I am the destination, the nourisher, the Lord, the witness, the abode, the shelter, the friend. I am the origin, the end, the foundation, the resting place and the seed that never perishes."

ya evaṁ veti puruṣaṁ prakṛtiṁ ca guṇaiḥ saha | sarvathā vartamāno'pi na sa bhūyo'bbijāyate || 13-24 ||

yah: one who; evam: like this; veti: knows; puruṣam prakṛtiṁ ca: the puruṣa and the prakṛti; guṇaiḥ saha: together with the gunas; sarvathā: in all ways; vartamanah: established; api: although; na: not; sah: s/he; bhūyah: again; abbijāyate: takes birth.

"One who knows the Purusha and the Prakriti, as well as the various ways of the gunas, will not take another birth, irrespective of his/ her (present) situation.

Ordinary materialistic people think that the purpose of life is merely about living - surviving as long as possible and enjoying as much as possible. A famous materialist, Charvaka Muni, wrote, rinam kṛtvā ghrtaṁ pibet yavaj jivet sukhāṁ jivet, bhasmi bhutasya debasya kutah punar agamano bhavet, "While you are still alive, enjoy life by eating excellent food, even if you need to make debts for that, because after the dead body has been burned to ashes, there will be no return". Some people even extend this idea beyond the borrowing and apply it to overtly or covertly fraudulent activities such as stealing or pretending to be a saintly person and begging for charity ("beg, borrow or steal"). In this perspective, religiously inclined materialists hear about the superior pleasures of paradise and develop a desire to be admitted there; accordingly they perform the required rituals to accumulate good merits. However, such position is not permanent, and after exhausting such merits one must take a new birth on the human level of life and engage in pious religious activities again to earn new credits; this applies to everyone, including those who do not believe in reincarnation and have been told that a place in paradise is a permanent settlement. The laws of nature do not stop working for those who do not "believe" in them.

Some of these materialists who believe in reincarnation have heard that the individual soul develops towards perfection through a variety of increasingly evolved bodies, and conclude that liberation (moksha) can be attained only by those who have taken birth in a high family and social position, with a considerable amount of talents, and so on. This is not a fact: any human being can actually attain liberation and perfection simply by taking complete shelter in the Supreme (9.32). Obtaining a human birth (manuṣya janma) is an important turn in a jivatma's evolutionary journey, because the nervous system of the functional human body is complex enough to afford philosophical elaboration and spiritual realization.

The purpose of life is the attainment of spiritual realization, that is also called moksha or liberation from conditionings; in this verse Krishna explains how spiritual realization consists in achieving the proper knowledge - understanding the facts about puruṣa, prakṛti, and the various qualities that constitute Nature. Already in verses 4.37 and 4.38, Krishna had stated, yathaidhamsi samiddho 'gnir bhasma sat kurute 'rjuna, jnanagnih sarva karmani bhasma sat kurute tatha, "O Arjuna, just like the blazing fire turns firewood into ashes, similarly the fire of knowledge turns all karma (reactions to action) into ashes", and na hi jnanena sadrisam pavitram iba vidyate, tat svayam yoga samsiddhah kalenatmani vindati, "In this world there is nothing as pure/ sacred as knowledge. One who achieves perfection in (this) yoga comes to find full happiness in the Self in the course of time."

This knowledge is not merely the accumulation of theoretical data, but truly changes the life of a person: yasya sarve samarambhah kama sankalpa varjitah, jnanagni dagdha karmanam tam ahuh panditam budhah, "Those who are intelligent declare that a truly learned person is one who has left behind all ventures based on the determination for personal sense pleasure and has thus burned all his karma (to ashes) by the fire of knowledge", (4.19). The reason why we keep taking birth in this world is because we still carry unresolved issues, material desires, attachments and identifications, that we could describe collectively as "karmic seeds" because they have been produced by our previous materially motivated actions. However, since material motivation is due to ignorance of the true nature and duty of the soul, all karma can be neutralized by proper knowledge, like seeds burned by fire cannot germinate, so there will be no more rebirth (Mahabharata, Vana parva, 199.107).

The expression vartamanah api means "although situated in the material world", and carries several layers of meanings. It refers to the jivan mukta, who still lives in a material body but does not identify with it: in this sense, it does not really matter which position one holds in the varna and ashrama system, because by definition transcendental consciousness is not limited by a particular material situation. Many people believe that one can attain moksha only by entering the order of sannyasa, while ordinary people, who have a regular job and family responsibilities, are excluded from this possibility, and therefore there is no point for them to make any effort in that direction. This is not a Vedic concept, and it is certainly not supported by Bhagavad gita. Already in verse 3.20, Krishna clearly stated that anyone can be situated in perfection (moksha) even in this life, by applying the science of action: karmanaiwa hi samsiddhim asthita janakadayah, "Janaka and others (like him) became situated in perfection through the performance of activities."

He also said, mam hi partha vyapasritya ye 'pi syuh papa yonayah, striyo vaisyas tatha sudras te 'pi yanti param gatim, "O Arjuna, those who have completely taken shelter in me will attain the supreme destination, even if they were born from impure intercourse, women, business people and traders, or manual workers", (9.32)

In the Maha Upanishad (2.14- 77) we find that when Sukadeva went to visit Janaka, on the advice of his father Vyasa, he found the famous king surrounded by all sorts of sense gratification, but perfectly detached and fully conscious of the transcendental reality. A jivan mukta, a soul that is already liberated even while still living in the material body, can remain in any social position without identifying with it. Krishna Chaitanya said, naham vipro na ca nara patir nabi vaisyo na sudra, naham varni na ca griha patir no vanastho yatir va, "I am not a brahmana, I am not a kshatriya, a vaisya or a sudra, and similarly I am not a brahmachari, a grihastha, a vanaprastha or a sannyasi".

The actual purpose of life consists in attaining liberation from all conditionings and thus overcoming the need to wear a material body. At this point we can really begin to live and act on the transcendental level (brahma bhutah prasannatma na socati na kanksati samah sarvesu bhutesu mad bhaktim labhate param, 18.54) where true bhakti can manifest.

In the preliminary stages of devotion one must acquire sufficient faith (sraddha) to actually abandon all other considerations and seriously engage in the process of vaidhi bhakti (regulated devotional service). Through service to the Supreme, regular association with liberated souls and the study of transcendental knowledge, one can directly experience a glimpse of the spiritual existence (abhasa) and therefore attain the level of nistha (strong belief). The increased enthusiasm and love produce a real taste (ruci) for spiritual life, and this higher taste enables us to become detached (asakti) from material things, as advised in verse 2.59. This is the level of Brahman realization (brahma bhuta) where we are fully satisfied (prasanna atma) with our service and union with the Supreme, and from which we can easily come to realize the presence of the Supreme in all beings as Param Atman (samah sarvesu bhutesu). Only from this level the true sentiments of devotion - bhava and prema - can manifest; before this point, they are simply abhasa rupa, a reflection or shadow of real bhakti.

Therefore we need to seriously engage in the process of anartha nivritti, "dropping whatever is not valuable", or in other words all the manifestations of abankara (material identification) and mamatva (material attachment). One who is still carrying this material luggage will continue to be blinded by selfish desires (kanksati) and suffer for all losses (socati), and to make an egotistic distinction between one's own benefit and the benefit of all beings (sarvesu bhutesu), categorizing others according to the selfish benefit s/he can obtain from them. This attitude will certainly keep the conditioned soul tied to the wheel of reincarnation.

ध्यानेनात्मनि पश्यन्ति केचिदात्मानमात्मना । अन्ये साङ्ख्येन योगेन कर्मयोगेन चापरे ॥ १३-२५ ॥

dhyānenātmani paśyanti kecidātmānamātmanā | anye sāṅkhyena yogena karmayogena cāpare || 13-25 ||

dhyānena: by meditation; atmani: in the self; paśyanti: they see; kecit: some; atmanam: the self; atmana: by the self; anye: others; sāṅkhyena yogena: by the sāṅkhya yoga; karma yogena: by the karma yoga; ca: and; apare: others.

"Some see (all this) in the self through meditation, others by engaging the atman within the atman, and others through the sāṅkhya yoga or the karma yoga."

The special character of Vedic religiosity consists in the personalized approach for progress; anyone can be properly engaged and attain ultimate success simply by expertly utilizing one's guna and karma, the qualities and the activities that have been created by previous impressions (samskaras).

Many people speak about "meditation", but have rather foggy ideas about what exactly this is supposed to mean. Most "yoga practitioners" today believe that meditation is simply about making a deliberate effort to relax, breathe peacefully and forget daily problems - to fight stress, improve physical health, and so on. Of course relaxing and bringing silence in the mind are useful and beneficial practices, but they only serve as a preliminary preparation for real meditation; we could make the example of a man who wants to travel and sits in a vehicle. It is a very good start, but unless we actually get the motor running and drive the car to destination, we are not going anywhere, and we cannot say we have been "traveling".

The first method of realization described in this verse is atma vidya, the realization of the transcendental nature of atman, that is also called brahman realization because the atman is the individual manifestation of brahman. This is called dhyana, "meditation". By true meditation, we actually tap into the universal Consciousness and find sat, eternal existence, cit, complete awareness, and ananda, transcendental happiness. The second method mentioned in the verse is dhyana (meditation) on the atman of the atman, the param atman. The individual Self becomes united with the supreme Self, and this is called yoga ("union"). Both the first and the second method are connected as subsequent steps of the same journey.

The third method is called sāṅkhya yoga, and the fourth method is called karma yoga. Sāṅkhya consists in categorizing the components of reality, specifically distinguishing what is spiritual from what is material. This method is also called jñana yoga, and is based on the study of the shastra; with a sincere practice of the theoretical principles thus learned, the jnani becomes able to drop material identifications and attachments, and therefore attains the transcendental level (7.19). Karma yoga is a faster method, that can be practiced also by those who have relatively less intellectual capacities; by working selflessly and with devotion in the service of God and for the benefit of all creatures, the sadhaka is supported and energized by the positive karmic reactions and quickly attains spiritual realization (9.27).

However, we should not think that these methods are separated from each other. Krishna has told us already in 3.3 and 5.4 that the two roads of Sankhya and Karma are actually one only; theory and practice must work side by side, just like knowledge (jnana) and renunciation (vairagya). When our learning does not become practical application, it remains useless, as in the case of those medical doctors who warn people about the dangers of smoking cigarettes but are unable to drop the bad habit themselves. Similarly, work without knowledge cannot bring proper fruits, as even the best intentions will fail to help us because we will commit a lot of mistakes. Philosophy without application becomes dry arrogance and cruelty, while religious dedication without philosophy becomes fanatical bigotry and dangerous sentimentality.

The key to success is the proper study of Transcendence and a sincere commitment to its pursuit, leaving behind all other considerations: our intelligence should be totally focused on the goal, and not dispersed in many other concerns (2.41). This intensity, this dedication, is called bhakti, and it burns like the fire of passion that we experience in this material world - but while material passion burns our intelligence and good sense (2.62-63, 3.39), the fire of bhakti burns all anarthas and karmic reactions (4.18-20). In fact, this fire of bhakti is the source of all blessings for those who are filled with material desires, for those who desire liberation, and for those who are already free from all desires, as confirmed in Bhagavata Purana 2.3.10: akama sarva kamo va moksa kama udara dbih, tivrena bhakti yogena yajeta purusam param.

A true devotee is anxious to learn about God and his instructions, and while s/he resides in this material world, s/he wants to understand how things work here, so that s/he will be able to offer them or engage them in divine service. Pure love is the best motivation, because it is free from selfishness, and therefore it constitutes the fundamental factor in all the paths of Yoga. At the conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.55) Krishna will say: bhaktya mam abhijanati javan yas casmi tattvatah, tato mam tattvato jnatva visate tad anantaram, "One can know me truly only by bhakti, and by this realization one enters Eternity". The Bhagavata Purana (11.14.21) confirms in the teachings given by Krishna to Uddhava: bhaktiyaham ekaya grahyah sraddhayaatma priyah satam, bhaktibh punati man nistha sva pakan api sambharat, "I can be attained through pure bhakti and full faith. I am the atman, dear to the good people (sat jana), and such bhakti in full dedication purifies anyone, even dog eaters".

Again in Bhagavata Purana (11.20.6) Krishna confirms the unity of the three methods: yogas trayo maya prokta nrinam sreyo vidhistsaya jnanam karma ca bhaktis ca nopayo 'nyo 'sti kutracit, "I have described (these) three yogas because I wish that human beings could attain perfection. These are jnana, karma and bhakti: there is no other way."

अन्ये त्वेवमजानन्तः श्रुत्वान्येभ्य उपासते । तेऽपि चातितरन्त्येव मृत्युं श्रुतिपरायणाः ॥ १३-२६ ॥

anye tvevamajānantaḥ śrutvānyebhya upāsatē | te'pi cātitarantyeva mṛtyuṁ śrutiparāyaṇāḥ || 13-26 ||

anye: others; tu: but; evam: in this way; ajanantah: who do not know; srutva: by hearing; anyebhya: from others; upasate: worship/ approach; te: they; api: although; ca: and; atitaranti: go beyond/ transcend; eva: certainly; mṛtyum: death; śruti parayanah: dedicated to hearing/ to the scriptures.

"Others still, who do not have sufficient knowledge, worship because they learn from others; they also overcome death because they are dedicated to learning from the scriptures."

The previous verse used the word pasyanti ("they actually see") because the direct meditation and engagement in Transcendence is the prescribed method to attain Self realization. However, it may take many lifetimes for a conditioned soul to attain that level and truly engage in yoga (manusyanam sahasresu kascid yatati siddhaye, yatatam api siddhanam kascin mam vetti tattvatah, 7.3, bahunam janmanam ante jnanavan mam prapadyate, vasudevah sarvam iti sa mahatma su durlabhabh, 7.9).

In the early stages of spiritual development, when we are still ignorant (ajanantah), we engage indirectly in the process by attaching ourselves to the association of the tattva darshis (4.34): tad viddhi pranipatena pariprasenena sevaya, upadeksyanti te jnanam jnaninas tattva darsinah, "You should learn this (knowledge) by approaching those who directly contemplate the Truth, asking them many questions and offering them service. Those who have the knowledge will initiate you (into this science)."

This initiation or beginning of the spiritual evolution is based on sincerely listening (śruti parayana) to shastra, guru and sadhus. "Listening" is different from "hearing": the act of listening implies a certain degree of attention and an effort to understand the meaning of what one hears. Sometimes people who were born into a traditional religious family simply sit through the recitation of spiritual discourses without making any real effort at understanding and realizing what is discussed; this is also a beneficial practice but the effects will be very limited - as a hungry man cannot get real nourishment simply by smearing the food over his closed mouth. We need to actually open our minds and hearts to the transcendental knowledge with full attention, not only by listening but also by repeating and remembering (śravaṇam, kīrtanam, smaranam). This absorption of the knowledge of Transcendence must also be accompanied by sincere service (pada sevnam and vandanam, as well as pranipatena sevaya), that constitutes the requirement of vairagya - abandoning one's attachments and identifications by simply becoming a servant of Yoga.

This is called worship, arcanam. The true meaning of worship is not tied to ritualistic ceremonies, but consists in selfless service to the object of our love and dedication. Some people are confused because they believe that "worship" constitutes a sort of acknowledgment of the absolutely (and exclusively) supremely divine position of the object of our worship, and especially in the case of abrahamic ideologies, this concept creates a mental friction, because it is believed that "worship" should only be applied to one specific personal manifestation of God. Of course each abrahamic group fights the others over this issue.

In the abrahamic perspective, such "worship" is filled with fear and is based on a pact of exclusive allegiance and blind obedience, in recognition and acceptance of the immense, exclusive and absolute power of the Divinity that is worshiped. Even if the concept of love is introduced in such religious contemplation, it remains unable to really connect the devotee and the Divinity, because it believes that a human being can never attain God but must only pay homage from a distance.

The Vedic concept is quite different. Since God is Consciousness, present in the hearts of all beings, and manifests in innumerable forms, the concept of "worship" is translated on a much more familiar and loving level. It applies to all the various forms of the one Godhead and even to its representatives and glorious creations, which constitute the expression of God's nature and concerns. When a Hindu "worships" a cow or a banyan tree, or his own parents or even a guest, s/he is expressing love, appreciation, admiration, consideration, respect, gratitude, towards a manifestation of the goodness of the Divine, that is offering him/ her an opportunity to reciprocate the blessings s/he has received.

Of course the concept of "worship" is associated with the concept of "religion" or "faith", but there are many levels of such function of consciousness. Later in the text of Bhagavad gita Krishna will explain about the three types of faith and religion (chapter 17, sraddha traya vibhaga yoga), showing that not all religious people obtain the same results. Those who practice religion without properly following the transcendental science remain bound to the material tendencies called gunas, explained in detail in chapters 14 and 16 (guna traya vibhaga yoga and daivasura sampad vibhaga yoga), and obtain results accordingly. The different forms of religiousness depend on the level of proper knowledge and personal evolution; all human beings have a natural tendency to religion, as religion (from the Latin word religare, "to connect") connects the individual with the greater existence in which s/he lives, and manifests in some expression of respect or worship offered to this greater existence. This natural tendency of the human being stems directly from the spiritual intelligence that is spontaneously present in everyone and is variously known as "the voice of conscience", "sense of ethics", "good sense" and so on, and that Vedic scriptures call sanatana dharma. This sanatana dharma, or eternal and universal sense of religion, is the primeval origin of all religious faiths.

Worship (upasana) is synonymous with respect and service; so when a human being perceives and acknowledges the greater existence and offers respect and service to it, this is called religion. This greater existence can be one's family or tribe or even the entire universe: the connection and dedication to its service in positive harmony - that we call religion - is the true source of satisfaction for the soul. The greater satisfaction and benefit is obtained when worship is offered in virtue and purity (sattva), while the presence of greed (rajas) and ignorance (tamas) will create negative side effects that can even destroy the benefits completely. This is suggested in this verse by the reference to death (mrityum), that is not the physical death of the body but the spiritual death of the soul who sinks deeper and deeper into the regions of ignorance (16.19-20). The only hope to escape from this disastrous course is to obtain the knowledge of the scriptures, the smṛiti (16.24), first by listening from the realized souls and then studying it directly.

In all cultural traditions we will find individuals who practice religion. Even atheists worship Reason and Logic, and recognize the intrinsic value of ethics and conscience, and of working for the benefit of the entire society or universe. The real problem is when a cultural tradition is hijacked by individuals who are motivated by ignorance and material greed, and consequently the spontaneous and natural religious tendencies of the people are directed towards evil and destructive beliefs and practices, characteristic of the asuras. This is exactly the opposite of what a tattva darshi does to engage rajasic and tamasic people in a progressive method of worship; the religious teachers must always be situated in genuine transcendental realization, in order to properly direct all levels of people. When the "religious authority" lacks this realization or is actually a victim of greed and ignorance, even sincere and intelligent followers become corrupted and fall on the asuric level of life, because we develop the same qualities of the object of our worship.

This verse offers us the fundamental point of religion, that can liberate us from death: learning from genuine scriptures and from qualified teachers and realized devotees. Everything else is just laukika sraddha, or "popular belief", that cannot give good results and in same case could even be disastrous.

यावत्सञ्जायते किञ्चित्सत्त्वं स्थावरजङ्गमम् । क्षेत्रक्षेत्रज्ञसंयोगात्तद्विद्धि भरतर्षभ ॥ १३-२७ ॥

yāvatsañjāyate kiñcitsattvaṁ sthāvarajaṅgamam | kṣetrakṣetrājñasamyogāttadviddhi bharatarṣabha || 13-27 ||

yavat: whatever; sanjayate: comes into being; kinchit: anything; sattvam: sattva/ existence; sthavara: non moving; jangamam: moving; ksetra: the field; ksetra jna: the knower of the field; samyogat: through the union/ connection; tat: that; viddhi: you should know; bharata rshabha: o best of the descendants of Bharata.

"O descendant of Bharata, you should know that whatever comes to being, moving or non moving, is generated by the union between the field and the knower of the field.

After describing the knowledge of the scriptures, Krishna again repeats its sum and substance: whatever exists is generated or manifested by the union of the prakṛiti and the purusha - the two components of the Supreme Brahman - both at the spiritual level and at the material level. We remember how this point was highlighted in the catuh sloka, the four central verses of the Bhagavata Purana (2.9.33-36), from aham evasam evagre to yat syat sarvatra sarvada.

All we can see, and therefore all that can be the natural object of our worship, is fundamentally God - sattvam, Existence itself. The unlimited manifestation of the spiritual worlds and all the powerful manifestations in these material worlds are simply the shakti, or energies, or powers, of the supreme Existence, and we become better able to realize this eternal existence of suddha sattva when we situate ourselves in sattva or goodness by following the scientific method of Yoga.

According to our level of realization or sva bhava (personal nature or personal sentiments) we will connect with the Supreme through an experience of union (yoga, religion) that is the powerful source of bliss and satisfaction. At the most primitive level, this union between the purusha and the prakriti is attained through the physical union of the male and female energies within the material body - the fundamental pure sexual act that offers momentary freedom from the limitations of egotism and a glimpse of the ecstatic experience. This primordial union is sacred, as Krishna clearly states in 7.11, and it is found at the highest level of consciousness at the level of madhurya rasa bhakti in the ecstatic union of the soul (as prakriti) with God (as purusha).

Unfortunately, the understanding of this fundamental principle has been desecrated by asuric ideologies based on rajas (greed) that disregard the very concept of dharma (ethical principles) and - even worse - by those based on tamas (ignorance) that have consistently presented dharma as adharma, and adharma as dharma (18.30-32). The resulting contamination has created extreme confusion (ajananam) and great sufferings for everyone, and the only medicine consists in proper knowledge and understanding (sruti parayanam) to transcend gross material identification (atitaranti mrtum).

In this verse, the word sattvam refers to the supreme Existence as well as to its various manifestations, as in "beings", "situations", and "objects" - all permanent and temporary, moving and non-moving on different levels of meaning. At the grossest level, this "moving and non-moving" refers to the various species of life, from the minerals to the plants, to the animals, to human being and even to highest residents of the heavenly planets, but at the subtlest level it refers to the constant transformation of all things and circumstances, that engages the soul in its evolutionary journey in a vast array of experiences.

The samyoga (union) between kshetra and kshetrajna is therefore meant for our evolution and progress, carrying us from the material level to the spiritual level, from ignorance to the light, from death to immortality - tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrtyor ma amritam gamaya (Bṛhad aranyaka Upanishad, 1.3.28). This is represented in the previous verse by the word atitaranti ("they go beyond").

समं सर्वेषु भूतेषु तिष्ठन्तं परमेश्वरम् ।

विनश्यत्स्वविनश्यन्तं यः पश्यति स पश्यति ॥ १३-२८ ॥

samam sarveṣu bhūteṣu tiṣṭhantaṁ paramaśvaram | vinaśyatsvavinaśyantaṁ yaḥ paśyati sa paśyati || 13-28 ||

samam: equally; sarvesu bhutesu: in all beings; tiṣṭhantaṁ: residing; parama isvaram: the supreme Lord; vinaśyatsu: in things that will be destroyed; avinaśyantaṁ: in things that will not be destroyed; yaḥ: s/he; paśyati: sees; sah: s/he; paśyati: (really) sees.

"The supreme Lord equally resides in all beings, in those that will be destroyed and in those that will not be destroyed. One who sees this, is actually seeing.

Krishna is leading us to the conclusion of this very important chapter, discussing the simultaneous difference and non-difference of the Purusha and the Prakriti. We have seen in 2.16-17 that matter and spirit are characterized respectively by destruction and non-destruction (nasato vidyate bhavo nabbavo vidyate satah), and that spirit can never be destroyed (avinasi tu tad viddhi). This spirit is the Consciousness that pervades all things (sarvam idam tatam); the individual spiritual fragments are the atman, and the sum total of all consciousness is the brahman. There is no difference in quality between the atman and the brahman - in fact they are one and the same - but there is a difference in quantity or vastity of such consciousness. This understanding will enable us to assimilate, realize and practice all the teachings of Vedic scriptures. The distinction between spirit and matter is useful in the beginning of our study; however, as the student progresses and becomes more capable of understanding the subject, the vision deepens and expands, removing the support walls that were used to learn to stand up. This is not a contradiction at all.

We could make the example of mathematics: in the beginning we are taught that a greater number cannot be subtracted from a smaller number - you need to have 4 apples in your basket, in order to remove 3 apples and find that only 1 apple is left. However, when we have advanced past this elementary level, we discover that we actually could subtract a greater number from a smaller number: this is called algebra, and can be explained by the example of "borrowing more apples" from someone else and thereby incurring a debt or calculating a negative number. So there is no contradiction in the two apparently opposite statements.

When we have realized that God is Consciousness and Existence, the distinction between the personal subject of the consciousness and the manifestation of such thoughts becomes less important; this applies on the three levels of Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan as well. At the Brahman level, the mahat tattva is also consciousness because it constitutes the blue print information (i.e. knowledge) of the sum total of reality in the world. At the level of Paramatma, Isvara is present both in the hearts of the individual jiva atmans and in the hearts of each and every single atom of matter, and even in between such atoms. At the level of Bhagavan, the consciousness of God is lovingly focused on all creatures and creations, to manifest and support their maintenance and progress and reciprocate their devotion.

An important word here is samam, placed in the position of honor at the beginning of this verse and the subsequent one. The Supreme Lord is situated in all beings and situations (sarvesu bhutesu) in the same manner; he does not make any discrimination about the material position or body of the various beings, or even about their guna and karma. This is why a realized soul is equally well disposed towards everyone, and has no prejudice at all, and especially does not mistreat anyone.

The Vedic tradition and Bhagavad gita do not condemn, despise or demonize material nature - bodies and objects and resources - as some other ideologies do. On the contrary, we celebrate the beauty of Mother Nature and rejoice in healthy pleasures and joys, while still remembering that they are temporary and limited.

In this verse, the word paśyati is particularly important and is repeated twice at the end. It was used in the same way in previous verses, for example in verses 5.5 and 6.30. Vedic knowledge gives great importance to direct personal verification and realization, and does not rely on blind faith and allegiance, therefore it accepts the validity of different darśhanas ("perspectives") of the same One Reality. However, we should not think that such an open-minded approach means that we can give the same value to all opinions, including the whimsical speculations of ignorant people. There is a stark difference between a particular perspective (or angle of vision) of reality and a distorted hallucination, projection or fantasy.

It is therefore imperative that we follow the expert guidance of realized teachers and systematically clean our minds from the contamination of ignorance, so we will become able to truly see things as they are and not as we imagine them to be.

समं पश्यन्हि सर्वत्र समवस्थितमीश्वरम् । न हिनस्त्यात्मनात्मानं ततो याति परां गतिम् ॥ १३-२९ ॥

samaṁ paśyanhi sarvatra samavasthitamīśvaram | na hinastyātmanātmānaṁ tato yāti parāṁ gatim || 13-29 ||

samaṁ: equally; paśyan: seeing; hi: indeed; sarvatra: everywhere; sama vasthitam: equally situated; īśvaram: the Lord; na: not; hinasti: becomes diminished/ degraded; ātmana: by oneself; ātmanam: the self; tataḥ: then; yāti: attains; param gatim: the supreme destination.

"One who sees the Lord as equally situated everywhere never becomes degraded/ by being controlled by his/ her mind / by engaging the self in the self, s/he ultimately attains the supreme destination.

In this verse, the expression ātmana ātmanam can be interpreted in two ways, because our mind and identification can either degrade or elevate us, based on the choices we make in regard of consciousness. This was already explained very well in verse 6.5: uddhared ātmanātmanam natmanam avasādayet, atmaiva hy ātmano bandhur atmaiva ripur ātmanah, "One should raise him/ herself by his/ her own effort, and not degrade him/ herself. Certainly one should be one's own friend, and one can be one's own enemy as well."

Therefore the two possible translations of this verse are:

- "One who sees the Lord as equally situated everywhere never becomes degraded by being controlled by his/ her mind and ultimately attains the supreme destination" and
- "One who sees the Lord as equally situated everywhere never becomes degraded, and by engaging the self in the self, s/he ultimately attains the supreme destination."

In both cases, the one key factor to ensure our elevation rather than degradation is being able to see God in everything - every creature, every object, every place, every situation.

A tattva darshi, or rishi ("one who sees") cannot remain confused, because s/he has directly experienced the luminous view of Reality. It is not simply a matter of faith, that can be lost along the way. Once you have really tasted the honey, there will be no more space for doubts in your mind regarding the meaning of the word "sweet".

How to recognize a true tattva darshi from an ordinary non-realized person? It is actually very simple: the answer is presented again and again in Bhagavad gita and all the other scriptures.

When someone has actually seen the presence of the Supreme Being and Consciousness in every creature, there is no more partiality or identification based on superficial and external differences, such as bodily identification. Material bodily identification is the root of all ignorance, and the cause of all sufferings.

All the negative qualities experienced by human beings - fear, hatred, lust, cruelty, as well as greed for power, possession and domination - automatically disappear when we overcome the delusion of the identification with the temporary material body and the attachment to temporary material things. Make a list of all the crimes, injustices and horrors that have ever plagued human society, and you will find that they are all based on the delusion of separation of interests calculated in terms of identification with the material body.

For a realized soul, every situation offers an opportunity to be in contact with God - the Supreme Consciousness - through an act of sincere service. Anything and anyone can be engaged, either by our associating or dissociating with it, by treasuring or discarding it, by consuming or non consuming it. We need to remember that action is constituted not only by the physical performance of some movement of the body and the senses, but also by the engagement of the mind and even by the deliberate choice of abstaining from a particular act. This was already explained in verses 4.16-18.

With this deeper awareness and motivation, a person never becomes destroyed or degraded (na hinasti) even in the most unfavorable situations including the death of the body. All these can be used as opportunities rather than problems, although of course we should not go around searching for trouble or expect never to feel pain or loss. Degradation or contamination does not depend on external factors, but on one's mind. External contamination is something temporary and can be removed easily with a bath and other purification methods, as long as the mind and consciousness are pure. On the other hand, when we allow our mind and consciousness to become polluted by making the wrong choices, we become really degraded.

प्रकृत्यैव च कर्माणि क्रियमाणानि सर्वशः । यः पश्यति तथात्मानमकर्तारं स पश्यति ॥ १३-३० ॥

prakṛtyaiva ca karmāṇi kriyamāṇāni sarvaśaḥ | yaḥ paśyati tathātmanamakartāraṁ sa paśyati || 13-30 ||

prakṛitya: by the prakṛiti; eva: certainly; ca: and; karmani: the activities; kriyamānani: are performed; sarvasaḥ: in all situations; yah: one who; paśyati: sees; tatha: also; atmanam: the self; akartaram: who is not the doer; saḥ: s/he; paśyati: sees.

"One who sees that all the activities, under all circumstances, are performed by the Prakṛiti, and that the Atman is not the doer, really sees.

Contamination by external circumstances normally happens through the physiological functions of the body and the contact with matter, as explained in verses 5.8-10. The acts of seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, moving around, dreaming, breathing (and other prana functions, such as sneezing etc), talking, evacuating, absorbing, opening and closing one's eyes (as in falling asleep and waking up) are associated with some type of contamination, and this is why we must bathe regularly.

One of the basic religious requirements or duties for human beings consists in washing at least once a day, and keeping oneself as clean as possible in regard to body (internally and externally), food, clothing, living quarters, etc. This is the most elementary difference between civilized people (aryas) and non-civilized people (anaryas). Of course true cleanliness also extends to the mind and consciousness, and as we purify ourselves from the contamination of material identifications and attachments, we can truly develop and attain perfection. This is the meaning of the realization described in this verse, as well as in verses 5.10 and 3.27. Only matter (gross matter like the body and subtle matter like the mind) can become dirty or contaminated; the atman, the purusha, the original consciousness, is always pure. It is like the sun, that can temporarily be clouded by ignorance, but is never really affected. The root itself of ignorance and stupidity is the ahankara, the material identification that binds us to the performance of material activities. As Krishna as clearly stated in verse 3.27: prakṛiteḥ kriyamāṇāni guṇaiḥ karmani sarvasaḥ, ahankara vimudhatma kartāham iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing this'."

When our ignorance is dispelled by transcendental knowledge, we can see the distinction (vibhaga) between ourselves (as purusha) and the material energy (as prakṛiti) that constitutes our bodies, senses and minds, as well as the objects of our senses. Therefore verse 5.9 explained that a self realized person (a sthitha prajna) knows that the senses naturally engage in the sense objects but does not identify with them. In this way s/he is never affected by material activities, just like a lotus leaf is never affected by water (5.10).

A greater degree of contamination is brought about by the fundamental sufferings we encounter in the normal cycles of life - birth, death, old age and disease - and also in situations where we are forced to suffer humiliation or insult, or even to perform actions that are contrary to our desires and intentions. The same considerations apply here, too. Only the external surface - body and senses - can be contaminated in such circumstances, and the person who is able to remain detached from all such actions (5.11) is always pure, like the lotus flower is always fresh, sweetly scented and perfectly clean in spite of its growing out of dirty mud and standing there all the time.

Since all external activities are performed by the senses in connection with the sense objects, and the sthitha prajna knows that his/her own identity is not affected by them, s/he is not the karta ("doer") but rather the akarta ("non-doer") as explained in this verse. A clear awareness (paśyati, "truly sees") is based on this point specifically; the atman is never really the "doer" or the "enjoyer", and as soon as s/he actually realizes this truth, s/he becomes free from karma.

Of course this does not mean that we should not strive to focus our consciousness or awareness in the proper modes (gunas) of prakṛiti - so that prakṛiti (our mind, senses and body) will function in such a way that our consciousness is purified and not degraded. The next chapters will elaborate extensively on this important point. On the transcendental level of akarma, the atman participates of the supreme Consciousness of Brahman: Krishna used this definition of akarta to design himself in verse 4.13, to state that he is never affected by any material contamination, or touched by action or by the consequences of action (5.12). This instruction reconnects the thread of discussion with the original question asked by Arjuna in verse 2.54: sthitha prajñasya ka bhasa samadhi sthitya keshava, sthitha dhīḥ kim prabhaseta kim asita vrajeta kim, "O Keshava, a person who is firmly established in the consciousness of meditation is said to be in samadhi. How does he speak, and what does he say? How does he move, and how does he stay?"

At that time Krishna answered:

prajahati yada kaman sarvan partha mano gatan, atmany evatmana tustah sthitha prajnas tadocyate, "O Partha, when someone gives up attachment towards all the desires that flow into the mind, and remains satisfied in the atman, he is said to be firmly situated in the correct understanding" (2.55), dubkhesu anudvigna manah sukhesu vigata sprihah, vita raga bhaya krodhah sthitha dhīr munir ucyate, "A person whose mind is not distracted by sufferings or joys and remains detached, free from attraction, fear and anger, is called a Muni who is able to maintain a steadfast meditation" (2.56).

We may remember here that the word muni is a synonym for rishi, as one who truly sees Reality as it is becomes liberated from material distractions, attachments and identifications.

यदा भूतपृथग्भावमेकस्थमनुपश्यति ।

तत एव च विस्तारं ब्रह्म सम्पद्यते तदा ॥ १३-३१ ॥

yadā bhūtapṛthagbhāvamēkasthāmanupaśyati | tata eva ca vistāraṁ brahma sampadyate tadā || 13-31 ||

yada: when; bhuta: of the beings; pṛthak bhavam: the separation happens; eka stham: situated in one; anupaśyati: becomes trained to see; tata eva: there after; ca: and; vistaram: the development; brahma: Brahman; sampadyate: attains the position; tada: at that time.

"When one becomes trained to see all beings as situated in one, even when they are separated, and (how all this) is developed, s/he attains the position of Brahman.

This is the conclusion of the chapter that explains the simultaneous oneness and difference of the purusha and the prakriti. The sthitā prajna clearly sees this difference through the proper use of viveka (discriminating intelligence) but at the same time sees that everything that exists is part of the great Plan, conceived and manifested by the great Intelligence or Consciousness.

Brahman is the name by which Vedic scriptures call this great Consciousness - in which we participate to a greater degree and with greater happiness when our tiny awareness (anu atman) is not confused by material identifications based on duality and separation. This "unitarian field" of consciousness is also being discovered by the most cutting edge advanced physicists.

A wise person (pandita) sees with equal friendliness the brahmana who is learned and gentle, the cow and the elephant, as well as the dog and the uncivilized people (vidya vinaya sampanne brahmane gavi hastini, suni caiva sva pake ca panditah sama darsinah, 5.18). Of course the specific behavior of each individual must be taken into proper consideration, but that only refers to their particular prakritik nature and not to their intrinsic being (atman), that is spiritual and constitutes an integral part of the cosmic Consciousness (Brahman).

On the Brahman level (brahma bhuta) there is no separation of existence between the various beings, therefore a yogi who has attained that level is always a well-wisher of all beings, and never mistreats anyone, or envies anyone, or tries to exploit anyone. Only on this level one can truly engage in devotional service (bhakti), as Krishna will clearly state in verse 18.54: brahma bhuta prasannaatma ma socati na kankshati, samah sarvesu bhutesu mad bhaktim labhate param.

The word vistara used in this verse means "manifestation", as in "development" or "transformation" or "differentiation", and applies to the creation of temporary forms and activities, intended for a specific function in time and space.

In chapter 10 we have seen Arjuna asking Krishna what is the specific meditation by which we should remember God (katham vidyam aham yogims tvam sada paricintayan, kesu kesu ca bhavesu cintyo 'si bhagavan maya, 10.17) and Krishna replied with the vision of the Virata rupa. This means that we certainly can and should meditate on God by perceiving his presence in the universal manifestation and in all beings and things, that are produced by the union of the purusha and the prakriti (13.27). We do not need to reject material nature, but simply perceive it in relation to spirit; this requires some training or practice, but such pure and focused vision is the only way to overcome ignorance and remain on the liberated level.

अनादित्वान्निर्गुणत्वात्परमात्मायमव्ययः ।

शरीरस्थोऽपि कौन्तेय न करोति न लिप्यते ॥ १३-३२ ॥

anāditvānnirguṇatvātparamātmāyamavyayaḥ | śarīrastho'pi kaunteya na karoti na lipyate || 13-32 ||

anaditvat: because it has no beginning; nirgunatvat: because it is not subject to the gunas; parama atma: the supreme Self; ayam: this; avyayah: imperishable; sarira sthah: that is residing in the body; api: although; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; na karoti: does not act; na lipyate: is not affected (by the action).

"O son of Kunti, this Paramatma resides in the body but has no beginning and is not subject to the gunas. He is imperishable, he does not act and he is not affected by the action.

Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan are the same Tat or tattva perceived in different degrees (Bhagavata purana, 1.2.11), so whenever we speak of one of these three perceptions, we indicate Tat, the supreme Reality. This supreme Reality has no beginning, because it is always existing (sat); eternal existence is its defining characteristic together with cit (consciousness) and ananda (happiness). It is not produced by some evolutionary process, or created by something else.

This same eternal Consciousness resides in each body as the Soul of the soul (param atma), from whom the individual soul (anu atma, jiva atma) emanates and by whom it is supported and guided. Under his authority, the jiva atma connects with action, either through spiritual energy (para prakriti) or material energy (apara prakriti) constituted by the gunas (qualities) - respectively sat, cit, ananda and tamas, rajas, sattva.

Between this pure supreme Consciousness that is never touched by action and the individual embodied consciousness that engages in action there is an intermediate concept of identity or "I-ness" that we call Shiva tattva or Sankarshana (a name that literally means "attraction"). It is an extremely subtle existence, that is simultaneously transcendent and immanent, eternal and non-eternal, because it becomes manifest and non-manifest in the various cycles of creation although it is always existing.

This Sadashiva appears in the material universe as param atma to generate all beings and enable them to act, and as param guru to guide them. He is the Father of everyone, and attracts everyone towards either the spiritual consciousness or the material consciousness (as each individual being chooses), therefore he is the all-auspicious giver of all blessings. However, he himself is never touched by any action (na karoti na lipyate) and gives the same power to a pure jiva that attained the realization of his Consciousness by dropping all false identification and attachments. For this reason, it is said that Shiva controls the ahankara, and operates the mode of destruction; when the individual soul faces such destruction willingly or unwillingly, respectively elevation or degradation ensue, with consequent liberation or bondage. When we purify our identification by establishing it on the spiritual level, following the example of the greatest Yogi and Guru, Shiva Mahadeva, we enter a higher level of consciousness that is described as "shivo 'ham" ("I am Shiva").

Of course the jivatman will never be able to become the totality of Shiva (Sadashiva, who is none other than Vishnu), but will act like Shiva in the same nature of Consciousness. The name Shiva literally means "auspicious", and indicates that particular expression of Consciousness that out of compassion (karuna) manifests in this world for the benefit of all beings. Therefore, the embodied jivatman can aggregate his/her tiny consciousness to the supreme Consciousness of the compassionate Isvara, and act in this world for the benefit of all beings - this is, in a nutshell, the entire meaning of the instructions of Bhagavad gita.

Sincerely working for the benefit of all beings is called selflessness - and this is the key to understand how to destroy the material ignorance of ahankara and mamatva. These two roots of material samskara are very difficult to eliminate, because they easily creep into all gunas, including the noble sattva, expanding selfishness from the core of the individual being to the circle of family, community, society, or species. We can recognize them because they are inevitably based on duality and separation of interests as in sectarianism, racism, and in all forms of prejudice or discrimination based on material identification and attachment.

Shiva Mahadeva offers us the medicine in the form of renunciation (tyaga) based on knowledge (jnana), which destroys the attachment and identification with such temporary objects and positions. This does not mean that we should formally accept the social position of sannyasa, because that would just be another material identification and attachment. Krishna has already explained (6.1) that real renunciation has nothing to do with the externals, but is a level of consciousness in which one works selflessly and dutifully for the benefit of all beings: anasritah karma phalam karyam karma karoti yah, sa sannyasi ca yogi ca na niragnir na cakriyah.

A sannyasi can give up ordinary work and rituals only to engage more fully and deeply in the active work for the benefit of all beings, and has totally given up all identifications and attachments. Unfortunately, in Kali yuga we see many fake sannyasis and sadhus who are very much attached to separatist identification and exploitation of others, even to a greater extent than ordinary people. As explained in Bhagavata purana, this happens because among the general ignorance rampant in society, a degraded fool is accepted as a brahmana simply because he is wearing a thread (viprathe sutram eva hi, 12.2.3), or as a scholar simply because he is quick with words (panditye capalam vacah, 12.2.4). In the same way, any degraded person is accepted as sannyasi or brahmachari simply by external distinctive clothing (lingam evasrama khyatah, 12.2.4), and an arrogant hypocrite will be accepted as a sadhu simply because of his amassed wealth and number of followers, while a humble spiritualist who does not pursue a political career or accumulate money and properties will be considered merely an ordinary person (anadhyataiva asadbhute sadbhute dambha eva tu, 12.2.5).

Consequently, ignorance will be reinforced because such fake gurus and sadhus are not capable or interested to properly guide spiritual seekers, but are very anxious to procure the support and friendship of famous and wealthy people. So dharma and religious devotion will be honored superficially only for the sake of obtaining personal fame (yaso 'rthe dharma sevnam, 12.2.6) either individual or collective, and the sacredness of a tirtha will depend on how far one will travel to reach there (dure vary ayanam tirtham, 12.2.6) and thus on how much good business local people can do by exploiting the tourists.

यथा सर्वगतं सौक्ष्म्यादाकाशं नोपलिप्यते । सर्वत्रावस्थितो देहे तथात्मा नोपलिप्यते ॥ १३-३३ ॥

yathā sarvagatam saukṣmyādākāśam nopalipyate | sarvatrāvasthito dehe tathātmā nopalipyate || 13-33 ||

yatha: as; sarva gatam: all pervading; sauksmyat: because of the quality of subtleness; akasa: space; na upalipyate: is not affected; sarvatra: everywhere; avasthitah: situated; dehe: in the body; tatha: similarly; atma: the self; na upalipyate: is not affected.

"Just like space is present everywhere but is not affected by anything because of its subtlety, similarly the Atman is not affected even while residing in the body.

Both param atman and atman have the same transcendental nature, comparable to the sun or the space in relation with atmospheric elements. We can understand that the sun always remains untouched and unaffected by any cloud or darkness, and similarly space (akasa) is present everywhere unaffected and untouched by the presence of material objects - gross or subtle - that occupy a specific position in the universe. As in this verse, we can also make the example of an earthen pot - a layer of clay that appears to enclose a portion of space. If we move the pot in another position, the space previously enclosed by it remains free from all relation with the pot, and has not been changed in any way either by its presence or absence. Space supports and enables the existence of all objects, but exists independently and cannot be destroyed; it is therefore the closest example to Atman that we can perceive in this world.

In ancient time, physics and metaphysics were considered two sides of the same universal science, and people were better equipped to study and understand subtle concepts such as space - that cannot be seen or touched or smelled or tasted. Unfortunately a few centuries ago there was a fracture caused by the spreading and establishment of intolerant and dogmatic ideologies, that systematically enforced blind belief in theories presenting them as absolute and indisputable facts, to be accepted as articles of faith. Such a stupid approach undermined the proper use of intelligence and the subtle faculties of the mind, and the popular mentality dropped to the grossest level of "tangible" reality and practice as opposed to "abstract" theory. Furthermore, since such ideologies violently rejected the intrinsic value of nature and natural forces, the healthy pleasures that support life and the wholesome respect for creation became demonized and persecuted. However, as denial and repression cannot solve any problem (3.33), the natural needs of human beings that were pushed back crept up in distorted and perverted ways, loaded with suffering and guilt and fear and hatred, and creating an artificial and hypocritical condition based on ignorance.

Today our task is to reverse this pathological process, allowing the collective mind of human society to heal and recover. Vedic knowledge is the greatest medicine for this cure, because it still contains the active principles of the original pure science.

यथा प्रकाशयत्येकः कृत्स्नं लोकमिमं रविः । क्षेत्रं क्षेत्री तथा कृत्स्नं प्रकाशयति भारत ॥ १३-३४ ॥

"O Bharata, just like the Sun illuminates all this world, in the same way the kshetri illuminates the entire kshetra.

Some people may have problems in understanding the nature of space, because it is so subtle and cannot be experienced through the material senses of the gross body. Yet space, or ether, can be studied scientifically as the support of light and radio waves, and the substratum of magnetic fields. In any case, everybody knows what the Sun is. Even blind people can feel its power in the form of heat, so we can safely use this example to elaborate on the scientific study of the power of the Sun. The energy of the Sun emanates from the Sun and pervades all the universe and all bodies, even when we are not able to see or perceive it.

All forms of matter are transformations of energy, and all energy is a transformation of the primordial energy of solar fusion. It is only by the sunlight that plants grow and produce wood and coal and petrol (hydro carbons) as well as the grains (carbohydrates) that we eat to produce the cells of our bodies. Furthermore, the heat of the sun rays evaporates water from the surface of the planet, creating clouds and rain. Finally, the power of the mass of the Sun creates the planetary movements by which Earth revolves, and we experience the darkness of the night. In its essential form, the Sun is omnipresent and omnipotent, supporting the existence and development of all beings.

Katha Upanishad (2.2.11) also explains: surjo yatha sarva lokasya caksur na lipyate caksusaur bahya dosaih, ekas tatha sarva bhutantaratma na lipyate loka duhkbena bahyah, "The sun, that can be described as the eye of all beings (as it enables all eyes to function by perceiving light) does not become affected by the defects in our eye or the defects in what is perceived by that eye. In the same way, the one param atman is not subject to the happiness or misery of anybody, even though he is situated in all beings."

क्षेत्रक्षेत्रज्ञयोरेवमन्तरं ज्ञानचक्षुषा । भूतप्रकृतिमोक्षं च ये विदुर्यान्ति ते परम् ॥ १३-३५ ॥

kṣetrakṣetrājñayorevamantarā jñānacakṣuṣā । bhūtaprakṛtimokṣam ca ye viduryānti te param ॥ 13-35 ॥

"Those who contemplate the kshetra and the kshetra jna and the difference between the two, and how to attain liberation through/ from the nature of existence, will reach the Supreme."

The power of true knowledge is the key to liberation and perfection of life. Bhagavad gita is the best study guide to such knowledge, and leads us from the basic understanding of spirit and matter, to the art of action in spiritual consciousness. This knowledge is directly experienced (pasanti) by those who learn to use the eyes of intelligence and knowledge (jnana caksu) rather than their physical eyes that can easily be misled by external appearances and cannot see beyond them. By this deep vision we become able to really contemplate the nature of all beings, that is transcendental and eternal.

Liberation is attained in stages. The first stage is the search for knowledge (jnana), that gives a meaning and a purpose to life, then comes the realization (viduh) that finally puts everything in the proper perspective and shows us the great Picture. This usually happens after many lifetimes (7.18) of sincere search, that starts from the deliberate choice of understanding the eternal Reality (athato brahma jijnasa, Vedanta sutra, 1.1.1). However, such vision does not exclude the knowledge of prakriti - material as well as spiritual - and this will be the subject of the last chapters of Bhagavad gita.

As Krishna has explained repeatedly, actions are performed by nature through the effect of the gunas; the individual soul (jiva atman) can only choose to focus on which modality s/he wants to function. We can choose to contemplate spiritual nature (para prakriti) or if we are not yet able to do that, we can learn how to use the material gunas in such a way that we can elevate ourselves rather than degrade ourselves. The subject of the gunas is gradually introduced in an increasingly stronger way, because the knowledge of the gunas is the key factor that will enable us to remain on the liberated level (brahma bhuta) even while still living in this body and in this world. And this is of paramount importance.

Some deluded ignorant fools believe that a conditioned soul can automatically attain liberation at the time of death, provided s/he has pledged allegiance or dedication to a particular Deity. This is not confirmed in any genuine Vedic teaching, and those who choose to blindly rely on such sectarian allegiance will have to face serious problems in the future. It is true that God comes to the rescue of his true devotee, but such devotion must be sincere and supported by honest work and a serious effort to attain self-realization. One cannot delegate one's own self-realization to others - guru, sanga or even ista deva. Each one of us must deliberately abandon all false identifications and attachments, and constantly practice the proper meditation on the Supreme Consciousness. There are no shortcuts, no free tickets, no cutting corners. If one claims to be a devotee of Krishna, s/he must sincerely study and understand and practice Krishna's instructions as revealed in Bhagavad gita. Krishna will guide us, but he will not do our work for us.

Why Bhagavad gita was spoken? To encourage Arjuna to engage in his proper duty. Arjuna realized that Krishna was the supreme Brahman and pledged his devotion to him, but Krishna did not exempt him from performing his duties on the battlefield. Our purpose should be to serve God for the benefit of all, not to try to use God for our own myopic selfish advantage.

Chapter 14: Guna traya vibhaga yoga

The yoga of differentiating between the gunas

At the beginning of his instructions, in chapter 2, Krishna had focused on explaining the difference between the atman (spirit, or consciousness) and the body (matter, or material nature). Then in verse 7.5 he stated that besides material nature (apara prakriti) there is a spiritual nature (para prakriti): apareyam itas tv anyam prakritim viddhi me param, jiva bbutam maha babo yayedam dharyate jagat, "O Arjuna, know that besides this inferior prakriti there is also another, a higher one - the living beings by which the universe is upheld."

In chapter 13, Krishna had wonderfully presented the nature (prakriti) of consciousness (purusha), to help us understand how the two factors are simultaneously One and distinct from each other, and together they constitute the supreme Brahman.

Interestingly, in that context Krishna has not drawn a clear divisive line between spiritual nature and material nature, but has taken us to the higher level where material nature is perceived as that very same spiritual nature when she manifests in the material world. By defining this mahat tattva as Brahman (13.13, 20, confirmed more explicitly in 14.3 and 14.4, and in Mundaka Upanishad 1.1.9, tasmad etad brahma nama rupam annam ca jayate, "from this Brahman names, forms and matter become generated") and by recommending the contemplation of the Godhead as the Virata rupa (10.17), Bhagavad gita is introducing us to the transcendental dimension where we attain the same sentiment (bhava) of the Supreme. Interestingly, the word bhava also translates as "nature" (8.3, 8.6, 10.17, 17.16) indicating the mode of consciousness in which one deliberately focuses with full awareness. And of course, this word is amply used in the context of bhakti literature to indicate a state of ecstatic spiritual consciousness.

Isvara - the Lord - is characterized by the fact that he is not controlled by the gunas, but he rather controls them and therefore he is transcendental to them. The jivatman is a fragment, limb or cell (amsa, 15.7) of the Lord and as such s/he is also transcendental to the material gunas, and certainly s/he can learn how to control them and use them exactly like the Lord does - in other words, use them in the devotional service to the Lord by removing the "separatist" (dualistic) mentality that shows a difference of interests between the jivatman and the Lord. Like every healthy cell or limb in our body, each jivatman still retains a certain degree of individuality (name, different function etc) but its consciousness is solely directed to the service of the entire body and the highest consciousness in it. This concept is beautifully simple, yet immensely profound and containing the key to liberation from all conditionings, as Krishna himself stated very clearly in the previous chapter (13.24): ya evam vetti purusam prakritim ca gunaih saba, sarvatha vartamano 'pi na sa bhuyo 'bhijayate, "One who knows the Purusha and the Prakriti, as well as the various ways of the gunas, will not take another birth, irrespective of his/ her situation".

So, this chapter 14 is a manual on the modifications of the gunas and how to use them - the greatest knowledge (14.1). The subject will be elaborated again in chapters 16, 17 and 18, to the very conclusion of Bhagavad gita.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

परं भूयः प्रवक्ष्यामि ज्ञानानां ज्ञानमुत्तमम् ।

यज्ज्ञात्वा मुनयः सर्वे परां सिद्धिमितो गताः ॥ १४-१ ॥

param bhūyaḥ pravakṣyāmi jñānānāṁ jñānamuttamam । yajjñātvā munayaḥ sarve parāṁ siddhimito gatāḥ ॥ 14-1 ॥

sri bhagavan uvaca: the wonderful Lord said; param: transcendental/ supreme; bhuyah: again; pravakṣyami: I will tell; jnananam: of all sciences; jnanam: the knowledge; uttamam: supreme; yat: which; jnatva: knowing; munayah: the great sages; sarve: all; param: highest; siddhim: perfection; itah: from here; gatah: went/ attained.

The wonderful Lord said, "I will tell you again about this supreme knowledge among all sciences. Through this knowledge, all the great sages have attained the supreme perfection/ of transcendental realization from this world.

The first word in the verse, in the position of honor, is param, "the Supreme", "the Transcendental", and refers to the higher level of knowledge where we are able to see everything in God and God in everything.

Krishna says, bhuyah ("again, further"), because he had already explained this highest knowledge (jnanam uttamam) at the beginning of chapter 9:

raja vidya raja guhyam pavitram idam uttamam, pratyaksavagamam dharmyam su sukham kartum anyayam, "This is the king among all sciences, the king among all secrets, the highest purifier. It is known through direct experience, it is dharmic, it is joyful to practice and it is imperishable" (9.2), maya tatam idam sarvam jagad anyakta murtina, mat sthani sarva bhutani na caham tesv avasthitah, "All this universe is pervaded by me in my non-manifested form. All beings exist in me, but I am not in them" (9.4), na mat sthani bhutani pasya me yogam aisvaram, bhuta bhrin na ca bhuta stho mamatma bhuta bhavanah, "(At the same time) the beings are not in me. See my divine yoga! I contain all existences, but I am not contained in the various beings, although I am myself the creation of all beings" (9.5).

Some people underestimate the knowledge of the gunas in the dangerously false notion that one "automatically transcends them" simply by pledging allegiance and service to God and his priests, but this is not confirmed in Bhagavad gita or in any other Vedic text. The damage caused by such ignorant and deluded persons is immense, because they continue to indulge in abominable activities and in a degraded form of consciousness (called asuric as we will see in chapter 16) and at the same time they demand to be worshiped as God (as his direct representatives). Such a behavior would not even be acceptable in God himself, as Krishna has clearly stated (3.22-25), what to speak of individual souls.

Only those who have completely abandoned illegitimate actions (tv anta gatam papam, 7.27) can attain the spiritual level; therefore we need to seriously study the science of action (chapter 3) and the science of the modes of nature (chapter 14) in order to remain firmly on the correct path.

All the great sages (munayah sarve) have walked this road, and thus they attained the highest perfection (param siddhim gatah), consisting in full freedom from the bondage of rebirth (na sa bhuyo 'bhijayate, 13.24). Nobody is exempt from this requirement, because action is inevitable: na hi kascit ksanam api jatu tisthaty akarma krit, karyate hy avasah karma sarvah prakriti jair gunaih, "Never, at any time, can one remain without acting even for a moment, because s/he is forced into action by all the gunas born from prakriti" (3.5).

Not even the "transcendental devotees and stalwart sannyasis" are exempt: sadrisam cestate svasyah prakriter jnanavan api, prakritim yanti bhutani nigrahah kim karisyati, "Even a person who has the proper knowledge must engage in actions according to his own nature. All embodied beings must follow their nature: what can abstention accomplish?" (3.33), and na karmanam anarambhan naiskarmyam puruso 'snute, na ca sannyasanad eva siddhim samadbigacchati, "A person cannot achieve freedom from karma by abstaining from action, just like perfection cannot be achieved simply through sannyasa" (3.4).

As explained clearly, the only solution consists in performing all work as sacred action: yajnarthat karmano 'nyatra loko 'yam karma bandhanah, tad artham karma kaunteya mukta sangah samacara, "Actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage and further actions. Therefore, o son of Kunti, you should perform your activities for that purpose of sacrifice, remaining free from attachment" (3.9).

This sacred action is always based on correct knowledge, because without the correct knowledge even the most complicated and impressive rituals remain useless (17.5-6, 17.13). The only true ingredient of all yajnas is the awareness of knowledge: with that proper consciousness, even the smallest and ordinary daily activities become the highest acts of worship. Verse 9.27 clearly stated: yat karosi yad asnasi yaj jubosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kuruva mad arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me."

As we will see in this chapter, awareness of knowledge is the most important characteristic of sattva guna - the quality of goodness, that illuminates and guides us in the proper direction.

The last section of the verse is also very interesting, and presents several important words: munayah, param, siddhim, itah, gatah.

The definition muni ("silent") refers to the serious effort in spiritual practice, by which one drops all other concerns and interests that are generated from the mundane identifications and attachments (2.56). When a sadbaka is fully immersed in divine consciousness, s/he does not talk much about useless trifles such as gossiping and political games. Of course this does not mean that s/he is not aware of the reality around him/ her or that s/he is not trying to help others to direct their activities in a positive and proactive way for the spiritual and material benefit of society and the universe in general. A true sadbaka continues to perform his/ her work in the world, which includes offering good advice and coaching sincere persons in their progress, but is able to understand when and where and how to invest his/ her energies and speech power.

The word sarve ("all") clearly indicates that this is a very scientific process, that can be experienced and duplicated by anyone by following the exact method. Some ignorant fools have been duped into believing that one can add the word "yoga" to any ordinary activity and that will be just as authoritative as the genuine original instructions by Krishna and the great Rishis. So they arrogantly claim they are engaged in hasa yoga ("the yoga of laughing") or khana yoga ("the yoga of eating" as in restaurants), or nidra yoga ("the yoga of sleeping"). And when questioned about the authenticity of such fancy fantasies, they get angry and accuse us of being "dogmatic". But what will be the result of such "yogas"? Certainly not the same result attained by the munis and yogis who scientifically applied the actual original method; this is also confirmed in verse 16.23.

The expression param siddhim is very interesting, because it can be interpreted at different levels. Param means "supreme" as well as "transcendental", while siddhim means "perfection" and it also indicates the mystic powers acquired through yoga. Consequently, this verse offers a sort of catalogue of all the blessings one can attain through the supreme knowledge (jnanam uttamam) taught by Krishna - benefits that go from the grossest material platform of increasing one's charisma and mundane success to the highest level of transcendental realization and pure love for God in full Krishna Consciousness. This ultimate goal is indicated by the word itah, "from here", indicating a guaranteed progress from the level of human life (atbatah brahma jijnasa, Vedanta sutra, 1.1.1) or this material world.

The word gatah ("gone") states that such progress is eternal and imperishable, and that once the muni has attained any true level of spiritual realization, s/he does not fall back again (2.40, 4.9, 4.35, 6.30, 6.40-45, 8.15, 8.21, 13.24, 15.6).

इदं ज्ञानमुपाश्रित्य मम साधर्म्यमागताः । सर्गेऽपि नोपजायन्ते प्रलये न व्यथन्ति च ॥ १४-२ ॥

idam jñānamupāśritya mama sādharmaṃyāmagatāḥ | sarge'pi nopajāyante pralaye na vyathanti ca || 14-2 ||

idam: this; jnanam: knowledge; upasritya: taking shelter into; mama: my; sa dharma: the same dharma; agatah: having attained; sarge: in the creation; api: even; na upajayante: they do not take birth; pralaye: in the annihilation; na vyathanti: they are not shaken; ca: and.

"Those who take shelter in this knowledge attain my same position, and they are not going to take birth in a next creation. They will also remain firmly established even at the time of the dissolution."

Krishna's words carefully maintain the balance of meaning in this verse: on one side, he clearly reminds us that as jivatmans we will never become God directly in the totality of Godhead, but he also declares that we can attain the same dharmic position of God - the same job, so to speak.

The word dharma contains a wealth of meanings, as we have already discussed in previous commentaries. It comes from the verbal root dhri, "to sustain", and defines the positive action that sustains existence. Therefore it can be translated as "nature", "duty", "function", "consciousness", and "position" as well. By applying each of these meanings to the translation of this verse, we obtain an expansion of true meanings.

What is the dharma of Krishna, or Vishnu? Supporting and maintaining the universe in its material and spiritual progress, which includes protecting the good and harmless people and weeding out the evil doers, as well as explaining the principles of ethics and religion (4.8). Therefore sa dharma mama can be translated as "the same supporting nature as me". Other commentators explain that "sa dharma" indicates the particular form of liberation called sarupya mukti, that consists in acquiring a form that is similar to the Lord's. However, since on the spiritual level the consciousness/ sentiment is precisely the form, and the other way around, the ultimate meaning is the same.

At another level, the "dharma of Krishna" is the bhagavata dharma or devotional service to the Supreme, also clearly presented in Bhagavad gita in so many verses; in this sense the word dharma here can be equated with bhava, in the sense of ecstatic love for God. We can easily see that there is no difference between these two levels of understanding, because devotional service is essentially about serving God and his mission, in whatever position or activity Bhagavan will present us from time to time.

This path absolutely requires upasritya, "taking shelter", the humility and spirit of selfless service and dedication to the Supreme. Krishna had already explained this point several times (3.30, 4.10, 7.14, 7.29, 9.13, 9.32) and will explain it again as the supreme conclusion of Bhagava gita (18.55, 18.57, 18.66). The jivatman can never be the totality of God, and therefore it needs to always "dovetail" itself to the Supreme Consciousness through the Supreme Shakti. To do this, one must be totally free from envy (anasuya, 3.31, 4.22, 9.1, 12.13, 16.18, 18.66, 18.71), towards the Lord or even towards the jivatmans, who are amsas of the Lord.

The second part of the verse applies both to the creation and dissolution of the universe and to the creation and dissolution of the individual body, as well as the beginning and end of the various experiences and circumstances that one comes to face in life. Accordingly, it refers to the liberated souls who take birth as shaktyavesa avatars to assist the Lord in his missions as well as to the jivan mukta sadhakas who have attained the full spiritual realization while still living in a material body. Both categories of liberated souls are never shaken by external circumstances or difficulties because they are fully conscious of God's plan. For such liberated souls there is no more birth, even if they incarnate in this world for a spiritual mission.

मम योनिर्महद् ब्रह्म तस्मिन्गर्भां दधाम्यहम् । सम्भवः सर्वभूतानां ततो भवति भारत ॥ १४-३ ॥

mama yonirmahad brahma tasmingarbhāṃ dadhāmyaham | sambhavaḥ sarvabhūtānām tato bhavati bhārata || 14-3 ||

mama: my; yonih: matrix; mahat: the great; brahma: Brahman; tasmin: in that; garbham: embryo; dadhāmi: I give; aham: I; sambhavaḥ: birth/ possibility; sarva: all; bhutanam: beings; tatah: thereafter; bhavati: becomes; bharata: o descendant of Bharata.

"O descendant of Bharata, the mahat tattva is my matrix, in which I create the embryo of creation from which all beings/ situation subsequently manifest."

Brahman is the complete Reality, the One that contains everything and in which all dualities are reconciled. Therefore, it includes both the male and female aspects, as illustrated by the famous symbolic concept of ardhanarisvara, "the Lord that is half woman".

Here Krishna says, mama yonih ("my womb", "my uterus") to indicate his female nature, and garbham dadami ("I give the embryo") to indicate his male nature. Male and female are two halves of the same One Reality. Since the microcosm represented in the human body reflects the macrocosm of the Universal Form, our own brain and nervous system consists of two symmetric halves - the left and right hemispheres and their particular wiring. The Tradition of Hatha yoga or Kriya yoga is precisely about approaching Self realization from this angle of uniting the male and female energies within one human body in the Divine Wedding, and this primordial concept was found in many other ancient cultures at global level.

When we say that we can never separate Isvara from Shakti, we are stating a much deeper truth than usually people can understand. It is not on the same level as the foolish delusional promises of young inexperienced lovers who swear "never to leave each other", because that feeling is merely a dim reflection of the true light of the Self that eternally resides within each and every one of us. The Truth is that God is simultaneously Isvara and Shakti - and we, as God's amsas or limbs/ cells, are also simultaneously purusha and prakriti - male and female.

According to a particular set of karmic seeds and desires, each individual develops more female or male chromosomes and therefore is born either with a vagina or a penis, but in every male body there is a tiny vagina (the opening of the penis tip) and in every female body there is tiny penis (the clitoris) and testicles that are nested up into the body (the ovaries). Every male has a certain amount of female energy and tendencies, and every female has a certain amount of male energy and tendencies. In rigid societies, the gender role is enforced on the basis of typical dress and hair style, and characteristic behaviors that emphasize logic in males and emotion in females.

In Vedic society, such differences are not enforced but accommodated in all possible variations, even to the recognition of the legitimacy of the tritiya prakriti, or "third nature", of those individuals whose bodies or even minds do not fit in the ordinary male-female categorization. Even more importantly, Vedic culture is designed to lead each and every individual to the level of personal integration of both energies in a blissful balance and harmony; such position is highly respected not only at the spiritual level (where it is recognized as the purpose of yoga) but also at the material level. An individual who has attained this sacred Union of the male and female energies in his/ her own body and mind is considered an auspicious character from whom we can receive blessings because of the absence of lust (the greed to possess and exploit) in his/ her mind and body. This is also the position of Isvara/ Shakti, whose union is constant and full of grace and bliss like a cosmic Dance.

This garbha ("embryo") mentioned by Krishna in the verse is hiranya garbha, the "golden seed" of the universe, also called brahmanda (brahma anda, "the egg of Brahman" or "the egg of Brahma" from which Brahma is born) worshiped by the ancient religions in the Mediterranean region. The mystic knowledge of ancient Egypt, Greece and Canaan was focused on the Cosmic Egg or Typhon's Egg, from whom Phanes - the personification of "revelation" (in Greek, phanes literally means "revelation" as in theophany or epiphany) also identified with Mitra or the Sun was born. Modern physicists, too, have reached the same conclusion about the origin of the universe and express it in very similar way; they say that before the Big Bang the universe was one vast body containing all the universal mass - a Cosmic Egg or Cosm-Egg for short. This "Son" was also at the center of worship in ancient religions, together with the cosmic Mother and Father, in the fundamental Holy Triad from which the concept of Trinity was copied. We find Vedic confirmation in the Jagannatha Tradition; the middle figure in the Triad is sometimes identified as Brahma, and not only as Lakshmi or Subhadra. In this perspective, when the Triad is seen as Vishnu, Shiva and Shakti it symbolizes the first manifestation of Brahman (Vishnu who is avyakta) that "becomes distinct" as Shiva and Shakti. When the Triad is seen as Shiva, Kali and Brahma, it symbolizes the second creation by which Isvara/ Shakti manifests as Time (Kala/ Kali) to give birth to Brahma, the first created being and the architect of the universe. These subjects will be amply elaborated in the Puranas and especially in the Bhagavata Purana, that describes both the primary and the secondary creations.

In this verse, Krishna clearly states that the mahat tattva is Brahman (mahat brahma). This was already hinted in the previous chapter (13.13), where it was said that the supreme Brahman is neither sat or asat, because it is both sat and asat - that is including cause and effect, eternal and temporary, spiritual and material, and male and female. Verse 13.20 again highlighted this supreme and eternal Unity of Brahman as Purusha and Prakriti at the same time: prakritim purusam caiva viddhy anadi ubhav api, vikarams ca gunams caiva viddhi prakriti sambhavan, "You should know that Prakriti and Purusha are both eternal, and that their transformations and qualities are born from the Prakriti."

The Mundaka Upanishad also confirms: tasmad etad brahma nama rupam annam ca jayate, "then this Brahman gives birth to names, forms and gross matter" (1.1.9), which are the basic components of the living beings and the life circumstances as well.

सर्वयोनिषु कौन्तेय मूर्तयः सम्भवन्ति याः । तासां ब्रह्म महद्योनिरहं बीजप्रदः पिता ॥ १४-४ ॥

sarvayoniṣu kaunteya mūrtayaḥ sambhavanti yāḥ | tāsāṁ brahma mahadyoniraham bijapradah pita || 14-4 ||

sarva yonisu: in all matrices; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; murtayah: the forms; sambhavanti: become manifested; yah: that; tasam: all of them; brahma: the Brahman; mahat: the Great; yonih: Matrix; aham: I; bija: the seed; pradah: who gives; pita: the father.

'In whatever form of matrix they appear, all beings are children of the supreme Mother and I am the Father, who gives the seed.'

The mahat brahma has now distinguished itself into the two halves - Mother and Father - with two different functions: awareness and activity. Perfect success can only be attained when both energies are well balanced and work together in harmony. In the same way, we can attain the transcendental level of bhakti only when we sincerely worship both halves of the Godhead, each one of them helping us to receive the blessings of the other half. This is also the meaning of the famous Hare Krishna mantra, where the Triad of Jagannatha is contained in all its manifestations as Krishna, Rama and Hare or Hara. It works at the transcendental level, where the bhakti lata bija ("the seed of the plant of devotion") is given by Consciousness (rasa) as the Father, and the nourishment and development is given by the activities of devotional service as the Mother. Therefore Krishna Consciousness is meaningless without the service of Radha o Bhakti. It works at the sadhana level, where the seed of spiritual desire is given by the Sat Guru as the Father, and the nourishment and development is given by the constant study of the Vedas and the practice of thier teachings (vidya) as the Mother. It also works at the material level, where the genetic blueprint (Consciousness/ Knowledge/ Father) unites with the materials supplied by the matrix (amniotic fluid/ hormones etc/ Mother) to develop and grow. It even works in the non-mammal animal species and plants, where the seed of life as DNA unites with the "nourishment material" represented by the egg or by the flesh of the seed or fruit in which it grows - that is also a sort of yonī.

Because Isvara/ Shakti is the Father/ Mother of all living beings, a person who is on the level of divine consciousness will not be envious or hostile to any other being, but will rather consider everyone as brother/ sister.

This verse contains the most powerful statement to the effect that the Mother Goddess is Brahman in this world (brahma mahad yonī) and not the submissive servant-wife as she has been portrayed increasingly often under the patriarchal abrahamic influence that percolated in Hinduism in the past centuries due to the degradation of Kali yuga. In the original Vedic vision, still reflected in the iconography that was depicted in the period preceding the first abrahamic invasions and dominations, Isvara and Shakti are on the same level and of the same stature, and equally bless their devotees. In those depictions, Shakti (in all her forms, as Lakshmi, Durga, etc) does not wear a sari and does not cover her head in "shyness", but she rather reveals her beautiful body decorated with rich ornaments but very little clothing. She either sits or stands alone, sometimes next to Isvara, but she does not kneel or sit at his feet massaging or worshipping them.

The overpowering patriarchal influence that was imposed on Indian society from the 7th century onwards seeped into the Hindu mind contaminating it with an increasing tendency to misogyny; this disease weakened the shakti ("power") of Indian culture and society, both at individual and collective levels. An increasingly male-dominated society inevitably becomes unstable emotionally because of the imbalance between the two primeval forces, and the ensuing discomfort creates in everyone (including the males) a sort of subconscious anger and frustration that is vented over the incarnations of the female energy - women, nature, bodies, cows, Mother Earth, water, healthy pleasures, love, knowledge and happiness.

This pathological degeneration triggers a vicious circle that ultimately produces a sheepish mentality in the general population, dramatically lowering their self-esteem and making them easier to be controlled and exploited. In such a scenario, self-affirmation is left to petty and mean methods or dirty tricks, such as betrayal and hidden revenge, that are characteristic of weak and powerless people.

We need to understand that in the early stages of every individual's existence - during pregnancy and for a few years after birth - the child does not consider him/her self as a separate identity from his/ her mother's. The child's self esteem totally depends on the image of the mother, and his/ her future character is shaped by the concept his/ her mother has of herself and by the attitude that others show towards her. A mother that does not consider herself as worthy or deserving respect and affection, or capable of taking decisions and directing her own life, or qualified enough to independently engage in the pursuit of knowledge, prosperity and happiness will inevitably produce children who are unable to properly function as individuals or as a community. Such persons are easily dominated and exploited by ruthless rulers and "leaders" just like their mothers were dominated and exploited by ruthless husbands and "family elders".

सत्त्वं रजस्तम इति गुणाः प्रकृतिसम्भवाः । निबध्नन्ति महाबाहो देहे देहिनमव्ययम् ॥ १४-५ ॥

sattvaṁ rajastama iti guṇāḥ prakṛtisambhavāḥ | nibadhnanti mahābāho dehe dehinaṁavyayam || 14-5 ||

sattvam: sattva; rajah: rajas; tamah: tamas; iti: like this; gunah: the gunas; prakriti: (from the prakriti); sambhavah: manifested; nibadhnanti: bind; maha baho: o mighty armed one; dehe: in the body; dehinam: of the embodied (beings); avyayam: eternal.

"Sattva, rajas, tamas: these are the gunas manifested by the prakriti. O mighty armed (Arjuna), these (gunas) bind the eternal soul to the body.

We enter here in the specific description of the three modalities of material nature called gunas. The word literally means "qualities" or also "ropes", as they cause conditioning or "binding" (nibadhnanti) when we are overpowered by illusion, but they can also be used to climb out of the trap when we know how to handle them properly. All embodied beings (dehinam) are subject to these gunas, from the highest to the lowest species of life in the universe, as Krishna will confirm in the last chapter: na tad asti prithivyaṁ va divi devesu va punah, sattvaṁ prakṛitiṁ jair muktam yad ebhīḥ syāt tribhir guṇaiḥ, "There is not even one single person, either in this world or in the world of the Devas, who is free from the influence of the three gunas created by the prakriti" (18.40).

The embodied soul (dehi) who is conditioned by material identifications and attachments (ahankara-mamatva) is hopelessly bound by these ropes, that tend to reinforce such conditionings in an apparently endless cycle, as confirmed in the Bhagavata Purana: sa esa yarhi prakṛiter guṇesṁ abhivisajjate, ahankriya vimudhatma kartasmity abhimanyate, "Absorbed in the gunas of nature, the atma is confused by ahankara" and tena samsara padavim avaso 'bhyety anirvritah, prasangikaib karma dosaib sad asan misra yonisu, "By revolving helplessly in the situations of the samsara, he obtains the mixture of good and bad results of his previous activities, in different species of life" (3.27.2-3). Kapila elaborates in detail on this science: evam parabhidhyanena kartritvam prakriteh puman, karmasu kriyamanesu gunair atmani manyate, "So by false identification, the purusha becomes convinced that he is the doer, and applies to himself the actions performed by the gunas" and tad asya samsritir bandhab, para tantryam ca tat keritam, bhavaty akartur isasya, saksino nirvritatmanah, "That misconception creates the bondage to the samsara, by which the soul loses all independence - although the soul is the witness, untouched by any action, independent and free from attachment to action." (3.26.6-7). This samsara manifests as the cycle of births and deaths, that is totally centered on bodily identification, as illustrated by the couple of words deba-dehinam. So how can we become free from the cycle of samsara? Not by our own individual power, because the jivatma's power is pathetically insufficient to fight against the Mother Goddess. But we can establish our consciousness in the Supreme Consciousness: daivi hy esa guna mayi mama maya duratyaya, mam eva ye prapadyante mayam etam taranti te, "This divine energy of mine, manifesting as the three gunas, is very difficult to overcome, but those who take shelter in me can cross over this magic" (7.14).

This "taking shelter" (upasritya, 14.2) does not equate to the blind sectarian allegiance and obedience preached by abrahamic ideologies. It is rather the rising of our awareness to a divine level, in which we act as Isvara: selflessly - that is, without the clouds of duality that constitute selfishness. There is no selfishness at the divine level, because Bhagavan includes the consciousness or awareness of all beings and existences. By taking shelter in this awareness or knowledge (idam jnanam upasritya, 14.2), we rise above the play of the material gunas and become able to utilize them rather than being helplessly dragged around by them.

The Bhagavata Purana confirms: sattvam rajas tama iti prakriter gunas tair, yuktaib parah purusa eka ibasya dhatte, sthity adaye bari virinci hareti samjnah, sreyaṁsi tatra khalu sattva tanor nrinam syuh, "Sattva, rajas, tamas are the qualities of nature; in their contact, the transcendental purusha, although one, accepts the forms of Hari, Brahma and Hara, for the maintenance of the universe. Of these, the personified form of sattva can bestow the greater benefit to human beings" (1.2.23).

It is important to understand that Bhagavan (the Supreme Purusha) is always perfectly situated in Consciousness and is detached from the activities, that only pertain to Prakriti (spiritual and material); the material gunas are created by prakriti from a state of balance. This is also explained in Krishna's instructions to Uddhava: prakritir guna samyam vai, prakriter natmano gunah, sattvam rajas tama iti, sthity utpatty anta hetavah, "Nature consists of the balance of the gunas, but the nature of the atman is not subject to the gunas. However, (the gunas called) sattvam, rajas and tamas are the cause of the maintenance, creation and destruction" (11.22.12).

तत्र सत्त्वं निर्मलत्वात्प्रकाशकमनामयम् । सुखसङ्गेन बध्नाति ज्ञानसङ्गेन चानघ ॥ १४-६ ॥

tatra sattvaṁ nirmalatvātprakāśakamanāmayam | sukhasaṅgena badhnāti jñānasaṅgena cānagha || 14-6 ||

tatra: there; sattvam: sattva; nir malatvat: purity; prakasakam: illumination; anamayam: freedom from defects; sukha: happiness; sangena: by the contact; badhnati: binds; jnana: knowledge; sangena: by the contact; ca: and; anagha: o sinless one.

"O sinless (Arjuna), among these, the contact with sattva through association binds to purity, illumination, freedom from defects, happiness, and knowledge.

The word sattva develops from the root sat, meaning "existence, reality, goodness, permanence, truth", but is often translated as "virtue", which is an ambiguous term loaded with semantic distortions that can greatly differ from one culture to the other.

In the Vedic sense, the meaning of "virtue" does not convey any sense of self-righteousness, rigidity or prudery as it usually does in abrahamic-oriented cultures. Rather, "virtue" should be understood here to mean the quality of something that is "good, valuable" in itself. Similarly, the name anagha, by which Krishna addresses Arjuna, should be seen in the true and original Vedic light, that expresses the meaning of "good natured, free from cruelty". This quality of fundamental goodness, that includes compassion and sympathy for all beings, is a most important requisite, and constitutes the application of sattva in the lives of human beings.

The quality of nirmalatvat (purity) is developed by regular association with cleanliness - taking bath daily, wearing clean clothes, eating clean food, living in a clean place and so on. The influence of this purity will reinforce itself and shape our character through habit, becoming our own nature.

The quality defined as prakasakam (enlightenment, illumination) is the clear vision that is developed when all impurities are washed away from the mind. This applies to spiritual realization and the contemplation of transcendental Reality, but also to daily activities and situations, where the habit to cleanliness helps us to remove all unnecessary considerations from our mind.

The quality called anamayam is translated as "calm, serene, without past debts or defects, harmless" and also derives from cleanliness, as we develop the habit of becoming detached from *anartha*s ("things devoid of value") and negative thoughts. This must become a habit because *anartha*s and negativities keep coming in the normal course of life, and we need to learn to drop them as quickly as possible. All these good habits inevitably lead to happiness (sukha), that is also a state of mind and a habit. We should "make up our minds to be happy", in all circumstances, which means always trying to find the positive aspects and accepting even problems as good opportunities to develop and improve.

But all these are ropes, and we must use them, not remain tied by them. Cleanliness is next to godliness and keeps us healthy and comfortable, but being obsessed by cleanliness can become a pathological disorder, and even obstruct our progress and daily functions. For example, we may become unable to get our hands dirty for the purpose of cleaning the floor or our soiled laundry, or we may feel very uncomfortable and unhappy in situations where we cannot avoid sitting in an unkempt public place or walking through some unclean area.

When we climb a mountain or walk through some dangerous place, it is a good idea to tie ourselves to a safety rope, that will protect us from falling down and getting hurt. Sattva is such a rope, and conditions us to those behaviors that we need to develop as habits in our personal evolution. However, even the best safety rope needs a release system, that we can choose to utilize to become free from the harness if need be. Sattva can also become an impediment if we remain unable to rise over it when the situation requires it, especially for the sake of dharma or devotional service.

रजो रागात्मकं विद्धि तृष्णासङ्गसमुद्भवम् । तन्निबध्नाति कौन्तेय कर्मसङ्गेन देहिनम् ॥ १४-७ ॥

rajo rāgātmakam viddhi tṛṣṇāsaṅgasamudbhavam | tannibadhnati kaunteya karmasaṅgena dehinam || 14-7 ||

rajaḥ: rajas; raga atmakam: consisting of attachment; viddhi: you should know; trisna: thirst/ hankering; sanga: the contact; samudbhavam: appeared (from); tat: that; nibadhnati: binds; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; karma: action; sangena: by contact with; dehinam: of the embodied beings.

"O son of Kunti, you should know that the contact with rajas develops attachment and hankering, that bind the embodied beings to action.

Rajas, usually translated as "passion", is the active guna that influences creation and acquisition; it is required to carry sattva from theory into practice in this world, where nobody can even survive without working (3.8). Action is not a bad thing at all, per se. In fact, action is the foundation for yajna and dharma, as we see in chapter 3:

karma brahmdbhavam viddhi brahmaksara samudbhavam, tasmāt sarva gatam brahma nityam yajne pratishṭitam, "Know that work comes from Brahma, and Brahma comes from the Imperishable, therefore the all-pervading Brahman eternally resides in sacred action" (3.15), annad bhavanti bhutani parjanyaḥ anna sambhavaḥ, yajnad bhavati parjanyaḥ yajnad karma samudbhavaḥ, "All creatures come to being thanks to food grains, and food grains come into being thanks to rain. Rain comes thanks to the performance of sacrifice, and sacrifice comes to being through work" (3.14).

The problem is actually ignorance (tamas), by which the conditioned soul is deluded into egotism and selfishness (ahankara-mamatva): prakṛteḥ kriyamanani gunaiḥ karmani sarvasaḥ, ahankara vimudhatma kartāham iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'" (3.27). As long as rajas is engaged, directed and controlled by sattva, everything goes very well. Desires and aspirations (trisna) can become purified and even bring purification to our life: mat karma kṛin mā paramo mad bhaktāḥ sanga varjitāḥ, nirvairāḥ sarva bhūtesu yā sa mā etī paṇḍava, "My devotee is engaged in working for me, and sees me as the supreme reality. S/he has abandoned all association/ affiliation/ identification, and has no enmity towards any being. In this way, my devotee comes to me, o son of Pandu." (11.55).

Because God is the sum total of all beings, the realized souls serve the Supreme by working for the benefit of all: labhante brahma nirvanam risayāḥ kṣina kalmasaḥ, chinna dvaidhā yatatmanāḥ sarva bhūta hite rataḥ, "The wise seers of Reality attain the brahma nirvana because have been purified from all faults and have cut off dualistic illusions, engaging themselves in working for the benefit of all living beings." (5.25) Of course this means that we need to give up raga-dvesa, the duality of selfish attachment and repulsion: vīta raga bhaya krodha mānā māyā mān upasṛitāḥ, bahavo jñāna tapasa putā mad bhavam agatāḥ, "Many who were free from attachment, fear and anger, fully taking shelter in me, have been purified by austerity and knowledge, and attained my realization" (4.10).

It is this detachment from the fruits of activity - not from the activity itself - that leads us to perfection: karmāṇy evadbikarāḥ te mā phaleṣu kadacana, mā karma phala hetur bhur mā te saṅgo 'stī akarmanī, "You certainly have the right to perform actions but never the right to enjoy the fruits of your actions. Do not try to become the cause of the fruits of the action, but do not become attached to inaction." (2.47). This early instruction by Krishna is confirmed in chapter 5: yuktaḥ karma phalam tyaktva santim apnoti naisthikim, ayuktaḥ kama kareṇa phale sakto nibadhyate, "A yogi gives up the results of activity and therefore attains permanent peace. One who is not a yogi becomes tied by the results of the action that s/he desired to obtain through work" (5.12).

The same is true for the various applications of rajas, as in family and society, for this life and the next (drista and adrista). The secret is the scientific knowledge of varnas and ashramas, by which individuals are trained and enabled to perform their duties according to dharma. In this way, even the ordinary daily activities will become bhagavat dharma (14.2): saktaḥ karmāṇy avidvamsō yathā kurvanti bhārata, kuryad vidvams tathasaktas cikīrṣur loka saṅgraham, "O Arjuna, just like the ignorant people who are attached to the results of actions engage in work, a person who has knowledge should work conscientiously but without attachment, for the benefit of people in general" (3.25).

तमस्त्वज्ञानजं विद्धि मोहनं सर्वदेहिनाम् । प्रमादालस्यनिद्राभिस्तन्निबध्नाति भारत ॥ १४-८ ॥

tamastvajñānajaṁ viddhi mohanam sarvadehinām | pramādālasyanidrābhistannibadhnāti bhārata || 14-8 ||

tamaḥ: tamas; tu: but; ajñana jam: born from ignorance; viddhi: you should know; mohanam: confusion; sarva dehinam: of all embodied beings; pramada: madness/ intoxication; alasya: laziness; nidrabhiḥ: excessive sleep; tat: that; nibadhnati: binds; bharata: o descendant of Bharata.

"However, o descendant of Bharata, you should know that tamas causes ignorance and its binding results, such as confusion, madness, laziness and excessive sleep.

Tamas is the modality of nature that obscures knowledge and awareness, and therefore it is usually translated as "ignorance". It is the dark influence that covers the true nature of the being with misconceptions and error - the actual cause of bondage to the selfishness that can damage rajas and the self-righteousness that can damage sattva. Ignorance here does not refer simply to the absence of a particular knowledge or understanding, but defines the stubborn refusal to accept or even contemplate knowledge and understanding. Therefore it has very little to do with the lack of official educational or academic qualifications, and a lot to do with false identifications and attachments (abankara-mamatva).

We have already elaborated on this particular point in our commentaries to verses 13.8 to 13.12 that described true knowledge: amanitvam adambhitvam abimsa ksantir arjavam, acaryopasanam saucam sbairyam atma vinigrabah, indriyarthesu vairagyam anabankara eva ca, janma mrityu jara vyadhi dubkha dosanudarsanam, asaktir anabhisvanga putra dara grihadisu, nityam ca sama cittatvam istanistopapattisu, mayi cananya yogena bhaktir anyabhicarini, vivikta desa sevtram aratir jana samsadi, adhyatma jnana nityatvam tattva jnanartha darsanam, etaj jnanam iti proktam ajnanam yad ato 'nyatha, "Freedom from the desire for honors, lack of arrogance, freedom from hatred, as well as tolerance, simplicity, the act of approaching the acharya, cleanliness, determination, self control, renunciation towards the objects of the senses, freedom from the sense of doership, as well as the clear perception of the inherent sufferings and problems of birth, death, old age and disease, freedom from attachment, detachment from all association including the sense of belonging towards children, wife, home etc, as well as equal attitude when receiving the pleasant and the unpleasant, totally and constantly focusing on me through bhakti yoga, performing service in a solitary place, without attachment for meeting others, the constant awareness of the original soul, the realization of the value of knowledge: all this is called jnana, and anything else is ajna."

Ignorance, ajna, is then defined as illusion or confusion (moha), by which people think they will live forever in the same position or material body and keep their things forever; this causes them to ignore the karmic consequences of their bad actions and neglect. In chapter 9, Krishna had explained these as characteristics of the asuras, the people who have a demoniac mentality: moghasa mogha karmano mogha jnana vicetasah, raksasim asurim caiva prakritim mobhinim sritah, "Entertaining delusional desires, engaging in delusional activities, and delusionally convinced of their knowledge, such people are confused by incorrect awareness, and they certainly take shelter in the bewildering nature of rakshasas and asuras" (9.12). Chapter 16 will elaborate even further on this subject. The association with illusion and confusion (moha) through practice and habit causes the loss of intelligence, defined as pramada, or madness, and a tendency to inertia defined as alasya ("laziness, carelessness, neglect") and nidra ("sleep, forgetfulness, oblivion"). This deadly poison of ignorance contaminates the power of rajas, directing activity towards stupid choices, destructive actions, criminal pursuits, intoxication or various types, and the worst types of selfishness and egotism that do not care for the sufferings of others or even for one's own future sufferings resulting from the consequences of present actions.

Every care must be given to avoid falling into the traps of tamas, because that is the andha kupa (blind well) from which it is almost impossible to escape, and that drags the jivatman down into the lowest levels of existence, into ghostly life, animal life, plant life and mineral life, where there is no choice but one can only bear sufferings for a very long time. This is why Krishna offered us the knowledge of karma yoga, the proper engagement in action, in chapter 3 immediately after clarifying the difference between atman and material body, in chapter 2. The science of action or karma yoga is the easiest approach and can purify and elevate even the most degraded conditioned souls, in the most difficult circumstances where no higher consciousness is possible.

We need to be always be very careful to remain detached from tamas by using rajas under the direction of sattva, until we become able to rise over all the gunas and become established in suddha sattva, the transcendental goodness that is the same position of Isvara or Divine Consciousness: niyatam kuru karma tvam karma jyayo hy akarmanah, sarira yatrapi ca te na prasiddhyed akarmanah, "You should perform the dutiful actions, because action is better than non-action. Without action, it is even impossible to maintain the body, that is the vehicle of the Self" (3.8), and mayi sarvani karmani sanjasyadhyatma cetasa, nirasir nirmamo bbutva yudhyasva vigata jvarah, "You should fight this battle in the consciousness of surrendering all your actions to me, without selfish desires (rajas contaminated by abankara and mamatva) and without lethargy (tamas in full delusion as pramada)" (3.30). We must be very careful because the fundamental ignorance of abankara and mamatva will create confusion also in regard to sattva and dharma: adbharmam dharma iti ya manyate tamasavrita, sarvarthan viparitams ca buddhib sa partha tamasi, "When confused by ignorance, the faculty of understanding will tend to present adharma as dharma, and dharma as adharma" (18.32). This is how nonsensical ideas are created, mistaking tamas for sattva, as in the case of the famous concept of "lazy brahmana".

सत्त्वं सुखे सञ्जयति रजः कर्मणि भारत । ज्ञानमावृत्य तु तमः प्रमादे सञ्जयत्युत ॥ १४-९ ॥

sattvaṁ sukhe sañjayati rajaḥ karmaṇi bhārata । jñānamāvṛtya tu tamaḥ pramāde sañjayatyuta ॥ 14-9 ॥

sattvam: sattva; sukhe: in happiness; sañjayati: binds; rajaḥ: rajas; karmaṇi: in activities; bharata: o descendant of Bharata; janam: knowledge; avṛtya: covering; tu: but; tamaḥ: tamas; pramade: in madness; sañjayati: transforms; uta: it is said.

"O descendant of Bharata, it is said that sattva binds through/to happiness, rajas through/to activities, and tamas transforms into madness.

All three gunas are dangerous, albeit in different measures, and we must always be careful how to handle them properly, without allowing ourselves to be bound by any of them. It is a very subtle science, and we must apply our intelligence to understand it properly.

Sattva - goodness - is the best instrument we can use because purity and knowledge elevate us to higher levels of consciousness, but if we become attached to it through abankara and mamatva, ignorance creeps into the happiness and comfort created by sattva, and we risk sliding into self-complacency, self-righteousness and laziness, something that will certainly put us in the power of tamas. Goodness in itself and for itself, without a higher purpose, turns sour and falls into its opposite, because opposites are closer to each other than sometimes we like to think.

Let's make an example. Taking bath regularly gives us a taste for cleanliness, but if we become complacent and egotistic, believing that we are clean by nature and identification, we might fall into the delusional idea that we do not need to clean the place where we live or even to wash, and we fall pray to tamas. The same trap lays within the love for knowledge created by sattva. If we allow abankara and mamatva to drag us to the level of material identification, we may delude ourselves into thinking that we are entitled to such study and knowledge because of our high birth, and then that our birth itself is the only qualification for such knowledge. At that point, madness has already developed and it will not take long before we come to believe that we do not need to study because we are already knowledgeable - or even authorities on knowledge - by dint of our birth.

The proper use of rajas is to engage our activities to the service of the Supreme through dedication to work that is beneficial for all beings. However, the ignorance produced by abankara and mamatva will harden rajas and bind us to the selfish desire to collect for ourselves the benefit of such work, in the form of enjoyment of wealth, position and power. As a result, we will make selfish choices, and this will create a stronger tendency to selfishness, in a vicious circle. Inevitably, the attachment for the results of our actions will fan a greater desire for sense enjoyment, and on the level of materialistic vision we become confused by that illusion. As Krishna has already explained: dhyayato visayan pumsah sangas tesupajayate, sangat sanjayate kamah kamat krodho 'bhijayate, krodhad bhavati sammohah sammohat smriti vibhramah, smriti bhramasat buddhi naso buddhi nasat pranasyati, "By thinking about the objects of the senses a person associates with them, by association desire develops, and from unfulfilled desire anger arises. Anger becomes confusion, and confusion becomes failing memory. Because of the loss of memory, intelligence is lost, and when intelligence is lost, one falls from his position." (2.62-63)

Tamas is the dull and dense pull of gravity that drags us down, the darkness that covers our vision if we do not keep ourselves active and clear minded by using rajas and sattva in the proper way. The influence of tamas is the most powerful characteristic in the material world, and comes into being already when in the beginning, abankara and mamatva become separated by duality and direct our consciousness away from the Supreme. It is the root of the vicious circle of deaths and rebirths into delusional ventures, of the bad choices that produce bad tendencies by which bad choices will be made again and again: this is expressed by the word sanjayate, generating attachment and conditioning.

To summarize, we can say that sattva brings happiness, rajas keeps us active and tamas makes us helpless; these three qualities are the modes in which our mind can work. It is up to us to control and direct our mind for a higher purpose, powering the vehicle that can carry us through the journey of evolution.

रजस्तमश्चाभिभूय सत्त्वं भवति भारत । रजः सत्त्वं तमश्चैव तमः सत्त्वं रजस्तथा ॥ १४-१० ॥

rajastamaścābhibhūya sattvaṁ bhavati bhārata | rajaḥ sattvaṁ tamaścaiva tamaḥ sattvaṁ rajastathā || 14-10 ||

rajah: rajas; tamah: tamas; ca: and; abhibhūya: overcoming; sattvam: sattva; bhavati: becomes; bharata: o descendant of Bharata; rajah: rajas; sattvam: sattva; tamah: tamas; ca: and; eva: although; tamah: tamas; sattvam: sattva; rajah: rajas; tatha: then.

"O descendant of Bharata, when rajas defeats tamas, it turns into sattva. But when rajas obfuscates sattva, it becomes tamas, and then tamas overpowers sattva and rajas as well.

The three gunas are always in movement, like waves in the ocean, and the predominance of one overcomes the other two, like a strong gust of wind sweeps the waves and a boat from one side to another.

However, there are only two directions - not three - in which we can move: higher or lower. So it is rajas, the power to act and to move, that decides the day: if it supports sattva and accepts to be guided by it through intelligence and pure selfless action in the service of the Supreme, then tamas is defeated permanently, and rajas also transforms into sattva. We then attain the level of pure sattva or visuddha sattva, the vasudeva state, that is the transcendental level from which we do not fall back again. Conversely, if rajas allows itself to be contaminated by tamas in the form of the delusional material identifications and attachments, we go down and remain indefinitely bound by the consequence of our foolish and cruel actions, sinking into the lowest forms of life. Then tamas wins and everything else is lost - hope, joy, knowledge, desires and even the ability to act that would raise us from this living death.

The word abhibhūya in this verse contains the meanings of "overpowering, subduing, covering, over-riding, defeating", and illustrates the dynamics of the transformations of the material world. Krishna has already explained that such power of transformation is divine and cannot be stopped: the only solution is to remain detached from the phantasmagoria of the gunas and their products, and keep our consciousness strongly fixed on the Supreme on the transcendental level. The jivatma is not really acting: prakṛiteḥ kriyamanāni gunaiḥ karmāni sarvasaḥ, abhankara vimudhatma kartāham iti manyate, tattva vit tu maha babo guna karma vibhagayoh, guna gunesu vartanta iti matva na sajate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'. One who knows things as they really are is able to understand the various qualities and activities, and therefore he engages the tendencies in the interaction with the appropriate tendencies: this awareness keeps him free from attachment." (3.27-28).

Krishna has been explaining this from the very beginning: traigunya visaya veda nistraigunyo bhavarjuna, nirdvandvo nitya sattva stho niryoḡa kṣema atmavan, "The Vedas deal with the various manifestations of the three gunas. O Arjuna, you should rather become detached from all these three gunas, and situate yourself in that pure goodness that is not subject to changes. One who knows the atman becomes free from all dualities and finds protection in detachment." (2.45)

We just need to learn to "let go", by finding the real source of happiness: visaya vinivartante nirabarasya debinah, rasa varjam raso 'py asya param drisṭva nivartate, "The embodied soul may keep the sense objects at a distance and reject them, but he can give up the taste for such objects when he finds the Supreme, that is the real taste of happiness." (2.59)

सर्वद्वारेषु देहेऽस्मिन्प्रकाश उपजायते । ज्ञानं यदा तदा विद्याद्विवृद्धं सत्त्वमित्युत ॥ १४-११ ॥

sarvadvāreṣu dehe'sminprakāśa upajāyate | jñānaṁ yadā tadā vidyādvivṛddhaṁ sattvamityuta || 14-11 ||

sarva dvāreṣu: at all the doors; dehe: the body; asmin: this; prakāśa: enlightenment; upajāyate: becomes manifest/ appears; jñānaṁ: knowledge; yadā: when; tadā: then; vidyāt: by (transcendental) knowledge; vivṛddham: increased; sattvam: sattva; iti: thus; uta: it is said.

"It is said that when all the doors of the body are enlightened by the realization of knowledge, then such knowledge increases the power of sattva."

The increase of sattva is a cause and an effect at the same time, therefore we can also translate this verse in the reverse order: "It is said that when the power of sattva increases, all the doors of the body are illuminated by knowledge".

The doors of the body are the 9 openings where the senses or perception and action reside: 2 eyes, 2 ears, 2 nostrils, 1 mouth, 1 genital opening and 1 anus. How can such bodily parts be enlightened by sattva or knowledge? By engaging in the appropriate action, choosing contact with sattvic habits, substances, and actions. This good choice will in turn raise the level of our consciousness and our sense perception will become clearer and liberating.

We should use our eyes to see beautiful, clean, auspicious things, and to direct all our actions in a way that is beneficial to all beings - even to the transcendental and divine level if we contemplate the form of the Personalities of Godhead. Similarly, we should listen to good and beneficial sounds, that direct our actions in the proper engagement and even towards vidyā or transcendental knowledge. The sense of smell can also be engaged in sattva and even in suddha sattva, and so on. The two lower openings of the body should not be neglected either, but they should be kept clean and pure through good habits and by the proper awareness about the true nature of sense objects. This is called prakāśa, illumination or enlightenment.

Here are Krishna's teachings to Uddhava:

yadetarau jayet sattvam, bhasvaram viśadam śivam, tada sukheṇa yujyeta, dharma jñanadibhiḥ puman, "When sattva overcomes the other two (gunas), a person becomes radiant, pure, auspicious, full of happiness and other good qualities" (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.13)

puruṣam sattva samyuktam, anumiyac chamadibhiḥ, kamadibhi rajo yuktam, krodhadyais tamasa yutam, "A person connected with sattva can be recognized by his qualities, such as self control, a person in rajas by lust and so on, and a person in tamas by anger and so on". (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.9)

yada bhajati mām bhaktiṇā, nirapekṣhaḥ śva karmabhiḥ, tam sattva prakṛitiṁ vidyāt, puruṣam striyam eva va, "A person - man or woman - who worships me with devotion, performing their duties without attachment, should be understood as situated in sattva" (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.10)

लोभः प्रवृत्तिरारम्भः कर्मणामशमः स्पृहा । रजस्येतानि जायन्ते विवृद्धे भरतर्षभ ॥ १४-१२ ॥

lobhaḥ pravṛttirārambhaḥ karmaṇāmaśamaḥ spṛhā | rajasyetāni jāyante vivṛddhe bharatarṣabha || 14-12 ||

lobhaḥ: greed; pravṛttih: engagement; arambhaḥ: endeavor/ beginning; karmaṇam: in actions; asamaḥ: uncontrolled; spṛiha: contact; rajas: in rajas; etāni: all these; jāyante: appear; vivṛddhe: when there is an increase; bharata rṣabha: o best among the descendants of Bharata.

"O best among the descendants of Bharata, when the contact with rajas creates a tendency to greed and a lack of control in engaging in activities, then there is an increase in rajas."

As with sattva, also the increase of rajas is a cause and an effect at the same time, therefore we can also translate this verse in the reverse order: "It is said that when the power of rajas increases, there is an increase of greed, and an uncontrolled urge to begin many activities and enterprises."

A passion for action remains pure (i.e. sattvik) as long as we are not attached to the selfish enjoyment of the results of the action: karmaṇy evadbikarāś te mā phaleṣu kādacana, mā karma phala hetur bhur mā te saṅgo 'stv akarmaṇi, "You certainly have the right to perform actions but never the right to enjoy the fruits of your actions. Do not try to become the cause of the fruits of the action, but do not become attached to inaction." (2.47) When there is an increase in rajas without sattva, desire or passion takes a power of its own and contaminates the purpose of our activities. Too little rajas, and we slide into tamas through inaction. Too much rajas, and we slide into tamas as well, but through cruelty. We find confirmation in Krishna's teachings to Uddhava: yada jayet tamah sattvam, rajah saṅgam bhida calam, tada dukheṇa yujyeta, karmaṇa yasasa śriya, "When rajas, causing attachment, differentiation and change, overpowers tamas and sattva, (a man) feels suffering and works hard desiring fame and opulence." (Bhagavata Purana

11.25.14). Even religious activities can be overshadowed by rajas and tamas: yada asisa asasya, mam bhajeta sva karmabhibh, tam rajah prakritim vidyat, himsam asasya tamasam, "A person who worships me hoping for blessings, performing his duties to get their results, has a nature in rajas. A person who hopes for violence must be considered under tamas." (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.11)

The word lobhabh, "greed" refers to the thirst (trsna 14.7) for acquisitions, possessions, power, domination, and control. When such thirst is excessive and cannot be quenched by healthy dharmic and natural sense gratification, it becomes an obsession. Here too we find the influence of tamas or ignorance, because a person of knowledge should understand that the pleasures of the senses and material possessions are temporary and cannot give true happiness (2.14, 5.22).

The word pravritti, "engagement" is generally used in opposition to nivritti, "renunciation" as in pravritti marga as opposed to nivritti marga. In fact there is no contradiction, because one can engage in action while remaining detached from the results of the action. Here it is used together with the word arambhah, that means "endeavor" in the sense of "beginning an action" with a purpose of obtaining a result. When we are compelled by greed to run after many schemes and ventures, and to choose which ones seem to promise better advantages for us, rajas increases its power and the vicious circle downwards starts.

The word asamah means "uncontrolled" as in unlimited desires and engagement in action even beyond the point of exhaustion, but it also includes the meanings of "dissatisfaction, restlessness, desire, aspiration, rejection". It refers to the intrinsic nature of sense gratification and possession: when we try to find happiness in sense gratification, we become inevitably disappointed because there can be no real lasting happiness there. Krishna has already explained this point: ye hi samsparsa ja bhoga dukkha yonaya eva te, ady antavantah kaunteya na tesu ramate budhabh, "Those pleasures that derive from contact with the sense objects are the cause for future sorrow because they have a beginning and an end. Therefore, o son of Kunti, an intelligent person does not seek happiness in them." (5.22)

The use of the word spriha, "to touch", is particularly interesting here. Touch is the contact of the senses with the sense objects that causes joy and distress (matra sparsas tu kaunteya sitosna sukha dukkha dah, 2.14). We can observe this fundamental tendency even in small children who want to touch everything, but this contact is also effected through the other senses, as our sense of sight comes in touch with the images, and so on.

अप्रकाशोऽप्रवृत्तिश्च प्रमादो मोह एव च । तमस्येतानि जायन्ते विवृद्धे कुरुनन्दन ॥ १४-१३ ॥

aprakāśo'pravṛttiśca pramādo moha eva ca । tamasyetāni jāyante vivṛddhe kurunandana ॥ 14-13 ॥

a prakasah: lack of enlightenment; a pravrittibh: absence of engagement; ca: and; pramada: madness/ intoxication; moha: confusion/ illusion; eva: certainly; ca: and; tamasi: in tamas; etani: all these; jāyante: manifest; vivṛddhe: with the increase; kuru nandana: o beloved descendant of Kuru.

"O beloved descendant of Kuru, with the increase of tamas we find stupidity, laziness, madness and confusion, that tend to get worse and worse.

The word pramada was already used in 14.8 in association with alasya (laziness) and in 14.9 as the most prominent effect of tamas. Again it will be used to exemplify tamas (together with moha and ajnana) in verse 14.18, and with alasya and nidra in verse 18.39, at the conclusion of Krishna's teachings in Bhagavad gita. The meanings of pramada include "whimsical, insensitive, stupid, psychologically imbalanced or damaged". In the state of pramada, one remains unable to believe what is totally obvious, in front of him, and all intelligence is lost. Pramada is also mentioned as one of the four main defective tendencies of the conditioned souls, together with bhrama (mistake, misunderstanding, false knowledge), vipra lipsa (conscious or unconscious cheating propensity) and karanapatava (defective sense perception).

In his conversation with King Pracinabarhi (Bhagavata Purana, 4.29.5), Narada Muni applies the concept of pramada in attributing it to material intelligence blinded by the identification with the body: buddhim tu pramadam vidyan mama-aham iti yat krtam, yam adbhishaya debe asmin puman bhunkte aksabhir gunan, "Intelligence becomes confusing when it acts according to aham and mama ("I" and "mine"), taking shelter in the identification with this body - by which the purusha engages the senses in the material gunas."

Again, the word pramada is used in verse 5.14.9 in the description of material conditioning, as applied to the confusion of the mind and intelligence that one experiences in the storm of the senses in material lust. Another translation of pramada is therefore "intoxication", that is not limited to the abuse of psychotropic substances (alcohol, drugs etc), but includes sexual lust and all other forms of lust - power, violence, cruelty, possession, pride, egotism, etc.

The word prakasa means "enlightenment, illumination, realization, understanding, vision", so a-prakasa is exactly the opposite: a lack of vision, the inability to understand, dullness, the stupidity that prevents us from seeing even the most obvious things. It is utter foolishness, lack of knowledge as well as lack of discriminating knowledge (viveka).

Similarly, as pravritti refers to "engagement in action", its opposite a-pravritti points to the inability to actually perform a task properly or at all - neglect, inertia, laziness and carelessness. This tendency is very widespread in Kali yuga, where most of the population is immersed in ignorance, and people like to "hang out" or "phase out" in front of the television or video games, or become lost in intoxication. In all such examples, people squander the valuable time of their human life in literally doing nothing - not as a necessary time of rest and relaxation to replenish one's energies, but as a precise goal of life and search for happiness. In the general opinion of tamasic people, the best occupation is considered a sort of perennial vacation, or a job where there is no real work to do, no responsibility or duty, as for example in some bureaucratic or political positions. This fundamental alienation from reality can lead to extremes such as escapism in dreaming, virtual reality, role enactment, and reciprocal delusion in couples or groups.

The leaders among the Asuras - many of whom belong to the human race as well - are eager to implement and exploit this process of idiotization of the masses, through deliberate chemical, magnetic and biological pollution in food, medicines, water, air and environment in general, drug addiction, climate control and lowering of ethical and moral standards. This process reinforces the tendency to ignorance and inertia and is reinforced by them, in a vicious circle where lack of interest for understanding the actual situation in society and one's actual position leads to poor choices or the refusal to make good choices (which is intrinsically a bad choice), which in turn aggravate ignorance and increases the tendencies to make mistakes and take the wrong decisions. This asuric scheme envisions a "new world order" where a small group of extremely powerful persons controls all the resources at global level and even the general population, treating them as animals or untermenschen (sub-men), a definition created by Nietzsche. In this picture, human beings like farm animals can be "culled" without any ethical consideration, in a deliberate depopulation program, if their numbers become too large. This is the bottom of tamas, where the conditioned soul experiences complete helplessness and cannot find any meaning in life.

It is very easy (and totally useless) to blame others for such a situation. The only solution is for each and every one of us to rise above tamas and utilize any strength of rajas we can gather, putting it under the control and guidance of sattva, and reclaim our own right to personal and collective evolution and realization as explained by Bhagavad gita and the Vedic system. Those who have already awakened from the slumber of delusional dreams should try their best to wake up others, even if only one person at a time, and for any period of time, so that the momentum can increase and the balance will be tilted away from tamas. To be effective in this work, we absolutely need to deeply understand the gunas of material nature, as Krishna is kindly teaching us here.

The most important point is to understand tamas, because tamas contaminates rajas and destroys sattva, and is therefore the real enemy from which we must guard ourselves. What is ignorance? It is not simply illiteracy, or the lack of knowledge or information (that could be easily overcome with a little effort), but it is rather the distrust towards evolution, the lack of interest towards knowledge and information, or even the opposition against knowledge and information. Such ignorance is born from fear, which in turn develops from the root cause of abankara and mamatva - material identification and attachment.

Tamas becomes particularly dangerous when it mixes with the concept of religion, and as Krishna will clearly state later (18.32) the influence of tamas causes people to mistake dharma for adharma, and adharma for dharma. Therefore we see foolish people worshiping ignorance and adharma as the "age old religious tradition" and ranting and raging against everyone else, blaming others for the consequences of their own stupid mistakes and demanding "the government" to "ban" this and that by rule of law and to persecute those who are not "in line" with such demented policies based on tamas and totally contrary to the teachings of Vedic scriptures.

Here is a very enlightening description in Krishna's teachings to Uddhava: yada jayed rajah sattvam, tamo mudham layam jadam, yuyjeta soka mohabhyam, nidraya himsayasaya, "When tamas overpowers rajas and sattvam, the consciousness is covered by stupidity, inertia, complaining, confusion, sleep, violence, and false hopes" (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.15). We should remember here that moha indicates "attachment to illusion" and himsa is "hatred, violence, anger".

यदा सत्त्वे प्रवृद्धे तु प्रलयं याति देहभृत् । तदोत्तमविदां लोकानमलान्प्रतिपद्यते ॥ १४-१४ ॥

yadā sattve pravṛddhe tu pralayaṁ yāti dehabhṛt | tadottamavidāṁ lokānamalānpratipadyate || 14-14 ||

yada: when; sattve: in sattva; pra vriddhe: there is an increase; tu: however; pralaya: the annihilation; yati: goes; deha bhrit: one who carries a body; tada: then; uttama vidam: of the greatest; lokan: the planets/ dimensions; amalan: pure; prati padyate: he attains.

"When the strength of sattva increases, at the time of pralaya the embodied soul attains the highest dimensions of the pure souls.

A similar verse is found in the instructions given by Krishna to Uddhava: sattve pralinah svar yanti, nara lokam rajo layah, tamo layas tu nirayam, yanti mam eva nirgunah, "Those who die in sattva go to Svarga, those who die in rajas take a new birth in the world of men, and those who die in tamas sink into a degraded situation, but those who have risen above the gunas attain me" (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.22).

In this verse, the word amalam can be translated as "pure", as it literally means "without any contamination", where contamination is the ignorance of material identification and attachments. The word tu, "however", indicates that when we attain a sufficient strength in sattva, there is no more space for rajas or tamas. When sattva becomes completely pure and stable, it is called suddha sattva or visuddha sattva ("pure goodness"): this is the vasudeva level of transcendental consciousness, that establishes us in the spiritual world even while we are still living in this material body. In such a blissful consciousness, we will certainly rise to the highest regions of the universe to serve and assist Isvara in the managerial tasks we may be assigned, until the end of the cycle of creation. At that time, we will continue to serve Isvara in the non-manifested spiritual world, usually known as Vaikuntha.

The pralaya ("destruction, annihilation, dissolution") mentioned in this verse applies to the dissolution of the present body as well as to the partial dissolution of the universe at the end of Brahma's day. In either case, the sattvik person leaves the human body s/he was wearing and rises to the higher dimensions. The material body that we are now wearing (deha bhrit) will be left behind because we have already developed our divine or spiritual body (siddha deha) that is made of pure consciousness and works much better than anything made of material elements. The degree of power of such siddha deha depends on the degree of consciousness: if it still composed largely of mental constructs - thoughts, emotions, beliefs etc - it will be a subtle body suitable for the highest planets of this material universe, called Svarga or Svargaloka, but it will not rise higher. Vedic scriptures explain that within this universe there are several levels or dimensions of consciousness exemplified by the chakras in the body and illustrated in the descriptions of the Virata rupa.

In general, people learn (or should learn) in yoga classes that there are 7 chakras in the human body: 1) muladhara (at the base of the spine, between the anus and the genital opening), 2) svadhisthana (below the navel, in the area of the bowels), 3) manipura (above the navel, in the pit of the stomach), 4) anahata (in the middle of the chest, near the heart), 5) visuddha (throat), 6) ajna (in the middle of the forehead, a little above the area between the two eyebrows) and 7) sahasrara (the crown suture at the top of the skull). The 7 human chakras are directly connected in ascending order to: 1) survival, 2) sense gratification, 3) self affirmation, 4) compassion, 5) communication, 6) understanding and 7) inspiration. However, these 7 chakras and the corresponding planets or lokas only represent the level of human consciousness; there are 7 lower planets and chakras below the muladhara, and 7 higher planets and chakras above the sahasrara.

The 7 sub-human chakras, in descending order, are: 1) atala (in the hips or loins, connected to fear and lust), 2) vitata (in the thighs, connected to anger and resentment), 3) sutata (in the knees, connected to envy), 4) talatala (in the calves, connected to doubt and confusion), 5) rasatala (in the ankles, connected to arrogance), 6) mahatala (in the toes, connected with selfishness), 7) patala (on the feet soles, connected with hatred and malice). Some descriptions congregate all the lower planetary systems as Patala (the subterranean levels).

The 7 super-human chakras, in ascending order, are: 1) Svargaloka (including Gandharvaloka, Kinnaraloka, etc), 2) Maharloka (also called Pitriloka or Yamaloka), 3) Vishnuloka (also called Dhruvaloka), 4) Siddhaloka, 5) Janaloka (including the luminaries and administration manager Devas), 6) Tapoloka, 7) Satyaloka (also called Brahmaloika). Some descriptions put Vishnuloka (Dhruvaloka) at the highest position, and others congregate all the higher planetary systems/ chakras into "Svargaloka", and calculate Bhurloka and Bhavarloka as intermediate earthly or human planets, for a total of 14 planetary systems or levels of consciousness instead of 21. In any case, the dimensions of existence above the human level are difficult to understand for those who have a human mind, so we can simply meditate on the "divine consciousness" that includes all the levels above the human platform.

It is interesting to note that the traditional iconography clearly depicts these higher chakras in the representation of Devas, Siddhas, etc, usually translated as a towering hairdo decorated with jewels, or as a tall crown surrounded by a halo. This knowledge of the divine chakras or higher levels of consciousness was widespread in ancient cultures also outside India, and survived in popular folklore for example in the conical hats of "wizards and witches".

The influence of sattva, rajas and tamas causes us to develop a mentality respectively as sura ("divine being"), asura ("ruthless being"), and pasu ("animal being"). At the time of death, such condition becomes permanent as there is a new opportunity to develop a suitable body according to such consciousness. Krishna has already explained this point several times:

yam yam vapi smaran bhavam tyajaty ante kalevaram, tam tam evaiti kaunteya sada tad bhava bhavitah, "O son of Kunti (Arjuna), whatever state of existence/ nature one remembers at the time of leaving the body, s/he attains (precisely) that state of being/ condition, (because) of always contemplating that existence." (8.6) anta kale ca mam eva smaran muktva kalevaram, yah prayati sa mad bhavam yati nasy atra samsayah, "One who, at the end of time (of this life), remembers me while leaving his/her body attains my nature. There is no doubt in this." (8.5)

रजसि प्रलयं गत्वा कर्मसङ्गिषु जायते । तथा प्रलीनस्तमसि मूढयोनिषु जायते ॥ १४-१५ ॥

rajasi pralayaṁ gatvā karmasaṅgiṣu jāyate | tathā pralīnastamasi mūḍhayoniṣu jāyate || 14-15 ||

rajasi: in rajas; pralayaṁ: the annihilation; gatva: attaining; karma saṅgiṣu: among those who are attached to activities; jāyate: takes birth; tathā: similarly; pralīnab: one is destroyed; tamasi: in tamas; mudha: devoid of intelligence; yonisu: in matrices; jāyate: takes birth.

"When death/ annihilation comes, those who are under the influence of rajas take a new birth among those who are attached to activities, while those who meet destruction while under the influence of tamas take birth in matrices devoid of intelligence.

The numbers of those who attain the higher spheres of existence after leaving their bodies depends on the proper functioning of society. In Vedic society, all children above 5 years of age can be entrusted to a genuine qualified Guru for the most delicate and important period of their lives, when they can learn and be trained to become worthy human beings. The first thing all students must learn is the meaning of dharma - the universal and eternal principles of ethics that sustain the evolution, prosperity and happiness of the individual and society as well. The Guru watches them closely because the students live in the Guru's family - the guru kula - and are directly engaged in a variety of tasks. The Vedic approach to education is a personalized one according to individual talents and capabilities, but there is a basic training that all students can and must receive in order to be accepted as members of a civilized society: truthfulness and honesty, compassion, cleanliness and discipline. These fundamental principles of dharma are also important characteristics of sattva guna, and become easier to follow when the predominating influence on our life is sattvik. Therefore, the Guru must be sattvik in nature, behaviors and conclusions.

A sattvik training produces good individuals and good citizens, and prepares them for a lifetime of personal and collective progress, in whatever varna or occupational class they will work in the future.

As we will see later (18.41-44) the brahmana is a person whose mentality and tendencies are already sattvik by nature (svabhava prabhavair gunaih, 18.41) and manifest as peacefulness, self control, austerity, cleanliness, tolerance, simplicity, and a strong love for knowledge (samo damas tapah saucam ksantir arjavam eva ca jnanam vijnanam astikyam, 18.42).

A person who has a kshatriya nature is influenced by sattva with a latent tendency to rajas, and therefore he needs to be trained more strictly to a harder discipline. His natural qualities of heroism, leadership, resourcefulness and generosity are sattvik, but if rajas is not controlled, they can turn into arrogance and thirst for power over people and wealth, deceitfulness, and manipulation of others through corruption and dirty politics. Therefore the Guru trains the kshatriya students in overcoming selfishness and egotism, through the study of the transcendental science as well as in sacrificing one's life in defense of the prajas.

A genuine brahmana will live in such a way that at the end of his life, he will naturally attain the higher dimensions or planetary systems, or even the spiritual world. A kshatriya can also attain the same destination by remaining faithful to sattva and to the principles of dharma (that are also a manifestation of sattva), especially if he is killed on the line of duty. A vaisha can also attain the same destination by working honestly for the benefit of society and all prajas, and remaining detached from the sense of position, possession and sense gratification in his service of producing and circulating wealth. Even a sudra can attain the highest position (tatha sudras te 'pi yanti param gatim, 9.32) if he works in a spirit of sacred action or sacrifice. Therefore, sattva and the basic principles of dharma are also taught to those students who have a sudra nature and are not very good at understanding science or taking responsibilities.

However, if a brahmana or a kshatriya or a vaisha become attached to the activities in themselves (karma sangi) because of some trace of material identification and attachments in rajo guna, they will not be able to attain the higher and pure dimensions, but they will take another birth as human beings, to continue to work sincerely in society until they evolve further. This is traditionally described as the path of karma kanda, or the pravritti marga, and it is not condemned but it is rather considered perfectly legitimate. If the principles of dharma are respected, the individuals naturally reap the successes of artha and karma and finally become interested to moksha - that can be attained through sattva and then visuddha sattva.

The real problem is when a human being allows himself to become influenced by tamas, either by lack of training or lack of personal qualities. In that case, he will not be considered part of the civilized society of the varnas; according to the degree of stupidity and impurity he may choose a suitable occupation to obtain his livelihood for himself and his family just like animals do - by foraging, hunting and even stealing. An animal is not to be blamed for such actions because he is not able to see that they are inappropriate or unjust, and similarly a non-civilized human being lives freely and innocently without rules, like an animal.

What are the greatest concerns of animals? Eating good food, sleeping in a cozy place, finding a suitable mate and building a family, and defending; animals also give great importance to playing and having fun, as well as to establishing one's position in society and control over one's territory. We find animals often demonstrate a great sense of art (music, for example, as many love to sing and dance) and even architecture (as in building dams and intricate nests) and farming (as some species of ants who herd and milk aphids like cattle). In the human form of life, these animal activities may be performed in a more or less technological and refined way, as this also applies to people who consider themselves very "civilized". At the time of death, one will be naturally attracted to take a new birth in a body that offers better opportunities for the activities he has developed.

Taking birth as an animal is not a punishment, but an opportunity to play out one's tendencies in an appropriate context. If one likes blood, meat and other non-vegetarian foods, taking birth as a human being is not very convenient - a birth as a carnivorous animal will be much more appropriate. If one is obsessed by sexual lust, it will be much more rewarding to take birth as a rabbit or a mouse, who can have sex many times a day and without too much difficulty in finding a sexual partner. Since the higher functions of intelligence are actually a burden in the pursuit of such activities, the conditioned soul is relieved from all complications as a pasu (animal) in a mudha yoni (a matrix devoid of intelligence). When the desire for such activities will be exhausted, the conditioned soul will again obtain an opportunity for a human birth.

At any time we have a choice to evolve or devolve, to elevate or degrade ourselves (13.29), and if we take the proper measures while we still have some intelligence, we will be saved from sinking too low into tamas.

The careful cultivation of awareness is therefore the prime duty of all human beings who wish to progress and obtain a better situation after death. Already Krishna has explained: yam yam vapi smaran bhavam tyajaty ante kalevaram, tam tam evaiti kaunteya sada tad bhava bhavitah, "O Arjuna, whatever state of existence/nature one remembers at the time of leaving the body, s/he attains precisely that state of being, because of always contemplating that existence" (8.6).

कर्मणः सुकृतस्याहुः सात्त्विकं निर्मलं फलम् । रजसस्तु फलं दुःखमज्ञानं तमसः फलम् ॥ १४-१६ ॥

karmanah sukृतasyāhuh sāttvikam nirmalam phalam | rajasastu phalam duḥkhamajñānam tamasaḥ phalam || 14-16 ||

karmanah su kृतasya: of good actions; ahuh: they say; sāttvikam: in sattva; nirmalam: immaculate; phalam: results; rajasah: rajas; tu: but; phalam: the results; duḥkham: distress; ajñanam: ignorance; tamasaḥ: tamas; phalam: the result.

"They say that sattva gives immaculate results as properly performed duties, while rajas produces distress, and tamas produces ignorance.

The gunas produce causes and effects at the same time, reinforcing themselves, as actions produce reactions and these reactions in turn create the tendency to perform more similar actions. Therefore this verse can also be translated in reverse as follows: "They say that the immaculate results of properly performed duties produce sattva, distress increases rajas, and ignorance increases tamas." Increase in the strength of one guna is obtained through a series of choices in regard to life habits - food, company, activities, mental attitudes etc - as will be explained later with practical examples. In any case, we can keep in mind the basic principle that cultivating the influence of sattva in our life is done by practicing cleanliness in mind and body - which includes letting go all selfishness and egotism. A person who is not contaminated by material identifications and attachments (the direct cause of egotism and selfishness) is clean and light, and more capable of tasting true happiness because of such detachment and sincerity in performing his/ her duties.

Since the original nature of the soul is loving service, the selfless performance of one's duty gives the greatest sense of satisfaction possible on the material level, and nourishes the power of sattva both at individual and collective level. It can be compared to the feelings of well being produced by physical cleanliness - when we take a nice warm shower and wear clean clothes and enjoy a clean and pleasant environment. Finishing one's chores and completing one's tasks is also called "discharging" one's duty; by doing so in a proper way we feel happy and light and healthy as when we remove impurities (mala) from our own bodies. In this regard, we may mention that the word mala ("impurity") refers to all those material substances that are meant to be eliminated or discharged for the sake of the body's health and purity. As we may also remember, the first duties of civilized people after they wake up every morning is to cleanse their bodies through the "bathroom rituals" that refresh them into a sattvik feeling of cleanliness and clarity of mind and senses.

Of course the duties we must perform should not be considered as an impurity: in this example, the impurity (mala) is rather the nagging uncomfortable feeling that we have not done what we were supposed to do. Due to the impure nature of this abstention or failure, the natural urge to render service and perform our functions becomes constipated and creates the toxic effects of laziness, neglect, callousness, and foolishness that increase the influence of tamas.

The word su-krita ("good action") used in this verse to refer to the duties of a human being (karmanab) that increase the influence of sattva is also found in association with the expression punya karma ("virtuous action") indicating all those good deeds that accrue one's merits. Here the concept of religious merits overlaps the concept of ethical merits, because real religion - as the favorable relationship of the individual with the entirety of Reality - is a synonym of dharma or ethical way of life. Religious merits are accrued by distributing charity to the meritorious people, by studying healthy and useful knowledge, by sacrificing one's wealth and work for the common good, by showing respect to good and beneficial persons, and similar actions. Sometimes such punya is created without full awareness of the importance of our actions, as for example when we offer help to a person without really knowing his greatness, or we contribute to deliver valuable things (books, foods, etc) where they can really give the greatest benefit. Such actions are called ajnata sukriti ("unconscious good deeds") and they also increase the power of sattva in our life.

On the other hand, the results of rajas - egotism and selfishness, identification and attachment - are inevitably going to bring distress, because of the natural limits of the material world. Any position or possession will become lost in time (with considerable suffering when it happens), and even the process to acquire them is painful, stressful and exhausting. Overwork is one of the well known causes of health problems, at the physical level, at the mental level and also in the field of human relationships especially with family and friends.

Workaholics know very well that full dedication to one's "career" for its own sake is likely to cause estrangement from one's spouse and children, because there is no more time or energy to give to one's near and dear persons. All relationships are strained, especially with co-workers or competitors who are seen as opponents and enemies to defeat, and this constant fighting mentality takes it toll on blood circulation and cardiac functions, with a higher rate of strokes and heart attacks, and even on breathing, with increased incidence of asthma and similar respiratory problems. Also, an overworked and stressed person usually need to sustain him/herself with stimulants such as coffee, cigarettes or drugs of various kinds, and all these substances cause damage to the body and the mind. Meals are also neglected, in regard to quality and environment and the relaxation required for proper digestion, so a workaholic will likely develop gastric ulcers, liver complaints, and irritable bowel syndrome. But the final and greatest suffering comes at the time of death, when loss and disillusionment appear inevitable and one is forced to question the actual value of the activities s/he pursued and their results, and the purpose of life itself. In modern times and western culture, literature and other forms of art have often elaborated on this subject - the most famous probably being Ebenezer Scrooge, a character created by novelist Charles Dickens.

When attachment to activities and their results becomes excessive, the conditioned soul becomes a-sura ("not nice"), and therefore indulges in ruthless acts and even criminal and destructive behaviors (brilliantly illustrated by Krishna in verses from 16.4 to 16.20), that can only create sufferings to everyone, in this life and in the next. For people who have been conditioned by this asuric tendency, there is nothing that cannot be considered "business" - from pornography to sex slavery to selling dangerous drugs, trafficking in weapons or human organs, deliberately polluting the environment, and so on and so forth.

As far as tamas and ignorance (ajnanam) are concerned, the two definitions are practically synonyms, so there is no really much to elaborate about. Ignorance is the vicious circle par excellence, in which indulgence in laziness, insensitivity, idiocy and addiction to damaging behaviors constantly and quickly aggravate the condition, leading to total incapacitation and often even death by overdose and the condition of ghost. There is a "point of no return" in tamas, where a conditioned soul is truly lost for a period - sometimes for several lifetimes - in utter helplessness and confusion.

सत्त्वात्सञ्जायते ज्ञानं रजसो लोभ एव च । प्रमादमोहौ तमसो भवतोऽज्ञानमेव च ॥ १४-१७ ॥

sattvātsañjāyate jñānam rajaso lobha eva ca | pramādamohau tamaso bhavato'jñānameva ca || 14-17 |

sattvat: from sattva; sanjāyate: develops; jñanam: knowledge; rajasa: from rajas; lobha: greed; eva: certainly; ca: and; pramada: madness; mohau: illusion; tamasah: ignorance; bhavatah: become manifest; ajñanam: stupidity; eva: certainly; ca: and.

"From sattva, knowledge is generated. From rajas, greed is born, and certainly tamas manifests madness, illusion, ignorance and stupidity.

The concept of knowledge (jñanam) must be understood in the light of the Vedic values (13.8.12), and not simply as the accumulation of information or technical skills, which could be more correctly defined as erudition. In fact, mere information or technical skill - that is not properly directed by dharmic/ ethical principles - is not sattvik at all, and could even become downright asuric if utilized for the wrong purposes. The difference between cleverness and intelligence is that cleverness is myopic, and is unable or unwilling to see the long term results of the action, because it is controlled by rajas and tamas (18.29-32). The results of such cleverness in action only appear to be profitable in the short run, but they are disastrous in the long run, so they cannot really help us to improve our situation either individually or collectively. So what's the benefit?

The word lobha is sometimes translated as "avarice", but its primary meaning is "greed" or "lust", applicable to all those positions and possessions that can be obtained through action. Of course, once such prizes are achieved, a greedy person may also become a miser and refuse to share or utilize his/ her properties for beneficial purposes outside the immediate range of his/ her selfishness. This pathological inability can even cause the miser to live in a miserable way, like a pauper, without actually enjoying the benefit of his/ her possessions and positions.

The word kṛipana ("miser") specifically applies to this particular kind of mentality, because such a narrow-minded person is pitiable, both in this life and the next. Krishna had already stated it at the beginning of his instructions: durena hy avaram karma buddhi yogad dhananjaya, buddhan saranam anviccha kṛipanaḥ phala hetavah, "Therefore, o Dhananjaya, keep far away from all bad activities by engaging in Buddhi Yoga. Always take shelter in this intelligence. Those who work only because they are interested in the fruits of the action are pitiable" (2.49).

For those who keep their intelligence in the purity of sattva, the performance of actions will never become bondage: karma jam buddhi yukta hi phalam tyakva manisinaḥ, janma bandha vinirmuktaḥ padam gacchanty anamayam, "The wise people give up the fruit born from their actions by engaging in this Buddhi Yoga and thus become free from the bondage of rebirth, attaining a position that is free from all sufferings" (2.51). This is the highest position of sattva, in which all actions become sacred worship to God and devotional service, in this world and in the next. Again, the influence of tamas is the real enemy, that we need to understand clearly so that we will not be vanquished by it. When tamas increases to a certain point at collective level, the situation becomes so bad, nobody believes anything can be done to improve the situation. Characteristic symptoms are depression, moroseness, cynicism, loss of self esteem and self reliance. People come to think it is normal to be irresponsible, fighting, cheating, callous, selfish, violent, arrogant, corrupt, and ruthless, so they become alienated from the true purpose of life.

These concepts have been repeated already several times, and this should make us understand how important they are, and how we need to always remember them. We should not underestimate these verses, thinking they are redundant or unnecessary, because as long as live in this world we must guard against the danger of bondage caused by the gunas.

ऊर्ध्वं गच्छन्ति सत्त्वस्था मध्ये तिष्ठन्ति राजसाः । जघन्यगुणवृत्तिस्था अधो गच्छन्ति तामसाः ॥ १४-१८ ॥

ūrdhvaṁ gacchanti sattvasthā madhye tiṣṭhanti rājasāḥ | jaghanyaguṇavṛttisthā adho gacchanti tāmasāḥ || 14-18 |

ūrdhva: upwards; gacchanti: they go; sattva sthah: those who are established in sattva; madhye: on the intermediate level; tiṣṭhanti: they remain; rajasah: those who are in rajas; jaghanya: abominable; guna: qualities; vṛtti sthah: regularly engaged in; adhab: down; gacchanti: they go; tamasah: those who are under the influence of ignorance.

"Those who are established in sattva rise upwards, those who are in rajas remain on the intermediate level, but those who regularly engage in the abominable qualities of tamas fall downwards.

Sometimes the word sattva is translated as "piety" and a man who is established in sattva is called "pious", but this is not precisely correct. The semantic luggage of the word "pious" is filled with negative meanings created by mainstream abrahamic ideology, including a measure of self-righteousness, bigotry, self-conceit, and "holier-than-thou" attitude. The Vedic concept is certainly different, and considers religiousness as inextricably connected with the strongest principles of ethics, such as compassion, honesty, truthfulness and genuine austerity. Bigoted and self-righteous people, on the other hand, are usually hypocrites who condemn the small weaknesses of others but secretly indulge in much worse activities themselves.

The word ūrdhva, "upwards", is also used in the expression ūrdhva retam, indicating that stage of yoga by which the life energy is raised through the spine, from the muladhara chakra up to the sahasrara chakra, where it unites the male and female energy at a sublimated level. This is possible when the sadhaka behaves like brahman (brahmacharya) and is not disturbed by lust in any form; therefore the life energy that ordinary people spend in materialistic pursuits remains inside the body of the sadhaka and can be sublimated, fueling his progress upwards even beyond the sahasrara chakra. When the life air of a sadhaka leaves his/ her body through the sahasrara chakra, elevation to Svarga and beyond is assured; when less advanced persons die, the life air may exit the body through the other chakras or the openings (doors) connected - such as the mouth or nostrils, and more rarely, through the eyes or the ears. In the case of a degraded or very unevolved person, the life air often escapes through the lower doors, especially through the anus, sometimes accompanied by stool or urine, and by a shiver in a leg or foot.

Of course this brahmacharya cannot be compared to the forced artificial abstinence from a normal sexual life, that is merely repression and denial (3.6, 3.33) and usually brings more problems than solutions. because these are clearly a manifestation of tamas. What is repression, if not the foolish attempt to ignore the facts, to fight against reality and nature, to delude oneself into believing that problems will simply disappear if we ignore them?

Repression never solves any problem, it rather pushes issues down and out of sight, where they always fester and cause physical and mental diseases, and cannot be addressed straightforwardly and cleanly as they should have in the first place. This is how artificially repressed sex desires become distorted into an insane lust for power and possessions, cruelty towards others (sadism) and even towards oneself (masochism), and in some cases into an uncontrollable and diabolic need for destruction and blood. Chapter 16 will elaborate more about this asuric or demoniac mentality that is generated by tamas when it controls rajas. In the previous chapters, Krishna had already warned us that we must always strive to elevate ourselves, and be careful not to sink into the degradation of tamas: uddhared atmanatmanam natmanam avasadayet, atmaiva hy atmano bandhur atmaiva ripur atmanah, "One should raise him/ herself by his/ her own effort, and not degrade him/ herself. Certainly one should be one's own friend, and one can be one's own enemy as well." (6.5)

And because the transcendental consciousness of Bhagavan is the purest and most powerful of existences, by always remaining Krishna conscious we will establish ourselves on the vasudeva level: samam pasyan hi sarvatra samavasthitam isvaram, na binasty atmanatmanam tato yati param gatim, "One who sees the Lord as equally situated everywhere never becomes degraded, and by engaging the self in the self, s/he ultimately attains the supreme destination" (13.29). Of course this Bhagavan Consciousness includes the Paramatma Consciousness and the Brahman Consciousness, and must be expressed through one's actions and attitude towards all beings. There cannot be any trace of tamasic influence in such Consciousness - overt or covert. Hypocrisy and deceit especially in the field of religion is the most dangerous form of tamas and brings the worst disasters: andham tamah pravisanti, ye 'vidyam upasate, tato bhuya ita te tamo, ya u vidyayam ratah, "Those who worship according to ignorance, without knowledge, will enter the darkness, but even more those who propound false knowledge," (Isa Upanishad 9).

On the human level, people engage in activities because they are interested in the results. This is totally legitimate and can continue indefinitely (tisthanti) especially if the karmi respects the principles of dharma and performs his/ her duties sincerely: a human being is respectable when he/ she is working hard and enjoying healthy pleasures, accepting only the share that s/he has been assigned.

The Isa Upanishad (1, 2) clearly states: isavasyam idam sarvam, yat kim ca jagatyam jagat, tena tyaktena bhunjitha, ma grdbah kasya svid dhanam, kaurvann eveha karmani jijivisc chatam samah, evam tvayi nanyatheto asti, na karma lipyate nare, "All this universe belongs to God, and each individual should accept only the share of wealth that has been assigned to him/ her, without becoming greedy. If one continues to act in this way, without deviating from this path, one can happily live for one hundred years and will never be degraded by his/ her actions".

The power of rajas means good actions, not bad actions. Only the influence of tamas can turn karma (action, duty) into ugra karma or vikarma, with negative consequences for everyone, creating a hellish situation. Isa Upanishad continues to explain (3): asurya nama te loka andhena tamasavrtah, tam te pretyabhogacchanti, ye ke catma hano janah, "Those who kill the atman slide down together with the asuras and the ghostly creatures, into the levels of life covered by the blind darkness of tamas".

Of course killing the atman itself is not possible, so the expression "atma hanah janah" refers to those who neglect the atman by identifying with the material body both in regard to themselves and towards others. Such foolish people chose to be deluded by ahankara and mamatva, and this deliberate choice increases their lust and greed many times. The expression vritti sthat ("without modifications of the activities of the mind") clearly illustrates that such unfortunate and stupid people actually make the consistent choice to degrade themselves by taking shelter in tamas.

The word adhab ("down") is symmetrically opposed to urdhvam ("up"), and symbolizes the downfall of consciousness to the lowest levels, both within the human body and in the cosmic scale of the planetary systems. On the level of asuric life, a human being is only interested in the qualities of the lowest chakras - survival, sense gratification - and remains unable to rise further. For those who linger in such mentality, Earth itself becomes hell.

नान्यं गुणेभ्यः कर्तारं यदा द्रष्टुमर्हति । गुणेभ्यश्च परं वेत्ति मद्भावं सोऽधिगच्छति ॥ १४-१९ ॥

nānyam guṇebhyaḥ kartāraṁ yadā draṣṭūm arhati | guṇebhyaśca paraṁ vetti madbhāvaṁ so'dhigacchati || 14-19 ||

na: no; anyam: other; guṇebhyaḥ: than the gunas; kartaram: (any) kartas; yada: when; drasta: one who sees; anupasyati: s/he sees; guṇebhyaḥ: than the gunas; ca: and; param: supreme/ higher; vetti: s/he knows; mat bhavam: my nature; sah: s/he; adhigacchati: attains permanently.

"One who realizes that the activities are performed merely by the gunas has the right vision, and by knowing my nature, attains the level of perfection.

This concept has been expressed several times already by Krishna:

prakṛiteḥ kṛiyamanani guṇaiḥ karmani sarvasaḥ, abhikāra vimudhatma kartāham iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'" (3.27), na kartritvam na karmani lokasya sṛijati prabhuḥ, na karma phala samyogam svabhāvas tu pravartate, "The master (of the city of the nine gates, the body) is not the cause of the actions performed by him or by other people. Thus s/he is not engaged by the results of activities. It is only his/ her nature that acts" (5.14), kārya kāraṇa kartritve hetuḥ prakṛitir ucyate, puruṣaḥ sukha duḥkhaṇam bhoktritve hetuḥ ucyate, "Prakṛiti is said to be the cause and the origin of the action, while puruṣa is the cause of the perception of happiness and distress" (13.21), prakṛityaiva ca karmani kṛiyamanani sarvasaḥ, yā paśyati tatthatmanam akartaram sa paśyati, "One who sees that all activities, under all circumstances, are performed by the prakṛiti, and that the atman is not the doer, really sees" (13.30).

The atman is consciousness, but when taking shelter in prakṛiti or śakti (nature or power), s/he becomes engaged in activities. The fundamental characteristic of action is movement, and therefore all activities are always moving and never stable. Even the emotions that the puruṣa/ atman experiences are in constant motion because they are mediated through the movements of the mind (vṛttis and vāsanās); according to Patanjali himself (Yoga sūtras, 1.2) yoga is precisely the science that enables us to stop these vṛttis and vāsanās (yogah citta vṛtti nirodhaḥ) and experience the eternal unchangeable Reality that is beyond the material world.

This unchangeable reality is expressed here with the words mat bhava, "my existence", that is pure Consciousness or sentiment (also associated with the definition prema). In the spiritual world/ dimension, only Consciousness exists - the eternal Existence where all things are contained in a state of non-manifestation, free from the limits of time and space and movement.

The word drasta ("one who watches") as opposed to karta ("one who does") is also extremely important. Nature or prakṛiti is the real cause of the action, and the puruṣa or atman is simply watching, as a witness. We can remember this word drasta used in verse 13.23: upadrasta anumanta ca bharta bhokta mahesvaraḥ, paramatmeti capy ukto dehe 'smin puruṣaḥ paraḥ, "Within this body also dwells the supreme Puruṣa, the Paramatma Mahesvara. He is the one who witnesses the action and allows it to be performed, supports it and enjoys it."

The experience of the "enjoyer" (bhokta) indicates the awareness or feeling that is the specific characteristic of Consciousness. Therefore one of the preliminary exercises in the practical yoga techniques consists in the "witness meditation", by which the sadbhāva practices detachment in the neutral observation of the movements of the mind, the guṇas and the sense objects. Generally conditioned souls are not really aware of the movements of the mind because they identify with it, and their awareness runs after the various thoughts and emotions that drift across the mind, jumping from one to the other without even realizing it.

Through the gradual practice of pratyāhara, dharana and dhyāna, the yogī learns to become detached from the objects contemplated by the mind, not unlike a cinema goer becomes aware of the contents of the movie as distinct from his/ her own actual reality. At some point, the spectator becomes able to appreciate the film as a work of art, see behind the special effects, and so on, and that is when s/he will not be upset emotionally by the various scenes and situations as they develop from the plot.

The atman is param, transcendental, and when we learn to remain detached from whatever is not atman, we attain a stable consciousness (sthita prajña). Such position is permanent, precisely because it is not geared into change, and therefore we will not fall down again.

गुणानेतानतीत्य त्रीन्देही देहसमुद्भवान् । जन्ममृत्युजरादुःखैर्विमुक्तोऽमृतमश्नुते ॥ १४-२० ॥

guṇānetānatītya trīṇdehī dehasamudbhavān | janmamṛtyujarādūḥkhairvimukto'ṁṛtamaśnute || 14-20 ||

gunan: the gunas; etan: all these; atītya: transcending; trin: three; dehī: the embodied being; deha samudbhavan: originated from the body; janma: birth; mṛtyu: death; jara: old age; dūḥkhaib: sufferings; vimuktaḥ: completely free; amṛitam: immortality; asnute: s/he eats/ enjoys.

"By rising beyond these three gunas, the embodied soul becomes completely free from the effects of the body - birth, death, old age and all their sufferings - and enjoys immortality."

The word atītya means "transcending, overcoming, going beyond" and refers to the attainment of the transcendental level. All the three gunas must be transcended: Krishna has already stated this in 2.45 (traigūṇya viśaya veda nīstraigūṇyo bhava arjuna, nirdvandvo nitya sattva stho niryoga kṣema atmanan). The correct method is to firmly establish oneself in sattva first (nitya sattva sthah), and from there we can rise even above sattva, by completely abandoning all material identification and attachment even to good things. We have already seen that attachment to material sattva binds us to the material level, and because the gunas are always in movement, their wheel will turn and tamas will creep in again.

The material body is a product of the gunas, and is necessarily subject to them as part of the prakṛiti, but we are not. We can and should therefore remain detached from the natural activities of the body (5.8-9) while still directing them into sattva with our consciousness: naiva kincit karomiti yukto manyeta tattva vit, paśyan sṛiṇvan spṛiṣan jighṛāṇan asnan gacchan svāpan svāsan, pralāpan viśriṇan gṛiḥṇann unmiśan nimisann api, indriyanindriyarthesu vartanta iti dharayan, "One who is a yogī thinks, 'I am not the doer of anything'. One who knows the truth engages in the activities of seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, going, dreaming, breathing, talking, abandoning, accepting, opening and closing one's eyes, and engages the senses in the sense objects in a sattvik manner."

The activities that pass through the nine gates of the body are particularly important in this regard; food, sleep, cleanliness habits, sense gratification, thoughts, emotions, etc should always be directed preferably towards sattva. In this way, the atman becomes free from sufferings due to body and enjoys immortality (amritam asnute, "eats the nectar") already while living in this body (jivan mukta). Of course the body will come under a certain measure of all the three gunas in the course of its functions. For example, closing the eyes (nimisa) involves accepting a small part of darkness that is required for sleep and rest (nidra); practicing yoga does not mean that we should never sleep: yuktabhara vibharasya yukta cestasva karmasu, yukta svapna avabodhasya yogo bhavati dubkha ha, "For one who consciously controls his food intake, who is controlled in moving around, who makes controlled efforts in working, and is regulated in sleeping and keeping vigil, yoga becomes the destroyer of sufferings." (6.17)

The sufferings of birth, death, old age are inevitably connected to the nature of the material body, that is constantly changing. All change brings the loss of a previous situation, and this creates a certain measure of suffering, proportionately greater when attachment and identification is stronger.

Obtaining a new body and leaving the old one is a shock for those who are identified with the body because of ignorance and illusion; these conditioned souls are not wise (dhira) and so they become confused (muhyati): debino 'smin yatha debe kaumaram yauvanam jara, tatha debantara praptir dhiras tatra na muhyati, "The embodied soul who lives in this body passes from childhood to youth to old age, and similarly at the end of this body he passes on. A wise person is not confused by this." (2.13)

Immortality is certainly possible, but it can only apply to the consciousness or awareness, not to the material body. Anyone who has taken birth will have to die: jatasya hi dbruvo mrityur dbruvam janma mrityasya ca, tasmad aparibharye 'rthe na tvam socitum arhasi, "Because what has taken birth must necessarily die, and what has died will again be reborn. There is no point in despairing over something that is inevitable." (2.27)

The atman / brahman is not touched by any of such changes. Krishna has already explained this from the very beginning: yam hi na vyathayanty ete purusam purusarsabha, sama dubkha sukham dhiram so 'mritatvaya kalpate, "O best among men, one who is not distracted by all changes and is always equally balanced in suffering and in joy, is a wise person and he can aspire to immortality." (2.15)

The word dhira ("wise") is from the same root as the words dhyana ("meditation") and samadhi ("equal consciousness"), and refer to the consciousness (atman) that is not subject to change (2.18-21). In verse 2.56, dhira is equated with muni: dubkhesv anudvigna manah sukhesu vigata sprihah, vita raga bhaya krodhah sthita dhira munir ucyate, "A person whose mind is not distracted by sufferings or joys and remains detached, free from attraction, fear and anger, is called a muni who is able to maintain a steadfast meditation." (2.56)

kairīṅgaistrīṅgūṇānetānātīto bhavati prabho । kimācāraḥ katham caitāstrīṅgūṇānavartate ॥ 14-21 ॥

arjunah uvaca: Arjuna said; kaiḥ: by which; lingaiḥ: forms/ symptoms; trin: three; gunan: the gunas; etan: these; atitah: who have transcended; bhavati: becomes; prabho: o Lord; kim: how; acarah: s/he behaves/ acts; katham: how; ca: and; etan: these; trin: three; gunan: the gunas; ati vartate: goes beyond.

Arjuna said, "O Lord, what are the symptoms manifested by one who has transcended the three gunas? How such a person behaves, and how has s/he overcome the three gunas?"

This verse is similar to 2.54, in which Arjuna started the series of his questions by asking: sthita prajñasya ka bhāsa samadhi sthāsyā keśava, sthita dhiḥ kim prabhaseta kim asita vrajeta kim, "A person who is firmly established in the consciousness of meditation is said to be in samadhi. How does he speak, and what does he say? How does he move, and how does he stay?"

The word lingaiḥ ("forms, characteristics, signs, symbols") is particularly interesting here. It is said to derive from the expression ligi gatyau and it refers to movement and transformation, and its most famous definition is lingyate jayate anena iti lingam, "that by which (reality) is cognized or approached". Another explanation expands the word linga into lim ("to dissolve, to merge in") and ga ("to emerge"), to refer to a number of philosophical and theological meanings applied to Shiva Mahesvara, who is traditionally worshiped in the form of the Lingam. More specifically, the definition applies to the subtle level or subtle body, that contains the causes (karana) for future manifestations, especially in the ascending direction. In other words, lingam is the first manifested expansion of Brahman in this world, that enables differentiation and creation for the progress of all conditioned souls.

Colonial indologists usually translate lingam as "male sexual organ", but that is certainly not the ordinary meaning. Of course, when we want to define the concept of "man" (as in male human being), the male sexual organ can certainly be considered a "characteristic" of some relevance, especially considering the fact that the original Vedic culture has no taboos regarding the anatomy of the human body and serenely accepts depictions of naked figures also of Deities. Shiva Mahesvara is quite often portrayed in that way because traditionally ascetics and yogis renounced the complications of clothing, and Shiva is undoubtedly considered the greatest ascetic.

The original shape of the Shiva lingam worshiped in temples is not phallic, but ellipsoid - egg-shaped - to represent the concept of the identity of the Consciousness that manifests at the beginning of creation as the sum total of the universe, the Hiranyagarbha. Of course, since in Hinduism there is no institutional control on the religious life of individuals or groups, anyone is completely free to create whatever depiction of Shiva lingam or any other form of the Godhead they like, based on their understanding. Such freedom of belief and expression does not mean that all those forms should be automatically accepted as genuine, because authenticity should be verified through a comprehensive and deep study of the original scriptures. However, as long as such depictions do not appear to be offensive, they are amply tolerated.

The expression atitah was first used in 4.22 in reference to overcoming duality (dvandva atitah), then it is repeated several times in chapter 14 (14.20 gunan atityah, 14.21 gunan atitah, 14.25 gunah atitah, 14.26 gunan sama atityah). Arjuna's questions are perfectly appropriate and relevant, because when we are searching for good association and guidance, there must be some precise parameters to evaluate each particular individual, some rules or characteristics that can be observed externally. Krishna has already explained how to rise above the gunas (2.45, 3.27, 3.28, 3.29, 7.14, 13.20, 13.24, 14.19) but still Arjuna presents a new opportunity for more elaboration.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

प्रकाशं च प्रवृत्तिं च मोहमेव च पाण्डव ।

न द्वेष्टि सम्प्रवृत्तानि न निवृत्तानि काङ्क्षति ॥ १४-२२ ॥

prakāśam ca pravṛttiṁ ca mohameva ca pāṇḍava । na dveṣṭi sampravṛttāni na nivṛttāni kāṅkṣati ॥ 14-22 ॥

sri bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; prakasam: enlightenment; ca: and; pravrittim: engagement; ca: and; moham: illusion; eva: certainly; ca: and; pandava: o son of Pandu; na dveṣṭi: does not hate; sampravrittani: completely engaged/ developed; na: does not; nivrittani: stopping the engagement; kankṣati: s/he desires.

The wonderful Lord said, "O son of Pandu, (such a person) does not hate enlightenment, engagement in activities or illusion, and neither becomes totally immersed in them, and does not abstain from work.

The first verb holding the sentence is na dveṣṭi ("does not hate") directly connected to its opposite na kankṣati ("does not desire"), indicating that a person who has transcended all the three gunas is not particularly repulsed or attracted by sattva, rajas or even tamas. It is not that a transcendental person loves sattva and hates tamas. Attraction and repulsion (raga and dvesa), love and hatred are two forms of the same principle of attachment - manifested in the positive or in the negative. Even hatred and spite can bind us to a dangerous object of the senses or to a bad relationship, so the real solution is to remain neutral and detached.

What is resisted, persists, because of we are investing energy into it. We can verify this very simple truth with the famous exercise "do not think about a pink elephant" - the more you strive, the more real the "pink elephant" image gets. The mind and especially the subconscious mind works with symbols and ideas, not with grammar, so by projecting an image we reinforce it, even if our intention is to remove it.

A less innocent exercise is the foolish effort made by some ignorant celibate monks to become detached from their sexual lust by investing spite and hatred into the image of women, for example. As long as they keep thinking and speaking of women - albeit in the negative way - their attachment and lust will never drop off. The only solution is not to think of women as objects of enjoyment, not with attraction and not with repulsion: the real brahmacharya consists in thinking about the atman that is the same whether it drives a body or another. The same concept of neutrality from both positive and negative attachment is presented in many other verses (nabhinandati na dveṣṭi, 2.57, raga dvesa vimuktais tu, 2.64, raga dvesau vyavasthitau, tayor na vasam agacchet, 3.34, yo na dveṣṭi na kankṣati, 5.3, iccha dvesa samutthena dvandva mobena, 7.27, na me dvesyo 'sti na priyah, 9.29, yo na brisyati na dveṣṭi na socati na kankṣati, 12.17, araga-dvesatah, 18.23, tyaktra raga dvesau, 18.51, na socati na kankṣati, 18.54).

This verse describes three wrong approaches: 1) hating, 2) aspiring to become attached, 3) desiring to neglect. The first approach is rejection or repulsion as in active opposition, the second approach is active attachment, and the third approach is rejection through negative desire or passive abstention from all actions. Let's make an example directly connected to the context of Bhagavad gita: engagement in the battle against aggressors. Arjuna should not hate (na dveṣṭi) to fight in the battle to defend the prajas; he should engage willingly for the sake of duty even if the action is painful. Also, Arjuna should not engage in the battle out of selfish considerations and attachment to fighting per se (sampravrittani). Finally, Arjuna should not abstain (nivrittani) from his dutiful action out of lack of personal interest.

The word sampravrittani means "fully engaged/ manifest as experiences or objects" and is a reinforced form of pravritti ("engagement"), indicating the activities considered as the focus of action in themselves. At the end of the verse we find the negative or privative form nivrittani, referring to the actions of abstinence or nivritti. Abstention from action is also a choice and will bring consequences - good if the action from which we abstain was bad, and bad if the action from which we abstain was good. In general, however, abstention as a systematic habit in life can increase the influence of tamas, while engagement in action with attachment and opposition to action in attachment will increase the influence of rajas. The only way to increase sattva is to engage in action for the sake of duty, as we will see in the last chapter (18.8-10, 18.23-28).

Prakasa (enlightenment), pravritti (engagement) and moha (illusion) are expressions respectively of sattva, rajas and tamas, and they come and go with the waves of material nature, as soon as one of the gunas becomes predominant even temporarily. Due to the characteristic of movement (action, change) that is inherent to prakriti, there will be opportunities for enlightenment even for those who normally live in rajas or tamas, and similarly there will be engagement or activities also for those who normally live in sattva or tamas, and illusion is possible for those who live in rajas and even in sattva. The real problem is not experiencing these states, but remaining attached to them, because inertia will inevitably attract the influence of tamas and our perception will become clouded.

उदासीनवदासीनो गुणैर्यो न विचाल्यते । गुणा वर्तन्त इत्येवं योऽवतिष्ठति नेङ्गते ॥ १४-२३ ॥

udāsīnavadāsīno guṇairyo na vicālyate । guṇā vartanta ityevaṁ yo'vatiṣṭhati neṅgate ।। 14-23 ।।

udasina vat: as neutral; asinaḥ: sitting; gunaiḥ: by the gunas; yah: one who; na: never; vicālyate: is shaken; gunah: the gunas; vartante: following; iti: like this; evam: certainly; yah: s/he; avatiṣṭhati: always remains; na ingate: is not overwhelmed.

"One who remains sitting in a neutral position in respect of the gunas is never shaken, and following this (policy) regularly s/he remains firmly established and is not overwhelmed."

Neutrality is manifested in real detachment, by which we engage in our duty without attachment for action or inaction or for the results of the action: this is pure sattva or visuddha sattva.

The word asinaḥ derives from the same root as asana ("sitting place"), and therefore carries the meaning of a stable and comfortable position that can be maintained for a long time without difficulty. However, a sitting position still allows us to perform a great variety of tasks, especially those focused on intelligence and the higher faculties of the mind. This means that all ventures should first be examined "by sitting", collecting information and data, verifying the values, planning a strategy and so on, before actually walking into physical action. This is how sattva directs rajas and favors success for the benefit of all. Without the proper direction and guidance of sattva, rajas becomes erratic, whimsical and altogether dysfunctional, attracting the influence of tamas and sliding the conditioned soul into stupidity and illusion.

The expression udasina vat ("as neutral") conveys the idea that in a deepest sense the liberated soul is not really neutral or disinterested in the results of the activities, as s/he strongly desires to please Isvara and to assist in the mission of protecting the good people, destroying the evil doers and establishing the principles of religion or ethics. That desire is transcendental to each particular action or object, and therefore it is not binding us to material attachment. As the next verse will clearly state, we are eager to use everything - clay, stone and gold - for the service of the Supreme and his mission. The liberated soul actually works and makes choices, but without identifying with them in a selfish or egotical way (mama and aham), therefore s/he is beyond emotions and thoughts and attraction. This is the healthy and auspicious way of living (svastha), that will bring unending blessings in this life and in the next.

The expression na vicālyate ("is not agitated") refers to the various emotions and thoughts we will experience in the course of action, because of the nature of change and transformation of action itself. It is reinforced by the verb avatiṣṭhati ("always remains established"), and by the expression na ingate ("is not overwhelmed"). Emotions are like winds that can sweep our boat over the ocean, and attachment is like a sail that catches them and connects them to our awareness. Any sailor knows that when a storm comes, all sails must be rolled up so that they do not offer resistance, but the winds should run through and go away. In this way, the ship will remain more stable. Emotions and thoughts can be positive or negative, and bring hopes or worries. We should utilize all beneficial things in the service of the Supreme and just let the negative things fall through and away, without remaining attached to either. Joy, hope, desire and aspiration are like favorable winds that push our ship on its course, but we must manage them expertly so that the sails themselves are not overwhelmed and ripped apart by an excess of "good wind". This ship that will enable us to cross the ocean of material existence is knowledge (jnana plavana, 4.36).

A liberated soul is not overwhelmed because s/he is surrendered to the greater Intelligence and its vast plan (11.33-34, 18.73). This is also amply confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (for example in 1.5.32, 1.9.16-17, 1.19.14, 3.16.26, 4.11.23, 5.1.15, 8.19.29, 10.70.38). Of course this does not mean that a liberated soul becomes passive or abandons the use of his/ her brain and intelligence; in fact a liberated soul is illuminated and guided by suddha sattva and therefore s/he is in a very good position to understand God's plan and to assist it in the best possible way, because his/ her vision is not clouded by the ignorance of dualism.

समदुःखसुखः स्वस्थः समलोष्टाश्मकाञ्चनः । तुल्यप्रियाप्रियो धीरस्तुल्यनिन्दात्मसंस्तुतिः ॥ १४-२४ ॥

samaduhkhasukhaḥ svasthaḥ samaloṣṭāśmakāñcanaḥ । tulyapriyāpriyo dhīrastulyanindātmasamstutiḥ ।। 14-24 ।।

sama: equal; duhkha: distress; sukhaḥ: joy; sva: one's own; sthaḥ: is established; sama: with equal consideration; lostra: clay; asma: stone; kāncanah: gold; tulya: equal; priya: pleasant; apriyah: unpleasant; dhīrah: sober; tulya: balanced; ninda: offense; atma samstutiḥ: glorification/ praise of self.

"The wise is firmly established (in suddha sattva) and equally (tolerates) his own joys and sorrows. S/he (sees) with equal consideration a lump of clay, a stone and a piece of gold, and gives the same value to pleasant and unpleasant things, remaining sober and balanced in front of insult as well as glorification (directed to him/ her)."

The word sama is repeated twice in the verse, and reinforced by the word tulya ("balanced"). Already Krishna has presented this point several times (2.15, 2.48, 4.22, 5.18, 5.19, 6.3, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.29, 6.32, 10.5, 12.4, 12.13, 12.15, 12.18, 12.19, 13.10, 13.28, 13.29) and will continue to do so (14.26, 18.10, 18.50, 18.54). Therefore we can understand how important this instruction is.

Another word that is directly connected to sama is samadhi (sama dhi, "equal understanding"), that refers to the constant level of transcendental awareness in all circumstances. This is the ultimate goal of yoga as clearly confirmed by Patanjali, who entitled the first chapter of his Yoga sutras to the pursuance of samadhi (Samadhi pada).

In particular, verse 6.8 utilized exactly the same example we find in this verse, comparing lostra (clay), asma (stone) and kancanah (gold) as having the same value, as all of them can be usefully engaged in the service to the Supreme, although in different ways. Foolish and ignorant people evaluate objects according to artificial parameters and therefore they do not engage materials and resources properly; for example we can see lazy and arrogant craftspeople who do a very bad work when using less expensive materials, because they think that such objects do not deserve their full attention and effort. These people have no self-esteem and their cynical mentality will prevent them from feeling true happiness and pride in their work. This example of material elements mirrors the considerations offered in verse 5.18, where the equal value is given to the different bodies of the brahmana, the cow, the elephant, the dog and the uncivilized person who considers dog flesh as a normal food. In both cases - material elements and bodies - the fundamental value is the same because all of them can be usefully engaged in the service of the Supreme. Clay can be used for making cooking pots or water containers, stone can be used to build houses, and gold can be used for ornaments or for trade. A Deity can be fashioned out of any of these substances and still be perfectly fit to be worshiped, because all these materials are pure and useful. Of course Krishna did not mention stool or bone in his example, because these substances cannot be engaged usefully in daily life for the same purposes. In regard to the bodies of the souls in this world, a brahmana can be engaged in teaching and offering consultancy and assistance in various activities, a cow can be engaged in producing milk, the elephant can be engaged in carrying heavy loads, the dog can be engaged in protecting homes, and the uncivilized person can be engaged in assisting society from the outside by supplying forest products. This does not mean that all these embodied souls must be forced into engagement, but if they are favorable and willing to be engaged, we can find the perfect service for them.

Tolerating joys and sorrows is not easy, because they raise emotions in our mind and in the minds of the people around us. Also, it is important to understand that a liberated soul does not become insensitive to joys and sorrows (especially those of others), but s/he continues to perform his/ her duties in the service of the Supreme without being really distracted. The word sva can be interpreted in two ways: as connected to the word sthab ("remains in his/ her own position") or as connected to the words dubkha and sukha (distress and happiness). In the first instance, the deeper meaning is that the liberated soul is always conscious of its real nature as atman, and therefore remains established on the transcendental level as its natural and permanent position. In the second instance, the meaning is that neutrality and detachment should not come in the way of compassion, and that a liberated soul should actually be concerned about the sufferings of others (para dubkha dubkhi). The same concept is reinforced in the last part of the verse, where atma ("self") is clearly connected to the pair of opposite words ninda and samstuti (offense and praise). Ordinary people are not easily upset by the offenses and praise offered to others, except for really envious people who actually enjoy seeing others offended and suffer when others are praised.

In verse 12.19 the same issue of offense and praise was mentioned: tulya ninda stutir mauni santusto yena kenacit, aniketah sthira matir bhaktiman me priyo narah, "Balanced in front of insult and adoration, silent, satisfied with whatever s/he obtains, without residence, strongly determined: a devotee is very dear to me among all human beings." The word ninda ("offense") includes several degrees of seriousness, from a mere neglect or lack of proper respect to unprovoked lethal violence, while stuti (and its reinforced form samstuti) is the praise and glorification usually offered to great personalities, beginning with the Personalities of Godhead. These are one degree stronger than mana and apamana (6.7, 14.25), meaning "respect" and "lack of respect". Obviously any degree of offense is unpleasant, and any praise is pleasant, but a wise person (dhira, muni) knows that both are relative and temporary, and does not give them too much value. The other couple of opposites, priya and apriya, contain a number of meanings, that can be applied to different contexts. While ninda and stuti have universal value, priya and apriya have individual value, because what is dear to someone could be annoying for someone else and the other way around. For example, priya is used as "dear, darling" to indicate a very close loving relationship, such as the one between lovers or spouses. It is also applied to one's favorite food or anything we could be particularly fond of, and that give us pleasure and happiness. By extension, we can use it to summarize all the good things that are desirable, favorable, or valuable to us specifically - the things we like as distinct from the things we dislike personally. On the opposite side, apriya is the exact contrary, and any contact with such unpleasant things or people is expected to create feelings of discomfort, annoyance and even distress.

The word tulya literally means "balance", as in the instruments that is used to weight objects, especially to ascertain their value.

मानापमानयोस्तुल्यस्तुल्यो मित्रारिपक्षयोः । सर्वारम्भपरित्यागी गुणातीतः स उच्यते ॥ १४-२५ ॥

mānāpamānayostulyastulyo mitrāripakṣayoḥ | sarvārambhaparitāgī guṇātītaḥ sa ucyate || 14-25 ||

manah: in being honored; apamanayah: in being neglected; tulyah: balanced; tulyah: equally disposed; mitra: friends; ari: enemies; pakṣayoh: to the divisions; sarva arambha: all personal enterprises; parityagi: who has completely renounced; guna atitah: beyond the gunas; sah: s/he; ucyate: is said (to be).

"(A person who) remains equally disposed in being honored and in being neglected, and is equally disposed towards the categories of friends and enemies, who has completely renounced the idea of pursuing egotistic material enterprises, is said to be beyond the gunas.

In this material world and especially in Kali yuga it is easier to be neglected, blamed or insulted even without any reason or against all reason. The odds of getting mistreated become greater for those who are sincerely engaged in fighting against the ills of a corrupt and ignorant society, because as we will see later in chapter 16, asuric people are very expert in insulting others and enjoy inflicting pain on their innocent victims.

A person who has abandoned the illusion of abankara and mamatva remains detached and is not distracted by adulation or slandering; if there is anything useful s/he will engage it, otherwise s/he will let everything flow by without much concern. Of course, one should avoid the situations such adulation and offenses are likely to be produced, and this is why one should live alone, independently and detached from social life. We should know what is the limit of what our mind and body can bear, and make the suitable choices to avoid exposing ourselves to excessive stress.

The martyr syndrome is a psycho-pathological problem, not a spiritual qualification; we do not need to lay down and act like a door mat so that everyone can wipe their feet on our head. When we say that we should be as humble as a blade of grass and as tolerant as a tree, we should remember that even grass and trees have limits in humility and tolerance, and they are not exempt from suffering serious damages from excessive mistreatment. Fortunately, a human body has the ability to move around (unlike grass and trees) and step aside from the stampeding rhinos to avoid being beaten to a pulp.

Some people may easily mistake our tolerance and friendliness for stupidity or masochism, and they may even come to believe we like being exploited, mistreated, stabbed in the back and persecuted. There is no vedic injunction that forbids us from making them understand they are seriously wrong. Also, to be friendly with someone you do not need to support and help them engage in ugra karma, or even engage ourselves in such criminal activities to keep them company. Quite the opposite: a true friend, a mitra, will try to save us from committing some big mistake. There is a difference between maitra ("friendship") and sanga ("association, company"): while friendship is always a positive beneficial sentiment, sanga could be good or bad - to remain on the transcendental level, it should only be true sat sanga.

The word paksha (pakshayoh) refers to divisions or categories, as in the moon fortnights, called sukla ("white") and krishna ("black"), respectively translated as waxing and waning moon. Applied to human society, paksha means party or camp, when one group is opposed to the other by dint of allegiance or nature, as in mitra ("friends") and ari ("enemies"). This equal disposition to all camps is easily described as non-sectarianism and freedom from the party mentality, something that is sorely required especially in the camp of materialistic religiosity, among organizations and institutions, such as churches or mathas. Material religiosity will not be able to take us to the supreme level.

The Bhagavata Purana (1.1.2) clearly says: dharmah projibita kaitavo atra paramo nirmatsaranam satam, "Rejecting the so-called illusory religion, we are discussing here only about transcendence, that is for good people who are free from envy". What is envy (matsara)? The dualistic and separatist mentality that divides people into camps (pakshas). These professional sectarian religionists, who claim to speak as authorities - as representatives of God - should give the good example and behave as devotees of God, and not as devotees of their own organization or sect. If they were truly transcendental or even just sattvic, they would welcome the idea of fair cooperation and recognize and appreciate the good work done by others and the guna and karma demonstrated, and join forces.

The danger for such people is to become victimized by tamas through material identification and separatism; this is particularly disastrous because they can turn into asuras if they try to exploit God's name and words to better manipulate and cheat or bully people into submitting to them by material oppression, repression and depression, or accusing them of not being humble or cooperative enough. Asuras will consider such lack of submission to their tyranny as hostility against them or even against God, but they are being fooled by illusion and will end not in paradise, but in lower births. Instead of God-brothers they turn into Godfathers: mafia is based on hierarchy and blind allegiance to bosses even against dharmā, vidyā, satya and sattva. There is no such concept in genuine Vedic knowledge. Verses 7 to 20 of chapter 16 of Bhagavad gita clearly explains how the asuras disregard the genuine knowledge from the scriptures, and how their religious activities are useless because they are not supported by dharmā, beginning with truthfulness, compassion, and purity from the contamination of material identification.

We should not cultivate hatred (dvesa) or envy (matsara) towards these unfortunate people. We must recognize that asuras and adharma and avidya also have a role to play in the world, and we are not interested in going after them or "stopping" them. We actually wish them well in detached friendship (maitra), and we pray that they may realize their mistake, for their own benefit. We will not try to take away their properties or followers: let them enjoy whatever success is due to their previous karma, but if someone is interested to hear or learn the truth, and improve their life, we should be ready to do our duty. We need to defend our own service, and we do it independently and in accordance to the true teachings of the scriptures. There is no religious monopoly to be enforced: this pursuit of spiritual perfection is everybody's birthright, just like everybody has a right to take a cold bath in the month of magha. If we cannot find any genuine devotee of God, it is better to directly take shelter in the param guru rather than supporting asuras and their organizations. The expression sarva arambha parityagi ("abandoning all egotistic pursuits") does not mean that we should not start dharmic ventures or preaching missions. It means we do not identify them as "ours" in a separatist mentality.

मां च योऽव्यभिचारेण भक्तियोगेन सेवते । स गुणान्समतीत्यैतान्ब्रह्मभूयाय कल्पते ॥ १४-२६ ॥

mām ca yo'vyabhicāreṇa bhaktiyogena sevate | sa guṇānsamatityaitānbrahmabhūyāya kalpate || 14-26 ||

mam: to me; ca: and; yah: one who; avyabhicareṇa: without deviating; bhakti yogena: through bhakti yoga; sevate: offers service; sah: s/he; gunan samatitya: having transcended the gunas; etan: all these; brahma bhuyaya: on the level of Brahman; kalpate: desires.

"One who truly serves me in bhakti yoga without deviation develops desires on the Brahman level, transcending all these gunas.

Krishna immediately clarifies that sarva arambha parityagi does not mean that we should not work sincerely for the benefit of all beings and in the service of the Supreme. Such desire (kalpate) is transcendental and does not bind us to the material gunas, but rather propels us forward and upward, nearest to Krishna's Consciousness.

The desire for immortality is the inspiration that carries us from the darkness to the light: asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrtyor ma amrtam gamaya (Brhad aranyaka Upanishad, 1.3.28) because it removes our identification with the material body, that is inevitably going to die.

Krishna had already explained that such desire is a legitimate pursuit even on the level of transcendence after rising above the gunas: yam hi na vyathayanty ete purusam purusarsabha, sama duhkha sukham dhiram so 'mritatvaya kalpate, "O best among men, one who is not distracted by all these and is always equally balanced in suffering and in joy, is a wise person and he can aspire to immortality" (2.15).

Another very similar verse is found at the conclusion of the Bhagavad gita (18.53): ahankaram balam darpam kamam krodham parigrabham, vimucya nirmamah santo brahma bhuyaya kalpate, "One who has become completely free from ahankara and amatva, from the sense of material strength, pride, lust, anger and greed, and is peaceful, focuses his/ her desires towards Brahman."

The Bhagavata Purana (11.29.34) confirms: martyo yada tyakta samasta karma, niveditatma vicikirsito me, tadamrtatvam pratipadyamano, mayatma bhuyaya ca kalpate vai, "If a mortal has renounced all his activities by fully dedicating him/ herself to me, desiring to serve me, such desire qualifies him/ her to attain my same nature, and immortality, too".

And also: harir ni nirgunah saksat, purusah prakriteb parah, sa sarva drg upadrasta, tam bhajan nirguno bhavet, "Hari is above the gunas. He is the Purusha himself, transcendental to material nature. He is the witness who sees everything. By worshiping him, one also becomes free from the gunas" (Bhagavata Purana 10.88.5) and bhakti aham ekaya grahyah sraddhayatma priyah satam, bhakti punatin man nistha sva pakan api sambhavat, "I can be acquired only by pure bhakti and I am dear to people who have deep faith. Such devotion and faith purifies anyone from the contamination of birth, including dog eaters", (Bhagavata Purana, 11.14.21).

The word anyabhicarena ("without deviation", "without change", "without interruption") refers to a firmly established consciousness or samadhi, and is found also in verses 13.11 and 18.33 with the same meaning. True service in bhakti yoga (bhakti yogena sevate) is not a part-time concern, a function we attend once a week or a couple of hours a day: it is a constant uninterrupted dynamic meditation. Anything less than that is merely imitation or practice aimed at attaining "the real thing", and it will not give the expected results, such as happiness, full consciousness and all the other divine qualities. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (1.2.6): sa vai pumsam paro dharmo yato bhaktir adboksaje abaituki apratibata jayatma suprasidati, "The supreme dharma for human beings is selfless and uninterrupted devotional service to Transcendence: this gives complete satisfaction to the soul."

The expression brahma bhuyaya ("on the level of Brahman") should not be overlooked or underestimated. Without the transcendental realization of Brahman as universal Consciousness there can be no real bhakti - at most, there will be some sentimental attachment to a cultural or affective idea, that most people may call "devotion". In this sense, one can be devoted to one's family or career, to scientific research, or to other causes. On the level of material religiosity, one can be a devotee of any religious figure or teaching or group, but usually this boils down to keeping pictures in one's house, saying a little prayer now and then, attending some congregational function to establish one's belonging to the social group. The spirit of service (sevate) is usually absent, or directed to the distribution of food and clothing to "the poor" or to the aggrandizement of the material position of one's chosen group by building large churches or temples or mathas and decorating them with gold or other impressive features. All these activities remain on the materialistic level, and at most they can give some punya.

The real bhakti starts from the level where we have overcome the materialistic mentality (dharmah projibhita kaitavo, Bhagavata Purana, 1.1.2) as decisively confirmed at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.54).

brahmaṇo hi pratiṣṭhahamamṛtasyāvayasya ca । śāśvatasya ca dharmasya sukhasyaikāntikasya ca ॥ 14-27 ॥

brahmanah: of Brahman; hi: indeed; pratiṣṭha: the foundation; aham: I am; amṛtasya: of the immortal; avyayasya: of the unchangeable; ca: and; śasvatasya: of the eternal; ca: and; dharmasya: of dharma; sukhasya: of happiness; aikantikasya: of the One; ca: and.

"I am the foundation of the Brahman, the immortal, unfailing/ imperishable, eternal (Brahman), that is the ultimate dharma and happiness, the One Reality."

This is the most explicit verse establishing the supreme position of Krishna as Bhagavan, the Personality of Godhead. There is nothing impersonal in the pronoun aham, ("I"), that Krishna uses many times in Bhagavad gita to refer to the Godhead.

However, we should not think that this is "a victory over impersonalism", because there has never been a war between Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan, that are all one and the same (vadanti tat tattva vidad tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, Bhagavata Purana 1.2.11). Bhagavan is knowledge (jnanam advayam), consciousness, and Brahman and Paramatma are the same consciousness - the only difference is our perception.

Ignorant and foolish persons who have no realization or even understanding of Brahman cannot possibly love or even understand Bhagavan, and maya will accommodate them by projecting a vast array of fantasies by which the conditioned soul

"creates" his own God in his own image. It is easy to expose such useless mental speculations because they do not correspond to the fundamental qualities of God, that we can find described in the original scriptures and by many realized souls as based on dharma, the universal ethical foundation of existence. So when you are presented with an image of God (or religion) that goes against compassion, happiness, truthfulness, intelligence and knowledge, ethical principles, transcendence, equanimity and so on, you can be sure that someone is trying to dupe you into buying their foolish fantasies. It is particularly dangerous when such "preachers" are evidently engrossed into the ahankara and mamata concept of life and are following the conclusions and behaviors described in chapter 16 as characteristic of the asuras. Asuras, or "demoniac people", can very well appear to be religionists, and especially claiming monopoly over religion, so we need to watch them carefully to avoid being confused by them.

We can remain safe if we sincerely cultivate the proper sattvik knowledge, that enables us to distinguish dharma from adharma: pravrittim ca nivrittim ca karyakarye bhayabhaye, bandham moksam ca ya vetti buddhibh sa partha sattviki, "Sattvik understanding knows what should be accepted and what should be abandoned, what should be done and what should not be done, what should be feared and what should not be feared, what will bring bondage and what will bring liberation" (18.29).

And the highest level of sattva takes us beyond the material identification: jnanam visuddham paramartham ekam, anantaram tv abahir brahma satyam, pratyak prasantam bhagavac chabda samjnam, yad vasudevam kavayo vadanti, "The purest knowledge about the supreme purpose of life does not have an inside or an outside. Brahman is described as the inner Truth, the serene Bhagavan, whom the kavis call Vasudeva" (Bhagavata Purana 5.12.11).

The word pratistha means "foundation" but also "establishment", "beginning", and "origin". In other words, Consciousness exists because there is a Conscious "I" (aham) who contemplates the Existence. It is a concept that many wise people have grasped in some measure, even intuitively without the benefit of previous knowledge, but Vedic scriptures elaborate on it scientifically and objectively, presenting it as the purpose of spiritual realization as well: atma vidya, "the science of the self". We as jivatmas have a sense of self because awareness is a fundamental function of the self. When there is no self, there cannot be any awareness; all sentences require a subject, all observations require an observer.

Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan, are jnana, knowledge, and so are the Atman and the Prakriti. Is there anything that is not originally knowledge? No. This knowledge or consciousness always exists, even when it is covered or distorted. A madman may believe he is Napoleon or Joan of Arc, but this does not mean that in fact he is nothing; his consciousness exists, but it is distorted in a superimposed image where inapplicable identifications are introduced. The consciousness always exists, even during a coma or at death, because when we leave the body we continue to remain conscious, in this or in different dimensions.

Now the Consciousness of God is non-different from our own minuscule consciousness, except for the fact that Brahman/Paramatma/ Bhagavan Consciousness is pariyapti, "most complete", while our own consciousness is limited by the concept of separation through time, space and individuality. Therefore the divine Consciousness is amritam (immortal), avyaya (unchangeable), sasvat (eternal), and it is also dharma (ethical sense, or "conscience"), and sukha or ananda (intrinsic happiness).

Each and every one of us can easily experience this supreme Consciousness (in quality if not in quantity) by removing from our awareness all the temporary things that will eventually die or change (such as material identifications and attachments) and by tuning in with the qualities that constitute the principles of dharma. Then we will certainly experience the happiness of Brahman (brahma ananda).

Chapter 15: Purushottama yoga

The yoga of the Supreme Person

The name Purushottama is composed by the words uttama ("supreme, highest") and purusha, a noun that expresses a very complex and deep concept, as we have already commented in previous chapters. In ordinary modern language, purusha is used to mean "man" as in the expression stri-purusha ("women and men"), but according to Krishna's teachings, all jivatmans are purushas, because they consist of consciousness and feelings just like the supreme Purusha.

Usually the term purusha is translated as "enjoyer", as the characteristic of consciousness focuses on feeling or tasting all the manifestations of existence. In the case of the embodied conditioned soul, the purusha tastes the material objects of the senses, while in the case of the liberated soul or the supreme Purusha, he tastes the spiritual sentiments. We have seen in the previous chapters how Krishna has explained the knowledge about purusha and prakriti, and here we will rise of yet another level, applying the science of bhakti to the supreme Purusha.

Purushottama is the Supreme Person, "the best of the purushas", and is famous especially in connection with the tradition of Purushottama kshetra, also known as Jagannatha Puri, in Orissa.

The Vishnu Purana states: hiranyareta samdiptam puranam purushottama, sakalam niskalam suddham nirgunam guna sasvatam, "Lord Purushottama is described in the Puranas as effulgent as the Sun. He is all-pervading and transcendently pure, simultaneously undivided and manifesting in innumerable forms, beyond the gunas and yet the personification of all qualities."

The Artha shastra written by Brihaspati mentions Purushottama kshetra as one of the 8 vaishnava tirthas in India, and the Kriya yogasara speaks about the "three Deities of Purushottama". The Vishnu dharmottara (3.125.21) mentions udreshu purushottamam, "Purushottama who resides in Orissa", and the Kalika Purana mentions Jagannatha as the consort of Goddess Katyayani. The Devi Mahatmya of Markandeya Purana mentions Vishnu as Jagannatha in its first chapter: utthastau ca jagannathas taya mukto janardanah, ekarnave 'bisayanat tatah sa dadrse ca tau, "The Universal Lord, supporter of all living entities, arose from the Ocean."

In the Vishnu Purana (V.33.41) Krishna is called Jagannatha and Purushottama (krishna krishna jagannatha janetvam purushottama, paresham paramatmanam anadi nidhanam harim); in the Vamana Purana Aditi glorifies Vishnu with the name of Jagannatha, and Purushottama is also mentioned there in connection with Prahlada's pilgrimage. Many other scriptures mention Purushottama as a definition of God the Supreme Person: Vamadeva Sambhita, Skanda Purana, Niladri Mahodaya, Brahma Purana, Kapila Sambhita, Padma Purana, Matsya Purana, Vishnu Purana, Vamana Purana, Garuda Purana, Agni Purana, Naradiya Purana, Ramayana, Mahabharata.

In the Purusha sukta the Supreme Purusha is glorified as the omnipresent Soul of the Universe (Virat Rupa or Jagat): sahasra sirsa purusha sahasrakshah sahasra-pat, sa bhumim visvato vriyatyathisthad dasangulam, purusha evedam sarvam yad bhumam yac ca bharyam, utamritatvasyesano yad annenatirohati, "The Lord of the Universe has thousands of heads, eyes and feet, and entirely encompasses the cosmic creation, surpassing it to a distance of ten angulas: he is thus existing everywhere both within the universe and outside the universe. This visible universe (vyakta) is the form of the Virata Purusha, the universal Lord that contains everything that existed and that will ever exist in the future. Although immortal, he manifests this form to grace the living entities and offer them the opportunity to reap the results of their own actions."

The Mahabharata (Anusasana parva, 135.12) contains the famous Vishnu sahasra nama stotra ("the thousand names of Vishnu") where Jagannatha Purushottama has a special position in the initial presentation of the whole stotra by Bhisma (jagat prabhum deva devam anantam purushottamam stuvan namasashrena purusa satatottamah ... tasya loka pradhanasya jagannathasya bhupate visnor nama sahasram me srinu papa bhayapaham ... vishnum vishnum maha vishnum prabhavishnum mahesvaram aneka rupa daityantam namami purushottamam), besides being mentioned in the text of the stotra.

A more technical description of the form of Vishnu called Purushottama is found in the Vaishnava Agamas, specifically in the Sarada tilaka, where Isvara is described in three broad categories: the majestic Vishnu, the terrifying Nrisimha and the loving Purushottama. Purushottama is the consort of Lakshmi and is therefore also called Madhava (ma, "of the Mother Goddess", dhava "husband"). The particular form of Nila-Madhava that is found at the origin of the story of the manifestation of the Jagannatha Deities is a Vishnu form holding in his hand a lotus flower on which Mother Lakshmi sits (not to be confused with Brahma, who sits in the lotus born from the navel of Vishnu). This loving aspect of Jagannatha unites the three concepts of conjugal love (as Sridhara for Lakshmi Devi), paramour love (as Krishna for Radha and the gopis) and mystic love (as Kama or Bhairava in tantra). It is important to remember that all these three aspects must be analyzed on the transcendental level. The Brahma Purana confirms that Purushottama is inconceivable through material parameters, and can only be understood by one who overcomes the dualistic mentality in reference to Dharma.

sri bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; urdhva: upwards; mulam: the roots; adhab: downwards; sakham: the branches; asvattham: asvattha tree; prahub: it is said; avyayam: eternal; chandamsi: the Vedic hymns; yasya: of which; panani: the leaves; yah: one who; tam: that; veda: who knows; sah: s/he; veda vit: one who knows the Vedas.

The wonderful Lord said, "It is said (there is) an asvattha tree whose roots grow upwards and whose branches grow downwards. Its leaves are the eternal Vedic hymns. One who knows it, knows the Vedas.

The example of the tree - as the samsara vriksha - is mentioned in Katha Upanishad (2.3.1) as the banyan whose roots go upwards, but also in Muktika Upanishad (2.2.32-37) and Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.6). This chapter describes the Supreme Lord as the root of this imperishable banyan tree of the Universe, and explains how to go beyond and find the original treasure.

It is important to understand that there is no contradiction or opposition between the pravritti marga of karma kanda and the nivritti marga of the various aspects of yoga. Krishna has already explained that Sankhya (chapter 2) is simultaneously different and non-different from Yoga: loke 'smin dvi vidha nistha pura prokta mayanagha, jnana yogena sankhyanam karma yogena yoginam, "O Arjuna, as I have already explained to you, in this world there are two types of beliefs: those who follow Sankhya are connected through knowledge, while yogis are connected through action" (3.3), and sankhya yogau prithag balah pravadanti na panditah, ekam apy asthitah samyag ubhayor vindate phalam, "Only childish people, and not panditas, speak of Sankhya and Yoga as two different paths. In fact one who is firmly situated on either of these attains the final purpose of both" (5.4).

Similarly, the concept of yajna is not limited to the ritual ceremonies but encompasses all dutiful actions of human beings: niyatam kuru karma tvam karma jyayo hy akarmanah, sarira yatrapi ca te na prasiddhyed akarmanah, yajnarthat karmano 'nyatra loko 'yam karma bandhanah, tad artham karma kaunteya mukta sangah samacara, "You should perform the dutiful actions, because action is better than non-action. Without action it is even impossible to maintain the body, that is the vehicle of the Self. All actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage and further actions. Therefore, o son of Kunti, you should perform your activities for that purpose, remaining free from attachments." (3.8-9)

Even the sannyasis and yogis who have renounced the conventional rituals need to engage in yajna, each in their own specific way according to the activities they have chosen to perform: some worship the Devas, others offer sacrifice itself in the fire of Transcendence, others offer the activities of the senses or the objects of the senses, or the control of the prana. Others sacrifice their wealth, or engage in studying the scriptures or following strict vows or austerities," (4.25-30).

In chapter 11 we have seen the description of the Virata Purusha or Virata Rupa as the manifestation of God in this universe, on whom we should meditate according to Krishna's instructions. The asvattha (banyan) tree described in this chapter 15 is another perspective of this Supreme Purusha (Purushottama), that manifests as the entire corpus of Vedic knowledge. The asvattha tree is particularly interesting because it is practically immortal. It originally starts from a seed, but since the branches become new roots, and the roots spread around and upwards to become branches, the tree can grow very wide and constantly renews itself. So even if some parts of the tree may die, the other branches and root continue to survive and thrive and propagate, expanding the same body constantly. This is a wonderful example to depict Vedic knowledge, that is and remains One as it keeps growing from the same fundamental principles, but readily adapts to time, place and circumstances with new branches carrying the same vital lymph.

Like the ellipsoid stone or pillar called Lingam, the Tree is a very ancient and universal symbol of Reality in this world, and has been honored as a sacred image by all ancient dharmic cultures. The stambha or jupa shakti is still installed in the traditional orthodox yajna salas as the seat and representation of all Devas, and it is considered that all the ghri offered in the sacrificial fire is eaten by this jupa shakti. We have already noticed the close connection between Purushottama and Jagannatha ("the Lord of the Universe"), but even more interesting is the connection between Jagannatha and the Universal Tree. Another name of Jagannatha is daru brahman, "the incarnation of God as a tree". The word daru means both "tree" and "wood" (which is obtained from a tree).

This mention of the daru is found in Rig Veda (10.155.3): ado yad daru plavate sindboh pare apurusham, tadarabhasya durhano tena gaccha parastaram, "In the beginning, the primeval Lord manifested as the transcendental Daru on the shore of the Ocean, and those who go to take shelter in this Supreme Lord are delivered from all difficulties."

A famous commentator of the Vedas, Sayana Acharya (1300-1380 CE), offers this explanation: ado viprakrista dese kartumanam apurusham nirmatra purushena rahitam, yad daru darumayam purushottamakhyam devata sariram sindboh pare, samudra tire plavate jalasyopari vartate tad daru he durhano dukhena, hananiya kenapi bantum asakeya he stotah arabhasva alambasva upasvety, arthah tena darumayena, evenopasyamanena parastavam atisayena, taraniyam uteristam vaishnavam lokam gaccha, "On the sea shore, in a place that is not accessible to material vision, God who is beyond the perception of the senses, exists in a tree form and is called Purushottama. He delivers his devotees from the ocean of material sufferings. O great scholars, take shelter in that tree form of the Lord, and through his worship attain the supreme abode of Vishnu."

The Sankhyayana brahmana also contains a similar verse: adau yad daru plavate sindboh pare apurusham, tad alambasva durduno tena yabi param sthalam, "On the shore of the ocean, the Primeval Lord has manifested as a tree/ wood that is not human. By taking shelter in him, you will attain the supreme abode."

The Sankhyayana bhashya comments: adau viprakrista dese vartmanam yad daru daru-mayam, purushottamakhyam devata sariram plavate jalasyopari vartate apurusham, nirmatri rahitavina apurusham tad alambasva durduno he hotah tena, darumayena devana upasyamanenaiva param sthalam, vaishnavam lokam gacchety arthah, "The Supreme Lord known as Purushottama has taken a form of tree/ wood and resides on the ocean shore, although he transcends the human level and he is beyond the perception of the senses. O great scholar, you should worship this form of the Lord with the purpose of going to the supreme abode of Vishnu." A similar verse is also found in the Utkala Khanda of Skanda Purana (21.3): ya esa plavate daruh sindhu pare hy apaurushah, tam upasya duraradhyam muktim yati sudurlabham, "One who venerates that transcendental tree that floated to the ocean shore, and that is so hard to worship properly, will attain the rarest form of salvation."

In the Utkala Khanda of Narada Purana (52.12) the Lord answers a question by Lakshmi Devi: pratimam tatra tam dristva svayam devena nirmitam, anyasena vai yanti bhavanam me tato narah, "In the greatest of all the holy places there is an image of the Lord that was directly manifested. Anyone who sees this form attains my abode."

The definition of Jagannatha as daru brahman also appears in Padma Purana, Brihad Vishnu and Tattva yamala: samudrasyottare tire aste sri purushottame, purnananda mayam brahma daru vyaja sarira bhrit, "In the land of Purushottama on the north shore of the sea, Brahman, the full manifestation of happiness, plays at taking a wooden/ tree body", niladrau chotkale dese kshetre sri purushottame, daruny aste cidanando jagannathakhyam murtina, "At Niladri, in the holy place known as Sri Purushottama kshetra in Orissa, the Supreme embodiment of happiness and knowledge manifests in a form of tree/ wood, known as Jagannatha/ the Universal Lord", bharate chotkale dese bhu svarge purushottame, daru rupi jagannatho bhaktanam abhaya pradah, nara ceshtam upadaya ya aste mokshaika karakah, "In Bharata Varsha (India), in the kingdom of Orissa, in that heaven on Earth known as Purushottama, Jagannatha/ the Universal Lord manifests to take away all the fears of his devotees. Although he seems to act like a human being, he is the only one who can give liberation."

"Extending downwards and upwards, its branches develop the gunas, the twigs become the sense objects, and grow downwards to become roots and spread even more to bind human beings with duties.

The tree of the universal manifestation is the Tree of Life, also known as the wish-fulfilling Tree (kalpa vriksha or kalpa taru). It is the manifestation of God's opulence and compassion for the conditioned souls who have so many desires to fulfill, and gives all sorts of fruits. Contrarily to what some people believe, the fulfillment of material desires and the ordinary life in the world are not detrimental to spiritual life or contrary to the religious spirit. In fact, devotional service or the worship of the Supreme is open to all - those who have overcome all desires, those who have unlimited desires, and those who desire liberation (Bhagavata Purana, 2.3.10). However, the universe is a complex and sophisticated project, and a good knowledge of its mechanisms, dynamics and laws is necessary in order to move around effectively and obtain the results we desire. The Vedic scriptures are the "Operating Manual" for the universe, and elaborate clearly and in detail about the proper procedures (or duties, karmani) that human beings are expected to follow. The possibilities are endless, with millions of varieties of bodies in which we can incarnate, each with their particular set of senses of perception and action, as well as millions of sense objects, all produced by the infinite combinations of the gunas of material nature.

For each desire we want to get fulfilled, there are duties that we must perform as payment of the debt (rina) we incur in.

As already explained in the previous chapter (14.18), one can climb upwards or downwards, and each action will develop into further actions carrying us up or down. The branches of this Universal Tree keep producing the permutations and interactions of the gunas, and each specific mixture creates the sense objects like innumerable twigs, providing livelihood to all creatures. The leaves of the tree are the Vedic hymns (chandamsi, 15.1), that guide us in the pursuit of our desired sense objects according to the particular set of duties determined by our guna and karma (3.28, 3.29, 4.13). If we try to acquire the sense objects we desire without following and discharging the prescribed duties, we will become bound by the reactions of our activities and the interaction of the gunas will make us fall to the lower branches, towards the selfish and degraded activities, where the taste of the fruits becomes bitter. Previous commentators explain the fruits of this Tree as dharma, artha, kama, moksha, but these are only the best and healthiest fruits, growing on the upper branches; on the lower branches we find the opposite type of fruits, such as adharma and anartha, with the abundance of unhealthy, illusory and temporary joys and sorrows that grow out of them. All positions on this tree remain temporary (8.16); this is indicated by the very name of the asvattha, that is explained as na svab sthāyati, where svab means "tomorrow".

The tree in itself is eternal and manifests in cycles, but we will not be able to stay forever on any of its branches: in the human form of life we get the opportunity to climb up towards the primeval original root, and discover the treasure that is hidden there, beyond Brahma who was the first created being and expanded the universe downwards through the process of secondary creation.

The expression urdhva mulam ("roots upwards") indicates that the roots grow upwards and also that the original root is at the top of the tree; previous commentators have observed that such an "upside down" tree is merely a reflection of a real tree on the water, so whatever is lowest here in the material world will be highest in the spiritual world. There is some deep hidden truth in this statement, but it needs to be understood correctly, because someone who has not attained the transcendental level of life could misinterpret it disastrously and even create confusion and scandals among the general public. We should proceed gradually and carefully in the study of the transcendental science, without jumping over important points or cutting corners, because the results will not be the same as those obtained through the proper process.

The asvattha tree of Vedic knowledge is not a contradiction of the fundamental principles of ethics and logic; what is ethical in this material world is also ethical in the spiritual world. Truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness and self-control do not lose their value and certainly do not become negative qualities or cause for degradation on the spiritual level: this must be understood very clearly. Therefore we should stick to what Krishna is actually saying in Bhagavad gita, and understand that the roots growing upwards and from the top at the same time refer to the fact that the universe develops from a single root at the highest level (Brahma) and then branches down in so many ramifications. If we want to discover the root, we must therefore rise upwards, and not downwards as we would do with an ordinary tree.

This asvattha tree is also very real, and not a mere reflection or illusion. Those who consider this universe as mere illusion are mayavadis - people who believe that illusion is the strongest power, and buckle under such power to non-sustainable conclusions described as asuric by Krishna (asatyam apratistham te jagad abur anisvaram, 16.8). Saying that the asvattha tree of Purushottama, the Virata Purusha, is merely an illusory reflection is a very dangerous and misleading statement indeed.

अश्वत्थमेनं सुविरूढमूलं असङ्गशस्त्रेण दृढेन छित्त्वा ॥ १५-३ ॥

aśvatthamenam suvirūḍhamūlaṁ asaṅgaśastreṇa dṛḍhena chittvā ॥ 15-3 ॥

na: not; rūpam: the form; asya: its; iha: here; tatha: also; upalabhyate: can be perceived; na: not; antaḥ: the end; na: not; ca: and; adīrṇa: the beginning; na: not; ca: and; sampratīṣṭhā: the foundation; asvattham: asvattha (tree); enam: this; su virudha: very strong; mūlam: the root; asanga: (of) detachment; sastra: with the weapon; dṛḍhena: determined; chittva: cutting.

"Its form cannot be perceived from here, as it has no end or beginning or foundation. Its very strong root should be cut with the weapon of determined detachment."

This verse is also very easy to misunderstand. We cannot cut and destroy the tree of the Universal Form: that would be completely impossible. Not only it cannot be perceived (upalabhyate na) from our position (iha), but it spreads everywhere for all the innumerable billions of jīvatmans in the past, present and future - an endless expanse of extremely strong roots and branches. Even if one soul breaks free from the tangle, there would still be innumerable other souls who still live in the tree and will not become liberated until their desires and karmic consequences have been fully exhausted.

This asvattha constituted by Vedic knowledge is eternal (has no beginning or end) and cannot be destroyed. Also, it should not be destroyed, and in fact Bhagavan descends personally from age to age, or sends his assistants, to save Vedic knowledge and re-establish its vigor for the benefit of all beings, in accordance to the specific circumstances and the particular audience, so much that to a superficial observer it may seem that such teachings vastly differ from one instance to another.

For example, in Bhagavata Purana (3.31.36) we see that Brahman appeared as a stag (riksha) to mate with her consort and daughter the Earth, exactly like in the Celtic and pre-Celtic tradition. Varaha appeared in a very distant age, and at that time Varahi was even more popular than him; we know that in vast regions of the planet, Mother Boar was worshiped, and we can still find the traces of that worship. In Bhagavata Purana (2.7.37) we also find a verse speaking of a space traveler Buddha dressing in a very attractive way to distract the asuras from their galactic wars of conquest. Therefore a thoughtful person who has attentively studied all the available shastra and honestly and faithfully practiced and applied their teachings by constantly meditating on the Vedic instructions will notice many small jewels scattered here and there, like stars in a clouded night, that observed in the proper perspective reveal a secret map to a higher dimension of Consciousness that goes completely beyond the intellectual level and into a realm that many will find unbelievable (acintya). Our determination and detachment are required to sharpen our individual intelligence and use it to cut ourselves away from the tangle of the tree, becoming able to trace its original root and even go beyond that. It is a major paradigm shift that we can effect only when we understand the nature and identity of the Supreme Purusha, the Purushottama.

There is a famous scene in the film "Matrix", where the protagonist, Neo, is visiting the home of the Oracle, and meets a young boy who is practicing the control of consciousness. The boy, with shaved head and clad in sannyasi-like clothing in spite of his obvious Caucasian origin, is bending a spoon by applying the power of the mind, and explains to Neo that he should not try to physically bend the spoon - because that would be impossible. He should rather realize that the spoon does not exist as it appears to be, and the paradigm shift in the consciousness will do the needful. This brilliant artistic inspiration is not far from reality, as we can see in many cutting edge research works both in physics and psychology: when our perception changes, the situation changes around us. We are consciousness, just like the Supreme Purusha is Consciousness. The Tree of the Universe is simply the expansion or manifestation of consciousness, and the elementary laws of physics only apply to time, space and individuality. Once we cut through the thick layers of ahankara and maṁatva that define time, space and individuality, we are not subject to such laws any more, and we become disentangled from the tree itself.

The weapon required to cut ourselves free is the sharp intelligence that shows us how all the fruits of the tree are temporary and cannot give real happiness (5.22); this realization is called detachment (asanga). We have already commented on the particular meaning of the word sanga and its opposite asanga, because they appear many times in the verses spoken by Krishna (2.47, 2.48, 2.62, 3.9, 3.26, 4.20, 4.23, 5.10, 5.11, 11.55, 12.18, 13.22, 14.6, 14.7, 14.15, and 15.5, 18.6, 18.9, 18.23, 18.26).

The literal meaning of the word sanga derives from sa ("together with") and anga ("limb, member, part of a body") and extends to all those things that are related to the material body, such as identifications and attachments, especially in regard to activities and qualities. Religious Organizations insist much on the value of sanga, or "association", "affiliation", "membership", because of the encouragement and support that the company of good people and favorable social structures can give to individuals, especially in Kali yuga. Therefore sadhu sanga ("the association with good people") is recommended as a principle of devotional practice by many teachers. However, the word sanga is not used in Bhagavad gita for this purpose; rather Krishna insists that we should become "free from all association" (or anyway, "associated with liberation" only). This is an extremely important point that we need to understand if we want to graduate from materialistic religiosity to the pure transcendental level of dharma and true spiritual life.

Genuine bhagavat dharma, taught in Bhagavad gita and Bhagavata Purana, is beyond this materialistic level of religiosity: dharma projhita kaitavo atra parama, "Here we completely reject materialistic religiosity, that is deceitful, and only pursue transcendence", (Bhagavata Purana 1.1.2). Of course, not everybody is able to rise to this level, and it would be unwise to try to push people to take this position artificially, out of positive or negative compulsion. Krishna explicitly forbids us to do so: na buddhi bhedam janayed ajnanam karma sanginam, josayet sarva karmani vidvan yuktabh samacaran, "A person who has knowledge should not confuse the understanding of the ignorant who are attached to their actions, but should rather help them to engage in all activities in a spirit of cooperation, giving a good example personally" (3.26).

People who still have material desires should not be pressurized to "give them up" artificially, but rather to pursue them in a dharmic way, according to the detailed instructions (the "Operating Manual") supplied by the Vedas. In this way, the natural progression of evolution will carry the conditioned soul through dharma to artha, kama and finally moksha, without the danger of degradation.

The roots of the Universal Tree are very strong (su virudha mula), and very rightly they should be, because they keep the conditioned souls engaged according to the perfect plan of the divine Consciousness. We should advise and encourage each and every individual in their particular personalized way, because what is powerful medicine for someone will be lethal poison for another, or even for the same person in different circumstances. Therefore the driddha (determination) mentioned in this verse in connection with the cutting of the roots of attachment should be applied with intelligence, and not under the influence of rajas or tamas. This surgery is extremely delicate, and will bring disaster is performed by unqualified "doctors", who deliberately or unwittingly ignore relevant factors due to carelessness or impersonalism, or because of an overpowering desire for personal selfish advantages, such as increasing the number of disciples and followers, possessions, name and fame, etc.

Spiritual evolution is not a "one size fits all" T shirt. Trying to make everyone fit into the mold by cutting off pieces of bodies or by stretching them to breaking point is not a good idea. The guidance of qualified teachers is required to continue progressing in our dharmic duties and engagements, without losing sight of the final purpose - transcending the cosmic manifestation and attaining the supreme position. Dutiful religionists should not forget this, to avoid becoming self-complacent and self-righteous: Krishna had already given the warning in verses from 2.42 to 2.46 talking about the veda vada ratah and how they are missing the point. Therefore the learned brahmanas must always remember the supreme position of Vishnu in all their rituals and in the performance of all duties: om tad visnob paramam padam sada pasyanti surayah divina caksur atatam visnor yat paramam padam. This is the verdict of the Rig Veda samhita (1.22.20), repeated in several Upanishads (Paingala, 4.30-32, Subala, 6.6, Tara sara, 3,9, Tripura tapani, 4.13).

ततः पदं तत्परिमार्गितव्यं यस्मिन्गता न निवर्तन्ति भूयः ।

tataḥ padam tatparimārgitavyam yasmingatā na nivartanti bhūyaḥ ।

tameva cādyam puruṣam prapadye । yataḥ pravṛtṭiḥ prasṛtā purāṇī ॥ 15-4 ॥

tataḥ: then; padam: position; tat: that; parimārgitavyam: must be searched; yasmin: where; gataḥ: having reached there; na: not; nivartanti: come back; bhūyaḥ: again; tam: that; eva: certainly; ca: and; adyam: primordial; puruṣam: the Purusha; prapadye: taking shelter; yataḥ: from whom; pravṛtṭiḥ: creation/ development/ engagement; prasṛtā: extended; purāṇī: very ancient.

"Then, one should search that position from which one does not fall back again, taking shelter in (God), the primeval (being), from whom all this creation has developed.

The word tataḥ, "then", indicates the position of complete detachment, attained by cutting one's material identifications and attachments, including the good and dutiful ones. One can reach this point by sincerely and carefully following Krishna's instructions in Bhagavad gita and the other Vedic scriptures; we should remember that it is the tree itself that supplies the handle for the ax to cut through it.

Disentangling oneself from the many branches and twigs does not mean one should abandon it and run away somewhere else. Rather, the freedom we achieve through detachment should serve us truly in our quest for the original root - the Virata Purusha, the Purushottama, who is at the highest position in the Universal Tree. This is indicated by the expression adyam puruṣa prapadye: Vishnu is the real root and cause of pravṛtṭi as dutiful action (yataḥ pravṛtṭiḥ prasṛtā) since the dawn of creation (3.10 to 3.16). So cutting this tree to find the root is more like the final harvesting of the very valuable result of all the cultivation - the ultimate purpose of the useful plant itself from the very beginning.

All the activities supported by the Vedic hymns have the ultimate purpose of pleasing Vishnu: dharmah svanusthitah pumsam, visvakṣena kathasū yab, notpadayed yadi ratim, srama eva hi kevalam, "The occupational duties of a person become simply tiring labor if they do not give rise to the desire to hear about God," (Bhagavata Purana 1.2.8), and ataḥ pumbhir drijā srestha, varnasrama vibhagasab, svanusthitasya dharmasya, samsiddhir hari tosanam, "Thus, o best among the twice-born, the prescribed duties according to the varna and asrama system find their perfection in pleasing Hari" (Bhagavata Purana 1.2.13).

Another very interesting word in this verse is parimārgitavyam, a compound including the word marga, meaning "road". The search for the Supreme is like a journey, and once we embark on this road, the final success is guaranteed (6.37 to 6.45). From a practical perspective, we can search this Universal Tree like a genealogical tree, tracing its origin up to Brahma, the first created being, and to his origin, Maha Vishnu. Brahma is the prapitamaha, the great forefather of all human beings as well of all other living entities, and therefore he is considered the prime authority in the universe. At each manifestation cycle, Brahma expresses the Vedic knowledge from within his heart through the direct instructions of Vishnu (tene brahma brida yab adi kavaye, Bhagavata Purana 1.1.1). This direct transmission of knowledge is also possible for all individual souls (10.11) who are sincere enough.

Krishna has already declared that he (Vishnu) is the origin or root of all existences, although he cannot be perceived materially (as he says here, na rupam asyeha tatopalabhyate, 15.3) in chapter 10: aham sarvasya prabhavo mattah sarvam pravartate, iti matva bhajante mam budha bhava samanvitah, "I am the origin of existence of everything, as everything emanates from me. Intelligent people remember this, and worship me with intense attention", (10.8). The position of Vishnu is therefore higher than Brahma and transcendental to this world, yet omnipresent and perfectly aware of everything. Vishnu resides in the hearts of all beings (10.11, 10.20, 13.18); this chapter will state it again and more forcefully (15.15) and the conclusion of Bhagavad gita will again declare it definitely (18.61).

But we also know that Vishnu always resides in his param dhama, his supreme abode or position. So if Vishnu is present in the hearts of all living beings, does this mean that all the spiritual world is also present within the hearts of those beings, together with Vishnu? It certainly is. We should not apply the material limitations of time, space and separation to the transcendental Godhead, because he is beyond the grasp of the material senses and mind not only in his aspects of Bhagavan, Paramatma and Brahman (8.9, 11.42, 12.3), but even as Atman (2.25). A very interesting word in this and other verses (2.51, 8.11, 15.4, 15.5, 18.56) is padam, that conveys the meanings of "position, abode, place" and its reinforced form sampada, as in 16.3 etc. An extension of this meaning of "position" is "a passage from the scriptures", as in verse, 13.5 (brahma sutra padais). Another connected word is pada (with a long a in first position), that means "feet" or "legs" (see verse 13.14 for example). From this word we also get the word prapadye ("taking shelter"), an action that is traditionally symbolized by the gesture of touching the feet or legs of the person we surrender to. The pada or position of Vishnu, the paravyoma or spiritual space, is beyond the root of the Universal Tree. In this meaning, the synonym dhama is used several times (8.21, 10.12, 11.38, 15.6). When the jivatman attains this supreme abode, there is no danger of falling back. This is also confirmed again in 15.6 and had already been stated in 8.21: avyakto 'kshara ity uktas tam abuh paramam gatim, yam prapya na nivartante tad dhama paramam mama, "That is said to be non-manifested, non subject to change, and the highest destination. By attaining it, one does not fall back. That is my supreme abode." On the other hand, those who do not take shelter in the Supreme will have to continue moving around in the Universal Tree, as confirmed in Bhagavata Purana: ya esam purusam saksad, atma prabhavam isvaram, na bhajanty avajananti, sthanad bhrastah patanty adbah, "One who does not worship Isvara, who is the Purusha himself, the source of the atman, will fall from his position", (Bhagavata Purana 11.5.3).

This had also been explained in chapter 9: traī vidya mam soma pab puta papa yajnair istva svar gatim prarthayante, te punyam asadya surendra lokam asnanti dīryan divi deva bhogan, te tam bhuktvā svarga lokam visalam ksine punye martya lokam visanti, evam tryi dharmam anuprapanna gatagatam kama kama labhante, "Those who know the three Vedas, who drink the soma and who are purified from all wrongs through the acts of sacrifice, worshipping me in this way pray to attain Svarga. After reaching the pious planets of Indra in heaven they enjoy the celestial pleasures of the Devas. After a long time spent in the enjoyment of Svargaloka, those who have exhausted their virtuous merits fall down again to the level of mortals. In this way, following strictly the path of the three dharmas (brahmana, kshatriya, vaishya), they develop a lust for desires and they continue to take birth and die" (9.20-21).

nib: without; mana: sense of prestige; mohah: illusion; jita: having conquered; sanga doshab: the defects due to association; adhyatma: in the original Self; nitya: constantly; vinivṛtta: detached; kamab: desires; dvandvaih: from dualities; vimuktah: completely liberated; sukha duḥkha: joys and sorrows; saṁjñaiḥ: understood/ known as; gacchanti: they go; amudhab: those who are not stupid; padam: position; anyayam: eternal; tat: that.

"This eternal position is attained by those who have conquered and eliminated the sense of prestige, illusion, and the defects due to identification and attachment. These intelligent persons are always conscious of the true self (adhyatman) and so they are completely free from desires, as well as from the joys and sorrows created from duality.

The word nirmana, placed in a special position at the beginning of the verse, is particularly interesting. Since mana means "honor" and the negative prefix nib or nir indicates the absence, the general meaning of the word is "lack of honor". Of course, this does not mean that a liberated soul enjoys being disrespected or insulted: it means that s/he does not like being showed special honor, because this could reinforce the ahankara and attachment to position and the danger of intoxication that is carries. Therefore genuine devotees and liberated souls only accept those honors that are favorable to the performance of their specific mission, and never demand or even welcome anything more than that. Actually, even a king or a guru should show a healthy dose of genuine humility and detachment from honors, because this behavior is inspiring and sets a very good example for their followers. Krishna has already stated: yad yad acarati sresthas tat tad evetaro janah, sa yat pramanam kurute lokas tad anuvartate, "Whatever a great leader does, the general common people follow the example as his activities are implicitly accepted as the authoritative standard by the public" (3.21).

Such consideration is not merely based on good personal character, but it also help preventing the opinion that a leadership position entails special material benefits, such as worship, power, sense gratification, etc, and therefore it should be pursued with such material motivations. Of course this idea is created by illusion, but as we have seen in the previous chapter, tamas can easily creep into the best plans and spoil them. A person who is totally free from illusion is naturally modest and humble, because s/he sees clearly that his/ her role in God's plan is merely a small service, enabled by a greater power that supplies all ingredients for the action (18.13-14, 18.19). The same negative prefix nib or nir applies here to the word moha (illusion), as in this verse mana and moha are compounded in a single expression.

This clear consciousness of one's true position is exactly the opposite of the illusion of ahankara and mamatva, the defects (dosa) of association or identification (sanga). Therefore Krishna connects all three factors as one and the same requirement: nirmana-moha-jita-sanga-dosa, saying very clearly that one needs to become free from the illusion of demanding recognition as the karta ("doer") based on ahankara and mamatva. This point was already stated very forcefully in verse 3.7: prakṛiteḥ kriyamanāni gunāni karmāni sarvasaḥ, ahankāra vimudhatma kartāham iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'."

So now we have clarified what should be eliminated (neti neti). What is the positive activity we should engage in? Krishna explains, adhyatma-nitya vivivṛita-kamab: always focus on the adhyatma, the Supreme Soul, the original Atman, and cultivate desires that are perfectly renounced - desires for renunciation and transcendence that are pertaining to the adhyatma.

We should notice that here the word kamab is expressed in the plural form ("desires"); this expression has two meanings, indicating that one should "be free from engagement in cultivating all the different desires", and at the same time one should "desire all those things that are favorable to detachment". There is nothing wrong in desire in itself, as in fact desire is the natural quality of the jiva who strives to reunite with God; the problems come when such primeval desire is not properly directed through consciousness and jumps around without control, running after the sense objects. We could compare desire to a beam of light, that can be focused intensely into a laser effect and perform astounding things, cutting through the thick darkness of illusion and egotism. However, if the beam is not focused enough, we will only be able to see what it shows - the theories and possibilities and the work to be done. On the other hand, if the beam is very concentrated and keeps jumping and running around without control, it will bring destruction and suffering (2.63). If it jumps around without control but is not strongly focused, it will simply dazzle and blind us into a vague confusion typical of tamas.

The third line is also logically connected to the previous two. One needs to become free from ahankara (mana, moha, as born from sanga dosa) and also from the dualities that are known as joys and sorrows (sukha dukha samjñair), by focusing on the adhyatma and directing one's desires towards transcendence only.

Duality is presented as a fundamental defect in many verses (2.45, 4.22, 5.3, 7.27, 7.28), and the solution is to tolerate the constant changes and transformations created by duality, such as joys and sorrows. Trying to avoid the sorrows or increase the joys artificially (with "forceful action" generally adharmic in nature) is not a good solution, because joys and sorrow automatically come as the results of our good and bad deeds, and only good deeds can really neutralize sorrows. So while we sincerely perform our dutiful dharmic actions, we need to tolerate whatever remains of negative consequences are still coming to us. Not only sorrows, but joys as well can be distracting, therefore one should become detached from them all.

The word amudha ("not stupid") is particularly interesting because it implies that mana, moha, sanga dosa and dvandva are symptoms of foolishness. Only intelligence (buddhi yoga, 2.39, 2.41, 2.44, 2.49, 2.50, 2.51, 2.52, 2.53, 2.63, 4.18, 5.20, 6.9, 6.21, 6.43, 8.7, 10.10, 12.8, 12.14, 15.20, 18.16, 18.29, 18.30, 18.36, 18.57) as the main characteristic of satva can lead us out from illusion and to the supreme position of eternal Transcendence (padam anyayam tat).

na tadbhāsayate sūryo na śaśāṅko na pāvakaḥ | yadgatvā na nivartante taddhāma paramaṁ mama || 15-6 ||

na: not; tat: that; bhasayate: illuminates; suryah: the sun; na: not; sasankah: the moon; na: not; pavakah: fire/ electricity; yat: where; gatva: having gone; na: not; nivartante: they come back; tat: that; dhama: abode; paramam: supreme/ transcendental; mama: mine.

"That (supreme position) is not illuminated by the sun, the moon or fire/ electricity. Those who reach that supreme abode, my abode, will not return (here).

Katha Upanishad (2.2.15) contains a very similar verse: na tatra suryo bhāti na candra tarakam, nema vidyuto bhanti kuto agni, "In that (dimension) there is no (need of light from) sun, moon, stars, lightning or fire". We should not foolishly conclude that because in the spiritual dimension there is no specific source of light, darkness reigns unbroken - it is rather the opposite, as spirit itself is the origin of all the light even in this world. When we speak about the light of sun, moon, stars, fire, lightning and electricity, we automatically imply the existence of darkness that thrives in their absence, because their presence is limited. All such objects are material, and as such they are subject to the law of constant movement and transformation - appearance and disappearance, creation and dissolution. The supreme position (param dhama) is beyond such duality.

The word tat mentioned in this and the previous verse clearly indicate the supreme Transcendence. The Personality of Godhead is non-different from his abode or position, because the param dhama is pure consciousness, the supreme light of intelligence and existence of visuddha satva. There is no shadow or darkness in the supreme Consciousness: everything is clear and thoroughly understood, without limits of separation, time or place. When we become free from the dualistic mentality, we will be able to see this. This is the reason why there is no need for separate or distinct illumination in this transcendental dimension. The sun (surya), the moon (sasanka) and fire (pavaka) are the sources of light we know in this world, and enable us whatever faculty of sight and understanding our senses can have in this dimension obscured by the cloud of abankara and mamatva. The fact is that the spiritual dimension, the param dhama, is already present everywhere in the universe, and the material world is merely the region we perceive as covered by the abankara cloud - but it is our vision that is covered, not the eternal light. This is confirmed by many verses in various scriptures, including Bhagavad gita:

divi surya sahasrasya bhaved yugapad utthita, yadi bhab sadrisi sa syad bhasas tasya mahatmanah, "If thousands of suns were rising simultaneously in the sky, that radiance would be similar to the radiance of the great Atman." (11.12)

jyotisam api taj jyotis tamasaḥ param ucyate, jneyam jnana gamyam bridi sarvasya vishitam, "He is described as the light in all radiant things, transcendental to darkness. He is established in the heart of everything, and he is to be known through the cultivation of knowledge." (13.18) kiritinam gadinam cakerinam ca tejo rasim sarvato diptimantam, pasyami tvam durnirikṣyam samantad diptanalarka dyutim aprameyam, "The luminous radiance of all those crowns, maces, and discs is everywhere, so dazzling that I can barely see you. It is like the rays of the sun or an immeasurable blazing fire." (11.17)

yo 'ntah sukho 'ntar aramas tathantar jyotir eva yab, sa yogi brahma nirvanam brahma bhuto 'dhigacchati, "One who is happy within the self, who finds pleasure within the self, who finds the light within the self is a yogi who attains the brahma nirvana and the existence of Brahman." (5.24)

yatha prakasayaty ekah kritnam lokam imam ravib, ksetra, ksetri tatha kritnam prakasayati bharata, "O Bharata, just like the sun illuminates all this world, in the same way the ksetri illuminates the entire ksetra." (13.34).

Attaining this pada or dhama that is constituted by pure light and consciousness requires a radical change of perspective, a true realization of the deepest nature of Reality. It is not sufficient simply to dress up in saffron cloth or white cloth or shaving one's head, because these are merely externals with the only purpose of alerting the public that we are not interested in ordinary mundane pursuits and subjects.

There are several other verses that state how a yogi who has attained this supreme position never falls back again on the material level of understanding (8.15, 8.16, 8.21, 15.4). The liberated personalities who descend in this world from time to time as avatars - svamsa or vibhinamsa, either direct Personalities of Godhead or his servants - are not falling in material consciousness, and therefore they never leave the param dhama.

It is also interesting to note that the word bhasayate ("illuminates") is from the same root as bhasya or "commentary", meant to illuminate the understanding of the readers. The same meaning is contained in the word dipika ("lamp") often used in the titles of commentaries. We should not foolishly think that commentaries are meant to illuminate the original text on which they elaborate: the illumination applies to the intelligence or understanding (buddhi) of the readers, who need more explanations to grasp the full meaning.

ममैवांशो जीवलोके जीवभूतः सनातनः । मनःषष्ठानीन्द्रियाणि प्रकृतिस्थानि कर्षति ॥ १५-७ ॥

mamaivāṁśo jīvaloke jīvabhūtaḥ sanātanaḥ । manaḥṣaṣṭhānīndriyāṇi prakṛtisthāni karṣati ॥ 15-7 ॥

mama: my; eva: certainly; amsaḥ: limb/ part; jīva loka: in the world of jīvas; jīva bhūtaḥ: the living beings; sanātanaḥ: eternal; manaḥ: the mind; sastani: the six; indriyani: the senses; prakṛiti: in prakṛiti; sthani: established; karṣati: cultivates/ attracts.

"The living being in this world is certainly a limb of my (body), and as such he is eternal. He toils in the material world, struggling with the mind and the senses that are the norm here.

The word amsa is particularly interesting. This verse clearly states that all the living entities are eternally "limbs" or "parts" of the body of the Supreme Lord. Not simply children or creatures of God, but parts of his own body. We can probably understand the concept better if we translate amsa as "cell" like the cells of our body. It is common knowledge that an average adult body is composed by approximately 100 thousand billions of living cells, all originated from the single cell of the fertilized egg, carrying the same genetic information but adapted in different forms according to their specific function - bones, muscles, nerves, etc. A body cell can continue to live only temporarily if it is separated from the body, like a spark from a fire that slowly becomes extinguished if it flies out of it (an example offered by Bṛihad aranyaka Upanishad, 2.1.20, yathagneḥ kṣudra viṣphulinga, "just as tiny sparks of fire fly in all directions").

On the spiritual level, of course, there is no real distance or separation and the cell can never die, because God's body is spiritual and omnipresent. The illusion of separation simply covers the light (the consciousness) of the spiritual cell, called jivatman, and can be overcome and reverted easily with the return to the proper consciousness. In fact, there is never any real separation - separation is simply perceived due to avidya: how can there be babir mukha (a jivatman's turning his face away from God) if Bhagavan is sarvato mukha (God's face is everywhere)? So the difference between svamsa and vibhinamsa cells is the quantity and not the quality of consciousness. Therefore there is division (pariccheda, vibhinna) and non-division at the same time. The same definition (amsa) is confirmed in Krishna's teachings to Uddhava: ekasyaiva mama amsasya, jivasyaiva maha mate, bandho 'syavidyayanadir, vidyaya ca tathetarab, "The jīva is a part of me, but is bound by timeless ignorance. However, it can change its position through knowledge" (Bhagavata Purana 11.11.4).

Like every healthy cell or limb in our body, each jivatman still retains a certain degree of individuality (name, different function etc) but its consciousness is solely directed to the service of the entire body and the highest consciousness in it. When the consciousness of the individual cell becomes distorted and does not function in a favorable mode of service, we understand that the cell has become diseased. A cell in our body can only subordinate its individual enjoyment to the enjoyment of the entire body. When all the cells of a body cooperate properly to nourish the body and to keep it in good health, they can automatically obtain the enjoyment and well being they naturally aspire to. Therefore the jivatman needs to subordinate his enjoyment to the enjoyment of the Supreme.

Each single cell has a different function in the body, but all cells need to be treasured, protected and nurtured according to their specific needs. This practical consideration of different engagements and requirements, however, is not based on prejudice, but on actual observation of the true potential of each individual. In this sense, the varnashrama system is the scientific knowledge that enables us to understand the specific functions of the individual cells in this world, and how they should be nurtured and engaged for the perfect health of the body of the Virata Purusha, that is clearly described as the incarnation of human society.

The key to understanding the nature of the jivatman is the fact that it is constituted by both the purusha principle and the prakriti principle: each individual living being is both male and female at the same time. The perfect balance of these two principles, that enjoy and support each other within the individual soul, mind and body, is the secret of the hatha yoga and of all the similar sciences that existed in the world, such as alchemy, or the Mysteries of ancient Egypt and Greece, the Divine Marriage, and other secret doctrines and practices that were revealed only to a small group of initiates.

The living entity emanates from the Godhead as a seed (bija), an atomic (anu atman) spark of the Fire, as a minuscule cell of the body of the Parama Purusha, but it contains the "spiritual DNA" (so to speak) by which he will be able to perfectly develop into a fully fledged spiritual form and personality like Bhagavan.

This is confirmed by the famous mantra that we find as invocation in several Upanishads of the Sukla Yajur Veda, including Isa Upanishad: om purnam adah purnam idam, purnat purnam udacyate, purnasya purnam adayah, purnam evavasiyate, "From this (Brahman) who is eternally complete (in itself), all complete (jivatman) emanate, and even after that, what was complete remains complete." Each and every emanation is complete and perfect in itself, yet the Supreme remains complete and perfect.

Each jiva is eternally individual (jiva bhuta sanatanah) as confirmed by Krishna already at the beginning of the Bhagavad gita (2.12), and can never be destroyed (2.23-24). However, when the jivatma enters this jiva loka, the world of the jivas or the collectivity of the jivas, he is under-developed and merely an atomic soul (anu atma) that will grow through experience and evolution to a fully fledged spiritual body (siddha deha). Its atomic dimension is described by Svetasvatara Upanishad (5.9): balagra sata bhagasya satadha kalpitasya ca, "if the tip of a hair is divided into 100 parts, and then again into 100, this can be compared to the size of the jivatman".

The anu atma can grow into maturity by cultivating his own evolution; this is indicated in the second part of the verse especially by the word karsati, that contains a variety of meanings, that include "cultivating" (as in farming and tilling the soil), "struggling", "being aggrieved". For example, farmers are called karsakas in Bhagavata Purana (10.2041). However, karsati also means "attracting", as in the name of Sankarsana, the first emanation of Vasudeva in the material world, who presides over the sense of identification.

This function attracts the conditioned soul to the matrix where he will take birth, like a magnet attracts various material elements, beginning from ahankara. The growth of the microcosmic human body is in fact a reflection of the macrocosmic body of the Virata Purusha in the process of universal creation.

After the manifestation of ahankara (the sense of identity and doership), material understanding or intelligence (buddhi) develops, and from it the mind (manah) is manifested. In turn, the mind manifests the five senses of perception (indriya) and so on. The anu atma is thus attracted into this rich matrix full of opportunities and elements, and develops a body that will enable him to work on his further evolution. The subtle body consisting of the mind and the five primary senses of perception is therefore considered the "establishment" of prakriti or material nature, a sort of agricultural or business enterprise in which the anu atma becomes engaged as an apprentice worker.

The mind and senses constitute the subtle body of the conditioned soul, and are developed through the activities (karma) and association with the material qualities (gunas). This subtle body is also called karana body because it is the cause of the particular type of gross body that the conditioned soul will develop for his next birth, based on affinities and tuning. The same will attract the same, and the guna and karma carried by the subtle body will get an opportunity to manifest on the gross level. In chapter 7, Krishna had described the jivatmans born in this world as para (spiritual) prakriti (nature), by whom the universe is upheld (7.5).

शरीरं यदवाप्नोति यच्चाप्युत्क्रामतीश्वरः । गृहित्वैतानि संयाति वायुर्गन्धानिवाशयात् ॥ १५-८ ॥

śarīraṁ yadavāpnoti yaccāpyutkrāmatisīśvaraḥ । grhitvaitāni saṁyāti vāyurghāṇānivaśayāt ।। 15-8 ।।

sariram: the body; yat: that; avapnoti: obtains; yat: that; ca api: and also; utkrāmati: gives up; īśvaraḥ: the Lord; grihita: accepting; etani: all these; saṁyati: goes away; vāyuh: air; gandhan: smells; iva: like; asayat: from their source.

"The Lord who has entered a body and accepted all these (the mind and senses), then goes out again (with them), like the air carries the scents.

The subject in the verse is called īśvara ("the Lord"), just like he was called prabhu ("the Lord") in verse 5.14 with reference to the same issue (na kartritvam na karmani lokasya srijati prabhub, na karma phala samyogam svabharas tu pravartate, "The Lord does not create/ manifest the idea of being the cause of the actions performed by other people. Thus he is not engaged by the results of activities. It is only his nature that acts").

We should remember that the param atman is the soul of the soul, and therefore he is the one directing the movements of the jiva atman and always accompanying him from one body to the other, residing with him in each and every body, one after the other. The jiva atman is only the subordinate atman, emanation (prabha) of the supreme Lord, but since he is of the same nature (prakriti), he also can be called Lord, especially in connection with the material body and senses that constitute his own prakriti. Both the isvara and atman are ksetra jna: idam sariram kaunteya ksetram ity abhidhiyate, etad yo vetti tam prabuh ksetra jna iti tad vidah, ksetra jnam capi mam viddhi sarva ksetresu bharata, ksetra ksetrajnayor jnanam yat taj jnanam matam mama, "O Kaunteya, this body is called the field, and one who knows this body is called the knower of the field. O Bharata, you should know that I am also the knower of the field who resides in all fields. Knowing the field and the knower of the field is called knowledge. This is my opinion." (13.2-3)

We know from the Upanishads (Mundaka 3.1.1,2, Svetasvatara 4.6,7), that the two purushas (the jivatman and the paramatman) like two birds of the same nature, are sitting on the same tree (the body). One of the two is engrossed in contemplating and eating the fruits of the tree, while the other is simply watching him and waiting for him to realize his glories, which will put an end to all worries (samane vrikse purusho nimagno anisaya socati muhyamanah, justam yada pasyati anyam isam asya mahimanam iti vita-sokah; dva suparna sayujya sakhyaya samanam vriksam parisavajate tayor anyah pippalam svadv atty anasnann anyo 'bhichakasiti). The same is confirmed by Krishna while instructing Uddhava: suparnav etau sadrisau sakhyau, yadricchayaitau krita nidau ca vrikse, ekas tayoh khadati pippalannam anyo niranno 'pi balena bhuyan, "Two similar birds somehow nested on the same banyan tree; one is eating the fruits (annam), the other is not eating, but he is the strongest" (Bhagavata Purana 11.11.6).

This is also confirmed in Vedanta sutras: sariras cobhaye api hi bhedena enam adhiyate, "Both (the jivatman and the paramatman) are present within the body, as distinct from each other" (Vedanta sutra 1.2.20) and guhāṃ pravistav atmanam hi tad darsanat, "Both (jivatman and paramatman) have entered the cave (of the body), but the atman is distinct from that (supreme)" (Vedanta sutra 1.2.113). Although the transcendental bird does not get entangled in the fruits of the tree, he still moves from one body to another to accompany the conditioned bird, out of friendship and love. With the same affection, the jivatman who is sincerely devoted to the paramatman focuses all his attention on the supreme Friend: this is the meaning of the statement ekam eva dvitīyam, "one without second".

The word samyati means "leaves, travels"; we find it in the same context in verse 2.22: vasamsi jirmani yatha vibhaya navani gribhanti naro 'parani, tatha sarirani vibhaya jirnany anyani samyati navani debi, "Just like a man abandons clothes that have become torn or worn out and acquires other and new clothes, in the same way one leaves the damaged body and accepts another new body."

As we mentioned in the commentary to the previous verse, the karana ("causal") body is the subtle sheath composed by the mind and senses according to the guna and karma developed in previous lifetimes. The word etani ("all these") refers specifically to the guna and karma developed by the conditioned souls, as well as the desires, the memories, the lessons learned, and all the other luggage. Carrying this luggage around (grihiṭva), the conditioned soul moves out of the old body and into the new one, accompanied by the param atman.

It is important to understand that the atman is never really tied by all this luggage, just like the nature of air is not actually touched by any scent - pleasant or unpleasant. The odors of air are due to the particles of matter that are carried temporarily, and that easily precipitate back to the ground when they are washed by the rain or sublimated by the heat and light of the sun. The comparison here can be applied to the remembrance, discussion and study of the transcendental science of Godhead, that are like the radiant sunlight and a beneficial rain produced by the correct performance of yajnas or sacred actions.

Krishna confirms this same point in his teachings to Uddhava: manah karma mayam nrinam, indriyah pancabbir yutam, lokal lokam prayaty anya, atma tad anuvartate, "The mind of the human beings is constituted by karma. It moves from one loka to another, together with the five senses, and the atman follows them, although it is separate from them" (Bhagavata Purana 11.22.37).

The teachings of Kapila to Devahuti offer the same view: devena jiva bhutena, lokal lokam anuvrajan, bhunjana eva karmani, karoty aviratam puman, "The purusha constantly moves from one loka to another, reaping the fruits of its previous actions, because of the bodies designed for the jivas" (Bhagavata Purana 3.31.43).

The time of death is the most crucial moment of one's entire life, like the final examination test is the most crucial moment of an entire course of studies. One should be ready to face the challenge constituted by this passage, and pass the test. Another very important verse in this regard is from chapter 8: yam yam vapi smaran bhavam tyajaty ante kalevaram, tam tam evaiti kaunteya sada tad bhava bhavitah, "O Arjuna, whatever state of existence one remembers at the time of leaving the body, he attains that state of being, because of always contemplating that existence." (8.6). To be on the safe side, we should always keep our consciousness focused on the supreme Consciousness, so that we will always be established on the transcendental level, in any circumstance (8.7).

श्रोत्रं चक्षुः स्पर्शनं च रसनं घ्राणमेव च ।

अधिष्ठाय मनश्चायं विषयानुपसेवते ॥ १५-९ ॥

śrotraṁ cakṣuḥ sparśanaṁ ca rasanam ghrāṇameva ca | adhiṣṭhāya manaścāyaṁ viṣayānupasevate || 15-9 ||

śrotram: the organ of hearing; cakṣuḥ: the eyes; sparsanam: the organ of touch; ca: and; rasanam: the organ of taste; ghranam: the organ of smell; eva: certainly; ca: and; adhiṣṭhaya: situated in; manah: the mind; ca: and; ayam: s/he; viṣayan: the sense objects; upasevate: renders service.

"He becomes settled (there) with the mind and the senses organs - hearing, sight, touch, taste and smell - and renders service to/ through the sense objects.

The most interesting word in this verse is upasevate, that should not be translated simplistically as "enjoys" (the sense objects). As we know, the word seva mean "service", and upaseva is a reinforced form of the definition, as we find for example in Bhagavata Purana 5.1.6 with upasevaya, "by serving" in connection with the devotional service rendered by king Priyavrata. The Sanskrit word for "enjoys" is bhunkte (used for example in verse 3.12 of Bhagavad gita), closely related to the word bhoga ("pleasure, sense enjoyment, food").

According to the level of consciousness of the jivatman, this verse can be therefore interpreted in two different ways, that are not contradictory at all. When the conditioned soul is under the spell of illusion, he serves the sense objects by constantly associating with them - talking about them, hearing about them, remembering them, working to acquire the credits to attain them, and so on. When the soul turns his desires and consciousness to the supreme Personality of Godhead, he engages his minds and senses in the service of God, as clearly stated in Narada Pancharatra: hrisikesha hrisikena sevnam bhaktir ucyate, "Bhakti is the service rendered by using the senses for the pleasure of the Lord of the senses".

As we have seen through Krishna's teachings in Bhagavad gita, there are different levels on which we can perform this devotional service (4.23, 4.24, 9.27). When our consciousness is still on the neophyte platform we need to support our meditation with material objects, ritual ceremonies, elaborate offerings, etc. However, with constant practice and meditation we can internalize this consciousness and remain always situated in remembering the supreme Personality of Godhead and serving him in our heart, turning our senses and mind into the sacrificial instruments required for the rituals. This is possible only when we have risen above all the three gunas of material nature, and our consciousness has become free from all material identifications and attachments. As long as we have anarthas ("useless luggage") we will be distracted from this samadhi ("constant meditation"). This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (1.7.5): yaya sammohito jiva, atmanam tri gunatmakam, paro 'pi manute 'nartham, tat keritam cabhipadyate, "The jiva is transcendental to the 3 gunas, but still it can be confused into the false identification with them, and thus it has to suffer the consequences of anarthas".

The specific set of senses acquired by the conditioned soul in the new body is directly connected to the particular mixture of the gunas and the cumulative effect of the previous activities (karma), therefore the combinations can be almost endless: yah sarvesu bhutesu tisthan sarvebhyo bhutebhyo antaro, "(the atman) in all beings remains within various conditions" (Brihad aranyaka Upanishad, 3.7.15). See for example the huge difference in sense perception and taste between human beings and animals of various species, demonstrated daily by their behaviors and choices. Colors, smells, sounds, tastes are not the same for all bodies; dogs can hear sounds that are above the hearing range of humans (special whistles are made for this reason), and hogs whet their appetite by the smell and taste of excrements. Insects have multiple eyes and feelers that "read" small traces of substances suspended in air, bats use a kind of radar or sonar to avoid obstacles while flying, and cats can see in the dark much better than us and are fond of magnetic fields. Wolves and lions and other predators can recognize the smell the urine of each other at a distance of kilometers and so they can establish the boundaries of their hunting territories. Some animals (such as cats) can be killed by a relatively small dose of vitamin C, which they do not require at all, others (such as cockroaches) do not suffer from the effects of radiation as in nuclear fallout. And there are many more examples like that.

In the scale of evolution, the sense of hearing (shrotram) is the most important because it works even during our sleep when the other senses are inert, and travels even through ether in the absence of other elements; it also carries the most delicate and complex messages including the transcendental science (śabda brahman). This is the reason why in the process of primary creation the sense of hearing is the first to manifest, together with space (also called ether, or akasha) and sound.

The sense of sight is based on the development of form and fire and light, represented by the Sun as the main source of radiance in the material universe. The sense of touch is generated by the development of air from space and sound, and creates the feelings of heat from which fire appears. From fire, water manifests with the faculty of taste, and from water earth is created, with the faculty of smell. Here again we can apply the meaning of upasevate as recommended by Krishna in chapter 10 in response to Arjuna's question (10.17): katham vidyam aham yogims tram sada paricintayan, kesu kesu ca bhavesu cintyo 'si bhagavan maya, "O Yogi, how should I know you through constant meditation? O Lord, in which different ways and sentiments should I contemplate you?" (10.17).

As stated in verse 13.18, Brahman is also the object of perception, present not only as the Friend in each living being's heart, but also in every single atom (jyotisam api taj jyotis tamasah param ucyate, jneyam jnana gamyam hridi sarvasya visthitam, "He is described as the light in all radiant things, transcendental to darkness. He is established in the heart of everything, and he is to be known through the cultivation of knowledge.")

When we say that the material elements and non-animated objects are jada ("inert matter") we are simply making a distinction in relation to the jiva ("living being"), but in fact there is no jada - everything is Brahman, because shakti and shaktiman are not different, and even atoms are full of consciousness and intelligence. Paramatman is there within every atom and even in the "void" between atoms, and the elements and all material nature are also mahat tattva or mahat brahma. According to the shastra, the 5 mahabhutas (the fundamentals material elements) are also reflections or manifestations (pratibimba) of the consciousness of the presiding Devas who are parts of the supreme consciousness.

Thus we return to the symbolism of the Tree of the Universe offered in the first verse of the chapter, that could be interpreted as a reflection of Reality, like the image of the material tree on water. But instead of being separate from the real thing, like an ordinary reflection, the Universal Tree is a reflection-emanation, an image of the original that contains its symbolism and a considerable part of its potency.

The first original Reality is parabrahman Vishnu, the non-manifested: from this seed (bijam mam sarva bhutanam viddhi partha sanatana, 7.10) many sprouts appear as the amsas, or direct manifestations of the Godhead, that constitute the various aspects (qualities, forms, functions etc) of God. The first separated (vyakta) manifestation (vibhinna) is Brahma, who is therefore considered the root of the Universal Tree. After Brahma many other separated manifestations are created, and the jiva atmans or anu atmans come to occupy such bodies or conditions of the being: they attract material elements, and use them as emanations in turn. The process of creation of the individual material bodies and the objects of the senses is similar to the creation of the Universal Tree; each jiva travels carrying the subtle body, composed by the mind and senses (15.7-8).

उत्क्रामन्तं स्थितं वापि भुञ्जानं वा गुणान्वितम् । विमूढा नानुपश्यन्ति पश्यन्ति ज्ञानचक्षुषः ॥ १५-१० ॥

utkrāmantaṁ sthitaṁ vāpi bhuñjānaṁ vā guṇānvitam | vimūḍhā nānupaśyanti paśyanti jñānacakṣuṣaḥ || 15-10 ||

utkrāmantaṁ: leaving the body; sthitam: situated; va: or; api: although; bhujjanam: experiencing actively; va: or; guna anvitam: under the influence of the gunas; vimudha: stupid people; na anupaśyanti: are unable to see; paśyanti: they can see; jñana cakṣuṣaḥ: those who have the eyes of knowledge.

"Whether they are leaving the body or remain situated in it, whether they are directing their experiences or passively following the influences of the gunas, those who are stupid are unable to understand (their situation), while those who see with the eyes of scriptural knowledge are able to understand.

Foolish people cannot see the atman, because they believe they are the body and mind. This is not merely ignorance, but stupidity as well, because illiterate or totally uneducated persons, too, can feel the radical change that happens when the atman leaves the body - even animals can spot the difference between a living being and a dead being. However, simple natural intelligence will not be able to give us the full understanding of the process of transmigration of the soul, because the atman and the subtle body (consisting of mind and senses) are not visible to the eyes. This is why the opposition is between stupidity and knowledge, and not between stupidity or intelligence, or between ignorance and knowledge.

Why is Krishna using this particular expression, instead of just saying "one who has correct knowledge"? Why does he involve the act of seeing? Because there is a big difference between theoretically knowing something and actually realizing it as if we were seeing it with our own eyes in front of us.

This importance of direct realization is highlighted in many verses of Bhagavad gita with the use of the word paśyati ("s/he sees") as in 2.29 (to see the soul), 2.69 (to see the night as day and day as night), 5.5 (to see Sankhya and Yoga as one only), 6.30 (to see me - Krishna - everywhere and everything in me), 6.32 (to see everyone as non-different from oneself), 13.28 and 14.19 (to see the Lord in all beings and circumstances), 13.30 and 18.16 (to see all actions are performed by prakṛiti), 13.31 (to see all beings situated in one although appearing separated), and darśati as in 2.16 (to see that real is eternal and false is temporary), 4.34 (to see the tattva directly), 5.18 and 6.29 (to see all beings equally), 11.4, 11.9, 11.10, 11.45 and 11.47 (to see the Universal Form), 11.50 and 11.52 (to see Krishna's form), 13.9 (to see the sufferings of birth, death etc), 13.12 (to see the value of knowledge).

These jñana chakṣu ("eyes of knowledge") have been mentioned in other verses as well, both directly and indirectly:

kṣetra kṣetrajñor evaṁ antaram jñana cakṣuṣa, bhūta prakṛiti mokṣam ca ye vidur yanti te param, "Those who see - with the eyes of knowledge - the kṣetra and the kṣetra jña and the difference between the two, and how to attain liberation from the nature of existence, will reach the Supreme." (13.35), na tu mam saṁyase drakṣṭum anenaiva sva cakṣuṣa, dīnyam dadāmi te cakṣuḥ paśya me yogam aīsvaram, "However, you will not be able to see me with your physical eyes, therefore I am giving you divine eyes. Look at the wonders of my yoga power" (11.8), sparsan kṛitva bahir bahyaṁ cakṣuṣ caivāntare bhrūvoh, prāṇapāṇau samau kṛitva nāśabhyāntara carinau, "Keeping outside (his/her concern/ attention) the external (objects/ concerns) and fixing one's eyes to the internal space between the eyebrows, balancing the prāṇa and apāṇa, controlling the breathing within the nose," (5.27).

By considering the use of these definitions in context with the other verses, it will be easier for us to understand what Krishna means in this verse about the contemplation of the movements of the atman. The proper knowledge we have studied in the genuine original scriptures and applied through our own experience is the clear vision that makes us understand when and how a jivatman has left the body, and to go where. To know the next destination of the atman in its transmigrations is even more important than simply realizing that it has left the body; life in each particular body is nothing but learning and practice for the final test - the moment of death - when our actual progress will be evaluated and we will get admission in the next class.

We can see in any school that there are different levels of interest for studies in each particular student. This is why Patanjali in his Yoga sūtras (1.22) explains that a student will attain good results proportionately to the effort invested (mṛidu madhya adbhimatratvat tato'pi viśeṣaḥ, "there is a difference according to the intensity of the effort - mild, moderate or strong").

Applied to the present verse, this means that the lazy students just float along passively following the river flow according to the influence of the gunas, with a very weak effort, and the results are not very good. On the other hand, a student who makes a sincere effort in actively experiencing the lessons - studying and practicing in a systematic and enthusiastic way - obtains good results more quickly. To see this, we need the proper vision of knowledge (jñana chakṣu) because foolish ordinary people will think that the lazy student is "cool" and the sincere student is a "nerd". Such idiots (vimudha) have no understanding of the purpose of the activities offered by the school, and are actually prolonging their sufferings unnecessarily as they put themselves in a condition in which they will fail their tests and therefore they will have to repeat them again and again. These stupid students simply hate and fear the examinations and tests along the course and at the end of the course, but remain unable to take the proper actions that would lead them more quickly to liberation from what they fear and hate. Fear is one of the prominent symptoms of thamas (18.35) and is considered by Krishna a disgraceful contamination (2.35, 2.56, 4.10, 5.28, 12.15, 16.1, 18.8). It confuses the mind and the intelligence, and even the senses (to the point of hallucinations), paralyzes the body and exposes us most vulnerably precisely to those dangers that we are so afraid of. No genuine religion or education can be based on fear.

यतन्तो योगिनश्चैनं पश्यन्त्यात्मन्यवस्थितम् । यतन्तोऽप्यकृतात्मानो नैनं पश्यन्त्यचेतसः ॥ १५-११ ॥

yatanto yoginaścainaṁ paśyantyātmanyavasthitam | yatanto'pyakṛtātmāno nainaṁ paśyantyacetasah || 15-11 ||

yatantah: endeavoring; yoginah: the yogis; ca: and; enam: this; paśyanti: they see; atmani: in the self; avasthitam: situated; yatantah: endeavoring; api: although; akṛita atmanah: those who have not realized the Self; na: not; enam: this; paśyanti: they see; a cetasah: without awareness.

"The sincere yogis see this atman situated (in the body), while those who are not engaged in the Self remain unable to see in spite of all their efforts, because they do not have the proper awareness.

After establishing the importance of one's sincere efforts (bhujjanam va gunanvitam) in acquiring the proper realization (jnana caksusah), Krishna immediately clarifies that effort alone is not sufficient - it must be guided by intelligence and proper awareness. Here we could equate effort with karma or yoga, and awareness with jnana or bhakti or buddhi.

We can push against a door with all our might, and break our fingers or toes trying to tear it down, but the same door can be opened very easily if we know where the key is. Action (karma) must always be supported by intelligence (buddhi) and knowledge (jnana). Similarly, renunciation (sannyasa) must be supported by dutiful action (karma) and intelligence (buddhi). Otherwise it will all be a waste of time and energy, as confirmed in Bhagavata Purana: srama eva hi kevalam (1.2.8), sramas tasya srama phalo (11.11.18) and especially sad varga samyamakantah, sarva niyama codanah, tad anta yadi no yogan, avahayuh srama avahah, "All the rules for the control of the mind and senses and body are merely a waste of time and energy if they do not bring us in contact with Reality" (7.15.28).

One needs to follow the proper scientific method clearly described in the original scriptures, as confirmed in Bhagavad gita (17.5) and Bhagavata Purana (4.18.5): tan anadṛitya yo 'vidvan, arthan arabhate svayam, tasya vyabharanty artha, arabdhas ca punah punah, "Those ignorant people who neglect the instructions of the shastra begin so many new schemes created by their minds, but they do not achieve success, no matter how long they try."

It is therefore pathetic to see so many so-called "yoga practitioners" putting so much effort in their gymnastic exercises to keep the body healthy and fit, and totally ignoring the actual purpose of yoga as explained so clearly in all the genuine original shastra. Such poor people are blind because they have no jnana chakṣu and they can only see physical bodies, because they are yatanto 'pi akṛita atmanah, "not endeavoring in the work of atman" and acetasah ("without awareness"). They are vimudhas (idiots), no matter how many certificates or even followers they have accumulated to "prove" their proficiency in "yoga".

The expression akṛita atmanah indicates the absence of spiritual cultivation or spiritual activity, or transcendental realization; used together with yatanto api ("in spite of much effort") it highlights the lack of fundamental knowledge and proper guidance and training.

The word yatah ("effort", "control") is also the foundation of the expression yatantah yoginah ("those who strive for yoga"), indicating the genuine sadhakas, who take yoga seriously. We find it in verses 2.60, 4.21, 5.26, 6.10, 6.12, 6.15, 6.19, 6.36, 6.43, 6.45, 7.3, 7.29, 8.11, 9.14, 12.11, 12.14, 18.7, 18.9, 18.23, 18.46, 18.47, 18.52, and especially in the following context: asamyatna yogo dushprapa iti me matih, vasyatmana tu yatata sakyo 'vaptum upayatah, "I say it is very difficult to attain yoga when the mind is not engaged, but there are appropriate methods by which one will be able to control the mind." (6.36), and santustah satatam yogi yatatma dridha niscayah, mayy arpita mano buddhir yo mad bhaktah sa me priyah, "The bhakti yogi is always contented, engaged in the self with firmness and determination, offering his mind and intelligence to my service. Such devotee is very dear to me." (12.14)

The word akṛita is the contrary of kṛita ("determined, performed, perfected") that we find in the context of the following verses: 2.50, 4.15, 6.41, 14.16, 15.20, 17.21, 18.13, 18.16. The word samskṛita (referring to the Sanskrit language) is also in the same etymological area, meaning "completely perfected". In this way we can better understand what Krishna is saying in this verse.

The genuine yogis are sincerely engaged in developing the atman, from anu atman to svarupa siddhi, and therefore they always keep their awareness or consciousness (cetasah) firmly focused on the realization of Transcendence. What is "situated in the self" (atmani avasthitam)? The subject of these verses is ayam ("this"), expressed in verse 9, and refers to the atman that travels within the subtle body from one gross body to another, always in the company of the param atman. Other verses that express this concept of the atman engaged or situated in the atman are 2.55, 3.17, 3.43, 5.25, 6.5, 6.6, 6.7, 6.10, 6.15, 6.18, 6.19, 6.20, 6.25, 6.26, 6.28, 6.29, 6.36, 6.47, 7.18, 8.12, 13.25, 13.29. This shows the central place of importance that self realization has in the tradition of yoga and Vedic knowledge. Abrahamic ideologies focus on establishing an official allegiance to a particular set of beliefs, rules and dogma in the worship of God as a separate Being, who has created us and demands our obedience. On the contrary, Vedic knowledge gives the special emphasis on the progressive development of the individual soul and the realization of its nature as a part of the supreme Soul. Those who do not understand the self (atman) will never attain perfection, no matter how hard they strive, especially in regard to rules and regulations or allegiances.

यदादित्यगतं तेजो जगद्भासयतेऽखिलम् । यच्चन्द्रमसि यच्चाग्नौ तत्तेजो विद्धि मामकम् ॥ १५-१२ ॥

yadādityagatam tejo jagadbhāsayate'khilam । yaccandramasi yaccāgnau tattejo viddhi māmakam ॥ 15-12 ॥

yat: that; aditya gatam: the rays of the sun; tejah: radiance; jagat: the universe; bhasayate: is illuminated; akhilam: entire; yat: that; candramasi: in the moon; yat: that; ca: and; agnau: in the fire; tat: that; tejah: radiance; viddhi: you should know; mamakam: from me.

"Know that the radiance that illuminates the entire universe, emanating from the sun, and seen in the moon and in fire, is (actually coming) from me.

The word aditya refers to the sun, Surya, the first and foremost among the sons of Aditi, the original Mother Goddess. The word gatam, "gone", can be applied in more than one meaning: in this case, the radiance that we perceive as coming from the sun is originally emanating from the supreme Brahman. The light is coming through the sun, not just from the sun, as all radiance originally comes from the atman.

Only now mainstream scientific researchers are discovering (or re-discovering, more likely) the actual nature of matter and energy, and the secrets of the light within the atom. Even laymen know that atomic explosions liberate a huge amount of light when energy deploys, and that solar rays generate endless electrical power through photo voltaic cells and other methods. Already from antiquity, men had discovered how to instantly produce fire from sun rays through a system of lenses that focused the light.

All the radiance - light and heat - in the universe is ultimately coming from the Sun, including the radiance of the fire and the moon. Ancient cultures at global level worshiped (honored, respected, loved) the Sun, together with Fire: both sun and fire were strong symbols of God, power, and by extension, Time, as they can give life and death, too.

Surya is sattva and satya, and its tejas is God's vibhuti providing all necessities of life, directly and indirectly. The sun stirs the activities of creatures and men, and the fire is essential for us to cook, heat, power machines and perform puja. The moon is the other side of the power of the sun - the energy that cools and gives juice to the plants, while the direct hot energy creates the solid nutrients. Like the sun produces heat, light, sun rays, the light of the moon and even shade and shadow, the Supreme Consciousness has many apparently different energies (parasya shaktir vividhaiva sruyate, svabhaiviki jnana bala kriya ca, Svetasvatara Upanishad, "It is said that the Supreme has a variety of energies from his own nature - specifically knowledge, strength and will power", 6.8).

Vishnu Purana (1.3.2) confirms: saktayah sarva bhavanam, acintya jnana gocarah, yato 'to brahmanas tas tu, sargadya bhava saktayah, bhavanti tapatam srestha, pavakasya yathosnata. "The energies in all creations are inconceivable for the human capacity of knowledge. They emanate from Brahman, but manifest the creation and all the rest. Such creative energies are comparable to the heat emanating from fire."

The original transcendental light of Brahman ( jyoti) shines through the sun, the moon and the fire in this universe. The important concept of tejas has also been discussed in the commentaries to verses 7.9 and 10.36, where we have quoted the famous verse from Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad (1.3.28): asato ma sad gamaya, tamaso ma jyotir gamaya, mrityor ma amritam gamaya, "from what is temporary lead me to what is eternal, from darkness lead me to the light, from death lead me to eternal life".

This dazzling light (jyoti, tejas, etc) of the Brahman constitutes only the rays, or the emanations, from the Supreme Personality of Godhead, manifesting his majestic glories (aisvarya vibhuti). Such radiance is difficult to contemplate for the embodied souls; this was clearly stated in verse 12.5 (kleso 'dhikataras tesham avyaktasakta-cetasam, avyakta hi gatih duhkham devavadbhir avapyate). Therefore, Isa Upanishad (15) prays, hiranmayena patrena, satyasyapibitam mukham, tat tvam pusann apavru, satya dharmaya dristaye, "O sustainer of life, the face of Truth is covered by a golden veil. Please remove it, to show yourself to the true dharma".

The same nature of light and radiance is characteristic of the individual atman: yatha prakasayaty ekah kritnam lokam imam ravih, ksetra, ksetri tatha kritnam prakasayati bharata, "O Bharata, just like the Sun illuminates all this world, in the same way the kshetri illuminates the entire kshetra." (13.34), apareyam itas tv anyam prakritim viddhi me param, jiva bbutam maha baho yayedam dbaryate jagat, "O Arjuna, know that besides this inferior prakriti there is also another, a higher one - the living beings by which the universe is upheld." (7.5), yad yad vibbutinat sattvam srīmad urjitam eva va, tat tad evavagaccha tvam mama tejo 'msa sambhavam, "Anything that is good, powerful, wonderful, or glorious, you should encounter, has come to existence as a part of my radiance." (10.41)

गामाविश्य च भूतानि धारयाम्यहमोजसा । पुष्णामि चौषधीः सर्वाः सोमो भूत्वा रसात्मकः ॥ १५-१३ ॥

gāmāviśya ca bhūtāni dhārayāmyahamojasā । puṣṇāmi cauśadhiḥ sarvāḥ somo bhūtvā rasātmakāḥ ॥ 15-13 ॥

gam: the planets; aviśya: entering; ca: and; bhutani: the beings; dharayami: I sustain; aham: I; ojasa: by my strength; pusnami: I give nourishment; ca: and; ausadhibih: the herbs and plants; sarvab: all; somab: the moon; bhutva: becoming; rasa atmakah: I am the juice/ taste.

"Entering the planets and all beings, I sustain them. By my strength, I nourish all the herbs and plants, and as the moon I become the juice of everything.

The first word in this verse - gam - is extremely interesting. In Sanskrit, it applies to the cows as well as to the planets, especially to Earth, the most important planet in this universe, where the destiny of the conditioned souls is created through choices. Only the human species of life can make karmic choices; the species both under and above the human level are simply collecting the results of their past activities, for the good or the bad.

God is Consciousness and Existence: from within all states of beings - at macrocosmic and microcosmic level - he sustains their existence according to the plan of the supreme Intelligence. As this Existence is light and radiance, we understand that in this universe all things exist because of the energy and matter from the sun. The word avisya ("entering") indicates that the Supreme manifests within the blueprint of each existence, bringing it to being. We should not think that God enters objects that have been already in existence, because that would be a contradiction in terms.

Gam is similar in origin to the Greek word gea ("earth"), and it sheds a special light on the deep symbolic meaning of the sacrifices and rituals described in the Vedic sambhitas and brahmanas. The connection between Earth and cows is very strong, as Mother Earth nourishes all her children with her milk in so many forms - see for example the description of the kingdom of Maharaja Prithu in chapter 18, canto 4 of Bhagavata Purana. In verses from 9 to 28, Mother Earth supplies all the different types of food that are characteristic of the great rishis and devas, as well of the human beings, animals, plants and so on.

The term dharayami ("I support") also applies to the law of gravity, personified by Sankarshana, also known as Ananta Sesha - whose iconography shows him in the form of a huge many-headed snake. Each and every planet rests on one of his heads, as small as a mustard seed compared to the immense body of Ananta. The power of gravity supports each planet in its orbit and floating and sticking together with the other planets.

Another very interesting word in this verse is ojas (ojasa). Ojas is the maha dhatu, the essence of health and power in the *dhatu*s. According to Ayur Veda, the main components or factors in the body are called doshas, *dhatu*s and malas. The malas ("impurities") are the waste materials that the body expels regularly - feces, urine, sweat etc - and serve as carriers to rebalance the system. The doshas are the "humors", such as vata (wind or air), pitta (bile or fire) and kapha (mucus or water/ earth), that balance each other rather like the three gunas (sattva, rajas, tamas): when all the doshas are working properly and in a quiet state, the body is healthy. Any imbalance or vitiation of the doshas results in suffering and disease. The seven *dhatu*s are rasa (lymph, digested fluid), rakta (blood), mamsa (flesh and muscles), medas (fat), asthi (bone), majja (bone marrow and nerves) and sukla (menstrual fluid and sperm, or hormones). The sum total of the energy of all *dhatu*s is called ojas; at universal level this same ojas nourishes all medicinal principles that bring health (pusnami ausadhibi). Bhagavata Purana (2.10.26) confirms this in the description of the Virata Purusha.

The three vital principles in the body are prana, tejas and ojas, as the subtle counterparts of vata, pitta and kapha and manifestations of air, fire and water. So prana is carried mostly by air, tejas radiates and heats like fire, and ojas gives nourishment and coolness. The original principle of ojas, representing God, is present in all creation and especially in medicinal herbs, in the moon and in the juices of life. It is a complement to tejas, that represents God as the sun and fire.

We have already seen (4.29-30, 7.8, 10.9) how God is present in the prana as the pranava omkara, the original nature of the atman; we know that prana is carried by airs (gross and subtle) in the body. We have also seen (7.9-10, 10.36, 11.19, etc) how God is present as tejas, which is also the light and fire to which the atman is part - and we will also see in the next verse. Now we see (rasa atmaka) that God is present as the ojas, that is the rasa or taste and the power of Soma, the moon. Taittiriya Upanishad (2.7.1) confirms: raso vai sah, rasam hy enayam labdhvanandi bhavati, "That (Brahman) is rasa, and by attaining it, one also becomes rasa."

Soma is one of the main names of the Godhead in the Vedic sambhitas, and his worship is at the center of an entire set of Vedic yajnas - that have unfortunately been neglected in the course of the centuries. The health of the universe rests on the balance between Soma and Surya, ojas and tejas, water and fire - a couple of apparent opposites considered very much central in worship and theology in all ancient cultures, and still in the concepts of yin and yang.

In particular, Bhagavata Purana (5.22.10) speaks about Soma as the source of amrita, the nectar of immortality; this confirms the verse from the Rig Veda (8.43.3) apama somam amrita babbhuma, "We have drunk the soma (rasa) and we have become immortal". Of course the same applies to the transcendental level of bhakti - by which the Personality of Godhead is invoked with reference to the Moon, as Rama chandra and Krishna chandra.

The deeper level of the concept of soma as rasa atmaka is the foundation of the science of bhakti. Rasa is the taste or feeling or nature of consciousness that constitutes the very nature of Brahman and Atman; it manifests in various sentiments as santa, daya, sakhyia, vatsalya, madhurya etc. The all-transcendental ojas that nourishes these rasas is the amrita (nectarine juice) of the names, activities, teachings, qualities, of the Godhead manifested in his lilas (Bhagavata Purana 1.1.3, 3.5.10, 3.16.6, 3.21.48, 4.7.44, 4.16.1, 4.16.3, 4.16.9, 4.29.41, 5.3.3, 6.9.39, 6.9.41, 7.9.43, 10.14.33, 10.15.50, 10.29.35, 10.85.59, 10.87.16, 10.87.21, 10.88.31, 11.6.19, 11.19.9, 11.19.20, 11.21.39, 12.10.26, 12.13.11, 12.13.14).

अहं वैश्वानरो भूत्वा प्राणिनां देहमाश्रितः । प्राणापानसमायुक्तः पचाम्यन्नं चतुर्विधम् ॥ १५-१४ ॥

aham vaiśvānaro bhūtvā prāṇinām dehamāśritaḥ । prāṇāpānasamāyuktaḥ pacāmyannam caturvidham ॥ 15-14 ॥

aham: I am; vaiśvānaraḥ: the fire (in the body); bhūtvā: becoming; prāṇinām: of all the living beings; deham: in the body; asritaḥ: situated; prana apāna: prana and apāna; samāyuktaḥ: keeping in balance; pacami: I cook/ digest; annam: the food; catur vidham: that is of four types.

"I am the the presence of the Vaisvanara, situated in the bodies of all living beings, that keeps the balance between prana and apana and digests all the food, that is of four types.

This verse is confirmed by Brihad aranyaka Upanishad (5.9.1) in very similar words: vaisvanaro yo 'yam antah purusa yenedam annam payate, "that is present as Vaisvanara (Agni) within man and digests the food".

The word bhutra ("becoming") is particularly interesting here, as it indicates a secondary manifestation of tejas, which also is a secondary manifestation, emanation or energy of the Godhead. Of course there is no real difference in quality between the source and the emanations; this Vaisvanara is to Agni what the jivatman is to paramatman, and the manipura chakra within human bodies is to Surya. This vaisvanara is also called jataragni, "the fire within the belly". As the atman resides in the individual body together with the param atman, so the vaisvanara agni resides in the individual body together with the source of the original Fire. In this regard, we should remember that according to the Vedic categorization, within the description of "fire" we also find all the substances that burn and consume, such as strong acids and metabolic enzymes. This Jataragni or Vaisvanara Agni can therefore be assimilated to the hydrochloric acid and the enzymes of digestion that "cook" the food we consume and dissolve it into their fundamental nutrients and calories.

Agni (corresponding to Pitta) is one of the main names of the Godhead in the Vedic samhitas as well, together with Soma (corresponding to Kapha) and Vayu (corresponding to Vata), the Asvini kumaras (the healing principle), Surya (power of life), Indra (direction), Varuna (cleansing), Ritu (the seasons), Aryaman (death), Rudra (destruction), Usha (dawn, the beginning) as well as Vishnu (the transcendental principle).

Within the human body, the eater is vaisvanara, Surya, and fire, while the eaten is soma, Chandra, and juice or water. Without God we would not even be able to digest and assimilate our food, transforming it into energy. The 4 types of foods mentioned in this verse are those that are swallowed, chewed, licked, and sucked: the criteria of categorization are the amount and balance of the fire (tejas) and water (ojas) in each type of food. The same logic applies to the function of balancing (samayukta) of prana and apana in the body. The two functions of agni or digesting and vayu or breathing are strictly connected in the process of metabolism or assimilation of nourishment. The symbolism of the Sun and the Moon is not merely a "primitive" idea of "worshiping nature" - it indicates the deepest nature of our bodies and our world as manifestations of the Godhead. This concept has been affirmed in ancient cultures as the microcosm as reflection of the macrocosm, and is in stark contrast with the abrahamic ideologies that demonize the body and the world and deny their spiritual value.

The key of prosperity, happiness and realization is not "the good side winning", but the proper balance of the two halves of Reality - this applies to all the apparent opposites and dualities in the world, such as male-female, etc. This is why Bhagavad gita speaks so often about the importance of "overcoming duality" (2.45, 4.22, 5.3, 7.27, 7.28, 15.6, etc).

We need to read this verse in connection with 15.12: yad aditya gatam tejo jagad bhasayate 'khalam, yac candramasi yac cagnau tat tejo viddhi mamakam, "Know that the radiance that illuminates the entire universe, emanating from the sun and seen in the moon and in fire, is from me." This brings us to the other meaning of the word samayukta in this verse: the life airs (prana and apana) are directly cooperating with tejas and ojas for the life and health and power in the body. In the first meaning samayukta can be translated as "keeping the balance", while in the second meaning it can be translated as "engaged together with". There is no contradiction between the two meanings.

sarvasya: of all; ca: and; aham: I am; hridi: in the heart; sannivistab: situated; mattab: from me; smṛtib: memory; jñanam: knowledge; apohanam: forgetfulness; ca: and; vedaib: through the Vedas; ca: and; sarvaib: all; aham: I am; eva: certainly; vedyab: I am to be known; vedanta krit: the author of Vedanta; veda vit: he who knows the Vedas; eva: certainly; ca: and; aham: I am.

"I am situated in the heart of all/ everything, and from me come memory, knowledge and forgetfulness. I am the purpose of the study of all the Vedas. I certainly am the creator of Vedanta, and the one who knows the Vedas.

Being Existence and Consciousness, God is present in everything and is the source of all knowledge. Just like the sun is the source of light, heat and shadow as well (as the temporary absence of light), Consciousness is also the cause of forgetfulness: the contrast must be present in this material world so that the conditioned souls may have the opportunity to make choices and thus learn and develop. The principle of memory is in the process of desire and choice, by which we are able to learn from our mistakes.

People who do not understand Vedic knowledge are usually baffled by the existence of evil and darkness in the world. Typically they do not believe in reincarnation or in the divine nature of the human soul, and believe that bad things happen to people because God is "inducing them in temptation" in order to test their faith and loyalty and subsequently sentence them to eternal paradise or hell. Since only the brief span of a lifetime is observed, such "testing" appear to be done whimsically, at random, and often with much cruelty and injustice. The professional class of priests in materialistic organized religions aggravate the problem by presenting their congregation with clever ways to solve the problem, mostly through bribing God and the priests with donations or offerings and prayers, or appeasing them with the practice of punishment they call "penance" (17.6) applied on oneself or others, especially their dependents (children, women etc) for "atonement" or "purification". The first method is inspired by rajas, and the second by tamas. Another popular trick to "protect oneself from evil", inspired by material sattva, consists in wearing talismans or sacred images or objects. However, all these methods are ultimately useless because they do not address the actual issue, that is about the soul's evolution.

We are all required to develop from the stage of anu atman (atomic soul) to a fully fledged siddha deha (spiritual body). What we learn, remember or forget determines what joys and sorrows we come to face, and all this is part of a plan based on past karma - created by our own choices. At each moment, however, we have the opportunity to apply different choices to change our destiny, to deliberately try to remember or forget different things and therefore to change our karma. So although memory and forgetfulness come from the supreme Consciousness, we still have a choice about them; all our past choices and experiences are stored in our subconscious (causal) mind, even if we may not remember consciously. By integrating our subconscious mind with the conscious mind, we can better understand our karmic journey and what we need to do to improve our evolution - in other words, "what is the right thing to do". At that point we may choose.

When we have made our choice, either in the positive or the negative, material nature carries on the activity under the control of God (Consciousness) who is the antaryami upadrasta - that we might call the "superconscious" mind or self. God is therefore the supreme Teacher, the param guru, at the same time the Knower and the supreme object of Knowledge (tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, Bhagavata Purana 1.2.11). Since he is supreme Knowledge and all knowledge comes from him, he is the original author of all Vedic scriptures as well as every other bit of wisdom and science that will ever exist, long before even Vyasa or any other Rishi appeared. He is the veda-vit ("he who knows knowledge") and the vedanta-krit ("he who makes the purpose of knowledge").

The purpose of all Vedas (a word that literally means "knowledge") is to attain the knowledge of Consciousness, or the consciousness of Knowledge, as these two are actually One. The entire Universal Tree of knowledge and material manifestation, with all the rituals and duties and sciences, ultimately leads to the supreme Consciousness only. Therefore the Bhagavata Purana clearly says: naiskarmyam apy acyuta bhava varjitam, na sobbate jnanam alam niranjanam, kutah punah sasvad abhadram isvare, na carpitam karma yad apy akaranam, "When devoid of love for God, scholarship is not beneficial even if it is selfless and free from vanity. This is exactly like the result of one's duty: even if selfless, when is it not offered to Isvara, it is not really auspicious" (Bhagavata Purana 1.5.12) and kim va yogena sankhyena, nyasa svadhyayayor api, kim va sreyobbhir anyais ca, na yatratma prado harih, "What is the use of yoga or sankhya, sannyasa, the study of the scriptures, the auspicious activities, or anything else: if Hari is never remembered, the self will never be appreciated" (Bhagavata Purana 4.31.12). This study of Vedic knowledge must be practiced in the proper way, through sincere dedication and practice, and not merely in an academic approach:

tat sadbu varyadisa vartma sam nah, samradhito bhagavan yena pumsam, brdi sthito yacchati bhakti pute, jnanam sa tattvadhigamam puranam, "Therefore, o great among saints, please instruct us on the auspicious path by which a human being can properly worship Bhagavan, who is situated in one's heart, and after having purified oneself with bhakti, receive from him the knowledge of reality transmitted by the ancient rishis," (Bhagavata Purana 3.5.4), yac chraddhaya srutavatya ca bhaktya, sammrjyamane hrdaye avadbhaya, jnanena vairagya balena dbira, vrajena tat te anghri saroja pitham, "Simply by listening with faith and love about your instructions, and meditating on them within one's heart, by the strength of knowledge and detachment we will become pacified and attain your lotus feet" (Bhagavata Purana 3.5.42), bhuyas tvam tapa atistha, vidyam caiva mad asrayam, tabhyam antar brdi brahman, lokan draksyasi apavritam, "Engage again in the austere search for knowledge, and under my protection, these will disclose all the worlds to you, within your heart, and you will be able to see them" (Bhagavata Purana 3.9.30).

Genuine knowledge is revealed through one's heart: this is how the sincere student can perceive the truth of the teachings s/he is receiving externally. This had already been clearly stated by Krishna in chapter 10: tesam evanukampartham abam ajnana jam tamah, nasayamy atma bhava stho jnana dipena bhasvata, "Out of my kindness for them, I destroy the darkness of ignorance from within their hearts, by the radiant light of knowledge" (10.11) and tesam satata yuktanam bhajatam priti purvakam, dadami buddhi yogam tam yena mam upayanti te, "To those who are always connected to me by serving me with love and devotion, I give the understanding by which they will come to me" (10.10).

This has been the orthodox method since the very beginning of time: janmady asya yato 'nvayad itaratas carthesv abhijnah svarat, tene brahma hrda ya adi kavaye muhyanti yat surayah, tejo vari mrdam yatha vinimayo yatra tri sargo 'mrta, dhamna svena sada nirasta kurbhakam satyam param dhimahi, "I offer my respect to Bhagavan Vasudeva, from whom the creation of this universe proceeds. He is fully independent, fully conscious of purpose, directly and indirectly. He inspired knowledge in the heart of Brahma. His nature overpowers even the Devas just like the optical illusions created by heat, water and earth. In this way by action and reaction he always manifests himself as the 'almost reality' of the three creations and all their places of existence. I meditate on him, the supreme truth, always self-sufficient, of whom illusion is just the absence of perception." (Bhagavata Purana 1.1.1).

द्वाविमौ पुरुषौ लोके क्षरश्चाक्षर एव च । क्षरः सर्वाणि भूतानि कूटस्थोऽक्षर उच्यते ॥ १५-१६ ॥

dvāvimau puruṣau loke kṣaraścākṣara eva ca । kṣaraḥ sarvāṇi bhūtāni kūṭastho'kṣara ucyate ॥ 15-16 ॥

dvau: two (kinds of); imau: these; puruṣau: puruṣas; loke: in the world; kṣarah: mortal; ca: and; akṣara: immortal; eva: certainly; ca: and; kṣarah: mortal; sarvani: all; bhutani: beings; kuta sthah: permanently established; akṣara: immortal; ucyate: it is said.

"In this world there are two types of purushas: those who are mortal and those who are immortal. All the living beings are called mortal, and the immortals are those who have a permanent position.

The focus of this verse is in the two categories of ksvara and aksvara. The word ksvara carries the meanings of "change, modification, failure, falldown, destruction, death" and certainly applies to the material bodies in which the living entity has taken birth. We may remember here that the word bhuta means "having come to being", and that the six major changes of such beings are birth, growth, duration, reproduction, dwindling, and death. Conversely, aksvara means "unchangeable, eternal, perfect, established, infallible, always existing, immortal". This definition has not been applied to the description of the jivatman in chapter 2, because the conditioned souls who have taken birth in a material body are indirectly subject to its changes and to the failures it entails. This verse presents 2 categories of purushas: 1) the nitya baddhas, or individual conditioned souls who identify with the body and therefore suffer for its modifications life after life, 2) the nitya siddhas, or individual personalities that are established in their eternal position, from which they never fall down.

Some commentators believe that the definition of nitya ("always") refers to an ontological difference in nature of the two categories, and infer that the nitya baddhas can never attain liberation (moksha). This is incorrect, because such notion is opposed to the fundamental dharmic principle of compassion.

The actual meaning of this application of the term nitya is relative, just like we see sometimes the word bhagavan applied to great personalities who belong to the vibhinna category (but whose consciousness is totally immersed in the supreme Consciousness), or the word amara ("immortal") applied to the Devas (for example, in Bhagavata Purana 1.15.8, 1.17.15, 2.7.13, 2.7.39, 4.2.4) who live a long life but ultimately will die, too, to leave their post to someone else. Therefore, the nitya baddhas can remain conditioned forever if they continue to choose illusion, but they will be able to gradually attain liberation from all conditionings if they consistently make progressive choices. On the other hand, the nitya siddhas may also have graduated to moksha from a conditioned position of nitya baddha through a sincere and correct sadhana, but they are described as "eternally perfect" or "eternally liberated" because they will not fall down again.

In the next verse (15.18), Krishna will state that God is above both categories, therefore we can understand that both such nitya baddhas and nitya siddhas are individual souls or *vibhinna*s, "distinct limbs/ cells" of the supreme Body of Consciousness. On the other hand, God himself in his many direct manifestations is defined as svamsa, "own limb", or maybe "clone".

The nitya siddhas do not have a material body made of material elements, not even subtle elements such as the bodies of the Devas. Their bodies (siddha deha) are made of pure consciousness, just like the body of the supreme Purusha, and just like everything else on the spiritual or transcendental level, including the objects (siddha vastu). This is confirmed by several verses:

avyakto 'ksara ity uktas tam abuh paramam gatim, yam prapya na nivartante tad dhama paramam mama, "That is said to be non-manifested, non subject to change, and the highest destination. By attaining it, one does not fall back. That is my supreme abode." (8.21), yad aksaram veda vido vadanti visanti yad yatayo vita ragah, yad icchanto brahmacaryam caranti tat te padam sangrahena pravaksyate, "I will tell you in summary about that imperishable destination described by those who know the Vedas. That destination is entered by the great sannyasis who have become fully detached from material illusion, and who practice brahmacharya with the purpose of attaining that position" (8.11).

In this world (iba loka), this aksvara brahman is perceived as the all-pervading Consciousness:

karma brahmodbhavam viddhi brahmaksara samudbhavam, tasmāt sarva gatam brahma nityam yajne pratishthitam, "Know that work comes from Brahma, and Brahma comes from the Imperishable, therefore the all-pervading Brahman eternally resides in sacred action" (3.15), evam satata yukta ye bhaktas tvam paryupasate, ye capy aksaram avyaktam tesam ke yoga vittamah, "The devotees worship you in complete dedication, while others meditate on the non-manifested eternal Reality: which of these two approaches is the highest understanding of yoga?" (12.1), ye tv aksaram anirdesyam avyaktam paryupasate, sarvatra gam acintyam ca kuta stham acalam dhrumam, "Those who offer their worship correctly and sincerely to the the aksvara, the indescribable, non-manifested, all-pervading, inconceivable, unchanging, never moving and eternal Existence," (12.3).

Arjuna has recognized Krishna as the personification of this Consciousness: tvam aksaram paramam veditavyam tvam asya visvasya param nidhanam, tva avyayah sasvata dharma gopta sanatanas tvam puruso mato me, "I believe you are the imperishable Reality, the supreme object of knowledge, the supreme foundation of this universe, the protector of the eternal unchangeable dharma. You are the eternal Purusha" (11.18) and kasmac ca te na, nameran mahatman gariyase brahmano 'py adi kartre, ananta devesa jagan nivas tvam aksaram sad asat tat param yat, "Why shouldn't they offer their respects to you, o great Atman? You are more glorious than Brahma, the first creator (of this universe). O Lord of the Devas, abode of the universe, you are imperishable, because you are above the cause and the effect" (11.37).

We have also seen that the word aksvara is normally used to indicate the pranava omkara: om ity ekaksaram brahma vyaharan mam anusmaran, yah prayati tyajan deham sa yati paramam gatim, "Vibrating 'Om", this one transcendental syllable/ the syllable form of the Brahman, and remembering me, one who departs leaving the body attains the supreme destination" (8.13), and maharsinam bhrigu abam giram asmy ekam aksaram, yajnanam japa yajno 'smi sthavaranam himalayah, "Of the great Rishis, I am Bhṛigu. Among the words, I am the one syllable. Of the sacrifices, I am the japa. Among the established things, I am the Himalaya" (10.25). By extension, because they emanate from the aksvara pranava omkara, all letters of the alphabet (or sounds) are also considered imperishable:

aksaranam a karo 'smi dvandvah samasikasya ca, aham evaksayah kalo dhatabam visvato mukhab, "Of the letters, I am the A. Of the compound words, I am the dvandva. I am Time eternal, the creator, and the omnipresent (consciousness of the universe)" (10.33).

The Bhagavata Purana confirms: tato aksara samamnayam, asrjad bhagavan ajah, antasthosma svara sparsa, brasva dirghadi laksanam, "From that omkara, the unborn Lord created all the vast range of sounds, the vowels short and long, the semi-vowels, the consonants and so on" (Bhagavata Purana 12.6.43).

उत्तमः पुरुषस्त्वन्यः परमात्मेत्युदाहृतः । यो लोकत्रयमाविश्य विभर्त्यव्यय ईश्वरः ॥ १५-१७ ॥

uttamah puruṣasivanyaḥ paramātmetyudāhṛtaḥ | yo lokatrayamāviśya vibhartyavyaya īśvaraḥ || 15-17 ||

uttamah: the supreme; puruṣa: puruṣa; tu: but; anyaḥ: another; param ātma: the paramatman; iti: like this; udāhṛtaḥ: it is said; yah: who; loka trayam: the three worlds; aviśya: entering; bibharti: maintains/ supports; avyaya: imperishable; īśvaraḥ: the Lord.

"But there is another puruṣa, the Purushottama, the imperishable Lord. It is said that he maintains the three worlds by entering into them.

As we know from Mundaka Upanishad 3.1.1,2, Svetasvatara Upanishad 4.6,7, and Bhagavata Purana 11.11.6, within each body live the two puruṣas - the jīvatman and the paramatman; the paramatman is Purushottama, always untouched by activity or its results, but supporting the jīvatman and all the material manifestation that is required to facilitate the jīvatman's evolution.

While the conditioned soul eats the fruits of the tree of the body, the liberated soul has moved its attention to the supreme Soul and therefore remains on the same permanent position. However, the supreme Soul remains uttama, superior, even to the liberated or perfected soul.

This supreme puruṣa is Purushottama, also known as Isvara ("who controls") and Bhagavan ("who contains all perfections"). Individual souls can only participate to a marginal measure of such glories, either in the conditioned (baddha) or in the liberated state (siddha). In the spiritual dimension (vaikuntha, goloka) the nitya siddhas have entered (aviśya 8.11, 11.54, 18.55, etc) the supreme Consciousness and therefore they participate to this Krishna Consciousness, but they still remain vibhinnaṃsas, or "distinct limbs", as confirmed in 2.12. Isvara is still the supreme, as confirmed in the Upanishads: nityo nityanam cetanas cetananam, "the supreme eternal and the supreme conscious" (Katha Upanishad 2.2.13 and Svetasvatara Upanishad, 6.13). Like different cells in our bodies, each individual vibhinnaṃsa participates to the total Consciousness but in its particular function. We cannot say that the hands are more "us" than our feet, or that our stomach is not really part of us, or less important than our head. Even more so, on the transcendental level the various parts of God's spiritual body can function in different ways without the limitations imposed by material consciousness. The bhava or rasa is one and full of happiness, knowledge and eternity, but still there are subtle hues that enhance the taste of spiritual relationships in bhakti. The form of our sentiments for God can be expressed as servitude, friendship, parental affection, conjugal affection and so on, but the fundamental bhava is always love that makes us forget everything else.

In this verse, the word aviśya ("entering") can be connected with the definition of avatara ("who descends into this world"). The next word in the verse, bibharti ("sustains") is from the same family of the words bhrit and bharta ("sustainer, support") and illustrates the purpose of the līlas of bhagavan in this world. How do the avatars sustain the world? Bhagavad gita has explained: paritrāṇaya sādhuṇāṃ vinasāya ca dūṣkṛitāṃ, dharma samsthāpanarthāya sambhavāmi yuge yuge, "I manifest myself yuga after yuga, to protect the good people, destroy the evil doers and to establish dharma" (4.8).

We should not remain confused by the variety of forms, names and activities of the divine avatars, because Isvara is avyaya, "without modification". All such forms, names and activities exist simultaneously and eternally within the supreme Consciousness, and they become manifested temporarily only because of the nature of this material world, that is subject to time, space and duality.

The word udāhṛtaḥ, "he is described", refers to the wealth of knowledge contained in Vedic scriptures, especially the Upanishads, as well as the stutis and prayers that celebrate the greatness of Isvara and his powers.

yasmātkṣaramatīto'hamakṣarādapi cottamah | ato'smi loke vedeca prathitaḥ puruṣottamah || 15-18 ||

yasmāt: because; ksaram: mortal; atītaḥ: beyond; aham: I am; akṣarat: than the immortal; api: even; ca: and; uttamah: superior; ataḥ: therefore; asmi: I am; loke: in the world; vede: in the Vedas; ca: and; prathitaḥ: celebrated; puruṣa uttamah: the supreme puruṣa.

"Since I am beyond both the fallible and the infallible beings, I am the supreme Personality of Godhead. For this reason I am known both in the Vedic literature and among the people of the world as the Purushottama.

This chapter explains how the supreme Personality of Godhead manifests in this world for the benefit of the conditioned souls. By following his instructions and remembering his names, qualities and activities, a conditioned soul can become purified and attain perfection. We have seen that the Supreme Personality of Godhead is the very same Consciousness that is also called Brahman and Paramatma: vadanti tat tattva vīdas tattvam yaj jñānam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti bhagavan iti sadyate, "Those who know Reality say that Transcendence is Reality, the non-dualistic Knowledge that is called Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan" (Bhagavata purana, 1.2.11). Just like Brahman is avikāri ("without transformation"), Bhagavan is also eternally the same although he manifests in many names, forms, activities etc. Because in the transcendental dimension there is no time and space, everything is eternally and simultaneously one, like the Virata Rupa seen by Arjuna (11.13).

Bhagavan enters into the world and spreads like the Universal Tree, but is never entangled in it: taya vilasitesu esu gunesu gunavan iva, antah pravista abhati, vijnanena vijrimbbhat, "Although he enters within the function of the gunas, and seem to be defined by them, he is never affected, because he is always fully conscious of the perfect knowledge (rijnana)" (Bhagavata Purana, 1.2.31).

We could say that Bhagavan is the "concentrated" form of Brahman: brahmano hi pratishthabham amritasyavyayaasya ca, sasvatasya ca dharmasya sukhasyaikantikasya ca, "I am the foundation of the Brahman, the immortal, imperishable, eternal Brahman, that is the ultimate dharma and happiness, the One Reality" (14.27).

Purushottama is therefore ksaram atita and aksarat uttama, because for him there is actually no ksara or aksara - just like the sun is always radiant and luminous, day and night. We, too, will be able to see this constant radiance when we penetrate through the cover of the clouds and we break free from gravity and rise into space, closer and closer to the sun. This is the real purpose of yoga, as Krishna has stated very clearly: yoginam api sarvesam mad gatenantar atmana, sraddhavan bhajate yo mam sa me yuktatamo matah, "Among all yogis, one who serves me with faith and full concentration, is considered by me as the greatest yogi" (6.47).

The real meaning of bhakti is to constantly focus on the supreme Consciousness and engage all activities on that level, just like each and every cell of our bodies function properly only when they work selflessly to carry out the activities of the entire body. This is why bhakti and yoga are totally incompatible with the dualistic mentality that separates us from the other beings and creates envy, cruelty, callousness, hatred, and so on. A true yogi and bhakta can never have these feelings towards other living beings or behave in such a way as to damage them. Of course this does not mean that s/he cannot hate ignorance and stupidity or cruelty, or s/he cannot kill an aggressor or eliminate what obstructs the material and spiritual progress of people. But the idea of beating someone up because they want to have the darshan of the Lord, or stopping the spiritual progress of others in any other way, is inconceivable for a true servant of Jagannatha.

यो मामेवमसम्मूढो जानाति पुरुषोत्तमम् । स सर्वविद्भजति मां सर्वभावेन भारत ॥ १५-१९ ॥

yo mamevamasammūḍho jānāti puruṣottamam | sa sarvavidbhajati mām sarvabhāvena bhārata || 15-19 ||

yah: one who; mam: me; evam: thus; asammudhab: without confusion; janati: knows; puruṣa uttamam: the supreme puruṣa; sah: s/he; sarva-vit: one who knows everything; bhajati: worships; mam: me; sarva bhavena: in all bhavas; bharata: o descendant of Bharata.

"O descendant of Bharata, one who knows me in this way, without any confusion, as the Purushottama, knows everything and worships me in all beings/ sentiments.

A neophyte in the practice of yoga must remove himself from the company of others (6.10), but after attaining the level of Brahman realization (brahma bhuta, 6.27), one should overcome the limitations of duality: sarva bhuta sthitam yo mam bhajaty ekatvam asthitah, sarvatha vartamano 'pi sa yogi mayi vartate, "The yogi who worships me as the One who resides in all existences is situated in me; wherever s/he may go, s/he always remains in me" (6.31). This is the proper vision.

The most important part of the verse is yah mam, "s/he to me", expressing the union of consciousness and the focus of our awareness and work. We should train our mind (6.35) to focus on this advaita jnana that is Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan, and includes all states of being. This is only possible when we drop the delusions (asam mudha) that keep us in the foolishness of material identification and attachment, characterized by the limitations of time, space and duality. In fact, this is the one and only point of Bhagavad gita and the entire corpus of Vedic knowledge, that develops the endless variety of situations and lessons and tests we face in the "school of life".

Yoga is not about learning how to twist your body into a pretzel or lose weight so that you can enjoy more sense gratification and social acceptance - that is for mudhas, who are easily trapped by illusion. No amount of academic titles will help either, as long as we maintain an asuric mentality: na mam duskritino mudhab prapadyante naradhamah, mayayapabrita jnana asuram bhavam asritah, "The evil doers, the foolish, the most degraded, those whose knowledge has been covered by delusion, and those who have chosen an asuric existence do not approach me" (7.15). We are going to learn more about the asuric mentality in the next chapter. The last part of this verse (bhajati mam sarva bhavena) has two levels of meanings: one meaning is the immediate understanding of the presence of God in all beings and situations, and the other meaning refers to the intimate bhakti rasa that we can develop in our personal relationship with Bhagavan. In this deeper meaning, sarva bhavena can be translated as "in all bhavas, with all bhavas", where bhava means "nature, feeling, sentiment".

There is no limit in approaching Purushottama through the rasas or bhavas: this relationship is exquisitely personal (yah mam) and does not depend on anything external - not even on the guru's instructions or lineage, that is merely indicative. The siddha deba develops from the anu atma according to its original nature, and is only determined by our full satisfaction - when we perceive that we have "grown enough" and that is the position we want to keep. In this perspective, the realization of Brahman is sambandha ("connection") through the supreme Consciousness, Paramatma is abhidheya ("knowledge") through the constant instructions we receive from the supreme Guru from within our hearts, and Bhagavan is prayojana ("engagement") in the functions of service to the Supreme as his limb or cell (amsa).

एतद्बुद्ध्वा बुद्धिमान्स्यात्कृतकृत्यश्च भारत ॥ १५-२० ॥

iti guhyatamaṁ śāstramidamuktaṁ mayānagha | etadbuddhvā buddhimānsyātkṛtakṛtyaśca bhārata || 15-20 |

iti: thus; guhyatamaṁ: the most secret; sastra: the shastra; idam: this; uktam: explained; maya: by me; anagha: o sinless one; etat: this; buddhva: by understanding; buddhiman: intelligent; syat: one becomes; kṛta kṛtyah: the most successful in accomplishments; ca: and; bharata: o descendant of Bharata.

"O sinless descendant of Bharata, I have thus explained the greatest secret that is contained in all scriptures. By understanding it, one becomes (most) intelligent and accomplishes the greatest task (in life).

In this verse Krishna addresses Arjuna calling him anagha and bharata, usually translated as "sinless" and "descendant of Bharata". The meaning of anagha, however, should be understood carefully and not superimposed with concepts that are alien to Vedic culture. Just like its synonym papa, the word agha does not correspond exactly to the English "sin", because it is not based on the same abrahamic ideology, where a human being is condemned because of disobeying the orders of God or the priests. In the Vedic logic, agha or papa is a black spot on one's character caused by a bad choice, a mistake, an act of weakness, selfishness or ignorance that needs to be counteracted and purified by positive actions. It is also a debt to be repaid, a duty that has not been fulfilled yet: this is the meaning to which we should connect the expression kṛta kṛtyah "accomplished duties", referred to the supreme success in life.

This chapter has summarized the message of Bhagavad gita, showing the realization of Purushottama as the purpose of the entire Universal Tree, the Vedic knowledge and the cosmic manifestation. This was also stated in chapter 4: sreyan dravya mayad yajñaj jnana yajñah parantapa, sarvaṁ karmakṣilam partha jñane parisamāpyate, "O Arjuna, better than the sacrifice of one's wealth is the sacrifice of knowledge. O Arjuna, the entire scope of all the activities must culminate in knowledge" (4.33).

This knowledge is the same explained in Bhagavata Purana, where the Lord had stated: jñana parama guhyam me yad vijñana samavṛtam, sarabasyam tad angam ca grihṇa gaditam maya, yavaṁ aham yatha bhavaṁ yad rūpaṁ guṇa karmakṣaṁ, tathaiṣa tattva vijñanam astu te mad anugrahaḥ, "My supreme knowledge is hidden, and it is applied in practice. Try to understand it while I am explaining it, with its secrets and implications. Let this knowledge be realized by you by my kindness: as it is I who manifest the existence of all forms, qualities and activities." (Bhagavata Purana, 2.9.31-32). This deep knowledge is expressed in the following catuh sloki (2.9.33-36):

aham evaṁ evagre nanyad yat sat asaṁ param, pascad aham yad etac ca yo 'vasiṣyeta so 'smy aham, "I am that which existed before the creation, and all that will ever exist. I am the sat and the asaṁ (the supreme cause and effect), up to the end (of the universe), and I am what remains after all these (creations) and everything else (are dissolved)", rite 'rtham yat pratiyeta na pratiyeta catmani, tad vidyad atmano mayam yathabhaso yatha tama, "Whatever appears to be of value or without value, is only in relationship with me. You must know that everything (in this world) is just the shadow of my maya, like darkness is a shadow (of light)", yatha mahanti bhutani bhutesucchavacesv antu, pravistāni apravistāni tatha tesu na tesv aham, "Just like the elemental powers (ether, air, fire, water, earth) are contained in all beings, both great and small, and at the same time they are not limited to them, similarly I am in all beings, and yet I am not (limited to them)", etadv eva jijnāsyam tattva jijnāsunatmanah, anvaya vyatirekabhyam yat syat sarvatra sarvada, "This (that I have now explained) is the most important subject of transcendental knowledge, the tattva that should be researched directly and directly, at all times and places and in all circumstances".

Chapter 16: Daivasura sampada vibhaga yoga

The yoga of differentiating between the characteristics of the divine and the demoniac personalities

This chapter of Gita is most useful practically in our daily life and personal progress, and continues the extremely valuable instructions that Krishna has given in chapter 14 about the three gunas. It will be followed by chapter 17, that explains more specifically how religious people can be classified according to the principles of daiva asura sampada and the three gunas. Finally, chapter 18 will again summarize the contents of Bhagavad gita.

By a general overview of Krishna's logical thread in the dialog with Arjuna, we can see that he starts by addressing Arjuna's feelings of depression and discouragement, and then he leads him away from the faulty and materialistic ideas about religion (laukika sraddha) and towards the correct teachings of the shastra about the realization of atman and brahman and the science of yoga in its various aspects. This is the same journey each one of us needs to take, both at individual and collective level. Still today, many people are confused by foolish and misleading ideas about religion and end up creating a lot of problems, in spite of their good intentions. This chapter will clarify everything.

The famous saying, sarva dharma sama bhava, has been very badly misinterpreted by foolish and ignorant people to mean that any belief is equally good, as long as we call it "religion" and contains some notion of "God". The mistake originally comes from a serious lack of understanding about the word dharma, that is stupidly translated as "religion" in the abrahamic sense - a definition that does not include the fundamental respect for the universal and eternal principles of ethics that constitute dharma. Indeed, abrahamic ideologies are characterized by the absolute necessity to subordinate these universal and eternal principles of ethics (usually called "conscience" or "human values") in favor of the sense of blind and absolute loyalty and obedience to the orders of God and his priests. Therefore, such ideologies may be called "religions" but certainly not dharma.

A widespread ignorance of the actual Vedic knowledge has brought many Hindu activists to try to "reinvent the wheel" by offering novel solutions to the problem of incompatibility between abrahamic ideologies and the concept of dharma, so we have seen a vast range of foolish propositions - from "banning the name 'religion'" (that is, banning the use of English language in this particular instance) to "creating new shastra to fit the times" to "denying the idea of a God in Hinduism". At best, these are naive and simplistic ideas that will not solve the problem.

True, we need to stop using words without understanding their meaning, and we need to approach the original shastra (sruti) without being distracted by obsolete interpretations limited by time, place and circumstances that do not exist any more. But just using the name 'dharma' will not solve the problem if we keep giving it the same old faulty meaning of 'religion': the problem is not merely in the language, the problem is in the meaning.

The same applies for the real meaning of the terms daiva and asuri, that are normally translated as "divine" and "demoniac". We can choose to use the original Sanskrit without translation, just as we normally do with difficult definitions such as yoga, karma, rishi, vigraha, sannyasa, brahmachari, etc, but that does not exempt us from making an effort to understand the actual significance of the original Sanskrit words.

To do that, we need to disengage the words "divine" and "demoniac" from their abrahamic sense, that indicates separate entities who are distinct from human beings and who determine from the outside what the behavior of human beings will be. This particular perspective is due to the fact that in abrahamic ideologies a human being can never progress or evolve in consciousness but is always only a helpless sinner, subject to either God (Yahweh, Allah etc) or the Devil (Satan) and their representatives.

In Vedic terminology, daiva and asura indicate qualities (gunas) that are expansions of the original three gunas described in chapter 14. The idea that some specific super-human beings come to be called devas and asuras indicate that such individuals have considerably developed the corresponding qualities and mentality in their own behavior and attitude. This is the meaning of the word sampada, "characteristics".

It is important to understand that such devas and asuras are separate individual atmans who are only responsible for their own behavior, and not for the behavior of human beings. Both the divine and demoniac natures are merely combinations of the neutral energies of the Supreme. Taking birth in a human body constitutes an intermediate position between devas and asuras because it enables us to choose in either direction, and therefore we will then become a daiva or an asura person individually because of our choices, as explained in 2.32, 2.43, 7.23, 9.20-21, 9.25, 14.14-15, 14.18, 16.20, 16.22.

Krishna had already briefly introduced the subject in chapter 12: moghasa mogha karmano mogha jnana vicetasah, raksasim asurim caiva prakritim mobinim sritah, "(Those people who) entertain delusional desires, engage in delusional activities, and are delusionally convinced of their knowledge but are confused by incorrect awareness, certainly take shelter in the bewildering nature of raksasas and asuras" (9.12).

Some materialistic speculators have manufactured a theory according to which the definitions of deva and asura merely indicate two human racial groups, respectively characterized by white and black complexion and identified as the "Aryan" invaders who brought Sanskrit to India, and the original Dravidian inhabitants of the subcontinent. According to this colonial speculation, all the Vedic and Puranic stories and references are reduced to clever and biased propaganda created by the victorious invaders who demonized the conquered and enslaved indigenous peoples and distorted the original historical facts.

In this hallucinated perspective, they proceed to "reinterpret" for example the story of Rama versus Ravana as the romanticized adventure of a Caucasian nomadic marauder who needed some good excuse to vandalize the peaceful and happy land of a beloved chief of black-complexioned peoples. They conveniently forget important details of the story - i.e. Rama is always described as black in complexion, and hailing from a highly urbanized civilization with an extremely ancient settlement in Ayodhya. But over and above all, these superficial scholars neglect to notice that the strict ethical code of Vedic civilization and the divine qualities it values so much.

sri bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; abhayaṁ: fearless; sattva saṁśuddhiḥ: complete purification of sattva; jñāna yoga: jñāna yoga; vyavasthitiḥ: the specific position; danam: charity; damaḥ: restraint, control of the senses; ca: and; yajnaḥ: sacrificial action; ca: and; svādhyāyaḥ: study of the science of the self; tapah: austerity; ārjavam: simplicity.

The wonderful Lord said: "Fearlessness, the purification of one's existence, the constant application of knowledge, generosity, control of one's senses, engagement in sacred activities and study of atma vidya, austerity and simplicity,

The previous chapter ended (15.19) with Krishna telling Arjuna, "One who knows me as the Purushottama knows everything and worships me in all beings."

However, we need to understand what are the external symptoms of such a great soul, as Arjuna had mentioned before (2.54, 14.21). Krishna has listed such qualities in 2.56-57, 12.14-19, 13.8-12, 14.22-25 and in 14.6 he has explained the external symptoms of sattva, rajas and tamas. The description will become even more detailed in this chapter and continue in chapters 17 and 18.

The first quality listed in this verse is abhaya, "fearlessness". We have already found it as a fundamental requirement in verses 2.56, 4.10, 5.28, and 12.15. Also, verse 2.35 mentioned fear as a cause for disgrace. But what is fear? Bhagavata Purana (11.2.37) explains: bhayaṁ dvitīyābhīnivesataḥ syad isad apetasya viparyayo 'smṛtiḥ, tan mayayato budha abhajat tam, bhaktyaikāyasaṁ guru devatatma, "Fear arises when the consciousness is focused on duality (dvitīya). One who separates himself from the Lord is confused by illusion and forgetfulness (ignorance). Therefore intelligent people should offer a devotional worship to the Lord, who is the atman of the guru and the devas." The same is also confirmed by the Bṛihad aranyaka Upaniṣad (1.4.2), dvitīyād vai bhayaṁ bhavati, "fear is born of duality", and brahman is abhayaṁ, "free from fear" (4.4.25). So we can understand that fear originates from the ignorance constituted by abhikāra and maṁatva, and focuses on the possibility of a loss in these areas of the consciousness. We are afraid of damage to our bodies and mind, or to the bodies and minds of those persons we consider "ours" (family, friends, etc), or to "our" objects (wealth, social position, safety of one's home, etc) or even to "our" mental certainties and beliefs that may be proven false and illusory. Fear usually generates hatred and violence, and is described as a major symptom of tamas (ignorance).

On the practical level, such losses may be caused by the mistakes of our own mind and body (adhyatmika kleśa), by the actions of other creatures (adbhāntika kleśa) or by the conditions created by the higher powers of the universe (adbhāntika kleśa), and therefore our mind creates the duality between enemy and friend.

In this perspective, the enemy is someone who gives us sorrow by taking something good away from us (or giving us something unpleasant) and the friend is someone who gives us joy by gifting us with something good (or relieving our sufferings due to unpleasant things). One who has realized Brahman knows very well that both positions are illusory. Each living entity receives the joys and sorrows that are due to his own previous activities (karma), and the atman is never really touched by any loss, or even by separation of consciousness and interests from the Supreme. If we lose something, it means it was never really ours to begin with (2.16). These were the first elementary teachings offered by Krishna at the beginning of the Bhagavad gita.

The expression sattva saṁśuddhi has various levels of meanings, because sattva can indicate the sattva guṇa, one's existence (the nature of sat), the mind (as a form of existence that survives the gross body), and the atman (that exists eternally). The word saṁśuddhi means "complete purification", which applied in this context produces the following translations: 1) "purification of material sattva guṇa into viśuddha sattva or transcendental goodness", 2) "purification of one's existence through the proper activities and prescribed duties", 3) "purification of one's mind and heart through the proper consciousness and realization" or "a pure heart", 4) "purification of the identity from all material superimposition".

The next expression is jñāna yoga vyavasthiti. We know that jñāna means "knowledge", yoga means "union, engagement, connection", and vyavastha means "position", also used with reference to the varṇa vyavastha (the "occupational position in society").

So vyavasthiti means "established position". The translation of the complete expression can therefore be, "being established in union with the Supreme through knowledge", "being consistently engaged in the study of the scriptures", and "being in the category of those people who cultivate knowledge".

Connecting all the three elements of the first line, we understand that a person who has purified his/ her mentality from material identification and realized the Self (atman/ brahman) is free from fear and always situated in the consciousness of Reality. By connecting the last element of the first line and the first element of the second line we also obtain something very interesting: jñāna yoga vyavasthiti danam, that is the gift of distributing solid knowledge - the greatest possible form of charity, as Krishna will state at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.68-70). However, this little jewel is very appropriately hidden in the fold between the two lines, because such knowledge is the greatest secret (9.1, 9.2, 11.1, 15.20, 18.63, 18.64, 18.67) and it should not be given to those who are not able to appreciate it (18.67).

The second line of the verse connects danam ("generosity" or "charity"), dama ("restraint"), yajna ("performing the sacred duties", and also "spirit of sacrifice"), svādhyāya ("personal study of śāstra"), tapas ("austerity"), and ārjavam ("simplicity"). While the first line speaks about the mentality or activities of the mind and consciousness, the second line speaks about behavior or the activities of the body. One should be the mirror of the other (due to satyam and arjavam).

The danam recommended in this verse must be supported by suddha sattva or at least by sattva, and so are the practices of self control, the ritual performances and worship, the austerities and so on. Therefore they are mentioned together with svadhyaya and arjavam. Svadhyaya is the personal study of shastra especially about atma vidya, while arjavam is simplicity, in the sense of honesty, truthfulness and straightforwardness: these two qualities are transcendental and powerful enough to protect us from all material contamination. As we will see in the next chapter (17), even charity, austerity and religious worship can be categorized according to the three gunas as daivi or asuri (divine or demoniac), and bring results accordingly.

Previous commentators have highlighted the fact that the requirements listed in this verse can be applied electively by category according to the ashramas or stages of life. In this perspective, a brahmachari must first learn fearlessness and purification of one's existence by firmly establishing himself in jnana yoga (applied knowledge, spiritual and material) and by strictly observing the dharmic principles of yama and niyama. Then he enters family life as grihastha and engages in charity, self control and performance of his sacred duties (ritualistic ceremonies and professional work), and at the onset of old age (panchasa urdhvam vanam vrajet, "after the age of 50 one should move to the forest") he enters the order of vanaprastha and then sannyasa, two stages in which he must concentrate on svadhyaya (the study of transcendental atma vidya only, foregoing material knowledge), as well as on austerity and simplicity. Family life, called grihastha ashrama, is the most important stage of life because a family man's first duty is to feed and protect all the other members of society, just like the king protects and feeds all the prajas. And just like a king, a grihastha is entitled to enjoy all types of dharmic sense gratification, but he pays for such goodies by properly discharging his duties.

He is entitled (adhikara) to kindle the fire for cooking meals for himself and his family (which includes servants and household animals), but he must honor the fire with a daily homa, and must also distribute sufficient food to guests and mendicants - mostly brahmacharis, vanaprasthas and sannyasis, but also all meritorious and needy people, as well as stray cows, dogs, crows, and so on.

Similarly, dama (restraint) is required specifically for a grihastha because of the dangerous nature of kama (desire), very well explained in verses 2.62 to 2.64 and 3.37 to 3.40. Desire in itself is not to be condemned (7.11), but our desires should always be purified by the association with the divine that turns sense gratification into prasada (2.64, 2.65). This is the meaning of yajna, sacred action. Especially in Kali yuga, it is not necessary to engage in very complicated and expensive ritualistic ceremonies; we can successfully perform yajna by investing time and resources in any sacred action, including the japa yajna (10.25) and the sankirtana yajna (10.9), considered the best by Krishna. However, we should not think that all religious activities (yajna, dana and tapas) will bring the same results. As we will see in the next chapter, especially in verses 17.3 to 17.6 and 17.11 to 17.28, only some religious activities are actually beneficial, while some are useless or even detrimental to our progress and to the progress of others.

We should be very careful to avoid misunderstanding about the concept of arjavam. True simplicity is born from sattva, not tamas. Simple does not mean stupid, ignorant, dull, lazy or careless: it means brilliant - clean, beautiful, true, effective. There is a great difference between "simple" and "simplistic". A person who is truly simple-minded is honest and affectionate or friendly to all (satya saralata prema). In a society controlled by asuras, however, these qualities are usually treated as defects. As saralata ("grasping the essence of the issue") and akapatya ("freedom from hypocrisy"), arjavam ("simplicity, straightforwardness") protects all our religious activities from the evils created by rajas and tamas as explained in chapter 17.

It is important to understand here that the devas who reside on the higher planets are not conditioned souls. They are defined by the same divine qualities that characterize Vishnu, who is also a deva. Those who still have a separate feeling in their consciousness/ nature, but are situated in sattva (the material guna of goodness) are allowed to take birth on the higher planets, where they live for a certain number of celestial years, and if they have not graduated to suddha sattva (transcendental goodness), they return to the human level to continue their progress (9.21).

However, the primary Devas (the Adityas, Vasus, Rudras, Asvini, Marutas etc, what to speak of Shiva and Brahma) who are in charge of the administration of the universe are direct manifestations of the supreme and complete Consciousness - directly God. They are the various Personalities of the Godhead.

अहिंसा सत्यमक्रोधस्त्यागः शान्तिरपैशुनम् । दया भूतेष्वलोलुप्त्वं मार्दवं ह्रीरचापलम् ॥ १६-२ ॥

ahimsā satyamakrodhastyāgaḥ śāntirapaisunam | dayā bhūteṣvaloluptvaṁ mārḍavaṁ hrīracāpalam || 16-2 ||

ahimsa: freedom from hatred; satyam: truthfulness; akrodhabh: freedom from anger; tyagabh: renunciation; santibh: peacefulness; apaisunam: freedom from wickedness; daya: compassion; bhutesu: towards (all) beings; aloluptvam: freedom from greed; mardavam: kindness; brih: modesty; acapalam: determination.

"freedom from hatred, truthfulness, freedom from anger, renunciation, peacefulness, freedom from wickedness, compassion towards all creatures, freedom from greed, kindness, modesty and determination,

The list of the symptoms of a beneficial personality (sivam) continues; it applies both to Bhagavan himself and to all those who have divine qualities. A person who has realized the jnana tattva (Bhagavata Purana 1.2.11) as Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan, and has become One with God, has no reason for fear, and is always detached from material possessions and engaged in sacred activities (16.1). In this verse we see the other symptoms of such realization, in one's external behavior towards other beings (ahimsa, satya, akrodha, tyaga, santi, apaisuna, daya) and in one's attitude towards oneself (aloluptvam, mardavam, bri, acapalam).

The first and arguably the most important definition in this verse is ahimsa, usually translated simplistically as "non violence". We have elaborated on this word already, as the definition is also found in verses 10.4 and 13.8 (and it will be mentioned again in 17.4). The importance of ahimsa is also confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (1.18.22, 3.28.4, 4.22.24, 7.11.8, 11.3.24, 11.17.21, 11.18.42, 11.19.33). Ahimsa is also mentioned in the yoga shastra as one of the fundamental requirements in the yama and niyama regulations, so much that some saints and teachers have come to present it as "the highest dharma" (ahimsa paramo dharma). In this sense, it is equated with daya ("compassion") and similar qualities such as maitri ("friendliness") etc.

However, the concept of ahimsa can be dangerously misunderstood due to the influence of tamas (ignorance, laziness, stupidity, inertia, callousness, carelessness, fear, etc). The word ahimsa derives from the verb himsati ("to hate"), and therefore it applies to the consciousness or mentality or motivation, and not to the action in itself. Therefore one can remain perfectly situated in ahimsa even while killing thousands of beings and destroying objects, if such forceful action is directed against aggressors and obstacles to the progress of people and is applied without personal selfish motivations. In fact, in some circumstances ahimsa actually demands sufficiently forceful and even lethal action (that some people could call "violence") in order to protect good and harmless persons and creatures.

However, we need to be honest about our motivations (satyam) and apply force without anger (akrodha), just like a good surgeon uses a sharp knife to remove a tumor but always keeps a cool head and does not damage healthy cells. We must always be extremely careful not to cause unnecessary pain, injury or death, because such damage will create a karmic debt that must be paid sooner or later. Satyam ("truthfulness") is actually the supreme and most fundamental principle of dharma, the last that remains to support the progress of the universe when all others have disappeared, as clearly stated in Bhagavata Purana (1.17.24-25). Without satyam ("truthfulness") no other ethical or religious principle can survive or support one's progress. The word akrodha ("freedom from anger") is also very important, and directly connected with ahimsa ("freedom from hatred"). The actual meaning of krodha applies to the vindictive anger that is born out of frustration of one's selfish desires in attachments and identifications, as beautifully explained in verses 2.62 to 2.63, and in verses 3.36 to 3.41. When there is no selfish desire for one's sense gratification or egotism, the definition of krodha does not apply. This freedom from anger is mentioned as a major requirement for yoga in verses 2.56, 4.10, 5.23, 5.26, 5.28, and again in 18.53, and krodha ("rage") is mentioned many times in this chapter as a key characteristic of asuras or people with a demonic mentality. Just like ahimsa, the divine quality of akrodha does not contradict forceful action against aggressors or obstacles to the progress of society. Sometimes we need to display anger to shake people out of their complacency and stupidity, and convince them to stop their wrongful and damaging activities. This is applied especially to the roles of king, guru, teacher and parent, when they are facing stubborn subordinates who will not listen to proper reason and logic. But such anger is only external and temporary, never internal or prolonged, because it is not fed by selfish attachments. Stupid people are often incapable of understanding this point and therefore they praise the behavior of those who externally remain quiet and even smiling, but internally cultivate a seething rage, that is bottled up and festers into poison to emerge later with much greater damage to everyone, exploding into himsa ("violence, hatred, injury").

We can see many cases in which great rishis and brahmanas, as well as avatars, openly displayed anger towards aggressors or offenders who were obstructing the progress of the universe, and even cursed them in order to teach them a lesson. However, these great souls were not victim of confusion and frustration, but remained fully conscious and balanced internally, and they were always acting for the benefit of all those who were involved, and never caused any real damage. This of course does not apply to the anger and violence of a so-called God who sentences his creatures to the eternal torture of hell or kills them indiscriminately and untimely in a flood (or in any other disaster, war etc) when believing that they only have one single life (no reincarnation). There is certainly nothing daiva ("divine") in that - there is just hypocrisy (asatyam, kapatya). This is why the next four divine qualities are described as tyaga ("renunciation"), santi ("peacefulness"), apaisunam ("freedom from wickedness") and daya ("compassion") towards all beings (bhutesu), especially towards innocent animals and all harmless creatures. A so-called religion that does not develop these characteristics visibly, deeply and consistently in all its followers (what to speak of its "authorities") is nothing but a dangerous fraud.

The divine quality of santi ("peacefulness") is created through dama (restraint) connected with tyaga (renunciation to identifications and attachments, especially regarding the lower gunas). The santi mantra of Yajur veda sambita (36.17) evokes this peacefulness in the entire universe: om dyaubh santir antariksam santib, prthivi santir apah santir ausadhyah santib, vanaspatayah santir visvedevah santir brahma santib, sarvah santib santir eva santib, sa ma santir edhi, om santib, santib, santib. Here is the translation: "Peace in the sky! Peace in deep space! Peace on earth! Peace in water! Peace in the medicinal plants! Peace in the forests! Peace among all the Devas! Peace in Brahman! Everywhere is peace, peace, peace, only peace."

The word apaisunam can be translated as "freedom from wickedness", but it covers a lot of meanings, as under "wickedness" it includes fault finding, backbiting, slandering, and the intention to hurt others. The word aloluptvam also conveys several meanings, as lupta can refer to booty, or things that have been stolen, destroyed, violated, hurt, lost, and broken. So aloluptvam refers to the character of a person who would never commit such bad actions. The word mardavam, "kindness", derives from mridu, that contains the meanings of gentle, soft, smooth, and benign.

The word bri (bribh) is translated as "modesty", and contrarily to what many people would expect, it was not listed in the qualities of ideal women (10.34). This word, and its synonym lajja, indicate freedom from arrogance and vanity, and a mild and humble disposition, that enhances the glory of divine personalities. Unfortunately, sometimes it is misinterpreted as "shyness", as in a tendency to hide oneself out of shame, scarce self esteem or even out of fear. We should carefully avoid this mistake, especially because here the word bri is coupled with acapalam, that means "determination".

A person who is modest but determined is reliable and sees things through, no matter what it takes - not because out of some abankara and mamatva, but because of a sense of selfless duty and responsibility. This was confirmed by Krishna in verses from 3.21 to 3.26.

तेजः क्षमा धृतिः शौचमद्रोहो नातिमानिता । भवन्ति सम्पदं दैवीमभिजातस्य भारत ॥ १६-३ ॥

tejah kṣamā dhṛtiḥ śaucamadroho nātimānita । bhavanti sampadam daivīmabhijātasya bhārata ॥ 16-3 ॥

tejah: radiance; kṣama: forgiveness; dhṛtiḥ: consistency; saucam: cleanliness; adrohab: freedom from enmity; na: not; ati manita: expecting great honors; bhavanti: they become; sampadam: great qualities; daivim: divine; abhijatasya: of one who has taken birth; bharata: o descendant of Bharata.

"radiance, forgiveness, consistency, cleanliness, freedom from enmity, not expecting great honors: these, o descendant of Bharata, are the characteristics of one who was born with a divine nature.

The word tejas has already been explained many times, because it has been used as a symptom of divinity in many verses (7.9, 7.10, 10.36, 10.41, 11.17, 11.19, 11.30, 11.47, 15.12). It will also be listed in 18.42 in the characteristics of the kṣatriyas, while the characteristics of the brahmanas are mentioned as dama (restraint or control of the mind and senses), tapas (austerity), saucam (cleanliness), kṣhanti (tolerance), arjavam (simplicity), jñana and vijnana (theoretical and practical knowledge). Therefore we cannot simply translate tejas as "vigor", although certainly the divine radiance of power and charisma constitutes a great strength.

The word kṣama has also been mentioned already in 10.4 and 10.34, with the meanings of "forgiveness", "tolerance" and "patience". In 10.34 it was mentioned together with dhṛiti, a word that is also contained in this verse. Dhṛiti is almost a synonym for acapalam, that appeared in the previous verse. The meanings of dhṛiti include courage, steadiness, firm bearing, firmness, stability, joy, satisfaction or contentment, will, resolution, constancy and consistency, as well as reliability. It also indicates any offering or sacrifice performed with clear deliberation. We may remember that Dhṛiti is the name of one of Dharma's wives (a daughter of Dakṣha). The word acapala is less common, and includes the meanings of steady, not fickle, not oscillating, even unmovable - which makes it much stronger than dhṛiti.

The word saucam means "cleanliness, sanctity", and it is also one of the fundamental principles of dharma as well as a rule of the yama-niyama system. It also applies to the cleanliness of the mind, and in this sense it is connected to the other divine qualities mentioned in the verse.

The word adroha, which is the opposite of droha, means "freedom from enmity and ungratefulness". We found the word droha in verse 1.38 in the compound mitra droha, "hostile and envious towards friendly people". Other applications are for example praja droha and guru droha, where praja indicates the subjects of the State and guru includes all teachers and well-wishers who are superior to us. In all these cases, we understand that droha refers to any unjustified negative attitude and behavior characterized by envy, wickedness, hostility, hatred, ungratefulness - all against innocent and good persons, even against affectionate friends, family members or benefactors.

The expression na ati manita, "not expecting great honors", is similar to apamāna ("lack of respect", as in 6.7, 12.8, 14.25), and amanitvam adambhitvam (13.8). A divine personality is not attached to receiving honors or a special position, although he understands when he is being disrespected, especially when such negative attitude is created by ignorance and foolishness - characteristically due to material identification.

Krishna specifically mentions this point in verse 9.11: avanjananti mam mudha manusim tanum asritam, param bhavam ajananto mama bhūta mahesvaram, "Foolish people disrespect me when I appear in a human form. They have no knowledge of my transcendental nature as the great master of all existences." Krishna is not expressing personal sadness because he has not been worshiped. On the contrary, what he regrets is the fact that ignorant people waste a valuable opportunity to learn something and progress in transcendental realization because they underestimate his teachings.

This lack of attachment to special honors does not mean that one should underestimate the value or importance of one's service or mission, what to speak of disparaging or offending transcendental knowledge. We can see a brilliant demonstration of this point in Jada Bharata's episode in Bhagavata Purana, canto 5, from chapter 9 to chapter 14. Under all aspects, Jada Bharata was the personification of humility and detachment from any material considerations of position and respect, but when king Rahugana scolded him (5.10.6-7) for his irregular walking in carrying the palanquin and threatened to punish him, Jada Bharata replied fearlessly and solemnly, authoritatively correcting the king's attitude and imparting him appropriate teachings about the transcendental science (5.10.9-13). And then he continued to walk irregularly just as he had been doing before, because that was the right thing to do.

Foolish people would probably have expected Jada Bharata to show his humility and lack of attachment to honors in a very different way - specifically apologizing to the king without daring to talk back to him, and starting to walk normally as the king was demanding. But Jada Bharata did not submit to ignorance and arrogance and material considerations of social etiquette, because his knowledge was very clear. We should never confuse humility with lack of confidence or shyness or low self esteem.

Some emotional people are anxious to present themselves as very fallen, or very stupid, or very ignorant, but such propositions are useful only in rare and extreme situations. They should never be used as cheap excuses for escaping from one's duty and justifying laziness and irresponsibility, or even worse, as pretexts to indulge in masochism and self-loathing, and/ or in sadism and emotional abuse enforced on others as "religious training", especially when they are accompanied by hypocritical behavior that belies such great protestations of personal humility. In such cases, we see the humiliation of subordinates, such as lay people, students, women and children, while the "religious authorities" demand exaggerated honors for themselves, although claiming to be "very renounced and detached". We see for example the attitude of saṁnyāsīs who sign their names accompanied by the grandiose titles of svāmī and maharāja (respectively "Lord" and "Great King"), but call (and refer to) women devotees with the epithet of dāsī ("servant") or at most devī dāsī ("lady servant"). This is disgraceful especially in India, where the definition of dāsī is traditionally applied to female house servants, popularly considered in the category of ordinary prostitutes. We have seen that such bad habit is invariably accompanied by other forms of humiliation and mistreatment towards "ordinary persons" for example in accommodation, food, transportation, and all the other instances in which respect or lack of respect are characteristically shown, including access to direct service to the Deities, leadership positions, and teaching/ preaching engagements.

The last part of this verse explains that such divine qualities appear, or are developed (bhavanti), in a person who was born with under the influence of divine nature (daivīm prakṛitīm asṛitāḥ, 9.13). Krishna has already explained that a person who consistently associates with sattva or suddha sattva through sincere service to God obtains a suitable body after death (8.6).

It is important to understand that such divine qualities are individual, and not merely inherited genetically, therefore we see from many scriptural examples that great divine personalities were born from asuras and the other way around. According to Vedic tradition, the garbhādhana samskāra should be properly performed at the time of conception to attract an elevated soul into the matrix that is sanctified by a higher level of consciousness and auspicious activities.

Astrology can give us some good indications of the character of a person based on the particular time and place of birth, but for all practical purposes it is much better to directly observe the behavior and mentality of each individual, because astrologers can always make mistakes and the birth information could be incorrect.

दम्भो दर्पोऽभिमानश्च क्रोधः पारुष्यमेव च । अज्ञानं चाभिजातस्य पार्थ सम्पदमासुरीम् ॥ १६-४ ॥

dambho darpo'bhimānaśca krodhaḥ pāruṣyameva ca । ajñānaṁ cābhijātasya pārtha sampadamāsurīm ॥ 16-4 ॥

dambhaḥ: hypocrisy; darpaḥ: impudence; abhimānaḥ: conceit; ca: and; krodhaḥ: rage; pāruṣyam: cruelty in insulting; eva: certainly; ca: and; ajñānam: ignorance; ca: and; abhijātasya: of one who has taken birth as; pārtha: o son of Pritha; sampadam: notable characteristics; asurīm: asurika nature.

"O son of Pritha, the characteristics of those born of asuric nature are hypocrisy, impudence, conceit, rage, rudeness, and of course ignorance.

The most important word in the verse takes here the place of honor in the first position, and again it will be mentioned in verses 16.8, 16.17, 17.5, 17.12 and 17.18 as a key concept. Mistranslated by other commentators as "vainglory", dambha actually means "hypocrisy, false morality, fraud, deceit, feigning, religious ostentation", and applies specifically to false religionists, who are therefore declared by Krishna himself to be not simply "imperfect", but downright asuric. They are a serious and unnecessary disturbance to society, especially when their conclusions and behavior are contrary to the teachings of genuine śruti and smṛiti. This is the reason why the only solution to all the problems of human society consists in defeating ignorance (ajñānam), here placed at the conclusion of the list as the summary and root of all evils. And ignorance is defeated only through the appropriate study and application of śāstra.

Unfortunately this symptom of dambha is presently observed in the vast majority of so-called religionists in all sects. The Bhagavata Purāṇa (7.15.12) specifically elaborates on the various forms of false religion: vidharmaḥ para dharmas ca, abhāsa upama chalah, adharma sakehaḥ panchama, adharma jno 'dharmavat tyajet, "There are 5 branches of adharma: religion that is against the principles of dharmā, religion against one's nature, religion based on hypocrisy, religion that is not progressive, and religion that is based on lies". According to this verse, false religion is anything that is against the principles of universal ethics such as compassion, cleanliness, etc, or forces people into duties that are against their true individual nature (as in birth prejudice), or relies on theatricals or feigned demonstrations (or a false facade for public relations), or disconnecting theory from practice. Also, a "religion" is false when it is not progressive (moving from lower standards or upā dharmā to higher levels), or it is based on lies and deceit - for example teaching that lying is good, or manufacturing false teachings for materialistic purposes.

The abrahamic concepts of taqqiyya (islamic) and kol nidre (jewish) are obviously a symptom of their belonging to this category of vidharma. Christianity also presents various examples, from its early days in 4th century with Bishop Eusebius (the official propagandist for Constantine); he entitles the 32nd Chapter of his 12th Book of Evangelical Preparation as "How it may be Lawful and Fitting to use Falsehood as a Medicine, and for the Benefit of those who Want to be Deceived". To quote another famous ideologist of Christianity, Ignatius Loyola (1491-1556, founder of the Society of Jesus): "We should always be disposed to believe that which appears to us to be white is really black, if the hierarchy of the Church so decides."

Hinduism itself has not been exempt from this contamination, especially in the last few centuries, so much that in the popular mentality (laukika śraddhā) hypocrisy has become established as a social and religious virtue, and most people are totally disconnected with the idea of truthfulness and honesty, and cannot even understand that theory is supposed to be put into practice. Other commentators have quoted a verse from the Varaha Purāṇa to this effect: rakṣasah kalim asṛitya jayante brahma yonisu, "in the age of Kali, (many) rakṣasas (asuras) will take birth in brahmana families".

The word darpa pushes dambha even one step further. It means "arrogance, insolence, impudence, haughtiness, desire to be worshiped" and is connected to egotism. The hypocrite asuras are not bothering to study (what to speak of practicing) the teachings of genuine shastra (16.17, 16.23, 17.6, 17.13) to understand the principles of dharma.

However, they arrogantly take the position of teachers, and they are so impudent that they declare themselves as the only legal representatives of religion, and demand that their "monopoly of teaching" be acknowledged and enforced by all means, including physical violence, overt or covert. The word abhimana also contains more meanings besides the usual "conceit": it is normally used to refer to arrogation, intention to injure, hostile intention, insidiousness, so it perfectly completes the picture. And the more ignorant one is, the more he is likely to be arrogant and overbearing, in a subconscious effort to compensate for his obvious weakness.

We need to understand what is arrogance by including all the above meanings, because many people tend to apply the label of "arrogance" to healthy qualities such as self-esteem, self-reliance, awareness of the importance of one's good work, clear vision of facts, and firm realization of theoretical and practical knowledge, and so on. These qualities are never harming others, but are actually beneficial to all, individually and collectively. A person who has a healthy measure of self-esteem will not think that he can teach shastric knowledge without bringing any shastric evidence, but will confidently engage in a deep and sincere study of the texts, and will not be afraid of questions and genuine philosophical debates.

Standing up and speaking up against injustice, untruth or ignorance cannot be categorized as arrogance, even when we are questioning those who are considered established authorities in society. Calling "thief" a thief (when there is actual evidence of the theft) is not arrogance at all. Pointing out a mistake or wrong conclusion or reasoning or some inconsistency is not arrogance - it is a sattvic action based on cleanliness and truthfulness. It is a service to society - that is the body of Purushottama himself.

The actual arrogance is rather in the angry and cruel (krোধa) reaction of those who feel outraged at the idea that anybody would dare question them or refuse to blindly believe or follow and worship them (or their group, or their leaders). In fact nobody is unquestionable, especially those who occupy a higher position in society and direct or instruct others particularly in the field of religion and spirituality.

The relationship between guru and disciple is based firstly on questioning (pariprasnena) and only secondarily on service (seva), as stated in verse 4.34. Of course, we must present questions in a civilized way, and in the form of interrogation rather than accusation, especially when we do not have actual evidence of wrongful behavior or motivations or conclusions. A truly spiritual or religious person will not refuse to answer questions to explain apparent inconsistencies or mistakes, and certainly will not get angry about such questions or try to take revenge on "upstarts and non-believers" with materialistic means such as violence of any kind, direct and indirect, including police action, court cases, destruction of writings or property etc.

Another important symptom listed here is parusyam, that indicates the harsh words and actions that are meant to viciously hurt people on a personal level. The Sanskrit dictionary lists its meanings as "insult, squalor, cruelty, violence, variety (as in special skills)".

Bhagavata Purana offers more elaboration on the subject: na tatha tapyate viddhah puman banais tu marma gaih, yatha tudanti marma stha, hy asatam parusesavah, "Arrows that hit and pierce sensitive points in the body cause less suffering than the cruel words of evil persons that strike and become lodged in the sensitive points of the heart", (11.23.3). Asuras are specialized in ad hominem attacks against those they perceive as "enemies", usually accusing their victims of being "offensive and envious", "full of hatred" or even "mentally unbalanced". They also try to hit what could be vulnerable points (marma) in the victim, especially based on their bodily conditions, taking full advantage of any physical disability or disease, or even gender, race, caste, financial status, etc. And because they have no consideration for truth, they are particularly fond of inventing the most outrageous falsities to slander their victims.

All this comes down to tamas and ajñana - ignorance - as concluded in this verse as well as in the last chapter of Bhagavad gita (18.22 to 18.32), where Krishna will explain that due to tamas, people mistake dharma for adharma, and adharma for dharma (18.32). So to distinguish between proper forceful action and asuric action we need to carefully study the shastra, including the Puranas and Itihasas, that are full of practical examples from the lives of great personalities.

दैवी सम्पद्विमोक्षाय निबन्धायासुरी मता । मा शुचः सम्पदं दैवीमभिजातोऽसि पाण्डव ॥ १६-५ ॥

daivī sampadvimokṣāya nibandhāyāsūrī matā । mā śucaḥ sampadam daivimabhijāto'si pāṇḍava ॥ 16-5 ॥

daivi: divine; sampad: characteristics; vimokṣaya: leading to complete liberation; nibandhaya: leading to complete bondage; asuri: asurika; matā: are considered; mā: do not; śucaḥ: worry; sampadam: characteristics; daivim: divine; abhijataḥ: one who has taken birth; asi: you are; pandava: o son of Pandu.

"The divine characteristics lead to complete liberation, while the asuric characteristics cause complete bondage. Do not worry, o son of Pandu: you were born with divine qualities.

The daivi sampada, divine characteristics, listed in these verses are very similar to the characteristics of knowledge listed by Krishna in verses from 13.8 to 13.12: amanitvam adambbhitvam ahimsa kṣantir arjanam, acaryopasanam sancam sthairyam atma vinigrahah, indriyarthesu vairagyam anabankara eva ca, janma mṛityu jara vyadhi duḥkha doṣanūdarsanam, asaṅgīr anabhisvangaḥ putra dara gribadisu, nityam ca sama cittatvam istanistopapattisu, mayi cananya yogena bhaktir avyabharini, vivikta desa sevītvam aratir jana samsādi, adhyatma jnana nityatvam tattva jñanārtha darsanam, etaj jñanam iti proktam ajñanam yad ato 'nyatha, "Freedom from the desire for honors, freedom from hypocrisy, freedom from hatred, as well as tolerance, simplicity, the act of approaching the acharya, cleanliness, determination, self control, renunciation towards the objects of the senses, freedom from the sense of doership, as well as the clear perception of the inherent sufferings and problems of birth, death, old age and disease, freedom from attachment, detachment from all association, including the sense of belonging towards children, wife, home etc, as well as equal attitude when receiving the pleasant and the unpleasant, totally and constantly focusing on me through bhakti yoga, performing service in a solitary place, without attachment for meeting others, the constant awareness of the original soul, the realization of the value of knowledge: all this is called jnana, and anything else is ajnana."

In fact Vedic knowledge is non-different from God and the divine position of God. A very famous verse of Rig Veda (1.22.20) clearly teaches: om tad vishnubh paramam padam sada pasyanti surayah diviva caksur atatam, tad vipraso vipanyaya jagrivam sab samindhate visnor yat paramam padam, "That position of Vishnu is always contemplated by the divine personalities (suras) who have divine eyes/ see it in the divine radiance of the Sun (eye of the Virata Rupa). The qualified brahmanas who are awakened can reveal this supreme position of Vishnu."

The suras mentioned in this verse are the opposite of the a-suras described in this chapter as demoniac personalities. Within the category of suras, Vedic scriptures list all the Devas who rule the administration of the universe, as well as the qualified brahmanas (bhu-devas) who are those who know Brahman and behave as Brahman. Of course within this category of suras we will not find false religionists who are characterized by dambha, because they are asuras by definition. We have already seen in chapter 10 that Krishna recommends the contemplation of the radiant Virata Rupa, by which we will remain always in the supreme Consciousness. Chapter 15 has further expanded this vision of the Virata Rupa as Purushottama, Daru Brahman, the immense banyan tree of the universe. This is confirmed in Svetasvatara Upanishad (3.8-9): vedabham etam purusam mabantam, aditya varnam tamasah parastat, tam eva viditvati mritum eti, nanyah pantha vidyate ayanaya, yasmat param naparam asti kincid, yasman naniyo no iyayo asti kincit, vriksha iva stabdho divi tisthaty ekas, tenedam purnam purusena sarvam, "I know that Purushottama, whose effulgence is the color of the sun that transcends all darkness. One who knows him overcomes death. There is no other path to perfection. There is nothing greater than him, because he is the greatest and the smallest. Like a tree covering the sky, he is alone established in the entire universe, and from him everything becomes manifest."

This supreme Knowledge or Consciousness (tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, Bhagavata Purana 1.2.11) is the only path to liberation or freedom:

na hi jnanena sadrisam pavitram iba vidyate, tat svayam yoga samsiddhabh kalenatmani vindati, "In this world there is nothing as sacred as knowledge. One who achieves perfect union in this knowledge comes to find full happiness in the Self in the course of time" (4.38), jnanena tu tad ajnanam yesam nasitam atmanah, tesam aditya vaj jnanam prakasayati tat param, "Those for whom ajnana is destroyed in the Self as jnana, that Knowledge, as the Sun, reveals that highest reality" (5.16), tad buddhaya tad atmanas tan-nisthas tat parayanah, gacchanty apunar avritim jnana nirdhuta kalmashah, "Those who realize That, identify with That, remain faithful to That, and fully dedicate themselves to That, attain that liberation from which one never falls back, because their impurities have been cleansed by Knowledge" (5.17).

If we want to become liberated, we must surrender to this supreme Consciousness: tam ha devam atma buddhi prakasam, mumuksur vai saranam abam prapadye, "desiring moksha, I surrender, illuminating the intelligence" (Svetasvatara Upanishad 6.18).

द्वौ भूतसर्गौ लोकेऽस्मिन्दैव आसुर एव च । दैवो विस्तरशः प्रोक्त आसुरं पार्थ मे शृणु ॥ १६-६ ॥

dvau bhūtasargau loka'smindaiva āsura eva ca | daivo vistaraśaḥ prokta āsuram pārtha me śṛṇu || 16-6 ||

dvau: two; bhuta: beings; sargau: (two) creations; loke: in the world; asmin: this; daivah: divine; asura: demoniac; eva: certainly; ca: also; daivah: divine; vistarashah: elaborately; prokta: described; asuram: the demoniac; partha: o son of Pritha; me: me; śṛṇu: listen to.

"In this world there are two (types of) created beings - the divine and the demoniac. I have explained about the divine creation. O son of Pritha, listen to me: I will now describe elaborately the characteristics of the asuras.

The daiva and the asura are two two states of incarnated consciousness. When consciousness (atman) becomes incarnated, the condition of a living being is created, therefore the jiva atman is superimposed with the definition of creature (bhuta). At a certain point in the evolution of the jivatman, it takes birth as a human being, and from this position it can develop towards the daivic nature or the asuric nature, and continue in that direction. This is called asritya o prapadye "taking shelter", and it is a matter of individual choice. The word asraya derives from asri (with a long a), meaning "to join, to adhere".

Krishna clearly says that the people who take shelter in the asuric nature never approach him: na mam duskritino mudhabh prapadyante naradhamah, mayayapabhrita jnana asuram bhavam asritah, "The evil doers, the foolish, the most degraded, those whose knowledge has been covered by delusion - those who have chosen an asuric existence do not approach me" (7.15). All these characteristics are typical of the asuras. This is confirmed in verse 9.12: moghasa mogha karmano mogha jnana vicetasah, raksasim asurim caiva prakritim mohinim asritah, "Entertaining delusional desires, engaging in delusional activities, and delusionally convinced of their knowledge, confused by incorrect awareness, they certainly take shelter in the bewildering nature of rakshasas and asuras".

On the other hand, those who take shelter in the divine nature are the suras: mahatmanas tu mam partha daivim prakritim asritah, bhajanty ananya manaso jnatva bhutadim avyayam, "However, o son of Pritha, the great souls take shelter in the divine nature and serve me with undivided attention, knowing that I am the inexhaustible origin of all beings" (9.13). These divine personalities are already advanced in the journey to liberation: jara marana moksaya mam asritya yatanti te, te brahma tad viduh kritsnam adhyatmam karma cakshilam, "They take shelter in me, endeavoring to attain liberation from the cycle of birth and death, and come to know that Brahman is everything transcendental. They know transcendence and the duties to be performed" (7.29).

This liberation is tad vishnob paramam padam, "the position of Vishnu", as confirmed in verse 14.2: idam jnanam upasritya mama sadbharmyam agatah, sarge 'pi nopajayante pralaye na vyathanti ca, "Those who take shelter in this knowledge attain my same position (of dharma), and they are not going to take birth in a next creation. They will also remain firmly established even at the time of the dissolution."

However, we should not hastily conclude that all those who are called atheists are asuras, especially when the concept of God that is presented to people is asuric in itself, as we see in abrahamic ideologies. See for example the ritual requested to evoke Yahweh described in the Bible (Genesis, 15.9-12): a number of animals were slaughtered and their dead bodies put on an altar - a heifer, a she goat, a ram, a turtle, a dove and a pigeon. The text says, "When the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abraham, and lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him". And again we see in Genesis, 22.1-2, that Abraham is accepted as a true servant of Yahweh when he accepts to slaughter an innocent child, his own and only son, merely to please his master by showing absolute obedience. The definition of asura is explained as asusu rata asurah, "asuras are those who are (only) attached to their immediate selfish gratification" (gross and subtle). This is also called indriya trishna, "thirst for sense gratification", which connects kama and krোধa, the lust for possession, control and domination and the anger that comes when such lust is challenged and frustrated. The height of dambha or religious hypocrisy is to call such characteristic as divine, and brand as "demoniac" anyone who does not agree to that.

The genuine concept of God as Vishnu presented in Bhagavad gita (13.17) has nothing to do with the character described in the Bible and worshiped by Hebrews, Christians and Muslims. Some people believe that persons with divine characteristics live on different planets from people with asuric qualities, or in different races or families, but this is not necessarily so, as demonstrated by many stories narrated by the shastra. Even within families and races that traditionally choose asuric values, we find brilliant divine personalities such as Prahlada, Vibhishana, and Bali. However, divine qualities cannot coexist in the same person with asuric qualities: one cannot be on the side of dharma and adharma at the same time. One could move from the shelter of one nature to the other, by making different choices, but the two natures cannot coexist simultaneously without neutralizing each other. It's like trying to go upwards and downwards at the same time: the result is that one does not go anywhere at all.

Granted, asuras can have good material qualities. They may be clever and have considerable knowledge about science and even about the scriptures (as shown in many Puranic stories), but they are not behaving in according to atma vidya, transcendental knowledge, and we know that mere erudition is not sufficient (7.15). In fact, false religiousness (dambha) and erudition that does not respect dharma are much more dangerous than plain honest materialism, as confirmed for example in Isa Upanishad (9): andham tamah pravrisanti, ye 'vidyam upasate, tato bhuya iva te tamo, ya tu vidyam ratah, "Those who engage in ignorant activities shall enter into the dark region of tamas. Worse still are those engaged in the culture of false knowledge."

Dambha (false religiosity based on hypocrisy) is influenced by rajas and tamas, as we will see more specifically later. As we have seen in the previous verse, the asuric quality of dambha tends to build up arrogance (darpa and abhimana) due to one's external social position or accomplishments. Therefore we will find that asuras often boast, "I am a great sannyasi", "I am a great brahmana", "I am an asvamedhi", "I am a great scholar", "I am a great preacher", "I am a great yogi", "I am a great guru", "I am a senior devotee", "I am a senior/ direct disciple of that great acharya", "I am a great pujari", and love to be presented as such by others. However, invariably such claims are nothing but a shallow external identification, a theatrical show.

One cannot really worship or serve God and at the same time callously create sufferings to innocent beings in the pursuit of one's selfish material advantage, either individual or collective, because that is the hallmark of the asuric mentality. As Krishna himself states in Bhagavad gita, he is the best friend of all living entities (subridam sarva bhutanam, 5.29, isvarah sarva bhutanam bhrd dese tisthati 18.61) and remains present in the hearts of all beings (sarvasya caham bhrdi sannivisto, 15.15, sarva bhuta sthitam, 6.31).

प्रवृत्तिं च निवृत्तिं च जना न विदुरासुराः । न शौचं नापि चाचारो न सत्यं तेषु विद्यते ॥ १६-७ ॥

pravṛttim ca nivṛttim ca janā na vidurāsuraḥ | na śaucam nāpi cācāro na satyam teṣu vidyate || 16-7 ||

pravrittim: engagement; ca: and; nivrittim: renunciation; ca: and; janah: the people; na: do not; viduh: they know; asurah: who are asuras; na: not; saucam: purity; na: not; api: even; ca: and; acarab: behavior; na: not; satyam: truthfulness; tesu: in them; vidyate: is known (to be).

"Asuras do not have (correct) knowledge about engagement in duties and renunciation. They have no purity, or (proper) behavior, or truthfulness.

This is also confirmed at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.30): pravrittim ca nivrittim ca karyakarye bhayabhye, bandham moksam ca ya vetti buddhib sa partha sattviki, "O Arjuna, only a sattvic person really understands about engagement in duties and renunciation (what should be accepted and what should be abandoned), what should be done and what should not be done, what should be feared and what should not be feared, what is binding and what is liberating". Everything depends on overcoming ignorance (tamas). Whenever tamas is present, there cannot be any real advancement, only the delusion of superiority (brta jnana, darpa, ati manita) and false religiosity (dambha). Such delusion is a not a "small imperfection", but rather a very serious danger both for the individual and for the entire society, because it teaches adharma as if it were dharma, and condemns dharma by presenting it as adharma (18.32). Deluded people, who have not understood the teachings of Bhagavad gita, believe that false religionists controlled by tamas are established on the good path anyway, because they somehow speak of God and perform religious activities, but false religionists are walking on a very different road that leads to the opposite direction, and they are not evolving towards higher levels but sliding into complete degradation (14.13, 14.15, 14.18, 16.20).

Sometimes false religionists even quote Bhagavad gita to manipulate people into supporting them. One of their favorite verses is used to justify their adharmic conclusions and behaviors: api cet suduracaro bhajate mam ananya bhak, sadhu eva sa mantaryah samyag vyavasito hi sah (9.30). The meaning that they give to this verse is very misleading, and borrowed from abrahamic ideologies. It implies that if one is "praying to God" or "chanting the name of God" and is officially recognized as a member "in good standing" of their church, he must be considered "a saint" even if he is found to be committing the most abominable actions. They say, "it's just a small mistake, a small imperfection". So they demand that such person should be worshiped, followed, served and obeyed as a saint, who is non-different from God and superior to all the Devas. What is more, they believe that such "saint" has the right to make disciples all over the world and expect everyone to surrender to him and worship him like God himself because he is God's representative or priest (or bishop, cardinal, etc). In this regard, they sometimes quote Bhagavata Purana (11.17.27): acaryam mam vijaniyam navamanyeta karhicit, na martya buddhyasinyeta sarva deva mayo gurub, "The acharya should never be disrespected, rather he should be considered non-different from me (God). He should never be considered a mortal being, because the guru represents the sum total of the divine Consciousness". Of course when the position of "guru" or "acharya" is assigned solely on the basis of political vote, affiliation to an organization or similar materialistic considerations - and especially when such position does not involve any responsibility towards the disciples - the name is wrongfully applied, because that is not the standard prescribed by the shastra for the definition of acharya.

As we have explained in the commentary to verse 9.30, the duracara or "bad behavior" that we could overlook can only refer to a mere breach in social conventions or to the difficult choice of a lesser damage, not to systematic and consistent wicked and cruel asuric behaviors and conclusions, that are immensely more serious. Also, verse 9.30 uses the noun acarab ("the doer"), and not the verb acarati ("who does"), therefore it is not stating that the person described in the verse is still committing objectionable acts.

Actually, Krishna has already stated very clearly that one can approach him only after giving up all forms of wickedness: yesam tu anta gatam papam jananam punya karmanam, te dvandva moha nirmukta bhajante mam dridha vratab, "Those who have put an end to all wicked actions, have accumulated good merits, are completely liberated from the delusion of duality and are firm in their determination, actually worship me" (7.28). For this reason, we have given a more appropriate translation of verse 9.30 as follows: "When a person is fully immersed and engaged in true devotional service, without any other concern or desire, must be considered a sadhu, even if he used to have a very bad behavior."

The word sadhu is also a tricky one, and it should not be used superficially. It certainly does not mean "acharya", "guru", or even "saint". It simply means "good person", and is generally used to refer to seekers of spirituality, as a synonym for sannyasi. There are lots of sadhus in India who are certainly not saints, and in fact many of them are using the garb of sadhu or sannyasi (renounced spiritualist) merely to get some personal material advantages.

In this age of degradation, the position of sadhu will be merely based on the arrogance of false religiosity (sadhutve dambha eva tu, Bhagavata Purana 12.2.5) and the impressiveness of material opulence (anadyataivasadhutve, Bhagavata Purana 12.2.5). The incredibly stupid people of Kali yuga (manda sumanda matayo manda bhagya, Bhagavata Purana 1.1.10) will blindly worship any fraudster who can boast of a big organization, ashrama or church - no questions asked, even in front of blatant asuric behavior. Of course, such material success in terms of wealth, followers and political power is gained because these "religious authorities" are very cleverly catering to the expectations and illusions of ignorant people. They do not want students but customers, and they milk them for every penny without taking any responsibility for their spiritual evolution or even their training in knowledge and ethics. In fact they are very careful never to mention the real basic requirements for spiritual progress (yama and niyama) because all their followers would quickly stop giving money and disappear.

With such disgraceful example from those who are supposed to be the best religionists in society (3.21), the same asuric values become the standard for everyone. Material wealth becomes the only criteria to evaluate a person's nature, behavior, religious position, eloquence and social position (vittam eva kalau nrinam, janmacara gunodayah, dharma nyaya vyavasthayam, karanam balam eva hi, Bhagavata Purana 12.2.4). One will be considered a brahmana simply because he wears a thread (vipratve sutram eva hi, Bhagavata Purana 12.2.3). A person's religious merits and position will be evaluated superficially, merely by the clothes he wears and by his material success, and one will be called a pandita just because he is clever and quick in word jugglery and slogans (lingam evasrama khyatar, anyonyapatti karanam, avrittya nyaya daurbalyam, panditye capalam vacah, Bhagavata Purana 12.2.4). People will give greater value to pilgrimages to distant and touristic places (dure vary ayanam tirtham, Bhagavata Purana 12.2.6), and good activities will be performed only for the purpose of getting a reputation (yaso arthe dharma sevnam, Bhagavata Purana 12.2.6).

The conclusion of the verse (na satyam tesu vidyate) highlights the most important point of all, as without satyam there can be no true form of religion or progress. Asuras consider lying and deceit as perfectly legitimate instruments to obtain selfish material advantages, at individual or collective level. Sometimes they try to justify such tricks by bringing legitimate examples, such as the small half-truths that bring no harm to anyone but might make people happy or even save innocent lives. But then they quietly extend the scope and motives to over-rule compassion and justice, and to take advantage of the good faith and vulnerability of others with false promises or hiding dangerous facts or plans.

When we see contradictions or inconsistencies in the teachings or behaviors of some religious people, we cannot automatically assume that the wrongful actions are due to "human error", especially if the cases are numerous and include a good number of leaders of that religion. If a religion officially says, "do not kill", and then we see that in its history the vast majority of its leaders have systematically killed several millions of people, and still kill people in the regions under its control, we should understand that we are dealing with asuras. If it speaks of love and charity and yet it approves or condones slavery, rape, corporal punishment and persecution of dissenters, we should understand we are dealing with asuras.

असत्यमप्रतिष्ठं ते जगदाहुरनीश्वरम् । अपरस्परसम्भूतं किमन्यत्कामहैतुकम् ॥ १६-८ ॥

asatyamapratistham te jagadāhuranīśvaram । aparasparasambhūtam kimanyatkāmahaitukam ।। 16-8 ।।

asatyam: false; apratistham: without foundation; te: they; jagat: the world; abuh: they say; anisvaram: without God; aparaspara: without cause-effect system; sambhutam: come to being; kim anyat: what else; kama: lust/ desire; haitukam: reason.

"They say that the universe is false and temporary, and there is no God and no creation based on cause and effect. For them, the only reason for the existence of the world is mere sense gratification.

We must be very careful in studying this verse, and clear our minds from all possible contaminations from other and non-compatible ideologies, because there is a serious danger of misunderstanding it.

The universe (Virata Rupa) is the direct manifestation of Brahman/ Paramatma/ Bhagavan in this world, and all Vedic scriptures recommend that we meditate on this glorious universal form of Purushottama. However, we have also seen that all material manifestations are temporary and illusory and as such they have no real existence as we see them (2.16, 8.15). For this reason it is said, brahma satya, jagan mithya. Brahman is the only permanent Reality, while the material universe is deceiving because it appears permanent but it is in constant change.

However, only the asuras will say that the world is asatya, "false", that is fundamentally "bad" in itself, as diametrically opposed to a "paradise" or "spiritual world" that is perfectly good and pure and from which we have somehow "fallen" (as exemplified by the story of Adam and Eve). Only the asuras will believe that this world is controlled by an evil power - "the witch Maya" or "the Prince of Darkness" - that is considered "the opposite" of God, always trying (and largely succeeding) to enforce its will upon human beings against the will of God. Based on this misconception, asuras launch "holy wars" against "other Gods" with the intention to "destroy" them, by killing their worshipers, annihilating their temples, and obliterating their sacred scriptures and knowledge, and even their memory.

By the way - this practically equates with saying that this world is anisvarab ("without God"), because if God is the Absolute, omnipotent and omniscient, nothing can happen outside his plan, and his existence must necessarily include the existence of all forms. If the existence of "other Gods" (elohim, in plural form as in the beginning of the Bible) is admitted, then the idea of abrahamic monotheism is not about the universality and the absolute power of one of such Gods (an oxymoron in itself), but rather about the tyrannical imposition of merely one form (or non-form) and the destruction of all other forms. And if this "one God" is omnipotent, why does he need human beings to do his dirty work and destroy "the other Gods" (even considering such a thing as possible)? If this "one God" wants to send to hell all those who do not believe in him, why do his followers have to persecute, attack and kill such non-believers already in this life? It does not make any sense. We will not find any such nonsense in Vedic scriptures. The asuras who present themselves as "the only true religionists" propagate these nonsensical ideas to justify their own horrible, cruel and destructive activities meant to exploit the world and the creatures who live in it, and they blame "nature" and "the world" for the damage they are making. When the asuras claim that the world is asatya, apratistha, anisvara, they mean to say that there is no dharmā (ethical principles, or conscience) or that dharmā is irrelevant, and that life in this world has no purpose or meaning. This is a convenient excuse for them to commit any abominable activity for their own selfish material advantage - individual or collective. They even have the impudence to claim that the criminal acts they commit are the only religious work, service to the Supreme Lord.

While sincere and wise scientists recognize the principle of cause and effect, asuras claim that the world is aparaspara sambhutam - it has no cause, and therefore there is no connection between cause and effect. They claim that everything happens simply by chance, and is automatically produced for no higher purpose, therefore they can destroy whatever they like for their own purposes - that in their eyes have become the supreme purpose by default. Because they believe that things and people come to existence merely for lust, gratification and enjoyment (kama betu), they might as well as use everything for their own advantage and enjoyment. According to this perspective, a living being is just a product - a commercial resource - and can be genetically constructed, modified, cloned, sold, owned, exchanged, rented, destroyed, and so on. And asuras believe they are entitled to do so out of mere curiosity or experiment, to further their career, increase their wealth and possessions and social position, etc. Of course this madness is first applied to animals, but then it can easily be used for human beings, especially the "lower ones" such as people of other races, prisoners, women, children, or persons who are weaker for some other reason - old age, disease, poverty etc. Because for asuras any opinion is as good as any other, they pick whatever best suits their immediate material selfish interest. Even when asuras do believe in God (as we will see in chapter 18), they are actually contemplating their own projection and calling it "God". As they create such "God" in their own image, they claim that God created the world and human beings out of selfishness, and that he enjoys cruelty and exploitation. In this way they hope to legitimize their own crimes.

एतां दृष्टिमवष्टभ्य नष्टात्मानोऽल्पबुद्धयः ।

प्रभवन्त्युग्रकर्माणः क्षयाय जगतोऽहिताः ॥ १६-९ ॥

etām dṛṣṭimavaṣṭabhya naṣṭātmāno'lpabuddhayaḥ | prabhavantyugrakarmāṇaḥ kṣayaā jagato'hitāḥ || 16-9 ||

etam: this; dristim: vision; avastabhya: accepting/ adopting; nasta: having lost; atmanah: the self; alpa buddhayah: very little intelligence; prabhavanti: develop/ build; ugra: horrible; karmanah: activities/ jobs/ enterprises; kṣayaā: for the destruction/ that will bring damage; jagataḥ: of the world; ahitah: without benefit.

"Because they are not intelligent, they accept these beliefs, losing the consciousness of the true self. (On that basis) they develop horrible activities, that unnecessarily cause damage to the world.

The word dristi ("vision") comes from the same root as darshana, but dristi refers here to a delusional vision or hallucination, while darshana indicates a particular but valid perspective of reality. Since asuras have concluded that the world is false and without a purpose, they believe that any opinion is as good as any other, and they endorse the legitimacy of an ideology merely based on its material success and popularity - on how many people accept and follow it, and how much material benefit it seems to offer to those who accept it. This is why false religionists easily get so many followers. The two main reasons for the disaster are the lack of intelligence (alpa buddhaya) and the loss of the consciousness of the real self (atman). Both intelligence and consciousness of the self are presented all over Bhagavad gita as extremely important.

The expression nasta atmanam ("having lost the Self") has various levels of meanings. One is directly connected to the lack of intelligence, because it is intelligence (buddhi) that keeps us conscious of who and what we are, of what is our duty and what is unworthy of our purpose in life (pravrittim ca nivrittim ca, 16.7, 18.30). Once this intelligence is lost, we forget ourselves and we fall into delusion, as confirmed in verse 2.63: krodhad bhavati sammohah sammohat smriti vibhramah, smriti bhrasat buddhi naso buddhi nasat pranasyati, "Anger becomes confusion, and confusion becomes failing memory. Because of the loss of memory, intelligence is lost, and when intelligence is lost, one falls from his position". On the level of delusion or tamas, the conditioned soul becomes victim of asuric tendencies and falls lower and lower into degradation and confusion and suffering.

Scarce intelligence is also the reason why asuras cannot really understand knowledge properly; due to delusion, knowledge becomes confused, half baked or half digested, and fails to deliver the desired results in the end. Asuras are as irresponsible as children playing with matches without having the first idea of how to put out a fire, and they keep scheming and laboring to make bigger and bigger fires they call "advancement" or "progress" or "development". Instead of creating, they can simply destroy (kṣaya) without any need or real benefit (ahitah), and all their activities are ugly and disastrous (ugra karma). They do not even leave the most sacred and pure things alone. They deliberately pollute sacred rivers and ponds with sewage and industrial waste of all kinds, they destroy sacred mountains and hills, and bulldoze off ancient temples and holy places. They knowingly contaminate the milk of cows with blood and pus and toxic chemicals under the pretext of "better production", and even add gelatin and lard to yogurt and butter to make them "more attractive". They make sugar whiter by bleaching it with baked bones from slaughterhouses, and obtain golden and silver foil by hammering sheets of these metals between thin layers of the entrails of slaughtered animals. These ugra karma enterprises can flourish only because the general mass of people are also fully immersed in tamas, and say, "ignorance is bliss".

Those who use the world as a garbage dump or a quarry without caring for the benefit of all creatures cause untold damages with the destruction of the environment. These imbalances cause irregular changes in climate on the whole planet and terrible consequences including cyclones, floods and drought, the melting of glaciers and ice caps at the poles and the consequent rising of the levels of the oceans. The worst situation for the planet and for human society is when such asuras artificially take up the positions of brahmanas and kṣatriyas and control society for their own materialistic and demoniac purposes.

Destruction in itself is not a bad thing. It is required from time to time to clean up the place and eliminate old things that have lost their utility for the progress of all beings, or constitute an active threat. However, there must always be some benefit (śivam, "auspiciousness") connected with such destruction, otherwise it is condemned by Vedic knowledge as ahitah, "unnecessary". This concept also applies to the antics of the asuras in this world, that are allowed in a certain measure and for a certain period of time so that the conditioned souls (jivatmanas) can develop through experience and choice.

This idea could seem similar to the abrahamic concept, but it is not. While abrahamics believe that the Devil is the incarnation of disobedience to God ("the Rebel Angel"), Vedic knowledge explains that the asuric tendency or nature is merely a lack of enlightenment (buddhi and atma vidya), just like darkness has no existence of its own and is merely absence of light. Therefore, while abrahamics stupidly invest their energies to fight darkness with sticks and stones and bombs and moralistic legislation, Vedic civilization simply solves the problem by turning on the light of intelligence and knowledge of the atman/ brahman. Of the two attempts, the violent exercise of persecution of ideological dissent can only bring more harm to individual and society, causing even more darkness in the form of fear, hatred, hypocrisy, illusion etc, but the Knowledge approach enables us to engage each and every individual or group in a progressive and useful way for society (3.26).

Regarding the concept of ugra karma ("horrible activities", "horrible enterprises"), anyone who has information about what is happening in the world today will understand the meaning. We know about bad doctors and iatrogenic damage, bad lawyers and corrupt magistrates, bad politicians and bad governments, and bad teachers at all levels. We know about bad financial systems and industry creating mindless consumerism, pollution and destruction of resources, artificial organisms and toxic medicines, dangerous genetic engineering and extreme technology for war (chemical, biological, nuclear etc). We also know about artificial junk food and its effects, and also about cruelty to animals and abuse on children and women and relatively weaker human beings. Not many know about the horrors of sex slavery or the kidnapping of little girls and pumping them with hormones so they look sexier to the brothel customers. Or about human organs trafficking. Or about the deliberate "thinning of the human herd" called de-population, obtained through carefully planned wars and other devices and campaigns. Many skeptics label this type of information as "conspiracy theories" and refuse to consider it seriously, but such an attitude could be dangerous. Some of the perpetrators of such horrible crimes may claim that the destruction they create is not "without benefits", because it generates financial gains, job opportunities, and commercially valuable products and services, but people are not aware of the very heavy karmic price they will have to pay for such activities. Their foolishness can be compared to the classical example of the lumberjack who was sawing at the branch where he was sitting high on the tree.

What should we do then? Of course we must not blindly believe anything that is told us, but we can and should certainly try to investigate and verify rumors about serious dangers. Merely dismissing unpleasant rumors without trying to investigate about them is a clear symptom of ignorance: aprakaso 'pravrittis ca pramado moha eva ca, tamasy etani jayante vivridhe kuru-nandana, "O Arjuna, with the increase of tamas we find foolishness, laziness, madness and confusion, that tend to get worse and worse" (14.13).

काममाश्रित्य दुष्पूरं दम्भमानमदान्विताः । मोहाद्गृहीत्वासद्राहान्प्रवर्तन्तेऽशुचिव्रताः ॥ १६-१० ॥

kāmamāśritya duṣpūraṁ dambhamānamadānvitāḥ | mohādgṛhītvāsadrāhānpravartante'śucivratāḥ || 16-10 ||

kāma: lust; asritya: taking shelter of; duṣpura: insatiable; dambha: religious hypocrisy; mana: false prestige; mada: illusion; anvita: absorbed in; moha: because of confusion; gṛhītvā: accepting; asat: non permanent; grahan: acquisitions; pravartante: they engage; asuci vratā: in impure vows.

"Taking shelter in insatiable lust, religious hypocrisy and false prestige, immersed in confused and delusional beliefs, they dedicate themselves to adharmic achievements, and engage in impure religious vows.

Sexual lust as a value in itself (or even the supreme value) is the biggest trap of all. It ensnares our rajasic tendencies and turns them into tamas, because it corrupts the genuine and healthy desire for pleasure and happiness into a dark, diseased, selfish and insensitive engagement in exploitation, possession and control of material objects and bodies that is the exact opposite of love. In extreme cases, this obsession for domination can also extend to a subtler mental level, where the asura especially enjoys the pain, anguish, fear, horror and despair he has created in other beings.

Sometimes this sadistic thrill even substitutes the normal sexual copulation act, as for example in sexual aggressions where the victim is violated with objects, or is treated like a hunter's trophy, disfigured or paraded around as a collectible item, a piece of property or the booty of victory. At this point of degradation, the criminal becomes firmly bound by the chains of tamas and is unable to find the way out from his madness - in fact, he comes to see it as the only possible reality, applicable to everyone.

There is no end to this distorted lust, because it is not connected to genuine healthy physical needs that can be easily satiated. It is a form of greed that feeds on itself, like a fire (duṣpurena analena ca, 3.39), instead of being appeased by the healthy and normal fulfillment of desire (as in eating a wholesome meal) because it is mixed with anger and cruelty and drags the mind from rajas to the darkest regions of tamas. Healthy normal sexual desire contains no anger or cruelty, but it grows from love and admiration and respect, and desire to please rather than being pleased, and is never directed to "objects" (or persons treated as objects) but to the soul and beauty as a divine manifestation worthy of worship. It's not about "scoring", "screwing" or "getting laid", and certainly it is not "nasty". Krishna has already said that while kama supported by dharmā is divine (7.11), the diseased and angry lust is the root cause of all crimes: kama esa krodha esa rajo guna samudbhavaḥ, mahasano maha papma viddhy enam iha vairinam, "This is a mixture of desire and anger, originated from rajas. It is all-devouring, the cause of great crimes, and the real enemy in this world" (3.37). This "great sin" is the realm of diseased pornography, sado-masochism, "bondage" and humiliation/ punishment sex, performance syndrome and loser syndrome, artificial (usually chemical or medicinal) induction of sexual excitement, and artificial status symbols based on unnatural bodily appearance and sexual "prowess".

In the minds of these pathological psychiatric cases (mana mada anvita), sexual insatiability is considered a virtue and a matter of pride especially at an advanced age. In extreme cases, they even come to consider rape and torture as a "religious merit" or an "instrument for social order", or claim that it should be a "legal right" (for example to have sex with small children). It is not uncommon to find fake religionists in this category of lust-obsessed perverts, although in the case of so-called religious leaders such activities are generally performed behind closed doors and denied, minimized or dismissed in front of the public. Of course, in some cases it is also possible that unfounded accusations and rumors are circulated by enemies because of envy and spite. So how can we evaluate each particular situation? It is not difficult. We can ascertain the actual facts simply by examining the level of spiritual realization and the gunas of the particular individual as per the teachings of Krishna in Bhagavad gita.

A person who is firmly situated in sattva or visuddha sattva, and has realized atma vidya, is transcendental to material bodily identifications and attachments, and demonstrates his knowledge and divine characteristics (daiva sampada) in all other aspects of his life. If, on the other hand, we can directly observe asuric characteristics in some other sector of his life, we can legitimately believe that there could be some truth in rumors and accusations about his lustful behavior.

Of course, a sattvic or transcendental person's approach to sex is based on the fundamental principles of dharmā - i.e. truthfulness/ honesty, compassion/ nonviolence, cleanliness/ simplicity, self restraint and ethical values. He may have a healthy consensual conjugal relationship based on love and affection, because spiritual or religious life does not require celibacy, but he will never take advantage of his position to solicit any type of physical or mental pleasure from his disciples or followers or anyone who is entrusted to him. Such behavior is only found in asuras.

Within the arya (civilized) Vedic society, sudras have no particular religious duty, therefore they can legitimately have whatever sexual relationship they like, as long as it is not against the fundamental principles of dharmā, and their employers will take care of the sudra's offspring together with the sudra servant himself/ herself as members of the family. A vaishya can have as many wives he wants and is able to maintain satisfactorily, and treats wives and children well, engaging them according to their specific abilities and inclinations. A kshatriya is bound by religious duty to satisfy any woman who requests sex from him, unless he has previously taken religious vows (*vrata*s) that prevent him to do so - the eka-patni vrata (monogamous marriage) or in rare cases, total sexual abstinence that can be temporary or permanent (as in the case of Bhishma).

However, the kshatriya cannot reject a woman because he does not find her attractive enough; temporary abstinence only applies to specific periods or circumstances, and never depends on the man's preference of one woman rather than another. On the other hand, a kshatriya can also legitimately have sexual relationships with any number of women of his choice, provided the principles of dharmā are not violated; no official ceremony or cohabitation is required, and all children are considered legitimate offspring. However, for the protection of the kingdom, a kshatriya king will try to find a suitable wife of appropriate character and disposition, a noble queen who will likely produce a worthy heir to the throne. For this reason, the most qualified kshatriya princesses used to choose their husbands in the svayamvara tournament, preferring warrior-like prowess over sentimental attraction.

A brahmana will only have sexual contact with his dharmā patni, in the proper frame of religious consciousness, in order to generate children who are endowed with divine qualities. Such a wife was usually found with the help of qualified and wise astrologers who examined the birth horoscopes and verified the compatibility of the union. The father of the bride then entrusted the girl to the care of the husband, and the newly weds started their religious and spiritual life together in full cooperation, as two halves of the same body. The expression grihitva graban indicates lobha (greed) for non permanent/ material things (asat). The desire to acquire permanent/ spiritual things (sat) is good, because through an ardent desire for God we attain liberation and perfection. The word grihitva literally means "accepting, adopting, taking", while graban means "objectives, achievements".

A griha ("home") is not a building but a family circle that grows from the mutual acceptance of husband and wife, children, relatives, friends, professional occupation, etc. Sattvic people have a sat griha that facilitates spiritual progress, ethical values, cooperation, love, trust and happiness, while asuric people have asat grihas, where lust, greed, sufferings, frustration, deceit, despair, hatred and envy proliferate, causing disasters at individual and collective level. It all depends on our choices.

We should not delude ourselves into thinking that someone cannot be an asura simply because s/he is externally engaged in religious vows or practices. Here Krishna clearly states that asuras are characterized by religious hypocrisy and normally engage in religious vows based on false prestige (mana) and greed (kama) for material results. In some cases, asuras even resort to the external chanting of spiritual maha mantras composed by the Names of God, but their intentions are dirty and they remain unable to open their hearts to spiritual blessings and become purified - so they continue in their abominable activities even after decades of "spiritual sadbhāna".

These impure vows in which asuras engage (pravartante asuci vratah) are mostly those meant to obtain the power to harm innocent and harmless people and exploit them for one's selfish material lust and greed. This also includes "child marriages" and all non-consensual unions, irrespective of the official ceremonies involved. Another type of impure vow is based on deceit, false prestige and religious ostentation, such as the impressive austerities or grand donations to some particular religious institution or church/ temple on the basis of personal advantage, such as name and fame or profit. In these religious activities there is no space for actual shastric knowledge or atma vidya (16.23, 17.4-6, 18.31-32) and society at large is not benefited. In fact, the wealth donated (especially gold or money) will in some case be used for unethical purposes or inspire criminal activities such as embezzlement, theft, etc.

A classical example of impure religious activity is blood sacrifice of all kinds, especially in the killing of harmless animals. Vedic civilization never required such rituals, but allows them in special cases and it regulates them so that degraded people in rajas and tamas who crave for meat can satisfy their desire in a controlled way.

Contrarily to what many people believe, the ancient Vedic rituals called gomedha and asvamedha yajna were not ordinary animal sacrifices, but involved a very complex and deep symbolism that can be easily detected in the original descriptions, where the "animal" of the sacrifice is clearly described as the Virata Rupa itself.

In their biased speculations, colonial writers have mistranslated and in some cases even manipulated the original texts to present Vedic religion as a barbarous, immoral and violent superstition whose substitution with Christianity would save the Indian people, but we know that they had no respect for the basic principles of dharmā, and their teachings must be discarded without hesitation.

चिन्तामपरिमेयां च प्रलयान्तामुपाश्रिताः । कामोपभोगपरमा एतावदिति निश्चिताः ॥ १६-११ ॥

cintāmaparimeyāṃ ca pralayāntāmuṣāritāḥ | kāmopabhogaparamā ētāvaditi niścītāḥ || 16-11 ||

cintam: worries; aparimeyam: endless; ca: and; pralaya antam: even to the end; upasritah: having taken shelter; kama upabhoga: enjoyment of sense pleasures; parama: the supreme (goal of life); etavat: thus; iti: like this; niscitah: without doubt.

"They certainly remain immersed in endless worries up to the very end of their lives, because they have taken shelter of mere sense gratification as the supreme purpose of life.

The word cintam literally means "fear for worries" and refers to the impermanence of the results obtained through material efforts. Aparimeyam means "endless, huge, immeasurable, infinite", and refers to a disproportionate and pathological attachment to materialism and its inherent fears.

In the case of asuras, this fear is not just the normal preoccupation about the loss of property and position that inevitably occurs in the course of time or even the danger of untimely losses, but it expands into the conscious or subconscious anticipation of the negative karmic consequences that they will have to pay for the adharmic (asat) actions that were performed to obtain such property or position. Asuras are always terrified because of their dirty conscience and have a tendency to see enemies everywhere, even when other people have no intention of attacking them. Each asura is naturally an enemy to the others, because they pretend to cooperate and ally but they are just waiting for the opportunity to stab each other's backs and grab the loot. Because they become accustomed to this mentality, they end up projecting it over everyone, including innocent and harmless people (atmavan manyate jagat, "everyone thinks that others have his same mentality"). This will be elaborated in the next verses in more details.

Over and above all, they are terrified by death, because they strongly identify with their material body, possessions and position, and they are uninterested, if not strongly opposed, to the genuine religious life that is based on the transcendental realization of the atman/ brahman. They know that the particular type of degraded sense gratification, lust and greed they have chosen to pursue is only available in a gross material body, and they are willing to go to any length to prolong their own lives in their miserable bodies. This mentality brings to organ transplants, artificial life support, and similar practices including genetic engineering - all asuric practices that do not give any actual improvement in one's life but easily distract one from the real purpose of life.

The word upabhoga means "lower pleasures", and specifically refers to the inferior quality of tamasic and rajasic pleasures compared to sattvic or transcendental pleasures (brahmananda, spanda). This will also be elaborated in chapter 17 (17.7-10) with reference to the food choices influenced by the various gunas. In the specific case of asuras, such pleasures are truly abominable and normally inspire disgust, horror and revulsion to any naturally healthy and sane person.

There are several level of asuric consciousness. Some poor conditioned souls are so far gone into the asuric consciousness that we cannot do anything to help them; in fact trying to help them will excite even more anger and violence from their part. Their only salvation lies in repeated births in lowly and difficult positions, by which they will exhaust their greed for degraded pleasures and at the same time experience a measure of suffering that will gradually teach them to avoid causing pain to others in the future. Others, who still have some measure of human consciousness, can be helped in this very lifetime by our good example and inspiration, and by the establishment of a positive social environment where sense gratification is available on a more sattvic level. After all, as Krishna has already declared (param drstva nivartate, 2.59), one can give up a bad habit only when he finds something better to focus on. Prohibition, repression or artificial abstention will be of no use (3.33) and corporal punishment based on inflicting pain and/ or humiliation on the transgressor will only aggravate the situation because it increases tamas, even to the risk of degrading the "punishers" as well, and bonding them into a pathological relationship to their victims, with disastrous karmic consequences.

At a more superficial level, a normal human being can also feel the influence of asuric nature, especially when society is badly directed and everyone is subject to constant aggressions at all levels. It is a temptation and occasionally a good human being might fall into the sticky marshes of tamas, thus becoming confused by fears and worries, identifications and attachments, and inferior pleasures. But we all have a choice, at all times, whether we want to take further shelter in divine consciousness or asuric consciousness, and each and everyone of us is responsible for his/ her own choices.

With a very careful balancing act, we can remain in an intermediate position (tisthanti, 14.18) for some time and even temporarily escape to safer grounds into material sattva (2.43, 6.41, 8.16, 9.20), but if we do not progress further towards liberation from material identifications and attachments, we will again fall to the level of rajas and risk sliding further into tamas. Even on the level of material sattva and rajas there will be worries (cintam) and a relatively inferior quality of pleasure, therefore the best solution is to elevate ourselves to the level of transcendental realization, that is characterized by sat (eternity), cit (knowledge) and ananda (happiness). Nothing less will really satisfy the soul.

आशापाशशतैर्बद्धाः कामक्रोधपरायणाः । ईहन्ते कामभोगार्थमन्यायेनार्थसञ्चयान् ॥ १६-१७ ॥

āśāpaśaśatairbaddhāḥ kāmākrodhaparāyaṇāḥ । ihante kāmabhogārthamanyāyenārthasañcayān ॥ 16-17 ॥

asa: wishes; pasa: ropes; sataih: by hundreds of; baddhah: bound; kama: lust; krodha: rage; parayanah: always focused on; ihante: they desire; kama bhoga: the enjoyment of lust; artham: for the purpose; anyayena: by any means; artha: wealth; sancayan: accumulation.

"Bound by hundreds of ropes in the form of desires, always immersed in lust and anger, they strive to increase their desires and for that purpose they adopt any means to accumulate wealth.

All these desires are actually ropes that tie the conditioned soul to worries (cinta), fear (bhaya) and anger (krodha), but the deluded fool is proud of them as if they were valuable and prestigious ornaments. The word baddha literally means "bound, conditioned", and is the exact opposite of perfection in life (siddha).

A prisoner actually has no control over properties or powers or position, but because he is mentally deranged he becomes all the more attached to the things he considers his properties, powers or position, and is ready to commit any crime for their sake.

The word anyayena contains the meaning of "by any means" (including illegal means such as begging, borrowing or stealing or robbing) and "from others" (as "from anyone" without consideration of justice or compassion). Asuras believe in the principle of scarcity - that the amount of power and opulences in this world is limited and the strongest must appropriate them before someone else does, even if this means violating the rights of others. For them, "might is right" enough.

Since the asuras believe that kama and krodha are values for, and in themselves, they engage completely in pursuing them (pravartante, 16.10). Because they have dedicated their life (parayana) to this purpose, they become overly attached to their plans, one after the other, always worried about their implementation (cinta). Good people make plans too, but they are not excessively attached, because they know that honest and constructive work will produce positive results sooner or later, and if one attempt fails, we can try again and success will come eventually. On the other hand, the asuras' work is neither honest nor constructive (ugra karmani), and is more an uncertain gamble than a true enterprise, so the amount of fear created is much greater.

One may think that asuras are cleverly saving energies and resources by cutting corners, exploiting and cheating others, but it is not so. The word ibante means "they desire, strive, work hard" and in fact we observe that abominable enterprises entail a greater deal of effort and sufferings and expenditures, and greater risks of loss, than dharmic professional enterprises. A lot of this effort is spent in fighting against other asuras and cheaters of all sorts, and being beaten by each other.

The purpose of the asuras is to amass as much wealth as possible, beyond the actual needs of their operations and livelihood, and even more than they will possibly be able to spend, because they lose sight of reality and slide into delusion. What will the asura do with 50 personal cars? One or two vehicles are more than sufficient, and the rest will simply sit in the garage and gather dust. Why should someone have 500 pairs of shoes? Good food can be expensive, but it does not cost millions. Most of the objects acquired by very rich people are stowed away and quickly forgotten, never to be used.

In fact, the accumulation of wealth and hoarding of resources (artha sancayam) becomes an end in itself, a bitter surrogate to real happiness, and it often causes unnecessary loss and damage and waste of property and materials. The miser sits on a mountain of food and watches it slowly rotting away, because he cannot eat more than what will fill his stomach every day, but he will not tolerate the idea of distributing the excess food to those who are starving and were deprived by him in the first place. And still his greed is not satiated, and he feels frustrated and angry, and prefers to destroy things rather than allowing others to have them.

The example of the ropes (asa pasa) is also used to describe the gunas or main influences of material nature (sattva, rajas, tamas), that create a tangled net in which the conditioned soul is trapped. However, both the categories of desires and gunas can be used for our progress and evolution towards liberation and the attainment of perfection in the purpose of life. It is all a question of knowledge.

The adharmic asuric tendencies are the real reason why a society becomes degraded and people face so many problems in their individual and collective lives. Greed and delusional hopes goad the conditioned souls to engage in abominable activities, even against their wishes (3.36), accepting jobs that are contrary to their principles or abilities, and that make them sick physically and mentally. The same greed and delusional hope attracts foolish people to support depraved politicians in a dirty game of populism and deceit that passes for democracy, and to betray their own family and friends and even their own selves.

इदमस्तीदमपि मे भविष्यति पुनर्धनम् ॥ १६-१३ ॥

idamadya mayā labdhamimam prāpsyē manoratham । idamastīdamapi me bhaviṣyati punarḍhanam ॥ 16-13 ॥

idam: this; adya: today; mayā: by me; labdham: accumulated; imam: this; prāpsyē: I will obtain; manoratham: whatever the mind can imagine; idam: this; asti: there is; idam: this; api: also; me: mine; bhaviṣyati: it will become; punah: more; dhanam: wealth.

"Today I have acquired all this, and I will get even more, as much as my mind desires. This wealth is mine, and it will increase more and more.

This is the picture of capitalistic society, where the accumulation of resources is considered a value in itself, and new extravagant needs are created artificially just to please the mind that is conditioned and deluded by insatiable greed, lust and anger.

Asuric capitalism is hugely different from the Vedic system of wealth production by vaiśyas and kṣatriyas, where accumulation of resources is temporary and instrumental to the benefit of the entire kingdom and all the prajās. The excess wealth produced by the vaiśya grihasthas is distributed to all other sections of society, as we have explained in the commentary to the verse 1 of this chapter. The treasury of the king and other kṣatriyas is also used for the common good - to equip the defense department, build roads, and further the progress of all subjects. Whatever the brahmanas obtain as donations, they use only the strict requirements for their modest maintenance, and they distribute the rest to meritorious and needy people in the form of prasadam. Under the guidance of brahmanas, all kṣatriyas and vaiśyas regularly become the yajamanas of yajnas or religious rituals for the well being and prosperity of all the prajās, and in such ceremonies there is always a substantial distribution of good food and other wealth to all, including the animals.

In the asuric economic system, the subjects are exploited and left unprotected: this is a behavior characteristic of thieves, not of rulers, as explained clearly in Bhagavata Purana: prajā hi lubdhai rajanyair, nirghrinair dasyu dharmabbib, acchinna dara dravina, dasyanti giri kananam, "Losing their wives and properties to such avaricious and merciless rulers, who will behave no better than ordinary thieves, the citizens will flee to the mountains and forests" (12.2.8) and dasyu prayesu rajasu, cauryanrita vrittha himsa, nana vrittisu vai nrīsu, sudra prayesu varnesu, "The kings will mostly be thieves, the occupations of men will be stealing, lying and needless violence, and all the social classes will be reduced to the lowest level of sudras" (12.2.13-14). The Kali yuga avatara, Kalki, will specifically appear to eliminate all such false rulers: vicaran asuna ksaunyam, hayenapratima dyutih, nripa linga cchado dasyun, kotiso nibhanisyati (12.2.19). This characteristic of Kali yuga was already detected by Parikshit (Bhagavata Purana, 1.17.1-6) when he met the degraded sudra dressed as a king, who was cruelly beating a cow and a bull.

The present economic and political system is fundamentally a cheating system, that exploits the weakest prajas instead of protecting them. It is made of multinational corporations that control the fundamental needs of the people - food, medicines, living quarters, energy, basic supplies - in all their stages, from production to retail sales (called "distribution"). The system is carefully engineered as to set lower prices on low quality industrial products that actually damage the health of the consumers and the environment as well, thus creating new business opportunities for the "remedies" to the ensuing problems.

Over and above all, the bank system has taken control of the various world governments, making money without producing anything and encouraging or supporting adharmic enterprises of all kinds, favoring allies and punishing adversaries by manipulating the stock market, lobbying and forcing unjust legislation - especially by making cheap and good healthy things illegal. Racketeering, insider information leaks, black market, usury, financial slavery through debts become normal practices. Wars are carefully planned simply to create business opportunities for weapon manufacturing and civil reconstruction, and to take control of valuable resources of the invaded regions. The general masses are brainwashed with the myth of consumerism as prosperity, but the quality of life of the members of society steadily decreases. In the end, huge dumps of garbage are created, especially by planned obsolescence and unnecessary complex packaging, while the things that are really important and vital become increasingly difficult and rare, if not impossible to find. The system implacably devours land, water, fuel, mineral resources, food, animals and people through various types of ugra karma business, especially with the production of non vegetarian food, that causes immense loss of land and water, as well as numerous diseases.

There is nothing wrong in acquiring valuable resources and objects, because artha is one of the main goals of human life according to Vedic scriptures. However, artha must be acquired only after a strict training in dharma, and must always avoid violating the principles of dharma such as satya (truthfulness/ honesty), daya (compassion), saucha (cleanliness) and tapas (restraint). Some people believe that a vaishya cannot do business without cheating and lying, but this is a dangerous delusion because it opens the doors to adharma and tamas, with disastrous consequences for the entire society. It is undoubtedly the result of a slave mentality, because under a colonialist government or any predatory government, people are forced to lie and hide their actual wealth and profit, otherwise they will be utterly stripped of everything by their greedy rulers, and maybe even killed.

On the other hand, when the government is based on dharmic (ethical) principles, vaishyas can prosper openly without fear, and without any need for cheating or lying. Also, the citizens will not feel the need to accumulate excess wealth because they have no fear for the future, as the entire social system is engineered to support all its members at all times, and the happiness of the people does not depend on tamasic pursuits.

असौ मया हतः शत्रुहनिष्ये चापरानपि । ईश्वरोऽहमहं भोगी सिद्धोऽहं बलवान्सुखी ॥ १६-१४ ॥

asau mayā hataḥ śatruhaniṣye cāparānapi | īśvaro'hamahaṁ bhogī siddho'haṁ balavānsukhī || 16-14 ||

asau: that; maya: by me; hataḥ: killed; śatruḥ: enemy; haniṣye: I will eliminate; ca: and; āparan: others; api: also; īśvarah: the Lord; aham: I am; aham: I am; bhogi: enjoyer; siddhaḥ: perfect; aham: I am; bala van: powerful; sukhi: happy.

"I have killed that enemy of mine, and I will kill others, too. I am the Lord and master (of all I survey). I am the enjoyer. I am perfect, powerful and happy."

Asuras have strange ideas about enemies. Their motto is, "one who is not with me is against me". Vedic scriptures define "enemy" as someone who is physically attacking us with hostile intent, but asuras consider as enemies not just those who physically attack them, but all those who refuse to submit and worship them, or could be considered competition. Krishna has stated (12.18) that a devotee should be equally balanced and impartial towards enemies and friends (samah satrau ca mitre ca), but of course this does not mean that we should never fight back those who attack us or our subordinates.

The meaning of dharma yuddha, often mistranslated as "holy war", has nothing to do with the attempt to materially enforce some religious ideology, but it is simply to protect the fundamental principles of ethics and the life of the prajas - the harmless, innocent, and good people that support society. A kṣatriya who dies in such selfless line of duty is immediately elevated to a higher level of existence (2.37, 11.33). There are precise rules in dharmic battles: a warrior can only fight against an equal opponent, and never attack one who is not willing to fight, including those active warriors who have lost weapons or armor, or are wounded or incapacitated. It is considered adharmic to attack any non-combatants, or to destroy trees or houses or crops. Women, children, farmers and civilians in general are never touched or threatened in any way; there is never any "collateral damage" or "reprisal". On the other hand, the asuras' idea of war is not limited by ethical considerations, and in fact they usually resort to cynical terrorism by attacking, kidnapping and raping women and children, destroying cities and villages, tormenting all peaceful civilians, and resorting to dirty tactics and devious mean such as deceit, political games, assassination, slander and character assassination, blackmailing, betrayal and back stabbing, destruction of innocence and demoralization of the adversaries.

And the scope of their greed is unlimited: they are not content with one village, one city, one kingdom, one nation, or even one planet: they even try to artificially reach other planets to establish their dominion there, too. Ravana planned to build a staircase to Svarga, and our contemporary asuras delude themselves and their followers into thinking that if they totally destroy or "consume" this planet, it will still be possible to "export" their way of life on other planets or space stations.

When we speak of "emperor" and "empire" in Vedic civilization, it is about a federation of smaller kingdoms that recognize a leader to whom to rally in times of danger and need, and who will resolve their disputes and guide them in cooperating for the common benefit. The emperor never interfered with the internal affairs of the vassal kingdoms, that freely chose their own kings, social systems, religious institutions and cultural customs. On the other hand, asuras want to completely control the land and the peoples they conquer, and demand to be worshiped above all Deities and authorities, thus uniting both religious and material power directly under themselves. They cannot tolerate dissent or questioning of any kind, and they take all opportunities to avenge themselves of any real or imagined offense, and even to conduct preventive strikes against any potential future opponents. For example, Kamsa tried to kill his own sister Devaki when he suspected that her unborn son could one day threaten his position, and even if he was finally persuaded to abstain from such an abominable action, he nevertheless kept Devaki and her husband Vasudeva locked up for many years and systematically killed their children at birth. By reading the many stories of asuras in the Puranas, we notice that they demanded to be worshiped as God, and actively persecuted anyone who refused to do so. Asuras are characterized by impudent hypocrisy and arrogant belief of their own egotistic divinity, as isvara (the Lord) usurping God's position as the owner of all planets, the enjoyer or beneficiary of all actions and the object of worship for all beings (bhoktaram yajna tapasam sarva loka mahesvaram, subridam sarva bhutanam, 5.29).

It is easy to spot the asura in the religious field because he invariably usurps the position of God in the worship of his followers, putting up his own pictures and images in the temple and demanding that regular rituals to be performed to them. It becomes normal for his followers to declare themselves his devotees or devotees of his organization rather than devotees of God, to chant his name instead of God's names, and to follow only the books written by him instead of studying genuine shastra. He arranges their marriages, tries to control their sexual life, and holds complete power over their income and possessions - assuming total control over their personal lives, demanding to be given all their wealth and service at any time, in "full surrender".

A genuine guru, on the other hand, always keeps a secondary position in the spiritual practices of his followers, and teaches them how to worship God. Sometimes, to facilitate neophytes who have some tamasic tendencies and expectations, a genuine guru will allow them to focus on his person in order to develop affection and gratitude for his tutoring, but such leniency should never be allowed to affect the development of self realization of the disciple or his/ her direct relationship with the Supreme Consciousness. Besides, it should always remain on the level of affectionate family dealings, and not develop into the fearful formal worship demanded by a dictator.

Foolish and ignorant people can easily be misled by clever manipulators who present demons as good people or even as saints, criminals as victims, friends as enemies, and the other way around. For those who are afflicted by a materialistic vision, the enemy is simply someone who seems not to belong to our camp: this perspective gives no space for consideration of dharmā, justice, or even decency or common sense, but the asura still believes he is in a perfectly moral, rightful and legitimate position, because his opinion constitutes the absolute religious truth. For example, for a hardened rapist, the "enemy" will be a child who finds the courage to subtract him/ herself from his predatory clutches, and who might expose his violent habits by revealing his actions to the public. Therefore in the distorted mind of the criminal, the child "should be eliminated". Anyone else who may protect the child from him will also become his "enemy". Similarly, a witness to a heinous crime will be considered as an enemy by a mafia boss, and in totalitarian regimes anyone who does not subscribe to the government dogma becomes an "enemy of the State" by that very reason, even if he does not take any aggressive action. Can the mere fact of existing independently be considered an aggressive crime punishable by death? Can asking questions about obviously incorrect actions and conclusions be considered an aggressive crime? Can the mere fact of having different religious/ spiritual beliefs be considered a crime punishable by death? Or in other words, is freedom of thought a crime? According to the demoniac mentality, it is. According to the divine mentality, it is not. Religion should be a personal matter. Religious leaders or brahmanas (and especially sannyasis) should have zero material power in society, politics, law making, or even possess any property. Whatever donation they are given in the form of land, cows, wealth, grains etc, they should only use what is necessary and dispose of the rest for the benefit of society at large. Religious imperialism has nothing to do with God, and everything to do with asuric mentality: it aims to control more people by deceit or violence, and preaches that we can get more pleasure in paradise if we eliminate all those who do not convert and submit to our own group. True brahmanas should merely teach and offer consultancies, both in public and in private, and if required, oppose incorrect and detrimental opinions presented as genuine truth. An opinion is physically dangerous only when it presents violent aggression as a legitimate (or the only legitimate) way of life. Bad actions must be counteracted by prevention and forceful opposition, but bad opinions must be counteracted by opinions only - by discussion and debate, preferably in public. This is the Vedic system. In this regard, out of humility one could feel hesitant in entering such a debate against great personalities - heads of famous religious institutions, teachers with many followers, or powerful social figures. But if these people are taking an adharmic position, no matter what their reasons are, they must be fearlessly challenged and opposed in debate, just like Krishna instructed Arjuna to take arms against his elders on the battlefield of Kurukshetra.

आढ्योऽभिजनवानस्मि कोऽन्योऽस्ति सदृशो मया । यक्ष्ये दास्यामि मोदिष्ये इत्यज्ञानविमोहिताः ॥ १६-१५ ॥ āḍhyo'bhijanavānasmi ko'nyo'sti sadṛśo mayā ।

yakṣye dāsyāmi modīṣye ityajñānavimohitāḥ ॥ 16-15 ॥

adhyah: prosperous; abhijana van: one who has many followers; asmi: I am; kab: who; anyah: other; asti: there is; sadṛśah: comparable to; mayā: me; yakṣye: I will perform rituals; dāsyāmi: I shall give charity; modīṣye: I will be happy; iti: like this; ajñana: by ignorance; vimohitah: confused.

"Confused by ignorance (he thinks): I have many followers, I am successful and wealthy. Who can be compared to me? I shall perform rituals, I shall distribute charity, and I shall be pleased by the results.

It is said, "power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely". However, as it was noticed by the brilliant author of Dune, power itself does not corrupt, but attracts people who are already corrupt or corruptible - individuals that can be considered pathologically imbalanced (mada anvitah, 16.10). These are the asuras.

Because in Kali yuga the general masses of people are immersed in tamas, and believe that wealth and material success are the self-explanatory evidence of sanctity (Bhagavata Purana 12.2.2-6), naturally asuras will tend to demonstrate their exalted spiritual and religious position and become popular by accumulating wealth, building impressive expensive ashramas and temples, gaining as many followers as possible, conducting grandiose and very visible religious rituals with complex and pompous celebrations, and making a big show of charity distribution. All this, however, is done for the selfish pleasure (modisyē) and for the aggrandizement and commercial advertisement of himself or his group or organization, with the purpose of increasing the business - getting more followers, more donations, more political weight.

In a smaller degree, these asuric tendencies can be observed among the general population during the traditional religious festivals. Those who are largely influenced by tamas are anxious to make a bigger pandal than their neighbors, to get the most powerful loudspeakers to make sure everybody notice it, and to purchase the largest and more decorative temporary statues and to conduct the most impressive rituals and processions. However, these pandal festivals often become a pretext to unlawfully collect money from the public, purchase food (and usually liquors and other intoxicants) for a small group of organizers, play noisy materialistic music for a few days, and create a sort of temporary social club, while at the end the "used idol" is discarded into the garbage dump.

A much better way to observe such festivals would be for all the local people to unite in cooperation and organize meetings and celebrations at a permanent temple, where the Deity is regularly worshiped all year round. There people will sit together to actually sing devotional songs and especially to discuss about the divine glories, activities, qualities, and teachings. At the end of each such meeting all the participants should be served good quality but simple pure vegetarian prasadam food, and offered whatever gifts will be appropriate to the occasion, such as booklets, malas etc. In this way there will be no waste or public inconvenience, and the community sense will become stronger.

The importance of permanent temples in the life of civilized society should not be underestimated, but such temples should not become centers of asuric mentality. The Deities should be served with love and respect, but their decoration is less important than the distribution of spiritual knowledge and consciousness among the members of the community. Putting too much emphasis on expensive materials, paraphernalia and decorations will stimulate the rajas and tamas (lust and greed) of people, including the priests, and the level of consciousness will fall immediately.

In Vedic times, the nigrahas of the Deities were sculpted already complete with clothing and ornaments, and the decoration of the temples was relatively austere although the architecture could be impressive. There was a lot of imagery, but mostly in stone and paintings. People went to visit the temple to raise their consciousness by listening to the chanting of the mantras and stutis, and by receiving the simple prasadam consisting in offered flowers, leaves, chandana, and fruits.

The ideal - and transcendental - level of religiosity (visuddha sattva) is that large temples should not be built or managed in the name of a group or organization or even a king, but in the name of God only, and everybody could have access and be allowed to serve and worship there. Otherwise it is a private temple and it is not for the glory of God but for one's own pleasure and glory (modisyē).

People who do not have sufficient knowledge and understanding about the purpose of religious life usually believe that it should be about "doing good deeds", and earning pious merits to counteract the consequences of their bad actions. Therefore they only offer financial support to those spiritualists who make a big show of such public activities, even if only with a few photos and very rare events. This stimulates and reinforces the tamasic and rajasic tendencies of the donors, who can boast - albeit as subordinate doers - of being great and powerful above all others, advertise themselves as important people in society, and feel "pious" because of the wealth they gave in charity and "earning elevation to paradise" that is a place full of heavenly pleasures. However, this charity is rarely done with respect and the proper consideration. All too often the donors give only stuff they cannot use any more and want to get rid of - stale or damaged food, old clothes, shoes, and other garbage. The actual sattvic or transcendental charity, however, is something else. It is performed quietly and without boasting about it, because it is needed and useful, and to please God as the sum total of human society, without expecting anything in return (17.20-22, 18.25).

The word abhijanavan specifically refers to noble ancestry, prominent family, or high caste. This vainglory is found in many other groups who have no understanding of the transcendental science, atma vidya, and who identify with the material body. As we have seen many times, this ahankara and mamatva is the root of all ignorance, and as such, it generates an asuric tendency.

अनेकचित्तविभ्रान्ता मोहजालसमावृताः । प्रसक्ताः कामभोगेषु पतन्ति नरकेऽशुचौ ॥ १६-१६ ॥

anekacittavibhṛāntā mohajālasamāvṛtāḥ । prasaktāḥ kāmabhogeṣu patanti narake'sucau ॥ 16-16 ॥

aneka: many; citta: worries; vibhṛanta: tormented; moha jala: by a net of illusions; samavṛtaḥ: covered; prasaktaḥ: attached; kāma bhogesu: in the enjoyment of lust; patanti: they fall down; narake: in a hellish condition; asucau: impure.

"Tormented by innumerable anxieties and covered by a net of illusion, (hopelessly) attached to the enjoyment of lust, they fall into a dirty hellish condition.

The word citta literally means "thoughts", as in "mental activities". Because this word is coupled with vibhranta ("tormented", "burned"), we understand that such laboring of the mind is painful and debilitating. It is not just anxiety, but it also includes schemes, hopes, desires, and resentments, all in a tangled net that completely binds the conditioned soul to ultimate anxiety.

Another word for "anxiety" is kuntha, that also means "thorn", as mentioned for example in Bhagavata Purana (3.32.17): rajasa kuntho manasah, kamatmano ajitendriyah, "their minds full of anxieties because of rajas, they remain immersed in lust without restraint". The level of transcendental consciousness is called vaikuntha ("without anxiety") or vigata kuntha yatra ("where all anxieties are gone") because a self realized soul is satisfied with whatever joys and opulences life delivers, and serenely accepts the fact that he will have to let them go one day. This is possible only when we have overcome the material identification (abhankara) and attachments (amatva).

On the contrary, asuras have no other purpose than enjoying this body in this lifetime, so their anxiety is all-devouring. It was already mentioned in verse 11 (cinta) as a major characteristic of their lives, and here it is repeated again. The expression moha jala samavritah literally means "caught in the fishing net of illusion", and illustrates how asuras keep very busy trying to weave their schemes and theories and systems, but inevitably end up tangled in their own traps. Under their false and delusional fantasies of religion (dambha), they imagine that they are going to enjoy in heaven because of their righteousness, but even if they call this world "a valley of tears", they are never really eager to leave it. And when the danger of death approaches, they frantically seek the help of hospitals and doctors to get a few more days of a miserable life. In their deepest heart of hearts, where their silenced conscience sits, they know that they are not going to paradise or Vaikuntha, but they have already sunk into a hellish existence (patanti narake), as they have created thousands of Vaitaranis (the symbolic hellish river full of all impure stuff such as blood, pus, bones etc) already on this Earth. Their condition is characterized by moha (illusion), prasaktarya (excessive attachment) and asaukam (uncleanliness). Their ugra karma is religious only superficially, and in fact their rituals and ceremonies are impure because they give more importance to a big show of opulence than to simplicity, honesty and purity. At the moment of death, such position only becomes more apparent, because they lose the shelter of the gross material body they used to hide their bad conscience. What will they do? They have already developed tamasic qualities, and they cannot switch to divine consciousness automatically, even with all the blessings of the priests and churches of the world. A soul's next destination at death is not determined by any external authority, but only by its actual individual consciousness, determined by its actions during life: yam yam vapi smaran bhavam tyajaty ante kalevaram, tam tam evaiti kaunteya sada tad bhava bhavitah, "O Arjuna, whatever nature one remembers at the time of leaving the body, s/he attains precisely that state of being, because of always contemplating that existence" (8.6).

This is particularly true for materialists: rajasi pralaya gatva karma sangisu jayate, tatha pralinas tamasi mudha yonisu jayate, "When death comes, those who are under the influence of rajas take a new birth among those who are attached to activities, while those who meet destruction while under the influence of tamas take birth in matrices devoid of intelligence" (14.15).

आत्मसम्भाविताः स्तब्धा धनमानमदान्विताः । यजन्ते नामयज्ञैस्ते दम्भेनाविधिपूर्वकम् ॥ १६-१७ ॥

atmasambhāvitāḥ stabdhā dhanamānamadānvitāḥ | yajante nāmayajñāiste dambhenāvidhipūrvakam || 16-17 ||

atma sambhavitah: egotistic; stabdhah: impudent; dhana: wealth; mana: false prestige; mada anvitah: deluded by; yajante: they perform rituals; nama yajnaib: that are sacrifices only in name; te: they; dambhena: because of arrogance; vidhi purvakam: devoid of knowledge and proper rules.

"Deluded by egotism, impudence, false prestige and (the possession of) wealth, they celebrate rituals and sacrifices that have no real value, because of their hypocrisy and ignorance of the proper purpose and rules.

Krishna continues to describe how the typical asuras make a big show of religiosity to impress the foolish and ignorant people and obtain their support, obedience and allegiance.

The expression atma sambhavitā could be translated as "self-made man", someone who considers himself not accountable to anyone else, even to God, and therefore becomes irresponsible in his actions. Such an asura is very opinionated - we could say "over-opinionated and under-informed". He firmly believes he does not need to learn anything, not caring for scriptures, and in his self conceit he does not hesitate to preach principles that are blatantly against the genuine scriptures, against dharma, jnana, and vidya, but he presents his own speculations as "the age-old religious tradition". Another translation of atma sambhavitah is "having a very high opinion of oneself"; this indicates that they consider themselves to be worshipable, so they hijack the people's worship from God to themselves and/ or their group, organization etc. Some of such false preachers even claim to be divine avatars, misappropriate "by proxy" the authority of some genuine acharya of the past, or manufacture their own God figure or ideology for political material purposes, to better exploit people and resources, and thrive on the general ignorance among the masses about the fundamental principles of dharma and vidya. It is true that we cannot put any limit on the number and activities of genuine divine avatars: avatara hy asankhyeya, hareh sattva nidher dvijah, yathavidasinah kulyah, sarasah syuh sahasrasah, "The manifestations of Hari in this world are innumerable, like the thousands of lakes, rivers and creeks that flow from the ocean of sattva" (Bhagavata Purana 1.3.26). But all such avatars are always characterized by the same fundamental dharmic mission: paritranaaya sadbunam vinasaya ca duskritam, dharma samsthapanarthaya sambhavami yuge yuge, "I manifest myself yuga after yuga, to protect the good people, destroy the evil doers and to establish dharma" (4.8). Since the principles of dharma are eternal and universal (sanatana), a true avatara is recognized by the fact that he protects the good (harmless, innocent) people, destroys the evil doers and brings back the consciousness and application of the original dharma. If some "avatara" is not demonstrating these characteristics or his teachings are not compatible with the fundamental principles of dharma and the transcendental knowledge contained in the genuine original scriptures, it's better to give him a large berth.

Even those who keep their profile a bit lower, and merely present themselves as sannyasis or babajis, should be considered asuras if their teachings and behavior are against the eternal and universal principles of dharma and vidya. We should certainly be very cautious about accepting the authenticity of sannyasis who engage in adharmic activities against the rules of sannyasa, such as political wrangling and institutional power games, persecution of dissenters or competitors, or even if they simply claim all rights and no duties, living and behaving like kings without bothering to honor the responsibilities that come with a royal position.

A genuine sannyasi has no house, no personal properties, no bank account, no pride, no personal servant. He is always happy only to hear and speak about Transcendence. A sannyasi cannot engage in politics, trade, business or any material activity to maintain himself, but rather he should simply accept whatever alms are coming spontaneously. If he is not able to face such austere and difficult life, he should humbly step down, as recommended in Brahma vaivarta Purana: asvamedham gavalambbham sannyasam pala paitrkam, devarena sutotpattim kalau panca vivarjayet, "In this age of Kali, one should skip five religious traditions: the asvamedha yajna, the gomedha yajna, the acceptance of the order of sannyasa, the oblations to the forefathers, and begetting children in one's brother's wife."

The word stabdha, from the root stha ("established"), literally means "motionless", and it indicates the foolish, dull and obstinate conceit caused to one's established position, wealth, hierarchy, government recognition, political support, number of followers, race, nationality, antiquity of lineage, caste, etc. It is also translated as "puffed up", or "foolish". This meaning is reinforced by the expressions dhana mana, literally "with consideration/ respect to wealth", and mada anvita, meaning "filled with madness, engrossed, absorbed in madness" and indicating some delusion of grandeur that has nothing to do with genuine transcendental realization and Vedic knowledge. The last part of the verse confirms: vidhi purvakam literally means "lack of knowledge" and "disregard for rules".

One of the grossest transgressions to the fundamental rules of dharma and vidya is the consumption of non-vegetarian foods, that is contrary to daya and ahimsa (compassion and non-violence) as well as to sauca (cleanliness and purity) and tapas (restraint, self-control). No genuinely religious person will indulge in such adharma. Another serious flaw indicated by vidhi purvakam is the lack of understanding of the meaning of the mantras chanted (and therefore the frequent choice of the appropriate mantras), the gross mispronunciation, and the neglect of important parts of the rituals. Krishna clearly says here that the yajnas performed by such foolish people are only for show and name, to become famous and obtain a reputation of religiosity (yajante nama yajmail), and as such they have no real value (17.5-6, 17.11-13, 18.25, 18.32).

अहंकारं बलं दर्पं कामं क्रोधं च संश्रिताः ।

मामात्मपरदेहेषु प्रद्विषन्तोऽभ्यसूयकाः ॥ १६-१८ ॥

ahāṅkāraṁ balaṁ darpaṁ kāmāṁ krodhaṁ ca saṁśrītaḥ | māmātmaparadeheṣu pradviṣanto'bhyaśūyakāḥ || 16-18 ||

aham karam: I am the doer; balam: strength; darpaṁ: pride; kamam: lust; krodham: rage; ca: and; samsritah: having taken residence; mam: me; atma para debesu: in their own body and in the bodies of others; pradvisantah: they hate; abhyasuyakah: envious.

"Taking shelter in ahankara, physical/ material strength, arrogance, lust and anger, they show envy and hatred against me, as I reside in their own bodies and in the bodies of others.

The root of the problem is immediately identified in the first word of this verse. It is the ahankara, the egotism that deludes the conditioned soul into believing that he is indeed the supreme controller of his life, and the legitimate owner and enjoyer of everything. This ahankara is the sense of material identity and is inevitably attached to social position, family position, material qualities and activities, possessions, affiliations, and everything else that pertains to the material body. Therefore it is only natural that the foolish materialist confused by this delusion (ahankara vimudhatma kartaham iti manyate, 3.27) gives great importance to physical strength, fitness and stature and/ or material power of any kind (bala) as well as to lust for sense gratification and material acquisitions (kama), because these are the pride (darpaṁ) of his life. Because bodies are separate from one another, and the pain suffered by one is not easily perceived by another, this identification with the material body causes a strong feeling of duality and selfishness. So whenever one's gratification and domination seems to be threatened, rage (krodha) ensues due to hostility (dvisa) and envy (abhyasuya - as opposite of anasuya).

As we have seen in verse 16.14, the asura thinks, "Why should someone else enjoy what is supposed to be rightfully mine? Why should someone else be the lord and master (isvara) instead of me? I am the legitimate enjoyer (bhogi), and I will eliminate any competition." This is the evidence of his lack of understanding about God. The asura thinks that God is a separate person, maybe one more powerful than others, but still an individual person. We see for example in the extensive narration of the Narasimha avatara that the asura Hiranyakasipu wanted to see Vishnu directly, because he did not believe that Vishnu is in everyone's heart as Prahlada had said. The main problem of asuras has been brilliantly solved there by Prahlada (who was Hiranyakasipu's son): "give up the asuric tendency of seeing others as enemies, because the only enemy is your own mind" (jahi asuram bhavam imam tvam, Bhagavata Purana 7.7.9). Hiranyakasipu was so arrogant that he in fact accused his son Prahlada of being an impudent upstart (durvinita), the disgrace of the family (kula bheda kara), and a degraded (adhama) stubborn (stabdham) fool (manda), because he did not worship Hiranyakasipu's established position (sasana - sa asana), as we can see in verse 7.8.5.

So this is the litmus test for all of us, clear as the sunlight in a beautiful day: no matter how religious an asura will appear to be, and how boldly he will try to present his official "established" rights and privileges, if he wants to control everyone and considers any dissenters as enemies and tries to destroy them, he is exposing his true demoniac nature. The only external enemy is one who physically attacks us: one who refuses to worship us and to be controlled by us is certainly not an enemy. The very fact that one physically attacks others with such a stupid motivation exposes his lack of spiritual realization, as anyone who becomes violent against a creature is actually violent against God who is present in the hearts of all creatures.

It is a fact that asuras are usually considered religious people and offer traditional rituals sacrifices and worship God in their own way - not out of love and devotion, but because they want something in return. Usually asuras do not approach Vishnu (7.15) because Vishnu is very strict and does not give blessings to those who are contaminated by asuric qualities. Materialistic persons usually feel it safer to approach more compassionate Personalities of Godhead, especially Shiva Mahadeva, who is also known as Pasupati or "the protector of pasu", that are people whose consciousness is on an animal level. Shiva Mahadeva is also known as Asutosha ("quickly pleased"), and Bholenatha ("the protector of simple-minded people"). Of course this does not mean that Shiva himself is simple-minded, or lower in position than Vishnu: it simply means that he is more compassionate. He is also known as Nilakantha ("blue/ black throat") because of the black stain left by the dreadful halabala poison, that Mahadeva deliberately swallowed to save the universe from its lethal effects.

We know that Vishnu is Yajna, the personification of sacrifice, and therefore during their rituals asuras will formally offer their homage to Vishnu hoping to get material benefits. However, they will not be able to really approach Vishnu because they are not pure enough to understand him, so they can only come in contact with his manifestations in the material world, such as Mahadeva, Agni, Yajna, the Virata Rupa itself and the various Vishnu avatars - such as the Purusha avatars (the Vishnus reclining on the 3 oceans), Narasimha, Varaha, etc.

We see that sometimes people who correspond to the description of the asuras by guna and karma are found to be engaged in the worship Vishnu or Krishna, but such worship is merely external (nama yajna) or a simple offering of superficial homage (namah) without real surrender (na prapadyante). The defining characteristic of asuras is that they want to take God's position, and therefore they do not recognize God's supreme position. They only see God (in any form) as a provider of blessings and benefits and forgiveness; they believe they can "use" God for their own purposes, and generally Vishnu appears to them as too powerful to be duped in that way. Of course asuras would have no fear in approaching an avatara of Vishnu if this avatara appears to be sweet and harmless enough: for example, all the asuras flocked around Mohini, and were certainly more than ready to worship and please her so that they could get from her what they wanted. The envy and hatred against others that is found in asuras is certainly not directed against "saints" only, as some have claimed. Such an interpretation is dangerous because in itself can feed the asuric tendency of dividing people into separate camps and see "enemies" in those who do not submit to such "saints", whether genuine or fake. Too often this trick has been played to defend fake spiritualists and asuras by claiming that those who did not submit to their adharmic demands and ignorant conclusions were simply "envious". In fact, it is very difficult to see how any sane person would be envious of asuras, considering the unholy and unhappy life they are leading and the disastrous course that asuras are setting for themselves in the future. They should rather be pitied.

Truth has no agenda: a whistle blower who alerts the public against the danger created by powerful criminals should be taken seriously, not superficially condemned as "envious". Proper investigation and analysis should be conducted on the basis of direct observation of the characteristics as explained by Krishna in this chapter. Then after being duly warned of the danger, each person will make their choice and be responsible for them. No other course of action is required for a sattvic person than making the proper shastric knowledge available to everyone.

तानहं द्विषतः कुरान्संसारेषु नराधमान् । क्षिपाम्यजस्रमशुभानासुरीष्वेव योनिषु ॥ १६-१९ ॥

tānaḥaṁ dviṣataḥ krurānsamsāreṣu narādhamān | kṣipāmyajasramaśubhānāsuriṣveva yoniṣu || 16-19 ||

tan: them; aham: I; dviṣataḥ: the hateful; kruran: the cruel; samsaresu: into the samsara; nara adhaman: the most degraded human beings; kṣipami: I send; ajasram: for a very long time; asubhan: inauspicious; asurisu: asurika; eva: certainly; yonisu: into wombs.

"I send these hateful and cruel people, the most degraded among human beings, into a long imprisonment in the samsara, to take birth in inauspicious asuric wombs again and again.

There is absolutely no need for anyone of us to run around looking for asuras to eliminate them, because God himself in the form of Time will bring them to face the consequences of their bad choices. Again, the only action we are allowed to take is to defend ourselves and our subordinates from physical attacks and to do our best to spread the correct knowledge and understanding of Vedic knowledge. Under no circumstances we should take the initiative of attacking people - go into war, court cases, or any similar action - because we believe them to be asuras. If these people actually become aggressors (agnido garadas caiva sastrapanir, dhanapabah, kshetra darapahari ca shadete atatayinah) and attack us or our subordinates with fire, with poison, or holding weapons in hands, or by taking away possessions, land or wife (or other family members), we have all rights to legitimate defense even with the application of lethal force, but otherwise nobody should be attacked simply because of what they believe or do not believe. If we committed such a mistake, we would become asuras in our own right.

Of course exposing the actual crimes of an asura, by bringing sufficient evidence to the knowledge of the public, cannot be considered an aggression. Wrong opinions and teachings must be counteracted by correct information, opinions and teachings.

Slandering can be counteracted by proving it wrong by one's dharmic behaviors and conclusions. Direct physical aggression should be counteracted by physical force, and indirect physical aggression should be counteracted by preventive measures.

The words divisa ("hateful"), kerura ("cruel, evil doer") and nara adharma ("depraved") are the characteristics of the asura, who attacks others unnecessarily and viciously, without any considerations for the fundamental dharmic principles such as compassion, truthfulness, and so on. There is no justification for hatred and cruelty, even towards criminals. Even in extreme cases, when evil and cruel asuras attack us, we should always behave with restraint and compassion; this means for example that the women and children of our aggressors should not be harmed in any way, and the amount of force applied against the aggressor himself should be limited to what is really necessary. We see in Bhagavata Purana the example of Indra, who took advantage of the temporary absence of the asura Hiranyakasipu to get back the control of the heavenly planets. Having seized the royal palace, Indra captured Hiranyakasipu's wife, who was pregnant, and contemplated the idea of killing the baby before he could grow into a dangerous asura like his father. Narada Muni immediately appeared and scolded Indra severely for that unworthy thought; he took the lady under his personal protection in his ashrama, and in that spiritual environment the unborn baby was able to absorb the feelings of love and devotion to God and to listen to his qualities, activities and teachings. So it was that Prahlada became a great divine personality in spite of being the son of a great asura.

This is also a warning for us. God (who is none other than Dharma itself) only protects the devas because they remain within the boundaries of dharmā (dharmā eva hanti, dharmā rakṣati rakṣitāḥ, "dharmā kills those who try to kill it, and protects those who protect it" (Manu Smṛiti 15.8). The moment we become opposed to dharmā, dharmā will start destroying us even if we were situated in a high position, and the moment we become supportive to dharmā, dharmā will start protecting us even if we were situated in a lower position. At any moment we can change the course of our life in this way.

Of course, self defense is always justified. If our opponents have already committed a serious violation of the fundamentals of ethics, we can respond in a similar fashion to prevent further damage especially to innocent and good people. If the only way to stop an aggressor is to terrorize him with an impressive display of ferocity from our part, that is what we must do: to fight against a rakṣasa we can engage a rakṣasa or use rakṣasa strategies, if the human manner of fighting proves insufficient. But when we set out to destroy monsters, we must be very careful not to become monsters ourselves: this is why Krishna says balam balavatam caham kama raga vivarjitam, dharmaviruddho bhutesu kamo 'smi bharatarsabha, "O Arjuna, I am the strength of the strong who is free from selfishness and attachment. In all beings, I am desire that is not contrary to dharmā" (7.11).

आसुरीं योनिमापन्ना मूढा जन्मनि जन्मनि । मामप्राप्यैव कौन्तेय ततो यान्त्यधमां गतिम् ॥ १६-२० ॥

āsuriṁ yonimāpannā mūḍhā janmani janmani | māmaprāpyaiva kaunteya tato yāntyadhamāṁ gatim || 16-20 ||

asurim: asuric; yonim: wombs; apannab: attained; mudhab: the fools; janmani janmani: birth after birth; mam: me; aprapya: unable to approach; eva: certainly; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; tataḥ: then; yanti: they go; adhamam: degraded; gatim: destination.

"O son of Kunti, even after taking birth from asuric wombs lifetime after lifetime, these fools remain unable to attain me, because they slide constantly into degradation."

It is important here to understand that the Supreme has no hatred for anyone: samo 'ham sarva bhutesu na me dvesyo 'sti na priyah, ye bhajanti tu mam bhaktya mayi te tesu capy aham, "I am equally disposed towards all living beings. I do not hate anyone, and I do not favor anyone. Yet, when someone offers me a sincere service in devotion, I also serve them with love and devotion" (9.29). God is not interested in punishing anyone: nadatte kasyacit papam na caiva sukritam vibhuh, ajnanenavritam jnanam tena mulyanti jantavah, "The all-powerful Lord does not consider the good or bad merits of anyone. The problem is only due to the living entities, that are confused because their knowledge is covered by ignorance" (5.15).

The asuras determine their own destiny by consistently making disastrous choices, and then God in the form of Time brings them to the consequences of their own actions. This is why Krishna says, "I cast them into degraded births, lifetime after lifetime". Such asuras remain unable to approach God simply because they do not want to. God is not abandoning them - in fact God never abandons anyone, as the param atman continues to accompany the jiva atman in all its incarnations, including the most degraded forms of life and even in asuric bodies. At any time, even the worst asura is allowed to change the course of his life. Unfortunately, the weight of his previous bad actions has a very heavy inertial mass, and will keep pulling down, lower and lower, and progress in the opposite direction will be extremely difficult and taxing, but it will still be possible. It is said, kartum akartum anyatha kartum samartha, "one who can do something can also undo it".

Of course, this freedom of choice exists only at certain levels of life, because in animal and vegetal species the conditioned soul can only exhaust its bad karma by enduring hardships, yet this is a progress, too. We could say that this category of asuras are the niya baddhas ("eternally conditioned souls") that are sometimes described in Vedic literature. But even for them there is hope, as the opportunity for purification and progress is presented to everyone, even for those who have already taken birth in asuric and inauspicious wombs. To move from the vicious circle to the virtuous circle we must simply follow the instruction of Prahlada to his father: "give up the asuric tendency of seeing others as enemies, because the only enemy is your own mind" (jahi asuram bhavam imam tram, Bhagavata Purana 7.7.9).

When big asuras are blessed with the personal presence and contact of an avatara of the Lord, as we see in the stories of Puranas and other Vedic literature, we are to understand that such asuras are actually special souls and personal companions of Isvara, who appear with him to assist his activities. Whether they are simply playing the role of Bhagavan's adversaries, or they have obtained such special opportunity because of some extraordinary punya or sukriti, these souls become instantly purified by the contact with the Personification of Dharma, and attain liberation. This is seen in many episodes of the Puranas, from Hiranyakasipu himself to Putana and several others. Many asuras were saved by the kindness and compassion of great devotees and self-realized souls such as Narada Muni and others. Since the root cause of the asuras' delusion is ignorance, the best medicine to heal them is genuine knowledge, daivim prakriti asritah, that consists in taking shelter in divine knowledge. We have already seen in chapter 9: moghasa mogha karmano mogha jnana vicetasah, raksasim asurim caiva prakritim mohinim asritah, "Entertaining delusional desires, engaging in delusional activities, and delusionally convinced of their knowledge, they are confused by incorrect awareness and take shelter in the bewildering nature of raksasas and asuras" (9.12).

Genuine knowledge is therefore the solution to the problem:

api ced asi papebhyah sarvebhyah papa krit tamah, sarvam jnana plavenaiva vrijinam santarisyasi, "Even if you were burdened by many negative actions, by the greatest possible sins, you will be able to cross the ocean of bad things by the boat of knowledge" (4.36), yathaidhamsi samiddho 'gnir bhasma sat kurute 'rjuna, jnanagnih sarva karmani bhasma sat kurute tatha, "O Arjuna, just like the blazing fire turns firewood into ashes, similarly the fire of knowledge turns all karma into ashes" (4.37), jnanena tu tad ajnanam yesam nasitam atmanah, tesam aditya vaj jnanam prakasayati tat param, "To those for whom ajnana is destroyed in the perception of the self by jnana, that Knowledge, similar to the radiant Sun, reveals that highest reality" (5.16).

त्रिविधं नरकस्येदं द्वारं नाशनमात्मनः ।

कामः क्रोधस्तथा लोभस्तस्मादेतत्त्रयं त्यजेत् ॥ १६-२१ ॥

trividham narakasyedam dvaram nashanamātmanah | kāmah krodhastathā lobhastasmādetatrayam tyajet || 16-21 ||

tri vidham: threefold; narakasya: of hellish life; idam: this; dvaram: the gate; nasanam: of destruction; atmanah: of the self; kamah: lust; krodhah: rage; tatha: and also; lobhah: greed; tasmāt: therefore; etat: these; trayam: three; tyajet: one should abandon.

"The threefold gate to hellish life and to self-destruction consists of the mixture of lust, greed and anger. Therefore one should abandon these three.

The mixture of lust and anger (or attachment, or greed) is an explosive one, as Krishna has already explained in several verses:

kama esa krodha esa rajo guna samudbhavah, mahasano maha papma viddhy enam iha vairinam "This power is a mixture of desire and anger, and it is born from the quality of passion. Know that it is all-devouring, the cause of great sins, and the greatest enemy in this world." (3.37), avritam jnanam etena jnanino nitya vairina, kama rupena kaunteya duspurenanalena ca, "O Arjuna, this mixture of lust and anger can cover even the knowledge of wise persons. It is the perpetual enemy, the all-consuming fire" (3.39), saknotihaina yab sodhum prak sarira vimoksanat, kama krodhodbhavam vegam sa yuktab sa sukhi narah, "One who becomes capable of withstanding the onslaughts of this lust and anger before leaving the body is a yogi and a happy human being" (5.23), kama krodha vimuktanam yatinam yata cetasam, abhito brahma nirvanam vartate viditatmanam, "The saintly persons who are completely free from lust and anger and have their consciousness steadily fixed in Brahman, who have realized the Self: for them there is brahma nirvana very soon" (5.26), balam balavatam cabam kama raga vivarjitam, dharmaviruddho bhutesu kamo 'smi bharatarsabha, "O Arjuna, I am the strength of the strong who is free from selfishness and attachment. In all beings, I am desire that is not contrary to dharmā" (7.11), asa pasa satair baddbah kama krodha parayanah, ihante kama bhogartham anyayenartha sancayan, "Bound by hundreds of ropes in the form of desires, always immersed in lust and anger, they desire to increase their desires and for that purpose they adopt any means to accumulate wealth" (16.12),

abankaram balam darpam kamam krodham ca samsritah, mam atma para debesu pradvisanto 'bhyasnyakah, "Taking shelter in abankara, physical strength, arrogance, lust and anger, they show envy and hatred against me, as I reside in their own bodies and in the bodies of others" (16.18), asastra vibhitam ghoram tapyante ye tapo janah, dambhabankara samyuktab kama raga balanvitah, "These people engage in terrible/ horrible austerities, not prescribed by shastra, and remain immersed in hypocrisy and egotism, under the sway of lust and attachment" (17.5), abankaram balam darpam kamam krodham parigraham, vimucya nirmamah santo brahma bhuyaya kalpate, "One who has become completely free from abankara and mamatva, from the sense of material strength, pride, lust, anger and greed, and is peaceful, focuses his desires towards Brahman" (18.53).

We can give up these characteristics of tamas by using rajas to climb our way up to sattva. In other words, one can engage rajas in the service of dharmā through the system of varnas and ashramas as it will be explained further in the last chapters of Bhagavad gita, and remain detached and free from abankara and mamatva. The process may be long and difficult, but it is the only solution.

It is also important to understand that the concept of naraka is different from the abrahamic concept of hell. Naraka is a subtle dimension (known in Vajrayana buddhism as bardo) where asuric conditioned souls, who committed violent acts against innocent and harmless creatures, remain for a period between two lifetimes, immersed in a sort of horrible nightmare that runs on their habitual fears and guilt. At some point in time, the confused soul who has become softened and purified by this experience is "fished out" and directed towards a new birth. On the other hand, abrahamic ideologies consider hell as a real and definitive place, where the unfortunate people who have failed to totally obey and please God and his priests are horribly tortured for all eternity, without any hope of redemption. The solution recommended by Krishna is very simple: just drop the asuric luggage of material identifications and attachments, renouncing the greedy lust and the hateful anger. This is already sufficient in itself to break the shackles of tamas and asuric nature.

एतैर्विमुक्तः कौन्तेय तमोद्वारैस्त्रिभिर्नरः ।

आचरत्यात्मनः श्रेयस्ततो याति परां गतिम् ॥ १६-२२ ॥

etairvimuktaḥ kaunteya tamodvāraistribhīrṇarāḥ | ācaratyaātmanah śreyastato yāti parāṁ gatim || 16-22 ||

etaib: from these; vimuktaḥ: completely liberated; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; tamab dvāraib: from the gates of ignorance; tribhīb: the three; narab: a human being; acarati: performs; ātmanah: for the self; śreyab: the benefit; tataḥ: then; yati: s/he goes; param gatim: to the supreme destination.

"O son of Kunti, a human being who becomes completely free from this threefold gateway to tamas is really acting for his own benefit/ is engaged in the transcendental activities, and attains the supreme destination.

By avoiding ignorance (tamas), one automatically remains free from lust, anger and greed (kama, krodha, lobha). Desire will always be there, because desire is a natural tendency of the soul who wants to engage in union with the supreme eternity, consciousness and happiness (sat, cit, ananda), but under the influence of sattva or visuddha sattva such desire is liberating and elevating the consciousness. Under the influence of rajas, desire ties the conditioned soul to endless activities, that can be directed either to elevation or degradation. When rajas is touched by tamas, it generates greed and desire (kama) becomes lust. Since lust can never be appeased by selfish sense enjoyment, like a fire cannot be extinguished by dousing it with oil, the feeling of frustration creates anger (krodha), and anger causes the loss of memory: kamat krodho 'bhijayate (2.62), krodhad bhavati sammohah sammohat smṛti vibhramah, smṛti bhramasā buddhiḥ nasat (2.63), "anger is born from (frustrated) lust, then anger becomes confusion, and confusion becomes failing memory. Because of the loss of memory, intelligence is lost, and when intelligence is lost, one falls from his position."

Because it is impossible to become totally free from all trace of desire, the solution recommended by Krishna is to remain detached and to soberly accept the pleasant and unpleasant things that life brings: raga dvesa vimuktais tu viśayan indriyaiḥ caran, ātma vasyair vidheyatma prasadam adbhigacchati, "A person who has become free from the attraction and repulsion for the objects of the senses, maintains the control of himself in his actions and regulates himself (in body, mind and senses) obtains the blessing (of the Lord)" (2.64).

The rules prescribed by Vedic civilization are meant for gradual purification of the conditioned souls, and must be applied scientifically after careful observation of the actual position of the individual in regard to guna and karma. This is why the distortion caused by birth prejudice creating the degraded caste system is so detrimental to the progress of the individual and society at large: because people are forced into duties and positions that are not suitable to their real nature, and there is no progress. We will see this point in greater detail later in chapter 18.

The expression acarati ātmana śreya ("acts for his own benefit") is in direct contraposition to nasta ātmanah ("destroying the self") found in verse 16.9. Krishna had already said very clearly that one should be one's own best friend, and not act as one's own enemy: uddhared ātmanatmanam natmanam avasadayet, atmaiva hy ātmano bandhur atmaiva ripur ātmanah, "One should raise him/ herself by his/ her own effort, and not degrade him/ herself. Certainly one should be one's own friend, and one can be one's own enemy as well" (6.5). As the word ātma can be applied at several levels according to the individual consciousness to one's identity as body, mind or soul, the benefit indicated in this verse covers all the aspects of the being. Of course the highest and truest benefit of the self is the realization of spiritual life.

When we make efforts to convince people to stop harming innocent and harmless creatures, and to give up their asuric tendencies, beliefs and behaviors, we are actually thinking more about the benefit of the criminals rather than the benefit of their victims. Of course we are also concerned about the sufferings of the innocent and harmless creatures, but we know that such sufferings have already fructified on the manifested level, and are more difficult to dispel. It is much easier and effective to prevent the creation of further bad results (ugra karma) by stopping the criminal before he can commit more damage.

The Sanskrit word karma stems from the root kr, which means, "to do", "to take action". Therefore it means "action". In a wider sense, it is also used to indicate "reaction" and "connection between action and reaction". These three are actually very strictly connected: according to the universal laws, each action is followed by an equal reaction in the opposite direction. What we saw, we reap. Karma can be compared to agricultural products: the plant that has already sprouted from the seed, but has not produced fruits yet is called sambhita, which means "accumulated". It refers to the causal body or karmic body that contains all the karmic reactions; they are also called kuta ("established"). They can be destroyed quickly by spiritual knowledge, and more slowly and with more difficulty, by prayascitta ("atonement") and punya ("meritorious actions").

The fruits of the fully grown plant are called prarabdha. The definition refers to the reactions of activities of previous lifetimes, that have already fructified into the present material body, life circumstances, nature tendencies, etc. They cannot be avoided because they have already manifested; they must be tolerated and can be modified only partially by hard work. The seeds produced by the fruits are called varṭamana (or kriyamana, respectively "present" and "which are being created"). The definition refers to the reactions to the activities that we are performing now, in this present lifetime, and that have not developed yet. And maybe will not develop at all, if we "roast" them through the process of bhakti and vidya. The karmic seeds can be destroyed very easily, because each day we can change our choices, and habits formed recently can be changed quickly. The agami karma consists of that sanchita karma that has not manifested yet in the form of fruits, but is going to (phalonmukha "towards fructifying") in the near future. Actually there is no injustice, nothing happens "by chance": life and destiny follow a scientific law of perfect justice which, once we understand it, will help us get free from all ties and even to close the karmic account once and for all. In fact, the proper understanding of the laws of karma and reincarnation give the greatest power to the individual on his/ her own life, facilitating a sense of responsibility and a greater awareness about the consequences of each action we are contemplating.

यः शास्त्रविधिमुत्सृज्य वर्तते कामकारतः । न स सिद्धिमवाप्नोति न सुखं न परां गतिम् ॥ १६-२३ ॥

yaḥ śāstravidhimutsṛjya vartate kāmakārataḥ | na sa siddhimavāpnōti na sukhaṁ na parāṁ gatim | | 16-23 | |

yah: one who; sastra vidhim: the knowledge of the shastra; utsṛjya: abandoning; vartate: goes; kama karataḥ: acting out of lust; na: not; sah: s/he; siddhim: perfection; avapnoti: will obtain; na: not; sukham: happiness; na: not; param gatim: the supreme destination.

"One who neglects the knowledge of the scriptures and takes up actions based on whimsical desires will not attain perfection, happiness, or the supreme destination."

This verse again highlights the absolute importance of genuine knowledge, that is detailed scientifically and practically in the original scriptures (shastra vidhi).

The word utsṛjya means "neglecting, giving up, ignoring, disregarding", indicating a deliberate choice. The arrogant and egotistic asuras believe they are on a perfect position, above the study of the scriptures, and believe that their own foolish and ignorant opinion is at least as much as valid - if not more valid - than the original teachings of the rishis and acharyas who compiled the sruti and smṛiti. Therefore they create new methods and systems and mantras and worship rituals, based on their own whimsical desires or the whimsical desires of other conditioned souls, neglecting the actual purpose of Vedic knowledge, and they hope they will be able to attain perfect results, although on the subconscious level they are afraid to be faced with teachings that condemn their adharmic activities. We should be careful not to misunderstand this point, because there is a deep difference between Vedic tradition and the abrahamic ideologies, known as historically revealed religions and based on specific scriptural texts that are considered the evidence for their own truth and value. Especially in the hands of asuric persons, such "historical" scriptural texts can be considerably manipulated, if not fabricated altogether, and used to deny the fundamental importance of intelligence, ethical conscience and personal experience.

Even within the Indian cultural and historical sphere, ancient written texts have sometimes been misappropriated and tampered, if not forged, with asuric intentions, but Vedic tradition has a wonderful advantage over other ideologies, because it does not depend solely on some written documents. The tradition of Vedic knowledge is transmitted at a subtler level (śabda brahman) and is put into writing cyclically in various ages and according to the time, place and circumstances in which it is presented, so that the people will be able to understand it. Veda (knowledge itself) is eternal and cannot be destroyed by burning libraries, because it is inspired again and again at every creation in the hearts of the rishis ("those who directly see reality").

This is the reason why Vedic knowledge and realization must be disseminated as much as possible, so that the proper understanding of the principles of dharma and vidya will be carried and preserved in the living hearts of the self-realized souls. The Rig Veda (9.63.5) clearly orders: krinvanto visva ariyam, "Let us make everybody an arya". The word visva is uncompromising, indicating that genuine Vedic knowledge is a birthright of all human beings, irrespective of the particular circumstances of their birth - and this universality is the key for the success of the entire mankind. When only a small number of "high caste" Indians have access to the study and practice of Vedic knowledge, the danger of degradation and loss increases exponentially, and adharmic forces will certainly take advantage of the situation, as it has been amply demonstrated in the history of the Indian subcontinent. But when such knowledge is made available to a greater number of people and at global level, it will reverberate stronger and stronger, and raise the general consciousness in India, too: this has also been demonstrated by the Hindu resurgence that started to develop after the 1970s.

This mission of spreading arya consciousness cannot be conducted without the knowledge of the scriptures, because the shastra pramana (scriptural evidence) is required to support the teachings of the guru and the direct realization or experience of the sadhu, the good person who is engaged in the spiritual sadbhava. A sadhu - what to speak of a guru - must be the incarnations of Vedic knowledge, both dharma and vidya, so the general people must have some parameters to recognize a genuine teacher from an asuric speculator.

Vedic knowledge is not based on mere faith (śraddha), although it is a fact that sufficient faith is required initially in order to actually start practicing the method in the proper scientific way. The process is called "self realization" (atma darśhana) or direct verification of "self knowledge" (atma vidya), therefore it needs to be applied individually in practice (vijnana) and not in theory only. This is the reason why the scriptural knowledge must be received from a realized soul (tattva darsi, 4.34), if possible from more than one, because mere words cannot actually convey its full meaning, and observation from a number of different perspectives can really help. A genuinely realized soul will be able to facilitate the student to actually experience the transcendental knowledge for him/ her self, and thus become realized in turn.

When a person has established him/her self on the level of genuine transcendental realization, and this realization can be practically observed in his/ her behavior (2.54), then only the meaning of the scriptural descriptions becomes clear and consistent, and one is able to see the difference between apparent contradictions (that can be reconciled in a greater picture) and actual inconsistencies (that expose manipulation or forgery). This means that individual realization is more important than the manuscripts that are historically available to us, and that might have been tampered with.

So whenever we find texts presented as Vedic, where the fundamental principles of dharma and vidya are disregarded or opposed, we know that they have been forged or tampered with. No genuine shastra will give teachings or orders that go against compassion, honesty, selflessness, personal evolution, the search for knowledge, liberation from conditionings, spiritual realization, universality of consciousness and life, the necessity to overcome material identifications and attachments, the importance of understanding the universe and the gunas, and the difference between divine and asuric characteristics.

When we speak about Vedic scriptures we refer not to the palm leaves or any other physical support or medium on which words have been written, but to these eternal and universal truths that were transmitted from rishi to disciple since the dawn of time. The word rishi literally means "seer", and refers to the fact that the compilers of the Vedic texts contemplated Knowledge through a direct act of perception and personal experience, just like Arjuna has seen the Virata Rupa in chapter 11.

It is not simply some theoretical stories or folk lore or record of ancient facts, but it is a genuine revelation of the nature of reality, that is achieved individually by all the sincere students of Vedic knowledge - a fundamental paradigm shift that is called illumination or enlightenment or awakening. After that point, one cannot simply go back to sleep, because his/ her perception of reality has become extremely clear and cannot be confused by anyone or anything. This experience is explained at the beginning of Bhagavad gita: yada te moha kalilam buddhir vyatitarisyati, tada gantasi nirvedam srotaryasya srutasya ca, "When this understanding will lead you out of the dense swamp of illusion, you will come to a point where you will be indifferent to whatever has been heard or will remain to be heard" (2.52).

The knowledge contained in Vedic scriptures is not "religious" in the abrahamic sense; it does not present dogma (articles or faith) or give orders to be followed, but it explains how the universe works, at the material and at the spiritual level, and it encourages all students to experiment and verify the theory by putting it into practice. Therefore it is scientific in nature. On the contrary, abrahamic scriptures are considered an absolute authority in itself even when their contents blatantly contradict the universal and scientific experience and verification, therefore abrahamic ideologies are sworn enemies of science and personal research. The word "heretic", for example, literally means "one who chooses what to believe", or in other words, one who wants to personally verify the merit of the statements given in the scriptures or by the religious leaders, because s/he does not give value to blind faith. Since the entire abrahamic ideology is built on the covenant or pact of allegiance and obedience over any other consideration, the use of intelligence and free will is condemned by abrahamic just like the respect for ethical values and for one's conscience. This is certainly not the case with Vedic knowledge. Krishna will say at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita (18.63): iti te jnanam akhyatam gubhyad gubhyataram maya, vimrshayatad asesena yathecchasi tatha kuru, "I have explained to you this secret knowledge; now think about it and then do whatever you like".

From all this, we can better understand what Krishna is saying in this verse. He is not condemning free thinking and scientific questioning, but rather he is speaking about asuras (persons who do not care for ethical considerations) deliberately and stubbornly neglecting or rejecting a priori the knowledge contained in the genuine scriptures because it contradicts their personal whimsical plans, selfish interests and desires (kama karatah).

Also, we should notice that Krishna does not say that one who neglects the authority of the shastra is cursed or should be punished. He is simply saying that such person will not achieve perfection, happiness or the supreme destination. In Vedic tradition, a person who does not recognize the authority of Vedic scripture is called a nastika (agnostic) and three of such nastika darshanas are considered traditional perspectives - Buddhism, Jainism and Charvaka's materialism. As long as such darshanas are not in violation of the universal and eternal principles of dharma and vidya they are not in opposition to Vedic knowledge, and they are respected in the spirit of plurality of perspectives. If the contents is good, the package is not so important.

तस्माच्छास्त्रं प्रमाणं ते कार्याकार्यव्यवस्थितौ । ज्ञात्वा शास्त्रविधानोक्तं कर्म कर्तुमिहार्हसि ॥ १६-२४ ॥

tasmaच्छāstram pramāṇam te kāryākāryavyavasthitau | jñātvā śāstravidhānoktaṁ karma kartumihārhasi || 16-24 ||

tasmat: therefore; sastram: the scriptures; pramanam: the evidence/ authority; te: your; karya: of what must be done; akarya: of what must not be done; vyavasthitau: in determining; jnatva: knowing; sastra vidhana: the instructions of the scriptures; uktam: (as they are) explained; karma kartum: to perform activities/ duties; iha: in this world; arhasi: you should.

"Therefore you should perform your activities in this world according to the directions offered by the shastra about determining one's duty.

Vedic scriptures cover both the material and the spiritual knowledge that is required to work and live in this world and achieve success (siddhi) and happiness (sukha) as mentioned in the previous verse. This progressive path of human evolution is summarized by the four purusha arthas or purposes of human life, described as dharma, artha, kama and moksha (see for example Bhagavata Purana 4.8.41).

This verse is introducing the contents of the next two chapters, elaborating more about the three gunas and how they determine the qualities and tendencies and therefore the duties of each category of human beings. The expression karma kartum arhasi mean "you should do your duty", indicating that the most important thing to progress in life consists in performing one's duty according to guna and karma, by making an effort to attain one's full potential. This is the process that we follow in any school:

each student is examined to ascertain the difference between his development and his potential, and is trained to overcome his shortcomings and defects until he is fully qualified.

All human beings are naturally endowed with some qualities and tendencies due to previous karma and association with gunas; in all societies we have intellectuals, warriors, merchants and craftspeople, but Vedic society is different because it prescribes a strict training so each individual will become able to perform his duties perfectly. Without such knowledge and training, the human potential will be wasted and lost, damaging both the individual and society. Intellectuals will be pushed into serving materialistic and degraded rulers, and will be forced to re-discover scientific truths about physics and metaphysics empirically by themselves, a bit at a time, with the danger of mistaking hallucinations for visions and losing track of the importance of ethical principles and conscience. Warriors and kings will be confused by the influence of rajas and fall slaves to their own senses and minds or to adulation and manipulation by clever courtiers, forgetting the well being and protection of the prajas and blindly pursuing material conquests and acquisitions out of mere egotism.

Entrepreneurs will become greedy and miserly, accumulate wealth without sharing it with the rest of society, and inevitably come to the point where such material clout will delude them into believing that they are the lords and masters of the world - thus becoming full fledged asuras, as we can see very clearly today. Sudras will be abandoned to their own devices and will become selfish, arrogant, and violent as only sudras can be, and will provide useful mobs ready to be manipulated and exploited. The influence of tamas generated by their beliefs, behaviors and choices will grow exponentially because of their sheer numbers and contaminate the other classes too with the asuric mentality, so that the entire society will become hellish.

All this can be avoided and mended simply by the genuine knowledge of dharmā and vidyā contained in the original Vedic scriptures, that scientifically explain the cause and effect mechanism (16.8). By understanding this knowledge and using intelligence (buddhi), human beings can realize what should be done and what should not be done (karya akarya, karma kartum) and become free from the foolishness created by lust, greed and anger. This is the meaning of becoming arya, "civilized people". The next two chapters will further elaborate on this essential point.

The word vyavasthita means "discussion, debate", as well as "treatise, commentary" and can be applied to the modern definition of "publication", as it refers to the theoretical and practical study of the instructions contained in the scriptures (shastra pramana). Our only purpose in life is to help people to know, understand and apply the genuine original knowledge of the shastra, and we do not care much if some asuras or confused people accuse us of being their enemies because of that.

There is a fundamental difference between the Vedic approach and the mainstream academic approach created in the last few centuries by adharmic forces and ideologies. We will find that Vedic scriptures are also studied in the various "Indology" departments of prestigious non-Vedic universities around the world, but the purpose and conclusions are certainly different.

It was pope Onorius IV (1286-1287) who inaugurated in the West the study of oriental languages - not to learn from them about better ideas, but to understand how to fight against the opponents and competitors (enemies) of the Church. The Ecumenic Council of Wien (1311-1312) recognized the importance of Onorius' strategy and encouraged the creation of suitable departments in all the other European universities. Its motivation and inspiration has always been about "learning knowledge to oppose knowledge", or in other words, controlling and manipulating the search for knowledge, and using it for political purposes. With the Protestant reformation started by Martin Luther in 1520, a vast region of Europe rebelled against the power of the Church of Rome but continued to oppose Vedic knowledge - dharmā and vidyā - as it was not in accordance with the Christian doctrine and in fact came to be considered as "the last and the most subtle and powerful foe of Christianity" (in the words of evangelist A.H. Bowman).

All the academic constructions studied and expanded under the "Indology departments" of mainstream universities are in pursuance of the work of colonial scholars, whose declared aim was to deliberately destroy Vedic knowledge with bad and biased translations and presentations. Sir Monier-Williams (1819-1899, author of the most famous and still popularly used Sanskrit/English dictionary), wrote, "For what purpose then has this enormous territory been committed to England? Not to be the 'corpus vile' of political, social, or military experiments; not for benefit of our commerce, or the increase of our wealth - but that every man, woman and child, from Cape Comorin to the Himalaya mountains, may be elevated, enlightened, Christianized... When the walls of the mighty fortress of Brahmanism are encircled, undermined, and finally stormed by the soldiers of the cross, the victory of Christianity must be signal and complete."

Indian academia has been built on the same foundations. The famous Scottish Churches College was envisioned by its founder missionary Alexander Duff (1806-1878) as a "headquarters for a great campaign against Hinduism." All educated "high caste" Hindus have studied in expensive Christian academic Institutes, beginning with those dedicated to the "saint" Xavier. We should not be surprised if the students of such schools have developed a maimed, distorted and depraved vision of Vedic knowledge.

Let it be clear to one and all: the study of the Vedic scriptures must be conducted in the proper manner as instructed by Vedic scriptures themselves, according to the yama and niyama method and from a genuinely realized guru who clearly demonstrates by example and precept that he has overcome ahankara and mamatva, otherwise there will be no proper result - no perfection, no happiness and no attainment of the supreme destination. Only further delusion and development of asuric characteristics and degradation.

Chapter 17

Sraddha traya vibhaga yoga

The yoga of differentiating between the three forms of faith

Krishna continues here to dispel the wrong and dangerous notion according to which "all religions are the same". This problem is particularly acute in India, where the concept of secularism is not the usual idea of "separation of Church and State", but an attempt by the State to embrace all religions, with special facilities and favors shown to "minority religions", which in practice means abrahamic ideologies, that are intrinsically adharmic. This faulty approach causes the State to become "beyond dharma" (dharma nirapekshita) rather than beyond the various types of religious faith (sraddha) or lineages (sampradaya), institutions or groups (matha).

We have already elaborated on the subject of "sarva dharma sama bhava" in the introduction to the previous chapter (16), and we will see the subject even more elaborately in this chapter. Obviously Krishna considers it very important, as he is talking about it in such details and at the conclusion of Bhagavad gita, indicating that its knowledge is more advanced and final than the teachings he had offered in the previous chapters. Why?

Because it enables us to actually put theory into practice and change our lives by making the proper choices, at each moment. This is the real test of our understanding and realization of the transcendental science, and the foundation of viveka (discriminating intelligence) by which we can distinguish divine personalities from asuric personalities, beyond any clever disguise or propaganda they may utilize.

Verification through scriptural evidence is extremely important (13.26, 15.20, 16.23-24, 17.5, 18.40). It supplies the precise guidelines and training in the development of knowledge and understanding that we need for our personal evolution, at least until we come to the point where we directly see (darshana) Reality (6.44) with our own intelligence and conscience. Such direct perception of Knowledge is perfectly within the possibilities of all human beings, but in the conditioned state, intelligence is covered by so many layers of ignorance and confusion that ordinary non-evolved persons remain unable to see anything, and may even perceive the opposite of reality, as a distorted reflection (18.32) that is upside down.

We should note that Krishna uses the definition "sraddha" rather than "dharma" to indicate the different religious practices of people. It is true that all manifestations of dharma have the same nature, because dharma is sanatana, the eternal and universal foundation of natural ethics. However, sraddha or faith is not necessarily in line with dharma, and in fact it can easily become opposed to dharma because of ignorance (18.32). The original concept of religion is certainly dharmic because it consists in the natural desire of the soul to know and connect with the Supreme, but the various opinions on how to fulfill such need can be very different. This is the foundation of the statement, ekam sad vipra babudha vadanti, "God is one but the learned call it with many names" (Rig Veda 1.164.46). The complete quote is as follows: indram mitram varunam agni rahu ratno divya sa suparno garutman, ekam sad vipra babudha vadanty agnim yamam matarisva nama abub, "He who is called Indra ("the glorious"), Mitra ("the friend"), Varuna ("the best"), Agni ("the worshipable"), Rahu ("the seizer"), Surya (ratno divya, "who travels in the celestial chariot") and Garuda the bird, is one eternal being, but the learned also call him as Yama ("the controller") and Matarisva ("the powerful blowing wind")."

The mistake in the equation is that the abrahamic ideologies do not support the conclusion of "all religions are the same", as each abrahamic faith makes a stark separation between itself as the absolute truth and all other faiths as false and diabolic, and therefore unacceptable. Thus abrahamics insist that only their God (that they call "the only true God" while the others are false) should be worshiped according to their particular rules, and nobody should be allowed to worship any other God (or any other form/ name of the one God).

The example of food and nourishment offered by Krishna in this chapter is perfect. Having religious feelings is like being hungry: all beings feel hunger and desire to find food, but not everyone will prefer to eat the same things, and some crazy people may even choose to eat toxic or poisonous stuff. The choice will be determined by knowledge (or lack thereof), as well as by the particular taste afforded by one's set of physical senses, and by the previous association with a guna or fundamental quality of nature - sattva, rajas or tamas. For this reason this chapter gives a detailed explanation on the different types of foods preferred by people controlled by each guna or feeling or emotion.

We should notice that guna and bhava ("perception, emotion, feeling, nature, sentiment") are strictly connected to each other. The influence of the three gunas is not subject mainly to logic or the conscious mind, but to emotion or the subconscious mind, because of the accumulation of the previous impressions and habits (samskaras and vasanas). So the nature (prakriti) of beings is indistinguishable from the gunas; not only on the material level, but even on the spiritual level, where the gunas are present in their original transcendental form (respectively as ananda, cit, sat).

It is said, de gustibus non disputandum (est), "one should not argue about personal tastes", and in fact this is perfectly true because discussion or logic or common sense do not have much power in convincing people to change their tastes, because tastes are based on feelings, emotions and nature. So the only way to change the situation for the better consists in discovering a better taste (2.59). To get there, we need to follow the method offered by the scriptures, under the guidance of those who are already realized (tattva darsis, 2.16, 4.34) and change our habits with a conscious effort of practice and detachment (abhyasa, 8.8, 12.9, 6.35).

It is said that habit is second nature, so we can understand that by consciously making choices in what to do and what not to do (16.7, 16.24, 18.30) we can take shelter in a different nature (sattva, rajas, or tamas), and then the new configuration of nature will carry out the actions, as explained in 13.21. In this 17th chapter, abhyasa is defined as sadhana (17.15), but to understand it better we can refer to verse 6.26 and especially in verses 18.37-39, as we will see in that purport.

The definition of religion we can find in the English dictionary is "the belief in a god or in a group of gods", "an organized system of beliefs, ceremonies, and rules used to worship a god or a group of gods", "an interest, a belief, or an activity that is very important to a person or group". By itself, religion has nothing to do with dharma and vidya, and therefore Vedic tradition cannot be defined simply as a religion. However, we should not deny Hinduism the legal definition of religion, because this would deprive the Hindu population of the right to religious freedom, officially recognized at international level as one of the most important human rights.

ये शास्त्रविधिमुत्सृज्य यजन्ते श्रद्धयान्विताः । तेषां निष्ठा तु का कृष्ण सत्त्वमाहो रजस्तमः ॥ १७-१ ॥

ye śāstravidhimutsrjya yajante śraddhayānvitāḥ । teṣāṃ niṣṭhā tu kā kṛṣṇa sattvamāho rajastamaḥ ॥ 17-1 ॥

arjunah: Arjuna; uvaca: said; ye: those who; sastra vidhim: the knowledge of the scriptures; utsrjya: abandoning; yajante: worship/perform sacrifices; śraddhaya: with sincere faith; anvitah: taking shelter; tesam: of them; nistha: the faith; tu: but; ka: what (is); kṛṣṇa: o Krishna; sattvam: sattva; aho: or; rajah: rajas; tamah: tamas.

Arjuna said, "Krishna, those who neglect the knowledge of the shastra but sincerely engage in rituals, taking shelter in them because of their faith, are they (to be considered) in sattva, rajas or tamas?"

Arjuna had already asked similar important questions in verses 2.54 (about the symptoms of a sthita prajna, a person established in knowledge) and 14.21 (about the symptoms of persons acting according to the different gunas).

The first point in the present verse (sastra vidhi utsrjya) mirrors the point presented in the last verses of the previous chapter: yah sastra vidhim utsrjya vartate kama karatah, na sa siddhim avapnoti na sukham na param gatim, tasmac chastram pramanam te karyakarya vyavasthitam, jnatva sastra vidhanoktam karma kartum ibarhasi, "One who discards the knowledge of the scriptures and takes up actions based on whimsical desire will not attain perfection, happiness, or the supreme destination. Therefore you should perform your activities in this world according to the directions offered by the shastra about determining one's duty." (16.23-24).

We therefore understand that the enlightened persons who are actually following the teachings of the shastra are not going to be described in the following verses according to their tendencies in sattva, rajas or tamas. What will be their faith then? It will be explained at the end of the chapter, in verses 17.23 to 17.28: those who know Brahman (and are therefore called brahmanas) have the knowledge of the Vedas (2.46) and transcend the level of the material gunas (2.45, 14.20, 14.25, 14.26). Such liberated souls worship Yajna, sacrifice itself, as the Soul of their souls (Paramatma) and as the Supreme Personality (Purushottama); they know that God is One, although he appears in many forms and names, and therefore they are not confused by the illusion of duality. This is indicated by the expression om tat sat, that refers to the union (yoga) of atman with brahman described in all the chapters of Bhagavad gita.

This was confirmed already in chapter 4: gata sangasya muktasya jnanavasthita cetasaḥ, yajnyacarataḥ karma samagram praviliyate, brahmarpanam brahma havir brahmagnau brahmana hutam, brahmaiva tena gantavyam brahma karma samadbina, "One who has finished with all association (with the material gunas) and whose consciousness is firmly established in knowledge, works in a spirit of sacrifice. The entirety of his karma is thus destroyed. The purpose of such actions is transcendental, the offerings are transcendental, the fire is transcendental, the act of offering is transcendental, the goal to be attained is transcendental, and the consciousness is transcendental" (4.23-24).

Faith is an important first step in one's development, but it is certainly not sufficient to achieve the supreme destination (param gatim). In Sanskrit, "faith" is defined as śraddha or nistha, where śraddha is the initial acceptance of a proposed hypothesis, that is required in order to engage in its verification, while nistha is the firm belief that develops after the verification has given the demonstration of the correctness of the hypothesis.

The stage of hypothesis is common to all forms of learning, so those people who do not recognize the universal value of truth may conclude that all beliefs - including whimsical unverified speculations and baseless fantasies - are equally valid. This particular perspective is called relativism, and it is condemned by abrahamic ideologies as well as by the Vedic tradition - but for very different reasons. Abrahamic ideologies reject relativism because they teach that their perspective is the only acceptable truth that excludes all others as falsities (asatyam, 16.8), while the Vedic tradition considers relativism simply an incomplete vision, that needs to be reconciled in the Greater Picture. Just like a piece of a jigsaw puzzle is real within itself, but it can make proper sense only when inserted in the correct position within the complete image, a relative truth that is not put in the correct perspective with everything else remains fragmented and could even be grossly misinterpreted by looking at it upside down.

What's more, relativism does not respect the universal and eternal value of the ethical principles or conscience we call dharmā. There can be many different ways of life, but we cannot have a criminal dharmā, because such a concept would be an oxymoron. Dharma is what supports the individual and society and the universe at large, so unnecessary violence, ignorance, and asuric conclusions and behaviors can never be called dharmā. One could argue that shastras are written from time to time in different presentations, according to desa (place), kala (time) and patra (recipients), and that we can only understand the shastra properly by the qualified guidance of a realized soul, the guru (4.34). However, the genuine guru does not invent new teachings that are different from those taught in the shastra, but simply presents the old teachings in a new package, that must ultimately be distinguished from the contents. Otherwise, we might find ourselves in the funny predicament of the disciples of that acharya who had listed "a basket for the cat" among the requirements for the puja in his ashrama.

This popular parable was repeated by several teachers in slightly different versions. One acharya established a temple in a village, but shortly afterwards he found that the area was infested by rats, so he decided to keep a cat within the ashrama premises to scare the rats away and avoid the damages that such pests usually cause. However, the cat was very curious about the worship rituals in the temple and at the times of arati he would sneak into the Deities' room and try to play with the puja articles. So the acharya instructed his disciples to put the cat in a closed basket just before the arati, and then release it when the worship was completed. After the acharya's death, the disciples continued the system and gradually forgot its purpose; at some point there was no cat in the ashrama but before each ritual the pujari went out around the village to catch a stray cat to put in the basket, because that item was written in the acharya's instructions.

trividhā bhavati śraddhā dehināṃ sā svabhāvajā । sāttvikī rājāsī caiva tāmasī ceti tāṃ śṛṇu ॥ 17-2 ॥

śrī bhagavan: the wonderful Lord; uvaca: said; tri vidha: of three types; bhavati: becomes; śraddha: faith; dehinam: of the embodied beings; sa: that; sva bhava ja: born from one's own nature; sattviki: sattvika; rajasi: rajasika; ca: and; eva: certainly; tamasi: tamasika; ca: and; iti: like this; tam: that; śṛṇu: listen.

The wonderful Lord said, "Embodied beings can develop faith of three types, according to their nature either in sattva, rajas and tamas. Listen, as I will explain to you.

It is said, "Sow a thought, reap an act; sow an act, reap a habit; sow a habit, reap a character; sow a character, reap a destiny". This is the mechanics of human nature: when we make the choice to contemplate something (2.62, 6.17, 6, 7.17, 8.6, 8.14, 14.23), we develop attachment and desire, and these shape our nature (sva bhava). In technical Sanskrit terms, a thought (as referred to in the above saying) is a vasana, and the ensuing action is called karma; in turn the reaction or consequence to the action goes to reinforce or modify the original vasana thereby creating a quality or characteristic or guna, and in turn the guna pushes us under the shelter of a particular prakriti or nature. Finally, prakriti carries out the action (3.5, 3.27, 3.29, 3.33, 9.10, 13.21, 13.30, 18.59).

As individual souls (jivatmas) we cannot individually control the prakriti and the gunas, but we can choose where to take shelter. We can make an example: a glider or a sailboat cannot change the direction of the wind, but it can regulate and manoeuvre itself in such a way as to "take shelter" of the proper wind and ride it. This is the reason why Mother Durga is depicted as riding the tiger or the lion as her vahana; both these animals are symbols of great power and strength, and not easily controllable, but once we ride them on the lap of Mother, we will be in the safest place possible. This was indicated in verse 9.13: mahatmanas tu mam partha daivim prakritim asritah, "The great souls take shelter in the divine nature".

The divine nature is the nature of God. We have seen, especially in chapters 11 and 15 that God is the Virata Rupa, or the form of the universe, and therefore serving the universe constitutes the meaning of dharmā - each one of us in our own specific capacity or sva dharmā. What is known as dharmā in human society is called ritam ("cosmic rule") at macrocosmic level, and includes all the natural laws that regulate the movements of the planets and stars and everything else. We, as spiritual cells in the spiritual body of God, constitute this divine prakriti (7.5, 9.8); we are atman and as such we are parts and parcels of brahman. Through this divine consciousness, we can attain the Supreme (13.35) and function perfectly in our own nature.

There is a supreme Intelligence and Consciousness (brahman) that guides and controls us (4.6, 9.8) and carries us through the process of evolution up to the highest perfection. All journeys begin with a first step. The first thing we need to do is to ascertain what is our present position, within the daivi or asuri prakriti, and in relationship to the gunas. Under the expert guidance of the guru and the scientific knowledge of the shastra, anyone can make progress - gradually but not necessarily slowly. But we can progress only when we have truly understood what is our present position in the Greater Picture, so that we can walk in the correct direction, and not simply wander around senselessly.

According to one's specific guna and karma, created by vasanas and samskaras, we can engage in the scientifically engineered duties and training that will enable us to move from the lower gunas to the highest and then to the transcendental level. Thus everything starts with understanding one's sva bhava or nature.

The next step from sva bhava is sva dharma, or the particular dharmic plan of activities (duties) that is engineered to carry us forward and upward in our individual evolution, for the benefit of the entire universe. This sva dharma is also called varnashrama dharma, because it contains all the various stages of individual sva dharmas as determined by the particular mixture of guna and karma of each human being, as we will see in chapter 18. Specifically, the varnas are planned scientifically in such a way that at each stage the individual is encouraged and supported in evolving from tamas to rajas to sattva and then to suddha sattva, the transcendental position of consciousness.

This knowledge is not destined only for those who are unevolved, because as long as we have a material body we will be subject to the power of the gunas: na tad asti prithiviam va divi devesu va punah, sattvam prakriti jair muktam yad ebbih syat tribhir gunaih, "There is not even one single person, either in this world or in the world of the Devas, who is free from the influence of the three gunas created by the prakriti" (18.40). Also, a jivatma can never have sufficient power to overcome the prakriti consisting of the gunas, unless he renounces duality and enters the supreme Consciousness: daivi hy esa guna mayi mama maya duratyaya, mam eva ye prapadyante mayam etam taranti te, "This divine energy of mine, manifesting as the three gunas, is very difficult to overcome but those who take shelter in me will cross over this illusion" (7.14).

One may neglect the knowledge of the shastra, but the laws of nature will continue to work. We will be subject to the law of gravity and the other mechanisms of physics even if we do not believe in them or we have no knowledge about them; the same applies to the law of karma, to the transmigration of souls (reincarnation) and to the play of the three gunas of material prakriti. Someone who is under the influence of sattva guna will make sattvic choices applying the characteristic tendencies of sattva out of his own nature.

To situate oneself in sattva, one simply needs to eat sattvic food, practice sattvic habits in the activities of body and mind, and value sattvic qualities. This is totally scientific and can be observed by anyone in any place, time and circumstance, in any individual and any culture; we do not need to believe or even to know what is taught in shastra. We just need to listen to our conscience - to ethical sense, healthy mind, common sense, decency, sincerity... in one word, to goodness.

This natural knowledge is contained by birth in the hearts of all human beings, because the supreme Soul naturally resides in everyone - those who believe and those who do not believe. When we say that Vedic scriptures present God as satya and dharma, we do not mean that we believe that there is one very powerful individual who demands to be worshiped as the supreme Truth and Ethics. Rather, it means that we honor and recognize Truth and Ethics as God, as the sum total of all existence and consciousness. We include all beings in this divine truth, and therefore we engage in the service of all beings and existences through the expansion of our consciousness, by removing the enclosing walls of duality and separation.

सत्त्वानुरूपा सर्वस्य श्रद्धा भवति भारत । श्रद्धामयोऽयं पुरुषो यो यच्छ्रद्धः स एव सः ॥ १७-३ ॥

sattvānurūpā sarvasya śraddhā bhavati bhārata । śraddhāmayo'yaṁ puruṣo yo yacchradhah sa eva saḥ ॥ 17-3 ॥

sattva anurupa: according to the existence; sarvasya: of all; śraddha: faith; bhavati: becomes; bharata: o descendant of Bharata; śraddha mayah: made of that faith; ayam: this; purusah: the purusha; yah: who; yat: which; śraddhab: faith; saḥ: s/he; eva: certainly; saḥ: s/he.

"O descendant of Bharata, everyone develops faith according to their (particular) way of life. Each purusha is categorized according to such type of faith.

Faith is something that we develop gradually, through experience, impressions, and especially training and education. Śraddha, or the initial form of faith, comes from sattva, that is the foundation of the mind or subtle body, also called linga sarira.

All the various perspectives of Vedic knowledge study the anatomy and the mechanics of the subtle body and explain exactly how to use it. The purusha is the atman (the soul), that can wear either a male or female body, or even a neuter or androgynous body, and is characterized by consciousness and feelings. It is transcendental to all material elements, including the subtle elements that surround it. This purusha is also known as cit ("consciousness"), kṣhetrajña ("knower of the field"), dṛishṭa ("the observer"), sakshi ("the witness"), and kutastha ("the immovable"). At macrocosmic (samasthi, or para) level as related to the microcosmic level (vyasthi or apara), the Purusha is the Purushottama, the manifested form of Consciousness called Brahman.

Initially, the microcosmic purusha is "turned inwards" (antarmukha) and it is conscious of a good desire or aspiration directed towards its source in service and happiness (vimoka). Such transcendental feelings reverberate Isvara's own feelings, and include compassion (daya), non-violence (ahimsa), desiring the good of others (kalyana), and contentment (anavasada). When such desire becomes distracted and turns outwards (bahirmukha), the purusha projects its attention towards material nature, where the pradhana is activated by Time through a movement of the gunas. This movement (vr̥tti) is compared to a wave in a pond, that makes ripples and confuses the vision of the clear surface, creating superimposition (adhyasa) in the form of abankara, of separate identification of the ego as the subject and beneficiary of action, also called cid abhasa ("reflection of consciousness"). At this point the atman "starts to live" in this world and is therefore called jivatman. The jiva's desires are still good (sat), but coming in contact with rajas it develops a separate interest and an impetus for action (kriya); to keep this tendency from degrading further, one should engage discernment (viveka), simplicity (arjavam), generosity (dana) and a conscious effort (abhyasa).

The material power of concentration of the purusha is called citta, and it is compared to the light of the sun reflected on the water. When directed towards the paramatma, citta is usually called chaitanya or the consciousness function of the atman. For everyone, however, citta is the power of memory, stored into the karana sarira (causal body) and known by western psychology as the subconscious. It contains the imprint of all the impressions of all the previous lifetimes; it is already influenced by the three gunas and can be directed through sadhana, constant practice and detachment. In this work, if we analyze its tendencies and acknowledge its messages, we can get clues on how to address the problems that need to be solved - especially the karmic debts, trauma and attachments that still influence our behaviors, obstructing our evolution.

The karana sarira (causal body, also called karmasaya) further develops functions in order to act in the material world, and their aggregate is called linga sarira (subtle body). Sometimes these functions overlap, and therefore the definitions can include more than one meaning, but in general it is understood that buddhi (intelligence, the faculty of understanding) is the function that is largely powered by sattva guna and can raise and purify our consciousness.

In contact with rajas and tamas, buddhi becomes the "internal cause" (antah karana) of interaction with the material elements of the universe. In this regard, it is interesting to note that for this antah karana there is little difference between the perception of the external objects and the perception of the internal objects such as memories, thoughts and emotions. Generally, this antah karana is described as the "aggregate of the internal senses", that include the mind, the five senses of perception and the five senses of action. The contact with sense objects (internal or external) belonging to sattva, rajas or tamas creates impressions and therefore modifies the nature of the consciousness.

These functions of modification include consideration of the consequences of action (sankalpa and vikalpa), reflection (cinta), decision (adhyasaya, niscaya), egotism (abhimana, garva), memory (smarana) and perception (samsparsha). These will be analyzed in this concluding section of Bhagavad gita specifically in regard to the action according to the gunas.

Since the cosmic mind is called Hiranyagarbha (the "Golden Egg", or "Golden Fetus", the Purusha avatara that is the origin of Brahma the creator), we can understand that at the microcosmic level, this is the beginning of the development of the gross body or sthula sarira, through the process called anurupa ("following the form").

यजन्ते सात्त्विका देवान्यक्षरक्षांसि राजसाः । प्रेतान्भूतगणांश्चान्ये यजन्ते तामसा जनाः ॥ १७-४ ॥

yajante sattvikā devānyakṣarakṣāṁsi rajasāḥ । pretānbhūtagaṇāṁścānye yajante tāmasā janāḥ ॥ 17-4 ॥

yajante: they worship; sattvikah: those who are in sattva; devan: the Personalities of God; yakṣa: the yakshas; rakṣasāṁsi: (and) the rakshasas; rajasāḥ: those who are in rajas; pretan: the ghosts; bhūta gaṇan: the various types of beings; ca: and; anye: others; yajante: offer sacrifices; tamasā janah: people who are in tamas.

"Those who are sattvic worship the Personalities of God, those who are in rajas worship the rakshasas and the yakshas, and those who are in tamas offer sacrifices to ghosts and other types of lower beings.

We have already mentioned that transcendently realized souls, who follow the purpose of the shastra, worship the One Reality of atman/ brahman, also called om tat sat. This aryakṛta ("non manifested") Narayana becomes manifest in this universe in all the various forms that are categorized according the three gunas - directly in the dimension of sattva, and indirectly in the dimensions of rajas and tamas. These manifestations can be perceived even without shastric knowledge.

The sattvic manifestation of God in this world consists of the many Personalities of the supreme Consciousness, called Devas - the supporters of the universe, who incarnate the functions of existence. Some even say that the total number of such aspects of God amounts to 33 millions (because the universal Godhead has innumerable forms perceived by different types of people), but we should not imagine that one is expected to worship all of them separately, because they are simply different aspects of the same Person. We can make the example of some important person in human society, who has several roles in his family, community, professional milieu and so on. So according to the functions he performs, this one man will have different names, different aspects and different activities; he will be called "daddy", "grampa", "brother", "son", "husband", "doctor", "professor", "sir", "or even "darling", or with his first name, family name, nickname, titles and so on. His apparel will also be different whether he goes to the surgery room, or to a formal dinner, outside gardening, to a children's party, for a swim, and so on. Yet, he is always the same person.

In a similar way, the supreme Consciousness we call God manifests in many forms and with many names - in a much greater measure compared to an ordinary embodied soul, who has serious limitations. The Devas are not mere abstractions or psychological archetypes or symbolic representations of the powers of nature; they are certainly not fantasy characters or mythological figures, or even ordinary jivatmas as some people believe. We have discussed this topic already in commenting other verses, because the Devas are mentioned many times (3.11, 3.12, 4.12, 4.25, 7.20, 7.23, 9.20, 9.23, 9.25, 10.2, 10.14, 11.11, 11.15, 11.22, 11.31). This unity of all the Devas as Personalities of the same Godhead is confirmed in a famous passage of Bṛihad aranyaka Upanishad (3.9.1-9) that narrates the conversation between Yajnavalkya Rishi and Vidagdha the son of Sakala, who had asked him about the number of the Devas. Yajnavalkya gave a series of answers, all perfectly valid, and the last and final conclusion indicated the One supreme Reality.

The sattvic worship of the Devas, that is recommended by Krishna in Bhagavad gita for all those who are engaged in regular duties in society, includes both the saumya and asaumya forms ("sweet" and "harsh"), the bhadra and the ugra ("benevolent" and "terrifying") of the Personalities of God. For example, Mother Kali, Bhairava, Narasimha, are each portrayed in both aspects, according to the particular sentiment they manifest.

Those who sincerely worship the ugra forms of the Devas are therefore established on the level of sattva, not of rajas or tamas, and they can further develop by studying and practicing the instructions of the shastra called Tantras or Agamas. There are vaishnava Tantras, shaiva Tantras, and shakta Tantras, and they are all the basis for the correct ritual worship, that will gradually bring the devotee to the realization of the Supreme Transcendence.

Some people (usually presenting themselves as vaishnavas) argue that the pancha upasana, the worship of the five main Personalities of God (Vishnu, Shiva, Durga, Surya and Ganesha) is "impersonalist", because this practice is not presenting a monotheistic vision of God that is typical of abrahamic ideologies. These people believe that God must be one, and if we worship more than one form of God we automatically reject the existence of the supreme Person. However, this is a foolish position.

Vishnu himself, that is recognized by all Vedic scriptures and specifically by Bhagavad gita as the sum total of all Personalities of God, has many forms - some of which appear dramatically different from each other. Who is then the "only real God" for vaishnavas? Can a vaishnava worship Krishna exclusively and neglect the worship of Vishnu in his various avatars? Why should he call himself a vaishnava then?

And how can there be an impersonal form? The very definition of form is personal par excellence - it goes with name, qualities, activities, entourage and so on, and no functioning brain can consider it impersonal. The confusion can only come from a materialistic mentality that sees material differences between the various forms of God, and therefore tries to impose limits on God. On the other hand, there are several people blinded by tamas who believe they are Tantrics and are worshipping ugra forms of Bhairavi and Bhairava, but in fact their worship is channeled towards the ganas or servants of Shakti and Shiva. This is particularly true when the rituals are trying to "control" or "use" the object of worship, in order to obtain selfish material advantages, often with the intention of harming other people. No jivatman can ever control any Personality of God (except through bhakti, of course) because the power of God is immensely superior to the power of the tiny human beings. Out of their kindness, Bhairava and Bhairavi may allow the foolish worshiper to interact with a gana who represents them, and who accepts the offerings and carries out the required tasks. However, this is different (in better) from the position of those who knowingly and directly worship ghosts in the hope of acquiring material powers.

The worship of rakshasas and yakshas is usually not very visible in religious traditions, because it does not have temples proper or open rituals. It is much darker as it requires causing pain, fear and despair to innocent creatures, and directly attracts the presence of these terrifying asuras, who are able to take human-like form or any form at will, or to remain concealed in a subtle form. Many cultures around the world recognize the existence of powerful wizards and shape shifters, who are fond of blood and flesh and consider human beings like cattle to be enslaved and exploited. From within such human herds, some ruthless individuals who desire great wealth and power over their fellow creatures may accept to worship the rakshasas and are thus placed in supervising positions, with great privileges compared to the other humans. Sometimes they offer their own women to be impregnated by such rakshasas and yakshas, to strengthen their position with blood alliances and a shared progeny of hybrids, that are considered as very powerful physically and mentally. Within this category of rakshasa worship we can also include the service that materialistic people offer to powerful men (politicians, kings etc) with the intention of obtaining selfish advantages.

The worship of ghosts of all kinds is even more popular in many cultures, and is even lower than the worship offered to asuras because it is inspired merely by fear, blind submission, madness and masochism and self-inflicted damage. This will be explained in further details in the description of the different types of austerities inspired by sattva, rajas and tamas (17.17-19).

We may mention here that according to tradition, ghosts or spirits are categorized according to their powers. Most spirits are not evil, they are just frustrated and miserable, they attack only if provoked, and if they try to communicate with living people, they do so out of their anguish hoping to get some help, but they easily come when invited or evoked and when they are presented with some offerings (usually they eat by smelling and seeing). These ghosts are known as pretas and bhutas - people who died without any relative performing the rituals for them, and newly dead people who are still attached to their bodies and material lives. They are usually bound to graveyard or crematorium grounds, or to the places where they died or lived. The spirits known as dakinis are often women who died in childbirth or similar circumstances; they are attracted to small children.

The pisacha or pisachini can easily be attracted to keep constant company with their worshiper and whisper in his ear, supplying information about the present or the past, especially about hidden things; however they cannot predict the future. Yakshas and yakshinis (also known as goblins, gnomes and cruel fairies) are on a higher level, but they are still very dangerous; they like to mingle with human beings and even have sex with humans, developing a strong selfish attachment to them, and usually taking revenge if neglected. The most powerful and dangerous type of spirit is called brahma rakshasa - usually the ghost of a knowledgeable sadhaka who degraded himself in some way during his life and remains unable or unwilling to continue his purification and evolution. A brahma rakshasa can easily trick gullible people by pretending to be a Deity or Personality of God and giving confusing and even dangerous instructions or information. This is why 99 times out of 100 agbhoris sadhanas go bad and people become crazy and die, thus becoming ghosts in turn.

अशास्त्रविहितं घोरं तप्यन्ते ये तपो जनाः । दम्भाहंकारसंयुक्ताः कामरागबलान्विताः ॥ १७-५ ॥

aśāstravīhitam ghoram tapyante ye tapo janāḥ | dambhāhāṅkārasamyuktāḥ kāmarāgabalanvītāḥ || 17-5 ||

asastra: not according to the scriptures; vibitam: directed; ghoram: horrible/ harmful; tapyante: submit themselves; ye: those who; tapah: austerity; janah: people; dambha: pride; aham kara: egotism; samyukta: engaged; kama raga bala anvitah: compelled by the force of lust and attachment.

"Those people who do not follow the directions of the shastra submit themselves to terrible practices, out of egotism and false religiousness/ hypocrisy, and engage (in such activities) under the sway of lust and attachment."

We find confirmation in the discussion between king Prithu and Mother Earth: tan anadriya yo 'vidvan, arthan arabhate svayam, tasya vyabhicaranty artha arabdhas ca punah punah, "Those ignorant people who disrespect the instructions of the shastra begin so many new schemes created by their minds, but they do not achieve success, no matter how many times they try" (Bhagavata Purana 4.18.5).

The verse we are reading now is similar to verse 16.18: abankaram balam darpam kamam krodham ca samsritam, mam atma para debesu pradvisanto 'bhyasuyakah, "Taking shelter in abankara, physical strength, arrogance, lust and anger, they show envy and hatred against me, as I reside in their own bodies and in the bodies of others". Deliberately neglecting the teachings of the shastra (ashastra vibitam) is certainly not a symptom of sattva (goodness) and freedom from egotism. So the religious practices that are not supported by the proper knowledge of the scriptures may try to compensate their weakness by impressing the ignorant and the gullible with great demonstrations of austerity and pomp. The real motivation of such practices is the desire for power, name, fame, adoration, and profit - all falling into the category of lust and attachment, egotism and self-righteousness. We sometimes see people making a show of terrible austerities, such as lying on beds of thorns or nails, or forcing their limbs into unnatural positions and atrophy, and so on, for the purpose of attracting followers and supporters, intimidating and impressing common people and getting cheap adoration. In some extreme cases the influence of tamas creates very serious mental disorders because the explosive mixture of lust and attachment produces increasing frustration, and the rage and violence can be turned against others and even against oneself. This is the reason why we see sadistic and masochistic perverts engaging in torture, corporal punishment, flagellation, even using spike belts and cilices, that cause damage to the body and to the mind. Because normal healthy pleasures are too mild for them, they need extra stimulation for their thickly encrusted senses in order to feel something.

One could object by observing that some extraordinary personalities - for example Dhruva and Bhagiratha - were able to please God by sincerely engaging in strict austerities that involved full control of the body position and abstention from food. We need to understand that God was pleased by the sincerity and the concentration by which the devotee was meditating, and not by the amount of deprivation and suffering that he caused himself, because that is not the meaning of austerity (tapah).

The word ghora is particularly important in this verse, as it conveys the meanings of "harmful, horrible, violent". Sometimes we see a particular category of sadhus called aghoris (also known as kapalikas, "bearers of the skull") who seem to be immersed in tamasic activities - drinking from skulls, sharing food with dogs and sometimes even eating human flesh and all sorts of disgusting things, living in crematorium grounds, uttering obscenities, consuming intoxicants, having sex with dead bodies, and breaking all cleanliness rules. However, the actions of the aghoris ("not horrible") are never violent, and never aim at satisfying their own senses. They rather constitute a "crash course" to attain the purpose of totally controlling their senses and becoming detached from any material identification and association. They do not kill or harm anyone, as they collect skulls, bones and human flesh from abandoned corpses and usually from the remains of sadhus and sannyasis, who are generally not cremated as a tradition and who wouldn't mind their remains to be used like this (following Dadhici's example). They are kind to all animals and other creatures, and they only show a shocking behavior to shake self-righteous people out of their complacency and delusions. They never hate or despise or mistreat anyone, and in fact as a norm they selflessly help all those who approach them, healing their diseases by absorbing their bad karmic reactions, just like the fire they worship consumes all impurities. The only help they will refuse is when they are asked to do something to harm others by "black magic". They never damage their own body either, nor subject it to pain or actual deprivation. Their sexual practices are conducted in total detachment, so much that uncontrolled ejaculation would nullify the value of their sadhana; just like the consumption of intoxicants, sexual intercourse is used to access another dimension of consciousness that is totally detached from the material body and mind. However, their awareness always remains sober and clear. Of course, not all who claim to be aghoris are genuine, but those who sincerely and knowingly follow this path are to be classified under the transcendental category, as they are not controlled by tamas.

On the other hand, those who perform animal sacrifices by killing innocent creatures are to be categorized under tamas, whether they will consume the flesh of the sacrificed animal or not. We should remember here that the colonial misinterpretation of asvamedha and gomedha yajnas was specifically engineered to present Hinduism and Vedic tradition as a cruel and barbaric superstition that only deserved to be despised and abandoned, and even opposed and destroyed. Also under tamas are those who prescribe hurtful and damaging prayascitta (atonement or purification) practices such as drinking hot ghi or molten lead; the colonial translations of Manu smriti and similar texts in that regard are certainly a fabrication because they are opposed to the fundamental dharmic principles as indicated in the next verse by the word karsayanta ("torturous").

कर्षयन्तः शरीरस्थं भूतग्राममचेतसः ।

मां चैवान्तःशरीरस्थं तान्विद्ध्यासुरनिश्चयान् ॥ १७-६ ॥

karṣayantaḥ śarīrasthaṁ bhūtagrāmamacetasah । māṁ caivāntaḥśarīrasthaṁ tānviddhyāsuranīścayān ॥ 17-6 ॥

karṣayantaḥ: causing suffering and damage; śarīra stham: situated in the body; bhuta gramam: all beings/ all the material elements; acetasaḥ: foolishly; mam: me; ca: and; eva: certainly; antah: inside; śarīra stham: residing in the body; tan: them; viddhi: you should know; asura: asuras; niscayan: certified.

"You should know that they are certainly asuras, because they foolishly cause suffering and damage to all beings, and to me as well, since I reside within the body.

In our commentary to the previous verse, we quoted: abankaram balam darpam kamam krodham ca samsritam, mam atma para debesu pradvishanto 'bhyasuyakah, "Taking shelter in abankara, physical strength, arrogance, lust and anger, they show envy and hatred against me, as I reside in their own bodies and in the bodies of others" (16.18). Of course nobody can really hurt God, because perfect detachment is one of his characteristics (4.13, 7.12, 9.4, 13.15), and Krishna also instructs us to develop the same quality (2.45, 2.56, 2.57, 6.35, 8.11, 12.11, 12.12, 12.16, 12.17, 13.10, and 15.3).

However, even if God, the realized/ pure souls, and even the material elements cannot be damaged by the asuras' behavior, it is the asura himself that becomes bound by the results of his activities. Ahimsa (absence of hatred) remains therefore the crucial factor in sattvic religious practices. All along Bhagavad gita, Krishna states again and again that yoga and spiritual realization cannot be separated from compassion and respect for all creatures and service to all beings as parts of the Supreme. To better understand this point, we should also consult verses 3.24, 3.26, 4.35, 5.7, 5.18, 5.25, 5.29, 6.9, 6.29, 6.30, 6.31, 6.32, 7.6, 10.20, 11.43, 11.55, 12.4, 12.13, 12.15, 12.17, 13.3, 13.8, 13.16, 13.17, 13.18, 13.23, 13.28, 13.29, 13.31, 14.4, 15.7, 15.8, 15.13, 15.14, 15.15, 15.19, 16.2, 16.3, 16.18, 17.14, 17.19, 18.46, 18.54, and 18.61.

This instruction also comes at the conclusion of Krishna's lila on this planet, leaving his spiritual legacy to the great devotee Uddhava: ahimsa satyam asteyam, akama-krodha-lobhata, bhuta priya bheba ca, dharmo ayam sarva varnikah, "This is the *dharm*a for all varnas: freedom from hatred, truthfulness, honesty (non-stealing), freedom from the mixture of lust anger and greed, and the work for the benefit of all beings" (Bhagavata Purana 11.17.21). The same crucial instruction was also given to the greatest king of ancient times, Prithu, a direct avatara of Vishnu, by the famous Sanat kumara, direct son of Brahma, as the essential principle to govern society. These four verses (17.5, 17.6, 17.19 and 16.18) clearly establish the parameters to ascertain whether a religion is genuine or not. Only fools (mudha, 17.19) or people who have no other choice (because they are being forced, blackmailed, etc) will engage in such adharmic religions.

Tamasic austerities and religious practice are damaging and hateful, meant to procure bloodshed and pain as a form of punishment; this is typical of the asuras. If we happen to find some passage in Hindu scriptures or teachings that seem to support asuric or tamasic conclusions and principles, we must need to consider that there has been some tampering and fabrication, because genuine Vedic scriptures can never support adharma. This is confirmed at the end of this verse: asuran niscayan, such people and practices are "certified asuric".

On the other hand, there are some austerities or religious practices that seem to be painful in the beginning, but they bring health and happiness, as explained in verses 18.36 to 18.39. Such beneficial austerities are certainly influenced by sattva as they are meant to develop good habits - to make a few examples, bathing regularly, eating proper food, following a healthy schedule for work and rest, and controlling the urges of one's senses and mind.

Another important meaning in the verse is indicated by the second interpretation of the word bhuta, that also refers to the elements or elemental beings, and not just to the living beings. This meaning is connected to another point presented by Krishna in the previous chapter: asatyam apratistham te jagad abur anisvaram, aparaspara sambhutam kim anyat kama baitukam, "They say that the universe is false and temporary, and there is no God and no creation based on cause and effect. For them, the only reason for the existence of the world is mere sense gratification" (16.8).

As we have already commented in the chapter describing the Virata Rupa, the material universe, the material elements, and material nature in general are a direct manifestation of God, and should be respected. Paramatma is present in the heart of all beings - all living beings as well as all the atoms of material elements, and in the space between atoms.

आहारस्त्वपि सर्वस्य त्रिविधो भवति प्रियः । यज्ञस्तपस्तथा दानं तेषां भेदमिमं शृणु ॥ १७-७ ॥

āhārastvapi sarvasya trividho bhavati priyah । yajñastapastathā dānam teṣāṁ bhedamimam śṛṇu ॥ 17-7 ॥

aharah: food (and drinks); tu: but; api: also; sarvasya: of all; tri vidhah: three types; bhavati: becomes; priyah: desired; yajnah: ritual sacrifice; tapah: austerity; tatha: also; danam: charity; tesam: in them; bhedam: the difference; imam: this; srnu: listen.

"Food is also categorized into three types, as are all the things desired (by people), the ritual sacrifices, austerities and charity. Listen, as I explain their different categories.

Food is dear (priya), because it is the first and most fundamental reality of existence for all beings. Food is the basis for yajna, because no religious ritual can be successful without the offering of food (as the oblations of clarified butter, grains, fruits, herbs, soma juice etc) and the distribution of prasada (1.42, 17.13). Such yajnas are mandatory for all family people - if not every day at least once a month on sankrantis or purnimas, or even once a year on Makara sankranti. By engaging in yajna we get the opportunity to perform genuine tapah (austerity), and genuine dana (charity) ensues naturally. Therefore this chapter is actually based on food. The word ahara includes not only food, but also drinks and all the other substances that we assume into our bodies, to build the gross and subtle tissues of our vehicle and instrument for life and work in this world. Some people say, "you are what you eat", and certainly there is a lot of truth in this. The material body, sthula sarira, is also called annamaya kosa, or "sheath made of food".

In Chandogya Upanishad Uddala Aruni instructs his son Svetaketu on how the food we eat builds up not only our body tissues, but our mind as well: annamayam hi saumya manah, "My good boy, the mind is made of food" (Chandogya Upanishad 6.5). The substance of the food is composed by three elements: the grossest component is used to build the hard tissues such as bone, teeth, hair, nails etc; the excess material is eliminated as waste and in the process it also carries all other impurities out from the system. The nutritious component becomes flesh, blood (and other bodily fluids) and marrow (and other tissues), while the subtle component becomes breath (prana), mental substance (manas) and speech (vak), much like the butter is produced by churning yogurt (annam asitam tridha vidhiyate, tasya yab sthavistho dbatus tat purisam bhavati, yo madhyamas tan mamsam, yo 'nisthas tan manah, dadnbah saumya mathyamanasa yo 'nima sa urdhvah samudishati, tat sarpir bhavati, evam eva kbalu, saumya annasyasyamanasya yo 'nima sa urdhvah samudishati tan mano bhavati, Chandogya Upanishad 6.6). To illustrate the religious importance of food, Uddala Aruni asked his son to make an experiment by abstaining from food for 15 days, while still drinking water to support the pranas (sodasa kalah saumya purusah pancadasabani masib kamam apah piba, apomayah prano na pibato vicchetsyata iti). At the end of the fasting period, Svetaketu found that he had great difficulties in remembering the verses of the Vedic sambitas, because the fire of the mind had been reduced to a small hot ember only. After taking some food, he felt happiness and strength of mind returning (sa basa, atba hainam upasada, tam ha yat keim ca papraccha sarvam ha pratipade). Thus he was able to understand the meaning of food (Chandogya Upanishad 7.1-3).

In Taittiriya Upanishad (Brighu valli), Varuna speaks to his son Brighu, giving him the famous aphorism, annam parabrahma svarupam, "food is Brahman itself". Varuna said, "Food, prana, sight, hearing, mind and speech are the means by which one can know Brahman (3.1.1). One must never disrespect food, because prana is food, and the body consumes food to feed the prana; therefore both the body and prana are made of food (3.7.2). One must observe the vow/ take the responsibility never to throw away food (3.8.1). One must observe the vow/ take the responsibility to produce an abundance of food (annam babu kurvita, tad vratam, 3.9.1). Food is prosperity. One must observe the vow/ take the responsibility to give food to anyone who asks for it, and because as a young man he respectfully offers cooked food, he will get respect and cooked food in his old age (3.10.1). The Sama Veda says, 'I am the food, I am the one who consumes the food... One who offers me as food protects my existence. Although I am food, I eat those who consume food without offering it first'" (3.10.6). This offering refers both to the yajna and to the distribution of food.

Another important statement in Taittiriya Upanishad is, annad vai praja prajayante, yab kas ca prithivim asrita atba annenaiva jivanti, atba ened apy antyantatah, "From food all living beings are born on this earth, they live by food and at the end they enter into food again/ become food again" (Brahmananda valli, 2.2.1).

The invocation of Taittiriya Upanishad says, sahana bhavatu, sana nau bhunaktu, saba viryam karavahai, tejasvi navadhitamastu ma vidvishavahai, "May we become united, may we be fed together, may we walk bravely together and be enlightened together. May we never be divided by quarrel or selfishness".

In the second chapter we find the following verse: "All beings on earth are born from food, they live on food and then return to being food. Food was born before the creatures were born, therefore it is considered the supreme medicine. Those who honor food as Brahman obtain plenty of food. Since food exists before the creatures and is medicine for all, all creatures are born from food and grow with food. Food is eaten, and eats the creatures, therefore it is called abara, 'eating'" (2.2.1). We had already seen this point in the chapter of Bhagavad gita that explains about yajnas: annad bhavanti bhutani (3.14).

Prasna Upanishad states that "food is Prajapati" (1.14). It starts the explanation by saying that Prajapati (Brahma) was meditating about creating a descendance, and he generated Anna and Prana (food and life air), and they produced all sorts of creatures (1.4).

In Brihad aranyaka Upanishad (1.4.7) we find, "All Devas are projections of the Purusha. The entire universe can be reduced to the fundamental elements: food and the prana that consumes the food. The life energy takes different names according to its functions, but we must track it as the atman" (1.4.7).

आयुःसत्त्वबलारोग्यसुखप्रीतिविवर्धनाः । रस्याः स्निग्धाः स्थिरा हृद्या आहाराः सात्त्विकप्रियाः ॥ १७-८ ॥

āyusḥsattvabalārogyasukhaprītivivardhanāḥ | rasyāḥ snigdhaḥ sthīrā hṛdyā āhārāḥ sāttvikapriyāḥ || 17-8 ||

ayub: (duration and strength of) life; sattva: sattva; bala: strength; arogya: good health; sukha: happiness; priti: pleasure; vivardhanah: increasing; rasyah: juicy/ sweet; snigdhah: fatty; sthira: substantial; hrdyah: satisfying; aharah: food; sattvika priyah: preferred by people in sattva guna.

"The food preferred by people who love sattva are juicy/ sweet, fatty, substantial and satisfying, and they increase pleasure, happiness, good health, strength, goodness and duration of life.

Krishna also gave instructions on food to Uddhava: pathyam putam anayastam, abaryam sattvika smritam, rajasam cendriya prestham, tamasam cartidasuci, "Food that is beneficial, pure, obtained without too much difficulty, is sattvic food. Food that gives a strong hit on the senses is rajasic, and food that is impure and creates suffering is tamasic" (Bhagavata Purana, 11.25.28).

Good food is full of life (ayub): this refers to the effect on the body and mind, but also to the symptoms we observe in the ingredients themselves. In other words, good food is fresh, and consists especially of recently harvested fruits and vegetables, consumed without cooking them (raw) as much as possible, to ensure that we get sufficient vitamins, enzymes, and the other volatile elements that support a healthy diet. Grains can be consumed as sprouts that do not require much cooking, but even when they are prepared as a steamed or boiled staple dish as composite carbohydrates (rice, wheat, barley, etc) they should not be overcooked or kept aside for too long before consuming them. Freshly cooked grains are much tastier and healthier. Also, whole grains are better than refined grains (that have been deprived of the germ). Good food gives strength (bala), and this is how we can immediately recognize the quality of the food we have consumed: after eating, we should feel stronger, not weaker or sleepy. The word restaurant derives from "restoring" (energies and strength). Good food is beneficial for health in general (arogya), as the greater part of our immune system resides in our digestive tract. Also, we need to learn about the proper combination of ingredients, and how to consume them in accordance to the time (of the day, of the year, as kala), place (climate, environmental circumstances, as desa) and our specific tri-dosa prakriti (individual bodily nature, as patra).

Good food gives happiness (sukha), as it makes us feel good not only physically but mentally as well. This is also connected to the next quality listed, "pleasing" (priti); when food is attractive to us, our body produces enzymes more easily to facilitate digestion. We can immediately notice because we start salivating, as salivary glands in our mouth are the first and most important source of self produced enzymes. Food is attractive to us because of our particular preference and because of its nice smell, look, texture, taste, etc, so the art of cooking should never be underestimated, because good food and good digestion not only support our physical health, but also our mental health and our spiritual development. Another very important factor in food is variety; by consuming a wide range of fresh seasonal agricultural and forest products, we ensure a proper supply of the different nutritional elements and medicinal properties. Variety in preparation and presentation also makes food more attractive (sukha, priti), and therefore more sattvic. Good food is juicy/ sweet (rasya), fatty (snigdha), and as such it is hearty (hridaya) and substantial (sthira); that also means its beneficial effect lasts longer. Juicy foods contain more vitamins and minerals; they are not necessarily watery, although they were originally (such as sugar that was originally sugarcane juice). A certain amount of fat is required for the proper functioning of the brain, that is constituted by fat for a considerable percentage of its weight. To explain these qualities of sattvic food, we can say that rasya is (for example) sugar; when sugar is mixed with milk cream, we have a mixture of rasya and snigdha. When rasya and snigdha are enriched with sthira (made more substantial), we have milk sweets. To make another example, we can look at a savory recipe: for perfect balance of a sattvic dish we need some juicy vegetables, some fat, and some substantial ingredients such as pulses or grains.

One of the most famous sattvic preparations is called charu (also known as payasa); it is made with rice boiled in milk with the addition of a little sugar and clarified butter. Milk and milk products (such as yogurt, butter, clarified butter, fresh cheese etc) are considered to be sattvic; however they should not involve any suffering for the animals and they should be collected and prepared with great concern for cleanliness and purity. Milk products that are contaminated by blood, pus, chemicals and various polluting substances, and/ or have been obtained by mistreating animals are not vehicles of sattva but of tamas and rajas and may have bad effects on our health as well. However, we should not fall in the wrong conclusion that milk in itself is bad, unhealthy or unfit for human consumption: it would be like saying that the very idea of taking bath in a river is bad, unhealthy or contaminating because the rivers around us are all polluted. The concept of bathing in a river is very good in itself, because originally/ normally rivers are clean reservoirs of fresh sweet drinking water, and their swift current has the effect of purifying and energizing body and mind. Until about 20 or 30 years ago the majority of rivers on the planet were still clean enough to bathe in, the most brilliant example being the sacred river Yamuna that goes through Mathura and Vrindavana, and that today is so polluted that its waters have been declared unfit even for agricultural irrigation. It is true that things can become polluted from time to time, and that presently the planet is facing a serious emergency, but this situation is merely a small fraction of time and does not change the eternal ontological nature of things but rather simply covers it. The same applies to milk and fresh milk products.

Besides rice, barley and wheat, all fruits and berries, nuts, sugar, honey and milk products, the ingredients especially increasing sattva are sesame, mung dal (green soya beans), chana dal (small chickpeas), all leafy vegetables and medicinal herbs, as well as most other vegetables, including jackfruit, cucumber, aubergine (eggplant), plaintain (green banana), pumpkins of all kinds, bhindi (lady's fingers) etc. Also, to the ancient lists we can add many new "foreign" vegetables - such as maize, tomato, capsicum, avocado, green beans, celery, asparagus, fennel, and so on. Edible roots such as potato, carrot, yam, beetroot etc are usually considered sattvic and suitable for fasting days, although some people believe they are tamasic because by harvesting them the entire plant is killed (with the exception of potatoes).

To elevate sattvic food to the level of suddha sattva, yogis and brahmanas remember the om tat sat, by chanting or reciting mantras or stutis that are appropriate to the situation. One of the most popular among traditional Hindus is verse 4.24 of Bhagavad gita: brahmarpanam brahma havir brahmagnau brahmana hutam, brahmaiva tena gantaryam brahma karma samadhina, "The purpose is transcendental, the offerings are transcendental, the fire is transcendental, the act of offering is transcendental, the goal to be attained is transcendental, and the consciousness is transcendental." Many traditional Hindus pray to the food itself as the form of the Mother Goddess, Annapurna: annapurne sadapurne, sankara prana vallabhe, jnana vairagya siddhy artham, bhiksam debi ca parvati, "Devi Parvati, you are the fullness of food, eternal prosperity, and the beloved of Shiva. Please give me alms, to establish me in the perfection of knowledge and renunciation".

The offering of the food can be done in several ways; the most popular among traditional Hindus is inspired by Chandogya Upanishad: "The first oblation is om pranaya svaha, to feed the prana, and with it, the eye, the sun, the sky, and everything under the sky including the person who is eating. The second oblation is om vyanaaya svaha, to feed the sense of hearing, the moon, the directions, and everything in the four directions, including the person who is eating. The third oblation is om apanaya svaha, to feed fire, earth, and everything that is ruled by fire and earth, including the person who is eating. The fourth oblation is om samanaya svaha, to feed the mind, Indra (Parjanya), lightning and everything under it, including the person who is eating. The fifth oblation is om udanaya svaha, to feed the skin, air, and space (ether), and everything that exists in space, including the person who is eating" (Chandogya Upanishad, 5.20.1-2, 5.21.1-2, 5.22.1-2, 5.23.1-2). To this, the mantra brahmane svaha (equivalent to om tat sat) is usually added to connect prana directly with atman and brahman. Another important teaching from Chandogya Upanishad is about the purity of food: ahara suddhau sattva suddhibh sattva-suddhau dbruva smrtih smrti lambhe sarva granthinam vipramoksah, "when the food is pure, one's mind/ existence becomes pure as well, memory becomes stronger, the knots of the heart are dissolved and one attains liberation" (7.26.2). Such purity is ensured by the non-violent manner of acquisition and the cleanliness of the nature of the ingredients, and also by the level of our consciousness while we consume our foods. We should eat consciously, chewing carefully, appreciating the good qualities of the food and feeling grateful for all the work that went into its production and preparation.

कट्वम्ललवणात्युष्णतीक्ष्णरूक्षविदाहिनः । आहारा राजसस्येष्टा दुःखशोकामयप्रदाः ॥ १७-९ ॥

kaṭvamlalavaṇātyuṣṇatīkṣṇarūkṣavidāhinaḥ । āhārā rājasasyeṣṭā duḥkhaśokāmayapradāḥ ॥ 17-9 ॥

katu: bitter; amla: sour; lavana: salty; ati usna: very hot; tikṣna: pungent; rukṣa: dry; vidāhinaḥ: burning/ spicy; āharaḥ: food; rajasasya: of one who is in rajas; iṣṭa: desired; duḥkha: distress; soka: mental anxiety; amaya: disease; pradāḥ: that give.

"The food desired by those who belong to rajas cause discomfort, mental anxiety and pain, and are spicy, dry, pungent, very hot, salty, sour and bitter.

The Vedic system to categorize foods is based on taste and effect on the body. Typically, rajasic foods are addictive, but the first time we taste them we experience a painful or unpleasant feeling, like burning (vidāhina) or some other form of discomfort in the tongue and even in the teeth, if not in the throat and in the stomach. This does not mean that they are unhealthy, as in fact many rajasic ingredients have medicinal properties, such as kearela (bitter gourd), nim leaves, lemons and other citrus fruits, amalaki (amla), yogurt, tamarind, muli (also called daikon or radish), cruciferous vegetables (cauliflower, cabbage, etc), onion, garlic, vinegar, black molasses, ginger, hing (asafetida), chilli pepper and all hot spices, as well as coffee and tea and other stimulants such as tobacco, betel, coca leaves etc, and even alcoholic beverages. If consumed in moderate quantities and manner, and at the appropriate times, these ingredients stimulate the fire of rajas in the body and mind, accelerating digestion and metabolism and even burning impurities and fighting disease. However, if consumed in excessive quantity (ati), they imbalance the body and create anxiety and pain.

The word amaya derives from ama (with a long first a), that means "unripe, immature, crude, unbaked (as in clay containers)", but also "causing disease", and more specifically, "causing constipation". It is a well known fact that astringent substances can dry out the contents of the bowels and make evacuation more difficult. Hot spices can also damage the bowels and the stomach, and cause hemorrhoids and similar problems. Pungent vegetables such as onions and garlic leave heavy residues in the body, that can be easily detected by their smell, and that bog down the mental processes, clouding the vision of intelligence. Ama is also the technical term used in Ayur Veda to indicate the undigested residue that is left in the stomach, and that may produce toxins by rotting and contaminating the next batches of food. Therefore Ayur Veda strongly recommends that we eat only after the previous meal has been completely digested.

Another group of rajasic foods are the dry and salty preparations that are often used as snacks or appetite stimulants, like fried foods (chips, *pakor*s, etc), roasted or parched foods (especially grains and nuts), strong legumes (such as urad dal etc), preserved foods (such as olives, pickles etc), and spicy foods of all kinds. In comparison, the sattvic foods are sweet and soothing, and slow the metabolism down. Contrarily to what many people think, the purpose of the yogic diet is not to stimulate the metabolism but to slow the metabolism down, so that less food will be needed to keep the body strong and active. Sattvic food is not to be consumed in great quantities, because sattvic people are able to control their senses and have vanquished greed and lust for sense gratification. As always, an uncontrolled excess of sattva slides us down straight into tamas, so we see that sattvic foods consumed in excess make the body and mind heavier, and induce sleep and indigestion, resulting into disease and suffering.

On the other hand, rajasic foods raise the metabolic rate and stimulate lust and engagement in sense gratification; people who want to "lose weight" can find that quite useful. However, this increased stimulation of the body's activities (all activities are controlled by rajas) causes a shift of the consciousness to the lower level of identification with the material body and attachment to material possessions and positions, as they tend to anchor the life airs to the lower chakras (survival and sense gratification). This is the reason why yogis and devotees are not supposed to consume these foods; particularly onion and garlic are considered the most powerful in lowering the spiritual consciousness among all the vegetarian ingredients, and many spiritualists abstain from their use, especially on fasting days.

We should remember what Krishna said in verses 14.7 and 14.9 about rajas. Here is the description about the effects of the three gunas: tatra sattvam nirmalatvat prakasakam anamayam, sukha sangena badhṇati jñana sangena canagha, "O Arjuna, the association with sattva binds to purity, illumination, freedom from defects, happiness, and knowledge" (14.6.), rajo ragatmakam viddhi trisṇa sanga samudbhavam, tan nibadṇati kaunteya karma sangena dehinam, "You should know that the contact with rajas develops attachment and hankering, that bind the embodied beings to action" (14.7), tamas tv ajñana jam viddhi mohanam sarva dehinam, pramadālaya nidrabhis tan nibadṇati bharata, "However, you should know that tamas causes ignorance and its binding results, such as confusion, madness, laziness and excessive sleep" (14.8).

यातयामं गतरसं पूति पर्युषितं च यत् । उच्छिष्टमपि चामेध्यं भोजनं तामसप्रियम् ॥ १७-१० ॥

yātayāmaṁ gatarasaṁ pūti paryuṣitaṁ ca yat । ucchiṣṭamapi cāmedhyaṁ bhojanaṁ tāmasapriyam ॥ 17-10 ॥

yata yama: stale; gata rasam: dried out; puti: stinky; paryusitam: rotten; ca: and; yat: that; ucchiṣṭam: leftovers; api: also; ca: and; amedhya: impure; bhojanam: eating; tamasa priyam: preferred by those who are in ignorance.

"The foods loved by people in tamas are unclean, such as leftovers, or stuff that is stale, dried, rotten and smelly.

We need to remember here that the influence of the gunas works both ways - people who are already immersed in tamas are attracted to such foods, and the habit of consuming such foods also causes the power of tamas to increase in one's life. However, we should not forget that wasting food is a very serious fault, as we must respect food as the manifestation of Brahman itself. Just throwing the leftovers into the garbage is not the solution to the problem of tamas inherent in consuming leftovers.

The Vedic tradition gives great importance to cleanliness and hygiene, both for physical and for mental health, and has a deep understanding of the effects of food at all levels. The word ucchista, "leftovers", refers to the fact that the mouth of any person (including relatively healthy people) contains a great number of bacteria and therefore the food that has been already been in contact with someone's mouth directly or indirectly (by contact with licked fingers or spoon etc) is potentially carrying germs of many diseases. Besides that, on a subtler level the food that has been in such close contact with a person also absorbs his/ her energy, and it will also pass it on to those who consume it. If the leftovers are coming from a very elevated spiritual personality, this transfer of energy will be to our advantage, but usually this occurrence is extremely rare, so it is better not to risk consuming leftovers.

The expression yata yaman means "spoiled", and refers to food that has been sitting around too long; in hot climates and without refrigeration, cooked preparations can turn bad quickly, and usually the time limit is 3 hours. Yata yaman can also refer to preparations that have gone wrong - burned, lumped up, or curdled, or were added too much salt or a bad mixture of ingredients, or were processed with a poor cooking technique, resulting in bad taste, bad smell, and bad appearance. Overcooked foods belong this category, as one can hardly make out the original ingredients because everything looks and tastes the same, or has no actual taste. The excessive use of spices and heavy oils (especially mustard oil) covers all ingredients and spoils the dish, too, thus manifesting two prominent qualities of tamas.

When cooked grains or vegetables are stale, they dry out and become hard (gata rasam), or they start to ferment (pariyusitam) and give off an unpleasant smell (puti). This includes all kinds of alcoholic fermented beverages - wine, beer, liquors (even distilled ones) - as we see that their consumption dulls out the consciousness, increasing ignorance, laziness, sleep, confusion and madness. In those individuals who are already prone to tamas, inebriation can also cause violence and destructive behaviors.

In some cultures, people have learned to preserve foods by drying and fermentation, developing carefully controlled methods that maintain the preparation within the limits of edibility. In this category we have fermented (stinky and moldy) cheeses, sauerkraut and other vegetable preserves obtained by lactic fermentation - to remain within the field of vegetarian ingredients. Non-vegetarian ingredients preserved through drying and fermentation are even more decomposed and stinking, as for example the various versions of fish sauces, the "green eggs" (aged for many days), meat jerky, and other similar things. Some people even eat insects (from land or sea) that normally subsist on garbage and impurities and are therefore useful in nature because they clean up the environment. This includes also the so-called "flowers or fruits of the sea", that are a particular type of insects that do not move around.

Meat, fish and eggs are impure foods by nature, as they normally decompose more quickly than vegetarian foods. This is the reason why carnivorous animals have a very short intestine (3 times their body length, that can quickly expel the remains of the ingested meals), and why colon cancer and similar diseases in human beings are normally associated with regular consumption of non-vegetarian foods. In human beings, the intestine length is 12 times the body length, and the concentration of acid produced by the stomach is only 1/20 of what is produced by the stomach of carnivore animals.

Any normal human being, and especially innocent children, will be immediately attracted by fresh fruit even when they are still on their plant, but will be naturally disgusted at the sight of a dead animal; this is confirmed by Vedic tradition, that recommends taking a full bath for purification in case we have come in the presence of a dead body (even without touching it, what to speak of eating it). We know that toxicity in the blood and body usually causes the clouding of the higher faculties of intelligence, together with headaches, dizziness, fatigue, and similar symptoms.

All non-vegetarian foods are covered by ignorance and deceit because they need considerable manipulation, cooking and the addition of other ingredients in order to hide their natural appearance and thus become acceptable by the average human palate and stomach. Also, it is extremely difficult to find a meat eater who does not feel irritated and disturbed if we remind him of the nature of what he is actually eating. Obviously meat eaters prefer to remain in ignorance or forgetfulness about the origin of their food. Those who actually know what they are eating and still enjoy eating it anyway are even worse, because they have forgotten all compassion, moral sense, decency, cleanliness, intelligence and good sense. They truly are asuras.

We will not list here the many instructions from several scriptures that recommend a vegetarian diet, because that would require a book in itself. However, we need to clarify that Vedic tradition does not prescribe the absolute prohibition on the consumption of non vegetarian foods or other tamasic foods: it simply gives good reasons and knowledge so that each and every individual will be able to make an informed and responsible choice, and to face its consequences. There are no taboos in Vedic culture, and no "religious restrictions" as we can observe in other religions. People who still want to eat meat should certainly be allowed to do so, provided they do not harm innocent and useful creatures, and they clean up after themselves.

Also, we need to understand that emergency situations fully justify choices that normally should not be done; this is called apat kala dharma, or "dharma in times of distress". So for example sannyasi beggars do not have much choice regarding the quality of the food they receive as alms, and although they usually try to approach sattvic people to ask for food, they may have to make do with what they get.

aphala akanksibhib: by those who are not anxious to enjoy the results; yajnah: ritual sacrifice; vidhi distah: directed by proper knowledge; yah: which; ijyate: is performed; yastavyam: that must be performed out of duty; eva: certainly; iti: thus; manah: the mind; samadhaya: well focused; sab: that; sattvikah: in sattva guna.

"The yajna that is performed without aspiring to obtain (selfish) results, but is directed by proper knowledge, out of sense of duty, and with full concentration of the mind, is in sattva.

The definition of yajna is very broad and covers all those activities that are performed with a sacred consciousness, as sacrifice or duty or ritualistic ceremony. The concept of sacredness is inherent in the human psyche, even without the understanding or knowledge of scriptures, and therefore we can find it in all cultures, in all regions and at all times, directed towards the greatest manifestation of power and consciousness that people call God. Krishna has elaborated on the various forms of yajna starting from 3.9: yajnarthat karmano 'nyatra loko 'yam karma bandhanah, tad artham karma kaunteya mukta sangah samacara, "Actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage. Therefore you should perform your sacred duties remaining free from material association" (3.9).

So the fundamental form of yajna is the performance of one's duties to support the universe (dharmā); in the smallest scale these duties refer to our body, our family, our professional community and our society, and they are called sva dharmā. On a larger scale, our duties apply to our part for the support of the universe, in cooperation with the Devas, and are performed through various rituals. Verses 3.10 to 3.15 illustrated this point, also connecting the birth and development of all beings to the food and the rains or the proper order of the seasons and universal laws (ritam). The traditional rituals performed by the family holders of the three higher varnas are aimed at reinforcing the natural harmony in the universe, where humans feed the Devas and the Devas feed the humans as parts of the same great family. The concept of karma as duty is evidence of the deep sense of responsibility of Vedic culture, that teaches human beings to be guardians and protectors of the world and all the creatures, rather than their masters and exploiters (as we see in the abrahamic ideology and its derivatives).

In fact, verse 3.13 clearly stated that one should only consume what has been sanctified by yajna, as prasada or blessing, just like a big family partakes of the food that has been served to all the assembled members.

We have seen more about yajna as the samagram ("collective form") of one's duties in verse 4.23, and after verse 4.24 (brahmarpanam brahma havir brahmagnau brahmana hutam, brahmaiva tena gantayam brahma karma samadbina), Krishna continues in verses 4.25 to 4.27, explaining the concept of yajna as ritual worship, as renunciation (of the results of our actions), as the practice of sadhana and control of the senses, the prana and the mind. In 4.28 yajna is presented as charity, spiritual search, austerity, cultivation of knowledge and observance of vratas, and in 4.29 and 4.30 it is described as the practice of meditation supported by pranayama. From 4.31 to 4.34, there is more elaboration on the concept of yajna itself.

In 5.28 and 5.29, yajna is explained as directly connected to Bhagavan, and then in 7.30, 8.4 and 9.16 the principle of yajna (adhijajna) is recognized as Bhagavan himself. However, as both meanings are valid, the definition of yajna will again be used as sacred action in 8.28, 9.20, 16.1, 18.3, 18.4, 18.5, 18.6, and verse 9.24 says that God is the beneficiary of all sacred actions (sarva yajnanam bhokta).

All this knowledge of sacred action is inherent in the heart and conscience of each human being, irrespective of his culture, and therefore it is called sanatana dharmā. The Vedic scriptures (shastra) offer added knowledge and understanding of this natural propensity, and here Krishna explains that people who are naturally good (sattvic) perform all sacred actions out of a sense of responsibility and duty (yastavyam), without expecting selfish advantages (aphala akanksibhib) and with a good understanding of the purpose of the action (vidhi distah). The word vidhi also conveys the meaning of "rules", and here (in absence of specific shastric instructions) it applies to the ethical principles and rules of good conduct that is naturally perceived by sattvic people as cleanliness, kindness and compassion, etc.

अभिसन्धाय तु फलं दम्भार्थमपि चैव यत् । इज्यते भरतश्रेष्ठ तं यज्ञं विद्धि राजसम् ॥ १७-१२ ॥

abhisandhāya tu phalam dambhāarthamapi caiva yat | ijjate bharataśreṣṭha taṁ yajñam viddhi rajasam || 17-12 ||

abhisandhaya: desiring; tu: but; phalam: the result; dambha: out of self-righteousness; artham: for the sake of; api: also; ca: and; eva: certainly; yat: which; ijyate: is performed; bharata srestha: o best among the descendents of Bharata; taṁ: that; yajnam: sacrifice; viddhi: you should know; rajasam: in rajas.

"O best among the descendants of Bharata, know that the ritual sacrifice that is performed out of self-righteousness or to get (selfish materialistic) results, is classified under rajas.

Even those people who are under the influence of rajas and tamas usually perform sacred actions, duties and religious rituals, because the religious instinct is a fundamental part of the human spirit and cannot be destroyed. It can be covered by other motives, forgotten, or more frequently misdirected towards objects of worship that are more attractive to ignorant and greedy people, as we have already seen at the beginning of the chapter, especially in verses 17.4 and 17.5. If they cannot find anyone else to worship, rajasic and tamasic people will worship political leaders, cinema stars, famous singers and musicians, professional sports figures, or even themselves (or more precisely, their own ego, mind and senses). Some worship mere fantasy projections, such as idealized persons, fiction characters, and so on. In any case, the religious activities and the performance of duties carried out by rajasic people are motivated by selfishness and greed; in the very least they want to get a special social position and a sense of self-righteousness and superiority. Even if they happen to worship some form of God, their purpose remains selfish, as they want special powers or favors - from passing a school exam to finding a good husband, to winning the lottery to obtaining admission to paradise and its pleasures. This is indicated at the beginning of the verse by the word abbisandbhaya ("for a specific purpose").

Here we need to draw a line between the two adjacent territories of praying God for help (on one side) and specifically worshipping God only when we want to obtain some favor (on the other side). The difference may not be immediately visible to some people, but it is the same situation we can experience in our personal lives when we have some people who only remember us when they need favors, and they never bother to show up on other occasions. Such people are obviously greedy and selfish, and have no genuine affection for us, and therefore the relationship cannot be very good. On the other hand, we may have sincere friends who really love us and occasionally tell us about their concerns when they are in trouble. Because we are part of their lives, they trust us and have a great opinion of us, they may ask for our help: this is how a devotee approaches God to offer his problems to his feet. A real devotee does not give a "shopping list" to God to ask him to fulfill his wishes, because he trusts that God knows better.

The religious ceremonies of rajasic people are performed out of egotism and ostentation (dambha artham), or even as a business (phalam), where the Deity is "used" as an instrument to make money (as a salary or in the form of donations), acquire followers, and/ or to glorify oneself or one's own organization, group etc. These wretched people really believe they "own" the Deity (sometimes even on "monopoly" or "franchising" basis), and usually calculate the "value" of the Deity in terms of material elements such as size, quality and price of the metal or stone, and so on. They even set a tariff for the darshana of the Deity, and sell the Deities' prasadam and favors to the public for a price they consider their legitimate earning. They do not ask for free donations but for a specific price, and they use the "spiritual value" of the item to improve their business.

Rajasic people also do not give much importance to rules as far as their own personal conduct is concerned. Of course, they will be intolerant and very rigid about "following the rules" when using this pretext to mistreat and exploit others, but because they are hypocrites (dambha artha) they conveniently forget the fundamentals of cleanliness, humility, proper behavior, abstention from objectionable foods, etc when they do not want to bother observing them in their own personal lives.

The same thing applies to the religious rituals based on fire sacrifice (homa), by which one aspires to acquire the prestigious titles of Agnihotri, Asvamedhi, Vajapayi, etc, and even pass them on to children and descendants who will take pride in such denominations generation after generation, even if in the future they will never observe any other ritual or fulfill any duty.

We should remember here a verse from the previous chapter: atma sambhavitah stabdha dbana mana madanvitah, yajante nama yajnaish te dambhenavidhi purvakam, "Deluded by egotism, impudence, false prestige and wealth, they celebrate rituals and sacrifices that have no real value, because of their hypocrisy and ignorance of the proper purpose and rules" (16.17).

विधिहीनमसृष्टान्नं मन्त्रहीनमदक्षिणम् ।

श्रद्धाविरहितं यज्ञं तामसं परिचक्षते ॥ १७-१३ ॥

vidhihīnamasṛṣṭānnaṁ mantrahīnamadakṣiṇam | śraddhāviraḥitaṁ yajñaṁ tāmasaṁ paricakṣate || 17-13 ||

vidhi binam: without knowledge; asṛiṣṭa annam: without sanctification of food; mantra binam: without the proper mantras; adaksinam: without offering gifts to the teacher; śraddha virahitam: without faith; yajnam: sacrifice ritual; tamasam: in tamas; paricaksate: it must be considered.

"A religious ritual that is performed without knowledge, without chanting the (proper) mantras, without faith, without the sanctification of food or without offering gifts, must be considered as belonging to tamas.

Rajasic people engage in the performance of yajna and upasana in order to obtain some selfish material results, but at least they put some effort in doing things nicely. They organize a good choreography of activities, with processions, songs and chants, they pick impressive mantras and ritual procedures, they invest in materials for decorations and offerings, and they often put much effort in building temples or even temporary structures, like the festival pandals. They solemnly sit through the recitation of traditional stutis and pathas hoping to get the benefits described in the phala sruti, and they try to impress the public with lavish distribution of foods, garlands, and other gifts - usually to donors or prospective future donors.

Tamasic people do not even bother to do that. It is too much work and investment for them, so if they really need to do something (because others are pushing them), they put up a cheap show, with the minimum of materials procured by hook or by crook, often by stealing them (especially flowers from neighbors' trees) and generally without caring much for their cleanliness. For the homa they use any type of wood - even pieces of old discarded furniture - and purchase cheap artificial surrogates for valuable ingredients such as camphor, clarified butter, grains, medicinal herbs and so on. The officiating priests (ritviks) are sloppy and casual, not very concerned about the correct procedures, and above all, abysmally ignorant about the purpose of the entire exercise.

As mantras, they whimsically mumble some lines, often grossly mispronouncing them and usually without understanding anything of their meaning, but nobody cares and so there is no questioning. Anything goes, even funeral mantras chanted for marriages. The yajna sala is unprotected and all sorts of people are sitting or walking around, including vomiting drunkards, gossiping ladies, silly girls combing their hair, children shrieking and running into mischief, among various types of garbage and discarded items, and what not. The procedure is conducted without real respect or faith, but simply because "it is the unquestionable tradition" that must be followed blindly as there is no escape. Here we need to be very careful about the delusional idea that such passive submission is actually sattvic and can be regarded as the selfless performance of one's duty, because in many cases tamas could be confused with sattva. To better clarify the point, we may remember the example of the "high caste" fool who believes he never needs to take a bath or clean his clothes because he is already and always pure "genetically, by birth".

The expression asrista annam is particularly interesting. The fundamental purpose of all yajnas is the distribution of food, not only as offerings to the Devas but also to all participants and to the public in general, including the animals. This is because the three higher varnas - brahmanas, kshatriyas and vaishyas - have the responsibility of feeding the rest of society, starting from the sudras, who assist them faithfully, and the yajna rituals are the perfect opportunity. This distribution of prasada does not necessarily need to be done as a meal proper, or even in the form of cooked foods; it can consist of the fruits, vegetables and grains arranged around the sacrificial altar. In tamasic rituals, such "decorations" are not provided, or they are stolen or still worse, swept away and thrown into the garbage dump at the end of the ceremony, sometimes together with the "used idol". If we read the description of the Puranas and other ancient texts, we will see what a real yajna looks like, and what is its purpose.

The word parikaksate indicates that all yajnas should have a responsible person (acharya) who is examining all the aspects of the procedure and correcting them at the proper time, giving instructions to the participants and ensuring that the ritual becomes successful. Otherwise, the entire exercise will be completely useless. Some superficial people would like to believe that such tamasic rituals simply have "some small defects", like the fire is often covered by smoke, but Krishna does not agree with such conclusion: asraddhaya hutam dattam tapas taptam krtam ca yat, asad ity ucyate partha na ca tat pretya no iba, "O son of Pritha, any action of ritual offering, charity or austerity that is performed without faith and in a material consciousness, does not bring good results after death or even in this life" (17.28). It is much better to engage in simpler but more sincere activities, as Krishna has already stated: patram puspam phalam toyam yo me bhaktya prayacchati, tad aham bhakty upabritam asnami prayatatmanah, "If someone, with sincere love and devotion, offers me even one leaf, one flower, one fruit or some water, I will accept the offering because of that love and devotion" (9.26).

If in spite of our shortcomings and the objective difficulties of Kali yuga, we still want to honor the Devas and society with a traditional religious celebration on some special occasion, we should make a sincere effort to observe at least the rules of cleanliness and respect, and try to understand the mantras and the purpose of the sacrifice. And above all, we should be humble enough to realize our defects and apologize for any mistake or omission: mantra binam kriya binam bhakti binam janardana, yat pujitam maya deva paripurnam tad astu me, vidhi binam mantra binam yat kincit upapadhitam, kriya mantra vibhinaniva tat sarvam ksantum arhasi, ajnanad athava jnanad asubham yan maya krtam, ksantum arhasi tat sarvam dasyenaiva grhana mam, aparadha sahasrani kriyante 'har nisam maya, daso 'ham iti mam matva ksamasva madbusudana, "O Vishnu, please correct any omission or mistake in mantras, procedures or devotion in my worship. Please forgive whatever mistake or omission I have done, or any bad things I may have done, knowingly or unknowingly, and accept me as your humble servant. I know that I have committed many offenses, but please forgive me because I only want to serve you."

देवद्विजगुरुप्राज्ञपूजनं शौचमार्जवम् ।

ब्रह्मचर्यमहिंसा च शरीरं तप उच्यते ॥ १७-१४ ॥

devadvijaguruprajñapūjanam | śaucamāṛjavam | brahmacaryamahimsā ca śārīraṁ tapa ucyate || 17-14 ||

deva: to God; dvija: to the twice born; guru: to the teacher; prajna: to the wise and knowledgeable; pūjanam: worship; saucam: cleanliness; arjavam: simplicity; brahmacaryam: abstaining from lusty activities; ahimsa: abstaining from hatred; ca: and; śarīram: of the body; tapah: austerity; ucyate: it is said.

"It is said that the austerities of the body are the worship offered to God, to the twice-born, to the teacher, to the wise and knowledgeable, as well as cleanliness, simplicity, functioning on the transcendental level and abstaining from hatred.

Tapah or tapasya (austerity) is the conscious and deliberate effort that we invest in any sacred activity, and includes the choice to tolerate all difficulties and problems that may present themselves in the course of our service. We could also define it as the sense of responsibility and duty that sustains us in the performance of our tasks, and also the concentration or meditation that leads us to understanding and realization. Together with satya, daya and saucha, tapah is considered one of the four legs of Dharma. We have seen Krishna speaking about the importance of tapasya in verses 4.10, 5.29, 9.27 and 16.1, because without hard work and endurance of the difficulties that we come to face on our path, we cannot achieve much.

In Bhagavata Purana 2.7.5 and 2.7.39, Brahma the creator of this universe explains that he engaged in tapasya in order to become able to manifest all the various creations after the previous dissolution. This is also repeated in 2.9.8 and in 2.9.23-24, where Vishnu states, tapo me bridayam saksad, atmaham tapaso anagha, srijami tapasaivedam, grasami tapasa punah, bibharmi tapasa visvam, vīryam me duscaram tapah, "Tapasya is my own heart, and I am the soul of one who engages in tapasya. I create, maintain and dissolve the universe all by the same power of tapasya: therefore tapasya is power itself".

Here Krishna is still speaking about the people who have no knowledge of the shastra, and are spontaneously attracted to a particular type of religious activities according to their prevalent gunas. Good people, who are under the influence of the sattva guna or mode of goodness, are naturally in touch with their conscience and common sense, that is the inner guru (paramatma antaryami). They already feel that austerity is about controlling their own mind and senses for the purpose of evolving towards higher levels of consciousness. Therefore they feel attracted to God (or whatever we want to call the Supreme - brahman, paramatma, bhagavan, isvara, hari etc) as the original and complete source of everything that is good. Because of the sattva that is naturally in them, they want to participate to the ocean of sattva (bareh sattva nidher, Bhagavata Purana 1.3.26) that is God.

Similarly, the sattva in them instantly recognizes the sattva in spiritually advanced people, in the form of wisdom and knowledge (prajna), compassion and ability to guide others on the path of progress (guru), and sense of responsibility in taking care of society (dhija). The dhija, or "twice born", are those persons who have been adequately trained by a genuine guru for a certain number of years, and have become qualified to work in responsible positions in society - as teachers and consultants (brahmanas), administrators, rulers and warriors (kshatriyas) or entrepreneurs (vaisyas).

These professional occupations require a good deal of training, not just on the material level, but on the religious and ethical level as well, because the behavior and choices of the individuals in such positions can direct the entire society towards progress and prosperity, or towards disaster and sufferings. A genuine guru is not merely a brahmana who knows how to teach, but a brahmana who deeply understands the needs of each professional position and the solutions to all possible problems of society. In Vedic times, there were many such gurus, who independently and individually managed residential schools in their own homes (guru kula). Any child could be admitted in such schools at the sole discretion of the guru himself, because it was the responsibility of the individual guru to bring each disciple to the level of qualification that his particular potential could afford him. When the guru estimated that a particular disciple was ready to begin his duties in society, he officially recognized him as a "twice born", awarding him the varna position that he was able to occupy. This ceremony is very aptly called the "second birth", because it gives official recognition of the proper position of an individual in society. The first birth assigns the child to the varna of his parents, through a series of samskaras (psychological imprints) that start even before conception, but the original guna and karma that were carried from previous lifetimes are not sufficient to perform one's duty properly. The son of a surgeon may feel more comfortable around an operation room and medicine books than a boy who was born in a family from a different professional community, but no sane man will expect that he will be able to operate successfully without the long training and education that his father had. Also, a surgeon's son who wishes to become a surgeon like his father should not be trained just by his father, because a good surgeon is not necessarily a good teacher, and certainly he could be unable to correctly evaluate the potential and qualities of his son, due to attachment, projections and expectations.

The gurukula system focuses first on the general approach to life and the development of each individual's potential, the ethics of work and social interactions, and on learning "how to learn". It is not necessary for a guru to know all the particular details of all professions, because the Vedic system of education is open, and any graduate student can continue to search for knowledge by finding other gurus who are more specialized in the field, and also by associating with successful practitioners of their professional area (prajnas) as apprentices. All such people must be respected (worshiped) because respect and appreciation for their knowledge and realizations will greatly facilitate our own learning. Not only the teachers will be encouraged and inspired to give us more treasures, but we will also be more attentive and receptive in obtaining them. This can only happen when the teachers are qualified, the students are genuinely interested in learning and not distracted by other interests and pursuits, and each individual is given a personalized education that is neither below nor above his real potential.

Austerity also means developing good habits and following some basic rules that will help us keep control on our mind and senses. It is not difficult for a naturally good person to understand that he needs to cultivate cleanliness (saucam), as contamination obfuscates the mind and causes diseases that constitute a serious distraction to progress. Simplicity (arjavam) protects us from the distraction of unnecessary complications and superfluous desires and activities, and abstention from hatred (ahimsa) protects us from the distraction of unnecessary fighting and from the danger of falling down into rajas and tamas, with very bad results for our progress. The austerity called brahmacharya is a little more difficult to understand because the idea of sexual abstinence has been tainted by the cultural superimposition of abrahamic concepts of "mortifying the body". The word brahma acara literally means "functioning as brahman", therefore it does not contain the idea of sex, not even to condemn it. The mistake of abrahamic ideologies (and their derivatives) is to continue thinking about sex in a negative way until it becomes a real obsession, loaded with negativity (spite, hatred, fear etc) that is only waiting to explode. Any intelligent person will understand that such a policy is a disaster in the making. Granted, a brahmachari will follow rules for avoiding lusty opportunities, but with the proper environment and engagement, a normal human being only needs relatively less sexual encounters to satisfy his healthy needs after these have actually manifested.

So the practice of brahmacharya is not about repressing sexual urges after they have manifested, but about living free from the sex-obsessed social and cultural pressure and peer expectations that are so detrimental to the lives of many people in the present asuric society. Especially when we function on the transcendental level, we develop the habit of seeing people as spiritual beings, and not as bodies from which we could obtain a greater or smaller amount of sexual pleasure. It is a kind of innocence (as lack of malice) by which we focus on the individual's intelligence, talents, qualities, activities, and not on their gender and sexual characteristics. This will also help us in our progress because it enables us to learn from others without being hampered by the particular type of body they have.

अनुद्वेगकरं वाक्यं सत्यं प्रियहितं च यत् । स्वाध्यायाभ्यासनं चैव वाङ्मयं तप उच्यते ॥ १७-१५ ॥

anudvegakaram vākyaṁ satyaṁ priyahitam ca yat | svādhyāyābhyasanam caiva vāṅmayam tapa ucyate || 17-15 ||

anudvega karam: that does not cause (unnecessary) agitation; vakyam: speech; satyam: truthful; priya hitam: pleasing; ca: and; yat: which; svadhyaya: study of the science of the self; abhyasanam: practice/ sadhana; ca: and; eva: certainly; vak mayam: concerning speech; tapah: austerity; ucyate: it is said.

"It is said that the austerities of speech are the practice of sadhana and the study of atma vidya, and speaking in a truthful but pleasing and peaceful way.

The previous verse explained how naturally good people manage to control their minds and senses to facilitate their own progress and contribute to the progress of society, by actions and attitudes manifested by bodily activities. Here we are reminded that not only physical actions, but words as well can have a great impact on our own lives and on the lives of others around us, so we need to learn to control our power of speech, too. The tongue is the most fundamental and powerful of senses, because it recognizes and accepts the food (anna), that is the first and foremost factor of life, as we have already seen in verses 17.7 to 17.10 and their commentaries. Food is brahman, and speech is also brahman (sabda brahman), therefore the tongue is our most important instrument for elevation or degradation (6.5).

Food and speech can greatly influence our consciousness, establishing us on the transcendental level of the atman/ braman realization to which the scriptures lead us, or on the level of natural goodness (sattva), or also downwards, to the level of materialism (rajas) and to the level of stupidity (tamas), down to the level of asuric life (naraka). The two extremes of daivic and asuric nature are the opposite poles of consciousness, and the conditioned soul can move between them, upwards or downwards.

A sattvic person will spontaneously feel that spoken words can have powerful effects on his own progress and on the progress of others, therefore he will make an effort to control his tongue. The expression anudvega karam indicates an effect of agitation on the mind, as vegam means "urge, impetus", as a rush of emotion that excites and spurs one to action. This effect can be directed towards others or even towards oneself, and the prefix anu here indicates an excess of stimulation, that is usually negative. Sometimes it may be necessary to use strong words to stimulate ourselves or others into awareness or action, just like it is sometimes necessary to display anger for the same purpose, but there must always be conscious control and channeling the power in the proper direction and in the appropriate amount. When we work with raw power such as emotions and words, we must always remain aware of their potential danger and act accordingly. We must proceed gradually. To crack a coconut we do not need to use dynamite, and if we use excessive strength we could easily damage or destroy the very thing we are trying to save. So we should try not to hurt anyone with our words - exactly the opposite of what asuras usually like to do (krodhab parushyam, "angry and cruel with their words", 16.4).

When we speak to civilized and learned people, or even simply innocent, respectful, sincere and intelligent people, a few mild or delicate words should be sufficient to convey the full import of what we want to communicate ("a word to the wise"). Therefore it is said, satyam bruyat priyam bruyat, "truth should be told in the most pleasing way possible". However, the word priya not only means "pleasant, agreeable", but also "loving, affectionate", and we know that in some difficult cases love needs to be a little tough. So the expression priya hitam also refers to the actual benefit of the persons involved, which may not be immediately pleasing if they are immersed in rajas and tamas. To guide us properly in the difficult task of applying this concept, Krishna will elaborate more on the subject in verses 18.36 to 18.38, and in general all over the last chapter of Bhagavad gita at the conclusion of his teachings. Here we will simply quote verse 18.36: yat tad agre visam iva pariname 'mritopamam, tat sukham sattvikam proktam atma buddhi prasada jam, "That happiness that starts as unpleasant as poison but soon becomes like nectar, is sattvic and derives from the satisfaction of intelligence and the self".

Applied to the difficult job of training and educating people, this means that a guru (or a parent, a friend etc) should always try first to appeal to the intelligence and self (conscience) of the person that needs correction, using affectionate and pleasing words. This is also what Life does with each one of us: the early messages we receive are always whispered softly, and they become forceful and agitating only gradually, if we continue to choose to ignore them.

It is true that we should never correct people if we are not asked to do so, because it is likely that our words will not be heeded anyway. Friends do not let friends stay ignorant, but good advice is a difficult merchandise to distribute, even without charging any money. The line to draw is where the actions of ignorant people start to damage not only themselves but also others (in various types of aggression); at that point we should be prepared to intervene with appropriate explanations and actions, even if this will attract the violent attention of the evil-doer on us directly. Also, some will get agitated and offended even without any provocation, simply when the pure factual objective truth is expressed and made known, so we should really evaluate the factors involved in the situation before we take action.

Controlling one's power of speech also means telling the truth (satyam), something that asuras are unable to do (na satyam, 16.7). Satyam (truth) is also shivam (auspicious, beneficial) and sundaram (beautiful), but we see that ignorant people have wrong ideas about these principles, and they cannot understand how destroying ignorance can be an auspicious and beautiful action. The foremost example in this regard is the foolish behavior exhibited by Prajapati Daksha on the occasion of his yajna, where he offended Shiva Mahadeva by calling him "inauspicious" and "ugly". Of course that was a dramatic enactment for our education, because a great personality such as Daksha is certainly not on such a degraded level of consciousness, but still the story is very interesting, and contains some excellent conclusions. Another important aspect of truthfulness consists in keeping promises and vows in spite of personal difficulties.

The word svadhyaya, "study of the science of the self", does not necessarily refer to the shastra, but certainly points in that direction. A person who is naturally sattvic will be very interested in acquiring the genuine and original knowledge of the shastra, by which he will be able to strengthen and purify his own natural knowledge and conscience, and become more expert and skillful in speaking. He will instantly recognize the truth and value of the shastric teachings, and will quote them in his speeches.

The word abhyasanam indicates that the study of spiritual science should be a regular practice (sadhana), and that it should move from theory (jnana) to application (vijnana) in order to become really effective.

manah prasadah: mental satisfaction; saumyatvam: kindness; maunam: being able to remain in silence; atma vinigrahaḥ: self control; bhava samsuddhiḥ: purification of one's emotions; iti: thus; etat: this; tapah: austerity; manasam: of the mind; ucyate: it is said.

"It is said that the austerities of the mind are the purification of one's emotions/ nature, self-control, kindness, serenity, and the ability to remain in silence.

All the activities of the body and all the words we speak ultimately derive from the activities of our minds, and therefore if we want to progress in our evolution and properly perform our duties to society and to the universe at large, we need to make an effort (tapah) to discipline our mind - thoughts, emotions, memories etc.

Some people foolishly claim that "it is not possible to control the mind", and certainly this might well apply to themselves because they do not have the proper method. However, the entire science of yoga is aimed at controlling the mind by the process of pratyahara, dharana and dhyana. Patanjali's very definition of yoga is citta vritti nirodha (Yoga sutras, 1.1.2), "control of the activities of the mind". Other meanings of the word nirodha are "stopping, dissolution", as control certainly includes the destruction of the thing that is controlled. However, the purpose of yoga is not the complete dissolution of all activities of the mind, but rather the dissolution of its material movements. This enables the mind to really focus on the atman, as steadily as the flame of a lamp where there is no wind (nir-vana). Those who claim that the mind and all mental processes must be dissolved completely are telling us that the only way for a lamp to shine steadily is to put out the light - but that is tamas, and certainly not sattva or visuddha sattva.

Krishna also clearly states that controlling the mind (manah samyama) is not only possible, but it is the instrument and purpose of one's personal evolution through yoga, as we can see in verses 2.64, 3.7, 4.21, 4.27, 5.7, 5.28, 6.6, 6.7, 6.10, 6.12, 6.14, 6.15, 6.19, 6.24, 6.26, 6.27, 8.12, and 18.52. Specifically, Krishna recognizes that controlling the mind is very difficult, because it is powerful and restless. Arjuna said, cancalam hi manah kṛisṇa pramathī balavad dridham, tasyaḥam nigrāham manye vayoṛ iva su dukṣaram, "O Krishna, the mind is indeed restless, turbulent, powerful and stubborn. I think that controlling it would be more difficult than controlling the wind" (6.34). To that, Krishna had replied, asamyatna yogo duṣṭapraṇa itī me matib, vasyatmana tu yatata saḥyo 'vaptum upayata, "My opinion is that it is indeed very difficult to attain yoga when the mind is not controlled, but there are appropriate means by which with a little effort one will be able to control the mind" (6.36).

So what are these appropriate means by which we can control the mind? Krishna lists them here in perfect clarity, in such a way that any good (sattvic) person can apply them, even without bringing the shastra into the picture. The first is the good sense of realizing how many good things we have; the technical Sanskrit definition is manah prasadah, "mental satisfaction", and clearly indicates a deliberate act of the consciousness by which we tell the mind to be reasonable and recognize the good things we already have. In "new age" terms, this is called "being positive" or "being proactive". One of the greatest secrets of life is that contentment and happiness do not depend on external circumstances, but they are a choice that each of us can make at any time. Every situation in which we find ourselves in this world has advantages and disadvantages, and a positive person can find the "silver lining" in almost any circumstance. Of course, at times we seem to be totally overwhelmed by disaster and hopelessness, but we should always remember that such situations are temporary, and that by going through them (one way or another) we get the opportunity to burn our old karmic debts and purify ourselves. This is certainly a consolation that should pacify the mind.

The word saumyatvam, from the adjective saumya ("kind, sweet"), indicates a kind and sweet attitude, a gentleness of the character that is benevolent towards all creatures, that usually wins the hearts of innocent persons including most animals. This quality is strictly connected with ahimsa and para upakara, the work for the benefit of all creatures, that we have discussed already many times in previous comments. Of course, this must be a general attitude towards one and all, a beneficial practice for our own mind, that can attract positive persons in our life. It is not an absolute rule to follow in all our dealings with particular individuals, and certainly not when we are faced with aggressors and ill-motivated materialistic people who want to exploit or harm us.

The practice called maunam ("silence") refers to the choice of peacefulness and quiet, that is necessary to pacify the mind and focus it on the sattvic or transcendental level. It means we should deliberately avoid prajalpa or unnecessary/ nonsensical talking, and appreciate the virtues of silence and gravity, as Krishna also recommended to Uddhava in Bhagavata Purana 11.10.6. We should observe that here Krishna has listed mauna among the austerities of the mind, and not among the austerities of speech, because mauna does not consist in chatting and gossiping away in sign language, or becoming lost in fantasies and day dreaming, or watching TV etc without speaking to other people. Maunam is the practice of dropping what is not essential and focusing our attention exclusively on the inner reality of the atman, and as such it is connected to the yoga practice of pratyahara, "withdrawing the senses from the sense objects", that is also described by the expression atma vinigraha, the withdrawal of the mind from the external and internal sense objects that belong to the temporary level.

All these practices are summarized by the expression bhava samsuddhi, or "purification of one's nature". The word bhava contains the meanings of "nature, existence", as well as "emotions, feelings, attitude". When our attitude and emotions are purified by a deliberate act of elevation of the consciousness through the practices listed above, and directed towards sattva or visuddha sattva, our entire existence rises to a higher level and approaches the divine nature.

श्रद्धया परया तप्तं तपस्तत्त्रिविधं नरैः ।

अफलाकाङ्क्षिभिर्युक्तैः सात्त्विकं परिचक्षते ॥ १७-१७ ॥

śraddhaya parayā taptam tapastattrividham naraiḥ | aphalākāṅkṣibhiryuktaiḥ sāttvikam paricakṣate || 17-17 ||

śraddhaya: with faith; paraya: transcendental; taptam: performed; tapah: austerity; tat: that; tri vidham: of three types; naraiḥ: by human beings; aphala kankṣibhiḥ: without desiring any selfish result; yuktaiḥ: engaged; sāttvikam: in sattva guna; paricakṣate: it is considered.

"Religious austerities that are performed by human beings can be of three types. Those (austerities) that are not aimed at obtaining a selfish result are considered sattvic.

This verse is directly related to verse 17.11, that explained that sacred actions (yajna) that are not aimed at obtaining a selfish result are considered sattvic, and to verse 17.20 about charity (dana) that is naturally inspired by sattva. Only the sattvic type of austerities (and other religious practices) are endorsed by the śāstra, because they are naturally inspired by one's conscience and goodness, that come from the paramatma antaryami. This spontaneous attraction towards the good is sometimes called natural ethics, human values or common sense - not because it is very common among all people, but because it can be found in any sincere and intelligent (sattvic) people from all walks of life and all cultures, all times and all places. The special character of the genuine Vedic tradition is that it is perfectly in accordance to these natural sattvic values.

In the Vedic tradition of yoga, the various practices of austerity are called yama and niyama, and are considered the fundamental rules for all sādhakas. The yama ("restraining") rules are ahimsa (abstaining from violence), satya (abstaining from lying), asteya (abstaining from stealing), brahmacharya (abstaining from lusty activities), aparigraha (abstaining from accepting superfluous things), while the niyama ("engagement") rules are śauca (cleanliness), santosa (contentment), tapah (discipline), svādhyaya (search for knowledge), and isvara pranidhana (dedication to the Supreme). All these should be applied at the activities of the body (saririka), the speech (vācika) and the mind (manasika).

The three types of austerities are those inspired respectively by sattva, rajas and tamas. We have already examined in detail how the sattvic austerities of the body, speech and mind are performed (17.14 to 17.16), and now we will see the motivations and the results - remembering that we are still speaking of the very same practices and of the natural inclination of the individuals according to their material nature (constituted by the gunas). Such austerities are the worship offered to the Supreme, the respect to good people, the search for knowledge and purification of one's consciousness, as well as the practice of cleanliness, simplicity, benevolence towards all beings, kindness, serenity and self-control. These are already sattvic, because tapas (austerity) is a quality of natural sattva or goodness.

The influence of rajas and tamas can pollute even austerity and create the desire for recognition, honor, adoration, fame and other material advantages. Under this influence, one enjoys the worship he receives from subordinates and the distinction among his peers, and if the consciousness is not purified quickly, the practice of sādhana or tapah slides into dambha, religious ostentation and hypocrisy. When we are enlightened by the proper knowledge and consciousness that are characteristic of sattva, we remember the real purpose of our religious activities, including tapah: it is śraddha paraya - the supreme faith, or faith in the Supreme.

In chapter 14 we had already seen similar instructions: karmaṇah sukritasyābuh sāttvikam nirmalam phalam, rajasas tu phalam dukkham ajnanam tamasaḥ phalam, sāttvat sajayate jñanam rajasas lobha eva ca, pramada mohau tamaso bhavato jñanam eva ca, "They say that sattva gives immaculate results as properly performed duties, while rajas produces distress, and tamas produces ignorance. From sattva, knowledge is generated. From rajas, greed is born, and certainly tamas manifests madness, illusion, ignorance and stupidity" (14.16, 14.17). These repetitions are not a literary defect, but rather they are meant to impress on us the great importance of understanding the difference between the various motivations and effects in religious activities.

सत्कारमानपूजार्थं तपो दम्भेन चैव यत् ।

क्रियते तदिह प्रोक्तं राजसं चलमध्रुवम् ॥ १७-१८ ॥

satkāramānapūjārtham tapo dambhena caiva yat | kriyate tadiha proktaṁ rājasam calamadhruvam || 17-18 ||

sat kara: for admiration; mana: for prestige; pūja: worship; artham: for the sake of; tapah: austerity; dambhena: out of self-righteousness; ca: and; eva: certainly; yat: which; kriyate: is done; tat: that; iba: in this world; prokta: it is said; rajasam: in rajas guna; calam: restless; adhruvam: unstable.

"Austerities that are performed in this world to obtain prestige and admiration, and to be worshiped (by others), out of self-righteousness, are said to be in rajas and are unstable.

This verse is also connected with verse 17.12, that described ritual sacrifices (yajna) influenced by rajas: abbisandhaya tu phalam dambhartham api caiva yat, ijjate bharata srestha tam yajnam viddhi rajasam, "O Arjuna, know that the ritual sacrifices performed out of self-righteousness or to get selfish materialistic results, are classified under rajas".

The influence of rajas produces greed and selfishness. Sometimes the technical term rajas is translated as "passion", but it seems that this definition is not really covering the subject, because one can have a passion for spiritual life, dharma etc, without any trace of selfishness or greed, and that passion could not be called rajasic under any circumstance. Also, we need to differentiate between rajas proper and the mixture of rajas and tamas (greed and rage) that has already been described as asuric, and that constitutes the greatest enemy in this world (3.37). While religious activities influenced by rajas are simply unstable and do not bring permanent results (calam adbhruvam), those influenced by rajas and tamas together are useless or worse, they bring negative results (16.10, 16.15, 16.17).

Let's now analyze the austerities in rajas, their motivations and results: the motivations of rajas are based on greed, so they are aimed at the selfish acquisition of objects, positions or some other material advantages related to the ahankara and mamata delusion. The word artham means "acquisition of something valuable", and also "purpose" or "meaning", and indicates that ordinary people cannot even understand why someone should practice austerities (or yajna, or dana) for selfless spiritual purposes only. Therefore someone who has risen above the opportunistic level is already beyond the human platform and is rising towards the divine dimension. The three selfish desires created by rajas in the religious field are listed here as satkara, mana and puja. Satkara means "recognition" and refers to the good name and fame or credit that one can obtain by performing impressive austerities and other religious activities.

In a reasonable measure, this can also apply to the normal healthy validation that a student receives from the teacher, or to a reasonable amount of encouragement we receive from other people in general so that we can heal any shortcoming in our normal self esteem. But these are crutches for cripples, and as we grow stronger, we are expected to abandon them and purify our motives completely. Also, name and fame is a good investment for a career in preaching, but the benefit stops there and is short-lived; if we want to make the most of it, we should use it for spiritual progress and then discard it. For example Chaitanya, Adi Shankara and other great personalities accepted the order of sannyasa (which is a huge form of austerity) to make themselves noticed by society, so that people would be attracted to listen to what they wanted to teach.

Rajas can and should certainly be engaged in transcendental work if required, but we should never become attached to it for its own sake. On the other hand a negative use of satkara, that contaminates rajas with tamas, precipitates us into the foolish pride of having become famous, and starting to think that it is all our merit and we should get some profit out of it. This is the reason why one should never condition the distribution of spiritual knowledge to the payment of fees; showing gratitude to the teacher with some offering (guru dakshina) is a must, but it does not have to be a specific amount of money - it could be any form of sincere service.

The word mana ("honor") has been already analyzed in other verses (6.7, 12.18, 14.25, 15.5, 16.10, 16.17) as the dangerous desire for special attention, that could easily increase ahankara or false identification, even more than satkara. Therefore, mana should be directed to the Supreme only: man mana bhava mad bhakto (9.34, 18.65). Traditionally, this special respect is shown by standing up to receive the persons we are honoring, greeting them with folded hands, praising them for their qualities, following them to the door when they are leaving etc. The difference between satkara and mana is that mana does not depend on a person's true accomplishments, but is generally based on adulation. This is particularly dangerous because the foolish victims of such flattery become vulnerable to emotional manipulation by people who are actually interested in exploiting them. There is a famous saying, ati bhakti chori lakshana, "too much devotion could be the symptom of a thieving mentality".

The word puja, "worship", in this case indicating the desire to be worshiped, is one further step into the danger of sliding from rajas to tamas and straight into the asuric mentality. In traditional Hinduism, worship is a special mark of respect and affection that is offered not only to God but also to God's representatives, such as the guru, our superiors, sacred scriptures, holy places, and even beneficial plants and animals that enrich our lives with their blessings. The difference between puja and mana is service; while mana is simply offered with words and symbolic gestures of respect, puja is active engagement of energy and resources, such as offering riches for the personal use of the persons we are worshiping.

The austerities performed with the purpose of obtaining such benefits already find their reward in these petty gains and are temporary because people forget easily. Those same followers who worshiped you today will leave tomorrow to find someone more interesting and impressive, or even make some plans to eliminate you and take your place. The mind of a rajasic person is always very active, running after new ideas and desires; because he performs the austerities only to get a particular material result, with the next mind wave he will try a different practice that seems to offer more advantages or to be more specifically recommended for the next result he wants to get. He thinks he can choose the mantras and the devas to "use" to obtain the desired results - like one looks for a better shop to purchase goods - as he believes that one form of God is different from another. So the rajasic person is not able to engage in one specific method for a longer period, but he always wants to change sadhana, to try new mantras or new ista devas, and consequently the results will be very temporary and limited. On the other hand, the real permanent result of austerity is the realization of the atman through the sattvic concentration of the mind; in this way we can end the cycle of births and deaths, confirmed in Maitreya Upanishad (1.6): cittasya hi prasadena hanti karma subha asubham, prasannatmatmani sthitva sukham aksayam asnute, "The happiness found in the contentment of the consciousness destroys all the consequences of actions".

मूढग्राहेणात्मनो यत्पीडया क्रियते तपः । परस्योत्सादनार्थं वा तत्तामसमुदाहृतम् ॥ १७-१९ ॥

mūḍhagrāheṇātmano yatpīḍayā kriyate tapaḥ | parasyotsādanārtham vā tattāmasamudāhṛtam || 17-19 ||

mudha: stupid; grabena: with much effort/ greedy; atmanah: self; yat: that; pidaya: by torture; kriyate: is performed; tapah: austerity; parasya: of others; utsadana artham: to cause damage; va: or; tat: that; tamasam: in tamas guna; udahrtam: it is said.

"The foolish austerities that are performed with great effort, by torturing oneself, or to cause damage to others, are said to be in tamas."

Two categories of people are attracted by tamasic austerities: the asuras and the imbeciles. This verse starts with the imbeciles (mudhas), because they are not as degraded as the asuras, who have deliberately chosen evil. Generally mudhas as a class are followers or worshipers of the asuras, because fools can easily be manipulated into worshipping apparently powerful persons: yajante sattvika devan yaksa raksamsi rajasah, pretan bhuta ganams canye yajante tamasa janah, "Those who are sattvic worship the Personalities of God, those who are in rajas worship the raksahas and the yakshas, and those who are in tamas offer sacrifices to ghosts and other types of secondary beings" (17.4). In the next two verses Krishna had also explained that austerities that are not recommended in the scriptures, performed out of pride, egotism, lust and attachment, and that torture one's body, are actually demoniac in nature because they are averse to the Paramatma residing within one's body: asastra-vibitam ghoram tapyante ye tapo janah, dambhabankara-samyuktah, kama-raga-balanvitah; karsayantah sarira-stham bhuta-gramam acetasah mam caivantah sarira-stham tan viddhy asura-niscayan (17.5-6). This is clearly defined as madness (14.13) and complete confusion (18.32).

The word mudha indicates here the obtuse obstinacy of those who embrace foolishness in beliefs and behaviors; this category includes all those austerities that are meant to damage oneself or others, because they are really stupid. Only foolish children throw tantrum scenes, hurting themselves to attract the attention of the parents and to blackmail them into giving what should not be given. This is confirmed by the word grabana, that conveys a strong greed, almost a violent action to grab or snatch something, as we saw in the chapter that described the activities of the asuras. The expression grihitva graban ("grabbing acquisitions") in verse 16.10 referred to greed for non permanent material things, where graban means "objectives, achievements", as something that is very difficult to obtain and brings a lot of problems even after getting it. Here is the complete verse: kamam asritya duspuram dambha mana madanvitah, mohad grihitvasad graban pravartante 'suci vratah, "Taking shelter in insatiable lust, religious hypocrisy and false prestige, immersed in confused and delusional beliefs, they dedicate themselves to adharmic achievements, and engage in impure so-called religious vows" (16.10).

The word pidaya ("by suffering, torture") is mentioned here together with atmanah, that means "self", so the idea of masochistic practices is very obvious. We need to draw a clear line between the austerities that are meant to help us transcend the identification with the body (that are actually good for the atman), and the self-damaging austerities in tamas. The difference is that in the first category there is no damage inflicted to the body, no blood, no burning, no scarring, no mutilation, no disabling. We can see for example the traditional festival of Thaipusam, in which devotees get their bodies pierced with small spears or hooks, but there is never any bleeding. Another example is the famous fire walking, in which devotees walk barefoot over a stretch of live coals, and nobody gets any burn or damage. In both cases, the devotees are immersed in a deep trance and their spiritual sentiments completely control the reactions of their bodies; this is actually the only purpose of the entire exercise. On the other hand, the asuric austerities are performed by spilling blood sometimes even in very small children, or also mutilating body parts (often in the sensitive genital area), flogging etc, all for the purpose of causing pain as a form of punishment or atonement or as a sign of loyalty and obedience.

Krishna has already said that such activities are demonic in nature: dambhabankara samyuktah, kama raga balanvitah, "Those people who do not follow the directions of the shastra submit themselves to terrible practices, out of egotism and false religiousness, under the sway of lust and attachment" (17.5). This is also confirmed in Niralamba Upanishad: mudha iti ca kartritva ady abankara bhava rudho mudhab, asuram iti ca brahma visnvi isana indradi nama isvarya akamanaya nirasana japa agnihotra adisvantara atmanam santapayati ca atyugra raga dvesa vibhimsa dambhadyapeksitam tapa asuram, "The foolish asuras engage in austerities with a strong sense of abankara and with great outcry, but they are filled with attachment and repulsion (duality), hypocrisy and self-righteousness, and violence. Sometimes they chant the japa of the names of Brahma, Vishnu, Shiva, Indra and other Devas, because they want to obtain special powers from them. They stand for a long time, observe long fasting, perform fire sacrifices, and submit themselves to horrible sufferings."

The expression parasya utsadana artham, "to damage or destroy others", is particularly interesting here. Not only tamasic people inflict suffering and damage to themselves, but they also want to cause damage and sufferings to others, and therefore they must be stopped. There is nothing brahminical or spiritual in black tantra, even if those who resort to these horrible practices are convinced that "their motivation is good". Only ghosts and other similar creatures respond to such worship, and establishing a relationship with them will certainly cause the worshiper to join them after death (9.25, 17.4) and share their horrible condition.

दातव्यमिति यद्दानं दीयतेऽनुपकारिणे । देशे काले च पात्रे च तद्दानं सात्त्विकं स्मृतम् ॥ १७-२० ॥

dātavyamiti yaddānam dīyate'nupakāriṇe । deśe kāle ca pātre ca taddānam sātṭvikam smṛtam ॥ 17-20 ॥

datavyam: that must be given, out of duty; iti: thus; yat: which; danam: charity; dīyate: is given; anupakarine: without considering one's benefit/ any return; dese: in a proper place; kale: at a proper time; ca: and; patre: to a proper recipient; ca: and; tat: that; danam: charity; sattvikam: in sattva guna; smrtam: is remembered.

"Charity that is given out of duty, in a proper place and at the proper time, to a proper recipient, without considering one's selfish advantage, is remembered as sattvic.

The definition of charity includes the donation of any amount of cash money, valuable items of various types and especially food, clothing and necessity accessories such as umbrellas or shoes, work instruments, useful objects, useful animals (especially cows), or even one's service as in the pro bono activities of doctors, lawyers, consultants and other professionals. The value of the donation should not be calculated monetarily, but from the spirit or motivation that prompts it, and from the amount of self-sacrifice one puts into it. For example, a charitable gift offered by a man who has limited financial means will bring better results than a large amount of money or other valuables offered by a thief who stole them without being apprehended.

We have already seen that actions in goodness bring happiness and purification, actions performed in greed bring sufferings and anxiety, and actions performed in ignorance bring degradation, illusion and madness. In this chapter, Krishna illustrates the "spontaneous religious inclinations" of people who have no knowledge about the shastra and simply follow their gunas, or natural qualities (goodness, greed or foolishness). Charity is certainly a big factor in religion, and if we want to situate ourselves in sattva, when we give something it is important to know to whom we are giving, and how our gift will be used, because we will share the results of the actions that were enabled by our act of charity.

This verse clearly mentions the three principal factors of the action: desa (place), kala (time) and patra (person involved), because different circumstances require different actions. The patra factor is the most important of all: for example, the best charity to give to someone who is hungry is to offer proper food. If we give money to a person who claims to be hungry, we cannot be sure that he will actually purchase proper food; in degraded societies beggars prefer to buy booze or addictive toxic drugs, gamble away the money, or are forced to pay heavy percentages of their collection to organized criminals, so our well-intentioned action will bring bad karmic results. If a beggar is pretending to be hungry but refuses proper food (as it usually happens), or deliberately mistreats children to use them as props for his emotional manipulation of the sentimental public, your donation will make you his supporter and accomplice.

The time and place of the act of charity are also important. The smṛiti shastras explain that there are auspicious times and holy places where charity becomes more powerful, because it encourages people to meet with a good purpose and establish relationships of respect and affection that are not based on material identifications and attachments. Such conventional times are listed mainly as the eclipses (solar and lunar), the beginning of the solar month (sankranti), the full moon (purnima), or the great festivals or yajnas. In this verse the word smṛitab ("are remembered") also indicates that genuine good charity remains forever in the memory of the people to inspire many more to follow the good example.

Generally people simply believe that charity should be given to the poor, the handicapped, the abandoned, the suffering and the downtrodden, to relieve their misery; so they give money to any beggar they meet, without asking any questions, because they feel it is their duty to help their fellow men in need. Charity is also a major source of income for the various religious denominations, and it is sometimes presented as obligatory, as the tithe (generally 1/10 of one's income) or balal tax (on various foods) demanded by the abrahamic faiths. A member of the congregation feels it is his duty to contribute money regularly and also for special occasions from time to time. In principle, this is a good thing, because charity is recommended universally as a deeply religious practice - the sacrifice of one's hard earned resources to the service of society as the body of God. Sharing one's wealth with the right people (patra, "recipient") is a source of inner satisfaction, happiness, and good fortune. This is how we create good karma that will come back to us in our own times of need.

However, in order to bring these benefits to society and to the individual, charity must be done carefully, and in accordance to the principles of goodness (sattva) without the influence of greed or ignorance (rajas and tamas). The main quality of sattva is wisdom, knowledge or intelligence, therefore we need first of all to understand what is our actual duty, and how to perform it properly. It is said that the road to hell is paved with good intentions, and certainly good deeds that are not supported by the proper intelligence and knowledge can backfire horribly and damage everyone involved.

Here we need to make a clear distinction between a healthy society and a degraded society, because in a healthy society ordinary citizens can confidently donate food and wealth to beggars, knowing that they are genuine people in distress who temporarily need a little help. In a healthy society there are no professional beggars thriving on manipulating people's compassion, because the King makes sure that everyone is properly engaged in their social duties. The only accepted habitual mendicants are renounced religious persons such as brahmacharis and sannyasis, who behave in a sattvic and saintly way and never appeal to people's pity with some show of personal degradation. Quite the opposite: brahmacharis and sannyasis dedicate all their time and energy to spiritual knowledge - studying and distributing the essence of the shastra - and therefore they constitute an important part of the great family that is human society. They are the children and the grandparents of all, and the grihasthas (family people) feed them respectfully and affectionately, out of duty, establishing a sattvic relationship that is not marred by material identification and attachment (as it would be if such children and elders remained in their own homes). This charity is very beneficial to the grihasthas too, because they learn to take care of others without exercising selfishness, greed, or need to control the people who depend on them.

The word datavyam ("that must be given as a duty") is important because it defines the boundaries of appropriate duty, according to one's position in society, to justice and proper functioning of society, to one's natural debt (rina) to the world that is paid through the five great yajnas (brahma yajna, pitri yajna, deva yajna, bhuta yajna, nara yajna), and so on. Our duty is to support good people (our personal family and our extended family and even our ancestors or pitris) in a reasonable number, to reciprocate the gifts and favors we receive (with the dakshina to the guru and the brahmanas), to take care of the travelers (atithi seva) and other good people who may occasionally need assistance (manava seva or nara yajna), to feed the good animals (bhuta yajna) and to participate to the collective life of the universe, each in our small way. These activities are sufficient, and we do not need to burden ourselves with more than what we can carry. It is said, "charity begins at home", and we should never neglect our own personal evolution or the true needs of our family and community, to run after some idealistic crusade aimed at "saving the world out there".

Working to fight poverty in society and at global level is a full time job, the duty of kshatriyas and brahmanas who are competent and intelligent enough to take the proper actions. The same applies to alleviating the sufferings of the victims of natural disasters or other great calamities such as wars and persecutions. An intelligent person will be able to see the dangers of uninformed donations that can easily be misappropriated by devious individuals or organizations, to the extreme of greedy asuric schemes played on the foolish public, aimed at actually causing more sufferings and victims in order to create more demand in the "charity market" for their profit. Some "religious leaders" flock like vultures in a frenzy of anticipation whenever they find some natural disaster, because the bereavement and despair of the victims make them weak and vulnerable to aggressive conversion campaigns based on blackmailing and emotional manipulation.

The King of the land is the only person responsible and qualified to conduct relief work in his own kingdom, and he should not allow anybody else to act independently in this regard, including the international organizations. Local people may help their neighbors, but simply out of duty towards the members of their community as a family. In this regard we need to clarify that the word "community" indicates "people with common interests living in a particular area" as neighbors, and has nothing to do with people's birth categorization (social class, caste, religion of birth, etc). Restricting social cooperation by means of birth prejudice or ideological/ political allegiance to a particular group is a sinful activity that must be curbed, because it perpetuates artificial divisions, resentment, hatred and envy, and gives people the wrong motivations to participate in charity. This brings us to the second factor mentioned in this verse: anupakarine, or "without expecting anything in return for oneself", that is the exact opposite of dambhena ("with ostentation and hypocrisy", 16.17, 17.18).

Political charity (including political charity dressed as religious charity) is meant to create or reinforce vote banks and is certainly not selfless, therefore it will not bring good results. On the contrary, it will encourage the general people to become irresponsible and depending on handouts, developing a beggar's mentality when instead they could work honestly and take care of themselves and their own subordinates. In extreme cases, such political beneficiaries will even become arrogant and demand special privileges as in the notorious "reservation system" enforced in India to favor the so-called "minorities" without any consideration of merit or need.

The Government's duty (the King's duty) is to engage everyone in their own sva dharma according to their individual guna and karma, and support them in developing their true potential. The first foundation for this work is the concept of dharmā, or selfless work performed to support society. Without teaching this concept in theory and practice (through the example of the srestha, 3.21), a Government is simply a failure. Government people and leaders must be shown as having very specific professional duties and fulfilling them in the proper spirit, otherwise no legislation or scheme will ever improve the conditions of society. More laws will only create more difficulties to good people, because of the bureaucracy involved and the blind restrictions that can easily be exploited by ill-motivated people, and corruption can only increase. Good people do not need laws in order to behave properly, and bad people will always find a way to circumvent the laws or will even break the laws regardless of the severity of the punishment promised. In fact, too many laws will keep the Government servants busy with petty matters while criminals remain free to commit any aggression or damage, protected by shameless lawyers and corrupt police and magistrates.

There should be one law only: that anyone who attempts any type of aggression against a peaceful person (human or animal) should immediately be stopped, and the kshatriyas' duty is to help the weak who are personally unable to fight off such aggressors (atatayinah). If this one law is respected, all the members of society will be free to work selflessly, each in their own capacity or sva dharma, for the benefit of the entire society, and there will be no poverty and no injustice. This means there will be no needy people, no downtrodden, homeless, poverty-stricken, abandoned, degraded or marginalized people - and therefore the ordinary citizens will not have to take care of them.

Charity to the destitute and victims of tragedy is a duty of the kshatriyas only, because they are responsible for the protection and maintenance of the prajas; ordinary citizens already contribute to this work by paying reasonable taxes and tributes to the Government, and should not be asked to take more responsibility than that. If a private citizen has wealth in excess and wants to share it with society after having fulfilled all his personal duties, he can make a donation to a qualified brahmana, who will not only distribute appropriate food and other necessities to the deserving and needy people, but will also be able to teach and guide these unfortunate people in their personal development, so that they will not remain in need indefinitely.

Again, it is important to understand here that brahmanas never condition their social assistance to sectarian allegiance or conversion, but support individuals according to their merits and needs so that they can become self-sufficient and useful members of society. These merits are evaluated on the basis of the universal and natural principles of ethics only. Furthermore, any twice-born (dvija, including brahmanas, kshatriyas and vaisyas) can conduct a traditional yajna, as that is the best opportunity to distribute good food, clothing and useful articles to all participants, thus encouraging the general population to participate and absorb dharmic knowledge and sentiments.

Participation to such events is traditionally open to all people, without consideration of qualifications or position. We see that in the puranic stories, even dogs and other animals were sumptuously fed and honored during yajnas. Again, the karta (promoter of the yajna) should perform this duty selflessly, without expectation of returns or any service, restitution or even gratitude from the beneficiaries, because such motivation would destroy the eternal results of his piety. He should not even expect to obtain name, fame and glory, or to earn paradise for himself or his kith and kin, because that would not be charity, but a business transaction or payment. We will see in the next verse that this type of rajasic charity brings only temporary results.

यत्तु प्रत्युपकारार्थं फलमुद्दिश्य वा पुनः ।

दीयते च परिक्लिष्टं तद्दानं राजसं स्मृतम् ॥ १७-२१ ॥

yattu pratyupakārārtham phalamuddiśya vā punaḥ | dīyate ca parikṛiṣṭaṁ taddānaṁ rājasam smṛtam || 17-21 ||

yat: which; prati upakara: to get something in return; artham: for the sake of; phalam: result; uddiśya: desiring; va: or; punaḥ: again; dīyate: is given; ca: and; pariklistam: without a good sentiment; tat: that; danam: charity; rajasam: in rajas guna; smṛtam: it is remembered.

"Charity performed with the desire of obtaining something in return, to get a material advantage, or without a good sentiment, is remembered as being in rajas.

Charity given at the proper time, in the proper place and to a worthy person, without expecting anything in return, is considered in the mode of sattva and giving eternal benefits, while charity performed in expectation of some return, or given unwillingly, is in the mode of rajas and will bring temporary results. Charity given without considering time, place and recipient, without respect and affection, is under the mode of tamas and will not bring any good results. Usually rajas and tamas tend to overlap, because greed and selfishness make people blind and deaf to reason and knowledge, therefore a materialist ends up behaving very foolishly and to his own disadvantage, still strongly convinced he is acting for his own good interest. The word prati upakara, indicating the intention to get some benefit in return, some reciprocation or advantage, is opposed to the word anupakara expressed in the previous verse. Foolish people may misinterpret this concept by claiming that selfless charity requires the donor not to verify how his money is spent and who will get the benefits, because in this way there will be no complications due to personal contact and interests. However, ignorance is not a symptom of sattva: it is tamas, and will not bring positive results. Since foolish people are regularly targeted for exploitation by the asuras (17.19), acting in tamas will immediately attract the attention of fraudsters. Cheaters would not be so successful if there were not so many people who are ready to be cheated, and conversely, when asuras and cheaters come to power, their first concern is to idiotize the mass of people with all possible means - brainwashing propaganda, withdrawal of information and circulation of misinformation, restrictions on education, and even physical brain damage through toxic polluting substances administered through drinking water, industrial food and even toothpaste. This verse again highlights the fact that the motivation of the action is the real crucial point. The action in itself, as people can observe it externally, is not the only factor in the karmic results, as ignorant people usually believe. A sharp knife can be used to cut the abdomen of a human being, but if the action is performed with the proper knowledge, to remove a malignant tumor or an acutely inflamed appendix, the result will be saving the life of the patient. On the other hand, if the knife is used by a murderer who wants to inflict a painful death to an innocent person, the action will bring terrible karmic results. Similarly, the act of donating something in charity may superficially seem the same in all cases, but the motivations of the donor will make all the difference for all the persons involved.

Most human beings live under the influence of rajas, with some hues of sattva or tamas, therefore charity is usually subject to greed motivations, gross or subtle. On the lowest level, one gives charity to become famous and respected, and to get a higher position in society - as we have seen in the example of politicians. The results of such charity are quickly consumed by the immediate material advantage one gets. Another popular motivation for charity is the purification or atonement for some bad actions one has committed, knowingly or unknowingly; even bosses of organized crime gangs are anxious to make donations especially to the religious affiliation to which they belong, hoping that such charity will counteract the bad karma they have created. It is a sort of "divine money laundering service" they seek, but since they will continue to commit the same crimes and sinful activities, the good results are negligible. Most people just want to feel good about themselves and get a boost to their ego and vanity, especially if they suffer from low self esteem. On a higher level than these, we have people who give charity only because they get some tax exemption or benefit; however, this particular motivation can be raised to a sattvic level if they choose to channel their donations to people they actually know as honest and qualified, and for causes that are actually dharmic.

On a slightly higher level yet, we find people who want to get religious merits (punya) to improve their condition and good luck in this life and in the next. All the famous prayers and recitations from the shastras are traditionally accompanied by some phala sruti verses illustrating the blessings and material advantages one can obtain by practicing the pious reading. The same applies to charity. For many people, this desired result is the attainment of paradise or svarga, the higher planetary systems where they will be able to live very long lives in a perfect body and surrounded by heavenly pleasures. This motivation is also material, and once one has exhausted such pious merits, they will have to return to the human condition to earn some more: te tam bhuktvā svarga lokam viśalam ksine punye martya lokam viśanti, evam tryi dharmam anuprapanna gatagatam kama kama labhante, "After a long time spent in the enjoyment of Svargaloka, those who have exhausted their virtuous merits fall down again to the level of mortals. In this way, following strictly the path of the three dharmas, they develop a lust for desires and they continue to take birth and die" (9.21).

Charity can also be motivated by a mixture of rajas and tamas, indicated here by the word pariklistam, "without a good sentiment", or even "begrudgingly" or "unwillingly". One may be forced to give charity by the order of a superior (parents, teacher, government officer, religious leader etc) or even by the request of a spouse or friend, or because everybody else is giving and one is afraid of being criticized. This is often the case for the presents offered to bad people for birthday parties or other similar occasions; one feels obligated to buy something to give, but there are no good sentiments involved.

Quite often, one is forced to give something to a beggar to get rid of the disturbance, especially when professional beggars resort to the "annoying" strategy, by calling out loudly for a long time, walking around following people or by touching and pulling people's clothes or hand or leg and so on. In this strategy, the professional beggar can also make good use of a repulsive appearance or offensive smell deliberately created, that makes his presence and contact very unpleasant. In both such cases, there is no affection and respect or good sentiment involved in the act of giving, and rather the opposite is created on both sides - resentment, envy, spite, hatred, and so on. This particular situation is illustrated also in the next verse that discusses charity performed under the influence of tamas.

अदेशकाले यद्दानमपात्रेभ्यश्च दीयते । असत्कृतमवज्ञातं तत्तामसमुदाहृतम् ॥ १७-२२ ॥

adesakāle yaddānamapātrebhyascha dīyate | asatkṛtamavajñātaṁ tattāmasamudāhṛtam || 17-22 ||

adesa kale: without consideration for place and time; yat: which; danam: charity; apatrebhyah: without considering the recipient; ca: and; dīyate: is given; asat kṛitam: without respect; avajnatam: without knowledge/ awareness; tat: that; tamasam: in tamas guna; udahritam: it is said (to be).

"Charity that is given without proper consideration of time, place and recipient, without respect or without knowledge, is considered to be in tamas.

Charity influenced by ignorance does not bring benefits, and it should be avoided. We see that often foolish people mistake tamas for satva, and believe that their acts of charity are the best because they do not know where their donations go ("your right hand should not know when your left hand gives"), when in fact they are merely deluding themselves and actually causing damages to everyone, as we were mentioning earlier. Recipient of ill-advised charity will be encouraged to develop a servile, dependent and irresponsible mentality, to tell lies and misrepresent facts, to participate to corruption, to become arrogant and exploitative, and so on. In some cases, the beneficiaries will feel humiliated, scared and impotent because of their dependency and servility, lose their self-esteem and therefore suffer in their personal relationships and become depressed, or they will develop rage, envy and resentment towards the donors, thinking that the difference in position between him and the donor is due to some social injustice, and that he is been exploited and used. This may trigger social unrest and even encourage aggressions and violent crimes, as well as drug abuse, alcoholism and other social problems. This happens especially when such charity is given without respect or even spitefully (asat kṛitam), in extreme cases even with the intention of insulting the recipient of the gift. The asat karah thinks, "Look at this miserable person, this rejected human waste. I have pity because he is so degraded and I am such a good person, so I will give him some charity". Sometimes this exercise in self-righteousness is prompted by some little unconscious sense of guilt, that is quickly put to sleep with a small bribe from the ego.

The insult can be conscious or unconscious, expressed verbally or non-verbally or implied, or demonstrated by the action itself, by giving something to a person who cannot utilize it - a comb to bald people, for example, or a bicycle to a paralyzed person, illustrated books to the blind, sexually provocative clothes to a modest woman, or a beef burger to a vegetarian. Of course this includes the charity acts of people who donate expired toxic medicines, rotten food, broken objects and garbage of various kinds. In the Vedic tradition, according to etiquette one should also be careful about offering one's old used shoes and clothes, because such action is considered an official statement of the inferior social position and lower respectability of the recipient of the gift.

The word avajnatam means "without attention, without caring, without bothering to know", as avajna means "lack of attention" and even "contempt" towards the patra ("recipient"). This closely links the action to the three key words adesa akale apatrebhyah, that are evidence of such carelessness. Adesa ("in a bad place" and akale ("at a bad time") refer to the casual behavior of a donor who throws his gift to the ground or keeps it in some inappropriate container (dirty, contaminated, leaky etc), or gives the donation in front of unsympathetic people, or approaches the recipient at some inconvenient time - in the night, while he is sleeping, while he is engaged in bodily functions etc.

The word apatrebhyah, "to those who should not be given", is referring to the spiteful gifts above mentioned but also to the unworthy recipients, such as the false beggars and the adharmic organizations that present themselves as charities but have different motivations. In this case, apatrebhyah could also be translated as "without a beneficiary", or "an unknown beneficiary". As we have already mentioned, unfortunately in degraded societies there are professional beggars who exploit the good sentiments of the public and sometimes collect large amounts of money, often by pretending to be physically handicapped or by carrying a sleeping infant (usually heavily drugged and sometimes kidnapped from its actual family). Giving "charity" to such people does not create good karma for anyone, because fraudsters and manipulators are encouraged to continue in their activities without progressing in their personal evolution. Especially if a beggar says he is hungry but he does not want pure and healthy food, do not give him anything at all. To test the character of a street beggar, give him a very small coin and see his reaction: if he appreciates the gift you may give more, but usually professional beggars will show disdain and refuse to accept the small change, demanding a more substantial gift.

Often people donate money to some relief organizations, governmental or non-governmental, and believe they have done their part, or their duty. They implicitly trust such organizations to utilize the funds in the best possible way, and they never attempt to verify the facts beyond the propaganda, or to question the policies and their implications. Usually the feeling of duty is determined by the donor's personal allegiance to the Organization or its presented ideology, either religious or non-religious. Sometimes the sentiment of duty is fulfilled by choosing an Organization that is endorsed by the Government or by international Agencies, or is big and famous enough. Unfortunately, these are not sufficient guarantees that your donation will bring you good karmic results, because you do not really know how your money will be used (and inquiries are discouraged). Among the professionals in the field, it is common knowledge that the largest organizations normally spend a huge percentage of their income in advertisement, political lobbying and power games, or in even shadier business.

Usually, only 1/4th of the collected donations actually reaches the intended beneficiaries or is used for them, and even so, those who receive aids are often blackmailed into religious conversion or paying sexual favors to the field workers of the organizations. Sometimes the bulk of the donations is used for something even more sinister, as in the case of covert terrorist organizations (often based on abrahamic ideologies) that commit serious crimes, including murder, rape, destruction of property, persecution of dissidents, acquisition and use of weapons of various kinds, and so on. It is important to understand that the people who contributed funds to such organizations are accomplices of such crimes and will share the karmic consequences. Ignorance is no excuse.

"Om tat sat: these are remembered as the three references to Brahman. Since very ancient times, brahmanas (apply them) in the (study of the) Vedas and in the performance of ritual sacrifices.

In this chapter, Krishna has illustrated the religious activities spontaneously performed according to the three material gunas by those who do not know the teachings of the śāstra, showing that sattvic people naturally behave in a good way according to the universal and eternal principles of natural ethics called dharma, that are the very same foundation of the knowledge offered by the śāstra. However, the Vedic scriptures contain much more than instructions and explanations about natural ethical principles. The śāstras contain the record of the activities and teachings of extraordinarily powerful spiritual personalities dating back from the beginning of creation, as well as the direct findings, realizations and experiences of the great Rishis who compiled the texts. These great sages perfected their full potential and attained the supreme goal of life, so when we study their compilations we can benefit from their success both in the material field and in the spiritual field.

The Vedic scriptures offer a vast number of perfectly engineered scientific techniques and methods for personal development, a precise and integrated system of social/ global cooperation, many stories and conversations illustrating the knowledge of dharma and the laws of the universe and nature, examples of good and bad actions and their results, and so on. Above all, they speak about the purpose of human life (puruṣa artha), explained as dharma, artha, kama and mokṣa - respectively ethical behavior (or social cooperation), acquisition of valuable things, fulfillment of sensual desires, and liberation from conditionings. However, there is a higher puruṣa artha, that one can attain after mokṣa, and is illustrated by Krishna in verse 18.54 at the conclusion of his teachings in Bhagavad gītā. This supreme purpose of life consists in yoga (union) of ātman and brahman, and it is also called "self realization" because it constitutes the fulfillment of the inherent and original nature of the self. Mokṣa in itself is simply liberation from material conditionings (identifications and attachments) and freedom from the influence of the material gunas, therefore it cannot be the highest purpose of life.

We can make an example: a conditioned soul is like a prisoner bound by shackles and confined in a dark dungeon, without any power over his own life and situation. By cultivating the proper activities and attitudes, the prisoner can become qualified for release from jail, and that is called "liberation" or freedom. However, being free is not enough to make him permanently happy. The idea of freedom is that it should be used to engage in meaningful and joyous activities, so after leaving the prison he needs a supporting community, constructive interests, a fulfilling job, a nice place to live, good relationships and so on, otherwise he will become bored and even risk falling down again into bondage.

We find a clear warning in Krishna's instructions to Uddhava: ya eṣaṃ puruṣaṃ sakṣad ātma prabhavam isvaram, na bhajanty avajananti śthanad bhrastāḥ patanty adbhah, "One who refuses to serve the Supreme Lord, the Puruṣa that is the source of the individual soul, will fall down from his position" (Bhagavad Purāṇa 11.5.3). The same point had been highlighted by the Devas in their prayers to Krishna before his appearance: ye 'nye 'ravindakṣa vimukta maninaḥ, trayāḥ astā bhavad avisuddha buddhyah, aruḥya kṛcchrena param padam tataḥ, patanty adho 'nadrta yusmad anghrayah, "O lotus-eyed Lord, those who consider themselves as liberated but have not elevated their intelligence to the level of visuddha sattva may attain a very high position through their efforts, but they will ultimately fall back (into material conditioning) if they are not interested in knowing and serving your feet" (Bhagavad Purāṇa 10.2.32).

This instruction was also found at the beginning of the Bhagavad: sa vai puṃsaṃ paro dharmo, yato bhaktir adhoksajē, ahaitukī apratīhata jayātma suprasīdati, "The supreme duty for all humanity is that by which men can attain loving devotional service to the transcendental Lord. Such devotional service must be unmotivated and uninterrupted to completely satisfy the self" (Bhagavad Purāṇa 1.2.6), and dharmāḥ svanustūṭāḥ puṃsaṃ, viśvaksenā kathasū yah, notpadayed yadi ratim, śrama eva hi kevalam, "Performance of one's duties becomes a burden if it does not inspire us to become attached to the Supreme" (Bhagavad Purāṇa 1.2.8).

So from the very dawn of creation (purā, "in ancient times"), the traditional teaching (smṛiti) of Vedic knowledge has always pointed (nirdeśab) all students towards the meditation on the Supreme, the eternal Brahman, with the three words om, tat, sat, indicating the ātman/ brahman and the transcendental consciousness, that are personified in Yajna, Vishnu. This is the sum and substance of the concept of vedānta, "the conclusion/ end/ purpose of the Vedas".

It is important to understand that all three of these syllables refer to the Supreme. The sacred syllable om, the pranava omkāra, is the most famous and powerful, because it constitutes the primeval sound of creation and life and is composed by the fundamental blocks of existence or tattvas (A, U, M, and anusvara). However, the chanting of the omkara evokes the memory of the Supreme, rather than constituting an explicit offering of one's actions; this is done by uttering the syllables tat and sat. The word tat literally means "that", and can be applied to a vast territory of meditation, to focus on Atman, Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan in his many forms and functions. Together with om, tat reinforces the awareness of the higher purpose of life as full dedication to the Supreme Consciousness; in current terms, we could say, "realization of God is the purpose of my life and actions". The word sat indicates goodness, existence, eternity, transcendence and spirit, as we have commented several times; together with om and tat, it expresses the eternal and transcendental purpose of our actions, raising them above the three gunas and the cycle of births and deaths in the material universe. This was also confirmed in verse 4.24: brahmarpanam brahma havir brahmagnau brahmana hutam, brahmaiva tena gantavyam brahma karma samadhina, "The purpose of such actions is transcendental, the offerings are transcendental, the fire is transcendental, the act of offering is transcendental, the goal to be attained is transcendental, and the consciousness is transcendental."

The word pura, "since ancient times", demonstrates that the standard Vedic system had been practiced for a very long time before Krishna's appearance, that is calculated about 5000 years ago.

तस्मादोमित्युदाहृत्य यज्ञदानतपःक्रियाः । प्रवर्तन्ते विधानोक्ताः सततं ब्रह्मवादिनाम् ॥ १७-२४ ॥

tasmādomityudāhṛtya yajñadānatapahkriyāḥ | pravartante vidhānoktāḥ satatam brahmavādinām || 17-24 ||

tasmāt: therefore; om: om; iti: thus; udāhṛtya: indicating; yajña: in sacrifices; dāna: in charity; tapah: in austerities; kriyāḥ: in all religious practices; pravartante: they begin; vidhāna uktāḥ: according to the indications of the scriptures; satatam: always; brahma vadinām: of those who follow Brahman.

"Therefore those who follow Brahman in accordance to the teachings of the scriptures always begin their duties - rituals, charity, austerities etc - with om.

Those who follow Brahman (brahma vadinah) are called brahmanas. The expression "following Brahman" includes (progressively) "knowing Brahman", "realizing Brahman", "identifying with Brahman" and "functioning as Brahman", as Brahman is the universal consciousness field of which we are all parts.

In verse 18.42, Krishna will detail the symptoms, the required qualifications and the duties (guna and karma) of the brahmanas as a professional class, but the most important definition of the term is traditionally attributed to Atri Rishi: janmana jayate sudra, samskaraḥ bhaved dviḥ, veda-pathaḥ bhaved vipraḥ, brahma janati iti brahmanah, "By birth everybody is simply a sudra, while through ritual purification one becomes a twice-born, through the study of Vedic knowledge one becomes learned, but brahmana is one who knows Brahman."

Since the union with Brahman is the ultimate purpose of the Vedas (the veda anta), a genuine brahmana engaged in brahma yoga is the only qualified person to teach Vedic knowledge: yavan artha udapane sarvataḥ samplutodake, tavan sarvesu vedesu brahmanasya vijanataḥ, "Whatever value is found in a pond is also found, for all purposes, also in a large lake, and similarly whatever is contained in all the Vedas can be found in a person who has realized the knowledge of Brahman" (2.46).

Krishna has already explained that such realized knowledge is a dynamic consciousness focused on service to the Supreme Transcendence: mam ca yo 'nyābhicareṇa bhakti yogenā sevate, sa guṇān samatīyaitan brahma bhūyaya kalpate, "One who truly serves me in bhakti yoga without deviation develops desires on the Brahman level, transcending all the three gunas" (14.26). This works both as cause and effect, as genuine bhakti maintains a clear transcendental consciousness, and transcendental consciousness enables and supports genuine bhakti. Actual transcendental bhakti to Bhagavan (mad bhaktim param, 18.54) can only begin after attaining the level of liberation (moksha), that constitutes transcendental consciousness, free from material identifications and attachments. This transcendental consciousness, the realization of the Self in the intimate union between atman and brahman, is the ultimate purpose of the Vedas (vedānta), that is regularly remembered by qualified brahmanas in all ritual ceremonies through the meditation and utterance of the sacred syllable aum, and sometimes with more explicit pronunciations, such as "krishna arpanam astu" ("I am doing this action as a service to Krishna"). Without the remembrance of the supreme goal of life, all the religious activities of Vedic hymns and ritual ceremonies remain simply within the temporary realm of the tri-guna and the four purusha arthas, that is to say, on the material level within this universe.

The realm of the three material gunas is characterized by relativity and by the law of cause and effect (karma); beyond the level of the gunas we find the eternal, unchangeable, absolute Existence, free from all conditionings and encompassing all consciousness, that is the pure happiness of the Self. This is indicated by the words sat (existence, eternity), cit (awareness) and ananda (bliss). This happiness is unconditional and is not disturbed by the contact (or lack of contact) with the external objects: bahya sparsesv asaktatma vindaty atmani yat sukham, sa brahma yoga yukatatma sukham aksayam asnute, "Unattached to the contact with the external (things), s/he finds happiness in the pleasure of the Self. Such a person is engaged in the union with Brahman, and enjoys inexhaustible happiness" (5.21). In Bhagavad gita, the ultimate purpose (anta) of the Vedas is called yoga, a definition that indicates this union with Brahman: yunjann evam sadatmanam yogi vigata kalmashah, sukhena brahma samsparsam atyantam sukham asnute, "Concentrating always on the Self, the yogi who has become free from all contaminations attains the highest happiness because s/he easily remains connected with the Brahman" (6.28). True brahmanas are perfectly aware of this ultimate truth, therefore they perform all their activities as an offering to the Supreme: yajña (ritualistic ceremonies and professional duties), dāna (charity), tapasya (austerities), and kriyas (spiritual practices), and even the final duty of leaving the material body: om ity ekaksaram brahma vyabaran mam anusmaran, yah prayati tyajan deham sa yati paramam gatim, "Vibrating 'om", the syllable form of the Brahman, and remembering me, one who departs from the body attains the supreme destination" (8.13).

The word satatam ("always") indicates that all actions - great and small - must be offered to the Supreme, in a constant meditation (samadhi). This was already explained by Krishna: yat karosi yad asnasi yaj juhosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kuruva mad arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me" (9.27). How to do it in practice? By uttering these simple words before starting any action (pravartante, "they begin") to refresh our memory and keep our consciousness on the proper level.

The expression vidhana uktah ("according to the rules") echoes the words udabhiya ("indicated", 17.24) and nirdesa ("designated", "ordered", 17.23). Specifically, it is composed by vidhana, derived from vidhi (meaning "rules", "method", "knowledge") and uktah, meaning "said", "explained". It refers to the tradition of smṛiti, to the instructions of the guru and to the many teachings of the great personalities of the past and especially the avatars. Above all, it refers to the direct instructions of the sruti, or shastra pramana, as for example in the following aphorisms: om tad vishnob paramam padam (Rig Veda 1.22.20), om iti brahma (Taittiriya Upanishad, 1.8.1), tat tvam asi (Chandogya Upanishad 6.8.7).

The sound om represents the Supreme Lord in all Vedic scriptures: om iti brahma (Taittiriya Upanishad 18.1), om ity etad brahmano nedisthan nama (Rig Veda). This is confirmed by Krishna in verse 7.8: raso 'ham apsu kaunteya prabhasmi sasi-suryayoh, pranavah sarva-vedesu sabbdah ke purusam nrisu. The Lord manifests in the liquidity and taste of water, in the splendor and light of the sun and moon, in the vital force of living beings, and in the primordial sound which permeates ether and space, which is the sacred vibration om. This very same sound is constantly vibrating in all space, inside and outside all bodies, and by developing our perception power we can hear it distinctly. The pranava omkara is the beginning, middle and end of all creation, and by remembering the transcendental form of sound vibration of the Godhead, everything we do becomes perfect.

तदित्यनभिसन्धाय फलं यज्ञतपःक्रियाः । दानक्रियाश्च विविधाः क्रियन्ते मोक्षकाङ्क्षिभिः ॥ १७-२५ ॥

tadityanabhisandhāya phalam yajñatapaḥkriyāḥ | dānakriyāśca vīvidhāḥ kriyante mokṣakāṅkṣibhiḥ || 17-25 ||

tat: that; iti: thus; anabhisandhaya: without selfishness; phalam: the results; yajna tapaḥ kriyāḥ: the activities of sacrifice and austerity; dana kriyāḥ: the activities of charity; ca: and; vividhah: various; kriyante: are done; moksa kanksibhiḥ: by those who desire liberation.

"In this way, those who desire liberation perform the dutiful activities of rituals, austerities and charity without selfish desire for the results.

The word anabhisandhaya ("selflessly") refers to phalana ("the fruits"), so that the meaning is "not selflessly attached to the fruits"; exactly the opposite of the expression abhisandhaya tu phalam we found in verse 17.12. This indicates that our actions must be purposeful and intelligently aimed at attaining a good result, but not for our own selfish advantage only. We had already seen that such attitude is the hallmark of sattva or natural goodness (17.11, 17.17, 17.20), and now we see that it is the characteristic of the Brahman consciousness exemplified in genuine brahmanas. Therefore the religious activities (yajna, tapa, kriya, dana) performed according to the natural principles of sattva and focused on the remembrance and consciousness of the transcendental Brahman are the proper method to attain the four purusha arthas, including liberation (moksha).

This is confirmed by Sukadeva: akama sarva kamo va moksa kama udara dbih, tivrena bhakti yogena yajeta purusam param, "Whether one has no desires, or is full of desires, or desires only liberation, if s/he is really intelligent, s/he will worship Purushottama with genuine devotion" (Bhagavata Purana, 2.3.10). As moksha is the highest attainment in the material sphere, it includes all other perfections and forms of success rather than substituting them; it is important to understand this point because ignorant people confuse tamas with sattva, and mere material frustration (due to general personal failure) with moksha. This is a very dangerous idea, because it tends to create utterly unqualified, fake and degraded sannyasis and sadhus, that will easily jump on sense gratification at the first opportunity, thus showing their true colors, just like the blue jackal of the educational tale.

The word tat is related to tattva, a technical term that could be translated as "ontological reality", both at the absolute level and at the level of categorization. We have already seen that in many verses Bhagavad gita mentions the word "tat" as a reference to Transcendence; to better understand its meaning, we can review verses 2.17, 3.9, 4.34, 4.39, 5.5, 5.16, 5.17, 6.21, 7.29, 8.1, 8.11, 8.21, 10.39, 11.37, 11.45, 11.49, 13.13, 13.14, 13.16, 15.5, 15.6, 15.12, 17.23, 17.25, 17.27, 18.55, 18.62. This meaning is also confirmed in many other texts, as for example in Chandogya Upanishad 6.8.7 (tat tvam asi). So when we say, "om tat sat", we are remembering the eternal transcendental nature of Brahman/ Atman as the actual reality and purpose of life and of Vedic teachings, beyond the temporary material benefits we can enjoy in this world as perks of our proper engagement in its administration.

Already in the beginning of Bhagavad gita, Krishna had stated:

vyavasayatmika buddhir ekeha kuru nandana, babu sakha hy anantas ca buddhayo 'vyavasayinam, "O Arjuna, the understanding that is constantly focused on the atman is the only true one in this (world). Those who do not concentrate (on the soul) disperse their intelligence in innumerable minor ramifications" (2.41), yam imam puspitam vacam pravadyanti avipascitah, veda vada ratah partha nanyad astiti vadinah, "O Arjuna, those who do not have a full understanding preach about these things with many flowery words, and those who are attached to the letter of the Vedas are unable to recognize anything else" (2.42), kamatmanah svarga para janma karma phala pradam, kriya visesa bahulam bhogaisvarya gatim prati, "They aspire to the pleasures of the higher planets and to the fruits of their actions to be reaped in a next lifetime, therefore they perform a great variety of complicated rituals to achieve the purpose of a high position and sense gratification" (2.43), bhogaisvarya prasaktanam tayapahrta cetasam, vyavasayatmika buddhibh samadhaui na vidhiyate, "Because they are attached to pleasure and a high position (of power and opulence), and their minds are confused by such things, they remain unable to focus their understanding on the Self and to attain samadhi" (2.44), traigunya visaya veda nistraigunyo bhavarjuna, nirdvandvo nitya sattva stho niryoja ksema atman, "The Vedas deal with the various manifestations of the three gunas. O Arjuna, you should rather become detached from these three gunas, and situate yourself in that pure goodness that is not subject to changes. One who knows the atman becomes free from all dualities and finds protection in detachment" (2.45).

सद्भावे साधुभावे च सदित्येतत्प्रयुज्यते । प्रशस्ते कर्मणि तथा सच्छब्दः पार्थ युज्यते ॥ १७-२६ ॥

sadbhāve sādhubhāve ca sadityetatprayujyate | praśaste karmaṇi tathā sacchabdaḥ pārtha yujyate || 17-26 ||

sat bhava: in spiritual consciousness; sadhu bhava: with the sentiment of a good person; ca: and; sat: sat; iti: thus; etat: this; prayujyate: is engaged; prasaste: in good faith; karmaṇi: the activities; tatha: also; sat sabdaḥ: the word sat; pārtha: o son of Pritha; yujyate: is engaged.

"O son of Pritha, one who engages sincerely in all duties with a transcendental consciousness and the sentiment of a good person, is indicated by sat.

We have already discussed the meanings of sat in previous chapters, because this small word contains a wealth of knowledge and is central to the realization of Transcendence. The Upanishads state: sad eva saumya idam agra asit, "o gentle one, in the beginning there was only sat" (Chandogya Upanishad 6.2.1).

The triad sat, cit, ananda is the illustration of the inherent qualities of Brahman, that is beyond the gunas or material qualities. As we mentioned in 2.16, sat means "existence, reality", and hence "essence, ontological being", "eternity, permanence" but also "spiritual, transcendental", "good, positive, virtuous", because whatever is good is supporting the existence of the universe for the progress of all the beings. As the highest form of good is the performance of one's duties, the word sat has also come to mean "determination, sincerity, positiveness". In its adjective form, sat means "actual, real, true, good, right, eternal, spiritual, transcendental". Its opposite asat therefore means "non-existent, illusory, false, wrong, impermanent, temporary, material".

From the root word "sat" we derive satya ("truth") and sattva ("goodness"), that are fundamental concepts in Vedic knowledge, as well as the word sadhu ("good person"). Grammatically speaking, sadhu is one who is on the level of sat, therefore the word is used to refer to all classes of spiritualists. In this direction, we can observe the use of expressions such as sat guru (the transcendental teacher, as compared to ordinary gurus or teachers) and of course sat sisya (the true and sincere student who is interested in atma vidya, or sat vastu, "spiritual things"), as well as sad anusthana (transcendental teachings or initiation in atma vidya) as compared with mere anusthana ("establishment, position" generally in society or professional class). Therefore the presence of sat indicates the proper transmission of knowledge according to the method explained by the scriptures (15.20, 16.24, 17.24) as opposed to the practices of those who do not follow the scriptures (16.23, 17.1, 17.5). The utterance of om tat sat is a mandatory reeminder during the traditional ceremonies of diksha and upanayana, in which the guru confers the sacred thread to the disciple as a token of his qualification in studying the Vedas. As in the expression "om tat sat", the word sat is directly connected to Brahman and Transcendence, the presence of the supreme consciousness is evoked eternally (satatam, 3.19, 6.10, 8.14, 9.14, 12.14, 17.24, 18.57, and sada, 5.28, 6.15, 6.28, 8.6, 10.17, 18.56). In other words, transcendental consciousness is not a part time job, a hobby, or a relaxation practice we use to become better able to deal with our busy lives. It is the meaning of life itself, and we are meant to remain constantly situated at that level (samadhi).

In this verse the expression sat bhava ("transcendental consciousness") can be explained as the consciousness or feeling/ emotion (bhava) of Reality as the eternal existence of God; this feeling or consciousness is ecstatic, full of bliss (ananda) and shows everything clearly in its true light (cit). On another level, sat bhava plays on the meaning of bhava as "creation, manifestation" as the blossoming of the eternal (sat) existence in our consciousness: Reality is eternal but we as anu atmans only become conscious of it gradually as we develop towards full self-realization. In this sense, we could translate the expression as "the sense of the nature of Reality, the feeling that something is coming into being or happening". Similarly the twin expression sadhu bhava fundamentally means "with the attitude of a good person", indicating that one should remain established at least on the level of sattva if not of suddha sattva.

This was one of the earliest instructions offered by Krishna: traigunya visaya veda nistraigunyo bhavarjuna, nirdvandvo nitya sattva stho niryoja ksema atman, "The objects described by traditional knowledge are made of the three gunas. O Arjuna, transcend the duality of these three gunas and remain always situated in sattva, protected by detachment" (2.45).

It was again confirmed at the conclusion of the chapter specifically discussing about the gunas: sama dubkha sukhah sva sthah sama lostrasma kancanah, tulya priyapriyo dhiras tulya nindatma samstutih, "The wise is firmly established in suddha sattva and equally tolerates his own joys and sorrows. S/he sees with equal consideration a lump of clay, a stone and a piece of gold, and gives the same value to pleasant and unpleasant things, remaining sober and balanced in front of insult as well as glorification directed to him/ her" (14.24).

Therefore a good translation of "sadhu bhava" could also be "improving one's good attitude and behavior", or "becoming purified", indicating a dynamic and constant engagement in sattva to keep ourselves detached from static identifications (transforming sattva into tamas) and away from rajas and tamas in themselves, that are always lurking and pulling at our material mind and body. This is also confirmed by the expressions prayujyate, as "is engaged, working, connected", karmani, "in all dutiful activities", and by prasaste ("in good faith, auspicious, genuine, authentic").

Another interesting observation in this regard is that the concomitant distinction of sat bhava and sadhu bhava reminds us that atman is part of brahman, and even in their complete union these two identities remain distinct (2.11) just like each molecule of water retains its atomic identity even after merging into the ocean. Therefore sat refers to the supreme Brahman, while sadhu refers to the embodied atman or jivan mukta.

The expression sat sabda found in the last part of this verse has at least two levels of meanings. The practical meaning is "the word sat", and in this case the accompanying expression yujyate means "is used, refers to", as in a dictionary meaning. However, if we take sat sabda as a synonym of sabda brahman (the spiritual sound constituted by the Vedic scriptures), the word yujyate can be taken to mean "is engaged, is connected", echoing the previous expression prayujyate ("is engaged") referring to the sincere and selfless engagement in one's duties. Interestingly enough, the two meanings reinforce each other, because here we are discussing about the performance of religious duties on a transcendental level as prescribed by the genuine shastra. A corollary of this "confluence meaning" will protect us from the delusion of neglecting to apply theory into practice - a major defect of habitually religious people.

Other commentators have explained the expression prasaste ("honestly, properly") as satam prasangam ("in the association of sadhus", or sat sanga), based on Kapila's instructions in Bhagavata Purana. The verse reads: satam prasangam mama virya samvido bhavanti bhrta karna rasayanah kathah, taj jasanad asv apavarga vartmani, sraddha ratir bhaktir anukramisyati, "Through the contact of sadhus and the discussions with them, one develops a taste for hearing and remembering my wonderful activities. By cultivating this taste, one quickly finds the path of liberation, developing faith, attachment and pure devotion" (Bhagavata Purana 3.25.25).

Other commentators have translated prasaste karmani as "prescribed duties" and "bona fide duties". Both interpretations can be reconciled through the next verse, in which sat indicates the Supreme, whose Personality is not different from his teachings and the narration of his lilas (sat sabda) reported in the scriptures. And as we know, this supreme Personality of Bhagavan as Yajna is not different from the performance of sacrificial action (yajna), to which this verse refers (prayujyate prasaste karmani).

यज्ञे तपसि दाने च स्थितिः सदिति चोच्यते । कर्म चैव तदर्थीयं सदित्येवाभिधीयते ॥ १७-२७ ॥

yajñe tapasi dāne ca sthitiḥ saditi cocyate । karma caiva tadarthīyaṁ sadityevābhidhiyate ।। 17-27 ।।

yajne: in sacrifices; tapasi: in austerity; dane: in charity; ca: and; sthitih: the position; sat: sat; iti: thus; ca: and; ucyate: it is said; karma: action; ca: and; eva: certainly; tad arthīyam: for that purpose; sat: sat; iti: thus; eva: certainly; abhidhiyate: is indicated.

"It is also said that sat indicates the characteristic of the action, or the purpose for which it is performed.

Krishna clarifies further that by uttering "sat" one is explicitly declaring the purpose of the religious activity - ritual ceremony, austerity, charity etc - as eternal and spiritual in nature, because it is dedicated to tat, or Brahman (om). The expression tad arthīyam sat literally means "for the sake of sat". Another equivalent expression is sat iti, "this is sat".

The difference between yajna, tapas, dana performed for the sake of spiritual Reality and the same activities performed by sattvic people who do not have the benefit of Vedic scriptural knowledge is that material sattva still remains on the material level and therefore its results are limited, although they are still better than the results produced by the same religious activities greedily and ignorantly performed under rajas and tamas.

The word sthitih ("position") is sometimes interpreted as referred to the traditional rites of passage such as samskaras (purification rituals meant to give a good impression to the mind to start a new phase in life) and pravasa (purification ritual before starting to utilize a house or temple). This is because it marks our position in a phase of life, a social and professional category, and a place where we live and worship, so that our sva dharma, or karmani (duties) can be easily pinpointed. According to our particular position at each moment, our duties may vary even considerably in regard to the effectiveness of our actions in support to the totality of being. However, at a deeper level sthitih indicates here that we are always conscious of our position of bodily limbs and loving servants of the Supreme: all our activities can be spiritualized by this deliberate act of consciousness, so that our life in this world becomes life in raikuntha (free from anxieties).

This had already been stated by Krishna: bhoktaram yajna tapasam sarva loka mahesvaram, subridam sarva bhutanam jnatva mam santim richati, "One who knows me as the beneficiary of yajna and tapas, the great Lord of all the worlds and the dearest friend of all beings, attains peace" (5.29), and aham hi sarva yajnanam bhokta ca prabhu eva ca, na tu mam abhijananti tattvenatas cyavanti te, "I am the Lord and beneficiary of all yajnas. Those who do not understand my tattva will have to take birth again" (9.24).

Since sat has been established as the indication of the eternal transcendental reality as opposed to the temporary and illusory material manifestations, sthitih can best indicate the permanent and inherent position or nature of the atman, that will never change (2.20 to 2.24): this is what we call "self realization".

The mention of yajna at the beginning of the verse also indicates that all other religious activities are sacred acts or sacrifices, originated from the fundamental concept of yajna. In this sense, sacred action is personified by the Vishnu tattva himself.

adhibhutam ksaro bhavah purusas cadhidaivatam, adhiyajno 'ham evatra debe deha bhritam vara, "Adhibhuta is the existence that is subject to changes, and the Adhidaiva is the purusha, the controlling principle. O best among the embodied beings, I am the Adhiyajna, that resides in this body" (8.4).

And again: yajnarthat karmano 'nyatra loko 'yam karma bandhanah, tad artham karma kaunteya mukta sangah samacara, "Actions must be performed as offerings to Yajna, otherwise in this world they cause bondage. Therefore you should perform your activities for that, remaining detached" (3.9). Here we find a direct connection with the expression tat arthiyam ("for him/ for that") as referred to karma (action, duty), to indicate the perfection of one's duties as an offering in devotional service to God. This worship of Yajna through yajna is considered the highest activity for those who are already liberated: gata sangasya muktasya jnanavasthita cetasah, yajnayacaratah karma samagram pravilyate, "One who has become free from all attachments and identifications, and whose consciousness is firmly established in knowledge, worships Yajna (Vishnu) through his actions. All his karma is thus destroyed" (4.23).

अश्रद्धया हुतं दत्तं तपस्तप्तं कृतं च यत् ।

असदित्युच्यते पार्थ न च तत्प्रेष्य नो इह ॥ १७-२८ ॥

asraddhaya hutam dattam tapastaptam krtam ca yat | asadityucyate partha na ca tatprepya no iha || 17-28 ||

asraddhaya: without faith; butam: offered in sacrifice; dattam: offered in charity; tapah taptam: performed as austerity; kritam: actions; ca: and; yat: which; asat: material/ temporary; iti: thus; ucyate: it is said; partha: o son of Pritha; na: not; ca: and; tat: that; pretya: after death; na u: and not even; iha: in this life.

"O son of Pritha, whatever action of ritual offering, charity or austerity is performed without faith and in a material consciousness, it does not bring good results after death or even in this life.

We have seen that religious activities (yajna, tapah, dana etc) performed in transcendental consciousness, according to the teachings of the genuine scriptures, bring the highest and permanent benefits, not only in regard to the material achievements in dharma, artha and karma, but also towards moksha and beyond. On the other hand, the same religious activities performed without scriptural knowledge or transcendental realization, but inspired and sustained by sattva (natural goodness) bring good karmic results, happiness and progress towards purification and knowledge. Religious activities performed with faith (sraddha) but without scriptural guidance and under the influence of rajas bring temporary results that are limited to the specific selfish purpose that is sought, and that will ultimately bind the worshiper to material attachments and identifications. The same religious activities performed with faith but influenced by tamas may (or may not) bring material temporary benefits, but they always entail negative karmic consequences and entangle the worshiper in a delusional and asuric mentality by destroying intelligence and good sense.

Now Krishna shows an even starker contrast between the highest level (om tat sat) and the lowest possible level indicated in this verse. Religious activities performed without faith are even less beneficial than the same religious practices influenced by greed and ignorance but supported by a measure of sincere faith. Here the borders tend to overlap (sraddha virahitam, 17.13) because we have seen in previous verses that religious activities motivated by greed and ignorance may be performed without faith, for example when a person is forced to such action by others even against his/ her will or beliefs. Abrahamic ideologies present the perfect example of such situation, as they do not recognize the freedom of choice of individuals in the field of religious activities, as they have amply demonstrated in the course of their history, especially in times and places where they have acquired sufficient political and financial power to control society.

The expression na ca tat pretya no iha is a clear statement that covers all the three worlds - this dimension of gross manifestations (iha, "here", that refers to the body), the dimension of subtle manifestation (pretya, the world of the departed) and the transcendental dimension (tat, indicated by om tat sat). So at the end of this chapter we have Krishna's conclusion: an embodied soul can choose where to take shelter, either in the divine (9.13) or in the asuric nature (7.15), and thus become a nitya siddha or a nitya baddha (15.16, 15.18).

Whatever condition of being is found between these two - the realm of the material gunas - is only going to push us in one of these two directions. There really is no middle ground to hold, if not temporarily and with much effort and suffering (8.15, 8.16, 9.21). If we do not want to become forever trapped on a degraded demoniac level of life (16.19, 16.20), the only real solution is moksha, liberation from material identifications and attachments, that will be the focus of the next and last chapter of Bhagavad gita.

Here is a summary reminder of the dynamics: the qualities that are characteristic of the divine nature lead to liberation, while the qualities of the asuric nature cause bondage (16.5). The asuric qualities are a mixture of rajas and tamas (3.37, 3.43, 16.10, 16.12, 16.16, 16.18, 16.21), such as greed, ignorance, egotism, hypocrisy, impudence, conceit, rage, rudeness, false prestige and arrogance do to one's position and wealth (16.4, 16.17). Those who have taken shelter in the asuric nature (7.15, 9.12) are unable to evolve and lose all intelligence, sense of reality and truth, and proper understanding (7.5, 16.7, 16.20), so they engage in disastrous choices and activities that damage themselves as well as others and the world in general (17.6, 9.12). There is a way out of this mess: we can honestly approach the knowledge of the shastra (16.23) that will gradually lead us in the proper direction through the correct performance of our duties (16.24) that purifies us from material attachments, and especially from the toxic tamasic mixture of lust, greed and anger (kama krodha lobha, 16.21).

Any embodied soul who becomes capable - in this very body - of withstanding the onslaughts of angry lust can find liberation and true happiness (5.23, 5.26, 16.22). Such a person remains neutrally situated in suddha sattva, and tolerates the various conditions of embodied life created by the gunas without being attached to positive things and without hating negative things; he continues to work dutifully and selflessly and is impartial towards friends and enemies (14.22, 14.23, 14.24, 14.25). His only interest is on the transcendental level of brahman, where action is pure devotional service to the Supreme (14.26). And this is the subject of the next chapter.

Chapter 18: Moksha yoga

The yoga of liberation

The wonderful journey of knowledge in the company of Krishna and Arjuna has led us from the awareness of disappointment and confusion of Visada yoga to the first step in transcendental realization - the concept of atman, the spiritual Self that incarnates in this world by wearing material bodies in order to evolve towards perfection or realization, culminating in the fully fledged spiritual form or siddha deha.

While the second chapter (Sankhya yoga) showed us how to distinguish between spirit and matter (the subject and the object of the action), the third chapter has taught us what to do with them both: this is the Karma yoga (the action or verb or predicate that sustains the statement according to syntax). In the 4th chapter we have come to the discussion about the purpose of life, that is the acquisition of knowledge (jnana), the direction in which we should channel our actions and efforts to elevate ourselves from the level in which we merely do our work because we are supposed to do it.

Through the instrumental factors of knowledge and detachment (vairagya, tyaga or sannyasa, chapter 5) we have become able to focus our mind into the proper state of consciousness or spiritual realization (dhyana, chapter 6) and to apply this vision to our practical daily life (vijnana, chapter 7), relationships and choices.

In chapter 8 (Taraka yoga) we have seen that spiritual realization is at the same time the instrument, the purpose and the essence of liberation, by which we become able to constantly contemplate the Supreme Brahman in ourselves: this is the sum and substance of all the teachings and practices of Yoga. This is the great secret (raja guhya, chapter 9): how to see God in oneself and in all beings, and yet as the unchanged source and foundation of all existence. By constant meditation on God, one attains the highest perfection. We have thus seen that the concepts of renunciation (sannyasa) and liberation (taraka) are connected by the concentration and application of proper consciousness in all our actions (dhyana, vijnana). But what should we meditate (dhyana) on?

In chapters 10 (Vibhuti yoga) and 11 (Visva rupa darshana yoga) Krishna clearly explained how one should meditate on the universal powers and form of God (the Virata rupa or Visva rupa) and in chapter 12 we learned that such meditation is not just theoretical, but it must develop into a sincere service in love and devotion (bhakti), that consists in performing all dutiful actions in transcendental consciousness. In the course of this loving service, the most important thing is to clearly understand our duty - in which position we are and how we should relate with everything. For this, we must realize how the personal principle (the self, or the purusha) relates to nature (spiritual and material, the prakriti) and how they are actually one and the same although they appear to be distinct. Chapter 13 has been a real eye opener in this regard.

Similarly, chapter 18 will declare that all duties (sarva dharman, 18.66) are actually one and the same - and that is the intimate union with the Supreme (18.65). This is the supreme secret (paramam guhyam, 18.67) and the conclusion of Bhagavad gita.

The discussion about the gunas or modes of material nature was therefore interrupted by chapter 15 to remind us about the ultimate purpose of all the other instructions of Bhagavad gita: the realization of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Purushottama.

After discussing the characteristics and the effects of the material qualities or gunas (that we need to navigate in this world to perform our duties) we are now going to study the last chapter of Bhagavad gita, that summarizes its general contents and purpose - much like the second chapter had done - and offers a conclusion that is the next stepping stone for further progress into the science of Transcendence. Moksha, liberation from material conditioning, is not the final destination in our journey, but rather it marks the beginning of real life, of truly meaningful action, and of the full realization of the spiritual dimension introduced in the beginning of the dialog by Krishna's teachings on the atman. This is confirmed in verse 18.54.

For those who want to continue their evolution in Transcendence, we recommend that after Bhagavad gita they should study the 108 Upanishads and the 18 Puranas. As Bhagavad gita is part of the text of the Mahabharata, a sincere student will make an effort to read this voluminous work, too, and its counterpart the Ramayana written by Valmiki Rishi. At that point one will be ready to study the famous Vedanta sutra, that is considered the purpose, sum and substance of all the Vedic hymns of the Sambhitas.

In this work we are offering an Appendix including a short summary of the Mahabharata and the famous Gita mahatmya ("the glories of Bhagavad gita") written by Adi Shankara Acharya.

sannyāsasya mahābāho tattvamicchāmi veditum । tyāgasya ca hṛṣīkeśa pṛthakkeśiniṣūdana ॥ 18-1 ॥

arjunah uvaca: Arjuna said; sannyāsasya: of sannyasa; maha baho: o powerfully armed one; tattvam: the truth; icchami: I desire; veditum: to know; tyāgasya: of tyaga; ca: and; hṛṣīkeśa: o Hrishikesh; pṛthak: difference; keśi nisudana: o slayer of Kesi.

Arjuna said: "O powerful Krishna, o Lord of the senses, o slayer of Kesi, I wish to know the truth of the difference between tyaga and sannyasa."

The chapter on the yoga of liberation begins with the crucial subject of renunciation: moksha is simply freedom from material conditionings, and it can be attained only by renouncing to the material identifications and attachments (abankara and mamatva) of which Krishna has been talking all along the Bhagavad gita. These are symbolically personified by the asura Kesi, who was killed by Krishna in his Vrindavana lila. We have seen that chapter 5 was dedicated to the science of renunciation (sannyasa yoga) and specifically in verses 5.1 to 5.6 and 5.13, and therefore in the introduction to that chapter we have given a brief summary of the history of the order of sannyasa in Hindu tradition or varna ashrama dharma. Since that subject is also connected to the contents of chapter 18, we invite our readers to refresh the topic by consulting chapter 5. The subject of sannyasa was discussed also in 3.4, 3.30, 4.41, 6.1, 6.2, 6.4, 8.11, 9.28, 12.6, while tyaga was discussed in verses 12.11, 12.12, and 16.2. The concept of renunciation is thus presented on two levels, respectively external and internal, or we could say regulated and spontaneous.

Krishna has clearly stated that mere external sannyasa is not sufficient (3.4, 5.2), but one should attain a deeper consciousness of renunciation even without the need for the external requirements of the sannyasa ashrama (5.3, 5.4, 6.1, 6.2). It has been made abundantly clear that mere regulations are not only insufficient in themselves but also extremely difficult and painful to follow especially in Kali yuga (5.6), just like it is difficult and painful (and insufficient as well) to simply meditate on the impersonal and non-manifested (12.5). Therefore active service to the Supreme and to all beings (sarva bhuta hite) is indispensable (12.13-14, 12.6).

As we will see in the next verse, sannyasa refers to physically abandoning those actions that are not considered directly useful to the transcendental service, while tyaga refers to a state of consciousness by which one performs any activity in a completely selfless spirit. This level is also known as avadhuta, and it is higher and more difficult to attain than the conventional position of sannyasis, because an avadhuta is not bound by any rule or regulation, while sannyasis are expected to strictly follow the scriptural injunctions for their specific order of life. For example, a sannyasi cannot have a residence, a bank account, a regular source of income, or more possessions than the traditional things he can carry by hand - more specifically, a walking stick (danda) and a small container for water (kamandalu). The digambari ("clothed by the directions of space") sannyasis do not wear any clothes, but if a sannyasi wants to wear something, it should be a simple loincloth made from old and worn out cloth discarded by others, and he should eat simple food by begging from door to door, without depending on anyone and without keeping anything aside for the next day. He cannot stay in one place for more than 3 days, and he should travel alone and on foot, without using palanquins or other vehicles, riding animals etc. Even if insulted or attacked, he cannot defend himself but he should always behave as a friend of all beings, and remain firmly situated in the transcendental consciousness without any material identification, affiliation or attachment, simply preparing himself to die at any moment. He cannot become a professional teacher, engage in debates, or take shelter of any cause, faction or sect. Special exceptions to these rules can be made in case of emergency or extraordinary circumstances, but still the principle of renunciation must be understood properly and applied honestly.

To better explore the topic, one should also read the Upanishads specifically dedicated to sannyasa or renunciation, listed hereafter: Nirvana Upanishad, Maitreya Upanishad (or Maitrayaniya Upanishad), Sannyasa Upanishad, Kundika Upanishad and Aruneya Upanishad in Sama Veda; Yajnavalkya Upanishad, Satyayani Upanishad, Jabala Upanishad, Paramahansa Upanishad, Bhikshaka (or Bhikshuka) Upanishad and Turiyatita Upanishad in Sukla Yajur Veda; Teji bindu Upanishad, Avadhuta Upanishad, Katha rudra Upanishad, Varaha Upanishad and Brahma Upanishad in Krishna Yajur Veda; Parivraha (Narada parivrajaka) Upanishad, Paramahansa parivrajaka Upanishad and Para brahman Upanishad in Atharva Veda. Also verses 2 and 3 of Kaivalya Upanishad, and verses 3.2.5 to 3.2.9 of Mundaka Upanishad speak about sannyasa. Since it is impossible to quote all the relevant passages from these very important texts, we invite our readers to peruse our complete translation of the 108 major Upanishads, published by our Jagannatha Vallabha Vedic Research Center.

श्रीभगवानुवाच ।

śrībhagavānuvāca ।

काम्यानां कर्मणां न्यासं संन्यासं कवयो विदुः ।

सर्वकर्मफलत्यागं प्राहुस्त्यागं विचक्षणाः ॥ १८-२ ॥

kāmyānām karmaṇām nyāsaṁ sannyāsaṁ kavayo viduḥ । sarvakarmaphalatyaṅgaṁ prāhustyaṅgaṁ vicakṣaṇāḥ ॥ 18-2 ॥

śrī bhagavan uvaca: the wonderful Lord said; kāmyanam karmaṇam: the activities performed to fulfill some desire; nyasam: renunciation; sannyasam: sannyasa; kavayah: learned scholars; viduh: know; sarva karma phala tyagam: renunciation to the fruits of all actions; prahub: they call; tyagam: tyaga; vicaksanah: expert people.

The wonderful Lord said, "Learned scholars know that sannyasa is non-engagement in activities aimed at fulfilling some personal desire, while expert people say that tyaga consists in being detached from the results created by all sorts of actions.

In other words, one should renounce the selfish attachment to the benefits that derive from one's actions, not renounce the actions themselves: karmany evadhikaras te ma phalesu kadamana, ma karma phala betur bhur ma te sango 'stv akarmani, "You certainly have the right to perform actions but not to enjoy the fruits of your actions. Do not try to become the cause of the fruits of the action, but do not become attached to inaction" (2.47). Krishna establishes here a distinction of consciousness by utilizing two different definitions: kavyah and vicaksanah, respectively "scholars" and "realized persons" (or "expert persons" as in someone who has directly experienced). The singular form of these nouns are kavi and vicaksi; the word kavi also means "poet" or "literate", while the word vicaksi is a compound of vica ("comprehensively") and aksi ("who sees").

We therefore understand that the definition of sannyasa is used more theoretically or technically as a scientific instrument for social and religious categorization, while the definition of tyaga applies specifically to one's personal spiritual development, as practiced daily in all activities. Sannyasa is therefore merely an external support for tyaga, and it cannot be considered either sufficient or indispensable to attain success. We find confirmation of this concept in the description of the varna-asrama dharma system in Bhagavata Purana (11.18.28): jnana nistho virakto va, mad bhakto vanapeksakah, sa lingan asramams tyaktva cared avidhi gocarah, "One who is firmly established in knowledge and perfect detachment, who is completely devoted to the Supreme and has no other desire or aspiration can rise above the rules and regulations and distinctive apparel of the asramas".

The word cared in this verse actually contains a clear encouragement to follow this path, and could also be translated as "should rise". Why? Because the strict observance of the rules and regulations of social classes is very useful in the early stages of one's spiritual development, but as one progresses into liberation, it becomes cumbersome and even obstructs one's real work. Rules are just like crutches, that are essential for invalids but become an unnecessary burden for healthy people who are traveling and working. Therefore Krishna will clearly say in 18.65 that one should leave behind all the different sva dharmas or rules and regulations of the social and religious system and simply focus on yoga, the transcendental union with the Supreme. Actual renunciation or sannyasa consists in giving up the desire for selfish activities, or kamyas and naimittika karma. Later on (18.5-6) Krishna will clearly say that the nitya karmani (yajna, dana, tapas) should never be abandoned; in fact, one should simply renounce the fruits of all activities, as this is defined as renunciation (tyaga, 18.6). This is also confirmed in Valmiki Rishi's Yoga Vasistha: na karmani tyajeta yogi karmabhist yajate hy asav iti, "a yogi should not give up prescribed duty, as the duty itself will renounce the yogi (drop away from him) when he has reached the proper level".

In this regard we may quote a famous verse that is attributed to Krishna Chaitanya: naham vipro na ca nara-patir napi vaisya na sudra, naham varni na ca griha-patir no vanastho yatir va, kintu prodyam paramananda purnamrtadbher, gopi bhartuh pada kamalayor dasa dasa anudasa, "I am not a brahmana, a kshatriya, a vaisya or a sudra, I am not a brahmachari, a grihastha, a vanaprastha or a sannyasi. I am simply the servant of the servant of the lotus feet of the husband of the gopis, the ocean of supreme ecstatic happiness".

On the material platform, the natural pursuit of happiness and pleasure takes different forms. The greatest pleasure in the material world is sex, but when this energy is not properly channeled, it can turn into the lust for name, fame, power, adoration, prestige, profit and position, that are not more meritorious or spiritual, but simply subtler and more hidden (and therefore more dangerous). Since this is due to the action of the laws of nature, like gravity, no one can escape from this danger. Even religious institutions and spiritualists in high positions are subject to this great danger. Politics has often been compared to sex and has the same devices and purposes; indeed, politics is especially dangerous for those who have accepted the renounced order of life. How many times we have seen godbrothers turn into godfathers? The problem is that, since we are eternally loving servants of God, when we do not love we inevitably fall into lust. And thus we are trapped in the last snare of illusion: false liberation in the form of artificial sannyasa.

In such position, the tendency to act in search of pleasure can easily bring a conditioned soul to various hidden or secret perversions, and then cover everything up with a tight lid in the name of public image, decency, social order and respect for religion and tradition. Often this leads to pursue enjoyment and pleasure in a very negative way, through degraded sadistic and masochistic practices that are disgusting for any normal people. These forms of sense gratification are not meritorious or sinless as some people believe, and in fact they are much more dangerous than ordinary healthy sense gratification: such a course of action will not lead to evolution, it will bring total disaster.

We find the word vicaksanah also at the conclusion of Krishna's instructions to Uddhava (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.33): tasmad deham imam labdhva, jnana vijana sambhavam, guna sangam vinirdhuya, mam bhajantu vicaksanah, "Therefore as they have obtained a suitable material body that enables knowledge and wisdom, experienced and intelligent people wash themselves clean of all the material gunas and should engage in my service".

The original purpose of sannyasa is expressed by its literal meaning as a compound of sat nyasa, "consecrating one's body to Sat (Transcendence)". In Vedic tradition and especially in the teachings of the Tantras we find that the worshiper of the Deity performs the kriya ("duty") called nyasa, that consists in placing mantras (bija mantras and nama mantras) on the various parts of his/her body to purify and spiritualize it, thus making it suitable to come in contact with the Deity. Kara nyasa is the application to the hands (fingers tips and finger joints), while anga nyasa is the application to the main limbs and even the organs of the body. Utpatti and sambara nyasa consist in the complete cycle of sanctification or dedication of one's body. An example offered in Bhagavata Purana is in reference to the Narayana kavaca (6.8.4-11).

All these rituals and practices are superseded when the power of the transcendental consciousness has destroyed all material identifications and attachments, and thus it has completely spiritualized the body. However, one should be extremely careful not to fall in the trap of false ego disguised as the "great avadhuta" or "great devotee" who believes he can do anything he pleases - including grossly adharmic actions - because he is "transcendentally above the rules", sometimes even while exhibiting the garb of sannyasi. Any adharmic action (papa) is in itself the evidence that the person is not at all on the transcendental level (7.28).

त्याज्यं दोषवदित्येके कर्म प्राहुर्मनीषिणः । यज्ञदानतपःकर्म न त्याज्यमिति चापरे ॥ १८-३ ॥

tyājyaṁ doṣavadityeke karma prāhurmanīṣiṇaḥ । yajñādānatapaḥkarma na tyājyamiti cāpare ॥ 18-3 ॥

tyajyam: tyaga; dosa vat: defective; iti: thus; eke: some people; karma: activity; prabuh: they say; manisinaḥ: great thinkers; yajna dana tapah karma: the (dutiful) activities of sacrifice, charity and austerity; na: not/ never; tyajyam: to be given up; iti: thus; ca: and; apare: others.

"Some philosophers say that all activities are fraught with defects and must therefore be abandoned. Others say that yajna, dana, tapas should never be abandoned.

In our introduction to chapter 3 (Karma yoga) we have discussed about the old controversy between the supporters of the Purva mimamsa and those of the Uttara mimamsa, also known as respectively karma kanda and jnana kanda or advaita. Krishna has referred to the karma kanda category as veda vada ratas (2.42, 2.43, 2.44, 2.45) or those who are attached to the letter of the Vedas and are unable to see beyond the cycle of samsara and thus attain liberation. Colonial academics believed that the Purva mimamsa refers to more ancient times when the entire Vedic society was focused entirely on the ritualistic path, worshiping the Devas for the purpose of elevation to the higher planets, and that only in relatively recent times Vedic philosophy developed the subtler metaphysical understanding expressed in the Upanishads, and finally the personalistic (almost "monotheistic") worship of Purushottama as we find in the Puranas and Bhagavad gita (contained in Mahabharata), that usually they relate to the abrahamic concept of God. Mainstream academicians even assigned a temporal frame to each of these "periods" calculated on the conventionally taught "linear progress" of mankind, in which civilization proper started only about 5000 years ago in the Middle East with the first Sumerian cities. This old paradigm is based on the infamous Aryan invasion theory, according to which Sanskrit, together with Vedic knowledge and Vedic civilization, was introduced in India only around 2000 BCE by the marauding Caucasian nomads that invaded the Indian subcontinent and enslaved the primitive but pacific Dravidians. This is generally labeled as the "Rig Vedic period", in which brahmanas were a sort of black wizards performing weird animal sacrifices to please blood-thirsty and primitive gods of war such as Indra and Rudra.

A sincere student of Vedic knowledge will not be confused by this colonial garbage, declaredly engineered for the purpose of demolishing the authority of the original Vedic tradition. The fact is that the entire Vedic knowledge is a consistent and articulated system, that exists simultaneously and eternally in its entirety but offers different degrees of approach to each individual in accord to their specific and particular level of evolution. Thus, the word purva ("before", "initial") does not apply to some earlier historical period of the Indian subcontinent, but to the earliest stages of development of each individual, that must be supported and nurtured by society through the proper varna-asrama system, with the promise of material benefits (in this life and in the next) that can best attract unevolved souls. In this connection, the word uttara ("higher") that juxtaposes Uttara mimamsa to Purva mimamsa must be understood as the "higher course of studies" that develops into yoga or advaita as clearly explained by Krishna in Bhagavad gita. This is also confirmed by the very name of the category of Puranas ("ancient"), that colonial indologists risibly consider "the most recent Vedic literature". If they are called "ancient", how can they be the most recent? It does not make any sense. Krishna offers the perfect synthesis between the two perspectives in the form of Karma yoga or tyaga, that is the dutiful performance of prescribed duties as required by time, place and circumstance, for the higher purpose of serving the Supreme, without any selfish attachment or identification. This position has been explained under all possible perspectives all along the Bhagavad gita and will be again summarized in this last chapter. When a mimamsaka becomes purified after so many lifetimes of sattvic activities, he starts to see that even pious actions involve some measure of defects, or greed and violence (3.38). This will be clearly stated in verse 18.48 with the example of fire and smoke; obviously this is even more applicable to the situation of the unfortunate people living in Kali yuga.

निश्चयं शृणु मे तत्र त्यागे भरतसत्तम । त्यागो हि पुरुषव्याघ्र त्रिविधः सम्प्रकीर्तितः ॥ १८-४ ॥

niścayaṁ śṛṇu me tatra tyāge bharatasattama । tyāgo hi puruṣavyāghra trividhaḥ samprakīrtitaḥ ॥ 18-4 ॥

niscayam: certainly; srnu: listen; me: to me; tatra: there; tyage: in the matter of renunciation; bharata sat tama: o best among the descendants of Bharata; tyagah: tyaga; hi: indeed; puruṣa vyaghra: o tiger among men; tri vidhaḥ: three types of; samprakīrtitaḥ: it is declared officially.

"Listen to me, o best among the descendants of Bharata, o tiger among men. Indeed it is declared that there are three types of renunciation.

The three types of renunciation that Krishna will describe in the next verses are determined by the influences of the gunas explained in previous chapters (14, 16, 17); renunciation in sattva or goodness (or even in suddha sattva) is always beneficial, while renunciation in rajas or greed has temporary and limited results, and renunciation in tamas or ignorance actually brings bad results.

Ideally, sadhus in the renounced order of life should be real saints (situated in suddha sattva), persons who have attained the platform of brahma bhuta, and whose association is the most valuable, blessed and pure treasure any human being can find in this world. Such persons do not see other people sexually, as males or females, but simply as spirit souls, parts and parcels of the Supreme, spiritual servants of Purushottama. These great souls are perfectly satisfied in themselves and do not need, expect or ask anything for themselves: they are not interested in sense gratification. They practice self discipline naturally and easily and are engaged 24 hours a day in selfless service to the Supreme and all beings.

A second group of celibate religionists is slightly less advanced but nonetheless very respectable: it is composed by sincere spiritual practitioners situated in sattva or material goodness, who are diligently trying to engage in self discipline for restraining their senses and do their best to serve the Supreme. This is a good position for a brahmachari, but not so safe for a sannyasi, because while a brahmachari can eventually take to family life if needed, a sannyasi is not supposed to renounce renunciation and become a vantasi ("one who eats his own vomit").

The third group is typically composed by men who have been frustrated in material life - they tried but did not succeed - or think that, in order to be spiritualists (and obtain the spiritual benefits or success) they must give up all pleasures and happiness. They consciously or unconsciously follow the philosophy of the sour grapes. But will they be able to engage positively in some good spiritual work, or will they simply become a nuisance for themselves and for others? If they rise to sattva and suddha sattva, they will be able to make progress, but if they become established in rajas (selfishness and greed) and tamas (ignorance), they will become dry, cruel, insensitive, rough, proud and vainglorious, thus spoiling their own chances for spiritual progress and giving a very bad and misleading example to others. If they think they have reached some elevated platform simply because of the external trappings (color or shape of dress, etc) they will not realize their foolishness until Mother Maya arranges for their noisy downfall. Usually these people are attracted by the idea of getting power over others (i.e. telling them what to do with their private lives), as well as attaining a worshipable position in society, special opportunities for name, fame and profit and other similar material benefits.

The fourth (utterly tamasic) group is not actually worth of the name of renunciates at all, as it is composed by frauds and hypocrites, who deliberately and cynically take advantage of their artificial dress to shamelessly exploit innocent and ignorant people for their own personal sense gratification and profit. These people think of themselves as very clever and choose the life of a religionist simply because it ensures easy food, quiet sleep, very little or no work, sufficient respect from the society and sometimes very good opportunities for sense gratification. When these people do not obtain money, facilities or adoration (which they think is due to them simply because of their dress), they get angry and revengeful.

यज्ञदानतपःकर्म न त्याज्यं कार्यमेव तत् । यज्ञो दानं तपश्चैव पावनानि मनीषिणाम् ॥ १८-५ ॥

yajñādānatapaḥkarma na tyajyam kāryameva tat | yajño dānam tapaścaiva pāvanāni manīṣiṇām || 18-5 ||

yajna dana tapaḥ karma: the activities of sacrifice, charity and austerity; na: never; tyajyam: to be given up; kāryam: duty; eva: certainly; tat: that; yajnah: sacrifice; danam: charity; tapaḥ: austerity; ca: and; eva: certainly; pāvanani: purifying; manīṣinam: even for great sages.

"The dutiful activities of sacrifice, charity and austerity should never be given up, because sacrifice, charity and austerity certainly purify even great philosophers.

The sacred actions that are prescribed in the scriptures and performed for the real benefit of the people (yajna, or sacrifice), the distribution of necessities for life to deserving people (dana), and the hard work in the service of the Supreme (tapas) should never be given up. Some deluded men take up the position of sannyasa in order to live as a parasite of the society without actually working, with the idea that they will automatically get respect, service and special material facilities from the general mass of people, obtain a free ticket out of family responsibilities or acquire power in a religious institution: such renunciation never brings the real fruits of sannyasa. On the contrary, it only brings sufferings to everyone and will certainly end in a disastrous downfall in the future. According to the original genuine varna and ashrama system, the duties of yajna, dana and tapas may take different shapes that best serve the purpose of one's activities. Brahmanas are expected to perform all the required duties in each subsequent ashrama (as brahmachari, grihastha, vanaprastha and sannyasi), while kshatriyas are only expected to perform the duties of the ashramas up to the vanaprastha stage. Vaisyas are expected to remain in the grihastha ashrama to advise and support their descendants, while there are no expectations of renunciation for sudras. This does not mean that these lower varnas are forbidden to enter further ashramas, because they certainly can make such choice if they so desire, if they are qualified and strong enough, and if they have properly understood the rules and regulations they will have to follow.

In the brahmachari ashrama, the performance of yajna is a learning practice and is done in turn and together with other students under the careful watch of the guru. Its dana only consists in offering one's service and daily begging collections to the guru, and tapas only consists in following the guru's instructions. In the grihastha ashrama, yajna must be performed regularly every day in accordance to one's possibilities, and must include the selfless performance of one's social and professional duties in the service of society. More specifically, it is meant to repay one's debts (rina) with the pancha maha yajnas to serve God, the Devas, the Rishis, one's ancestors, guests (including meritorious human beings) and useful animals. Dana consists in feeding and clothing and in general taking care of the other 3 ashramas, while tapas consists in disciplining one's sense gratification to remain in sattva and within the limits of dharma (satya, daya, saucha). In regard to ritual ceremonies, one is only required to perform sattvic procedures, as there is never any compulsory prescription for animal sacrifices or other procedures influenced by rajas or tamas.

In the vanaprastha and sannyasa ashramas, the practice of yajna becomes increasingly focused on inner meditation, as elaborated in the Aranyakas and Upanishads; in this regard we may comment that aranya and vana are exact synonyms for "forest", indicating that after exhausting the need for the ritualistic worship of naimittika and kamyā karmani, a sober person moves from the swamp of material entanglement (2.52) to the transcendental forest of freedom. This was indicated by the passage from verse 3.9 to verse 3.17 and from verse 3.18 to 13.20. The stage of sannyasa totally focuses on inner spiritual activities as yajna, dana and tapas, totally abandoning all material concerns. However, sannyasis too are supposed to work hard in the service of society, engaging in the assistance of those who are in need with all the resources they can utilize.

There is no contradiction between the Purva mimamsa and the Uttara mimamsa, as both are stages of the journey of transcendental realization, and both will be overcome and integrated when we move to Yoga. Krishna has already declared: tapasvibhyo 'dhiko yogi jnanibhyo 'pi mato 'dhikah, karmibhyas cadhiko yogi tasmad yogi bhavarjuna, "The yogi is superior to the ascetic and is considered also greater than the scholar, and greater than those who perform ritualistic activities. Therefore, o Arjuna, you should be a yogi" (6.46). The ascetic is the sannyasi, the scholar is the vanaprastha and he who performs the ritualistic activities is the grihastha; similarly the perfection for a brahmanas is asceticism, detachment from material wealth and position, and abstaining from sense gratification, while perfection for the kshatriya is the material and spiritual knowledge he needs to rule well, and perfection for a vaishya is the performance of the ritualistic ceremonies by which he regularly purifies and distributes the wealth he has amassed. A brahmachari is not qualified yet as adhikari and the sudra is only required to sincerely serve others.

एतान्यपि तु कर्माणि सङ्गं त्यक्त्वा फलानि च । कर्तव्यानीति मे पार्थ निश्चितं मतमुत्तमम् ॥ १८-६ ॥

etānyapi tu karmāṇi saṅgam tyaktvā phalāni ca | kartavyānīti me pārtha niścitaṁ matamuttamam || 18-6 ||

etani: all these; api: certainly; tu: but; karmani: activities; sangam: association; tyaktva: abandoning; phalani ca: and the results; kartavyani: should be performed as duty; iti: thus; me: my; pārtha: o son of Pritha; niścitaṁ: without a doubt; matam: opinion; uttamam: the best.

"O son of Pritha, I tell you without any doubt that the best course is to perform all sacred activities as duties, abandoning the identification and the fruits of such actions.

To properly understand this verse, we need to focus on three words: sangam, phalani, kartavyani.

All along Bhagavad gita, Krishna has said numerous times that sanga ("association", "contact", "belonging", "affiliation") must be free from the material delusions of identification and attachment. In this regard, we should consult verses 2.46, 2.47, 2.48, 3.9, 4.20, 4.23, 5.10, 5.11, 11.55, 12.18, 15.3, 15.5, and also (in the negative perspective) 2.62, 3.26, 13.22, 14.6-8, 15.4. So the concept of contact or association boils down to the identification as the karta ("the doer"), as expressed in verse 3.27. In that context we can see that the idea of remaining free from the contact or identification with the action automatically applies to the results or benefits of one's dutiful activities, and this means that one should perform dutiful actions selflessly, without being attached to the gross and subtle benefits that derive from it.

This is a totally revolutionary concept for those who come from a pragmatist (i.e. selfish) society, where profit and personal advantage (individual or collective) is the norm, and the idea of someone working without any expectation of personal benefit or credit is considered stupid or risible, and even natural creatures and eternal knowledge are subject to legal appropriation, patent registration and payment of royalties. Yet, this selfless performance of one's duties is the only method by which human society can thrive and prosper and guarantee the progress and evolution of all its members. Any honest and intelligent sociologist can create study projections based on such scenario, and invariably it will be found perfect and successful. In Vedic society nobody gets paid - salary or fees or commission or compensation - for any specific work; everybody works for free and only gets the proper necessities of life because that is fair and natural, and obtains wealth (artha) as general recognition for their personal value.

Vaisyas directly produce food (annam babu kurvita, tad vratam, Taittiriya Upanishad, Brighu valli, 3.9.1) and consume the amount they require for themselves and for their subordinates (sudras, etc), not only in its direct form but also in the form of other necessities that can be obtained by bartering from other producers and entrepreneurs and craftsmen, such as clothes, pots and vessels, tools and instruments, etc. Then they give a proper amount of the surplus wealth (food products and other goods) to the brahmanas as donation (dakshina, bhiksha) and to the kshatriyas as tribute. Some amount is stored for emergencies and further agricultural development, and if there is still a surplus, it is used to barter for other goods and valuables to be stored for the future benefit of the society at large. There are no loafers because the brahmanas, the gurus and the kshatriyas make sure that everyone is properly and happily engaged according to their actual guna and karma and training. At the same time, everyone is taken care of, and taking pride and joy in their work for the benefit of the entire social body. As in the healthy and natural functioning of the body and its limbs, the various organs work without any selfish attachment but automatically obtain everything they need; the mouth enjoys the food but immediately sends it down to the stomach so that it can be properly digested (and the stomach also enjoys full satisfaction) and distributed to each and every organ and cell of the body. In this way there is no place for fear, hatred, envy, laziness, stress, or dissatisfaction, because communication and cooperation are perfect.

The definition of phala as "the fruit of the action" in reference to karma yoga and sannyasa yoga brings to mind the beautiful example of a person who plants a fruit tree in a public place, so that everyone will get its blessings and benefits. The situation in human society is now so degraded that people not only jealously guard their own orchards and trees, but avoid planting fruit trees even on their own land property because they are tired of getting their fruits stolen and destroyed by looters, thieves and envious monkeys. As a result, everybody suffers and is deprived, including the stupid monkeys. Phala as fruit of the action is explained in verses 2.43, 2.47, 2.49 (kripanas are those attached to such fruits), 2.51 (manisinaḥ are those who are not attached to such fruits), 4.20, 5.4, 5.12, 5.14, 6.1 (anasritāḥ, "not taking shelter" in such fruits), 7.23, 9.28 (detachment from such fruits as being called sannyasa yoga), 12.11, 12.12, 17.11, 17.12, 17.17, 17.20, and 17.25.

The word kartanya, "what is to be done", describes the dutiful action on the basis of dharma, ethical considerations, or conscience. Contrarily to despotical and ignorant ideologies where one is ordered and forced to carry out actions even against one's better judgment and ethical conscience, in sanatana dharma or Vedic culture the concept of duty is always based on the intelligent choice of a conscious act of personal free will. Without freedom, there cannot be any evolution or progress, and certainly no satisfaction or happiness.

नियतस्य तु संन्यासः कर्मणो नोपपद्यते । मोहात्तस्य परित्यागस्तामसः परिकीर्तितः ॥ १८-७ ॥

niyatasya tu sannyāsaḥ karmaṇo nopapadyate । mohāttasya parityāgastāmasaḥ parikīrtitaḥ ॥ 18-7 ॥

niyatasya: of the prescribed duty; tu: but; sannyasaḥ: renunciation; karmaṇaḥ: the activities; na: never; upapadyate: should be done; mohat: due to illusion; tasya: of them; parityagah: abandoning; tamasah: because of tamas guna; parikirtitah: has been explained.

"One should never renounce the activities of his/ her proper engagement. It has been explained that one who abandons them out of illusion is under the influence of ignorance."

We have seen that tamas (ignorance) produces laziness, stupidity, confusion and inertia, and that sometimes foolish people confuse such symptoms for noble sattvic characteristics. Later (18.32) Krishna will very clearly say that tamas deludes people into mistaking (and presenting) dharma as adharma, and adharma as dharma. It is very easy to observe this fact in the present degraded asuric society, that is ruled largely by tamas with some measure of rajas.

Speaking of sannyasa, we have seen many men dressed in saffron, red and pink robes presenting themselves as staunch renunciates, who live perpetually immersed in apathy, irresponsibility and laziness, sleepily rambling now and then about the sexual life of married people, and are roused only when they see some opportunity to collect donations from the public by exploiting the good name and merits of the founder of their organization, to get followers who will worship and serve them, or to engage in political power games and institutional fighting, or to actively persecute dissenters especially those who bring good logical arguments or present the original genuine Vedic version. And also all of the above, if time and energy suffice.

Some of the most malicious ones may object that such activities of persecution of heretics and infidels constitute their specific service to society, but there is no such provision in the Vedic system. Unlike abrahamic ideologies and other totalitarian and imperialistic systems, Vedic civilization clearly teaches that renunciates and spiritualists must never try to enforce religious or ideological beliefs and behaviors on people, or encroach on people's personal lives and choices (or instruct others to do that). Sannyasis, sadhus and brahmanas can only offer teachings and advice, in speech and writing and by personal example.

On the other hand, kshatriyas and other government people, who enforce law and order, can only take material physical action to stop violent aggressions against the prajas - human and animal members of society. There should be no moral policing or persecution of dissenters or forced conversions. If false religionists become a nuisance for society by openly preaching in favor of violent aggression against innocent people, they should be challenged to debate by brahmanas; their followers should be prevented from putting such teachings into practice, and their targeted victims should be helped to defend themselves even to the extreme consequences (by killing the aggressor).

Only in extreme emergencies the assembly of the brahmanas can use their spiritual power (brahma tejas) to curse and remove an evil adharmic ruler who has not been defeated in duel by dharmic kshatriyas, but after the bad king has been deposed, the brahmanas will never step in and take control of the government, individually or collectively, even if they were capable of doing a good job as rulers. If a grihastha brahmana takes this step, he will lose his position as brahmana and become a kshatriya to all effects, with the attending rights and duties and limitations, but his position will still be respectable.

A sannyasi however (whatever varna he used to belong to) is strictly forbidden from having anything to do with government or politics, because by so doing he automatically becomes the object of ridicule for the entire society. Therefore one should think very carefully before entering the renounced order, especially considering that in Kali yuga nobody is required or even expected to take sannyasa. In case of extreme emergency and very serious danger for innocent and good people, a sadhu or sannyasi can temporarily take a kshatriya role to fight back violent invaders or criminals if there are no qualified kshatriyas left. However in that case the sadhus will only perform that duty without getting entangled in any measure of political power mongering, luxury, and attempts to control the personal lives and beliefs of the subjects.

An arrogant person who demands worship, service, sense gratification, profit and special material position and facilities because of his wearing the garb of a sannyasi or sadhu and refuses to engage in useful activities for the benefit of all beings (claiming to be "renounced") actually has no transcendental realization and is controlled by tamas. Therefore those who accept him as guru or superior and offer him wealth and service will share his negative karmic consequences and develop the same mentality and attitude, perpetuating the social disaster. As Krishna has already said very clearly, everyone should work seriously and honestly for the benefit of society: niyatam kuru karma tvam karma jnyo by akarmanah, sarira yatrapi ca te na prasiddhyed akarmanah, "Engage in your dutiful work, because action is better than non-action. Without action, it is even impossible to maintain the body" (3.8). The only creatures who do not perform useful work in the universe but subsists at the expenses of others without giving anything valuable in return are called parasites.

In this verse we notice the word niyatam as a derivative from niyama, or "regulated activities in which one should engage", as the counterpart of yama or "regulated abstentions". We have found the same word in verse 7.20 to indicate the prescribed method to worship the Devas, in verse 4.29 to indicate the proper scientific practice of pranayama yoga and in verse 6.15 to indicate the proper practice of meditation (dhyana yoga) on the atman.

As we have seen in the scientific system of the varnas and ashramas, these niyata (or nitya, "eternal") karmani or kartavyani can vary according to one's guna, karma, training and circumstances, but still one needs to always remain fully engaged and without selfishness, otherwise the mind and the soul will not be satisfied. This is confirmed in Bhagavata Purana: sa vai pumsam paro dharmo yato bhaktir adbhotsajе, abaituki apratihata yayatma suprasidati, "The highest perfection of one's sva dharma is to perform one's duties in a spirit of loving dedication and service, without interruption and without selfishness" (1.2.6).

The word upapadyate ("it is not justified", "it is not befitting", "it is unworthy", "it is below one's position") was found in verse 2.3 when Krishna told Arjuna that withdrawing from the battlefield would be disgraceful for him, and in verse 6.39 when Arjuna tells Krishna that others are less qualified than him to dispel his doubts. Many people born in families of great ancestry have neglected or dropped their duties because of ignorance and greed, and their descendants have become so degraded that their behavior and conclusions can be easily recognized as asuric, yet in their delusion and confusion they continue to believe they are situated in a high position in society as brahmanas, acharyas, goswamis etc, even without making any effort in performing their duties or purifying their existence. They eagerly spend plenty of time in watching stupid TV shows and immoral films, but they have no time to read the scriptures or practice even the shortest meditation in sandhya vandana and they do not follow any rule or restriction in their diet. What to speak of consecrating their food, they develop a habit of eating non-vegetarian stuff and even become aggressively offensive towards those who dare expound the benefits of vegetarianism. Thus they have lost all intelligence and good sense, and slide into a hellish way of life.

दुःखमित्येव यत्कर्म कायक्लेशभयात्त्यजेत् । स कृत्वा राजसं त्यागं नैव त्यागफलं लभेत् ॥ १८-८ ॥

duḥkhamityeva yatkarma kāyakleśabhayātyajet | sa kṛtvā rājasam tyāgam naiva tyāgaphalam labhet || 18-8 ||

duḥkham: distress; iti: thus; eva: certainly; yat: which; karma: work; kaya kleśa: physical trouble; bhaya: because of fear; tyajet: gives up; sah: s/he; kṛtvā: doing; rajasam: under the influence of rajas; tyagam: renunciation; na: not; eva: certainly; tyaga phalam: the results of renunciation; labhet: obtains.

"Certainly one who gives up his duties because of fear of physical trouble or distress is acting under the influence of rajas, and cannot obtain the results of renunciation.

We have mentioned this category of renunciates in the commentary to verse 4 as those who have embraced the "sour grapes" ideology. Many celibates - sannyasis or life long brahmacharis - choose their position because they know that getting married and working at a regular job require a lot of effort and commitment, and entail many difficulties and hardships. In the best scenario they remain as children and innocent about what many people call "the ways of the world", but this usually makes them immature and irresponsible, unless of course they have developed spiritually beyond material identifications and limitations, and consistently demonstrate the symptoms described in the shastra in this regard. Not everyone can claim of being on the same platform as Narada Muni and his brothers the four Kumaras, who remained celibates but were certainly not immature in their realizations. The measuring rod is offered here by Krishna: the difference between a responsible mature person and an irresponsible child is that the adult will engage in the dutiful actions even if he is not attracted to them for some reason - when he is tired, or when the action entails some degree of suffering and unpleasantness, kaya kleśa (bodily suffering or fatigue) or dukha (mental suffering), and so on.

Childish wannabe spiritualists will generally behave foolishly like children, whimsically moving from one engagement to the other or trying to avoid work in general, and exchange positions whimsically by claiming only rights and no duties. They like to gossip about each other and about outside people, try to get better toys than their mates, use Deities as dolls and the dīnya līla as nice fairy tales for their entertainment. They may play roles such as the big devotee, the guru, the king, the general secretary, the president, the scholar and so on, but without truly understanding what these roles entail in the real world as they are always abandoning their responsibilities and never cleaning up their own mess.

Children scare easily and need to be protected and reassured by elders, and get bored especially about reading and studying and other tedious but productive work, which they generally try to avoid as much as possible. They do not really care to produce actual good results with their work but rely on fantasy and daydreaming or outright lies. Superficial materialistic people, who are usually rather immature themselves, tend to confuse a childish mentality with a transcendental one - in this way the entire society easily falls prey to ruthless and manipulative tyrants and conquerors who have no qualms in misleading, mistreating, cheating and exploiting children of all ages.

Those who renounce the proper duties because of fear of difficulties and strain are not really renunciates and therefore they will not attain the result of renunciation (tyaga phalam) described in the shastra. At most they will get some cheap adoration from ignorant people and an easy life at the expenses of the public, but at the time of death they will have to take a new birth, to pay their debts and make up for the wasted time by working twice as hard and facing twice as many hurdles as normally human beings have to deal with. We have personally experienced this fact, and we are very concerned about those who are not aware of what is waiting for them in the future; it is not our intention to criticize anyone but rather we want to offer precious information and warnings to help people avoid unnecessary future sufferings caused by uninformed choices in this lifetime.

This verse shows that fear is a result of rajas, because it originates from the desire to obtain what is pleasurable and the desire to avoid what is not pleasurable. Fear has been associated with anger in verses 2.56, 4.10 and 5.28, where Krishna has clearly stated that it must be overcome and abandoned. A person in tamas will remain lazy and callous and avoid to perform any real beneficial work; as s/he is only interested in immediate sense gratification and violence, s/he will usually be unaware of dangers and therefore may seem to be fearless. A person situated in sattva is emotionally and mentally an adult, who deliberately and serenely sacrifices him/her self to perform the prescribed duty, without fear for the consequences, because s/he is detached from joys and sorrows as the fruits of action (phalan) as Krishna has repeatedly stated in Bhagavad gita.

कार्यमित्येव यत्कर्म नियतं क्रियतेऽर्जुन । सङ्गं त्यक्त्वा फलं चैव स त्यागः सात्त्विको मतः ॥ १८-९ ॥

kāryamityeva yat karma niyataṁ kriyate'rjuna | saṅgaṁ tyaktvā phalaṁ caiva sa tyāgaḥ sāttvikō mataḥ || 18-9 ||

karyam: the duty to be performed; iti: thus; eva: certainly; yat: which; karma: work/ action; niyatam: prescribed; kriyate: is performed; arjuna: o Arjuna; sangam: association; tyaktva: giving up; phalam: the result; ca: and; eva: certainly; sab: that; tyagah: renunciation; sattvikah: in sattva guna; matah: considered.

"O Arjuna, one should certainly perform the activities of one's prescribed duties, but renouncing the result (of such actions). This is truly considered renunciation in sattva.

For most people in our present society the idea of renunciation is based on celibacy or freedom from marriage and family responsibilities, so in general one is considered a sannyasi if he is not officially married and has no progeny. However, we should notice that here Krishna is using the word tyaga and not sannyasa, as a person who has already officially entered the order of sannyasa cannot possibly engage in any activity that could create fruits or duties in regard to marriage, children, or professional pursuits. One can enter sannyasa only after completing and resolving all such duties and past pending matters, and the very strict rules of sannyasa ensure that no new karmic debts will be initiated. In other words, Krishna gives much more importance to tyaga than to sannyasa.

According to the traditional Vedic culture, every man has a natural debt (rina) to pay to his parents and ancestors for the benefits he obtained by taking birth - a good caring home, emotional and financial support, fundamental training in self-preservation and ethics, etc. This debt is paid by keeping up the good name of the family (with one's good behavior) and by producing at least one child to continue the lineage and perform the rituals for the departed ancestors. Therefore marriage is a specific duty for all the members of the higher varnas - brahmanas, kshatriyas and vaishyas. Sudras do not have such duty because they are not able to fulfill it, or in other words, they individually lack the guna and karma required for the job; they usually perform the very simple ritual of gandharva marriage and have children out of affection and not out of duty, but still they loyally take care of their family.

This brings us to an extremely important point: generating an offspring is not something that one should do lightly, as a natural biological instinct (like ordinary animals do) or as a mere social or cultural custom or expectation. The Bhagavata Purana (5.5.18) clearly states: gurur na sa syat, sva jano na sa syat, pita na sa syaj janani na sa syat, daivam na tat syan, na patis ca sa syan, na mocayed yab samapeta mrtum, "One should not (dare to) become a guru, a kinsman, a father or mother, a worshiped superior or a husband/ protector if s/he is not able to deliver his/ her subordinates from death".

What does this mean? Everyone who has taken a material body will have to die (2.18, 2.27), so how can one deliver him/ her from death? Here "death" indicates the identification with the material body, because it is only the material body that will die (2.13, 2.17, 2.18, 2.20, 2.30). So we can only be saved from death if our superiors see us and treat us as eternal spirit souls (atman/ brahman), not as bodies: this means that before venturing to take up the responsible position as guardian of another creature, one should be fully established on the transcendental level, or at least able to treat people on that level (brahma achara).

We see here that father and mother are mentioned on the same level of guru, and in fact the role of parent is even more decisive and crucial than the role of any teacher. One is not a genuine religious teacher if he encourages people to beget many children just to increase the numbers of a materially identified community, without the proper ethical and spiritual preparation, and sometimes without the minimum of education and affectionate care that even animals provide to their young.

"Delivering" a baby is not a mere physical action like "delivering" a pizza, human beings are no "breeding" animals, and no pregnancy should be considered a "mistake" or a "nuisance" or "disturbance" so that one wants to "dump the load and hit the road". If a person feels a strong desire for romantic love and sex, s/he should marry, get healthy intercourse and happily have a baby if a pregnancy ensues. Renunciation in sattva consists in dutifully taking care of wife and children for as long as necessary, without expecting their service and worship in return. Under no circumstance the idea of religious or spiritual renunciation can be used to justify running away from wife and especially young children and refusing to take responsibility for their maintenance and protection. This also brings us to the sensitive issue of birth control and abortion; if a person simply suffers from a hormonal lust problem and is not ready to take the responsibility for a family, contraceptive means should be used to avoid pregnancy. Before the advent of abrahamic ideologies, many natural methods (especially herbal medicines) were used to prevent unwanted pregnancies, and nobody ever thought they were immoral in any way. They were not considered something "against the laws of nature assigning the punishment of pregnancy for the sin of sense gratification". They were just a medicine like any other. Claiming that birth control is against God's laws because it allows sinners to escape the consequences of their actions is like saying that digestive aids are sinful and should be criminalized and their use punished, because they help gluttons to escape the rightful sufferings and damages of occasional consumption of excessive or inappropriate food, or that it is against God's laws to mend a broken bone that was the consequence of a bad judgment in jumping over an obstacle or running downhill.

In ancient times it was extremely rare (if not unheard of) for women to actually chose to abort their baby, but not because abortion was banned or punished by law or social persecution. First of all because there was no concept of "illegitimate child": the very fact of having been conceived made a child perfectly valid, true and legitimate, and nobody would even dare to think of mistreating or disrespecting such a child or his/ her mother on the so-called "immoral" basis of that birth. In all non-abrahamic cultures, motherhood is revered as sacred in itself, and not considered a "contamination" or "loss of honor" in any case. Also, abortion is a very serious matter, because it always entails acute physical and mental sufferings for the mother as well as considerable risks even when it is legally allowed and performed in a medically safe way, and if a woman makes this extreme choice, it is to be understood that she has no better alternatives and she is really desperate.

In Vedic civilization, any woman who for some reason does not have the active support of a husband to raise a child can take shelter in an ashrama (like for example the mother of Lava and Kusha, and the mother of Prahlada) without having to officially become a lifelong and exclusively dedicated disciple of the guru of the ashrama or take vows of strict discipline or penance for the rest of her life. Also, there was no such thing as "pre-marital sex" or "extra marital sex", simply because sex itself was considered a legal and legitimate form of marriage per se (see the Gandharva marriage, for example).

Husbands and wives who married in this way were free to live together or apart as they consensually saw fit, without being censored by "society" or even worse, by "religious authorities". Multiple marriages (that did not violate the basic principles of ethics such as truthfulness and compassion) were also accepted as normal and legitimate, and not condemned.

We know that Veda Vyasa was born of the casual sexual encounter of his mother Satyawati with the Rishi Parasara, and that his parents never lived together and apparently never had any further contact; certainly when king Santanu asked Satyawati to marry him, there is no record of anyone asking Parasara's opinion or permission, and Satyawati became the official queen mother for the future heirs to the throne. Nobody thought even for one moment that she should have hidden the existence of a previous son, and rather Vyasa was respectfully called to the court to help his step-brothers to get children who could continue the dynasty.

Even prostitution was considered normal and acceptable in Vedic times; it was a perfectly legal and respectable occupation, not persecuted or subject to any constraint or sanction, and did not have any parasitic "protectors" that exploited the girls, because nobody would even dream about trying to hurt a prostitute. And of course there was no human trafficking or sexual slavery. All prostitutes could easily and freely move to different occupations and social positions, so their children had all opportunities to get a good education and engage in different professional occupations than their mother's. In such a civilized society, there was no need for a woman to kill her unexpected baby, and if ever she did do that (like Gandhari and Ganga), nobody criticized her.

In this verse, karya ("duty") is the proper ethical action that should be taken in any given circumstance, and it refers to the constructive or productive work as well to the acceptance of the difficulties and sufferings connected to that particular situation.

The expression sanga tyaktva, "giving up the association", means that one should not identify or be attached to the actions or its consequences; in the example of marriage and family, a truly renounced man sees his wife and children as parts of God's body, God's creatures and servants, and not as parts of his own body, his own creatures or servants. Only in this way he will be able to protect them from death. Of course this also applies to mothers, not to fathers only, but we have hardly ever seen any woman abandoning her child under the pretext of religious or spiritual renunciation - except when forced to do so by others.

न द्वेष्ट्यकुशलं कर्म कुशले नानुषज्जते । त्यागी सत्त्वसमाविष्टो मेधावी चिन्नसंशयः ॥ १८-१० ॥

na dveṣṭyakūśalaṁ karma kuśale nānuṣajjate | tyāgī sattvasamāviṣṭo medhāvi chinnaśaṁśayaḥ || 18-10 ||

na dveṣṭi: does not hate; akūśalam: unpleasant; karma: work; kuśale: pleasurable; na anusajjate: does not become attached; tyāgi: the renounced person; sattva samavistah: focused on sattva; medhavi: who is intelligent; chinna śaṁśayaḥ: having cut off all doubts.

"A renounced person who is situated in sattva does not hate what is unpleasant and does not become attached to what is pleasant. Through intelligence, s/he overcomes all doubts (regarding duty).

The point of dutiful and detached action is repeated here for further clarity and associated with the expressions dveṣṭi and anusajjate. The words dveṣṭi and dveṣa ("s/he hates" and "hatred" as in the opposite of raga or "attraction") were mentioned in verses 2.57, 2.64, 3.34, 5.3, 7.27, 9.28, 12.13, 12.17, 13.7, 14.22, and we certainly recommend our readers to refresh their memory by reading those verses and observing the usage of opposite terms of comparison, in a range from abhinandati ("praises"), raga ("attachment", "taste"), kāṅkṣati ("aspires", "desires"), iccha ("wishes", "dreams"), priya ("pleasing", "beloved"), and bhīṣati ("enjoys pleasure/ happiness"). We find the word sajjamaṇah for example in Bhagavata Purana as "mentally attached" to the material objects created by the gunas (11.25.12), or attached to the activities of the material world (8.5.44).

The addition of the prefix anu reinforces the concept, indicating consistency or a prolonged situation.

The word kuśala indicates "joy, pleasure, happiness", but also "expertise, good fortune, auspiciousness, a favorable situation, a religious situation, good discrimination". Of course akūśala is the exact opposite, and it can come to cover a vast range of unpleasant and bad things, including what we could call "a bad job" with reference to situations and people. This verse clearly states that one should perform one's duty in a selfless way even when it entails unpleasantness or even the possibility of failure. In this regard, we can apply the same considerations we made about whimsical childish behavior versus the responsible behavior of brave and strong-minded adults.

Krishna had already mentioned the need to overcome the attachment to auspiciousness in verses 2.57, 9.28 and 12.17; this does not mean that we should not make any difference between subha and asubha (auspiciousness and inauspiciousness) but rather that we should not be attached to either in the fulfillment of our duties (karma, karmani). A corollary of this instruction implies that astrology and astrological remedies are not to be trusted excessively or depended on, but merely utilized as general indications or supports. While the first part of the verse focuses on the determination in performing one's dutiful activities selflessly, without repulsion or attachment, the second part of the verse connects this attitude with true renunciation (tyaga), a firm position in goodness (sattva samavistha), intelligence or wisdom (medha), and the clarity of thought that dispels doubts (chinna samsaya) with the light of knowledge and realization. It is important to understand that doubts (samsaya) should be addressed and solved in the appropriate way and not merely dismissed or ignored, because that is the difference between sattva and tamas.

One who never doubts anything is not using sufficient intelligence (medha), but one who is never able to overcome doubts through the appropriate research and verification is foolish and lazy (2.7, 2.37, 3.2, 4.40, 4.41, 4.42, 5.1, 5.25, 6.23, 6.39, 7.1, 8.5, 10.7, 12.8, 18.6). The word medha ("intelligence", "wisdom", "understanding") is particularly interesting, also with reference with the famous yajnas called asvamedha and gomedha that colonial indologists deviously and mistakenly described as ordinary animal sacrifices, respectively of a horse and a cow. The fact is that such yajnas were meant to worship and serve the principles called asva and go and not to slaughter the animals associated with those names, as we see for example in the expression pitri medha used to indicate the offerings to the pitris or ancestors (Bhagavata Purana 9.10.29, referring to Ramachandra). We find in Atharva Veda (suktas 52, 53 and 54) a long elaboration on the fact that the word asva indicates kala, time, "a horse which flows continuously with seven rays and thousands of axes (as plural form of "axis")" as the different planets, solar systems and galaxies (sahasra aksha). As the horse Kala is the father, the cow Bhumi (planet Earth, and by extension all planets) is the mother; the "coming home" of the cows therefore indicates the point in which the revolving planetary systems return in a particular position or "home". The word bhumi is closely connected to bhuta, meaning "being", "existent", or "element", indicating specifically an existence that has come to be by the aggregation of the various material elements of the universe.

A clear confirmation of the deep symbolic meaning of such rituals is given by the very famous Purusha sukta (Rig Veda, 10.90), that still today must be chanted in all ritual performances: "The Purusha has a thousand heads, a thousand eyes and a thousand feet. He fills the universe everywhere, although he is ten fingers tall. This Purusha is everything that has been and everything that will be, even greater than the powerful Lord of immortality, that grows with nourishment. All the creatures are one fourth of his existence, while the three fourths are the eternal life in the world that is not subject to destruction... From him, Viraja has come to existence, and again from Viraja has the Purusha appeared... The Gods prepared the sacrifice and the sacrificial offering was the Purusha himself: they nourished him with grass, anointed him with balms. From the flesh of the sacrificial victim, clarified butter was created, the creatures of the air, the wild and domestic animals, the hymns of the Rig and the Sama, and the mantras and the rituals, from which the Yajur was born. From the body of the Purusha came forth the horses and the cattle with two rows of teeth... when they divided the flesh of the Purusha, how many portions did they prepare? The brahmanas were his mouth, his arms were the kshatriyas, the legs the vaishyas, and the feet the sudras. The moon was born from his mind, the sun from his eye, Indra and Agni from his mouth, Vayu from his breath. From his navel came the interplanetary space, the heavenly planets from his head, earth from his feet, and the planetary systems from his body... I know this great Purusha, who shines like the sun and transcends the darkness, and one who knows him in this way attains liberation in this very lifetime - indeed, there is no other road to liberation. The Lord of the universe lives in the universe, and he appears in many forms without ever taking birth... I offer my homage to the eternally resplendent Brahman, who gave the divine power to the Gods, who is the guru of the Gods and their Elder." To reinforce the connection between this concept and the topic of sannyasa and tyaga, we would like to mention here a verse quoted from Brahma vaivarta Purana: asvamedham gavalambham sannyasam pala pitrkam devarena sutotpattim kalau panca vivarjayet, "In this age of Kali, five acts should be abandoned: the asvamedha yajna, the gomedha yajna, the acceptance of the order of sannyasa, the offering of oblations to the forefathers, and a man's begetting children in his brother's wife."

Of course, this is because human society has lost its best qualifications and are unable to perform them correctly, not because such practices were too primitive or immoral for the "evolved civilized human beings" of our times, as some foolish ignorant people would believe.

न हि देहभृता शक्यं त्यक्तुं कर्माण्यशेषतः । यस्तु कर्मफलत्यागी स त्यागीत्यभिधीयते ॥ १८-११ ॥

na hi dehabhṛtā śakyaṁ tyaktuṁ karmāṇyaśeṣataḥ | yastu karmaphalatyaḡi sa tyāḡityabhidhiyate || 18-11 ||

na: not; hi: indeed; deha bhṛta: by those who carry a body; śakyaṁ: it is possible; tyaktuṁ: to abandon; karmani: all activities; asesataḥ: endless; yah: one who; tu: but; karma phala tyagi: one who renounces the results of actions; sah: s/he; tyagi: (real) renouncer; iti: thus; abhidhiyate: it is said.

"Indeed for those who are embodied it is not possible to give up the vast numbers of the dutiful activities, therefore one who remains detached from the results of the activities is considered the real renouncer.

The key word in this verse is deba bhrta, "those who carry a body", indicating the complex network of needs, influences, qualities, activities and consequences that we need to negotiate while still embodied in this universe. This will be again confirmed in 18.40: na tad asti prithivyam va divi devesu va punah, sattvam prakriti jair muktam yad ebhiv syat tribhir gunaih, "There is not even one single person, either in this world or in the world of the Devas, that is free from the influence of the three gunas created by the prakriti". In verse 3.8 Krishna had also stated: niyatam kuru karma tvam karma jayo hy akarmanah, sarira yatrapi ca te na prasiddhyed akarmanah, "You should perform the dutiful actions, because action is better than non-action. Without action, it is even impossible to maintain the body, that is the vehicle (of the Self)." This idea is reinforced by the use of the word bhrit, that is closely related to the verb bibharti, "to maintain/ is maintaining".

Even those who claim they have ceased all activities still have to find some sort of food (air, light etc) and shelter, and their minds will continue to create presentations and distractions or focus on something, even if it is only complete ignorance. And why should they keep a body if they are not using it to do something good in this world? If they don't need a body, it is better for them to leave it and stop being a waste of space on this crowded planet, because their so-called abstention from karmic entanglement is simply a vegetative life immersed in the laziness of tamas. The body is given to us as a valuable instrument and vehicle, and we are supposed to use it properly for the service of all beings, in payment of our debt (rina) to the Devas, the Rishis, the Pitris and all the other benefactors of the world.

The expression karmāni asēṣataḥ indicates that dutiful activities are innumerable and never ending. Of course this does not mean that each and every individual must perform all those activities at the same time, because the immense number refers to the possibilities or opportunities of engagement in the administration of the universe in accordance to one's individual guna and karma. Karma as duty is determined by guna or qualification, as we will see later in this chapter especially applied to human society, but even the Devas and the creatures that are below the human levels have duties to perform, as we can easily see every day. The sun dutifully shines, the wind dependably blows, and even a small ant works indefatigably to carry its loads for the benefit of the community - not only to secure food and provisions to its community in the anthill, but also to clean up dead bodies and debris from other places. Even a dung beetle or an earthworm have a very important and respectable job in the world's administration, because they break down waste and make it available again in the form of usable fertilizer for the growth of plant food.

In human society as among all beings, the Soul of the soul (antaryami paramatma) guides the jivatman to seek the circumstances and experiences that are appropriate for his/ her development, so we can see that naturally and spontaneously our conscience tells us that we are attracted to a particular occupation rather than another.

Of course this attraction could simply be temporary and instrumental to one's education, as for example a short experiment in some occupation that appeals to our fantasy in an excessively idealized way, filled with misconceptions that need to be cleared out by direct verification. This is ideally done at an early age in the home of the guru (guru kula) where the students live as his adopted children, all on the same level, and are engaged in all sorts of tasks and can access all types of training at least tentatively. But it can also occur later in life.

Ultimately it is the guru, the assembly of brahmanas and the king who have the responsibility to assess or verify the sva dharma of each individual according to his/ her guna and karma, or natural inclinations and capabilities, and to help and support each individual to develop his/ her full potential and remain properly engaged. We can therefore understand that having unqualified persons in such crucially responsible positions constitutes an extreme threat to the entire society and could devastate the lives of everyone. Intelligent people should always be attentive and carefully scrutinize the conclusions and behaviors of gurus, brahmanas and government representatives to make sure that they are doing their job properly, otherwise they must be removed from their positions. In the Vedic system this is usually done passively by ostracism, as the unqualified individuals are exposed and the public simply avoids them. We can see the demonstration for example when the subjects of Hastinapura were eager to leave Duryodhana and the capital city, and move to the new city of the Pandavas, Indraprastha. The citizens of Ayodhya were going to do the same thing when Rama was exiled, and were dissuaded only by the order of Rama himself, who explained that he was going to live like an ascetic in the forest for a few years and then he would come back.

In our times, the situation has become so degraded that we need to start almost from scratch to rebuild the foundations of a healthy society, and this must begin with the head. We need a new body of śresthas (3.21), qualified brahmanas who have the proper knowledge and realizations and visibly apply them in practice in their own lives; these will act as the gurus of the entire society and train and engage anyone freely and without prejudice, simply on the verification of their actual guna and karma. The blind birth prejudice of the caste system has nothing to do with the varna system of genuine Vedic civilization and should be discarded from any government legislative or administrative process.

अनिष्टमिष्टं मिश्रं च त्रिविधं कर्मणः फलम् ।

भवत्यत्याग्निनां प्रेत्य न तु संन्यासिनां क्वचित् ॥ १८-१२ ॥

aniṣṭamiṣṭam miśraṁ ca trividhaṁ karmāṇaḥ phalam | bhavatyatyāgināṁ pretya na tu saṁnyāsinaṁ kvacit || 18-12 ||

anistam: non desirable; istam: desirable; misram: mixed; ca: and; tri vidham: three types; karmāṇah: of activities; phalam: result; bhavati: becomes; atyaginam: for those who are not renounced; pretya: after death; na: not; tu: but; saṁnyasinam: for the saṁnyasis; kvacit: at any time.

"After death, those who were not renounced are faced with the consequences of their activities - non-desirable, desirable and mixed. However, saṁnyasis are not bound by them.

A genuine sannyasi has already experienced and overcome death when he has given up all material identifications, attachments, relationships and affiliations, desires, enterprises, and so on. Whatever residual karmic reactions resulted from his previous activities have been consumed by the austerities he accepted while still in the body, so at the time of death there are no more ties with his material body. This is the real reason why sannyasis are not bound by karma.

We see in this verse that Krishna uses the two terms tyaginam and sannyasinam simultaneously, to signify that both factors should be there - the spiritual renunciation to the fruits of the actions and the physical renunciation to the position of karta ("doer") and to the activities that are not strictly necessary. In the traditional Vedic system, an evolved person must leave home after attaining the age of 50 (pancasa urdhvam vanam vrajet). This is also confirmed by the personal example of innumerable great personalities - generally brahmanas and kshatriyas and especially kings - offered in the stories of Puranas, Upanishads and other Vedic texts. After spending a sufficient period as a resident of the forest (vana prastha) living a quiet, simple and solitary life, one should formally prepare for death by entering the order of sannyasa, that is already considered social death. Usually this ceremony is performed at the age of 75, when the expectation of further survival is rather short, and family life has lost much of its meaning. The sannyasi changes his name and makes himself totally unrecognizable by his former relatives and friends, and gives up all connection to his professional and ritual engagements. He stops cooking and taking care of his body and personal possessions, and survives from moment to moment and from day to day, always ready to leave his body at any time. This is the real meaning of sannyasa.

A person like that is not bound by anything. It is easy to understand how the concept of sannyasa came to be associated with the concept of the world as mere illusion (brahma satya, jagan mithya). A sannyasi perceives the remaining period of his life in the body as a mere dream, a temporary illusion that will soon crumble away and from which he will awaken to the eternal reality of pure spiritual existence. Some commentators in the impersonalistic line explain the word phala (as in karma phala, or "result of the actions") as a compound of pha from phalgu ("unsubstantial") and la from layam ("disappearance", also related to pralaya, "destruction"). Thus, because the sannyasi has already realized that the karma phala are merely illusory, he will not be bound by them at the time of leaving his body. From one dream he will move to another dream with a new birth, or hopefully he will awaken to nirvana.

This however is a very simplistic position, that resembles the conclusion of the sour grapes or the fantasies of immature children; a consciousness based on dreams and illusions does not belong to sattva or visuddha sattva but to tamas, and if it spreads among people in general it can seriously damage society at large because it confuses grihasthas into believing that absenteeism and irresponsibility are legitimate or even nobler spiritually than proper engagement in dutiful action. This is the reason Krishna explained in chapter 3, when he said that he also engages in action, simply to give a good example to society (3.22-26), because personally he has no selfish interest in obtaining any result from actions. This is also why sannyasis should never be in contact with kshatriyas, government representatives, active leading members of the society and married people; at most they can approach their homes once a day and remain outside the door for the time required to receive the leftovers of the family meal. Therefore there is no need to see the karma phala as mere phantasmagoric illusion, and a much better course of action (yoga) has been repeatedly stated by Krishna all along Bhagavad gita, as we can easily see in verses 2.47, 2.51, 4.20, 5.12, 5.14, 6.1, 9.28, 12.11, 12.12, 17.11, as well as in verses 2.39, 2.48, 2.50, 3.9, 3.19, 3.28, 3.31, 4.14, 4.15, 4.21, 4.23, 4.24, 4.32, 4.37, 4.41, 5.2, 5.3, 5.10, 6.1, 9.27, 11.55, 12.6, 13.30, 16.24, and 17.23.

The word pretya ("after death") is closely connected to the word preta ("dead people" as ghosts), as at the time of death one leaves the gross body but normally retains the subtle body that we could call "ghost". In a sense, everybody becomes a ghost for some time, because reincarnation is usually not immediate; the deceased spirit can remain around his/ her dead body and the places and people of his previous lifetime if s/he is too attached to them, and in this way s/he misses a crucial opportunity for progress and evolution. If at the time of death we are able to leave all these identifications and attachments behind and move on, we will be obtain a new opportunity for reincarnation according to the result of our past activities and desires (karma phala), otherwise we might remain stuck between two lifetimes as a ghost proper, even for a very long time, and this is certainly unpleasant.

The circumstances created by our past karma can be pleasurable (ista), non pleasurable (anista) or more likely, a mixture (misra) of the two. The word istam is very interesting because it means "pleasurable" but also "desired", "preferred", "chosen". So Krishna is saying here that after death we will be faced with expected and unexpected circumstances, both the manifestation of our desires and fears, because attraction (raga) and repulsion (dvesa) are equally magnetic poles for the materialization of events.

For this reason we must become established on a level of neutrality, and not simply reject material life and objects as negative and undesirable - because what we deny and repress can easily become stronger in our mind and attract exactly what we do not want to get. Hatred, resentment and fear bind the conditioned soul with even stronger ties than love and attachment, and it is frequent for arch-enemies to be reborn as twins, or to become husband and wife or parent and child in a next lifetime. A racist or a person who actively hates a particular nationality, community or caste will very likely take a new birth there, and a man who hates women (or a woman who hates men) is preparing a next birth as a member of the opposite sex. Of course this applies to the birth circumstances only, and it does not change the individual's attitude and beliefs automatically. This certainly creates a very good learning opportunity.

When we apply this concept to the practice of celibacy or renunciation to sexual life, it is easy to understand that a true sannyasi must be neutral and undisturbed, and not obsessed by negative sexual thoughts entertained or expressed to condemn or hate sexuality. When tyaga, renunciation, is considered in a dualistic way as the opposite of bhoga ("enjoyment of pleasure"), it is still on the conditioned platform and the unfortunate victim of this delusion will swing back and forth from one to the other and back.

This happens because one still considers himself the enjoyer (purusha) and believes that he is renouncing to something that is actually his legitimate right or property; this ego is based on the false identification with the material body and position, for example as "man", while "women" are seen as bodies and objects of enjoyment. The fact that a celibate is not physically engaging in sexual activities is totally secondary and certainly not sufficient (3.6) to solve the problem. When we are neutral, we do not think of ourselves as the karta, isvara or bhogi (16.14), not even to believe that we have the credit of renouncing action, domination or enjoyment. We do not even think of ourselves as men or women, but as atman only.

A true sannyasi does not speak about women or think about women, because he sees all embodied beings as jivatmans, spirit souls, parts of God's body, therefore he sees no "women". He does not condemn or fear women or forbid them to move or sit around when he is walking or sitting in some place. He does not speak disparagingly about women, he does not treat women disrespectfully, he does not hate women. For him, there are no "women" or "men", but only spirit souls wearing various types of bodies.

Some commentators have tried to relate istam with heaven or svarga, anistam with hell or naraka, and misram with earth and human society, but this is an attempt to justify and validate Vedic concepts by associating them with abrahamic concepts. It is not necessary, and in fact it can be very misleading.

पञ्चैतानि महाबाहो कारणानि निबोध मे । साङ्ख्ये कृतान्ते प्रोक्तानि सिद्धये सर्वकर्मणाम् ॥ १८-१३ ॥

pañcāitāni mahābāho kāraṇāni nibodha me | sāṅkhye kṛtānte proktāni siddhaye sarvakarmaṇām || 18-13 ||

pañca: five; etani: these; maha baho: o mighty armed one; karanani: the causes; nibodha: understand; me: from me; sankhye: in the science of Sankhya; kṛta ante: at the conclusion; proktani: described; siddhaye: for the perfection; sarva karmaṇam: of all activities.

"O mighty (Arjuna), you should understand that according to Sankhya there are five factors required for the perfection of all activities.

In verse 1, Arjuna had called Krishna maha baho, "mighty armed one", and now Krishna is returning the compliment, after calling him bharata sattama and purusa vyaghra, respectively "best among the Bharatas" and "tiger among men". In this chapter Krishna is explaining how moksha (liberation) can be attained by working sincerely and selflessly for the universal good, and the references to physical strength are an indication that such work must be done by investing sufficient energy and effort in practice, and not just in theory and vague meditation.

The word nibodha ("you should understand") is related to the word buddhi, and therefore indicates the proper use of intelligence. Physical force by itself is not very effective, if it is not coordinated and directed by the proper use of intelligence and strategy - exactly the subject that Krishna is going to explain in these verses.

What is strategy? It is the art and science of planning resources for their effective use in achieving a goal; as the expression is nibodha me ("you should understand from me") we can conclude that it is best to learn the science of strategy directly from the best authorities or expert people. We have seen that Sankhya ("counting, enumeration") is the science of combined physics and metaphysics that categorizes the elements of the universe and their connections. It is said that the word sankhya is a compound of two roots - san from samyak ("completely") and khyā from khyayante ("described"). The expression kṛta ante ("at the end of the work") can be applied at different levels; one meaning can indicate the end or purpose of the actions or activities themselves, and another meaning can indicate the conclusion of the work of compilation of the Sankhya literature. In both cases it involves a sense of finality that is directly connected to the idea of strategical planning. One should take proper advantage of the opportunity of a human body (18.11) because ghosts (18.12) are unable to work for their own progress or for the benefit of the universe and the service of the Supreme.

The science of action is certainly not an easy subject, as Krishna had already remarked: kim karma kim akarmeti kavayo 'py atra mohitah, tat te karma pravakṣyami yaj jnatva mokṣyase 'subhat, "Even scholars can become confused about what is karma and what is akarma. I will tell you this science of karma, by knowing which you will become free from all inauspiciousness" (4.16). This chapter is dedicated to liberation (moksha), and it started by discussing about renunciation (sannyasa and tyaga), but we should not be surprised to see that Krishna continues the discussion by elaborating about action and work: sannyasah karma yogas ca nirsreyasa karav ubhau, tayo tu karma sannyasat karma yogo visisyate, "Both these paths - sannyasa and karma yoga - will bring the best benefit, but karma yoga is better than sannyasa" (5.2).

अधिष्ठानं तथा कर्ता करणं च पृथग्विधम् । विविधाश्च पृथक्केष्टा दैवं चैवात्र पञ्चमम् ॥ १८-१४ ॥

adhiṣṭhānaṁ tathā kartā karaṇam ca pṛthagvidham | vividhāśca pṛthakceṣṭā daivam caivātra pañcamam || 18-14 ||

adhiṣṭhanam: the place; tatha: similarly; karta: the doer; karanam: the instruments; ca: and; pṛthak vidham: of different types; vividhah: various; ca: and; pṛthak: different; cestah: efforts; daivam: destiny; ca: and; eva: certainly; atra: here; pañcamam: the fifth.

"The position, the doer, the instruments and the effort can be of different types. The fifth factor is destiny.

The word adhi sthana means "place", and it includes the body, its natural guna and previous karma, the position in time and space, the specific circumstances of community or society and culture, place and time, the facilities offered by a good or bad birth (both can be very useful), and so on. It is the starting point from which we can begin our journey and work, and therefore it is extremely important to understand and verify where we are actually standing.

The word karta means "doer", "one who does", and indicates the motivation or deliberation of the action, so we see this definition normally used in the sankalpa or official declaration of purpose at the beginning of religious rituals. Several people can be engaged in the performance of a ritual, especially a complex and important one, but the merit of the sacrifice and the good results go to the karta, the person who has taken the initiative to make it happen and is supplying all the materials and remunerating the priests. We know that the concept of karta is relative: prakṛiteḥ kṛiyamanani gunaiḥ karmani sarvasaḥ, abhankara vimudhatma kartaham iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'" (3.27). In this verse, however, the definition is used to indicate the subjective agent, that is the origin of the choice to engage in action, not the force that determines the particular type of action - which is conducted by prakṛiti. The jivatman still has a measure of free will, by which s/he can choose whether to engage in action or not, while the modality of the action is controlled by the gunas or nature.

The word karana ("instruments") refers to the sense organs - those of perception and those of action - that constitute the inner or personal instruments of our work. One can be born in a good family of skilled surgeons and have sufficient intelligence and inclination for the job, but if he is blind or deaf he will not be able to get the same results he would obtain with properly functional visual and auditive senses. So this is an important factor.

We need to remember here that karana (with a long first a) means "cause". In this regard, we may remember verse 13.21: karya karana kartritve hetuḥ prakṛitir ucyate, puruṣaḥ sukha duḥkhaṇam bhoktritve hetuḥ ucyate, "Prakṛiti is said to be the cause and the origin of the action, while puruṣa is the cause of the perception of happiness and distress" (13.21); this can help us put the karta and the karana into perspective.

The word veśa means "endeavor, effort, attempt, movement," and indicates the amount of energy that the karta invests in the action. Some commentators say that the word is a compound of va ("and", "again") and ista ("desired", "chosen"), indicating that one needs to try again and again to obtain the purpose or aim that he is seeking. As the quote goes, success is obtained with some percentage of inspiration and a much greater amount of perspiration.

The word daivam is very interesting. It is usually translated as "destiny", and as such, daivam includes the sum total of the karmic reactions of our previous activities and desires, but it is not limited to a mechanical result of events. In the Vedic perspective, nothing is truly impersonal, not even the laws of material nature, because the blueprint of every existence is knowledge. Therefore destiny is non-different from the consciousness or plan of God (deva), although certainly not in the same sense presented in abrahamic ideologies; God does not reward or punish anyone, does not absolve sins or judge people, and does not sentence or condemn anyone to any particular situation. A reaction to our previous action is simply meant to instruct us, demonstrating the reciprocity of all existence and perception. With each choice and decision, either in positive or negative, we put consequences in motion and obtain results - ista, anista and misra - that will either fulfill our desires or teach us that such desires were not a very good idea in the first place.

Some commentators translate daivam here as paramatman, the Soul of the soul, that always accompanies the jivatman in all his subsequent incarnations and guides him towards the actions and reactions that are required for his evolution. In this regard, they have quoted the aphorism esa hi drasta sṛasta, "he who is the witness is the creator" (Prasna Upanishad 4.9), indicating that antaryami paramatman, the creator and origin of the jivatman, can see and understand all the desires of the heart of the soul, and arranges for the suitable circumstances and experiences to materialize, and then guides the jivatman towards them and through them. However, in the Vedic perspective a human being still has some amount of freedom to choose in which actions s/he wants to engage.

We can compare destiny to a mighty river on which we are traveling. The current is strong and it carries us in a specific direction and therefore it is an important factor to be reckoned with, but we still have the freedom to row our boat and steer it at will, for example towards the bank where the current slows down. Along the course of the river there will be waterfalls, where we can only focus on surviving the jump and keeping our head above the water as much as possible, but there will also be shallow waters and fords (tirthas) where we will be able to get out of the river altogether and rest on the shore, and maybe build a new and better boat. With sufficient investment of effort and time, we can even build dams or dig a new stream for the river in which other people after us will be able to travel, but the water will always flow to the ocean, no matter how we try to divert its course. So the purpose of life and the basic process of reincarnation and liberation will always remain the same for everyone.

शरीरवाङ्मनोभिर्यत्कर्म प्रारभते नरः । न्याय्यं वा विपरीतं वा पञ्चैते तस्य हेतवः ॥ १८-१५ ॥

śarīravāṇmanobhiryatkarṇa prārabhate naraḥ nyāyīyaṁ vā viparītaṁ vā pañcāite tasya hetavaḥ ॥ 18-15 ॥

sarira: by the body; vak: by the speech; manobhir: by the mental actions; yat: which; karma: action; pra arabhate: begins (with a purpose); naraḥ: a human being; nyayyam: appropriate; va: or; viparitam: otherwise/ contrary; va: or; panca: five; ete: these; tasya: of this; hetavaḥ: the causes.

"Whatever good or bad action is performed by a human being with body, speech or mind, is caused by these five factors.

The word nara means "man", but we can safely believe that it includes here both men and women, considering that human beings as a species are allowed a certain degree of free will and instruments for actions performed by body (sarira, tanu, or kaya), speech (vak) or mind (manasa). Here manas is expressed in the plural form (manobhir) as in 2.56, 7.1, 9.34, 11.49 and 18.65, to indicate the different levels and modalities of mind functions - for example conscious and subconscious.

The technical Sanskrit terms for actions performed by body, speech and mind are saririka or kayika, vacika and manasika respectively and apply to all activities including the practice of the spiritual or yoga sadhana and the calculation of karmic reactions according to the different circumstances. For example in Kali yuga or in particularly difficult circumstances, mental activities performed with a good motivation and of good nature have the same or better effect than speech or bodily activities with the same purpose, while mental offenses (i.e. bad activities performed in the mind only) are considered much less serious than bodily offenses. This is because the physical environment including the body and senses is creating negative influences, and it is far easier for a person to actually commit bad actions than good ones. Of course, when one chooses to keep thinking of some action, s/he is also creating a certain amount of karmic reaction and associating with the object of the action (2.62), and the accumulation of such reactions and association will have an increasingly greater influence on the subsequent manifestation of actions through speech and then on the bodily level.

The individual's responsibility and the results for each action depend on the exact amount of free will that one enjoys at the time when the action is performed. For example, a slave who is forced to steal or kill, or a child or a jail convict who is forced to eat non vegetarian food are not held responsible for the karmic consequences of their actions. Those who put them in such situations are responsible and will have to face the karmic consequences. Even a woman who is forced to kill her own child through abortion by the pressure of family or society will not have to suffer the same karmic reactions of the killing of a child in ordinary circumstances. Conversely, if a person who is in a position of power - health, wealth, energy, time, position, instruments, etc - neglects to honor even a small duty or good action, or chooses to commit even a small bad action, the karmic reaction will be much more severe.

The expression pra arabbate means "starts to perform, enterprise, undertake", and indicates that the important thing in any action is not so much the successful completion, but the deliberate choice to initiate it and invest time and energy into it. This is already creating the good or bad karmic reaction, and accruing the merit or demerit of it, because the successful completion does not depend solely on the karta (subjective actor) and the cesta (effort). This is confirmed in 3.7, 4.19, 14.12, 14.25, 18.25, 18.48.

The two types of action described in this verse are nyayam and viparitam. Nyaya means "reason, logic", and indicates the intelligent and reasonable actions that are called dharmic, or righteous in a positive way. The word viparitam means "opposite, reverse", and refers to the contrary of reasonable activities, that according to the Vedic perspective is called vikarma, bad actions or adharmic actions. These definitions are very interesting, because contrarily to other ideologies, Vedic tradition considers the merit and demerit of actions on the basis of ethical values, conscience, and especially intelligence and reason. Krishna has already presented buddhi yoga (the yoga of intelligence) as the highest criteria for action (2.39, 2.49, 2.50, 2.51, 2.53, 3.1, 4.18, 6.43, 8.7, 10.10, 12.8, 12.14, 15.20) and buddhi (intelligence) as a fundamental requirement (2.41, 2.44, 2.52, 2.63, 2.65, 2.66, 3.2, 3.26, 3.40, 3.42, 5.20, 5.28, 6.9, 6.21, 10.4). The Vedic religion of Bhagavad gita has nothing to do with the blind beliefs and obedience of abrahamic ideologies, that most atheists consider the actual and genuine (if not the only possible) model of religion.

तत्रैवं सति कर्तारमात्मानं केवलं तु यः । पश्यत्यकृतबुद्धित्वान्न स पश्यति दुर्मतिः ॥ १८-१६ ॥

tatraivaṁ sati kartāramātmānaṁ kevalam tu yaḥ | paśyatyakṛtabuddhitvāna sa paśyati durmatih || 18-16 ||

tatra: there; evam: thus; sati: being; kartaram: of the doer; atmanam: oneself; kevalam: only; tu: but; yaḥ: s/he; paśyati: sees; akṛita buddhitvat: due to a shortage of intelligence; na: does not; sah: s/he; paśyati: sees; durmatih: stupid.

"Therefore one who sees oneself as the only cause of actions is deluded due to lack of intelligence.

The expression tatra evam sati literally means "that being the case" and connects the previous verse to this one. The expression atmanam kevalam may apply to two levels of meaning; the ordinary level refers to "oneself only" as in the main translation of the verse, while at the higher level means "the atman alone". In the second case the translation is, "one who sees the atman as the cause of action is deluded by a lack of understanding". We have already seen that the purusha is never really engaged in any action, but simply feels and perceives.

We had already seen that verse 3.27 straightforwardly called "stupid" (vimudha) one who considers himself as the only cause and master of his actions: prakṛiteḥ kṛiyamanani guṇaiḥ karmani sarvasah, abhankara vimudhatma kartāham iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'". So the concept of karta ("doer") needs to be understood properly. There is in fact a subjective principle of action called karta (18.14), but it is not the exclusive controller and beneficiary of the action (2.47). This is why Krishna in this verse uses the word durmatih ("unable to understand easily") and akṛita ("imperfect").

We should not foolishly claim full credit for our success, because we can only be the instrument (nimitta matra, 11.33) of the higher and vaster Consciousness; this of course does not mean that we should not get recognition for our work, or that someone else can take credit or recognition for the work we have done, substituting our name with their name, for example as authors of a book we have written. The factual truth should be recognized, and each person should be appreciated for their contribution: tasmat tram uttistha yaso labhasva jitva satruṇ bhunksva rajyam samriddham, mayaiṁvate nibataḥ purvam eva nimitta matram bhava sayā sacin, "So, get up, o great archer, and achieve fame by your victory against the enemies, and then enjoy the prosperity of the kingdom. I have already killed all these warriors: you should become just the instrument of the victory" (11.33).

Acknowledging one's subordinate position to the supreme Consciousness as an instrument in the great plan of life is quite different from the false modesty or lack of self esteem of one who is unable to take a compliment or an encouragement or to understand the value of his own work. An instrument cannot claim the full credit for a good job, but it can and it should certainly receive the credit due to a good instrument. This is why Krishna says in 11.33, yaso labha, "obtain fame" and bhunksva rajyam, "enjoy the kingdom".

Vedic knowledge is not subject to copyright. We cannot say that Vyasa plagiarized the work of the many Rishis who wrote the original hymns of the Sambitas, and although he is known as the compiler of the Vedas he never claimed "intellectual property" or tried to stop others from writing further commentaries or treatises over Vedic knowledge. Yet, Vyasa is honored as the original teacher of the Vedas in this age. The Vedic system regularly reports, "this person said", "that person said", and quite often the individual who is speaking clearly says he is quoting someone who previously said the same things or similar things. Knowledge is eternal, and so nobody can claim to have "created" it, but it is a fact that individuals are credited with particular compositions or presentations.

Vyasa's father Parasara wrote some hymns of the Rig Veda (dedicated to Agni and Soma) and the Parasara dharma sambita. Atri Rishi (manasa putra of Brahma and the first of the Seven Rishis) is the author of the 5th mandala of the Rig Veda, that is also called Atri sambita. Agastya Rishi, another of the Seven Rishis, is the author of an original text on the Ayur Veda (now lost, but mentioned in later literature), the Nadi jyotisha (a treatise on astrology), the famous Lalita sahasranama stuti ("the 1000 names of Lalita", the Mother Goddess), and the famous Aditya bridayam sukta. Agastya's wife, princess Lopamudra of the Vidarbha kingdom, cooperated to the Lalita sahasranama and personally composed one hymn of the Rig Veda. Gautama Maharishi, another of the Seven Rishis, is the author of many suktas of the Rig Veda, the Bhadra sukta of Sama Veda, and the Gautama Dharma sutra, the first text among the Dharma shastras. Vasistha, another of the Seven Rishis, family Guru of the avatara Rama, is the author of the 7th mandala of the Rig Veda, and of the Vasistha sambita. The teachings of Vasistha are also related by Valmiki Rishi (the author of the Ramayana) in his famous Yoga Vasistha. Pulastya, one of the Seven Rishis, direct son of Brahma, received from Brahma the Vishnu purana and transmitted him to Parasara Rishi. Bharadvaja, another of the Seven Rishis, is famous for having written the Vimanika shastra (a treatise on aeronautics-astronautics, now lost).

Angira, author of most of the Atharva Veda, is said to be a dignitary at the court of Yama on Pitrloka, the inter-dimensional planet where the virtuous ancestors live. Atharva is author of many hymns of the Atharva Veda; the fact that the Atharva Veda was composed by these two Rishis and as such it is known by the name of Atharvangirasa sambita. Kausika, Vasistha, Kasyapa, Saunaka, Vamadeva, Meghatithi, Priyamegha, Nodha, Savya, Nrimegha, Kusta, Pracheta, are the authors of other hymns of the Atharva Veda.

Kanva is the author of various hymns of the Rig Veda dedicated to Agni, Yupa, Marut, Brahmanaspati, Varuna, Mitra, Aryaman, Pusha, Rudra and Soma. Medhatithi wrote various hymns of the Rig Veda dedicated to Agni, Nirmathya Havaniya Agni, Idhmah Samiddha Agni, Astanunapat, Narasamsah, Ilah, Barhih, Devirdvarah, Ushasanaktha, Daivya, Hotara, Pracetas, Sarasvati, Ila, Bharati, Tvashta, Vanaspati, Svaha Akrutayoh Agni, Visve Deva, Indra, Maruta, Tvashta, Mitra Varuna, Dravinoda Agnih, Asvini (ritu devatab), Indra Varuna, Gayatri, Padani, Brahmanaspati, Soma, Dakshina, Sadaspati, Narasama, Maruta, Ribhu, Asvini, Savita, Devyah, Varuna, Anyagnayah, Dyava-prithivya, Prithivi, Vishnu, Ayu, Vayu, Marutvan, Pusha, Apah and Pura-ushnik. Praskanva Rishi wrote various hymns of the Rig Veda dedicated to Agni, Usha, Ashvini and Surya.

There were also several Rishikas (female Rishis) among the original authors of the Vedas: Ghosha (2 suktas in the 10th mandala of Rig Veda), Vagambhrina (Vac sukta of Rig Veda), Maitreyi, wife of Yajnavalkya (10 hymns of Rig Veda). Gargi, the composer of the Gargi sambita, is mentioned in Yajnavalkya sambita and Brihad aranyaka Upanishad on the occasion of a famous philosophical debate. Visvavara, Sikata, Nivavari, Apala and Visvavara from Atri's family, Angirasi Sarasvati from Angirasa's family, Yami Vaivasvati, Sraddha, Surya, Indrani, Urvasi, Sarama, Juhu and Paulomi Saci all wrote a number of the original Vedic suktas, of which all the subsequent Vedic literature constitutes commentaries.

Later in this chapter Krishna will elaborate more about intelligence according to the three gunas, and the effects of actions performed under the various types of understanding. Some people believe that all types of understanding or opinions should be equally respected and valued, but this is not Krishna's instruction - in fact it is just the opposite (18.32).

यस्य नाहंकृतो भावो बुद्धिर्यस्य न लिप्यते । हत्वाऽपि स इमाँल्लोकान्न हन्ति न निबध्यते ॥ १८-१७ ॥

yasya nāhaṅkṛto bhāvo buddhiryasya na lipyate | hatvā'pi sa imāṁllokānna hanti na nibadhyate || 18-17 ||

yasya: of whom; na: not; aham kṛitah: sense of doership; bhavaḥ: nature/ feeling; buddhiḥ: intelligence; yasya: of whom; na: not; lipyate: (is) affected; hatva api: even while killing; sa: s/he; iman: this; lokan: world; na hanti: does not kill; na nibadhyate: (and) is not bound (by the reactions).

"One who is not affected by the egotism of identification with the action remains with a clear intelligence. Even if he kills, he does not kill, and is not bound (by the reaction).

The word ahankṛita ("I have done") is a synonym of ahankara ("I am the doer") mentioned several times as the delusion of material identification (2.71, 3.27, 7.4, 12.13, 13.6, 13.9, 16.18, 17.5, 18.53, 18.58, 18.59). This ahankara is a material element like the mind, space, air, fire, and so on; as long as we are in the material world we cannot become free from it but we need to learn how to deal with it. This is why Krishna in this verse says na lipyate, "is not affected". It is the same with the gunas - as long as we are embodied in the material world we will have to deal with the lower gunas of rajas and tamas, because we will come in contact with them regularly, again and again. So the best thing is to learn how to use them without being affected and controlled by them.

We can use tamas to sleep deeply and rest our body and mind, we can use rajas to goad ourselves into action when we risk getting too comfortable and uninterested in investing much effort in our duties. Sattva is a quality of balance and tends to detachment, so in contact with ahankara or separate identification it could develop a rigidity that is likely turn to tamas because of the material obscuration of consciousness.

The solution, as we have already seen, consists in overcoming the identification with material sattva as well and elevating oneself to suddha sattva, that is the quality of goodness not tainted with material identification. But that means that one should overcome ahankara. How to overcome ahankara? It would be like trying to overcome water or fire or earth. We cannot become free from these elements, because they are present even in our own bodies. We must recognize that the action is conducted by prakriti through the consciousness of the purusha, under the direction of the paramatma, Purushottama.

We need to use ahankara just like we use water or fire or earth - carefully, with intelligence, knowledge and detachment, without being affected by it. We can direct the power of identification towards the transcendental level, in the direction of atman or self realization and bhakti or devotion to the Supreme. The key to the process is bhava (with a second long a) that means "feeling, nature", and on a higher level, "consciousness". When directly applied to action, this means we should not have any personal selfish motive, either individual or collective. Collective selfishness means acting for the exclusive benefit of one's family, ethnic group, circle of friends or gang, community, gender, race, nation or even species, without considering the benefit of all others. The concept of selfishness is based on duality, i.e. the mistaken idea that we are separated from other beings and existences, and therefore we can actually get benefit from an action that damages others. To remain free from this delusion we must always consider the benefit for all beings before engaging in any action; the activities strictly connected to our survival, as the killing of aggressors of all kinds and the reasonable and appropriate consumption of food and other resources, are not considered a selfish action because by stopping an aggressor we are actually preventing him from committing a crime, and because our personal existence has a greater value than food and other resources when we are following the instructions of the shastra and living for the service of the universal community (Virata rupa) and the well being of all creatures (para upakara). This is also directly confirmed in verse 5.25: labhante brahma nirvanam risayah ksina kalmasah, chinna dvaidha yatatmanah sarva bhuta hite ratah, "Those who see Reality attain the brahma nirvana because they have been purified from all faults and have cut off all dualistic illusions, engaging themselves in work for the benefit of all living beings." Verse 12.4 also uses the same words: te prapnuvanti mam eva sarva bhuta hite ratah, "they can attain me if they are sincerely interested in the benefit of all beings".

Verse 13.31 is particularly clear: yada bhuta prithag bhavam eka stham anupasyati, tata eva ca vistaram brahma sampadyate tada, "When one becomes trained to see all beings as situated in one, even when they are separated, and (how all this) is developed, s/he attains the position of Brahman." Other verses also bring up this concept, further explaining that God is present in all beings as life and consciousness: 5.29, 7.5, 7.6, 7.9, 7.10, 8.4, 8.22, 9.5, 9.8, 9.13, 9.29, 10.20, 10.22, 10.39, 11.15, 11.43, 12.13, 13.16, 13.17, 13.28, 14.3, 14.4, 15.13 and 15.14. Therefore those who act in envy and hatred against other beings are clearly defined as asuras: ahankaram balam darpanam kamam krodham ca samsritah, mam atma para debesu pradvisanto 'bhyasuyakah "Taking shelter in ahankara, physical strength, arrogance, lust and anger, they show envy and hatred against me, as I reside in their own bodies and in the bodies of others" (16.18), and karsayantah sarira stham bhuta gramam acetasah, mam caivantah sarira stham tan viddhy asura niscayan, "You should know that they are certainly asuras, because they foolishly cause suffering and damage to all beings, and to me as well, since I reside within the body" (17.6).

The expression hatvapi sa imal lokan na hanti na nibadhyate echoes one of the first instructions given by Krishna: ya enam vetti hantaram yas cainam manyate hatam, ubhau tau na vijanito nayam hanti na banyate, "One who knows this (atman/ brahman) does not consider himself to be killing or being killed; in both (positions) he knows that one does neither truly kill nor is truly killed" (2.19). A person who has overcome the illusion of duality and is attached to the benefit to all beings as the cells of one single body will take action to remove only those body parts that are damaging the body as a whole, like gangrenous tissues or cancerous growths. In this way, he is actually working for the benefit of all other beings, therefore he is not going to suffer an adverse reaction for the "killing" of such cells. Of course forceful removal must always be the last resort: Krishna and the Pandavas amply demonstrated this point in the events of the Mahabharata leading to the battlefield of Kurukshetra, where Krishna and Arjuna are now talking for our benefit.

Furthermore, this does not mean that we can hide behind hierarchy and bad orders from our superiors in command, or take the pretext that one type of being is better than another so the existence of the better beings will be improved if we eliminate the "not so good" ones (that are not aggressors). There is no place for cheating or dishonesty in the work for dharma.

ज्ञानं ज्ञेयं परिज्ञाता त्रिविधा कर्मचोदना । करणं कर्म कर्तेति त्रिविधः कर्मसंग्रहः ॥ १८-१८ ॥

jñānam jñeyam parijñātā trividhā karmacodanā | karaṇam karma karteti trividhaḥ karmasaṅgrahaḥ || 18-18 ||

jnanam: knowledge; jneyam: the object of knowledge; pari jnata: one who understands; tri vidha: of three kinds; karma: of action; codana: the impetus/ the motivation; karanam: the instruments (the senses); karma: the action; karta: the doer; iti: thus; tri vidha: three types; karma sangraha: the factors/ components of the action.

"There are three triggers for action: knowledge, the object of knowledge and the subject of knowledge. There are three requirements for action: the instruments for action, the action itself and the subject of action.

The expression tri vidha ("of three types") can also apply to the characteristics determined by the particular influence of each of the three gunas or modes of material nature, as Krishna has explained in previous chapters. In the next verse Krishna will clearly mention the specific symptoms of knowledge, action itself and subject of the action according to sattva, rajas and tamas, but we have seen from the previous chapters that also the objects of knowledge (the sense objects) and the instruments of knowledge (the senses of perception and action) are characterized by the specific gunas. The best example is the description of the three types of foods and corresponding preferences in tastes in verse 17.7.

In verse 13.3 Krishna had defined knowledge as the knowledge of the kshetra (object) and the kshetra jna (subject) as well, so in fact we could aggregate the factors of sense objects and senses under the category of the subject of action (karta) that Krishna will describe in the next verses. The word codana is very interesting. In other contexts, it has been used to indicate "encouragement" or "scriptural instruction" (codana laksano artho dharma, "the meaning of dharmic duty is what is indicated by the scriptures", Purna mimamsa sutra 1.1.2), but also "motivation", "inducement" and "impetus", "inspiration" or even "subtle manifestation" (as in the blueprint design of a technical device). We translated it as "trigger" but we could also call it "catalyst".

Some people believe that the knowledge of action and the self is not a precise or concrete science and therefore all opinions are good, but this is a very serious mistake. In Vedic civilization and in all pre-abrahamic cultures, people were able to see the strong connection between physics and metaphysics, between the kshetra and the kshetra jna.

In more recent times, western physicists have become increasingly free from the abrahamic academic prejudice and have proved that at subatomic level, reality does not actually exist until we measure it.

John Wheeler's delayed-choice thought experiment was first proposed back in 1978 using light beams bounced by mirrors, but only 40 years later the procedure was conducted with full success by using a Mach-Zehnder interferometer and ultracold metastable helium atoms, scattered by laser light in a suspended state known as Bose-Einstein condensate. The atoms were ejected until there was a single one left; this chosen atom was then dropped through a pair of laser beams, which made a pattern acting as crossroads that would scatter the path of the atom. Then they randomly added a second pattern that recombined the paths, but only after the atom had already passed the first stage. This second phase led to constructive or destructive interference, which is what would be expected if the atom had traveled both paths, like a wave would do. But when the second pattern was added no interference was observed, as if the atom had chosen only one path: this was taken to mean that the atom had not determined yet its nature before being measured for a second time. Only when the atom was measured at the end of the journey, its wave-like or particle-like behavior was brought to existence.

This confirms Bohr's view that one cannot ascribe the wave or particle behavior to a massive particle before the measurement takes place. Scientists were already surprised about the quantum physics predictions about interference (of the kshetra jna on the kshetra) when applied to light (which seems more like a wave), but the recent experiment applied the same principle to atoms, that are complicated objects that have a mass and interact with electric fields. A Vedic rishi would not have been surprised at all. To keep up with the progress of knowledge in the mainstream scientific research field, we need to become detached from the imperfect and often mistaken information that was peddled to us as absolute unquestionable truths during our early years in school. The same applies to archeology, paleontology and especially history, where records and theories have been manufactured with incredibly biased motivations to hide the actual truth from people.

With reference to Bhagavad gita and this verse, we need to understand that reality and action are much deeper than what they appear to be superficially, so we must keep an open mind to consider all the factors. Vedic knowledge is not based on blind faith, but a certain measure of confidence in the teacher is indispensable in order to become able to conduct our own verification experiments in the precise conditions that will guarantee its success. Whimsically neglecting the basic parameters (sangraha) that are the basis for the experiment will compromise the procedure and yield different results. Another interesting point to note is that the word sangraha is also related to the concept of "understanding", "enlightenment", as "to receive" (the same logical derivation of the Latin word "data"), and "collection" (of information or factors).

In the bhakti perspective, this verse has been explained as the process of engagement in devotional service, where jnana is sambandha (the relationship between bhakta and Isvara), jneya is abhidheya (the engagement in active service to Isvara), and jnata is prayojana (the attainment of perfect union with Isvara). In this regard, these are considered the basic factors that inspire action, while the ingredients of action are the bhakta (karta), the bhajana or active meditation on Isvara (as karma or duty according to vaidhi or raganuga bhakti), and the rasa or bhava (sentiment) that constitutes the siddha deha or spiritual bodily form of the devotee (including the senses of course). This is confirmed by Narada pancaratra: brisikena brisikesa sevnam, bhaktir ucyate, "Bhakti is defined as using one's senses in the service of the Lord of the senses".

ज्ञानं कर्म च कर्ताच त्रिधैव गुणभेदतः । प्रोच्यते गुणसङ्ख्याने यथावच्छृणु तान्यपि ॥ १८-१९ ॥

jñānam karma ca kartāca tridhāiva guṇabhedataḥ । procyate guṇasaṅkhyāne yathāvacchṛṇu tānyapi ।। 18-19 ।।

jnanam: knowledge; karma: action; ca: and; karta: the doer; ca: and; tri dha: of three types; eva: certainly; guna bhedatah: categorized according to the gunas; procyate: it is said; guna sankhyane: by analyzing the gunas; yatha vat: as they are; srnu: listen; tani: to them; api: also.

"Knowledge, action and the subjective factor are certainly categorized according to the three gunas. Listen to their enumeration according to their specific qualities.

In this verse the word guna is used in its fundamental meaning of "quality", "mode", "characteristic", applied specifically to the three categories of sattva, rajas and tamas. Similarly, Krishna uses here the word sankhya in the most elegant way as a symmetrical indication that remind us about the Sankhya philosophical system of recognizing the nature and qualities of the various components of Reality, introduced in chapter 2 as either spiritual or material (sat or asat, 2.16).

Now, we should spend a moment to wonder how chapter 2 was entitled to Sankhya, when in fact it only speaks about the atman/ brahman as distinct from the material manifestation, and even recommends to become detached from all the various categories of the material universe, that are merely manifestations of the three gunas (2.45). The seed of this understanding is contained in a deeper meaning of the subsequent verse: yavan artha udapane sarvatah samplutodake, tavan sarvesu vedesu brahmanasya vijanatah, "Whatever value is found in a pond is also found, for all purposes, also in a large lake, and similarly whatever is contained in all the Vedas can be found in a person who has realized the knowledge of Brahman" (2.46). This indicates that the analytical knowledge of the various categories of the material universe is not opposite to the science of Brahman, but rather Brahman realization contains all other categories of knowledge and existence.

By overcoming the illusion of duality (2.45, 4.22, 5.3, 5.25, 7.27, 7.28, 15.5), one penetrates the mystery of the non-difference between purusha and prakriti, as amply elaborated in chapter 13, that also started by Arjuna's questions about kshetra and kshetrajna, jna and jneya (13.1). This is indeed how Krishna started his teachings in chapter 2, and the same point will continue to be central to the understanding of Bhagavad gita, the Vedanta sutra and the Vedic hymns as well (13.5). In 13.6 and subsequent verses, Krishna enumerates the categories of reality that are generally considered as the subject of Sankhya, therefore we can see the strong connection between the two topics - sankhya or analytical enumeration of categories of reality, and understanding of the concept of purusha and prakriti, or shaktiman and shakti.

The connection between Sankhya and the science of the three gunas is illustrated in the descriptions of the creation of the universe, about which Krishna has given a reference in verses 7.6, 9.8, 10.32, 14.3, 15.4. However, to explore the subject further we will have to examine the teachings of the Puranas, and especially the Bhagavata Purana. In verse 4.11.16 we see for example this statement: evam pravartate sargah sthiti samyama eva ca, guna vyatikarad rajan mayaya paramatmanah, "O king, the creation, preservation and destruction (of the universe) occurs by the interaction of the gunas of the Paramatma's energy". The subject of primary creation is explained in Bhagavata Purana (3rd canto, chapters 25 to 32) by the avatara Kapila, the original expounder of the Sankhya system, who also elaborates there about the science of action, especially about prescribed duty and bhakti. We give here below a brief summary of that description.

The static combination of the three gunas, the three influences of nature, is the aggregate of the elements that compose nature, and is called pradhana. These elements are the five gross elements, the five subtle elements, the four internal senses, the five senses of perception and the five organs of action. The five gross elements are earth (energy in the solid form), water (energy in liquid form), fire (energy in the form of heat and light), air (energy in the form of gas) and space. The five corresponding subtle elements are smell, taste, color, touch and sound. The senses of perception are the nose, tongue, eyes, skin and ears, while the senses of action are those that enable us to speak, move, work, generate and evacuate. The internal subtle senses are the mind, intelligence, ego and material awareness. The 25th element is time - the external manifestation of the Godhead that starts and ends creation - while the 26th element is the presence of the soul.

In the beginning the soul is pure, clear and peaceful awareness, free from all distraction, but when it identifies with matter, the principles of creation manifest the various material elements. The false perception of the self focused in goodness manifests the mind. Material identification focused in passion manifests intelligence, with its functions such as doubt, correct understanding, incorrect understanding, memory and sleep, as well as the senses of perception and action, that depend respectively on intelligence and life energy. Material identification focused in ignorance produces the material elements, beginning with the subtle element of sound, that in turn produces space and the sense of hearing. From the existence of space the sense of touch develops, and then air. The interaction of air and the sense of touch produces the concept of the forms of the bodies, determined by the destiny of each individual. The evolution of the forms generates fire (light and heat) and the eyes acquire the ability to perceive forms and colors. The interaction of fire with the visual perception evolves the element of taste, that produces water and the sense that perceives taste (the tongue). Although taste is originally one, it develops in various categories such as astringent, sweet, bitter, pungent, acid and salty, because of its contact with different substances. The interaction of water with the perception of taste develops the subtle element of odor, that manifests earth and the sense of smell. When all these elements become differentiated, the Supreme Lord personally enters the creation together with time, action and the gunas, giving birth to the Cosmic Egg. Within the Cosmic Egg, Vishnu, Hari, divides it in 14 planetary systems that compose its body. The parts of the body of the Virat Purusha, the universal Lord, manifest as the various components of nature - the mouth is the power to speak and the Deva of fire, the nostrils are the sense of smell and the prana, and so on. At this point the jivatmans are introduced in the universe and take birth in accordance to their specific gunas and karma. In this way we contemplate the Godhead as present in our own body and in the universe and simultaneously distinct from them. When the living being is in this position, he is not subject to the influence of the gunas, of the temporary identifications and of the sense of possession, just like the sun remains detached from its own reflection in the water.

अविभक्तं विभक्तेषु तज्ज्ञानं विद्धि सात्त्विकम् ॥ १८-२० ॥

sarvabhūteṣu yenaikam bhāvamavyayamīkṣate | avibhaktaṁ vibhakteṣu tajjñānaṁ viddhi sāttvikam || 18-20 ||

sarva bhutesu: in all beings; yena: by which; ekam: one; bhavam: sentiment/ nature; avyayam: imperishable; ikṣate: s/he sees; a vibhaktam: not divided; vibhaktesu: in (all) the separated (manifestations); tat: that; jñanam: knowledge; viddhi: you should know; sattvikam: in sattva guna.

"You should know that knowledge in sattva guna sees the one imperishable existence in all beings, undivided although manifesting in many different forms.

The first and truest form of knowledge is based on sattva, the quality of existence that is nearest to sat and satyam - the transcendental existence that is the supreme truth. To better understand this verse, we should remember that the word bhuta ("being") indicates a living entity or jivatman, and also a form of existence ("being") in which the living entity finds itself in this world as a result of his guna and karma. Therefore the sattvik intelligence sees all jivatmans as cells in the same universal body of the paramatman - as one and the same, and at the same time distinct and categorized according to their different functions and positions. Furthermore, such sattvik intelligence sees all conditions of life - subha and asubha, sukha and duḥkha, etc - as parts of the same great plan for the evolution of the jivatman, just like many different classes present various subjects in a single school course for the all-round preparation of the students. Both these perspectives and meanings have been confirmed many times along the text of Bhagavad gita.

The word bhava (with a long first a) is used here to indicate the supreme Being, and with very good reason. We have seen in previous commentaries that this word includes the meanings of "being, state of being, situation, existence, nature", and also "feeling, sentiment, taste," and even "heart" (as in 10.11). Brahman, the Purushottama, is consciousness and existence: raso vai sah, rasam hy evayam labdhvanandi bhavati, "He is taste, and by attaining him, one becomes happy", (Taittiriya Upanishad, 2.7.1).

This definition of bhava includes both atman and brahman, as both are avyaya ("imperishable", "eternal"), but this sentiment or knowledge shines brighter when it is not clouded (na lipyate) by the cover of separate material identification (no ahankara - na aham kṛto) as we have seen in verse 18.17. Atman and brahman are one, yet they are distinct as the two birds sitting on the same tree; this was confirmed from the very beginning of Krishna's instructions, in verse 2.12. This simultaneous difference and non-difference between Isvara and jiva is explained not only in terms of quantity, but also in terms of relationship, as we have seen in chapter 13. The jivatman is simultaneously purusha and prakṛiti, just like Brahman is simultaneously purusha and prakṛiti: this differentiation is only functional but it allows the required space for relationships or "dance", epitomized by Krishna's rasa lila with the gopis in Vrindavana. In that lila, the parama purusha is Krishna and the parama prakṛiti is Radha, while on the subordinate/ responsive level, the prakṛiti is the gopī's bhakti, while the purusha is the gopī's bhava, that is non-different from Krishna himself.

And in fact we found in chapter 13 a statement that is very similar to the verse we are now studying: avibhaktam ca bhutesu vibhaktam iva ca sthitam, bhuta bhartri ca taj jneyam grasinsu prabhavinsu ca, "Although undivided, he appears as if he is divided into the many beings where he resides. He is the sustainer of all beings, and is to be known as the powerful Vishnu, who devours everything" (13.17). In turn, that verse connected to the meditation on the Virata Rupa or Kala Rupa, radiant as fire and sun and devouring the universe, that we have seen in chapter 11, especially from verses 11.10 to 11.32, that finally reveal in full splendor what had only been hinted in the previous verses 5.16, 8.10, 10.11, 10.21, and 10.36,

Here is just one example: divi surya sahasrasya bhaved yugapad utthita, yadi bhab sadrisi sa syad bhasas tasya mabatmanah, "If thousands of suns were rising simultaneously in the sky, that radiance would be similar to the radiance of the great Atman" (11.12). Again this will be confirmed in verse 13.8, that explains the Sankhya and the unity/ difference of purusha and prakṛiti: jyotisam api taj jyotis tamasah param ucyate, jneyam jñana gamyam bridi sarvasya visthitam, "He is described as the light in all radiant things, transcendental to darkness. He is established in the heart of everything, and he is to be known through the cultivation of knowledge" (13.18). And what is this great radiance of Brahman, the brahmajyoti, if not the emanation of all the shakti, svamsa and vibhinna manifestations of the one great Reality? Therefore those who have true knowledge can see Paramatman existing in all beings: vidya vinaya sampanne brahmane gavi hastini, suni caiva sva pake ca panditah sama darsinah, "The wise and learned see equally the brahmana who is learned and gentle, the cow and the elephant, as well as the dog and to the savage" (5.18).

The next two verses will illustrate the symptoms of a mind functioning under rajas and tamas, while we can call the sattvic mode of understanding with the name of "knowledge" (jñana) or "intelligence" (buddhi), the tamasic mentality does not meet the requirements, therefore this definition will not appear in verse 23. While we study the three types of knowledge (18.20-22), action (18.23-25) and doer or subjective factor (18.26-28) we should remember that these include the position, the instruments and the effort mentioned in verse 18.18.

The conclusion of this elaboration (18.30) is that only sattvic persons are able to understand the subject of sannyasa/ tyaga and moksha that is the focus of this chapter. Then again Krishna will explain about the different types of intelligence (18.31-32), determination or effort (18.33-35), and happiness (18.36-39). After establishing again the importance of the gunas, Krishna will describe the duties of the different types or categories of human beings in society according to their gunas (18.41-49). Only after that, Krishna will directly discuss about transcending material positions and identifications (sarva dharman parityajya, 18.66), while continuing to fulfill one's proper duties (18.56-57) as genuine, pure transcendental devotional service to the Supreme (18.55, 18.58, 18.61-62, 18.64-66). And this is the last conclusion of Bhagavad gita.

पृथक्त्वेन तु यज्ज्ञानं नानाभावान्पृथग्विधान् । वेत्ति सर्वेषु भूतेषु तज्ज्ञानं विद्धि राजसम् ॥ १८-२१ ॥

prthaktvena tu yajjñānam nānābhāvānpṛthagvidhān | veti sarveṣu bhūteṣu tajjñānam viddhi rājasam || 18-21 ||

prithaktvena: because of the distinction; tu: but; yat: which; jnanam: knowledge; nana bhavan: many natures; prithak vidhan: different types; vetti: s/he knows; sarvesu bhutesu: in all beings; tat: that; jnanam: knowledge; viddhi: you should understand; rajasam: in the rajas guna.

"Know that the knowledge influenced by rajas is the understanding that sees different natures in all beings as separated from each other.

We have already seen in many verses that the influence of rajas creates greed and attachment for the selfish exploitation and enjoyment of material nature. The very concept of selfishness and greed implies duality and separation of interests, as claiming one thing for oneself means that we are preventing someone else from having or accessing it. It is important to understand here that overcoming duality is a fundamental teaching that must be applied to the bhutas - the living beings and the conditions of being; one should never fall in the trap of believing that there is no difference between sat and asat, dharma and adharma, vidya and avidya, or that all opinions and "ways of life" are equally valid. It is a question of good sense: anyone can see that a particular action will bring some consequences, and the opposite action will bring the resulting consequences.

A rajasic mentality will shift the discriminating intelligence from choosing the ethically valid action and will bring it to choosing the individual or group that will obtain a separate benefit from the action. Therefore the karma ("action, duty") will be seen in terms of antithetical advantage rather than general advantage, based on the particular separate identity of the beneficiary of the advantages contemplated, as if different categories of beings had different natures. In a sattvic society like the original Vedic civilization (in Satya yuga), people do not have a rigid concept of private property, and certainly they do not apply it to common basic resources such as land, water, animals, plants, or even food. When society is seen as a single harmonious unit of members who cooperate together and share together, each receiving automatically what is required for proper living, there is no crime among human beings - no thefts, no frauds, no violent aggressions.

The idea of charity is aimed at circulating and distributing wealth rather than getting some personal merit (17.20). When rajas increases in society, greed, selfishness and attachment develop, and the exploitation mentality creates a scarcity paradigm, the impulse to hoarding up grains and other food supplies, and the clear delimitation and segregation of one's land or territory, family and domestic animals. As a consequence, people feel empty, needy and fearful about the future, and they become worried about their self-defense, because they perceive in others the same seed of fear, the desire for exclusive appropriation, and the anticipation of loss and death. In the cultivation of knowledge, the difference of opinions moves from complementary to competing and rival; while in Satya yuga there was only the desire to better understand and enlighten each other, in Treta yuga with the increase of rajas we see debates starting to develop in order to establish a winner, who thus demonstrates his superiority among other scholars. The study of philosophy and theology becomes separate from elemental sciences, and the concept of linear history appears to disrupt the constant awareness and knowledge of the entire cosmic manifestation, spiritual and material. The divisive feeling creates the different classes of occupation in human society, and a difference of roles and inclinations between men and women. Brought to excess, this rajasic influence becomes unreasonable and detrimental, based on the logic of cutting a piece of cloth from one side of a blanket to add it to the opposite side of the same blanket with the idea of making the blanket bigger, or as the famous saying goes, "robbing Peter to pay Paul".

Bodily identification becomes stronger and birth prejudice develops, creating many sufferings and damages to individuals and to society at large. People become easily confused about the nature of the atman, and upadharms and nastika darshanas develop as popular religions to cater to less intelligent and lazier people, who like to believe that the atman is temporary or limited to the body (to rationalize and justify their greed), or prefer to simply have a set of rules and celebrations for social interactions and affiliation (to rationalize and justify their superficiality). When rajas is further contaminated by tamas (ignorance), human society becomes asuric and hellish, as the concept of exploitation and enjoyment of resources becomes disconnected from actual work and resorts to violent aggression and destruction (vandalism, sadism).

We have seen this development described in the chapter about the difference between the daivi and asuri characteristics: idam adya maya labdham imam prapsye manoratham, idam astidam api me bhavisyati punar dhanam, asau maya batah satrur hanisye caparan api, isvaro 'ham abam bhogi siddho 'ham balavan sukhi, "Today I have acquired all this, and I will get even more, as much as my mind desires. This wealth is mine, and it will increase more and more. I have killed that enemy of mine, and I will kill others, too. I am the Lord and master. I am the enjoyer. I am perfect, powerful and happy." (16.13-14). This mentality starts from rajas because of the sense of duality and separation, in which one feels that one can obtain pleasure by hurting others, and the sattvic idea of healthy enjoyment of one's legitimate share in a cooperative society is replaced by the selfish accumulation of possessions and power. This selfishness reinforces the ahankara (material identification with body and position) and mamatva (material attachment to possessions and affiliations), until abhimana (arrogance, pride) fills the entire horizon of the conditioned soul, and he cannot see anything else. It is the intrinsic ignorance consisting in material identification that attunes the consciousness with the lowest mode of tamas, in which intelligence is completely covered by darkness. This is certainly not the road to liberation.

यत्तु कृत्स्नवदेकस्मिन्कार्ये सक्तमहैतुकम् । अतत्त्वार्थवदल्पं च तत्तामसमुदाहृतम् ॥ १८-२२ ॥

yattu kṛtsnavadekasminkārye saktamahaitukam । atattvārthavadalpaṁ ca tattāmasamudāhṛtam ॥ 18-22 ॥

yat: which; tu: but; kṛtsna vat: as the completion; ekasmin: in one; kārye: in the action; saktam: attached; ahaitukam: without reason; a tattva artha vat: one who does not give the proper value to reality; alpam: very little; ca: and; tat: that; tamasam: in tamas guna; udahritam: it is described.

"The narrow-mindedness that sees dutiful action in one method only, to which one is irrationally attached, and that does not give the proper meaning/ importance to reality, is described as controlled by tamas.

Abrahamic ideologies and their derivatives (such as communism, capitalism, globalism, as well as some sects of originally non-abrahamic faiths that have been contaminated later by abrahamic beliefs and concepts), are the perfect example of tamasic mentality, because each one of them (and each of their sub-sects) presents itself as the only true, genuine, possible or permissible method or way of life, and is openly determined to demonize and destroy all other beliefs or opinions, irrespective of their actual merit and the benefits they would bring to individuals and society. Sectarianism can also be present in other groups and cause friction, lack of mutual respect and even occasional clashes, but apart from abrahamic sects (and derivatives) there is no historical evidence of any particular ideology forcing people into conversion and systematically engaging in trying to physically eliminate all other ideologies.

We need to understand this point very clearly, because in Kali yuga people are immersed in tamas and therefore rather stupid (manda sumanda matayo manda bhagyah hy upadrutah, "lazy, foolish, ill-favored by fortune and above all, misguided", Bhagavata Purana 1.1.10) and tend to equivocate and confuse things. Sometimes this foolishness and ignorance comes to the point of mistaking beliefs or ideological affiliations for ethnic culture or even racial character, so if we do not accept or respect the dangerously adharmic abrahamic ideologies we are accused of being racist and intolerant of cultural diversity.

Such foolish accusers are not even aware of the meaning of the words "race" and "culture", and they do not understand that a person who converts to any abrahamic sect fails to have his/ her DNA changed. His/ her skin color and face traits remain exactly the same - unless of course we introduce artificial methods such as use of bleach, dyes, cosmetic surgery etc, that can alter the external appearance but certainly not the DNA and genetic configuration and have effect on anyone with no regard to one's particular beliefs and religious practices. Also, ignorant and foolish people do not bother to verify the fact that cultural diversity and ethnic traditions rarely disappear with conversion to a particular religion, and people tend to continue in their particular traditional clothing style, food taste, language, music style, entertainment preferences, and so on - unless of course the religious or government authorities make separate efforts to ban previous ethnic customs and enforce new life styles, and in any case total uniformity (eka asmin karye) is extremely difficult to obtain and maintain unless tamas is strong and deep enough. So this really boils down to tamas again - on how strong it becomes in people.

There are two opposite foolish positions - one says that all opinions and beliefs are equally valid (or equally non-valid), and the other says that only one's own opinion is valid a priori simply because one believes in it. Both positions are influenced by tamas and remain unable to help the progress and happiness of the individual or society. The actual fact is that there will always be many opinions, some of which have more merit and some have less merit; all these should be individually evaluated based on their degree of intelligence, ethical sense, feasibility and beneficial effects on individuals and society in general.

The merit or demerit of a particular opinion has nothing to do with the social or historical position of the person or persons who proposed it, or even with the sheer number of the people supporting it. Vote by majority is not a guarantee of the value of what is being approved, because a majority of adharmic people, criminals or fools will support what they like best from their own perspectives; sometimes it is said that democracy is like two goats and five wolves voting together about what is for dinner, or even about what is the most righteous diet.

Claiming that a particular opinion has absolute value because "God said so" (to whom? and who will prove it?) or more realistically, because "God's priests said so", is a tamasic proposition and will only be accepted by people who are already influenced by ignorance. Rajasic people will accept an opinion because it suits them (and their personal objectives) and sattvic people will accept an opinion because it makes sense in the light of intelligence and ethical sense, while tamasic people will accept an opinion because of apathy, fear and confusion created by clever manipulative propaganda.

A tamasic mentality is naturally attracted to some particular material object or projection, and sees it at the eternal and perfect Being, the appropriate center of his/her attention, service and worship, but the real problem is that s/he becomes overly attached (sakta) and aggressive against all those who do not share the same belief. Such mentality is irrational, illusory, confused and irrelevant to the actual purpose of life or benefit of society. It could be some ideological belief, a religious sect, a social class, a race, or a group of any other kind - even a religious organization, a sampradaya, and so on. It could be a powerful person such as a politician, a superstar of some kind (cinema, sports, culture, religion, etc) or a fictional character or even a rakshasa or evil spirit as we have seen in previous chapters (9.25, 17.4). The influence of tamas will compel a foolish person to worship and become very attached (saktam) to his/ her center of focus, to the point of supporting it against all logic and good reasons, and with all possible violence, deceit and devious means.

In this verse the words abaitukam ("without reason") and a-tattva-artha ("no meaning") indicate the tamasic characteristics of no reasoning, blind faith, lack of interest in understanding or discovering reality or facts. The word alpam ("minimal") indicates a very narrow minded approach, obsessed with trifles and irrelevant details such as gossip about celebrities, and it can be connected to the expression duratma as opposed to mahatma. This small vision will - for example - present yoga as a health and fitness practice, aimed at stimulating the lower chakras, and present tantra as a pretext to get cheap sex from foolish followers, eat non vegetarian stuff and drink booze for selfish sense gratification and recreational purposes.

Similarly, the word karye, meaning "in what is to be done", can refer to a manufactured form or image, indicating the religious fervor of those who give more importance to the materials and the specific shape of the Deity as an idol of stone, metal or wood, rather than to the divine principle that is manifested in such vighraha because of the bhakti of the worshiper. Tamasic people who have very little intelligence (alpa medhasa, 7.23) will superficially worship the form without understanding it deeply, and therefore the results of such worship will be short-lived and very limited, even if the vigraha is one of the various Vishnu tattva forms.

नियतं सङ्गरहितमरागद्वेषतः कृतम् । अफलप्रेप्सुना कर्म यत्तत्सात्त्विकमुच्यते ॥ १८-२३ ॥

niyatam sangarahitamaraḡadveṣataḥ kṛtam |aphalaprepsunā karma yattatsāttvikamucyate || 18-23||

niyatam: regulated; sanga rahitam: without association; araga dvesataḥ: without attachment or repulsion; kṛtam: done; aphala prepsuna: without selfish desire to enjoy the results; karma: work; yat: which; tat: that; sattvikam: in sattva guna; ucyate: it is said.

"That action that is performed in a regulated way, without identification or affiliation, without attachment or repulsion, without a selfish desire to enjoy the results, is described as belonging to sattva.

The word niyatam refers to regulated actions performed steadily and sincerely, as a matter of duty, as proper beneficial engagement or sadhana (yata, 2.60, 3.8, 4.21, 4.28, 4.30, 5.25, 5.26, 6.10, 6.12, 6.15, 6.19, 6.36, 6.43, 6.45, 7.3, 7.20, 7.29, 8.11, 9.14, 12.11, 12.14, 15.11, 18.7, 18.9, 18.46, 18.47). Such actions could be sometimes difficult and challenging, but we need to make some effort to remain regularly engaged; even if we are not successful, the amount of effort we invested in the attempt will bring good results - just like in school we must go through our exercises, tests and homework in order to learn and practice and become perfect. In Hindu-Vedic tradition, these actions are called nitya karma, or nitya karmani (plural), and constitute the activities that according to Krishna should never be abandoned (18.3).

However, we should not think that such duties are exactly the same for everyone at all times, because the fundamental concept is to engage one's resources and abilities (guna and karma), and these can be quite different from one person to the other, or even for the same person in different circumstances or stages of individual progress. Therefore we need the wise and knowledgeable guidance of guru, shastra and sadhu to become able to understand what exactly is our duty (sva dharma) in each particular circumstance.

We have elaborated several times on the word sanga; here we will only repeat that it means not only "contact, association", but also "affiliation, belonging, identification" (sa-anga, "member with") as to a particular group rather than to the entire universal body of the Virata Rupa of which we are all parts. So our sanga ("association") should be liberated (from all material identifications and attachments) otherwise we should cut ourselves free from it, in order to achieve the level of mukta sanga - an essential step towards moksha or liberation.

Some commentators translate raga as "love" or "absorption", but that is not correct. Love is always a good sentiment and has the power to bring freedom; unfortunately the definition of "love" has been rather inflated and hijacked by using it incorrectly to refer to lust, attachment, sense of possession, attraction, infatuation, enjoyment, and so on. Also, the concept of "absorption" conveys the sense of concentration and meditation that certainly does not need to be abandoned in order to attain moksha.

The word raga actually means "attachment" and is closely connected to the type of identification (abhankara), based on the egotistic dualistic separatist perception indicated by its counterpart dvesha ("repulsion, hatred"). One who identifies with the material body will be very attached to it and invest a lot of time and effort and resources in trying to keep it in the best possible shape. One who identifies with the mind will be very attached to mental activities - general readings, riddles, crossword puzzles, scholarly pursuits etc - and invest time, effort and resources accordingly. One who identifies with a particular group will be attached to that group or its ideology, and similarly invest and work for it. In all such cases, as material body, mind and group affiliation are temporary, the conditioned soul will experience fear, suffering, despair and confusion at the time of loss, due to death or other factors. The same applies for dvesha ("hatred, repulsion") and this is why we should do without them, as indicated by the privative prefix a applied to the compound word.

So the only raga that should be accepted is the one that has no dvesha because it is focused on the Supreme on the transcendental liberated stage. This means that we should become attached to our original and true spiritual identity as atman, part of brahman, and engage all our potential - time, effort and resources - in pursuing that consciousness and engagement. Since the atman/brahman is eternal and unchanging, there will never be any loss, therefore automatically fear and confusion will disappear.

On that level, we are liberated from the consequences of material action because we do not identify with the action itself or its results and we are not attached to them (aphala prepsuna), but we simply accept whatever comes by the grace of the Supreme as prasadam or blessing, and use it in the best possible way as a further opportunity for universal service. That is called visuddha sattva.

The level of material sattva is a sort of preparatory training or internship towards the level of visuddha sattva or transcendence; in the language of bhakti literature we can define material sattva as vaidhi bhakti (regulated devotional service) and visuddha sattva as raganuga bhakti (spontaneous devotional service). While the first is mostly a mechanical exercise and still requires some effort, the second level is free from any friction caused by material contamination, so there is no opposing resistance to the pursuance of our activities. Again, the platform of material sattva must be carefully watched and protected from any contamination, otherwise there is a serious danger of sliding into tamas instead of attaining the higher level of visuddha sattva.

This can happen due to the influence of ignorance, where sanga rahitam is interpreted as "without connections to others or the rest of the world" (as in self-centered egotistic callousness), a-raga-dvesa is interpreted as "everything is the same because I don't care" (as in neglect of the basic dharmic values), and aphala prepsuna is interpreted as "I don't care what the results of my actions will be" (as in selfish sense gratification, aggression and undue exploitation and misappropriation). These considerations apply both to the individuals and to the groups, including religious communities, traditions or organizations.

यत्तु कामेप्सुना कर्म साहंकारेण वा पुनः । क्रियते बहुलायासं तद्राजसमुदाहृतम् ॥ १८-२४ ॥

yattu kamepsuna karma sahaṅkāreṇa vā punaḥ । kriyate bahulāyāsaṁ tadrājasamudāhṛtam ॥ 18-24 ॥

yat: which; tu: but; kama ipsuna: by one who desires to enjoy; karma: work; sa ahankarena: with egotism; va: or; punaḥ: again; kriyate: it is done; bahula ayasam: with huge efforts; tat: that; rajasam: in rajas guna; udahrtam: it is said.

"However, that action that is performed in egotism, or with great efforts, by one who wants to enjoy (the results), is described as influenced by rajas.

We have seen that rajas is characterized by greed or lust rather than "passion" as generally believed. The dictionary definition of "passion" is "emotion as distinguished from reason", and "intense, driving or overmastering feeling", "ardent affection", "a strong liking or desire for, or devotion to some activity, object or concept". Therefore "passion" is a neutral factor that can be directed also towards sattva or even towards the transcendental spiritual level, which contradicts the usage of the definition for the materially attached, greedy and lusty influence of rajas. The misunderstanding is probably due to the application of "passion" to the concept of strong desire, mistakenly interpreted as always based on lust and not on love, as a corollary of the faulty interpretation and application of the definition of "love" that we have already discussed. There is a clear and important difference between love and lust, and if we are not able to understand it, we can never progress in the science of spiritual life and Transcendental Reality.

People tend to confuse the two because of ignorance and degradation, enforced through asuric cultural parameters by social convention and ideological propaganda often taking the garb of religious or moralistic teachings. Nonetheless, each human being has the innate capacity of seeing the difference between the two concepts - lust and love - because of his/ her natural ethical sense or conscience, and also in the light of intelligence and good sense. While lust is focused on selfish enjoyment, attachment and desire to possess and exploit, love is characterized by a spirit of service and self sacrifice, and by the desire to give happiness and pleasure to the object of one's affection. Both sentiments or feelings (bhava) are based on emotion rather than on reason, and both can be rationalized and channeled through intelligence and logic. Both can be overwhelming and both are based on desire, but the effects are diametrically opposite, especially for our personal evolution and for the karmic consequences that will be generated. While love is liberating, lust is cause for bondage; while love brings unconditional happiness, lust brings constant suffering and fear.

Some religionists, influenced by the abrahamic ideology that demonizes nature, the body and sense pleasure, claim that there is no such thing as love in the material world, and that what we call "love" is nothing but lust. This is not a fact. Material love exists and is influenced by sattva, while spiritual love is influenced by visuddha sattva, and lust is influenced by various degrees of rajas and tamas. By denying the existence and value of sattvic material love, these ignorant religionists are repressing the natural healthy tendency for sattvic happiness and pleasure, but such tendency cannot disappear and will rather become distorted as the confused followers are led to believe that they can have some immediate joys and relationships in this world only through rajas and tamas, in a perverted selfish and even violent and degrading way. We have seen this automatic mechanism manifest again and again and destroy the lives of innumerable people: we really need to clarify this misconception to save them from serious trouble.

Actual - sattvic - love (including the material love directed to creatures and not just to the Creator) is naturally supported by dharma (satya, daya, saṅga, tapas) and therefore it sublimates desire and even raises it to the level of divinity (7.11), culminating on the platform of visuddha sattva into the transcendental passion or ecstasy of bhakti rasa and bhakti bhava directed to the Supreme Existence, who is also made of feelings: raso vai saḥ, rasam hy evaṃ lābhanvanti bhavati, "He is sentiment, and by attaining him, one becomes happy", (Tattirya Upanishad, 2.7.1). Desire in itself is not a source of degradation, and it can actually be a powerful force for evolution if it is directed and channeled in the correct way.

However, the kama ("desire") mentioned in this verse (kama ipsuna, 18.24) is not the divine type because it is closely associated with ahankara (sa-ahankarena), that is precisely the egotistic and selfish identification and attachment that characterizes lust. It is desire and emotion channeled towards exploitation and separation, and will inevitably bring sufferings and damage.

The expression bahula ayasa, "with great effort", is directly connected to the concept of sa ahankara, "with selfish egotism". It is important to understand that spiritual engagement (yata, nitya karma) is supposed to be proportionate and suitable to the individual's capabilities, as confirmed in verse 9.1 su sukham kartum ("to be performed happily/ easily"). The concept of sukham ("joy") is not condemned in Bhagavad gita, rather it is encouraged as a natural aspiration of the living being, that we can legitimately enjoy although we should not get too attached to it (2.15, 2.66, 4.40, 5.3, 5.13, 5.21, 6.21, 6.27, 6.28, 6.32, 9.1, 10.4, 16.23). We will see more about the subject of joy or pleasure in verses 18.36 to 18.39.

It is true that in the course of our sattvic and spiritual duties in this life we must invest some effort and tolerate some difficulties and even sufferings, but we are never required to make efforts that are superior to our strengths or to go looking for suffering deliberately, because there is no intrinsic value in suffering. This idea of suffering as a inherent religious merit, called "penance" and characteristic of the abrahamic ideologies, is actually of asuric origin, as we can see clearly stated in verses 16.9, 16.10, 16.18, and especially 17.19. Therefore the proper path is in the middle - far from the callous laziness and neglect created by tamas, and also far from the excessive unnecessary strain and stress caused by the egotic and arrogant attempt to establish one's superiority under the impulse of rajas. We do not need to show off as a big devotee, a staunch renunciate, a strict religionist, or a great personality of some other type, because all this is based on ahankara and bahula ayasa, and will not impress God or persons who have actually realized Transcendence. At most, such megalomaniac display could win the favor of ignorant and gullible fools and procure temporary followers and wealth, but it is certainly not worth it, because we will not be able to keep up with it, and soon our stamina will dwindle or snap and we will either become a cynical fraud (just keeping up a fake front for "public relations") or we will simply give up the facade and return to ordinary materialistic life as many examples have demonstrated already.

It is not difficult to understand: we can make the example of physical exercise. If we want to attain and maintain a certain level of physical fitness, we need to establish a progressive routine that is within our real possibilities, and practice regularly without straining too much. When jogging, we start with a short distance at a comfortable pace, then we increase very gradually day after day, with a careful observation of the effects on our body and mind, and if necessary we skip one or more days to recover our energies. We do not attempt a 40 km running marathon immediately, without proper preparation, just to impress our friends and neighbors, because if we do that we might end up in hospital with permanent damage, that will seriously restrict our activities in the future, and bring the typical sufferings and confusion that are the result of rajasic actions.

Our duties such as the spiritual sadhana and the engagement in professional activities (that can also be considered spiritual service) should be personalized under the direct guidance of an expert teacher, and adjusted according to time, place, circumstances and individual abilities. The impersonalist approach that treats everyone "transcendentally" in an artificial way, without caring to ascertain the actual guna and karma and level of personal evolution of each individual, is certainly not in visuddha sattva but in tamas, as we will see in the next verse.

अनुबन्धं क्षयं हिंसामनपेक्ष्य च पौरुषम् ।

मोहादारभ्यते कर्म यत्तत्तामसमुच्यते ॥ १८-२५ ॥

anubandham kṣayaṁ hiṁsāmanapekṣya ca pauruṣam | mohādārabhyate karma yattattāmasamucyate || 18-25 ||

anubandham: of future bondage/ consequences; kṣayaṁ: destructive; hiṁsa: hateful/ cruel; anapekṣya: careless; ca: and; pauruṣam: not sanctioned by the divine authority; mohat: out of illusion; arabhyate: is started; karma: work/ activity; yat: which; tat: that; tamasam: in tamas guna; ucyate: it is said.

"Those activities that are cause for bondage, that are destructive, hateful, careless, and fabricated without real knowledge, performed out of illusion, are said to be in tamas."

The expression anu bandham here is very interesting. The word anu means "following, regularly, closely, after someone, connected, related, subsequent", and bandham means "bondage". Accordingly, we can apply all these meanings to define the characteristic symptoms of tamasic duty or action. One is "slavery", as the action that is performed because one is forced to do so, by violence, blackmail or because there is simply no alternative. Another obvious meaning is that tamasic activities (or "duties") create negative consequences for oneself and others, as for example the professional occupation of thieves and robbers and cheaters.

Another meaning indicates an activity (or "duty") performed simply out of imitation and conformism, because "this is the tradition" or "it has always been done like this", without really understanding its purpose or significance, and therefore with a very high risk of misconceptions, mistakes and failures. Akin to this interpretation, we can add the scenario of those engaging in professional, social or religious activities because of the gregarious "gang" spirit - something that sheeple normally do when they feel they have found some trendy fashionable group or club that gives them a sense of exclusive belonging and camaraderie.

Another meaning refers to addictive (especially masochistic) or compulsive activities, such as unnecessary and excessive lifelong vows made out of egotism, that may cause unexpected complications and even serious damage in the future, and in the very least will cause guilt, fear, confusion and depression in case one becomes unable to continue the practice because of some unavoidable circumstance. Such pledges are taken without a real evaluation of one's personal strength or purpose of life, and often in a reckless and irresponsible way, but they create bondage and liabilities.

The word kṣaya means "destruction, loss"; in the same etymological derivation, a kṣa-tra is "one who protects from destruction". Any activity (or "duty") influenced by ignorance usually causes damages to oneself and others (16.19, 17.6); within the category of destruction we should also include the loss of faith and trust, the loss of innocence and good sentiments, the loss of karmic credit and merit, and the loss of intelligence, good sense and good will. A tamasic conditioning (also called "brainwashing" or "programming") enforced as "training" by family, school, community or organization will weaken the mind of the individual and destroy his/ her potential and chances for future success, and sometimes even the possibility of a healthy normal life with sane relationships and engagement.

A word of caution also to psychologists and psychiatrists who follow the behavioral approach in pursuance of Pavlov's experiments with dogs: a truly scientific mind will first ascertain the reality of the factors before initiating any experiment or procedure. Their methods might be useful with people who are already deeply in tamas and need to be treated at the bottom level of consciousness like animals, and mechanically conditioned just to behave properly because they are unable to learn in the normal way, but there are also more evolved human beings with a greater potential (even not fully developed yet, as it is the case with children) who could be harmed by the procedures.

The word himsa has been analyzed already in other verses. It means "violence" in the sense of hatred and aggressiveness, cruelty and malice, and desire to hurt and cause suffering. Abrahamic ideologies value corporal punishment and penance, inflicted on oneself and on others, especially after the "ideal example" of Jesus Christ who is shown in an anguished, broken and tortured state of extreme suffering called "passion". This concept develops from the intrinsic hatred towards the body and its natural origin through maternal birth, called "the original sin", from which the believer must be purified through his/ her own suffering or the suffering of a replacement scapegoat. This is crazy tamas in a very destructive form, and cannot possibly lead to liberation or spiritual realization. Ignorance normally brings cruelty and callousness, and when carried to the extreme, even delusional madness with all its attending perversions.

The word anapeksa means "indifferent, with no consideration"; it was used in a positive sense in verse 12.16, applied to indifference towards the circumstances that could distract us from our proper duty. In this verse the definition is used in a negative sense, applied to indifference towards the action itself - when it is performed sloppily, lazily, absentmindedly, by cutting corners and without sincerity, attention or devotion. It also applies to the indifference towards the sufferings and problems that one is causing to others, as well as to indifference towards the principles of ethics or dharma, or decency or goodness.

Another application of the term refers to carelessness in regard to the consequences of the action, its disadvantages and demerits, and its chances of success; this approach may seem similar to the sattvik attitude, but as it is not inspired by selflessness and bravery in the performance of one's duties, it remains on the level of irresponsibility and uselessness.

The word paursam is also very interesting. It refers to the human level, where the material mind can manufacture so many different methods based on assumptions or fantasy, on one's own power and prowess; it is the opposite of a-paurusa, a definition used to indicate Vedic knowledge (apauruseya, "super-human"), that is realized - directly "seen" - by the rishis in its completeness and perfection. In this verse, paursam refers to some activity or duty that has been invented or manufactured artificially, whimsically, without superior reference or scriptural evidence, but to serve some material purposes. This meaning is reinforced by the next term, mohat, "out of illusion", that can indicate a delusional perception of our own prowess and powers, by which we cannot really understand whether we are able to perform the action or not.

The combined meanings give an impression of the blind leading the blind, groping around in the dark and still claiming they know perfectly well where they are going - a situation that can easily be recognized in many aspects of the present society, especially in most of the academic fields of psychology, sociology, politics, and so on. The so-called ascending empirical method for acquiring knowledge is not condemned by Vedic civilization, but it is not given excessive value in itself, also because of the vast amount of information and knowledge already available for study.

We can see for example in mathematics and physics that the process of learning makes good use of the knowledge offered by previous scientists, and we happily take advantages of formulas and theorems and "laws" and other universally recognized and accepted milestones of knowledge in such fields, in spite of the fact that they may not be 100% accurate or they may even be disproved by subsequent discoveries. Still, it would be foolish to think that one had to totally rediscover (rather than verifying) personally each and every single piece of knowledge that is presently available thanks to the work of previous scientists.

The word arabhyate is also interesting; it literally means "it is started" and refers to the fact that the result of the activity is less important than the act of beginning it. While the conclusion of the activity results from a number of factors and is an accumulated effect of previous attempts, actually initiating an action is a big step that already creates a ripple in the world and in our own karmic territory.

मुक्तसङ्गोऽनहंवादी धृत्युत्साहसमन्वितः ।

सिद्धसिद्धयोर्निर्विकारः कर्ता सात्त्विक उच्यते ॥ १८-२६ ॥

muktasāṅgo'nahamvādi dhṛtyutsāhasamanvitaḥ । siddhasiddhyornirvikāraḥ kartā sāttvika ucyate ॥ 18-26 ॥

mukta sangah: free from all association; an aham vadi: without egotism; dhṛiti: with determination; utsaha: enthusiastically; samanvitaḥ: endowed with; siddhi asiddhyoh: in success or failure; nir vikarab: without changing; karta: the doer; sattvika: in sattva guna; ucyate: it is said.

"A person who engages in duty without attachment to association, without egotism, but filled with equal determination and enthusiasm in front of success or failure, is said (to be situated) in sattva guna.

The expression mukta sanga was already mentioned in the chapter on Karma yoga: yajnarthat karmano 'nyatra loko 'yam karma bandhanah, tad artham karma kaunteya mukta sangah samacara, "Actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage and further actions. Therefore, o son of Kunti, you should perform your activities for the purpose of sacrifice, remaining free from material association" (3.9).

The concept was mentioned again in 2.47 (sangam tyaktva), 4.23 (gata sangasya muktasya), 5.10 (sangam tyaktva), 5.11 (sangam tyaktvatma), 11.55 (sanga varjita), 12.18 (sanga vinarjita), 15.5 (jita sanga dosa), 18.6 (sangam tyaktva), 18.9 (sangam tyaktva), 18.23 (sanga rahitam).

The word sanga is a compound of sa+anga, meaning respectively "with" (sa) and "limb" or "member" or "part" (anga). It carries the meanings of "union, contact, confluence, togetherness, concluded, complete, with all its parts, sticking, addiction, attachment, sexual intercourse", but also "war, conflict". A closely related word, sangha, carries the meanings of "association, society, organization, group, crowd, religious order, church, company, assembly, concrete cement".

It is clear that Krishna is warning us against the problem of identification and belonging with some sort of "sanga/ sangha" especially in the matter of actions and duty, and not only because of attachment to the results of our actions. The two things actually go together, because when we choose to maintain a sense of identification and affiliation with a particular group (falling into the illusion of duality of interests) we become attached to the results of our actions as we want to offer such result to the aggrandizement of our particular group, and not to the entirety of society and Consciousness where they should go.

Such a mentality is influenced by rajas (prithak, "separation", 18.21) and tamas (anu, "following", 18.25), not by sattva or suddha sattva, so if someone is trying to peddle such attitude to us as if it was transcendental, we know what to reply. This is particularly serious when someone is trying to enroll or exploit us for the interest of a group (organization, matha etc) by using the good name of God ("become a devotee of God") and then they demand that we uniform our beliefs and practices to the policies of the organization because we are "members" and our allegiance and loyalty goes to the organization first, irrespective of God's actual instructions. Of course we can notice that sanga/ sangha can be under the influence of sattva, rajas or tamas; a sattvik sanga/ sangha will put the emphasis on the "togetherness" as in "team work and cooperation", rather than on the separatedness of sectarianism, so the results will be dramatically different. A strong influence of tamas will not only encourage sectarianism and competition with other groups, but will even cause intolerance, offensive behaviors and physical persecution of other sanghas. The more we rise in sattva, the better everything becomes; the highest level is the transcendental platform, on which we are united (sanga) with the entire Reality (brahman, paramatma, bhagavan), and therefore sanga becomes yoga. For those who are still struggling with the gunas, there are other considerations too. It is said, kerite mantra prayoge va, tretayam tantra sadhane, dvapare vyuha racane, saktib sanghe hi sa kalan, "In Satya yuga power is found in mantras and yoga, in Treta yuga power is found in tantra and sadhana, in Dvapara yuga power is found in strategy and planning, and in Kali yuga it is found in team work".

Even at the lowest level, the strength of sanga can be used beneficially on people who are deeply immersed in tamas like most of those who live in Kali yuga; by carefully and expertly using the power of tamas (anu, or conformism) and rajas (prithak, or sectarianism) under the enlightened guidance of a truly qualified guru, otherwise hopeless individuals can be brought to a basic level of human life and acceptable behavior, engaging them in activities that will ultimately create punya and increase sattva (3.6). But the guru must be truly qualified, because what is medicine for someone will be poison for another, and the impersonalist delusion that everyone (or all the individuals whimsically labeled under the same category, without proper verification) should be treated in the same way will certainly cause many casualties and great damage to the entire society.

For neophytes and weak practitioners in the journey of spiritual progress, even the power of abankara and mamatva can be channeled in a good direction - sattva and suddha sattva - by identifying oneself as a devotee of God (especially one's ista deva), a sadhaka, a karyakarta, etc, and by feeling a sense of belonging and possession (association) in regard to God, guru, shastra, sadhus, and so on. If such association (sanga) is truly qualified and spiritually oriented (in sattva or preferably in suddha sattva), it will help us rather than obstructing us in our progress, through good example, inspiration, encouragement, instruction, and support. If we truly follow these parameters of sattva and suddha sattva, even association with individuals that are less evolved than us (such as our own students or subordinates/ dependents) will be beneficial for us, because it will keep good energy (emotion, or bhava) circulating in our own consciousness, and this will make us more open to the inspiration and direct instruction from Paramatman. Even popular wisdom says that one can still learn a lot by teaching others.

Sattva or goodness influences us to become free from abankara and mamatva, or at least to apply them to the highest and purest level possible, using our position and our resources for selfless service to the Supreme and all beings. When we work in this selfless spirit of service, we find perseverance (dhriti) and enthusiasm (utsaha) in the action itself, because of the satisfaction coming from a work well done and from having found our proper place in the world, filling an adequate job description with our true guna and karma. This dutiful work is done for itself, without the need to show off or to get support from others or to be pushed. The word dhriti means "determination, perseverance, patience", and must be supported by utsaha, "enthusiasm", because good results do not come by themselves and we need to keep pushing and trying and applying effort and intelligent work, and we need also to keep doing it with a smile and a proactive approach. We should see difficulties as opportunities rather than obstacles, so that we learn to utilize anything that life and destiny (dainam) put on our path. Remaining free from abankara and mamatva (an abam vadi) is still possible even if we work with determination, enthusiasm and pride, and we get satisfaction and a good livelihood from our activities. We just have to always remember "I am just doing my job", and "I am happy to be of service".

When we are equally disposed towards success and failure (siddhi asiddhi), it is not because of indifference or stupidity, but because of a proactive and optimistic approach: we are able to see that each step is valuable in itself and even failure can be used for learning and building future success. This applies both to the success or failure we have already experienced, and also to those future outcomes that appear to be likely or inevitable in the course of the proper performance of our duty. Asiddhi means "imperfection" and is a splendid way to consider anything less than perfection, in descending order from 99% to 0%. We assess our position and then work our way upwards, with determination and enthusiasm, catching all good opportunities and shaking off negative feelings, without allowing ourselves to be distracted and misled. Cultivating determination and perseverance means that we must be regular, trying to work out a functional schedule and doing something every day, even if only a little bit, and resuming our efforts with renewed energy if for some reason we were forced to stop.

This is reinforced by the word nirvikara, "without change", indicating that once we have taken a decision with intelligence and wisdom, we should stick to our path without second thoughts and without being discouraged by difficulties or losses, because nothing valuable can be achieved without some measure of self sacrifice. Enthusiasm means that we find pleasure in our work (su sukham, 9.1) and we invest everything we have into it, without reservations, without hesitation, without holding back and without fear. Sattva is the key to long lasting and progressive success.

रागी कर्मफलप्रेप्सुर्लुब्धो हिंसात्मकोऽशुचिः । हर्षशोकान्वितः कर्ता राजसः परिकीर्तितः ॥ १८-२७ ॥

rāgi karmaphalaprepsurlubdho himsātmako'śuciḥ | harṣaśokānvitaḥ kartā rajasah parikirtitaḥ || 18-27 ||

ragi: very attached; karma phala: the results of the work; prepsub: intensely desiring; lubdhab: greedy; himsa atmakah: of a cruel nature; asucib: impure; barsa soka anvitah: characterized by joys and sorrows; karta: the doer; rajasah: in rajas guna; parikirtitah: is declared.

"A person who acts out of attachment for the results of his/ her work, pushed by intense desire and greed, distracted by elation and despondence, without cleanliness or compassion, is described as acting in rajas."

We have seen that a sattvik person remains balanced and steady in front of the various situations, and can keep a cool mind and nerves of steel - s/he is the fearless leader and advisor who can steer ordinary people out of any type of trouble. Because s/he is not greedy, s/he will live happily with whatever joys, wealth and success are available without too much stress, and consequently s/he will enjoy relatively good health and peace of mind.

A rajasic person, on the contrary, will always be in a mental turmoil, tossed here and there by powerful emotions and desires (prepsub), torn between elation and depression (barsa soka), victimized by envy and half blinded by the narrow and short vision typical of selfishness. So s/he will be unable to understand that the artificial means that s/he is using today to support his/ her stressful life and achieve immediate goals will ultimately take their toll on physical and mental health, relationships, and even on the opportunities to enjoy the accumulated wealth, properties, positions etc. A rajasic person (man or woman) is selfish and this does not make him very popular in spite of all efforts to win a good social position, and certainly he will never be able to have a real satisfactory relationship based on love or affection. When he is asking, "what's in for me?" before even bothering to hear other people speak, he is ruthlessly nipping any good sentiment in the bud, and cutting himself out of any real evolutionary progress because his interest remains nailed to grossly material profit in the form of sense gratification, possession and domination.

The word ragi ("attached") indicates lust, that is very different from love, even when it is applied to personal relationships. What to speak of material objects and wealth, a rajasic person remains miserable and suffering because no relationships can really satisfy his hunger. He is eating more and more and more, and then vomiting so that he will be able to eat some more - this applies to relationships as well, as we can see in the cases of people who become addicted to superficial sex, flirting and meaningless social life. A miser (kripa) is greedy and avid (lubdhab) and envious of the property and success of others, but he is never really enjoying his own property and success, because he is always focused on the next goal and above all, he is afraid of losing what he already possesses. So in the end he suffers more than a true pauper, because at least a person who does not own anything has no fear of losing what he does not have. This is connected also to the expression himsa atmaka, that can be interpreted on different levels.

On one level, himsa atmaka means "one whose nature is violent and cruel", but we see that usually violent people are also addicted to harming themselves, in some way or another. In a very direct interpretation, we can see that rajasic people tend to commit suicide more easily, due to the terribly desperate depression they feel when they lose the object of their attachment - wealth, good name, career, family, a romantic or sexual relationship, the success they aspired to or dreamed of. However, this self-inflicted damage could also be brought about through the abuse of drugs, or by mere stress and excessive mental pressure, the thrill of fear, or by some weird death wish as in the case of those nuts who think it is fun to go swimming with the sharks, climb dangerous cliffs, go bungee jumping or paragliding, drive at full speed at night without headlights or on the wrong side of the road, and so on. Such activities are performed without any benefit whatsoever to society or individuals, but simply to get one's adrenaline pumping and feel "high".

Of course the problem is that "getting high" has a descending curve, called "being down"; all forms of intoxication produce side effects called hangover, withdrawal, rejection, de-sensitization or over-sensitization (reverse tolerance), compulsive reactions and dependency. After the pleasurable effect has passed, the addict feels worse than before and in the long run he will need to consume a dangerous quantity of the substance just to feel "normal", and to get the "high" feeling he will usually risk overdosing.

The addict will also have very unpleasant hallucinations, desperate depression, anger and violent fits, anxiety, paranoia, schizophrenic tendencies and many other mental disorders; he will feel pains all over the body, nausea, and a lot of other physical problems mostly due to brain damage and liver damage. This can be observed in different degrees in those who consume addictive substances such as psychotropic or stimulant herbs (from the mild and sometimes beneficial theobromine, caffeine, cannabis, light alcoholic drinks and nicotine, to the stronger and more dangerous datura, psilocibine etc), and even more in an increasingly serious scale with liquors, heroin, morphine and other opium derivatives, cocaine and other traditional drugs normally used for centuries in various cultures, and to more recent synthetic chemical cocktails such as LSD, amphetamines, meth and similar stuff, as well as legal prescription medications, commercial solvents (sniffed by some destitute street children) etc. Interestingly, the same stimulation and similar damage can be caused by some natural substances produced by one's own body - especially the pituitary and other glands - under particular stress or excitement conditions such as danger, fatigue, physical strain etc. These are the neuropeptide endorphins, the hormone adrenaline (also known as epinephrine), and the various dopamine neurotransmitters produced by a particularly rajasic approach to sex, gambling, video gaming, physical exercise, risk/ danger taking, social rewarding, personal attention, psychotropic substance abuse, and even some kind of music.

It is interesting to note that in order to get the dopamine production effect, one does not really need to assume the substance or perform the action - it is sufficient for the mind to anticipate or even remember the consumption or the activity through the internal senses (antah karana). Addictions and drug abuse are typical of people who are strongly influenced by rajas and tamas; the rajasic type uses these substances for stimulation, while the tamasic type uses the same substances to dull down or block unpleasant feelings and emotions or thoughts. In the end, however, both elation and despondency, as well as the obnubilation of all feelings, are cause for suffering and degradation, sooner or later. Of course, there is an even darker category of asuric people who do worse than that, specifically becoming addicted to causing pain and suffering and death to others "just for fun"; the numbers of these unfortunate souls are increasing under the pressure of what goes under the name of "culture" and "entertainment", and the accumulated karmic results will be disastrous.

A person who gives so much importance to sense gratification, acquisition of possession and position, as if they were permanent and could define one's purpose in life through identification and attachment, will certainly be looking at people in an impure way (asuci), always thinking about how to get some profit or benefit from them, and will eagerly associate with bad or dirty company if that seems to offer some opportunity for material benefits - which is often the case. This also applies to the contact with material objects and acquisitions, as a rajasic person will not care if his earning is pure or impure - as the famous Roman emperor said, "pecunia non olet" ("money does not stink").

अयुक्तः प्राकृतः स्तब्धः शठो नैष्कृतिकोऽलसः । विषादी दीर्घसूत्री च कर्ता तामस उच्यते ॥ १८-२८ ॥

ayuktaḥ prākṛtaḥ stabdhaḥ śaṭho naiṣkṛtiko'lasaḥ | viṣādī dīrghasūtrī ca kartā tāmasa ucyate || 18-28 ||

ayuktaḥ: not engaged/ without connection (to yoga or the scriptures); prakṛtaḥ: materialistic; stabdhaḥ: stubborn; śaṭhaḥ: deceitful; naiṣkṛtikab: destructive/ harmful; alasaḥ: lazy; viṣadī: morose; dīrgha sūtrī: procrastinating; ca: and; kartā: the doer; tāmasa: in tamas guna; ucyate: it is said.

"A person acting in tamas guna is not engaged (in useful activities), he is materialistic, stubborn, deceitful, destructive, lazy, morose, and procrastinating.

The word ayukta is the exactly opposite of yukta (2.39, 2.50, 2.51, 2.61, 3.26, 4.18, 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, 5.12, 5.21, 5.23, 6.8, 6.14, 6.17, 6.18, 6.29, 6.47, 7.17, 7.18, 7.22, 7.30, 8.8, 8.10, 8.14, 8.27, 9.14, 9.22, 9.28, 9.34, 10.10, 12.1, 12.2, 17.17), a word that Krishna uses as a synonym of yogi (3.3, 4.25, 5.11, 5.12, 5.24, 6.1, 6.2, 6.8, 6.10, 6.15, 6.19, 6.27, 6.28, 6.31, 6.32, 6.42, 6.45, 6.46, 6.47, 8.14, 8.23, 8.25, 8.27, 8.28, 10.17, 12.14, 15.11). By re-reading these verses we will be able to understand the meaning of this definition more deeply. Yukti, or yoga, includes the meanings of "engagement, connection, service, conscious action, purposeful action, relation" and could be considered the opposite of the separatist mentality that comes from the illusion of duality. Among the various meanings of ayukta we find "unemployed, unsteady, erratic, disconnected, devoid of basis or foundations, without reference to śāstra or method, irresponsible, lazy, incomplete".

This is confirmed by the verses that directly speak about those who are ayukta: nasti buddhir ayuktasya na cāyuktasya bhavana, na cabbhāvayataḥ santir asantasya kutaḥ sukham, "A person who is not connected/ engaged (in yoga) cannot have the proper understanding. A person who is not engaged (in yoga) cannot get any good results, or be able to attain peace. And how can there be happiness without peace?" (2.66), and yuktaḥ karma phalam tyaktva santim apnoti naiṣthikim, ayuktaḥ kama kareṇa phale sakto nibadhyate, "A yogi gives up the attachment to the results of activity and therefore attains permanent peace. One who is not a yogi becomes tied by the results of the action that s/he desired to obtain through work" (5.12).

The word prakṛta is directly derived from the word prakṛti ("nature") as applied to material nature, therefore it indicates a person who sees life as a mere manifestation of material nature, not unlike the animals see it. By itself, this definition is not insulting or negative, but it restricts the intelligence and the activities of the individual to the material level. The word thus contains the meanings of "materialistic, spontaneous, naive, simplistic, sentimentalist, passive, uneducated, illiterate, unrefined". On a deeper level, it can indicate a person who is slave to the nature of the body, i.e. the mind and senses, and focuses his consciousness on their demands only, without caring for the consequences; these two interpretations reflect the qualities of rajas and tamas. On the other hand, the word stabdha is certainly negative. It means "stubborn, rigid, obstinate, arrogant, impudent", and it was used in verse 16.17 to describe the asuric nature. The word śaṭha is even worse, as it means "cunning, deceitful, clever, hiding, cheating, secret, hypocritical".

The word naiṣkṛtika literally means "undoing", and it indicates a destructive behavior, insulting and torturing others, trying to destroy their livelihood and create problems. It also conveys the meanings of "miserly, mean, passive aggressive, blackmailing". The word alasa means "indolent, languid, lazy", while viṣadī means "depressed, morose, negative" - as in Arjuna's feelings in the first chapter of Bhagavad gita. The expression dīrgha sūtrī means "procrastinating, postponing, goofing out, spacing out", as when one takes a month to to one day's work, or "kills time" with some foolish games. We find further elaboration in Bhagavata Purana (1.16.9): mandasya manda prajñasya, vayo mandayusaḥ ca vai, nidraya bṛiyate naktam, diva ca vyartha karmabhiḥ, "Lazy and ignorant/ foolish people, who live only a short life, spend their nights by sleeping and their days by wasting the hours in useless activities".

प्रोच्यमानमशेषेण पृथक्त्वेन धनञ्जय ॥ १८-२९ ॥

buddherbhedam dhṛteścaiva guṇatastrividham śṛṇu | procyamānamāśeṣeṇa prthaktvena dhananjaya || 18-29 ||

buddheḥ: of intelligence; bhedam: the difference; dhṛteḥ: of determination; ca: and; eva: certainly; guṇataḥ: according to the gunas; tri vidham: three types; śṛṇu: listen; pra ucyamanam: as they are described; asesena: in many ways; prithaktvena: differently; dhananjaya: O Dhananjaya.

"O Dhananjaya, there are also three types of intelligence and determination, according to the gunas. Listen, I will describe them.

The word buddhi ("intelligence, understanding") has been used prominently in Bhagavad gita as a major factor in self realization and progress in knowledge and wisdom towards liberation. Krishna already introduced this concept in verse 2.39: esa te 'bbibita sankhye buddhir yoge tv imam srinu, buddhya yukto yaya partha karma bandham prahasyasi, "I have explained Sankhya Yoga - now listen to Buddhi Yoga. O Arjuna, through this application of intelligence and correct understanding you will be released from the bondage of karma". Next he continued to elaborate on Buddhi Yoga from verse 2.49 to 2.53, and speaking about the importance of intelligence and understanding, culminating in 2.63: krodhad bhavati sammohah sammohat smriti vibhramah, smriti bhramasat buddhi naso buddhi nasat pranasyati, "Anger becomes confusion, and confusion becomes failing memory. Because of the loss of memory, intelligence is lost, and when intelligence is lost, one falls to destruction."

Again Krishna will highlight the importance of using one's intelligence, especially in verses 5.20, 6.9, 6.21, 6.43, 8.7, 10.10, 12.8, 12.14, 15.20. It is interesting that buddhi and dhriti ("determination") are mentioned together in this verse, because intelligence without determination will not be sufficient to carry out the actions to their proper completion, and determination without intelligence is mere stubbornness that will cause us to stick to wrong and detrimental choices.

The word bheda means "classification", but also "division, differentiation, separation", and in this sense it can be connected with viveka, the discriminating function of intelligence that makes us understand the difference between sat and asat, between dharma and adharma, between vidya and avidya. So on a primary level, bheda in this verse refers to the distinction between the three different categories of intelligence and determination according to the three gunas, but on a deeper level we see that bheda as viveka also becomes a factor together with buddhi and dhriti, for the preliminary stage of action when one makes the choice of performing it (arambha, 3.4, 4.19, 12.16, 14.12, 14.25, 18.48).

The expression pra ucyanam means "as it is being stated", and refers to the elaboration that Krishna will offer in the next verses and that is presented as particularly accurate by the words asesena ("completely") and prithaktvena ("distinctly"). It is also interesting to note that the primary meaning of asesena is "endlessly", which in this context refers to the innumerable sub-divisions (prithak) of the characteristics of the three gunas when they couple up and weave into each other.

So besides the basic three modes known as sattva, rajas and tamas (that are rarely found in their pure state as they keep interacting with each other), we can have sattva-sattva, sattva-rajas, sattva-tamas, rajas-rajas, rajas-sattva and rajas-tamas, tamas-tamas, tamas-rajas and tamas-sattva. Furthermore, in individual persons (and in material objects and situations) we can also find sattva-rajas-tamas, sattva-tamas-rajas, rajas-sattva-tamas, rajas-tamas-sattva, and so so with many (endless, actually, because they also change with time and action) different combinations, where the definition shows the preeminence of one guna on the others by the relative position in the compound word. Thus, for example, sattva-rajas is a combination in which a person likes to work hard for the good of society, and although he enjoys the dynamism of his engagement and a variety of stimulations for his intelligence, and has a taste for the benefits and pleasures that his work and social position bring, when he has to choose between honesty and success, he will immediately choose honesty and will use his wealth and position selflessly. Conversely, a rajas-sattva person will tend to be more self-righteous and take advantage of his position to get some special attention and honors, although he will externally and superficially remain a very refined gentleman and even a philanthropist. A sattva-rajas-tamas person will be honestly working for the benefit of society, moderately enjoying the benefits and pleasures connected to such work, but he will be jealous of his privacy and attached to family, clan, ethnic group etc; furthermore, if the occasion arises, he may choose to use his position to give special benefits to those he considers "his own people" even if they are not qualified or deserving. A sattva-tamas-rajas person will be a well mannered individual, a good honest worker, but if he has to choose, he will put his own interest before the interest of society, and defend his position fiercely.

Krishna elegantly hints at this mixture of influences inherent in the roles of human society by calling Arjuna with the name of Dhananjaya ("who wins wealth"), referred to the service Arjuna rendered to his brother Yudhisthira especially on the occasion of the Rajasuya yajna, when Arjuna played the role of supreme army commander and followed the roaming horse to the various kingdoms to collect tributes and donations from their rulers as a mark of respect and cooperation to Yudhisthira. This does not mean that Arjuna himself is confused by the influence of the gunas; it means that his role in society is inevitably based on a mixture of characteristics that originate from the gunas, and therefore he has to deal with them: na tad asti prithivya va divi devesu va punah, sattvam prakriti jair muktam yad ebbih syat tribhir gunaib, "There is not even one single person, either in this world or in the world of the Devas, who is free from the influence of the three gunas created by the prakriti" (18.40).

प्रवृत्तिं च निवृत्तिं च कार्याकार्ये भयाभये । बन्धं मोक्षं च या वेत्ति बुद्धिः सा पार्थ सात्त्विकी ॥ १८-३० ॥

pravṛttim ca nivṛttim ca kāryākārye bhayābhaye | bandhaṁ mokṣaṁ ca yā veti buddhiḥ sā pārtha sāttvikī || 18-30 ||

pravṛttim: engagement; ca: and; nivṛttim: renunciation; ca: and; kārya akārye: what should be done and what should not be done; bhaya abhaye: what should be feared and what should not be feared; bandham: bondage; mokṣam: liberation; ca: and; yā: that; veti: who knows; buddhiḥ: intelligence; sā: that; pārtha: o son of Pritha; sāttvikī: in sattva guna.

"O son of Pritha, sattvik intelligence is when one knows what should be accepted and what should be rejected, what actions should be performed and what actions should not be performed, what is to be feared and what is not to be feared, what brings liberation and what brings bondage.

This verse reminds us, for contrast, of verse 16.7: pravṛttim ca nivṛttim ca jana na vidur asurāḥ, na saucam nāpi cacaro na satyam tesu vidyate, "Asuras do not have correct knowledge about engagement and renunciation. They have no purity, or proper behavior, or truthfulness." Thus we understand that asuras are actually stupid (alpa buddhayah, 16.9) and they tend to keep making the wrong choices that will bind them more and more and bring them down to the lowest levels of existence (16.19-20). In this process, paramatman is merely allowing them to act through the volition of consciousness (tan aham kṣipami, mam aprapya): it would be wrong to say that God is responsible for such degradation, or that such hellish existence (naraka, 1.42, 1.44, 16.16, 16.21) experienced by the asuras is a sort of punishment ordered by God as claimed by abrahamic ideologies. It is all a question of what we do with our free will; as a loving parent, God will simply assist and support us in our educational experiences while we try to get happiness even in the wrong way and against the good advice of shastra and sadhu.

Also, neither paradise (svarga) nor hell (naraka) are eternal - no material condition of pleasure or pain is ever eternal, as all joys and sufferings have a beginning and an end, and are caused by the contact of the senses with the sense objects (however subtle and refined): matra sparsas tu kaunteya sitosna sukha dukkha dah, agamapayino 'nityas tams titikṣasva bharata, "O Arjuna, the contact of the senses with the sense objects causes joy and distress just like cold in winter and heat in summer. Such feelings are temporary: they come and go, and you should just try to tolerate them." (2.14). Here we can also connect this concept with the statement about what is to be feared and what is not to be feared (bhaya abhaye): we should only fear to make the wrong choice, that is adharma over dharma, because all our bad actions will bring a proportionate consequence in the future, sooner or later, causing further bondage in the cycle of births and deaths. On the other hand, we should not fear death or loss in themselves, because with the proper consciousness we can utilize them for our progress towards liberation. We should never be afraid of God, either, as God is not our enemy.

God does not care for the merits or demerits of individuals or groups: nadatte kasyacit papam na caiva sukritam vibhuh, ajnanenavritam jnanam tena mulyanti jantavah, "The all powerful Lord does not consider the good or bad merits of anyone. Whatever happens is only done by the living entities themselves, that are confused because their knowledge is covered by ignorance" (5.15). This means that at any time we can choose to change the course of our life and gradually establish ourselves on a better path. God does not care if someone does not give him allegiance or loyalty or obedience: samo 'ham sarva bhutesu na me dvesyo 'sti na priyah, ye bhajanti tu mam bhaktya mayi te tesu ca py aham, "I am equally disposed towards all living beings. I do not hate anyone, and I do not favor anyone. Yet, when someone offers me a sincere service in devotion, I also serve them with love and devotion" (9.29). In this perspective, it makes sense to say that God is good and loving.

The words pravritti ("doing, following, engaging") and nivritti ("renouncing, abandoning") are quite important because they constitute the focus of the balance between the two opposite poles of sat-asat, dharma-adharma, vidya-avidya, and so on. The choice is not between two perspectives or darshanas of Reality, or between one belief or another, but between two courses of action that will automatically and naturally bring opposite consequences as fear or fearlessness (bhaya abhaya), freedom and bondage (moksam bandham), and therefore they should be performed or rejected (karya akarya).

The laws of the universe do not care about what we believe or do not believe: if we throw a rock against the sky, the rock will come back down with a "vengeance" that is totally neutral and hit a believer just like a non-believer.

Other commentators have defined the two as vibhita ("proper, established, arranged, ordained, dutiful, determined, destined, ordered, prescribed by shastra") and pratisiddhe ("improper, omitted, denied, rejected, forbidden by shastra"). However, we should not interpret this scriptural endorsement as some kind of sectarian commandments, because that is not the Vedic mentality. The emphasis on the scriptural support is expressed to counteract the tendency of people to rely on social conformism or laukika sraddha, that is an opinion held by some or many people but not substantiated by any fact or reliable source - in other words, a popular superstition.

यया धर्ममधर्मं च कार्यं चाकार्यमेव च ।

अयथावत्प्रजानाति बुद्धिः सा पार्थ राजसी ॥ १८-३१ ॥

yayā dharmam adharmaṁ ca kāryaṁ cākāryameva ca | ayathāvatprajānāti buddhiḥ sā pārtha rājasī || 18-31 ||

yaya: by which; dharmam adharmaṁ ca: dharma and adharma; kāryam ca akāryam: what should be done and what should not be done; eva: certainly; ca: and; ayatha vat: not clearly; prajānāti: who understands; buddhiḥ: intelligence; sah: that; partha: o son of Pritha; rajasī: in rajas guna.

"O son of Pritha, the type of intelligence that does not understand clearly what is the difference between dharma and adharma, or what should be done and what should not be done, is controlled by rajas.

The primary meaning of this verse is that rajasic people do not care about dharma, but only about their own material advantage, so they choose to label conclusions and behaviors as dharmic or adharmic according to their personal interests and beliefs. Similarly, they legitimize their actions, engagements or rejections, on the degree of material benefit they can obtain through them (kama īpsuna, 18.24) or the attractiveness of the activity itself (akusalam kusale, 10, istam anistam, 12) and personal likes and dislikes (raga, dvesa, lobha, bhaya). In our previous commentary we have mentioned the difference between the shastra buddhi ("understanding through the scriptures") and the laukika sraddha ("popular belief"); the proper understanding of the eternal principles of knowledge as directly seen by the rishis ("realized souls") is illuminated by sattva, while the influence of rajas leads people (loka) to develop particular beliefs (sraddha) according to their selfish interest. Greed does not apply only to sexual lust or acquisition of money and other material possessions - it also includes subtler forms of sense gratification such as fame, name, adoration, social position, recognitions, honors, etc. It also expands in collective selfishness, greed and aggrandizement as we can see in intolerant sectarian movements or ideologies.

This can easily be applied to the distinction between pravritti and nivritti on several levels of meanings, but in any case the central concept here is ayathavat, that means "wrong, not true, not thoroughly understood, incorrect, imperfectly understood". Krishna is giving us the measuring instrument to verify the value of all possible conclusions and behaviors.

One of the important darshanas in Vedic tradition is Nyaya, that literally means "logic". So all conclusions and behaviors should be carefully sieved through the mesh of logical arguments, direct verification and examples from genuine scriptures compiled by genuinely realized persons.

We have seen many times Krishna emphatically and explicitly saying that we should overcome the illusion of duality (dvandva, 2.45, 4.22, 5.3, 5.25, 7.27, 7.28, 15.5) and he has also repeated the same concept of equal attitude to opposite situations in 2.14, 2.15, 2.38, 2.48, 2.50, 2.56, 2.57, 2.64, 3.30, 3.34, 5.19, 5.20, 6.7, 6.8, 6.9, 6.29, 6.31, 6.32, 12.13, 12.15, 12.16, 12.17, 12.18, 12.19, 13.10, 13.28, 13.29, 14.24, 14.25, 18.50, 18.51.

Unfortunately, people who are influenced by rajas and tamas remain unable to understand this point correctly, and imagine that the only way to overcome duality is to deny the value of viveka, discriminating intelligence. This problem is also created by the fundamental dualistic attitude, by which the individual is expected to become officially affiliated to a particular ideology and pay exclusive allegiance to it, in a form of expanded selfishness also influenced by rajas, and therefore gives up the proper use of discriminating intelligence, delegating it to "the leaders" or "the authorities" that are seen as "the guardians of the tradition". We see this problem for example in the dichotomy between the "followers of dvaita schools" and "the followers of advaita", as if dvaita was a totally different reality in opposition of advaita and not just a different perspective of the same Reality. These two groups are often mistakenly presented as pravritti marga and nivritti marga.

In the typically abrahamic approach, the opposite camp is considered not simply mistaken (or "incompletely understood"), but dangerously vicious (i.e. satanic), because allegiance to a particular ideological affiliation is based on the fear of committing the sin of "infidelity" manifested in appreciating the good value of some statement given by the opposite camp. This idea is totally alien to the original Vedic system, where all the various darshanas are respected as different perspectives, as long as they agree on the basic - universal and eternal - principles of dharma (sanatana dharma), that have nothing to do with beliefs or perspectives or the choice of one's ista devata. This is the reason why Hinduism is so broad minded: it is not afraid of "heretics" or "infidels" and listens with an open mind to all good ideas: a no bhadra kritavo yantu visvatah, "may good things come to us from everywhere" (Rig Veda, 1.89.1)

अधर्मं धर्ममिति या मन्यते तमसावृता । सर्वार्थान्विपरीतांश्च बुद्धिः सा पार्थ तामसी ॥ १८-३२ ॥

adharmam dharmamiti yā manyate tamasāvṛtā । sarvārthānviparītāṁśca buddhiḥ sā pārtha tāmasī ॥ 18-32 ॥

adharmam dharmam: adharmam (as) dharmam; iti: thus; yah: which; manyate: one considers; tamasa avrita: covered by ignorance; sarva arthan: in all pursuits/ values; viparitan: in the wrong direction; ca: and; buddhih: intelligence; sab: that; partha: o son of Pritha; tamasi: in tamas guna.

"O son of Pritha, the type of intelligence influenced by tamas believes adharmam to be dharmam, and because it is covered by darkness it always chooses the wrong direction in all pursuits.

While rajasic people opportunistically decide what is dharmam according to their particular selfish material interest, tamasic people consistently mistake adharmam for dharmam, and dharmam for adharmam. They do not say, "I do not know what dharmam is", or "there is no dharmam", but they are actually very strongly opinionated and usually very vocal about what they believe dharmam is - and therefore they cause the greatest damage to individuals and society, because they keep trying to enforce adharmam as dharmam on all others. Just as a passing note, we should remember that the fundamental principles of dharmam are truthfulness, compassion, honesty, self-control, etc; any "religious teaching" that violates such principles is clearly dictated by tamas.

The word avrita means "covered", and refers to the darkness of ignorance and stupidity that is almost palpable, like a thick fog on which the tamasic individual or group will project their own blind beliefs. Another application of the word avrita refers to a stratification of various layers of dirt, wrong concepts, unfounded or misplaced beliefs, incorrect cultural superimpositions, and contrasting random ideas accumulated during one's various experiences. The point is that such concepts remain separated and opposite, without any attempt at reconciling them in a meaningful harmonious picture; they are simply superimposed without proper discrimination even if they show a veritable monster - like a stack of photo slides or transparencies of an object seen from different positions and perspectives. The expression yah manyate ("he thinks") summarizes the entire problem of ordinary unfounded and unverified opinions, either one's own or someone else's, presented as actual facts or truth. Usually such opinions are created from a superficial observation devoid of actual knowledge, as when a simple-minded person sees a machine functioning or a vehicle moving, and thinks that the object is acting independently, without an operator.

The expression sarva arthan literally means "all meanings, all purposes, all values" and applies both to theory and practice. The word viparitam ("wrong direction") is also very interesting; it expresses the idea of "totally opposite, upside down", where perception is exactly the opposite of reality. Now, making some mistakes on the path is not a very serious problem, because we can learn and correct ourselves and become even stronger and wiser than before, but going in the wrong direction is a big problem that should be addressed as quickly as possible, to avoid wasting a lot of time and energies. We should not be afraid of abandoning a wrong path, if after sufficient correct experimentation along a reasonable length of time, we actually see it is leading us in the opposite direction.

The sectarian blind ideological allegiance by which one only accepts good ideas from a particular line is certainly different from the determination of honestly and seriously following a method by applying all the genuine requirements. Once a student has chosen a guru, s/he should stick to the method faithfully and apply it without cutting corners, but questioning should always be encouraged (pariprasnena, 4.34). An intelligent student does not close his/ her eyes "out of loyalty" in front of apparent contradictions or mistakes or inconsistencies in the teachings or behaviors of the guru; a student has not only the right but also the duty to ask relevant questions (respectfully but clearly) to verify whether s/he has misunderstood something. A genuine guru should happily welcome such questioning as a good opportunity to help the student to understand how theory and practice should be applied to the various circumstances of time, place and recipient, and if any mistake had really been made out of distraction or other reasons, the genuine guru will be eager to correct the mistake. Otherwise, the student should understand that the guru is not genuine, and that there is no fault or offense in abandoning a false guru.

The preposterous misconception of blind ideological allegiance, that is nothing else but intolerant sectarianism and blind faith, has been compounded by mainstream academia that was founded and directed for many centuries as a propaganda tool for abrahamic expansion and society control; in the first schools and universities of the present era, all students had to take clerical vows in the Christian church (hence the words "clerk" and "clerical work" applied to scribes) as all others were forbidden to learn to read and write. The church would then pick the most clever and faithful by indoctrinating them and verifying their beliefs through exams before giving them further knowledge with which to control society for the benefit of the church - mostly as priests and other echelons of the church itself, but also as school/ university teachers, intellectuals, writers and translators, medical doctors, lawyers and notaries, magistrates and judges, diplomats and advisors to kings.

It is high time to liberate Hinduism from such disastrous influence and restore it to its pristine and genuine glory; this must be done by separating (viveka) what is actually Vedic knowledge and instructions from what is merely a stratification of dirt - not unlike the process of washing a baby and throwing out the dirty bath water. In this light, the repeated instructions by Krishna about removing oneself from sanga (as a corollary of abankara and mamatva) are particularly valuable (2.47, 4.23, 5.10, 5.11, 11.55, 12.18, 15.5, 18.6, 18.9, 18.23, 18.26). We must liberate ourselves from the fear of not being "loyal enough" to one party or another, one group or another, one school or another, one lineage or another, one organization or another, one tradition or another, because this fear is an obstacle to real progress and evolution. It stops us from recognizing good things as good and bad things as bad, irrespective of who said or did them, and certainly this approach does not lead to liberation.

धृत्वा यया धारयते मनःप्राणेन्द्रियक्रियाः । योगेनाव्यभिचारिण्या धृतिः सा पार्थ सात्त्विकी ॥ १८-३३ ॥

dhṛtvā yayā dhārayate manahprāṇendriyakriyāḥ | yogenāvyabhicārīṇyā dhṛtiḥ sā pārtha sāttvikī || 18-33 ||

dhṛtiya: determination; yaya: by which; dhārayate: that sustains; manah prana indriya kriyah: the activities of the mind, the prana, and the senses; yogena: through the practice of yoga; avyabhicarinya: without interruption; dhṛtiḥ: determination; sā: that; pārtha: o son of Pritha; sāttvikī: in sattva guna.

"O son of Pritha, the sattvik determination is that which sustains the dutiful activities of the mind, the prana and the senses through the practice of yoga without interruption.

We can see from this verse that Krishna applies the definition of yoga to all the dutiful activities that a human being performs with mind, prana and senses. The practice of astanga yoga ("eight-limbed engagement") consists of eight parts: yama, niyama, asana, pranayama, pratyahara, dharana, dhyana and samadhi, and all these can be applied equally to all methods such as hatha, krīya, raja, karma, jnana and bhakti. Actually these are all perspectives of the same approach of "union" with the Supreme, as all definitions of yoga are merely attendant practices to the central and fundamental meaning of yoga. Buddhi or vidya includes jnana, vijnana, sankhya, sanmyasa and moksha, explains the truth about prakṛiti and puruṣa, shows the visva rūpa and warns us about the effects of the gunas and the symptoms of dāvi and asuri natures. It also possesses the attributes of taraka and vibhūti, and leads us to the realization of Purushottama through bhakti in proper dutiful action or karma. It is therefore very important to apply sattvik viveka to our understanding of yoga, otherwise sattvik determination will be applied to rajasic or tamasic understanding, and the results will not be so good. For example, many unqualified teachers of yoga merrily skip over the fundamental requirements of yama and niyama, and carefully avoid to tell their students what dhyana and samadhi are supposed to be, while Patanjali himself starts his Yoga sutras by dedicating the entire first chapter to discussion about samadhi and atman/ brahman realization as the sole purpose of yoga.

There is not one single verse in Patanjali's Yoga sutras that states that the purpose of yoga is to lose weight or relieve stress or treat the various physical diseases through asanas and pranayama, or to see pretty lights and colors in one's mind. Various technical exercises in meditation and purification of nadis and chakras have been added to the tradition of yoga by a number of teachers on the basis of their own experience, but under no circumstances such literature or teachings can be considered on a par with the original shastra of yoga, and certainly they should not be presented under the label of "the best/ true yoga" as methods to achieve mere physical fitness or relieve stress so that one can carry on with a materialistic life where no yama or niyama are applied.

Reference to sufferings is there (Yoga sutras, 2.11-2.16) but simply to state that it must be addressed in the mind only, by detaching oneself from it. Bhagavad gita is more specific about practically addressing physical problems, but it only recommends attention and moderation in working, eating and sleeping: yuktahara viharasya yukta cestasva karmasu, yukta svapnavabodhasya yogo bhavati duḥkha ha, "For one who consciously controls his food intake, who is controlled in moving around, makes controlled efforts in performing one's duties, and is regulated in sleeping and keeping vigil, yoga becomes the destroyer of sufferings" (6.17).

Rather, the fundamental definition of yoga is to control and eliminate the modifications of consciousness (yogas citta vritti nirodhab, Yoga sutras, 1.2) in order to focus it on the pure atman/ brahman (tada drastuh sva rupo avasthanam, Yoga sutras, 1.3) by dropping all other identifications (vritti sarupyam iti ratra, Yoga sutras, 1.4) and overcoming mistaken perceptions (vrittayah pancatayah klistah - pramana, viparyaya, vikalpa, nidra, smritayah, Yoga sutras, 1.5, 1.6) including all the fantasies and projections of the mind based on false knowledge (viparyayo mithya jnana a tad rupa pratistham, Yoga sutras, 1.8). All imaginative visualizations are therefore excluded very explicitly by Patanjali: sabda jnana anupati vastu sunyo vikalpah, "Descriptions or knowledge of things that are devoid of actual reality are called fantasies (and as such, they should be abandoned)" (Yoga sutras, 1.9).

The only two genuine methods to achieve the purpose of yoga are emotional detachment and constant practice of meditation on the atman (abhyasa vairagyabhyam tan nirodhab, Yoga sutras, 1.12) together with the direct meditation on Isvara (tat param purusa khyater guna vaitrisnyam, Yoga sutras, 1.16) or simply devotion to Isvara (isvara pranidhanad va, Yoga sutras, 1.23). One should be very wary of any yoga teacher who is trying to make things more complicated than this, especially in Kali yuga when human beings need to simplify processes and make them more practical and useful for the limited possibilities of the people of this era.

The word dharayate in this verse obviously refers to dharana ("to hold"), that is the constant practice of focusing the consciousness on the desired object of meditation. Some preliminary exercises for neophytes include contemplation of a lamp light or a mandala or yantra, but in any case one should avoid using imagined forms such as random geometrical shapes, ordinary material objects or similar distracting forms, either gross or subtle. This dharana can be performed successfully only if the previous limbs of astanga yoga have been fully mastered, from yama and niyama (abstentions and practices) to pratyahara (withdrawing the senses from sense objects). We will briefly summarize them here: yama consists of ahimsa (non violence, including strict vegetarianism), satya (truthfulness and honesty), asteya (abstention from misappropriation and excessive consumption of resources), brahma acharya (behaving like brahman), aparigraha (not accepting gifts or payments), while niyama consists of saucha (cleanliness and purity, including ritual purification and samskaras), santosha (renouncing the search for sense gratification and possessions), tapas (tolerating difficulties in the performance of one's duties) and svadhyaya (study of the scriptures about atma vidya and brahma vidya). Without being firmly established in these practices, the "mastery of asanas and pranayama" has no meaning, because it will only apply to the body and will have no effect on the mind, and in some cases it can even have adverse effects, such increase of blood pressure, physical pain etc, apart from the lamentable increase in egotism (ahankara) and arrogance (abhimana).

Many people misinterpret the purpose of asana and pranayama (and the various kriyas) as some sort of entertainment exercise or party trick, in which we show people our stomach dancing in its cavity or we produce thin cotton cloth streaming into our mouth and out from our nose, or we exhibit our body twisted up into a pretzel, or precariously balanced in awkward and exotically strange positions. But the meaning of the word asana is "sitting place", and the purpose of the asana is to sit in meditation; the variety of the positions and movements has the only purpose to train the body to remain still and quiet, so that it will not disturb or distract one from meditation - the focusing of consciousness on the atman/ brahman. This is confirmed by other commentators to this verse with the expression nirbheda brahma anusandhana, "becoming united with brahman without any difference/ disruption". The sensationalist physical demonstrations offered by some yogis are merely meant to impress and attract the simple minded and foolish people, and to inspire a measure of awe and reverence for the ability to do extraordinary things; a serious student of yoga is not distracted by these gimmicks.

Similarly, the word pranayama means "control of the prana", and it is done through the control of breathing - it is not the mere control of breathing itself. Just like the balanced stillness of the body is conducive to the steadiness in focusing the mind, prana circulation and breathing must be reduced and ultimately stopped in order to facilitate the cessation of all the modifications of the mind (yogas citta vritti nirodhab, Yoga sutras, 1.2). Exactly the same must be done with the senses through pratyahara (literally "directing the consumption by removing"), which includes not only the practice of restricting the amount of food consumed by the mouth and stomach, but also all the other "food for senses" that is hearing, seeing, touching, smelling and remembering and desiring (through one's antah karana or internal senses).

This does not mean total abstention but rather control and detachment (5.8, 5.9) and is confirmed by verses 6.16 and 6.17 and especially by this verse with the expression manah prana indriya kriyah, "the activity of mind, prana and senses". This control should be constant, unbroken, stable, free from deviations as expressed by the word anyabhicari, meaning "firmness, no change, no adulteration". In the approach called isvara pranidhana by Patanjali, this anyabhicarini bhakti means samadhi as suddha bhakti, or devotion that is not touched by any other consideration except love and service for the Supreme.

यया तु धर्मकामार्थान्धृत्या धारयतेऽर्जुन । प्रसङ्गेन फलाकाङ्क्षी धृतिः सा पार्थ राजसी ॥ १८-३४ ॥

yayā tu dharmakāmārthāndhṛtyā dhārayate'ṛjuna | prasaṅgena phalākāṅkṣī dhṛtiḥ sā pārtha rājasī || 18-34 ||

yaya: by which; tu: but; dharmakama arthan: dharm, kama and artha; dhritya: the determination; dharayate: that sustains; arjuna: o Arjuna; pra sangena: because of attachment; phala akankshi: one who desires the results (of the actions); dhrutih: determination; sah: that; partha: o son of Pritha; rajasi: in rajas guna.

"O son of Pritha, that determination that sustains dharm, kama and artha because of the desire for their benefits is (produced) by rajas guna.

It surely takes a lot of determination to engage sincerely and regularly in the hard work required to achieve success in dharm, artha and kama. Vedic civilization does not condemn such pursuits but rather describes them as purusha arthas, "purposes of life", as the purusha is the living consciousness that inhabits the body. For such work to be really successful in this life and in the next, one has to start with dharma, otherwise the results will be ultimately disastrous, even though superficially it may seem that benefits are reaped more quickly and easily without concerns for dharma (18.31).

In transcendental suddha sattva, every action is a sacred offering in the union with the Supreme: yat karoṣi yad asnāsi yaj jūbosi dadāsi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kuruṣva mad arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me" (9.27). On the material platform, the difference between sattva (14.6, 14.16, 17.11, 17.17, 17.20, 18.9-10, 18.20, 18.23, 18.26, 18.30) and rajas (14.7, 14.17, 17.12, 17.18, 17.21, 18.21, 18.24, 18.27, 18.31) is that in sattva one works selflessly for the benefit of all beings, in full knowledge and consciousness, without being distracted by joys or sorrows, while in rajas one works to acquire wealth, sense gratification, position, power, for oneself or one's own group, and remains attached and identified with the results of actions. Religious activities performed under the influence of rajas also remain material and create bondage.

The expression pra sangena again highlights the sanga ("contact, association, affiliation, belonging") as the main factor of the action prompted by rajas. It is the selfish separation of interests (prīthaktvena, 18.21) by which one separates himself and his group from the rest of the universe, and therefore from the body of the Virata rupa and the supreme absolute consciousness of the Brahman.

It is interesting to note that in this verse Krishna lists first dharma and then immediately kama before artha; this indicates that under the influence of rajas the acquisition of valuable pursuits is merely directed to personal sense gratification and desires. In sattva, the acquisition of valuable things is directed to the benefit of the entire society and community of beings, and therefore kama is created and obtained automatically for all, without any separate effort, as it actually should be. This is the key to genuine success: karmanah sukritasya bhūṣṭvāṁ sattvikam nirmalam phalam, rajasas tu phalam duḥkham ajñanam tamasaḥ phalam, "They say that sattva gives immaculate results as properly performed duties, while rajas produces distress, and tamas produces ignorance" (14.16).

यया स्वप्नं भयं शोकं विषादं मदमेव च ।

yaṣā svapnaṁ bhayaṁ śokaṁ viṣādaṁ madameva ca । na vimuñcati durmedhā dhṛtiḥ sā pārtha tāmasī ॥ 18-35 ॥

yaya: by which; svapnam: dreaming; bhayaṁ: fear; sokaṁ: complaining; viṣadam: negativity; madam: delusion/ madness; eva: certainly; ca: and; na: not; vimuñcati: one gives up; durmedha: stupid; dhṛtiḥ: determination; sa: that; pārtha: o son of Pritha; tamasī: in tamas guna.

"O son of Pritha, the determination that is in tamas guna is characterized by stupidity and cannot go beyond dreaming, fearfulness, lamentation, moroseness and illusion.

This is certainly the type of determination that we can observe most commonly among the people of our times. Even people who consider themselves as staunch dharmic activists will rarely go beyond mere lip service or idle theorizing and protesting.

When some actual practical proposal is offered, they shy away and disappear. In Kali yuga people are immersed in tamas and therefore rather stupid (manda sumanda matayo manda bhagyā hy upadrutāḥ, "lazy, foolish, ill-favored by fortune and above all, misguided" (Bhagavata Purana 1.1.10), and mandasya manda prajñasya vayo mandayusaḥ ca vai, nidraya bṛiyate naktam diva ca vyartha karmābhīḥ, "These lazy, foolish and ignorant people are weakened by bad health; they spend their nights sleeping and their day engaging in pointless activities" (Bhagavata Purana 1.16.9).

Rakṣhasas and human asuras are very eager to take advantage of the situation, because stupid people can be controlled more easily, like sheep that passively remain in queue at the slaughterhouse munching on some fodder although they can see their companions dragged away and killed. This is because they are offered svapna or dreams and fables (such as the description of the pleasures of paradise, surrogate happiness through consumers' goods and services, fictional heroes and adventures in movies, etc) and bhaya or fear (the imaginary torture of hell and the very real torture and persecution in this very lifetime), soka by creating one crisis after another to distract people and make their lives more miserable (so that they do not have time or energy for anything more than mere survival) and by offering scapegoats to blame and hate (so that they do not try to find out the real cause for their unhappiness) by and mada, encouraging intoxication and addictions through a subtly manipulative balance of prohibition, shame and guilt. As Orwell put it: convincing people that ignorance is strength, freedom is slavery, war is peace, oppression is love, victims are the offenders, and truth is whatever you are told to believe from time to time.

Tamasic ideologies have always treated the mass of people like sheep (hence the neologism "sheeple"), even shamelessly calling their own leaders as "shepherds", and time and again they have sacrificed many innocent creatures (human and non-human) in their blood holocausts for the sadistic pleasure of the evil beings they worship. The main instrument they have used in these last 3000 years to keep the people in tamas is the imposition of collective stupidity and ignorance, especially through the physical destruction of books, libraries, teachers, schools, universities, and the prohibition to cultivate any knowledge that is not strictly under their control; this principle has been applied more or less thoroughly in different periods and regions proportionately to the social, financial and military power acquired by such ideologies. In their scriptures we find many openly anti-intellectual statements condemning not only wisdom, intelligence and knowledge but even the direct experience of "one's ears and eyes" that dare to oppose the complete and blind obedience to the official ideology.

In Europe, even the teaching of basic reading and writing was prohibited for many centuries, from the 300s to the 1600s, reserving this privilege to priests and monks, who were the only people allowed to keep libraries. Ordinary people (laymen, or "non-clerics") were forbidden to read even the Bible independently; translations in vulgar (popular) languages were strictly prohibited and translators were burnt at the stake for their disobedience to the law. Intellectuals and even kings tried to oppose this tyranny, but only in the 1400s with the Italian and French Renaissance the situation started to improve thanks to the patronage of wealthy aristocrats, who through corruption were able to put some of their own people on the papal throne.

However, the recovery has been very gradual, long and difficult and still today it is incomplete, as the abrahamic ideology has been inculcated so deeply in the collective subconscious, that even those who try to remove its influence from culture and society continue to subconsciously carry its fundamental concepts as if they were objective truths, or the only possible truths. For example, we see many atheists (by definition "people who do not believe in the existence of God") that merrily engage in insulting God (a God they externally claim does not exist) and surmise a priori that all religions are contrary to the natural ethics and conscience, and have the purpose of dumbing, brainwashing, oppressing, enslaving and exploiting people in this life with a false promise of future happiness in paradise. At present, it is very clear that only a solid, deep, vast, consistent, practical, scientific and ethical ideological system such as the original Vedic civilization and knowledge has the intrinsic power to solve the problem and save human society from complete disaster.

All tamasic ideologies stupidly try to solve problems by applying the same faulty mechanics that created the problems in the first place (18.32). For example: to cope with the problem of unwanted teen pregnancies and sexual abuse of children, schools introduce compulsory sexual education - but instead of trying to prevent the exploitation of children by warning them about the dangers, the program rather actively engages pre-teens in learning how to have sex in all possible ways. This, coupled with the obsession about sexual prowess and attractiveness ("sexiness") as general status symbols advertised by media and society, creates a pressure on children to demonstrate that they are "cool" by having more sex even if their hormonal development has not created any sexual desire yet.

Similarly, to address the problem of widespread criminality, the government privatizes the prison system with contracts with commercial companies that demand a guarantee of 90 to 100% "occupancies" in their establishments, so that police and magistrates are pressurized into convicting larger numbers of people, including children, even for very mild misconduct cases. In these jails, convicts are exposed to a very harsh life and association in which they learn to become actual criminals, and subsequently after their release they are rejected by the job market because of their criminal records - and have no other option but applying their newly mastered skills to make a living. The "war against drugs" is conducted by deliberately pumping people from early childhood with all sorts of toxic substances - from fluoride in the water and toothpaste to chemical additives in fast food, to heavy metals in vaccines and strong medications (such as Ritalin) for the so-called attention deficit disorder - and giving a high position as valuable commercial and cultural goods/ services to addictive substances and behaviors such as alcoholic beverages, caffeine, nicotine, engagement in gambling, obsessive sex, video gaming, and so on.

This is reinforced by the application of emotional manipulation techniques and by proposing unrealistic standards of social acceptability and life objectives. Wasting resources, "killing time" and avoiding any real useful work are considered symptoms of high-class position in society, and nothing seems too stupid when it comes to spending money and "having fun".

The dumbing down trend of TV programs, music lyrics and styles, literature, media news, comedy, popular jokes, feature films and general entertainment is considered normal. From early childhood, people are made to believe that it is "cool" to dedicate time and attention to watching professional sports games and soap operas and serials, following the gossip and private lives of celebrities, or getting obsessed with cars and motorcycles, physical fitness, fancy diets, fashion and trends, commercialization of relationships (especially through "celebration of special days" by purchasing and gifting consumer's goods), commercialization of personal value (through status symbols such as career position, academic titles, attractiveness of one's wife, personal physical fitness and attractiveness, down to the model of one's car and the cost of one's shoes and clothing), so-called reality shows, game shows, street magicians shows, systematic media disinformation, and a superficial use of social media and electronic gadgetry. However, the disastrous performance of students in schools and adult illiteracy are blamed on the introduction of the teaching of Darwin's theory of evolution, that is contrary to the tenets of abrahamic ideologies and therefore "immoral".

To cater for the basest taste of the public and the adrenaline junks, cinema producers favor the glorification of actual criminality, especially by creating terrifying cult characters and multiple sequels about psychologically diseased individuals who horribly torture and slaughter innocent people, more graphically disturbing with every new movie, so that they consider a symptom of success if the spectators end up feeling sick to their stomachs. But if anyone is putting up some kind of protest, they are not objecting to Jason or Freddy - they are objecting to Harry Potter.

Other typical tamasic approaches are the "one way only" method (18.22) with an hypertrophy of legislation and law enforcement and bureaucracy, by which everything that is not compulsory becomes forbidden and illegal, also creating an overgrowth of unproductive and pointless professional positions dedicated to complicating simple things and harassing good people. To give themselves some importance and confuse the gullible, these useless administrators often come up with preposterous and whimsically invented methods (18.25) in the hope they will somehow work, and applying more of the same if it becomes clear that they are not working. And over and above all, there is the general blame game in which everyone is whining, cursing and complaining about others without really knowing who or what is actually responsible for a particular problem - and without ever engaging in practical proactive work.

The dreaming (svapna) mentioned in this verse is not simply the excessive importance given to ordinary sleeping dreams and daydreaming (that in moderate amounts are generally good for one's health), but it can also be applied to fake "meditation" practices invented by people who are not qualified by proper knowledge and realization.

The overpowering presence of svapna in tamasic societies is also observed in the hypertrophy and excessive importance given to commercial advertisement, fictional stories with no practically useful contents, all forms of virtual reality, cosplay, internet gaming, internet avatars, computer generated special effects, and so on, while mada indicates not only the intoxication of wine and liquor, but also all kinds of addictions and delusions, including plain madness.

सुखं त्विदानीं त्रिविधं शृणु मे भरतर्षभ ।

अभ्यासाद्रमते यत्र दुःखान्तं च निगच्छति ॥ १८-३६ ॥

sukham tvidānīm trividham śṛṇu me bharatarṣabha | abhyāsādramate yatra duḥkhāntam ca nigacchati || 18-36 ||

sukham: happiness; tu: but; idanim: now; tri vidham: three types of; srnu me: listen to me; bharata rshabha: o best among the descendants of Bharata; abhyasat: by practice; ramate: one enjoys; yatra: where; dubkha antam: the end of sufferings; ca: and; nigacchati: one attains.

"O best among the descendants of Bharata, there are three different types of happiness. Now hear from me how by practice one can obtain pleasure and put an end to sufferings.

Everyone seeks happiness: this is the nature of the soul, that is also called anandamaya, "made of happiness". Although the atman is pure sat, cit, ananda, the conditioned jivatman keeps running around in the attempt of finding pleasure in the external world. However, in this verse Krishna does not use the word ananda, but the word sukha, that is usually accompanied by its polar opposite dubkha, "suffering". Therefore we are dealing here with that type of happiness that one obtains through action in the world of the gunas. The expression abhyasat means "constantly, acquired by practice", and indicates that the pursuit of all types of happiness is not an instant fix but requires a certain amount of effort and work.

What is this material happiness? The acquisition of pleasure and the cessation of suffering. At the most basic level, happiness is just the absence of suffering, especially physical pain, that can be really overpowering and erase everything else from one's consciousness. However, even physical suffering can be experienced in a different way according to our individual level of evolution and training; the human body has the power to deliberately cut off the painful feelings in order to continue to work for a higher purpose, and conversely one's mental attitude towards pain can also make it much more unbearable through emotional reinforcement and identification.

In this last section of Bhagavad gita, Krishna is still talking about the all-encompassing power of the gunas in this world, because as long as we have a body and a mind, we need to deal with them and use them properly. This is a very important field of knowledge: ya evam veti purusam prakrtim ca gunaih saba, sarvatha vartamano 'pi na sa bhuyo 'bhijayate, "One who knows the purusha and the prakriti, as well as the various ways of the gunas, will not take another birth, irrespective of his/ her situation" (13.24). After explaining the three types of happiness, Krishna will comment: na tad asti prithinyam va divi devesu va punah, sattvam prakriti jair mukta yad ebhiv syat tribhir gunaih, "There is not even one single person, either in this world or in the world of the Devas, who is free from the influence of the three gunas created by the prakriti" (18.40).

We can also remember a very similar statement in chapter 7: daivi hy esa guna mayi mama maya duratyaya, mam eva ye prapadyante mayam etam taranti te, "This divine energy of mine manifesting as the three gunas is very difficult to overcome, but those who take shelter in me can cross over this illusion" (7.14). Here is the redeeming path: while we continue to negotiate the gunas in this world, in our bodies and minds, we must keep our consciousness, desires, identifications and attachments on the transcendental level, that is the supreme Reality of atman/ brahman: ye caiva sattvika bhava rajasas tamasas ca ye, matta eveti tan viddhi na tv aham tesu te mayi, "You should know that certainly all those forms of existence created by sattva, rajas and even tamas come from me alone, but I am not in them: rather, they are in me" (7.12). Verse 7.12 was accompanied by another wonderful statement, that shows us the proper way to tread: balam balavatam cabam kama raga vivarjitam, dharmaviruddho bhutesu kamo 'smi bharatarsabha, "O Arjuna, I am the strength of the strong who is free from selfishness and attachment. In all beings, I am the desire that is not contrary to dharma" (7.11).

This divine dharmic desire is the pursuit of happiness in the true and correct direction, and is based on love rather than selfish lust; the highest object of love is certainly the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and we can start developing this love first of all by hearing or reading about his activities for the support of dharma.

This was already clearly stated in chapter 4: yada yada hi dharmasya glanir bhavati bharata, abhyutthanam adharmaasya tad atmanam srijamy aham, paritranyaya sadhunam vinasaya ca duskritam, dharma samsthapanarthaya sambhavami yuge yuge, janma karma ca me divyam evam yo veti tattvatah, tyaktva deham punar janma naiti mam eti so 'rjuna, "O Arjuna, whenever dharma declines and adharma rises, at that time I manifest myself. I personally descend yuga after yuga to protect the good people, destroy the evil doers and re-establish dharma. One who truly knows the divine nature of my births and activities does not have to take another birth after leaving this body, but comes to me." (4.7, 4.8, 4.9). This is the truest method to attain happiness and the cessation of sufferings: mam upetya punar janma dubkhalayam asasvatam, napnuvanti mahatmanah samsiddhim paramam gatah, "Having attained me, they do not have to take another birth in this world, that is the cause of sufferings and impermanence. Such great souls have already reached the highest level of perfection" (8.15).

यत्तदग्रे विषमिव परिणामेऽमृतोपमम् ।

तत्सुखं सात्त्विकं प्रोक्तमात्मबुद्धिप्रसादजम् ॥ १८-३७ ॥

yattadagre viṣamiva pariṇāme'ṁṛtopamam | tatsukham sāttvikam proktamātmabuddhiprasādam || 18-37 ||

yat: which; tat: that; agre: in the beginning; visam iva: like poison; pariname: at the end; amrita: nectar; upamam: similar to; tat: that; sukham: happiness; sattvikam: in sattva guna; proktam: it is described; atma buddhi: the understanding of the self; prasada jam: derived from the satisfaction.

"That happiness that seems like poison in the beginning but is nectar at the end is described as sattvik in nature and is born from the understanding of the self and the satisfaction of the mind.

The most direct meaning of this verse refers to sadhana, the deliberate engagement of body, mind and senses in the practice of spiritual consciousness and action, dropping all other concerns at least for the time regularly scheduled for meditation: sankalpa prabhavan kamams tyaktva sarvan asesatah, manasa ivendriya gramam viniyamya samantatah, yato yato niscalati manas cancelam asthiram, tatas tato niyamya itad atmany eva vasam nayet, "Completely abandoning all the desires and plans arisen from the mental processes, one should control the mind and all the senses by regulating them from every side. The mind is unsteady and impatient to wander around. Every time and wherever it runs off, one should bring it back under control and regulate it so that it remains controlled in the atman." (6.24, 6.26).

This is also exactly how Patanjali defines yoga: yogas citta vritti nirodbah, (Yoga sutras, 1.2) tada drastuh sva rupe avasthanam, in order to focus it on the pure atman/ brahman (Yoga sutras, 1.3) vritti sarupyam iti ratra, by dropping all other identifications (Yoga sutras, 1.4) and overcoming mistaken perceptions i.e. vrittayah pancatayah klista aklistah - pramana, viparyaya, vikalpa, nidra, smritayah (Yoga sutras, 1.5, 1.6).

It is important to understand that one does not need to abandon the dutiful activities, which include some amount of planning and desiring in order to become successful - just like Arjuna needed to focus on strategy while engaging in the battle at Kurukshetra. Many times Krishna has explained that one should renounce not the action itself, but the selfish attachment to the results of the actions (2.47, 2.64, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.25, 3.26, 3.28, 3.30, 3.31, 3.33, 4.14, 4.15, 4.20, 4.21, 4.23, 4.24, 4.37, 4.41, 5.2, 5.10, 5.12, 5.13, 5.14, 6.1, 7.29, 7.30, 9.28, 12.11, 12.12, 12.14, 13.21, 18.2, 18.6, 18.7, 18.8, 18.9, 18.17, 18.23, 18.30).

Thus we understand that the practice of sadhana consists in learning how to control the mind and focus it (dharana, dhyana, samadhi) on the precise subject we want to examine, without allowing it to run off in other directions: vyavasayatmika buddhir ekeha kuru nandana, babu sakha hy anantas ca buddhayo vyavasayinam, "O Arjuna, the intelligence that is constantly focused is the only true one in this world. Those who do not concentrate disperse their intelligence in innumerable minor ramifications" (2.41).

When we have a strong and sincere consciousness of dutiful activities performed as a service to the Supreme, every small action becomes transcendental and worthy of our full concentration: yat karosi yad asnasi yaj juhosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kuruva mad arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me" (9.27). And again: gata sangasya muktasya jnanavasthita cetasa, yajnayacaratah karma samagram praviliyate, "One who has finished with all associations and whose consciousness is firmly established in knowledge, worships Yajna (Vishnu) as all his actions become devotional service. The entirety of his karma is thus destroyed." (4.23)

To practice yoga one does not need to remove himself from family and society and abandon his duties. In the beginning, one must make some extra effort to find a place and time alone (6.10, 13.11) to learn to concentrate without distractions, but the purpose is to attain the direct realization: naiva kincit karomiti yukto manyeta tattva vit, pasyan srinvan sprisan jighrann asnan gacchan svapan svasan, pralapan visrijan grihnann unmisan nimisan api, indriyanindriyarthesu vartanta iti dharayan, "One who is a yogi thinks, 'I am not the doer of anything'. One who knows the truth engages in the activities of seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, going, dreaming, breathing, talking, leaving, accepting, opening and closing one's eyes, but s/he sees that the senses should naturally be engaged in the sense objects and s/he does not identify with them." (5.8, 5.9).

This is the way to engage the gunas in the gunas: tattva vit tu maha baho guna karma vibhagayoh, guna gunesu vartanta iti matva na sajjate, "O Arjuna, one who knows things as they really are is able to understand the various qualities and activities, and therefore he engages the gunas in the interaction with the appropriate gunas: this awareness keeps him free from attachment" (3.28).

The word prasada found at the end of this verse (prasada ja) was already explained at the beginning of Krishna's instructions: raga dvesa vimuktais tu visayan indriyais caran, atma vasyair vidheyatma prasadam, prasade sarva dukkhanam hanir asyopajayate, prasanna cetaso hy asu buddhibh paryavatisthate adhigacchati, "A person who has become free from the attraction and repulsion for the objects of the senses, maintains the control of himself in his actions and regulates himself (in body, mind and senses) obtains satisfaction. This prasadam (blessing) brings about the destruction of all sufferings, gives peacefulness to the mind, and quickly establishes the proper understanding." (2.64, 2.65).

visaya: the objects of the senses; indriya: (and) the senses; samyogat: from the union; yat: which; tat: that; agre: in the beginning; amrita upamam: comparable to nectar; pariname: at the end; visam iva: like poison; tat: that; sukham: happiness; rajasam: in rajas guna; smrtam: it is remembered.

"That happiness that comes from the contact of the senses with the sense objects is like nectar in the beginning and like poison in the end, and is described as due to rajas guna.

Learning how to be satisfied with what comes naturally and to peacefully enjoy the healthy dharmic pleasures can be difficult in the beginning because it takes some training. A small child tends to be selfish because his survival requires constant cares and attention from adults; he feels pleasure and laughs when his needs are met, and feels pain and cries when his needs are not attended to.

In such a helpless situation there is not sufficient space for other considerations in his consciousness, except for the constant feeling of insecurity and fear. According to the Vedic system of civilization, a child is pampered until 2 or 3 years of age, when s/he becomes able to understand the connection between actions and their consequences. At that point his/ her family members generally start to educate the child by precept and not only by example as they had already been doing from before his/ her birth. Still, the child is usually not punished for his/ her mistakes and his/ her security or self image is never threatened. After the completion of 5 years from birth, children were sent to live in the home of the guru for their education; the guru and his wife became their foster parents and the other students became their siblings for a variable number of years according to their individual possibilities.

Because of the new environment and the many interesting opportunities for engagement, children could easily forget any previous bad habits and the excessive familiarity they had developed with their lenient family members. Still, in the house of the guru the student was treated with much affection and care, and never mistreated or punished severely; discipline never used any corporal punishments or other methods that could harm the healthy self-respect of the child. Particular emphasis was given to developing the actual potential of the child with positive reinforcements and recognitions, and especially with peer pressure and healthy competition among students, who were encouraged to associate closely in small groups based on age and talents or inclinations.

Apart from the academic learning, students were gradually trained in engaging in tedious menial services such as house chores, and to observe strict discipline in regards to meals and leisure occupations. For example, they were taught they could take food only by sitting together and after taking permission from the guru, and consume only the foods permitted by the guru. All the students proudly wore the same austere clothes and attire of the brahmachari, and roamed around in groups to collect forest products (wood, fruits, herbs etc) and alms from the village people (grains, etc) to present to the guru for communal use in the ashrama; in this way through peer pressure they learned how to behave responsibly, properly, politely and selflessly in all circumstances.

For those who did not have the good fortune of being educated in a genuine gurukula (which today means practically the entirety of the global population, except a very small number of people), this training in sense control will have to be self-taught at a later age. Still the principle is the same, and we can find the proper instructions in Bhagavad gita. This verse warns us about attachment to sense gratification, that is pleasurable in the beginning but ends in frustration. The word samyoga means "engagement, service, meditation, contemplation" and indicates the deliberate choice of focusing one's attention on sense gratification rather than on one's duty and on the consciousness of one's true identity (which is the meaning of brahma achara). This is quite different from the healthy and appreciative enjoyment of the good things that naturally come to us in the correct performance of our duties.

We can make a very good example with couple relationships: marriage should be based on love and duty, and not on sense gratification and lust, otherwise after a short infatuation period there will be nothing left when physical attraction dwindles. Then the troubles start, because pregnancy is the natural consequence of sexual union, and if a relationship was simply based on sense gratification, the husband will feel he has been somewhat replaced by the child in his wife's attentions, and the physical and mental changes of motherhood may make the wife less sexually attractive. The daily life routine and duties will become tiresome and boring and the couple will start blaming each other to the point of resentment and spite, and often the man will make himself scarce, sometimes seeking sexual gratification from other women.

We can see the root problem through the word visa ("poison") used in this verse together with its derivate visaya ("sense objects"). A poison may not be instantly recognizable when we drink it and actually it could taste sweet, but soon it will affect our health, destroying our strength and intelligence, making us lose consciousness and finally killing us. This applies to all types of sense gratification, that can be healthy only if consumed sparingly and carefully and in the correct way; a poison often can also act like a medicine, but it must be taken in the proper dosage and in the specific circumstances, otherwise it will have the opposite effect. A great example is salty, sour or spicy food, that was mentioned in verse 17.9 as characteristically loved by rajasic people; in small quantities and in the appropriate bodily conditions and environment (season etc), these ingredients can be extremely beneficial to our health, but if we consume them in excess they become addictive and gradually destroy our health.

The same applies with the sensations of heat and cold that were also brought as an example of sense gratification early in chapter 2: matra sparsas tu kaunteya sitosna sukha dukkha dab, agamapayino 'nityas tams titikshasva bharata, "O Arjuna, the contact of the senses with the sense objects causes joy and distress just like cold in winter and heat in summer. Such feelings are temporary: they come and go, and you should just try to tolerate them without being confused and distracted from your duty" (2.14). We certainly enjoy cold things in summer such as ice cream, chilled drinks and dips in cool water, and warm things in winter, such as warm fire, warm bed, contact with warm bodies, hot soup and food etc. But we do not like cold things in winter and hot things in summer; in fact the same items that gave us so much pleasure in one season will make us suffer in the opposite season. Therefore an intelligent person will simply journey through these ups and downs without being attached to either, but accepting them in moderation when they are favorable to his/ her service in the performance of his/ her proper duties.

यदग्रे चानुबन्धे च सुखं मोहनमात्मनः ।

निद्रालस्यप्रमादोत्थं तत्तामसमुदाहृतम् ॥ १८-३९ ॥

yadagre cānubandhe ca sukhaṁ mohanamātmanah | nidrālasya pramādottham tattāmasamudāhṛtam || 18-39 ||

yat: which; agre: in the beginning; ca: and; anubandhe: and in future consequences; ca: and; sukham: the happiness; mohanam: delusional; atmanah: about the self; nidra: sleep; alasya: laziness; pramada: madness; uttham: arisen from; tat: that; tamasam: in tamas guna; udabritam: it is said.

"That happiness that is based on illusory identifications from the beginning to the end, and is born from sleep, laziness and madness, is said to originate from tamas guna.

This verse clearly states that the happiness offered by tamas is merely oblivion and loss of consciousness about oneself - not only about the real self or spiritual atman, but even one's material identification. Some people say, "ignorance is bliss", and in fact we can see that on the level of tamas, total illusion and madness can give a sort of happiness to the confused soul, that is unable to perceive his actual position and degradation. For a drug addict or a drunk in the gutter their stupor gives a temporary cessation of suffering and a delusional feeling of happiness, and only someone else can usually see their real plight. Even when the anesthetic effect of their intoxication vanishes and they suffer horribly both in mind and body, their consciousness remains covered by delusional identifications and attachments, and they are unable to improve their condition. As gunas and prakriti are always in movement, there will be some brief flash of self-awareness even in the most degraded human being, but that moment will be exactly the opposite of happiness, and the only way out from that terrible predicament will be a new birth in an animal body, where the conditioned soul will be able to stop harming himself and to start "detoxifying".

For a pig, happiness is all about rolling around in smelly mud and finding some tasty excrements to eat; this perfectly agrees with the set of senses and the type of mind and body he has naturally acquired, and his activities will not be self-destructive and self-inflicted as in the case of the junkie. If an animal suffers, it is trouble coming from outside, that will consume his past karma and not create more bad karma for the future; the duration of this experience depends on the specific individual's karmic baggage and if we try to engage a pig on a more sattvik level of life, he will feel alienated and possibly even get angry at us.

There is no point in trying to change his nature; although we should not mistreat him, we should not waste time and energy to educate him either. This is why Krishna tells us not to confuse the minds of people who are immersed in tamas: na buddhi bhedam janayed ajnanam karma sanginam, josayet sarva karmani vidvan yuktaḥ samacaran, "A person who has knowledge should not confuse the understanding of the ignorant who are attached to their actions, but should rather help them to engage in all activities in a spirit of cooperation, giving a good example personally" (3.26).

Of course there is a huge difference between a pig and a human being, as manusya jati (human birth) already contains the potential for education and evolutionary progress to a level that lower animals can never attain; however such evolution must be a personal choice and cannot be imposed from the outside. All external help should come in the form of assistance in positive and proactive engagement, that will counteract the tamasic tendency to laziness and favor an increasing influence of rajas or greed. In very rare and exceptional cases, the power of transcendental contact can raise a conditioned soul out of tamasic stupor, but even in that case the purification and progress must be performed through active engagement in practical useful service so that s/he will sweat off all traces of tamas. Otherwise, a relapse is inevitable.

In this verse, the word anubandha refers to future binding consequences, and can be translated "in the end" like in the two previous verses we have seen the word parinama, that literally means "transformation" (as in parinama vada, "the doctrine of transformation"). This indicates that both sattva and rajas imply a change or transformation - one for the better, the other for the worse - while tamas is an immobilizing factor, like the ropes or shackles that bind a prisoner (anubandha).

As we have seen, intoxication or pra mada ("what makes one crazy") is a major cause/ effect for tamas to obliterate self-awareness; this can be applied to all types of addictions and behaviors that remove our consciousness from the perception of reality, including the adrenaline highs that drown other feelings and numb the brain. However, the same effect is easily obtained by obsessive identification and attachments as in moha ("illusion"), inertial inaction, callousness and irresponsibility to the point of catatonic condition as in alasya ("laziness"), and simply a self-reinforcing habit of excessive sleep as in nidra ("sleep"). In all these conditions, the deluded soul seeks permanent happiness and not merely a temporary relief from fatigue, and therefore he "hates Mondays" and dreams of a lifelong vacation in which he will not do anything but all his needs and pleasures will be provided by someone else's work.

We find very similar statements in Krishna's instructions to Uddhava: sattvikam sukham atmottham, visayottham tu rajasam, tamasam moha dainyottham, nirgunam mad apasrayam, "Happiness in sattva is found in the self, happiness in rajas is found in sense objects, and happiness in tamas is found in illusion and degradation. However, transcendental happiness is found in me" (Bhagavata Purana 11.25.29). We should remember here that by "me" Krishna means the supreme Consciousness and Reality known by the names of Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan.

In this regard, we can observe the distinction between the atman mentioned for sattva and the paramatman mentioned for visuddha sattva: the perception of atman ("self") can vary according to the degree of sattva or goodness, and is indicated by the legitimate etymological use of the definition atman to refer to the spiritual consciousness and purusha, the jiva, the mind and even the body. So we are to understand that all types of happiness that we can find in ourselves without looking for external sources are sattvik and good for us.

However, as the gunas constantly revolve in the wheel of samsara, even sattvik happiness is not permanent and if we want a permanent solution and position we need to rise above all gunas: traigunya visaya veda nistraigunyo bhavarjuna, nirdvandvo nitya sattva stho niryoja ksema atmavan, "The knowledge of the three gunas is based on the sense objects only. O Arjuna, you should become detached from all these three gunas, and situate yourself in that pure goodness that is not subject to change. One who knows the atman becomes free from all dualities and finds protection in detachment." (2.45).

न तदस्ति पृथिव्यां वा दिवि देवेषु वा पुनः । सत्त्वं प्रकृतिजैर्मुक्तं यदेभिः स्यात्त्रिभिर्गुणैः ॥ १८-४० ॥

na tadasti pṛthivyāṁ vā divi deveṣu vā punaḥ । sattvaṁ prakṛtijairmuktaṁ yadebhiḥ syātttribhirguṇaiḥ ॥ 18-40 ॥

na: not; tat: that; asti: there is; pṛthivyām: on the earth; vā: or; divi: in the sky; devesu: among the devas; vā: or; punaḥ: again; sattvaṁ: existence; prakṛtijaiḥ: born from nature; muktaṁ: free; yat: which; ebhiḥ: from these; syat: there will be; tribhir guṇaiḥ: three gunas.

"Neither on this earth nor in the heavens among the Devas, one's existence can be free from the influence of these three gunas, that are generated by nature.

In this verse, the expression divi deveṣu is quite interesting. The word diva literally means "sky", "luminous", "glittering", and is used to refer to the higher planetary systems, where everything is radiant - bodies, land, buildings etc - as the material elements are illuminated by sattva, with a small influence of rajas and almost complete absence of tamas. The expression tat sattvaṁ, divided at the beginning of each of the two lines, means "that existence" or "that mind", indicating that Svargaloka is a higher dimension of life but it is still within the material realm under the rule of the mind.

Materialistic people often confuse heaven with the spiritual dimension, but these are not exactly the same. The concept of paradise, especially in abrahamic ideologies that consider it the highest possible attainment and an eternal position, is still loaded with materialistic ideas of sense gratification, and a subconscious cultural superimposition often confuses Hindus into believing that the spiritual world or Vaikuntha is a sort of paradise where the devotees of Vishnu or Krishna go after death to enjoy an eternal life of celestial pleasures. Bhagavata Purana (3.15.13-23, 4.12.35) gives a short description of the Vaikuntha planet within this universe, called Svetadvipa or Dhruvaloka, where Brahma and the other Devas travel when they want to approach Karanodakasayi Vishnu and where a certain semblance of time and space is created in order to facilitate the understanding and the communication with embodied souls.

However, even in this watered-down projection of the transcendental Consciousness we clearly see that everything there is meant for the service and pleasure of Bhagavan, and not as a display of sense gratification opportunities to reward the faithful deceased. Without the limitations imposed by material dualistic perception, such as time and space, the spiritual world or param dhama (8.21, 10.11, 11.38, 15.6) is a non-manifested/ non-changing (avyakta) eternal complete present everywhere in perfect union with the Supreme, therefore it cannot be described (adbhokṣajā). It is the Supreme itself/ himself, beyond duality and non-duality.

There is no contradiction between this verse and the verses in which Krishna has instructed us to become free from the gunas (2.45, 7.14, 14.20, 14.23, 14.25, 14.26), as this verse and the others referring to the great power of the gunas (3.5, 3.27, 3.29, 4.13, 7.13, 7.14, 13.15, 13.20, 13.22, 13.24, 14.5, 14.18, 14.19, 15.10, 18.19, 18.29) speak of the influence of gunas on one's existence - mind, senses, body, surrounding objects, circumstances of life - and never on the real self or atman. Because of its inherent transcendental nature, the atman can never be touched or changed by the gunas, just like a diamond is never really touched or changed by the layers of dirt that accumulate around it. The consciousness of the self can only be temporarily covered or obscured, but genuine detachment based on realized knowledge is sufficient to liberate it from such identifications: this is called mokṣha. The subject of the gunas and the process to transcend the gunas is also explained extensively by Krishna to Uddhava in the famous Uddhava gita, contained in Bhagavata Purana (canto 11, chapters 7 to 29); we are planning to produce a separate publication on this subject.

It is important to understand that liberation comes from the genuine and permanent detachment born from realized knowledge, and not from the mere absence of a physical connection with a material body. Liberation from material conditionings does not come automatically at the time of death; although it is a fact that death liberates us from the sufferings of a seriously damaged body, if we still have material identifications and attachments we will have to take a new birth in another material body: jatasya hi dbruvo mṛityur dbruvam janma mṛitasya ca, tasmad aparibharye 'rthe na tvam socitum arhasi, "Because one who has taken birth must necessarily die, and one who has died will again be reborn. There is no point in worrying over something that is inevitable." (2.27). Our purpose then is not merely to "be liberated from the body", but to become liberated from all the delusional desires, attachments and identifications that will cause the development of one body after another. This applies not only to the earthly level (pṛthivi) but also at the celestial level (divi deveṣu) within the material universe: a brahma bhuvaṇa lokah punar avartino 'rjuna, mam upetya tu kaunteya punar janma na vidyate, mam upetya punar janma dukkhalayam asasvatam, napnuvanti mahatmanah samsiddhim paramam gatah, "O Arjuna, all these worlds, from the planet of Brahma downwards, are places from which one returns, but for one who has attained me there is no more rebirth. Having attained me, they do not have to take another birth in this world, that is the cause of sufferings and impermanence. Such great souls have already reached the highest level of perfection." (8.16, 8.15). This means that we need to attain the atman/ brahman realization well before leaving this body: saknotibaiva yāḥ sodbhum prak sarira vimokṣanat, kama krodhodbhavam vegam sa yuktaḥ sa sukhi narah, "One who in this life, before leaving the body, is capable of withstanding the onslaughts of lust and anger, is a yogi and a happy human being." (5.23)

Liberation can and must be attained already in this lifetime: gata sangasya muktasya jnanavasthita cetasah, yajñayacarataḥ karma samagram pravilyate, "One who has finished with all associations and whose consciousness is firmly established in knowledge, worships

Yajna (Vishnu) through his actions. The entirety of his karma is thus destroyed." (4.23) This is required because living in a body necessitates constant actions and therefore puts us in contact with the gunas: na hi kascit ksanam api jatu tisthaty akarma krit, karyate hy avasah karma sarvah prakriti jair gunaih, "Never, at any time, can a person remain without acting even for one moment, because he is forced to into action by all the gunas born from prakriti." (3.5).

To attain liberation, one simply needs to firmly maintain one's consciousness (samadhi) on the transcendental identity of atman/ brahman, that is neutral and detached in regard to the gunas, even while continuing to work with them: prakriteh kriyamanani gunaih karmani sarvasah, abankara vimudhatma kartaham iti manyate, tattva vit tu maha babo guna karma vibhagayoh, guna gunesu vartanta iti matva na sajjate, "All activities are actually performed by the gunas, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'. One who knows things as they really are is able to understand the various guna and karma, and therefore he engages the gunas in the interaction with the appropriate gunas: this awareness keeps him free from attachment" (3.27, 3.28).

In the next group of verses, Krishna will expand this concept into a brief description of the guna and karma of the four varnas or occupational categories of human society. that constitute the guidelines for a sattvik and progressive life, gradually leading to liberation (dharma, artha, kama, moksha). After that, Krishna will clearly explain that even while performing one's occupational duties, it is possible to become established on the level of liberation by keeping one's consciousness focused on the transcendental Reality, in the subsequent realizations of Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan. This is the nirguna level, where all the differences in material duties become meaningless, and one is ready to selflessly perform any service to the Supreme (18.66). This will be the conclusion of Bhagavad gita.

कर्माणि प्रविभक्तानि स्वभावप्रभवैर्गुणैः ॥ १८-४१ ॥

brāhmaṇakṣatriyaviśāṁ śūdrāṇāṁ ca parantapa । karmāṇi pravibhaktāni svabhāvabhavaigūṇaiḥ ।। 18-41 ।।

brahmana: of the brahmanas; ksatriya: of the ksatriyas; visam: and the vaisyas; sudranam: of the sudras; ca: and; parantapa: o Parantapa; karmani: the activities; pra vibhaktani: are categorized; sva bhava: out of their individual nature; pra bhavaib: produced by; gunaih: the gunas.

"The duties of the brahmanas, kshatriyas, vaisyas and sudras are categorized according to their specific natures, produced by the gunas.

The expression karmani pravibhaktani indicates that the duties of the four varnas are different, and this difference is determined by the particular nature (sva bhava) of each category, produced by the influence of the gunas. Some commentators have translated the word pra bhava as "by birth", and interpreting this as a confirmation of the casteist prejudice by which one can belong to a particular varna only if he was born into it.

This interpretation is profoundly incorrect and it has caused immense damage to Hindu society and to the human society in general, because it somehow created the idea that people who were born as in a high varna - especially brahmanas - did not need to qualify themselves, while people who were not born in that position could never become qualified and should never be allowed to try. The casteist prejudice is heavily influenced by tamas and Kali yuga, and is the reason for the gradual social, political, economical weakening and collapse of India society, especially as clever invaders and colonizers took full advantage of this weakness and reinforced it for their own purposes.

Unfortunately there is still a number of people, especially among unqualified birth brahmins, that continue to defend the birth prejudice, claiming that the different castes have a totally different DNA, like a cow is different from an elephant or a dog. However, this half-baked genetic argument does not explain why the DNA of a member of a high caste does not show any change in case the individual "loses his caste" due to the ostracization from the community or conversion to a non-Hindu faith. The fact is that there is not one single verse, in Bhagavad gita or in the entire expanse of the shastra (sruti and smriti) that states that the categorization and duties of the four varnas are determined by birth, but on the contrary there is ample documentation on the suddhi, prayascitta and remedial diksha procedure that has been used regularly and for large numbers of people who were welcomed in the varna system as vratyas, up to the highest position of brahmanas. The system was discontinued only in the last 200 years as the British introduced the caste based census, rigidly codifying the hereditary positions as different race groups.

Verse 4.13 had already stated: catur varnyam maya sristam guna karma vibhagasah, tasya kartaram api mam viddhy akartaram avyayam, "The four varnas have been created by me on the basis of different gunas and karmas, but although I am their maker, know that I am unchangeable and detached from action." The position of each individual within the civilized system of human society described in Vedic tradition is solely determined by the particular tendencies or gunas and activities or karma; in the original Vedic system one's duty or sva dharma is determined automatically by one's karma, so much that the two words are normally interchangeable, except in the case of vikarma or "bad actions" that are not prescribed for anybody. The concept of karma as duty is therefore strictly connected to the concepts of sva dharma and sva bhava; the difference between dharma and bhava is similar to the difference between dharma and karma, as there can be an asuri bhava (7.15, 9.12, 16.4, 16.5, 16.19, 16.20) that is opposed to dharma.

In other words, there can never be a "criminal dharma" as some casteist fools would have us believe, because that is an oxymoron or a contradiction in terms. If one was born in a family or community of criminals, it is certainly not his duty to remain in such situation and carry on the "cultural legacy and family beliefs"; on the contrary, it is the express duty of all civilized people and especially of the brahmanas to help those who want to reform and purify themselves and find an appropriate place within the civilized human society called the varnashrama dharma: krinvanto visva aryam, "Let us make everybody an arya" (Rig Veda 9.63.5).

In this verse the first three occupational classes are united in a single compound word (brahmana-kshatriya-visam) while the sudras are mentioned separately, because brahmanas, kshatriyas and vaiśyas are dvi-ja ("twice born") and therefore they have the duty to perform the activities of their specific professional responsibilities as well as the traditional Vedic rituals called nitya karmāni ("regular duties"). By definition, sudras do not have the suitable gunas for such duties, and therefore they are not required to perform them; if they wish, they can engage in various types of religious activities or get training for a higher varna, under the expert guidance of a qualified brahmana, and if they develop the appropriate gunas, they can be awarded the recognition and engagement that is most suitable to them. Contrarily to the abrahamic ideology, where one's particular type of birth is mysteriously and unquestionably decreed and sanctioned by God and therefore it cannot be changed for one's life (and then it's over as there is no reincarnation), Vedic civilization teaches that one obtains a particular body in particular circumstances due to his previous activities and desires, and therefore his situation can be changed at any time by a suitable modification of his activities and desires. Not only this concept is explained theoretically, but it is also demonstrated through the practical examples of many famous personalities whose stories are narrated in traditional Vedic literature.

Jabali (Satyakama Jabala), Valmiki, Gautama, Janasruti, Citraratha are often quoted as individuals who were born totally outside the varna system (one could say "outcaste") and yet became acknowledged as great brahmanas and Rishis. The story of Satyakama Jabala, son of a prostitute who did not even know who his father was, is particularly well known because it is narrated in Chandogya Upanishad (4.4.1-5). The great Vasistha was the son of the apsara Urvashi, born from a casual encounter. Veda Vyasa was born from the casual sexual encounter of a woman belonging to the fishermen community; he had a highly qualified brahmana son (Sukadeva), two kshatriya sons (Pandu and Dhritarashtra) and a son who was situated on a level of consciousness completely transcendental to the varna system (Vidura). Parasara himself was born from Adrisyati Chandanuni. Aitareya Rishi, author of the Aitareya Upanishad, was born of a sudra mother. In Aitareya Brahmana (2.19) we find the story of Ailusha Rishi, who was the son of a prostitute and himself a gambler of low character; however he became sincerely interested in Vedic knowledge and in time he was recognized as a Rishi and an Acharya. On the other hand, the famous rakshasa Ravana (and his brothers) were the grandchildren of Pulastya Rishi.

Visvamitra the son of Maharaja Gadi was a kshatriya not only by birth but by guna and karma as well, but he was determined to become a brahmana and he achieved his goal after a long and hard training. He is mentioned together with Maharaja Vitahavya in Mahabharata respectively in Adi Parva chapter 174 and Anusasana Parva, chapter 30, because they both moved up from a kshatriya birth to the position of famous brahmanas. The Hari vamsa (29.7-8) also says that among the descendants of Gritsamada the son of Vitahavya there were many brahmanas, as well as kshatriyas, vaiśyas and sudras. The position of brahmana was attained by Suceta, Prakasa, Pramiti (famous experts in Vedas and Vedangas), and also by Sunaka, who was born as a sudra and became the father of the famous Saunaka Rishi (who narrated the Bhagavata purana to the Rishis assembled in Naimisharanya). Conversely among the descendants of the great brahmana Rishi Bharadvaja we find king Vitaka, a great kshatriya, who had two sons (Nara and Garga); Nara continued the dynasty with a kshatriya offspring, while Garga became a brahmana. Another kshatriya who became a brahmana and generated an offspring of brahmanas was Maharaja Dhrista, mentioned in Bhagavata purana (9.2.16-17). Again the Bhagavata Purana (9.2.22) mentions for the same reason Maharaja Agnivesya (later known as Jatukarma Rishi), son of Devadatta, whose brahmana descendants became famous as the Agnivesyayanas.

Jahnu Muni was born as the son of king Hotra, descendant of the saintly king Aila of the Chandra vamsa (Bhagavata Purana 9.15.1-4), Kanva Rishi was born in the dynasty of Maharaja Puru and his son Medhatithi was the ancestor of the brahmana Praskanna (Bhagavata Purana 9.20.1-7). Similarly the position of brahmana was attained by Gargya the son of King Sini, by the three sons of king Duritakshaya called Trayyaruni, Kavi and Puskarakaruni (Bhagavata Purana 9.21.19), by the vaiśyas Nabhaga and Dista (Bhagavata Purana 8.18.3), by Ajamidha and his son Priyamedha (that belonged to the dynasty of king Bharyasva) and his descendants such as the great Rishi Mudgala, Satanaanda and Kripacharya (Bhagavata Purana 9.21.21, 9.21.31). The Hari vamsa (31.33-35) states that Maharaja Bali had 5 kshatriya sons but also other sons who became brahmanas and generated brahmana lineages. The Bhagavata Purana also informs us that among the 100 sons of king Rishabhadeva, 81 became brahmanas (Bhagavata Purana 5.4.13).

śamo damastapaḥ śaucam kṣāntirārjavameva ca । jñānam vijñānamāstikyam brahmakarma svabhāvajam ॥ 18-42 ॥

samah: control of the mind; damah: control of the senses; tapah: control of the body; saucam: cleanliness; kṣāntih: tolerance; arjavam: simplicity; eva: certainly; ca: and; jñanam: theoretical knowledge; vijñanam: applied knowledge; astikyam: faith in Vedic authority; brahma karma: the activities/ duties of the brahmana; svabhava jam: born from his specific nature.

"The activities/ duties of the brahmana, determined by his particular nature, are control of his own mind, senses and body, cleanliness, tolerance, simplicity, theoretical and practical knowledge, and living in accordance to Vedic teachings.

The word astikyam ("faith in Vedas") is closely connected with the word astika ("one who believes in the authority of Vedic knowledge") used in the traditional categorization of darśhanas; we may remember that among the dharmic darśhanas there are three that are described as na-astika ("not recognizing the authority of Vedic knowledge"): Buddhism, Jainism and Charvaka's agnostic materialism. These ideologies are still considered compatible with sanatana dharma because they recognize the validity of the eternal and universal principles of ethics (dharmas), but they are not up to the mark of the civilized (arya) system of varnas and ashramas, and they are therefore called upa-dharmas.

In this verse Krishna clearly establishes that there can be no such thing as an agnostic brahmana, because that would be an oxymoron, like saying "dry water" or "cold heat". Astikya is a defining characteristic by which one can recognize a brahmana, so if this quality is not present, the individual can at most be a brahma bandhu, or "relative of a brahmana". It is important to understand that such faith is in the genuine and original Vedic knowledge. It does not refer to a particular belief in a personal God, because Vedic knowledge accommodates the perspective of impersonalism (akshara, 12.3, non-manifested, 7.24), although Krishna says that it is an unnecessarily difficult form of meditation (12.5). Therefore the word nastika cannot be translated as "atheist" in the abrahamic sense.

The preceding couple of attributes, jnana-vijnana, refers to astika, therefore it indicates a solid verifiable source, and not some second hand opinion or popular belief (laukika sraddha) as sometimes Hinduism is considered. This also means that one can certainly study and respect the teachings of Vedic commentators or gurus, but such writings must never be considered on the same level of the original sruti, because their presentation was necessarily adapted to their particular desa, kala, patra and therefore do not require an implicit faith from a brahmana. Blind allegiance to a sampradaya against the teachings of the original Vedas thus disqualifies a person from the category of brahmanas. This also means that paid teachers depending on academic institutions cannot be considered brahmanas, because brahmanas only teach under their own responsibility and value truth and knowledge above all else. On the other side, academia forces people to conform to what is taught, even against truth and ethics, and against the benefit of the students.

The next karma (characteristic activity, duty, qualification, occupation) of the brahmana is arjavam, a definition that conveys the meanings of "simplicity, honesty, truthfulness, straight-forwardness". Unfortunately some people confuse simplicity with foolishness or ignorance. The same applies to kshanti, that means "tolerance, forgiveness", often mistaken for callousness or indifference, neglect or absenteeism, or even irresponsibility. The other qualities are sama and dama (control of one's internal and external senses, especially manasa, jihva, udara and upasta - mind, tongue, belly and genitals), tapah (austerity consisting in bravely facing difficulties) and saucha (cleanliness and purity). These have been discussed in many previous verses, especially from 13.8 to 13.12 where Krishna described the real meaning of jnana; that list should also be considered contained in the expression jnana vijnana of this verse. One who does not show the qualities/ activities listed in this verse cannot really be considered a brahmana.

In the Bhagavata Purana (7.11.21) Narada Muni states: samo damas tapah saucam santosah ksantir arjavam, jnanam, ayacutatmatvam satyam ca brahma-laksanam, "The qualities that characterize a brahmana are the control of one's mind and senses, austerity and tolerance in the face of difficulties, cleanliness, contentment, tendency to forgive, simplicity, knowledge, compassion, truthfulness, and complete surrender to the Supreme Personality of Godhead."

In the Mahabharata (Vana Parva chapter 180), Maharaja Yudhishthira states: dharmas ca satyam ca damas tapas ca amatsaryam bhris titiksanasya, yajnas ca danam ca dhrtib srutam ca vratani vai dvadasa brahmanasya, "A brahmana must always behave in accordance to dharma (ethical principles). First of all he must be truthful and able to control his own senses. He must be austere, detached, humble and tolerant. He must not envy anyone. He must be expert in the performance of sacrifices and distribute his possessions in charity. He must be determined in the study of Vedic scriptures and in religious activities: these are the 12 fundamental qualities of a brahmana." And again, sudre tu yad bhavel laksana dvije tac ca na vidyate, na vai sudro bhaved chudro brahmano na ca brahmanah, "If these qualities (listed as the characteristics of the brahmanas) are found in a sudra (i.e. a person born in a sudra family), such person must never be called a sudra, just like a brahmana (i.e. a person born in a brahmana family) is not a brahmana if he lacks these qualities."

We find descriptions of the character of the genuine brahmanas also in the original sambitas such as Rig (2.22.2, 5.34.6, 6.63.5, 7.103.1), Atharva (5.17.9), Yajur (26.2); here is one example: brahmana saba saumino vacamkrat brahma krimvantah parivatsarinam adhvaryayo gharminah sisvidhana avirbhavanti guhya na kecit, "A brahmana is always gentle and soft spoken, always engaged in spiritual activities on the highest level of consciousness, offers revelations on knowledge, recognizes merit in others and does not hide anything" (Rig Veda 7.103.8). Again the Mahabharata gives further clarifications in this regard (Anusasana Parva 163.8, 26, 46), where Shiva tells Parvati: sthitoh brahmana-dharmena brahmanyam upajivati, ksatriyo vatha vaisyo va brahma-bhuyah sa gacchati, ebhis tu karmabhir deva subhair acaritais tatha, sudro brahmanatam yati vaisyah ksatriyatam vrajet, etaih karma-phalair deva suddhatma vijitendriyah, sudro'pi dvija-vat sevyo iti brahmabravat svayam, sarvo'yam brahmano loke vrttena tu vidhiyate, vrtte sthitas tu sudro'pi brahmanatvam niyacchati.

Here is the translation: "If ksatriyas or vaisyas behave like brahmanas and engage in the occupations of brahmanas, such persons attain the position of brahmana. In the same way, a sudra can become a brahmana and a vaisya can become a ksatriya. O Devi, thanks to the performance of these activities and by following the instructions of the Agamas (Vedic scriptures that contain the instructions for the rituals) a person born in a family of sudras devoid of qualifications can become a brahmana. In this world, a person is born in a brahmana family as a result of his tendencies, therefore a sudra that manifests the tendencies of a brahmana and acts as a brahmana automatically becomes a brahmana." The Bhagavata Purana (7.11.35) confirms: yasya yal laksanam proktam pumso varnabhinyanjakam, yad anyatrapi dryeta tat tenaina vinirdiset, "One who shows the characteristics of a brahmana, ksatriya, vaisya or sudra as described above, should be classified in the corresponding social category."

Abandoning the study and practice of Vedic scriptures (svadhyaya tyaga) still remains the most serious cause for degradation for a son of brahmana parents. Manu sambita (2.157, 2.172) states, yatha kastha-mayo basti yatha carma-mayo mrgah yas ca vipro'nadhiyanas trayas te nama bibhrati, "A brahmana who does not study the Vedas is comparable to an elephant or deer made of leather, that are called elephant or deer but cannot function as such. We must know that as long as a brahmana is not qualified in the Vedic knowledge, he remains on the same level of a sudra." The Manu sambita (4.245) states, uttamanuttaman gacchan hinam hinams ca varjayan, brahmanah sresthatam eti pratyavayena sudratam, "According to the good or bad company he keeps, a brahmana can either become extraordinarily elevated or fall to the position of a sudra."

The Mahabharata (Santi parva, 189.7) declares, himsanrta-priya lubdhab sarva-karmopijvinah krsna saucaparibhrasthas te dvijah sudratam gatah sarva-bhaksyatatirn ityam sarva-karmakaro 'sucib tyakta-vedastvanaca rah sa vai sudra iti smrtah, "A brahmana who commits violent acts (as for example in the consumption of non-vegetarian foods), who lies and cheats, who is greedy, impure, or engages in any activity in order to earn a livelihood, is degraded to the position of sudra. Precisely because he eats and drinks anything without discrimination and is attached to the material things and to the idea of making money, he has abandoned Vedic dharma and ethical behavior, and is called a sudra."

Traditionally, a brahmana is considered fallen from his social position if he commits violations to cleanliness/ purity (sauca), for example because of the consumption of non-vegetarian foods, alcoholic drinks, or even of vegetarian foods that have been cooked by sudras (sudranna pustam), as confirmed by the Kurma purana: nadyac chudrasya vipro'nnam mohad va yadi kamatah sa sudra-yonim vrajati yas tu bhunkte hy-anapadi. This is the reason why a brahmana never goes to a restaurant for eating, and is extremely careful about what he purchases on the market.

दानमीश्वरभावश्च क्षात्रं कर्म स्वभावजम् ॥ १८-४३ ॥

śauryam tejo dhṛtirdākṣyam yuddhe cāpyapalāyanam | dānamīśvarabhāvaśca kṣātram karma svabhāvajam || 18-43 ||

sauryam: heroism; tejah: charisma; dhritib: determination; dakṣyam: resourcefulness; yuddhe: in battle; ca: and; api: also; apalāyanam: steadiness; danam: charity; īśvara bhavaḥ: sense of leadership; ca: and; kṣatram: of the kṣatriya; karma: activities/ duties; svabhava jam: born from his specific nature.

"The activities/ duties of the kṣatriya, determined by his particular nature, are heroism, charisma, determination, resourcefulness, steadiness in battle, charity, sense of leadership.

The Bhagavata Purana confirms: sauryam viryam dhritiḥ tejas, tyagas catmajayab kṣama, brahmanyata prasadas ca, satyam ca kṣatra lakṣanam, "The characteristics of the kṣatriya are heroism and chivalry, determination, charisma, detachment from possessions, self-control, obedience to brahmanas, satisfaction, and truthfulness" (Bhagavata Purana 7.11.22) and tejo balam dhritib sauryam, titikṣaudaryam udyamah, sthairyam brahmanyam aīsvaryam, kṣatra prakṛitayas tv imah, "Charisma, bodily strength, determination, heroism, tolerance, generosity, great endurance, steadiness, devotion to the brahmanas and sense of leadership are the natural qualities of the kṣatriyas" (Bhagavata Purana, 11.17.17). A person who does not show these qualities in practice is not a kṣatriya but an impostor and usurper, or the impotent descendant of illustrious forefathers.

Just like arjavam (simplicity) and kṣanti (tolerance) should not be confused with foolishness and apathy, the characteristics of a kṣatriya need to be understood correctly. The expression īśvara bhava ("controlling nature") could also be translated as "lordly attitude" because īśvara means "Lord"; a tendency to be bossy is not a bad thing, as it does not mean bullying people around to impose one's will over others whimsically. If the bossy individual is qualified and properly trained, and capable to lead, direct and manage others, society should appreciate this quality and use it to its benefit instead of resenting it on the basis of a delusional belief in the complete equality of all human beings. The only equality that should exist in society is equal access to opportunities to qualify oneself; according to the particular nature (talents and tendencies, or guna and karma) of each individual, some people will become more qualified for some particular duties, and some will be more suitable for other duties, and some others will always need to be told what to do and depend on others for their protection and maintenance. Of course respect and obedience are to be commanded, not demanded. A true leader shines for his own value and charisma (tejas, saurya) and naturally inspires faith and loyalty in good people. A true kṣatriya is always on the front line, before anybody else, in the thick of the battle, and is the best example to follow. He works harder and longer hours than anyone else, and is ever ready (24 hours a day, 7 days a week) to sacrifice his own sense gratification, comforts, possessions, position and personal life (by living and by dying) for the sake of the kingdom and the prajas - whether the kingdom is a large country or a village, a neighborhood or any group of people who look up to him for guidance. A true kṣatriya takes responsibility not only for his own failures but also for collective defeats, inspires and encourages others and helps them to rise and progress to become qualified leaders in turn. He demonstrates concern, care and affection for the prajas just like a good father behaves with his children, engages them happily and appropriately, and always watches over their well-being, over and above his own immediate family and relatives. If a kṣatriya expects to be obeyed in his orders to people about what they should do, it is because he knows what he is doing; he is dakṣha, "expert", as his training has taught him the sciences of war strategy, social management and resource administration.

The word dakṣyam also indicates resourcefulness, that is the ability to face new unforeseen situations and to adapt one's approach smoothly. Generosity and charitable disposition (dana) are his natural qualities, therefore people are not afraid they will be exploited or mistreated in any way; rather, because he is never afraid to stand for justice and protection of the subjects (yuddhe apalāyanam), people feel safe in his presence and seek his help and protection. The qualities called sauryam and tejas are similar to each other. The word sauryam is closely related to sura (divine beings such as the Devas) and surya, referring to the Sun, and indicates the radiance of majesty, the chivalry and personal power, and invincibility that we associate with the Sun itself. Tejas also means "radiance, power", and even "heat", and its meanings overlap with tapah; in fact tejas is created by tapah. These two attributes warn us that it is dangerous to step too near to the royal kṣatriya, because in spite of his benevolence and spirit of self-sacrifice, his energy is very powerful and could scorch a weak personality, causing negative effects such as envy or fear (which in turn will give rise to hatred). Normally and ideally, sauryam and tejas should be engaged with determination and careful skills in the protection of the prajas, and therefore the two qualities are mentioned in the first part of the verse together with dhriti (determination, patience, endurance, perseverance), dakshyam (skillfulness, resourcefulness, expertise, ability, dexterity) and yuddhe apalayanam (steadfastness and courage in battle).

The word dhriti, especially in this context, could also be translated as "grit, resolve". It indicates the strong determination of the warrior, who firmly faces any difficult situation or loss and even death, and when he is wounded and unable to stand, he continues to fight even on his knees. However, this determination should not be confused with the stupid stubbornness of tamasic people that are attached to some particular action or belief or underestimate dangers; the kshatriya has a clear vision of the situation but he chooses to sacrifice himself for the protection of the prajas if this is required, because that is his duty.

He is never depressed or dogged down, as this is considered a contamination (kasmalam, 2.2), a sign of impotence (klaibyam, 2.3) and a "weakness of the heart" (bridaya daurbalyam, 2.3) that is unworthy of a civilized person (anarya justam, 2.1), a cause of infamy (akirti karam, 2.1) and an obstacle to one's elevation (asvayam, 2.1). Of course these qualities cannot be expected from everyone, and even in a person who has the genuine talents and inclinations for the role of kshatriya, these must be developed through appropriate training and experience, so aspiring kshatriyas should not feel discouraged at their shortcomings.

Similar to dhriti is apalayanam, "not fleeing", referring to the steadiness in battle and heroism in spite of adversities; this quality or characteristic is not demonstrated only on the battlefield but in all aspects of daily life, in the small and the big things. Also, there are many weapons with which one can fight; swords, bows and arrows (of many types) are more chivalrous than guns and modern weapons (that are more suited to cowards), and there are subtler weapons too, consisting in words and ideas. Kshatriyas are educated and trained in strategy and diplomacy in dealing with the enemy - the first attempt is sama, treating the opponent like a friend and allowing sufficient space for his livelihood and prosperity, the second is dana, trying to win them with peace offerings and gifts, the third attempt is bheda, trying to break up hostile alliances and facing one enemy at the time, and only as a last chance one should resort to danda, punishment as in taking physical action against the offender.

This brings us to another very important clarification. The main job of a kshatriya is fighting to protect the prajas, because that is his natural inclination and the best use of his qualities, as Krishna has stated specifically: sva dharmam api caveksya na vikampitum arhasi, dharmyad hi yuddhac chreya 'nyat ksatriyasya na vidyate, yadricchaya copapannam svarga dvaram apavritam, sukhinah ksatriyah partha labhante yuddham idrisam, "Considering your own dharmic duty you should not hesitate, because for a kshatriya there is nothing better than fighting a dharmic battle. O Arjuna, happy are the kshatriyas to whom such opportunity comes unsought. For a warrior, engaging in such a battle is like having the doors of heaven open in front of him." (2.31, 2.32). This will also be confirmed again in verse 18.59. However, the warrior spirit of a kshatriya is not the war mongering, blood lust, and cruelty of the asuras; he is not a brawling bully and he avoids confrontation and conflict if there is any other option still possible, as the Pandavas demonstrated in practice in their dealings with the aggressive Duryodhana and his brothers. Besides, there is a specific code of conduct for kshatriyas; non-combatants should never be attacked or harmed, and property that is not directly connected to the fighting should not be destroyed; for example, the encampments where the warriors retire for the night are not to be touched. Even on the battlefield a warring enemy should not be attacked if he is unprepared, unarmed, distracted, distraught, or if he admits defeat.

Sometimes unqualified persons pose as kshatriyas, but they should be exposed and neutralized by genuine kshatriyas or brahmanas; they are described as nripa linga dharam ("merely showing the appearance/ insignia of kings"). Prominent examples can be found in Bhagavata Purana (1.3.25, 1.14.17, 4.14.28, 4.14.31, 4.14.34, 1.16.4, 1.17.1, 1.17.5, 1.17.10-11, 1.17.14, 1.17.32, 4.14.4, 4.16.6, 4.16.14-16, 12.1.39-41, 12.2.8, 12.2.20).

Here is a description of the unqualified kings of Kali yuga: stri bala go dvija ghnas ca, para dara dhanadritah, uditasta mita praya, alpa sattvalpakayusah, asamskritah kriya hina, rajasa tamasavritah, prajas te bhaksayisyanti, mlecha rajanya rupinah, "These mlecchas in the form of kings will be killing/ injuring women, children, cows/ the planet and the twice born, and going after the wives and wealth of others. They will be mentally and emotionally unstable, rather weak mentally and physically and short lived. Covered by rajas and tamas, they will not perform any proper duty or auspicious ritual, but they will devour the prajas." (Bhagavata Purana 12.2.39-40).

A brief note about the meaning of mleccha: as in the case of the varnas, the categorization of mleccha depends on guna and karma, demonstrated by a criminal nature (mleccha bhavata durjanah, Bhagavata Purana 9.16.33), as in the case of the sons of Visvamitra who did not accept Sunahsepha as their eldest brother. Ancestry, ethnic group, language, nationality, family of birth and other similar considerations are irrelevant to the point - only adharmic behavior is the criterion.

कृषिगौरक्ष्यवाणिज्यं वैश्यकर्म स्वभावजम् । परिचर्यात्मकं कर्म शूद्रस्यापि स्वभावजम् ॥ १८-४४ ॥

kṛṣigaurakṣyavāṇijyam vaiśyakarma svabhāvajam | paricaryātmakam karma śūdrasyāpi svabhāvajam || 18-44 ||

kṛsi: agriculture; go rakṣya: protection of the cows/ del pianeta; vāṇijyam: commerce; vaiśya karma: the activities/ duties of the vasya; svabhava-jam: born from his specific nature; paricarya: service/ assistance; atmakam: consisting of; karma: activities/ duties; sudrasya: of the sudra; api: also; svabhava-jam: born from his specific nature.

"The activities/ duties of the vaiśya, determined by his particular nature, are agriculture, protection of the cows/ planet, and commerce. The activities/ duties of the sudra, determined by his particular nature, are the service / assistance (to others).

Vaiśyas and sudras are grouped up in one single verse because they are less evolved than brahmanas and kṣatriyas and therefore they have less duties; the sudras considerably less than the vaiśyas. These professional and social positions are easier to maintain even without making particular efforts to qualify oneself or make lots of personal sacrifices. Therefore it is said that in the age of Kali everyone is born a sudra, because without a strenuous effort and a proper training it is almost impossible to become genuine brahmanas or kṣatriyas. Yet, sudras and especially vaiśyas should not be underestimated, because their work is essential for the proper functioning of the social body. Only stupid people would neglect their own stomach or feet, considering them less lovable than their arms and head, because all parts of the body are strictly connected and the sufferings of one part affects the entire body.

The word krishi is the most important item in the verse; in verse 17.7 we elaborated on the fundamental importance of food, both materially and spiritually, and how the production of abundant food is the core of the entire service to the social body. Even the brahmanas and the kṣatriyas depend on the food produced by agriculture, just like the basic function of the head and the arms is to work to procure food and convey the resources to the stomach so that the nutrients can be re-distributed all over the body, so that all the other types of work can be performed properly - including the higher functions of intellect and consciousness.

Without sufficient and appropriate food there can be no material or spiritual progress (1.42, 17.13), as confirmed also by the śruti (Chandogya Upanishad 6.6, 7.1-3, Taittiriya Upanishad Brighu valli, 3.1.1, 3.7.2, 3.8.1, 3.9.1, 3.10.1, Taittiriya Upanishad Brahmananda valli, 2.2.1, Sama Veda sambhita 3.10.6, Prasna Upanishad 1.4, 1.14, Brihad aranyaka Upanishad 1.4.7).

After establishing the importance of agriculture, Krishna immediately gives the necessary ethical guidelines with the expression go rakshya; rakshya means "protection" and go can refer both to cows and to Mother Earth as the personification of the land. This means that a vaiśya is responsible for the health and well being of the land; he must make sure that the soil is not depleted or contaminated or polluted in any way, because the food production would suffer. Within the definition of land (go, bhumi), one needs to include the water reservoirs (surface and underground), the forests, the wild animals etc.

Protection of the cows obviously does not mean ruthless exploitation and cruel treatment as we can observe in the "animal husbandry" methods developed following the abrahamic exploitative values and centralized industrialization. It may be difficult to believe for those who are used to the present asuric society (and may consider it the "norm"), but it is possible for human beings to live with cows and other animals in a mutually beneficial relationship, based on friendship, love and trust. When obtained ethically, the products of cows are extremely valuable for the health and progress of human society.

The word vanijyam means "commerce, trade", and refers to a further stage in the transformation and distribution of resources, by which wealth is created through commercial enterprises. This does not include unnecessary parasitic professional positions that simply make money without actually producing anything of real value, but it rather consists in all those activities that contribute to create useful goods and distribute them to a larger number of people. For example, mining and forging metals into weapons, pots and plates, containers, instruments for agriculture and specialized tools of many kinds, and of course the personal ornaments that are suitable for the different types of individuals according to the recommendations of the brahmanas. Vaiśyas also used precious metals (gold, silver, copper) in the form of minted coins and gems (pearls, diamonds etc) to support their trade in other regions where they traveled by river or sea or by utilizing the roads protected by the imperial garrisons, transporting commodities characteristically produced in different places, such as salt, spices, medicinal herbs and extracts, textile materials, oils, rare foods and seeds, cosmetics and so on.

Indian tradition gives equal primary importance to army personnel and farmers (jawan-kissan) that are the foundations for the survival and prosperity of the people and the kingdom (rastra), even in the absence of properly qualified brahmanas and kṣatriyas, like we see in non-aryan tribal civilizations. In fact, the present plight of farmers and society in general could be easily solved by removing the asuric tendencies and obstructions (internal and external) and allowing people sufficient freedom to provide for themselves in the matter of food and other agricultural/ forestry products, energy, housing, and protection. Any society can prosper with an agriculture based first of all on local subsistence and self sufficiency, with diversified production based on organic cultivation and permaculture, added value processing in local cottage industry preservation and transformation of produce, and small scale local market selling directly to consumers on an open venue. This was the prevalent system everywhere in ancient times, and it worked very well.

The Vedic system, however, rises human society to a higher level. It is more scientific and focuses on education and training, so that the full potential of each individual can be developed, stage after stage, after attaining perfection in one's individual occupation. A sudra is encouraged to become responsible for himself through the development of self-sufficient handicrafts and/or kitchen gardening; once he has become able to manage his own production independently and provide sustenance for himself and his family, he is already in the process to become a vaiśya. The decisive step consists in taking an apprentice and becoming responsible for his work and maintenance - at this point, he is already an entrepreneur, albeit a small one, and he can get advice and further training from qualified vaiśyas and then from brahmanas.

A successful vaiśya has become able to manage many workers and gradually develops a stronger tendency to protect his subordinates - both animals and people - and the lands he is taking care of. By a closer cooperation with qualified kṣatriyas and the proper instructions from brahmanas, he can develop the qualities to become fully responsible for his own small "kingdom" and by delegating the easier tasks to apprentices, he can personally qualify as kṣatriya. Similarly, a kṣatriya who has expanded his mind from the charge of a small kingdom to the greater society of all beings in the universe can become able to protect the prajas on a deeper and vaster level, that is beyond the temporary identification with the material body and social position. Since all the twice-born (brahmanas, kshatriyas and vaisyas) regularly study Vedic knowledge and engage in religious activities and pursuits, this evolution is only natural.

In his elaboration on the varna system, Narada Rishi explained to king Yudhisthira: deva guru acyute bhaktis, tri varga pariposanam, astikyam udyamo nityam, naipunyam vaisya laksanam, "The characteristics of the vaiśya are devotion towards the Devas, the guru and God, feeding the three (the 3 varnas, as well as the 3 purposes of dharma-artha-kama), faith in Vedic system, skillfulness and determination in working" (7.11.23). Krishna also gave similar instructions to Uddhava: astikyam dana nistha ca, adambho brahma sevnam, atustir arthopacayair, vaisya prakritayas tv imah, "Faith in Vedic civilization, dedication to charity, freedom from hypocrisy, service to the brahmanas and constant work to create wealth are the natural qualities of the vaisyas." (Bhagavata Purana, 11.17.18).

The duty of the sudra is very simple and only requires sincerity and loyalty to one's employer. It is important to understand that a sudra is not a slave, an outcaste or an untouchable (dalit or paria); sudras normally lived in the home of their employers as family members, but they were free to leave if they were not satisfied with their treatment, and sometimes they could be sent away if they did not behave properly. Although the Vedic system encourages individual evolution, sometimes people choose to indulge in lower and degrading tendencies and picking up bad habits, for example neglecting cleanliness or becoming greedy to the point of stealing, or cruel and insensitive towards people or animals. At this point the sudra falls to the level of anarya, and is dismissed from service and expelled from Vedic social life; he becomes a chandala or mleccha, that is outside the varna system, and therefore has no duties whatsoever.

The word paricarya means "working for others" and refers to employment or dependent work, including State/ Government servants of all levels; anyone who receives a salary for his work is a sudra. A kshatriya is an independent protector and does not take orders or salary from anyone because this would compromise his freedom in supporting dharma; he can accept gifts or tributes (taxes) from the people he protects and cares for, but only in a reasonable amount. A kshatriya can employ sudra soldiers in the army under his orders and take care for their maintenance, but their responsibilities and duties are different; they are not permanently on service but they simply respond the kshatriya's call in case of a major attack from the outside. They are private citizens who understand that the king needs help in defending their homes and families, and participate to the manoeuvres as best as they can, according to their abilities; these voluntary temporary fighters can come from all sections of society because every limb of the body is eager to help when the entire body is in danger, therefore sudras, vaisyas and even brahmanas can bear weapons and fight on the battlefield in case of emergency. But that does not make them kshatriyas, and they are not permanently organized as military forces like in modern societies, where army personnel get bored and restless when there is no war, or become lazy on the salaries paid by the government.

स्वे स्वे कर्मण्यभिरतः संसिद्धिं लभते नरः । स्वकर्मनिरतः सिद्धिं यथा विन्दति तच्छृणु ॥ १८-४५ ॥

sve sve karmanabhirataḥ saṁsiddhiṁ labhate naraḥ | svakarmanirataḥ siddhiṁ yathā vindati tacchṛṇu || 18-45 |

sve sve: each according to his own nature; karmani: activities; abhi rataḥ: following; saṁ siddhiṁ: complete perfection; labhate: obtains; naraḥ: a human being; sva karma: in one's specific duty; nirataḥ: engaged; siddhiṁ: perfection; yatha: as; vindati: attains; ta: that; srnu: listen.

"By engaging in the duties pertaining to his specific nature, a human being gradually attains perfection. Now listen how one can attain perfection through engagement in his specific duties.

The expression sve sve karmani indicates that each limb of the social body has very specific functions and should stick to the engagement in his particular duties according to the position that was assigned individually by the guru. The influence of rajas and tamas can push people to desire a different occupation because it seems to offer more advantages and less problems than the position they occupy, but that is simply illusion. An upgrade of varna is always possible, but it cannot be done whimsically; it requires a genuine gradual qualification and training in accordance to the established rules. A downgrade in the varna system is much easier, but it is not helping the personal evolution of the individual or the good functions of society; however it is preferable to step down to a less responsible position than to try to artificially occupy a professional place without fulfilling one's proper duties.

Especially in the genuine Vedic system, the higher position one occupies, the more duties and the more difficult and hard is the work, and the more sacrifices one is expected to make for the sake of society. Sudras may think that their vaiśya employer is having an easy life just giving orders while the farm hands are doing all the work, but they do not know anything about planning, coordinating, marketing, and managing. Left to their own devices, sudras would work as little as possible and enjoy and consume as much as possible, and would soon slide into bankruptcy and destitution, if not starvation. Of course the definition of sudra applies to the guna and karma of the individual, not to the birth or belonging to a sudra community, because it is certainly possible that sudra parents can give birth to a more talented child, who will rise to a higher social position by his own effort, even against all hardships. The socialist/ communist experiments in the last 300 years have demonstrated that inevitably more talented (and often more ruthless) individuals rise to fill the posts of command anyway, and in the absence of an ethical and scientific social system of evaluation of their qualifications, their personal power cannot be controlled by the rules and duties supporting a progressive evolution. So they become tyrants in their own way, and the people working under them are oppressed and exploited, often worse than in capitalistic systems, and nobody really makes much progress, because nobody is encouraged to take personal responsibility and become more qualified.

The word abhiratah means "sticking to, following", and indicates a type of attachment to one's duty that is actually selfless, a loyalty towards society, and a love and pride in one's work for its own sake. This approach brings a deep satisfaction and a feeling of happiness for a work well done, for the clean conscience of having properly contributed one's part for the common good. Since the prescribed duties for the professional categories are strongly based on ethical and progressive considerations, they constitute a valuable fail-safe protection against degradation and should always be respected in the best possible way. Of course this does not mean that there are no provisions for flexibility in the system. This brings us to the very important concept of apat (apad) dharmā, or "duties/ ethics in case of emergency". It is similar to the word anapadi, that indicates a social emergency or upheaval in which there is no qualified person to occupy a particular position, and the next best person must step up and take the place. The Vedic system is based on the fundamental ethical principles called conscience, and therefore it easily admits that in some circumstances it is better to follow the spirit than the letter of the law; dharmā is not a rigid set of commandments and taboos but a system of principles that support society, so it should be applied with intelligence according to the circumstances.

Chandogya Upanishad (1.10-12) offers the example of Ushasti son of Chakra, who was a purohita, a chief priest in sacrifices performed for kings and other twice born. Once traveling through a wild region during a serious shortage of food, he was able to find no food except a few cooked beans from the house of a chandala (outcaste) and he shared them with his wife because they were extremely hungry, however he refused the water that the chandala wanted to give him, because he could find purer water elsewhere. After simply taking a bath, he proceeded to his destination where he normally resumed his place as instructor and supervisor of the ritvika brahmanas engaged in the religious rituals to which he had been invited. Nobody objected saying that he had "lost his caste" and therefore he was not qualified any more to direct the yajna.

The brahmanas still have the responsibility of ascertaining the level of emergency and directing or endorsing the necessary actions; it is said: jaghanyo nottamam vrittim anapadi bhajen narah, rite rajanyam apatsu sarvesam api sarvasah, "A person with lower qualifications should not usurp a higher position for the sake of his own livelihood, but when there is no genuine king in charge, in the emergency created anyone can perform any other tasks - except for the kshatriya" (Bhagavata Purana, 7.11.17). The exception of the kshatriya in this verse means that in times of emergency or social upheaval, the work of the kshatriya is the most important and urgent in order to preserve and protect the prajas and the resources of the kingdom, so a kshatriya who abandons his duties in such circumstances to take up some other professional activity is a traitor to the kingdom. A kshatriya can also find himself in a situation of personal emergency - for example being exiled by some conspiracy, or being defeated in battle and left seriously injured on the battlefield while his opponent ascends the throne. In such cases he is allowed to take up the occupations of brahmanas (if he is qualified to teach something) or vaishyas (agriculture and cow protection) until such time when he can resume his normal duties again; only he cannot become a sudra, otherwise he will be lost (Bhagavata Purana, 11.17.48). Similarly, a brahmana can temporarily work as a kshatriya or a vaishya, but never become a sudra, a position that is considered the livelihood of a dog (sva vrittya, 11.17.47) as a house dog totally depends on the owner and is fully loyal to him, no ethical questions asked. A vaishya may take up some handicraft venture or get temporary employment as a sudra (11.17.49), until he gets the opportunity to return to his normal duties. The duties of each particular varna are engineered to challenge his abilities and progress in learning and realization, therefore it is possible that due to some difficulty or depression one can be tempted to take another position - a lower one for which he is overqualified and therefore does not require much effort, or a higher one for which he is even unable to understand what qualifications are required. This is why verse 18.47 will warn us that it is better to fail or die while engaging in our duties than to attain success in performing someone else's duties.

The word samsiddhi is a compound of sam + siddhi, indicating complete perfection, much like the word sanskrita (indicating Sanskrit language) is a compound of sam + kruta, indicating a complete system of expression. The complete perfection one can attain through the loyal and sincere performance of one's professional and social duties - i.e. proper work - increases one's learning (knowledge), character (sila, or behavior), intelligence, strength, wealth, position and religious merits (punya), so that one will get a better birth in the next life or even moksha (liberation). The word vindati ("increases") indicates the gradual attainment of perfection through a regular and continued effort.

यतः प्रवृत्तिर्भूतानां येन सर्वमिदं ततम् । स्वकर्मणा तमभ्यर्च्य सिद्धिं विन्दति मानवः ॥ १८-४६ ॥

yataḥ pravṛttirbhūtānāṃ yena sarvamidaṃ tatam | svakarmanā tamabhyarcya siddhiṃ vindati mānavaḥ || 18-46 ||

yataḥ: from which; pravṛttib: the creation/ engagement; bhutanam: of the beings; yena: by which; sarvam idam: all this (universe); tatam: is pervaded; sva karmana: by his own activities; tam: that/ him; abhyarçya: by worshiping; siddhim: perfection; vindati: attains; manavaḥ: a human being.

"By properly performing one's duties one is worshiping the Supreme from which all beings/ situations are created and engaged, and that pervades all this universe. This is how a human being can attain perfection.

The glory of the Vedic system is that it raises the human being to the level of bodily part of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, to become directly engaged as co-creator and co-controller, co-preserver and co-protector of the universe. This concept is unique to the Vedic tradition, as other dharmic and natural systems consider the human being simply as a part of creation, with the same rights of all other creatures but not more duties, while the adharmic systems consider the human being as the lord and owner of creation, with more rights (and no duties) compared to other creatures.

This is the reason why in Vedic tradition, and especially in the varna and ashrama system, the word dharmā is normally translated as "duty". This is also the reason why the dvi-ja (twice born) who are more responsible than the generic ordinary population of sudras are required to engage daily in religious rituals to associate with the Devas who have even higher responsibilities towards all creatures. So when a brahmana, kshatriya or vaisya is engaged in performing a homa (fire sacrifice) calling the Devas to partake of the abutis (oblations of clarified butter), he is actually engaged in a breakfast business meeting with his superiors - bonding with them and absorbing their qualities, and at the end of this human life he may move to their level and work directly with them.

The Devas, too, are limbs of the universal body (Virata Rupa), and occupy their positions precisely because of their absolute loyalty to their own duties; the fire never fails to burn, the wind never fails to blow, the sun never fails to rise, and death never fails to take his toll on a mortal body. All levels of consciousness, however, are coordinated by the supreme Consciousness, that includes all other individual consciousnesses and yet is greater than them all - just like the owner of the body includes the functions and consciousness of all the body cells and organs, yet he is more than the body. This was explicitly confirmed in verse 15.7: mamaivamso jiva loke jiva bhutah sanatanah, "The living being in this world is certainly a limb of my (body), and as such he is eternal."

At the universal level, this supreme Consciousness or Reality is called tattva, or more specifically, vishnu tattva, because it is the foundation and source of all power (vishnu means "powerful"). Here we must not be distracted by sectarian prejudice, because we would lose a golden opportunity to really understand life; Vishnu is not a separate Deity that can be opposed to Shiva, Durga, Brahma, or other Personalities of Godhead, although we see that in their avatara lila, the various Personalities interact in amazing ways. Actually, all such Personalities are one Reality, one supreme Consciousness, that is called Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan: avadanti tat tattva vidad, tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti, bhagavan iti sadyate, "Those who know the tattva declare that tattva is undivided Knowledge, variously called Brahman, Paramatma, and Bhagavan" (Bhagavata Purana 1.2.11). The Godhead is described as knowledge (jnana) and reality (tattva), as well as undivided (advayam); God is therefore the sum total of all being and knowledge/ consciousness, and although it remains undivided, it manifests innumerable forms and names to express all the immense variety of qualities and functions. It is already impossible to comprehend all these aspects of God that are manifested in this single universe (Virata Rupa), so we can understand how foolish must be the arrogance of someone who claims they fully know the Supreme Reality in the spiritual world, that is non-manifested and therefore impossible to even imagine for minds that function within time-space parameters.

After clarifying this point, we can safely state that all the members of the varna system should actually perform their professional duties sincerely and devotedly, considering them as the most fundamental act of worship to Vishnu, the sum total of all Consciousness: atah pumbhir dvija srestha varnasrama vibhagasah, svanusthitasya dharmasya samsiddhir hari tosanam, "The categories of varnas and ashramas and their specific prescribed duties constitute perfection (of human life) because they please Vishnu" (Bhagavata Purana, 1.2.13), varnasramacara vata purusena parab puman, visnur aradhyate pantha nanyat tat tosa karanam, "A human being who performs the duties of the varna-ashrama system is worshiping the supreme Personality of Godhead, Vishnu. There is no other way for satisfaction" (Vishnu Purana 3.8.9). The satisfaction mentioned in this verse of Vishnu Purana refers both to pleasing the Supreme and to pleasing the atman, as the two are closely connected.

The word yatah at the beginning of the verse is a declination of the pronoun yah, "that", indicating the Supreme. The word pravritti contains the meanings of "creation, emanation, engagement, work, development", and connected to the word bhutanam ("of all beings") obviously refers to the supreme continuum of reality that is the source of the manifestation and the activities of all beings. We can continue the microcosmic comparison with the body cells, by remembering that it is the atman, the original unchangeable being living in the body, that creates all the body cells by developing tissues and organs gradually, beginning from conception, and sustains all the cells for the entire duration of the body, and then destroys the body by leaving it in accordance to his evolutionary journey. Since the atman is consciousness, he is present everywhere in the body (yena sarvam idam tatam, 2.17), and service to him is the purpose of all the cells and organs.

Similarly in a larger macrocosmic scale, God as the sum total of Consciousness is all pervading, the origin of all creatures and the purpose of their engagement: janmady asya yato 'nnyad itaratas carthesv abhijnah svarat, tene brahma brda ya adi karaye mubhyanti yat surayah, tejo vari mrdam yatha vinimayo yatra tri sargo 'mrta, dhamna svena sada nirasta kurbakam satyam param dhimahi, "I offer my respect to Bhagavan Vasudeva, from whom the creation/ birth etc of this (universe, body, manifestation) proceeds. He is fully independent, fully conscious of purpose, directly and indirectly. He inspired the supreme Consciousness of Brahman in the heart of the first poet (Brahma). His nature/ existence/ energy of illusion overpowers even the suras (devas and rishis), (just like) with the optical illusions created by heat, water and earth. In this way by action and reaction he always manifests himself as the 'almost reality' of the three creations and all their objects/ places of existence. I meditate on (him), the supreme truth, always self-sufficient, of whom illusion is just the absence of perception." (Bhagavata Purana 1.1.1).

The word pravritti ("engagement") is also connected to abhyaraya ("worshiping"), as the worship itself consists in dutifully engaging in the activities that are suitable to one's nature. This is the origin of the famous saying, "work is worship", also characteristic of the Hindu tradition. The fact that God is all-pervading (yena sarvam idam tatam) means that everyone can remember and worship God at any time and in any place, and in any activity: yat karosi yad asnasi yaj juhosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kurusva mad arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me" (9.27). This attitude will align our consciousness perfectly with the supreme Consciousness, so that there is no more difference in purpose: yajnarthat karmamo 'nyatra loko 'yam karma bandhanah, tad artham karma kaunteya mukta sangah samacara, "Actions must be performed as sacrifice, otherwise in this world they cause bondage. Therefore you should perform your activities for that (purpose of sacrifice), remaining free from (material) association." (3.9).

Because there is no difference in purpose, there will be no negative effects: brahmany adbhaya karmani sangam tyaktva karoti yah, lipyate na sa papena padma patram ivambhasa, "Dedicating all activities to the Brahman, giving up all material identification and association, one is never affected by the negative consequences of bad action, just like a lotus leaf is never affected by water." (5.10). This will be confirmed at the conclusion of this chapter (18.65). This is the traditional ancient system, by which the great personalities of the past attained perfection: karmanaiva hi samsiddhim asthita janakadayah, "Janaka and others like him became situated in perfection through the performance of their duties." (3.20)

श्रेयान्स्वधर्मो विगुणः परधर्मात्स्वनुष्ठितात् । स्वभावनियतं कर्म कुर्वन्नाप्नोति किल्बिषम् ॥ १८-४७ ॥

śreyānsvadharmo viguṇaḥ paradharmātsvanuṣṭhitāt | svabhāvanīyatam karma kurvannāpnoti kilbiṣam || 18-47 |

sreyan: better; sva dharmah: one's specific duty; viguṇah: not perfect; para dharmat: than the duty of someone else; sv anuṣṭhitat: followed perfectly; sva bhava nīyatam: prescribed according to one's specific nature; karma: activities; kurvan: performing; na āpnoti: does not achieve; kilbiṣam: fault.

"It is better to engage in one's specific duty, even imperfectly, than following the duties of others in a perfect way. One's duties are prescribed according to one's specific nature, and engaging in them is the right thing to do."

We have seen an almost identical verse in the chapter on Karma yoga: sreyan sva dharmo viguṇaḥ para dharmat sv anuṣṭhitat, sva dharme nidhanam sreyah para dharmo bhayavahah, "It is better to perform one's own duty even with some imperfections or mistakes, or even if this means meeting with death or destruction, rather than successfully engaging in the duties of others - which is a dangerous choice" (3.35). This idea can be (and has been) misinterpreted by foolish and ignorant people who remain unable to understand the particular nature of each individual, and confuse it with the circumstances of his birth. So this verse has been desecrated by fake brahmins to mistreat and insult innumerable genuine Satyakamas and to prevent them from pursuing the proper education and engagement in dharmic duties that they desired so strongly, while the duty of the brahmana should have been to purify, elevate and train sincere souls who wanted to progress, even from the lowest level (Rig Veda 2.22.2). It is difficult to calculate the amount of negative reactions to such gross dereliction of duty, arrogance and cruelty, but we can see the results all around us.

Krishna has already explained very clearly that each particular position and its duties are assigned specifically according to the individual's guna and karma, and are not automatically hereditary. We have elaborated on this point several times already in previous commentaries, but one should see that Krishna's statement is clear enough on its own when he speaks of a specific individual nature. As the popular saying goes, if it walks like a duck and quacks like a duck, it cannot be something else, even if it was found in a place very different from a duck nest. This is called vrśika tanduli nyaya, "the logic of the scorpion and the rice"; it is said that sometimes scorpions lay their eggs inside a mound of rice to take advantage of the warmth of the grains that are drying up, so when the eggs hatch, it appears that the little animals were born from rice grains, while in fact the rice was simply the host. Of course when degradation spreads and brahmanas become corrupted by tamas and rajas, those endorsed by them as brahmanas will be even less qualified generation after generation, until adharmā becomes normally presented as dharmā (18.31, 18.32). This is the true root cause of the degradation of Hindu civilization, where many misguided people present the gross identification with the material body (casteism, racism, sexism, etc) as the highest form of dharmā and religious duty, that overrides all considerations of ethics and intelligence and even the direct observation of the actual guna and karma and realizations of the individual. A very clear example is the life of Salabega, a very famous pure devotee who loved Jagannatha very much and was very dear to the Lord, and whose songs are universally recognized as the highest standard of bhakti and sung by one and all in Puri and Orissa. Yet, simply because of his birth Salabega was always treated like an outcaste, insulted, beaten and barred from ever entering the temple for public darshana, his house was torched and he was denied access to the crematorium for the funeral of his mother - a disgraceful persecution that is still considered with pride by the brahmins in Puri as a demonstration of "purity" in the temple standards. We could make thousands of similar examples from the history of the last 500 years and also from contemporary news especially in Orissa, Bihar, Haryana, Uttar Pradesh in India, although casteism is becoming increasingly obsolete especially in big cities where the westernization of society and culture has moved the focus of social prejudice and injustice to financial considerations and political positions rather than religious privilege.

Some people resent what they call "brahmin bashing", claiming that the higher castes (which are actually artificial and irrelevant ethnic subdivisions of the general brahmin caste) have been and are still grievously mistreated and unjustly discriminated. However, they are not taking any proactive measure to improve the situation, thus demonstrating that they are deeply immersed in tamas (18.35, 18.32, 18.39, 18.28, 18.25, 18.22, 14.13, 14.8, 14.17) and therefore unqualified for the elevated position of brahmana they want to occupy and the attending rights they are demanding. Instead of blaming others, recriminating, complaining, whining and dreaming, they should start really performing their duties and work actively and fearlessly to purify themselves and the entire society from avidya and adharmā. For example, many of these fake brahmins are very attached to non vegetarian foods (the ordinary type, purchased on the market) and to silence their own guilty subconscious, they regularly attack and insult those who propagate the knowledge of the benefits of vegetarianism. Also, fake brahmins are generally characterized by hatred and spite for women, and many of them are ferociously "anti-feminists", a persuasion that goes from justifying rape ("boys will be boys"), to beating and torturing their own wives and other female family members or congregation members, encouraging the mistreatment, suppression and elimination of girl children, and enjoying and circulating offensive jokes and vignettes that portray women in humiliating and degrading ways.

For a brahmin who wants to become a brahmana, a good first step consists in actually studying, understanding and applying the instructions of the shastra in one's own life, developing his qualities as described in scriptures and especially in Bhagavad gita (2.46, 17.23, 18.42, etc), verifying his own realizations and improving the general culture of society by engaging in public debates in support of dharma and vidya, and sincerely (without cutting corners for materialistic selfish purposes) performing the traditional karmas (dutiful activities, ritual ceremonies) starting from suddhi, prayascitta and vrata for themselves and for those who wish to engage in the Vedic way of life. Then he should continue by sincerely understanding and observing all the samskaras and elevating his own consciousness and the consciousness of others through example and precept, observing and teaching the practices of yama and niyama and properly training the other members of society (according to the individual guna and karma) for the positions of kshatriyas and vaishyas. If he chooses not to do that, he does not deserve any respect, even if externally he may present himself as a great religionist. The Vishnu dharma shastra (93.7) states, na vary api prayacchet tu vaidala-vratike dvije na baka-vratike vipre naveda vidi dharma-vit, "Those who know dharma should never give even a drop of water to the hypocritical son of a brahmana who has not studied Vedic knowledge but follows the vow of the duck or the vow of the cat". The baka vrata ("the vow of the duck") is that of one who always looks down in order to make a show of humility and does sadhana for the purpose of earning money, but is cruel, arrogant and usually tells lies. The vaidala vrata ("vow of the cat") is shown by one who is externally proud of his religious position (dharma dhwaji) but is in fact a hypocrite, a greedy, envious, hateful, violent person, indulging in slandering innocent people.

When social and professional roles are assigned by a qualified guru, a person's leaving his prescribed duty for another position, without any real emergency, can be explained as a whimsical movement of the restless mind, that can only create problems to the individual and to society: indriyasya indriyasya arthe raga dvesau vyavasthitau, tayo na vasam agacchet tau hy asya paripanthinau, "Attraction and aversion are ordained to result from the interaction of the senses with the objects of the senses; one should not fall under the control of either of them, because they are both to be considered as obstacles on the path of the performance of duty" (3.34).

The word vigunah means "incomplete, with bad qualities, without much value, not interesting", and refers exactly to the negative emotions of a person who is facing depression and a fall in self esteem due to some temporary difficulty. When a person is not educated and trained properly, he will become more vulnerable to anxiety and insecurity, because he has no clear vision of the situation. At the opposite side, we have the expression su anusthita, meaning "very well done, more attractive", which shifts the focus from the social importance of the activity to the narcissistic complacency for the action itself or the social position it seems to offer. The guru is supposed to help the disciple developing this clear vision (darshana), starting from the real identity of the self (atman), the meaning of dharma, artha, kama and moksha, and the appropriate method to apply them in one's life through yoga as explained by Krishna in Bhagavad gita. The word killbisam means "stain, offense, contamination, bad reaction", as in verses 3.13, 4.21, 6.45; this indicates that in the sincere performance of one's duties there could still be some imperfections and failures, but one should not take them too seriously.

On a deeper spiritual level, the word viguna has been interpreted as nirguna, signifying that one should continue to perform the assigned duties even after having transcended the material qualities of nature (3.18, 3.22, 3.23, 3.24, 3.25, 4.14, 4.20, 4.21, 4.23, 4.24, 9.9, 17.26) because in this world everyone must continue to work until the end of the body (3.4, 3.8, 5.2, 18.9). Similarly, the expressions sva dharma and para dharma are applied respectively to the atman and the non-atman, that is the material composing the mind, the senses and the body. In this respect, we would like to highlight the fact that there is a difference between para (no long a) and para (long final a); the first means "other" and the second means "superior" as in para prakriti (long a).

सहजं कर्म कौन्तेय सदोषमपि न त्यजेत् । सर्वारम्भा हि दोषेण धूमेनाग्निरिवावृताः ॥ १८-४८ ॥

sahajam karma kaunteya sadoṣamapi na tyajet | sarvārambhā hi doṣeṇa dhūmenāgnirivāṛitāḥ || 18-48 ||

saha jam: born at the same time; karma: activities; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; sa dosam: together with some fault; api: although; na tyajet: one should not abandon; sarva arambha: all enterprises; hi: indeed; dosena: with some fault; dhumena: by smoke; agnih: fire; iva: similarly; avritah: covered.

"O son of Kunti, one should not abandon the duties pertaining to one's own congenital nature, even if they seem to be imperfect, because all activities are bound to have some defect, just like fire is covered by smoke."

The expression saha jam ("born at the same time") refers to the guna and karma carried by the individual at the time of his birth, and that can be ascertained by a good astrologer by examining the exact time and place of birth; for this reason astrology (Jyotisha Veda) is considered a direct and important part of Vedic literature. In ancient times every newborn had his or her horoscope immediately cast by a trusted astrologer, so that the parents could adjust the early stages of education.

In genuinely qualified brahmana families, all the members always maintain a high standard of spiritual consciousness, mental purity, good behavior and clear knowledge of dharma and vidya, and thus they create a specially favorable environment; with the garbhadaṇa samskara the womb of the mother is purified through spiritual and religious impressions, so at the time of conception the high level of consciousness of the parents will likely attract an evolved soul. Any negative influence can bring disastrous results, as exemplified by the inauspicious circumstances of the pregnancy of Diti, the wife of Kasyapa Rishi and mother of the great asuras Hiranyaksha and Hiranyakasipu. Again, here we must remember that birth is something that applies to the person who is born, not to his parents or family; the one who takes birth is the subject of the action. It is easy to verify this point by comparing specific qualities - intellectual capacity or the strength of one's ethical sense but especially professional talents or abilities - between siblings or even between child and parents, where irregularity or discordance are the actual norm and not the exception: how many mathematical geniuses, for example, come from families where everybody shares the same trait? Therefore the duties one acquires by birth are those activities that are related to one's own congenital characteristics, that may be quite different from those of one's parents or family members, especially if the parents have neglected to control their level of consciousness during intercourse - in which case any type of person can take birth, as the sexual act in itself is exactly the same for all varnas and indeed for all human beings.

In any case, during the pregnancy and at birth several more samskaras are performed to raise and purify the level of consciousness of the fetus, that is still very impressionable and submissive to learning. After the astrological evaluation of the guna and karma of the child, the family can remedy a bad situation with extra rituals and spiritual/ religious activities and so on, besides the customary samskaras that continue up to the age of 5, when the child is sent to the gurukula. One of the main rituals is the annaprasana, marking the start of the weaning process at the completion of 6 months of age and consisting in feeding the child with his first cooked grains; during this ceremony the child is shown various articles symbolizing different tendencies (guna and karma) such as books, working tools, money, an image of a Deity, weapons, and so on. The child will normally be attracted by one article more than by the others, and this is taken as a broad indication for his education.

However, a child below 2 years of age (sisu) does not undergo any specific training or moral teaching and is free to do whatever s/he wants; there is never any punishment for "bad actions" because such a small child cannot really understand it. After the second or third birthday the child (bala) is gradually taught whatever possible by his/ her family members, and at the age of 5 he is usually sent to the residential school; there, too, he is considered just a child and allowed lots of freedom and leniency until the age of 12. A boy older than 12 years is called kumara and becomes subjected to an increasingly strict discipline by the guru, stage by stage: he is called keśora until his 15th birthday and taruna until his 19th birthday, after which he is known as yauvana. These definitions are used to establish their specific duties.

Not all the students in the gurukula will be able to endure the increasing pressure, so usually sudras are dismissed at the age of 12 after learning the fundamentals of dharmā and achara, vaiśyas graduate at the age of 15, kṣatriyas at the age of 19 and brahmanas can be trained up to the age of 25, after which they need to marry and begin their work in society. During this training period, the individual can rise much higher than the original position at birth, but the purpose of the training is not to move the student to a higher varna than what was indicated by his birth chart, but rather to help him develop his potential in accordance to dharmā and vidyā, and learn how to perform all the duties prescribed for his particular nature, and which will be comfortable for him. After attaining perfection in those duties one can start training in stricter duties for further evolution. It is important to understand that the higher varnas have proportionately more stringent duties and less opportunities for enjoyment - up to the brahmanas, whose sustenance should be obtained by collecting discarded grains in the fields after the harvest or from the bags of merchants in the market (jayavara silonchanam vipra vrittib, Bhagavata Purana 7.11.16) and should always live in simplicity and austerity, without indulging in sense gratification.

The expression saha jam ("born with") is elegantly balanced with the symmetrical expression sa dosam ("with defects"), indicating that in the beginning any enterprise or work appears difficult and imperfect, but one should not be discouraged by a poor performance or even by failure. This is why we need to practice our duties regularly (sadbhāva) to improve ourselves. No job is perfect or easy or completely pleasant, as there will be tedious and even unpleasant, dangerous and painful moments, yet one should never give up: this is the only way we can attain perfection (samsiddhi).

The example of the fire covered by smoke (dhūmena agnih avritā) is amazingly beautiful. When we start a fire (especially by friction, as it was done in ancient times) the smoke is the first thing we see, then a small flame pops out, and when properly fed with the suitable fuel, a nice crackling fire appears; then we can put some bigger load of wood and finally everything is consumed to embers and ashes. So in the beginning of one's training there will be mostly difficulties and discomfort (yat tad agre viśam iva pariname 'mritopamam, "happiness that seems like poison in the beginning but becomes nectar in the end", 18.37) especially if we did not make any practice in previous lifetimes (6.41-6.45). Before making good progress, we need to burn away a good amount of impurities that cloud our vision and encrust our good will, and that makes a lot of stinking smoke.

Then one fine day we suddenly get some amazing realization, like a small flame popping out apparently from nowhere, and we start to see the light; from that time, our desire to improve and progress gets warmer and brighter and the fire is burning. All the good things (study, austerity, charity, rituals, etc) we offer in the fire make it brighter, until our light can be seen from far and wide, and nothing can stop the fire of our realization and consciousness. Finally, when the process is completed, all the fuel has been digested and absorbed into a glowing and stable awareness that can remain hot for a very long time without any further feeding, and that can instantly kindle other consciousness fires just by contact. Applied to the evolution of the individual from one level of duties to another, the embers of stable consciousness are then fed with a different and purer quality of fuel - such as gṛhi or camphor, for example, exemplifying pure transcendental consciousness - that gives the fire different functions, shifting gradually from heat to light, until only light remains.

We have already clarified the difference between dharmā and adharma, one described as sat or daivi and the other as asat or asuri; therefore when we speak of sva dharmā that is following one's sva bhava, that never applies to asurim bhava, because there can be no such thing as criminal dharmā. Therefore a person who was born in a disadvantaged situation, in a degraded family or community, should be helped in all possible ways if he wants to purify and elevate himself. True, he was born in that situation because of his past karma, but bad karma is not absolute and eternal and can be changed at any moment simply by engaging in positive karma or actions, or even simply by accepting transcendental knowledge (2.39, 2.50, 2.51, 3.9, 3.31, 4.14, 4.19, 4.20, 4.23, 4.37, 4.41, 9.28).

Similarly, we need to remain conscious about dharma and vidya in all social and professional positions; a sudra can refuse to carry out the orders of a bad adharmic master, and in fact he should abandon him to find better employment. Anyone can and should observe whether the vaishyas and especially the kshatriyas (and even the brahmanas) are engaged in adharmic actions; for the protection of the entire society the genuine brahmanas should admonish, reform or if necessary even remove such unqualified leaders. Returning to the example of the smoke covering the fire in the early stages: smoke does not make the fire impure but it can kill you if you are in a closed environment and you keep breathing it - that is, if you remain attached to your bad habits and qualities, or if you continue to perform toxic activities either by your own deliberation or by someone else's orders.

We have also explained that the importance of remaining loyal to one's prescribed duties is based on the fact that such duties are specifically and scientifically engineered for the evolution of the individual, and not for his material profit, comfort and success. People are very eager to discuss about their own rights (or what they perceive to be their rights, sometimes incorrectly) and not so eager to discuss about their duties; if you try to bring the issue to the table they get offended and do their worst to take revenge overtly or covertly, again demonstrating their utter lack of qualifications. Krishna has stated many times that one should perform one's duties sincerely and at the best of one's abilities, but without being attached to the success and failure in any specific action (2.38, 2.48, 3.35, 4.22, 16.15, 18.26), therefore it should be clear that the purpose of engagement is learning, not merely obtaining a material result. Learning and evolving have an eternal value as we carry them from one lifetime to the next, while the material attainments in this world are always very temporary and therefore have little meaning in themselves; they rarely make us better persons, and without a higher evolution of consciousness in the members of society, all the technological achievements will fail to procure happiness because they are likely to be misused and cause more problems than solutions.

असक्तबुद्धिः सर्वत्र जितात्मा विगतस्पृहः । नैष्कर्म्यसिद्धिं परमां संन्यासेनाधिगच्छति ॥ १८-४९ ॥

asaktabuddhiḥ sarvatra jītātmā vigataspr̥haḥ । naiṣkarmyasiddhiṁ paramāṁ san̥nyāsenādhigacchati ।। 18-49।।

asakta buddhiḥ: with detached intelligence; sarvatra: in all circumstances; jīta atma: with self control; vigata sprihaḥ: having abandoned the attachment to contact; naiskarmya siddhiḥ: the perfection of naiskarma; paramam: supreme; sannyasena: by renunciation; adhigacchati: one attains.

"One attains the supreme perfection of naiskarma through sannyasa, that is detached intelligence applied to all circumstances, (and also) establishing self control and giving up all association.

Krishna has already discussed the meaning of sannyasa in several verses (3.4, 3.30, 4.41, 5.3, 5.6, 5.13, 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.4, 6.38, 8.11, 9.28, 12.6) and then again on the request of Arjuna in chapter 18 he elaborates on the difference between sannyasa and tyaga (18.1 to 18.12). Also, chapter 5 was completely dedicated to Sannyasa yoga. From all these instructions we can understand that the act of renunciation in itself, as in the sannyasa ashrama, has different value and results depending on the consciousness and motivations.

A superficial external renunciation devoid of real realization will not bring good results (3.4) but only sufferings (5.6) because nobody can ever stop acting (3.5) as long as the body continues to live. So the real sannyasi is one who performs his prescribed duties in society without being bound by ahankara and mamatra (5.3, 5.13, 12.6, 18.5, 18.6, 18.7, 18.9, 18.10, 18.11), not the one who does not kindle the fire and remains officially without a job and a family (6.1).

Therefore we must carefully distinguish when the word sannyasa is used in the superficial sense or in the true sense. The key to understand the true meaning of sannyasa as the path to moksha is found at the beginning of this verse in the expression asakta buddhiḥ sarvatra, that can be translated as "using intelligence to remain detached in all circumstances" as we have seen in so many previous verses. In fact, the central focus of Bhagavad gita is Buddhi yoga (although there is no specific chapter entitled to it), the awakened consciousness that enables us to remain connected and united through detachment. It sounds like a contradiction, but we can consider the example of a father who has many children: he can remain connected to all of them only if he is detached from their differences, mistakes, characteristics or appearances but maintains an equal approach. The moment he becomes attached to one of them, he will lose focus on the others, and ultimately he will also lose the object of his attachment, because attachment is not love.

The expression jīta atma is also very interesting; it means "having conquered oneself". Just like the word sannyasa can be used at different levels, the word atma can refer to the soul (atman, jivatman) or to one's mind, senses or even to the body. All the different meanings remain valid because people who are situated on different levels of personal evolution need to relate to the self and renunciation according to their particular capabilities. So at the beginning of the path of yoga, one needs to start controlling his own body and senses (yama, niyama, asana, pranayama) and then he becomes able to control the mind (dharana, dhyana, samadhi). On the level of samadhi, the atman is conquered in the sense that the yogi has won the greatest prize: the direct perception and realization of his transcendental identity. And then he can engage in purely spiritual work (18.54).

Similarly, on the neophyte level one needs to take the external motions of accepting the order of sannyasa and following the strict rules and regulations, that are like crutches for the development of one's consciousness - a journey that usually takes many lifetimes (7.19). The regulated practice of renunciation will create a positive habit (18.37) and shape the mind into sattva and finally visuddha sattva; on that level one can engage in any varna or ashrama and perform the attending duties without being touched by any contamination, as Krishna will clearly state at the conclusion of the chapter (18.66).

This brings us to the next interesting expression of the verse - vigata spriha. Some commentators translate "without hankering/ without aspirations", but the literal meaning is "contacting/ touching completely gone". We have seen it in verses 2.56 (vigata spriha), 2.71 (nihsprihah), 4.14 (na me spriha), 6.18 (nihsprihah), and in a negative sense in 14.12. The word spriha is closely related to sparsa ("contact"), as we have seen in previous verses: matra sparsas tu kaunteya sitosna sukha dukkha dah, "the contact of the senses (with the sense objects) causes joy and distress just like cold and heat" (2.14); ye hi samsparsa ja bhoga dukkha yonaya eva te, "Those pleasures that derive from contact (with the sense objects) are the cause for future sorrow" (5.22); sparsan keritva bahir, "keeping the objects of contact outside" (5.27); sukhena brahma samsparsam, "s/he easily remains in contact with Brahman" (6.28).

Several previous verses mentioned siddhi or samsiddhi (18.45, 18.46, but also 3.20, 8.15, 12.10, 14.1); specifically, verse 3.4 stated: na karmanam anarambhan naiskarmyam puruso 'snute, na ca sannyasanad eva siddhim samadhyagacchati, "A person cannot achieve freedom from karma by abstaining from action, just like perfection cannot be achieved simply through sannyasa." How can we reconcile verse 3.4 with the present verse claiming that one attains the supreme perfection of niskarma through sannyasa (naiskarmya-siddhim paramam sannyasena adhyagacchati)? Simply by remembering that the word sannyasa can have a lower or neophyte level, and a higher or transcendental level, as we were discussing on the meaning of the expression jita atma.

Here Krishna clearly establishes that the meaning of the word in the particular verse is verified by the presence of detached intelligence in all circumstances (asakta buddhi sarvatra), genuine mastery of the self (jita atma) and true detachment from all identifications and associations (vigata spriha). As long as a sannyasi does not have these symptoms, he will not attain the supreme perfection of niskarma. For a person who has attained that perfection, there is no more duty to perform: yas tv atma ratir eva syad atma triptas ca manava, atmany eva ca santustas tasya karyam na vidyate, "A human being who loves the Self certainly becomes satisfied in the Self and peaceful within the Self: for such a person there is no need to perform any action" (3.17).

सिद्धिं प्राप्तो यथा ब्रह्म तथाप्नोति निबोध मे । समासेनैव कौन्तेय निष्ठा ज्ञानस्य या परा ॥ १८-५० ॥

siddhim prāpto yathā brahma tathāpnōti nibodha me | samāsenaiva kaunteya niṣṭhā jñānasya yā parā || 18-50 ||

siddhim: perfection; praptah: achieved; yatha: similarly; brahma: Brahman; tatha: also; apnoti: achieves; nibodha: you should understand; me: from me; samasena: in brief; eva: certainly; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; nistha: established position; jnanasya: of the knowledge; ya: which; para: supreme/ transcendental.

"O son of Kunti, you should understand from me that once (this) perfection is obtained, one attains Brahman. In brief, certainly this realization is the supreme knowledge.

The perfection to which this verse refers consists in performing the activities of one's duties with complete dedication in service to the Supreme, and without any selfish motivation, attachment or identification (see the previous verse, 18.49). When one is firmly situated in this consciousness (nistha), all positions in the universe are instantly transformed into pure devotional service, because Brahman is everywhere and in everything (sarvatra). At this level the separation between matter and spirit loses importance because everything is ultimately spirit (Brahman). This is an advanced understanding of Reality - just like in elementary arithmetics we are taught that you cannot subtract a larger number from a smaller number, but in advanced algebra we learn that the opposite is true, too. This is the reason why we need the direct and personal guidance of a realized guru, who is established on a higher level (nistha) from which s/he can see how the two apparent opposites can easily be reconciled, and how the teaching method should proceed gradually according to the understanding of the student.

The Vedic system offers a variety of approaches to the same fundamental path of Yoga, where the word Yoga defines the essence of spirituality and religion as explained abundantly in the many chapters of Bhagavad gita. In this sense, Yoga is not simply one of the darshanas of Vedic tradition, but it is Vedic tradition itself - its essence, meaning, root, source and foundation. The karma kanda (Purva mimamsa) is Karma yoga, the jnana kanda (Uttara mimamsa) is Jnana yoga, the Sankhya system is Sankhya yoga, Nyaya is Buddhi yoga and Vijnana yoga, Vaisheshika philosophy is Vibhuti yoga and Visvarupa darshana yoga, and there are even more darshanas in Bhagavad gita - such as the Taraka brahma yoga, Sannyasa yoga and Moksha yoga, that go even beyond the scriptures and seek realization from the direct contemplation of the atman/ brahman.

This is the real, immense, liberating contribution of Bhagavad gita, offered from age to age (4.1) to the human kind as an essential integration to all methods of study. Bhagavad gita is not meant to affirm the sectarian superiority of the formal worship or sentimentalist devotion of one particular God - Krishna - as opposed to "the demigods", or to preach an exclusive path of formal renunciation and absenteeism from the "illusory things of the world".

Through Bhagavad gita, Krishna teaches us that we are all, directly and indirectly, limbs of the Supreme Purusha (Purushottama, chapter 15, who is the source of Brahman, 14.27) and as such we have duties in this universe by which we can contribute to the happiness and progress of the entire body. This devotional service is the key to our individual evolution and to the establishment of a perfect society where each individual is supported, protected, engaged and cared for, each and everyone comfortably enough for their particular guna and karma but with just the sufficient pressure to make efforts to improve, and where the human potential can bloom in its full splendor and glory. This is true Yoga.

The first part of the verse is focused on the symmetry of yatha-tatha, that means "at the same time, in the same way", and connects perfection (siddhi) with Brahman, the supreme Consciousness that encompasses all Reality. This is the final stage (nistha) of renunciation (sannyasa) and liberation (moksha), the subject of this chapter. We have already elaborated on the fact that Brahman (Paramatma, Bhagavan) is the reality of consciousness or knowledge (tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, Bhagavata Purana, 1.2.11) and that the jivatmans are his parts or limbs (amsa, 15.7).

Everything wonderful and beautiful in this world is manifested by a part of the radiance of this Brahman (tejo amsa sambhavam, 10.41), as the Bhagavata Purana further explains: etan nanavataranm nidhanam bijam avyayam, yasyamsena sriyante deva tiryan naradayah, "From these many avatars (Karanodakasayi Vishnu, Garbhodakasayi Vishnu, Kshirodakasayi Vishnu) come the indestructible seed (the anu atman, aham bija pradam, 14.4) that manifests all existences such the devas, the animals, the human beings and all other creatures" (1.3.5). These three subsequent forms of Vishnu are called purusha avatars ("manifestations of the personal principle of consciousness in this world"); the first is also called Narayana ("the shelter of human beings") that is sleeping (sayi) immersed in yoga nidra or maha maya in the Karana ("causes") udaka ("ocean") also called the mahat tattva brahman, and at each one of his breath cycles all the innumerable universes are created and destroyed. Then a svamsa ("complete/ united part") enters each of these universes and rests (sayi) on the Garbha ("embryo") udaka ("ocean"), giving birth through his navel to Hiranyagarbha ("the golden embryo" or "the golden egg") that is Brahma, the first creature and creator of each universe.

Simultaneously, Narayana also manifests in a localized form in prapanchika vaikuntha, a duplicate Vaikuntha planet (or dimension) within this universe - a sort of embassy of Vaikuntha in the material world - and therefore he is called Kshira ("milk") udaka ("ocean") sayi ("reclining"). This Vishnu abode in the ocean of milk is the island Trikuta ("three mountains") also called Svetadvipa ("the white island") and Dhruvaloka or the polar star, around which all the other stars and planet circle; here Brahma and the Devas can approach Vishnu for help in the protection of the universe. Since the number of universes is unlimited, there are certainly many of these svamsa avatars in the material manifestation; from these emanate all the jivatmans or anu atmans, that are the seeds of life and consciousness, beginning as small atoms that incarnate in the world in order to evolve.

बुद्ध्या विशुद्धया युक्तो धृत्यात्मानं नियम्य च । शब्दादीन्विषयांस्त्यक्त्वा रागद्वेषौ व्युदस्य च ॥ १८-५१ ॥

buddhyā viśuddhayā yukto dhṛtyātmānaṁ niyamya ca | śabdādīnviṣayāṁstyaktvā rāga dveṣau vyudasya ca || 18-51 ||

buddhya: with intelligence; visuddhaya: completely purified; yukta: engaged; dhṛitya: with determination; atmanam: the self; niyamya: regulating; ca: and; śabda adin: beginning from sound; viṣayan: the sense objects; tyaktva: giving up; raga dveṣau: both attraction and repulsion; vyudasya: putting aside; ca: and.

"By engaging the self with determination and a completely purified intelligence, and by following the prescribed method, and also by letting go all the sense objects, beginning with the sounds, as well as attraction and repulsion,

Intelligence (buddhi) is the key and the instrument to attain true success both on the material level (in dharmā, artha, kāma, mokṣa, brought about by sattva, 14.16) and on the spiritual level as well; however, in order to remain on the spiritual level (nistha) one's intelligence must be completely purified, and therefore rise above material sattva. The word visuddha ("completely purified") is also used to refer to that level of sattva ("goodness") that is not contaminated by any material consideration, therefore the visuddha buddhi is beyond material intelligence and constitutes the highest possible position from which we can realize the absolute Truth - Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan Purushottama. Of course the expression can also mean "purified by intelligence", as when intelligence is pure, the consciousness is not covered by contamination. .

Other commentators have explained that visuddha buddhi means anatmani atma buddhi nirvṛtan, "the termination of thinking as self what is not the self", or in other words, abandoning the root delusion of material identification (abhikāra and māmatva). The process of purification requires determination (dhṛiti) because one needs to sincerely follow the proper method and its rules (niyama) and abandon all the attachment, attraction and repulsion towards the sense objects. This is not a one-time choice, but a daily repeated process, because as long as we have a material body, our material senses and material mind will be subject to the power of the guṇas (18.40) and to the waves and movements of their interactions.

The purpose of Yoga is to become detached from such waves and movements, raising our consciousness above the ocean of material existence, so that our mind is not disturbed any more by these vṛttis. This is only possible when the mind is strongly focused on the transcendental contemplation of atman/ brahman.

Some people try to meditate "on the void", foolishly thinking that the purpose of Yoga is to become "liberated from the mind", but that is delusion; if they seem to succeed, it is because they have immersed their consciousness in tamas, so nothing moves there but only because of inertia and forgetfulness, just like in the minds of a lobotomized human being or a less evolved creature such as a plant or a rock. We need to follow the proper method (niyamya) in meditation, because mere fantasy and speculation will not have the same effect as a sincere and dedicated application of the genuine scientific system. The word yukta is from the very same root of the word yoga, and indicates "union, connection, engagement, relationship, control, regulation"; we can better understand the meaning of Yoga by applying all these particular meanings to our sādhana.

The expression śabda adin, meaning "all those (things) beginning with sound" is very interesting. On the simpler level, it indicates the various sense objects or functions of the senses such as sound, form and color, touch, taste, smell. On a deeper level, it refers to the fact that all material creations begin from the sound - first subtle, then gross - and develop subsequently into form and then into physical contact. We can easily verify this scientific fact by experimentally concentrating our attention on a mental sound, preferably a word, and then we will be able to observe how the mind follows the senses by recalling a form that corresponds to that word or sound, and then how the senses of action will send the impulse of movement to go and touch the sense object. There is the famous exercise on the name "lemon"; by focusing on the name/ sound/ idea "lemon", our internal senses will immediately present the image of a lemon and even the sour taste of the lemon, recovering it from our previous memories.

Therefore the purification of the mind starts with sounds, more specifically with the pranava omkara and the maha mantras composed by the names of God, the descriptions of the teachings, activities, qualities and forms of God, and with other auspicious sounds such as conch shells blowing, bells ringing, etc. By regularly surrounding ourselves with these spiritual sounds, the memory of the inauspicious sounds will be pushed out, and gradually the mind will abandon it completely because it has found a better taste (2.59).

The perfection of this meditation is called sakalpa or samprajnata samadhi, or constant absorption of the mind on auspicious transcendental sense objects or ideas, such as mantras, stutis, vigrahas, lilas, etc. Only after attaining this level one can aim at transcending it and attain the nirvikalpa or asamprajnata samadhi, the original state of the atman/ brahman, where there is no sankalpa ("desire, purpose") or jnata ("object of knowledge"), because there is no more duality, no more space and time, and the atman is completely united into brahman, yet it remains distinct in service and relationship. One who has not experienced transcendence will not be able to understand how this is possible, because it is not a concept that can be explained by words or perceived by the senses or by the mind. Yet, it is very much real, in fact more real than material objects and consciousness; in asamprajnata samadhi everything is contained in a bindu ("point/ drop") much like Arjuna experienced the entire expanse of the universe in one single point when he contemplated the Virata Rupa. Such an experience has nothing to do with sunyata ("void").

The word nyudasya ("putting aside") is a very practical instruction for meditation, both for beginners and advanced students. The mind is restless and always eager to find something new and interesting, so it keeps running everywhere and bringing back stuff to show us, like an enthusiastic little child who has found wonderful and strange objects in his exploration of the world - a pebble with a particular shape, a feather fallen from a bird, a piece of broken glass, a flower, and so on (sometimes even nasty things). Krishna has already recommended that we should make friends (6.5, 6.6) with our own mind and treat it affectionately but firmly like we would deal with a restless child to be engaged in some important learning task: sanaib sanair uparamed buddhya dbriti grihitaya, atma samstham manah krtva na kincid api cintayet, yato yato niscalati manas cancelam asthiram, tatas tato niyamya itad atmany eva vasam nayet, cancelam hi manah krishna pramathi balavad dridham, tasyaham nigratham manye vayo iva su dukaram, asamsayam maha babo mano durnigratham calam, abhyasena tu kamteya vairagyena ca grihyate, "Gradually withdrawing from attachments and distractions by the use of intelligence, with a determined effort, one should fix the mind in the Self/ atman and stop worrying/ thinking about everything else. The mind is unsteady and impatient to wander around. Every time/ wherever it runs off, one should bring it back under control, and regulate it so that it remains controlled in/ by the Self/ atman. The mind is indeed restless, turbulent, powerful and stubborn; controlling it is more difficult than controlling the wind. However, although the mind is restless and very difficult to manage, it can be controlled by practice and detachment." (6.25, 6.26, 6.34, 6.35).

We should therefore sit in meditation, in a comfortable position (asana) so that our body will not distract us, then calm and purify the mind through proper breathing (pranayama) and learn how to stop listening to external messages (pratyahara) so that we can fix our mind (dhara) on a transcendental sound (mantra) and form (vigraha, yantra). Every time our mind becomes distracted by external or internal objects, every time it comes up with some other idea or memory, we should say, "thank you, but now I am busy" and go back to the proper contemplation. Sometimes it helps to take a quick note (pen and paper) if we have the impression that the mind's idea is particularly useful in our daily life, so that the mind feels satisfied that we have given it some attention. However, we need to remain neutral towards all the impressions, emotions, memories etc, because both attraction and repulsion will reinforce the interest of the mind and create an attachment, and repression is even worse because it gives the problem too much power. Just acknowledge and let go. Gradually the mind will learn to appreciate the transcendental objects and will become calmer and more focused, undisturbed by the waves of the gunas (2.70).

"living alone/ in an isolate place, eating moderately, controlling the speech, the body and the mind, taking shelter in renunciation, and constantly immersed in meditation,

Krishna is summarizing here the essentials for yoga and sannyasa, that lead to moksha. The previous verse (18.51) clearly stated that one should first of all be determined to purify one's intelligence from ahankara and mamatra, follow the rules of yama and niyama, and becoming completely detached from both attraction and repulsion, letting go all the sense objects, starting from sound - noise pollution, useless and meaningless socialization, the constant chattering of the mind, and so on. In this verse Krishna recognizes that it is extremely difficult to do this unless one lives alone, in a quiet and solitary place, so that one does not have to deal with the constant chattering of the mind of someone else (besides one's own mind's chattering), and with the silly and superficial socialization and the loud noises created by stupid people. And today the situation is even worse than the condition of society in Krishna's times. Sometimes religiously inclined people who are influenced by tamas believe that if something is good, more of that same thing must be better, so they distort and abuse the idea of spreading auspicious sounds for the benefit of all. Vedic civilization did not use loudspeakers and certainly does not prescribe putting the mega boom boxes at maximum volume to get their kirtanas or *bhajan*s heard at 10 km distance, creating hearing problems, mental confusion and physical pain to all those who live at a closer range (within 1 km, for example) and damaging the eardrums, brain and nervous system of those who stand or sit even nearer (within 10 meters, for example). We have seen how tamas creates addiction to an excessively high volume of music, because the aggression of sound to the brain and nervous system is mistaken by the conditioned body and mind as a pleasurable stimulation. However, normal people, especially small children, and even animals are simply disturbed and aggravated by this noise pollution, that can cause miscarriages in women and cows as described in the shastra with reference to very powerful sounds like the war conch shells of asuras. Actually, sattvic sounds as described in shastra with references to ashramas are very soft and sweet, on the same decibel level of scattered birds singing.

So, vivikta sevi ("living alone") is a precise instruction by Krishna. It was already recommended in previous instructions: yogi yunjita satatam atmanam rahasi sthitah, ekaki yata cittatma nirasir aparigrahabh, "A yogi should constantly practice meditation on the atman by living alone in a secluded place, carefully keeping the mind and the consciousness under control, free from expectations and from attachments to material acquisitions/ from depending on others" (6.10). Because our world is now overpopulated and society and government are not conducive to the actual practice of yoga, it may be difficult to find a proper place to live and practice meditation in a congested city or even in the vicinity of some loud temple or "yoga ashrama", so we need to adjust as best as we can. For example, it is always advisable to have a room of one's own (no other people using the same room) and let people know that we are practicing mauna (silence), so that we can avoid their gossiping and chattering and superficial socializing. The telephone is another major source of distraction and frustration, so it is better to switch it off or keep a voice mail recording instead, and let people know that they should send you messages and you will call them back when free.

The next extremely important factor in one's spiritual life and practice is the choice of food (asi, "eating, consuming, absorbing"). It was also mentioned in verse 6.17 (yukta ahara, "controlled eating"), and confirmed in many verses of Bhagavata Purana (mita bhuk, 3.27.8, 7.12.6, 11.11.30, mita vanya bhuk, 4.8.56, mita adanam vivikta ksema sevanam, 3.28.3, nihanga aparigraha ekah vivikta saranah mita asanah, 7.15.30). This of course applies both to the mind's food and to the body's food. By living alone in a quiet place, we can better choose the food we want to make available to the mind, without external disturbances and interruptions, and similarly a yogi who lives in the forest or keeps a small permaculture or forest garden and orchard in or near his bhajana kutir or ashrama can obtain nice light food that is suitable for sadbhava.

It is a very well known fact that a yogi's diet is based on fresh fruits and vegetables, especially herbs and leaves (patram puspa phalam toyam, 9.26), edible roots (Bhagavata Purana 4.23.5, 10.20.28, 11.18.2, vanya bhuk, 11.29.42, 12.2.9), nuts, and milk produced by the ashrama or household cows, who return home in the evening after grazing in the forest or non-cultivated lands around the isolated place where the yogi lives. Occasionally the yogi (brahmana, sadhu, brahmachari, vanaprastha or sannyasi) can go to some village and collect alms in the form of grains (rice, wheat, barley, sesame, beans, etc) and keep a small store in the kitchen especially to cook small quantities of nice bhoga offerings for the Deity on festive occasions. With a sufficient supply of pure fresh water and occasional forest products such as honey and medicinal substances, the health and peace of mind of the yogi are guaranteed.

We understand that such a sattvik, idyllic, easy and comfortable way of life is not available to many people at present, therefore we will adjust by observing strict vegetarianism and choosing only sattvic ingredients, and especially preparing and consuming them in a "light" manner (laghu). So we should avoid the excessive use of spices and especially hot spices, the excessive use of sugar and especially refined white sugar, the excessive use of fats and especially fried fats or heavy oils such as the irritant mustard oil or the saturated fats of palm oil, coconut oil, "vanaspati" vegetable oil mixes etc. Even excessive use of clarified butter (ghi) and milk products is detrimental to good health and the lightness of body and mind required by the practice of yoga and sannyasa, so when we use relatively heavy (albeit pure vegetarian) ingredients, it should be only in the form of prasadam, that consists in very small quantities of preparations offered to the Deity and shared with others.

Controlling one's speech and mind is something we need to work on even when we are living and practicing in perfect solitude, and it is best done by engaging our power of speech (vak shakti) in reciting the shastra and singing devotional songs, and especially by vibrating the completely transcendental sounds of pranava omkara and maha mantras, that are composed exclusively by Divine names. The mind can also be nourished by the constant study of the scriptures (svadhyaya) and by devotional activities and thoughts (isvara pranidhana), and especially on the dynamic meditation (dhyana) on the Divine reality and its service, including the close association with the antaryami paramatma, whose voice becomes easier for us to hear clearly when there is no other noise around, internally or externally.

The word yata means "controlled, engaged", and gives us a better understanding of the word yati, that is a synonym of sannyasi (4.28, 5.26) as also confirmed even more clearly in Bhagavata Purana 7.12.16, 11.8.16, 11.18.17, but also 2.2.15, 3.1.31, 4.23.12, 5.26.39, 11.8.17, 11.16.43). Here is one example: mauna aniba anila-yama, danda vag deba cetasam, na hy ete jasya santy anga venubhir na bhaved yatibh, "One who is not controlling his power of speech, has not given up selfish activities, does not control his prana, and does not keep a strict discipline on his own voice, body and mind, can never be a true sannyasi, even if he carries many bamboo rods (the insignia of an ordained sannyasi)" (Bhagavata Purana, 11.18.17).

The tridandi sannyasis of some later dvaita lineages carry a bamboo rod (danda) with three (tri) points, to distinguish themselves from the original ekadandi ("one rod") sannyasis; they claim that such three points symbolize their vow of controlling speech, body and mind (vak, kaya, manasa) as instructed in this verse. This is all very nice, but too often these three points of the danda are seen not just to represent such control, but to replace it altogether, as the sannyasis are found to be shamelessly engaged in such activities of sense gratification and material power that ordinary people end up trying to achieve a more enjoyable standard of living and better facilities by officially entering the order of sannyasa in such lineages. Such fake sannyasis will claim that they are accepting these facilities only for the sake of devotional service, but that does not explain very expensive and unnecessarily prestigious status symbols such as the rolexes, the executive class seats on frequent air flights, the multi-star hotel rooms, the lavish birthday parties, the super-luxury vehicles, the dedicated personal servants including cooks preparing an elaborate feast with sophisticated items three times every day, the silver plates cups and katoris, the silken bedsheets and garments, the pashmina sweaters and shawls, the high quality marble and golden fauceted bathrooms at one's own private apartments, and the state of the art electronics and digital devices that are only used for very elementary purposes (sending/ receiving email messages and writing notes for a lecture). At these objections, the fake sannyasi will reply that he is humbly accepting these loving offerings from his disciples to avoid hurting their feelings, but if he is their guru he is supposed to teach them what is an appropriate living standard for a sannyasi, and encourage them to invest their wealth and efforts in the service of God and the cause of dharma and vidya instead. And if the sannyasi receives gifts from outside people, he should distribute them to deserving others according to the principle of utility in such higher service, if possible instructing them to sell the expensive articles and use the money for better purposes. Of course we need to adjust the externals of sannyasa to the present desa, kala, patra, but the principle of renunciation must remain the same, otherwise there will be a rajasic/ tamasic meaning in the definition itself (18.31, 18.32).

The verse from Bhagavata Purana (11.18.17) we quoted earlier is extremely interesting, because it further illustrates the meaning of the verses we are studying (18.51, 18.52, 18.53). Mauna means "silence" as we have seen in 18.51 and 18.52 (this verse), and we will see in 18.53 (next verse) represented by santa ("peaceful, quiet"). The word aniba means "without greed, without hankerings, without selfishness", and it corresponds to dropping all sense objects (visayam tyaktra) and abandoning the duality of attraction-repulsion (raga dvesau tyuda) as in verse 18.51, and to controlling speech, body and mind (yata vak kaya manasa) in the present verse (18.52), as it is also explicitly mentioned in the Bhagavata Purana (danda vag deha cetasam). The Bhagavata verse adds pranayama (anila yama) as an important practice to control speech, body, mind and prana or life energy, connecting prana with cetasa ("consciousness") as an alternate definition of "mind" (manasa, 18.51).

The expression dhyana yoga parah clearly indicates that a yogi should give priority or supreme position (parah) to meditation; this applies to multiple terms of comparison. The most immediate meaning is that a yogi should focus his/ her entire life on meditation as the main purpose of his/ her existence; yoga is not a hobby or an ancillary health practice used to enjoy some physical exercise and relaxation for one hour twice a week. It is not even a "second job" to make some extra bucks or get some other similar benefits. Also, within the practice of yoga, dhyana is much more important than dharana, pranayama, pratyahara and asana, and even more than yama and niyama, because all these yoga angas ("limbs") are meant to support dhyana or meditation, and they constitute only preliminary and subordinate practices. When the yogi becomes perfect in dhyana (the actual purpose of yoga), meditation itself becomes nitya dhyana, technically called samadhi, or sama dhi, or sama dhyana ("constant equal meditation"). Another meaning of the expression interprets the word para as "Supreme" as in brahman, paramatma, bhagavan; meditation should only focus on atman / brahman, not on material objects. All these meanings are also confirmed by the expression samupa asritah ("fully possessed, taking full shelter").

अहंकारं बलं दर्पं कामं क्रोधं परिग्रहम् ।

विमुच्य निर्ममः शान्तो ब्रह्मभूयाय कल्पते ॥ १८-५३ ॥

ahaṅkāraṁ balaṁ darpaṁ kāmaṁ krodhaṁ parigrahaṁ | vimucya nirmamaḥ śānto brahmabhūyāya kalpate || 18-53 ||

aham karam: I am the doer; balam: strength; darpaṁ: pride; kamam: lust; krodham: rage; parigraham: seeking gifts/ favors; vimucya: completely free; nir mamah: without a sense of proprietorship or belonging; santah: peaceful; brahma bhuyaya: the level of Brahman; kalpate: wishes.

"completely free from ahankara, pride for one's strength, lust, anger and expectation of honors, free from mamatva, and peaceful: (this person's) desires are on the level of Brahman.

An alternate (and more literary) translation of this verse is: "One who has become completely free from ahankara and mamatva, from the sense of material strength, pride, lust, anger and greed, and is peaceful, focuses his/ her desires towards Brahman." Other commentators have translated brahma bhuyaya kalpate as "can aspire to attaining the level of Brahman", but a person who is qualified in the manner described in these verses is already on the level of Brahman. The same meaning was expressed in verse 14.26 (sa gunan samatityaitan brahma bhuyaya kalpate, "develops desires on the Brahman level, transcending all these gunas").

The first line of this verse starts with ahankara ("I am the doer"), that is the single most detrimental obstacle to spiritual realization; the other bad qualities and habits listed in the first line are merely consequences created by ahankara. Material identification with the body and mind, that constitutes the ahankara, creates and thrives on the pride for one's own strength (balam darpaṁ) as well as on physical strength and fitness as a value in itself (balam) and on pride and arrogance as a value in itself (darpaṁ). So one who "practices yoga" because s/he is (or wants to be) proud of his/ her own body fitness or strength is automatically a failure and cannot progress.

The addition of kama next to bala and darpa is also illuminating, because generally those who pride themselves in their own bodies (fitness, sexiness etc) are eager to engage in subtle or gross sex and sense gratification; already the simple fact of being proudly conscious of one's body and identifying with it (ahankara) is a sort of narcissistic sexual activity. It does not matter if people cover their bodies up completely when they go out in public: lust and sense gratification and sexual urges remain undiminished even under a burqa and they are not dissolved even by artificial repression or mere abstention (3.6, 3.33). The only real solution is to drop the identification with the material body altogether, and move one's focus to our true identity as atman/ brahman. A real yogi does not wish to make the body strong and fit (2.70), even if this means that s/he is going against the opinion of the public (2.69) and is subjected to a barrage of impressions in that direction (2.70); his/ her wishes are on the level of Brahman (brahma bhuyaya kalpate).

The word balam means "force, material power, violence, strength", as well as "impact, clout, leverage, influence, affluence, position, fame, attachment" as these are elements of such material power. Together with arrogance (darpa), lust (kama), anger (krodha) and the exploitation mentality (parigraha), this material power is nothing less than asuric: dambho darpo 'bhimanas ca krodhab parusyam eva ca, ajnanam cabhijatasya partha sampadam asurim, asa pasa satair buddhab kama krodha parayanah, ihante kama bhogartham anyayenartha sancayan, ahankaram balam darpam kamam krodham ca samsritah, mam atma para debesu pradisanto 'bhyasuyakah, "The characteristics of those born of asuric nature are hypocrisy, impudence, conceit, rage, rudeness, and of course ignorance. Bound by hundreds of ropes in the form of desires, always immersed in lust and anger, they desire to increase their desires and for that purpose they adopt any means to accumulate wealth. Taking shelter in ahankara, physical strength, arrogance, lust and anger, they show envy and hatred against me, as I reside in their own bodies and in the bodies of others." (16.4, 16.12, 16.18).

Specifically, it is the mixture of lust, greed and anger that obstructs the evolution of the soul: kama esa krodha esa rajo guna samadbavah, mabasano maha papma viddhy enam iha vairinam, tri vidham narakasyedam dravam nasanam atmanah, kamah krodhas tattha lobhas tasmad etat trayam tyajet, kama krodha vimuktanam yatinam yata cetasam, abbuto brahma nirvanam vartate viditatmanam, "This (negative power) is (the mixture of) desire and anger, and it is born from rajas guna. Know that it is all-devouring, the cause of great sins, and the (true) enemy in this world. The threefold gate to hellish life and to self-destruction consists of this mixture of lust, greed and anger, therefore one should abandon them. The saintly persons who are completely free from lust and anger and have their consciousness steadily fixed (in atman/ brahman), who have realized the Self: (for them) there is brahma nirvana very soon." (3.37, 16.21, 5.26).

The mixture of kama-lobha-krodha is born from the influence of rajas on ahankara (material identification) and mamatva (material attachment), therefore by dropping ahankara and mamatva, and taking shelter in the Supreme through sattva and visuddha sattva, we automatically become free from this great enemy of progress. Ahankara and mamatva are also the source of parigraha, the tendency to accumulating and keeping superfluous things, acquiring wealth and property, expecting gifts and favors and service from others, exploiting or depending on others for one's own maintenance, and so on. This also applies to the religious field, of course, as we have seen that asuras also love to present themselves as religionists (16.10, 16.15, 16.17), and ordinary religious activities can also be performed with the wrong motivations and with bad effects (17.5, 17.6, 17.12, 17.13, 17.18, 17.19, 17.21, 17.22, 18.31, 18.32), and with the wrong attitude and understanding (18.7, 18.8, 18.21, 18.22, 18.24, 18.25, 18.27, 18.28). Only a sincere sadhaka, who is free from ahankara and mamatva and has overcome all the bad qualities born from rajas and tamas, can attain peace and rise to the level of Brahman, the brahma bhuya or brahma nirvana (5.26). And only from that level, true bhakti or devotion to Isvara Bhagavan can start, as the next verse will clearly state.

ब्रह्मभूतः प्रसन्नात्मा न शोचति न काङ्क्षति । समः सर्वेषु भूतेषु मद्भक्तिं लभते पराम् ॥ १८-५४ ॥

brahmabhūtaḥ prasannātmā na śocati na kāṅkṣati । samaḥ sarveṣu bhūteṣu madbhaktiṁ labhate param ॥ 18-54 ॥

brahma bhutah: the state of Brahman; prasanna atma: satisfied in the self; na socati: does not lament; na kanksati: does not hanker; samah sarvesu bhutesu: equally disposed towards all beings/ towards all existences; mad bhaktim: bhakti to me; labhate: obtains; param: spiritual/ transcendental.

"One who is established in the state of Brahman is satisfied in the self; he does not lament or hanker (after anything), is equally disposed towards all beings and achieves transcendental devotion to me.

Brahma bhuya or brahma bhuta is the existence of Brahman, or "being" Brahman, the level of paramahansa that constitutes the perfection of the evolution in human beings - samsiddhi, or moksha, liberation from the ignorance and illusion of material identification and attachment. Without attaining this level, devotion can only be impure, contaminated by material ignorance and motivations that we project on God; before the atman/ brahman realization, religious devotion can only be a shadow or glimpse of true bhakti. Such sentimental devotion should not be condemned, because it is a step in the proper direction (10.10), but it should not be presented as the genuine article, either, because people would be confused and misled into believing they have already attained the goal when they are actually just dreaming and fantasizing, so they will stop making efforts to attain the true realization and they will miss the main point and the special opportunity of human life.

What is the existence of Brahman? The word bhuta ("being") refers both to the condition of existence and to the individual consciousness who lives in that particular existence; the word is a derivative from the verb "becoming" (bhavati), therefore it indicates a process of development, such as birth, evolution or realization. The individual soul starts as anu atman ("atomic self"), a non-developed spark of consciousness that is meant to evolve and grow into a fully fledged siddha svarupa, or transcendental/spiritual body, made of pure consciousness (sat cit ananda) just like the body of God. So the anu atman enrolls in the school of the material world and becomes a jiva atman or jiva buta ("living being"); in the beginning there is some confusion about the body-identity thing, so the tiny atman incorrectly identifies with the material body he has developed. Through a series of experiences and with the proper education and teachings, the jivatman will finally attain the full understanding (realization) of its true identity and the meaning of "transcendental body". This is the brahma bhuta level.

One might ask why God, who is so good and omnipotent, puts the jivatmans through such a long and painful process. Can't he create fully perfect emanations, already developed, already in the adult siddha deba form, and spare us all this trouble? The answer is that true love must be based on free choice, on real appreciation that comes through a contrast with some other term of comparison. This is the purpose of duality, this is the purpose of the entire material manifestation. As jivatmans, we get the opportunity to participate in the lila of creation, preservation and destruction of the world, and we can always choose the role we want to play. God does not get angry at us if we do not make the right choices, but the game has some in-built rules that the jivatman cannot break, because they are stronger than him (7.14, 3.5, 3.33, 13.30, 18.40). Foolish and ignorant people throw insults at their Mother Mahamaya, calling her "witch", or "evil stepmother", just like stupid children get angry with mother because of their own failures and limitations, or with the teacher because they are asked to study more effectively. If they really want to overcome their problems, they should rather seek the blessings of Mother and make a sincere effort to understand what she wants from them: she just wants us to grow up.

How can we grow up? By developing the same level of consciousness of Isvara (mam eva ye prapadyante, 7.14), that is benevolent neutrality and detachment towards all beings and circumstances, due to the fact that we find perfect happiness and satisfaction in the self (prasanna atma). What is the different between a child and an adult? The adult can take care of himself and does not need or depend on others, either materially or emotionally, irrespective of the age of the body in years. An adult makes the best use of what he gets, without complaining or obsessing about what he has and doesn't have (na socati na kanksati) and remains balanced in joys and sorrows (samah sarvesu bhutesu). At that level, we can really engage in real devotional service and not simply in a childish imitation of devotion.

We should carefully dispel the various misconceptions on the points offered in this verse, starting with the widespread but mistaken idea that Brahman realization is "impersonal" as opposed to "personal". This is particularly foolish because by definition in the Absolute (advaita) there is no duality and therefore there can be no contradiction between personal and impersonal. All the genuine shastra keep repeating that Transcendence, by definition, is what transcends the limited comprehension of the material mind and speech based on the experience of duality, time and space that we can have with the material body. The subtler (and therefore sharper and more penetrating) our consciousness becomes, the more we can realize that duality, time and space are not what they seem to be (as the illusory projection of maya). The fact is that individuality is eternal and constitutional, therefore it cannot be annihilated when entering or merging into the Brahman consciousness; what is annihilated is the ahankara, the material identification of a separate interest and action that is not in complete harmony with the Supreme.

A limb or cell in the body can never really function properly unless its consciousness is completely aligned with the consciousness of the entire body; when the DNA code in the cell is different from the DNA code of the rest of the body, or when the cell acts in a way that is not the purpose pursued by the body, we have a problem. To materially identified and conditioned people, this may appear to belittle the role of a human being in the universe, or to diminish the importance of free will, presenting God as a sort of intolerant dictator. This happens because in this world we have the experience of foolish and ignorant conditioned beings trying to play God without being God, and without even understanding what God really is. One of the best definitions is offered by the Bhagavata Purana (1.2.11): vadanti tat tattva vido, tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti, bhagavan iti sadyate, "Those who know the tattva declare that tattva is undivided Knowledge, variously called Brahman, Paramatma, and Bhagavan".

God is existence, knowledge and consciousness - the sum total of all existence, knowledge and consciousness that is, has been and can ever be - and the source of everything as well. In other words, Krishna Consciousness is not "being conscious about Krishna" but it is Krishna himself as Consciousness. When we "dovetail" our consciousness with God as Consciousness, we are not losing or missing anything, because everything is there and nothing exists without it or outside it - if "without" and "outside" actually could have a meaning when we speak of all-pervading omnipresence).

Realizing Brahman is like a drop of water entering the ocean, like some computer data entering the supreme software that creates the entire hologram - every molecule of water still retains its atomic identity, every bit of information still retains its script, and similarly every atman or bit of consciousness retains the consciousness of everything (otherwise, it would not be consciousness). Not easy to explain in words or to grasp with one's material intellect, but there is no surprise there, as Transcendence by definition transcends both words and material intellect.

Again, we need to clarify a possible misunderstanding here; when we say that Transcendence cannot be defined materially, it does not mean that it is a "mystery of the faith" and that it should not be discussed. It means that it has to be realized individually, with a paradigm shift called enlightenment (prakasa) or realization, a flash of actual comprehension that consists in directly seeing the meaning (darshana), after having heard and read so much about it. Human intelligence is not sufficient to understand Transcendence, but it holds the key to open its door, so we need to cultivate and purify it with regular practice as explained in Bhagavad gita.

Then we have attained this realization we can see the Big Picture, so there is no cause for complaining or running after things; we can certainly continue to make plans and strategies and to work, and we can see the difference between joys and sorrows, but we are not bound to them any more because we know that everything is perfectly organized and balanced as One Consciousness, as clearly stated by Svetasvatara Upanishad (3.9): tenedam purnam purusena sarvam, "by his arrangement the universe is made complete and perfect" and by Isa Upanishad (8): yathatathiyati 'rthan vyadadhat, "he fulfills the requirements of all". So we happily perform our functions and we finally achieve that transcendental identification, possession and belonging that is the true reality, of which any material identification, possession and belonging is just a shadow. The material universe is a world of shadows, covered by the cloud of ahankara, and the illusion (maya) consists in the fact that a shadow looks very similar to the real thing but has no substance.

This is where Krishna had started his teachings in Bhagavad gita: nasato vidyate bhavo nabhavo vidyate satah, ubhayaor api drishto 'ntas tv anayos tattva darsibhib, "Those who see the truth know that what is illusory/ temporary will not continue to be, while what is real/ eternal will never be destroyed. They have carefully observed both categories and reached this conclusion." (2.16).

A yogi who has attained the Brahman realization can still continue to live in a material body in this world as jivan mukta (4.21, 5.11, 5.13, 5.14, 5.19, 5.23, 10.3, 13.33, 14.20, 15.10, 15.11) and he is aware that he automatically receives what he needs (9.22), although the package may also contain some bitter medicines. There is no need to leave or destroy the body or even the mind in order to achieve liberation; a conditioned soul's trying to achieve moksha by merely leaving his body will simply lead to a new reincarnation, and trying to get rid of the mind will simply lead to a deep tamasic state - exactly the opposite of what we are seeking. In fact, a realized soul can continue to live a long and full life, because serving God in the material world is just as good as (or even better than) serving God in Vaikuntha (jivivise chatam samah, Isa Upanishad, 2).

The word labhate ("obtains, attains"), applied to actual bhakti, indicates that genuine devotion to Bhagavan is something that we find through the process of realization, a diamond that is hidden under layers of dirt and becomes visible when impurities are burned or washed off. It does not depend solely on sadhana, and certainly it does not correspond to sadhana, or Krishna would have said, "kurute" ("s/he does, performs"); bhakti therefore is not a particular type of activity such as religious rituals or practices, or a sentimental or cultural attachment to a projected form of God. These things are just the vessels or opportunities for developing bhakti.

bhakti: through bhakti; mam: me; abhijanati: one can understand; yavan: as much as; yah ca asmi: as I am; tattvataḥ: in truth; tataḥ: then; mam: me; tattvataḥ: in truth; jñatva: knowing; visate: enters; tat: that; anantaram: eternally/ without end/ constantly.

"Through bhakti one can understand me as I really am. By knowing this tattva, one finally enters (in me).

We found a very similar verse already in the chapter describing the Virata Rupa: bhaktiā tv ananyaya saḥya aham evam vidho 'rjuna, jñatum drastum ca tattvena pravestum ca parantapa, "O Arjuna, only through bhakti it is possible to know and to see me truly, and to enter into me" (11.54). The word visate was also found in verse 8.11 (yad aksaram veda vido vadanti vīsanti), that mentions the akshara brahman, the unchangeable eternal existence of consciousness, saying that those who "know that knowledge" enter there.

This verse (18.55) is also quite difficult to understand properly, because superficially it appears to be contradictory; the word visate ("enters") is a synonym of pravisyate ("enters", infinitive form pravestum) and seems to indicate a loss of individuality or a physical movement in space from one place to another. Neither of these are actually correct. We need to remember that this tattva (Brahman, Paramatma, Bhagavan) is Knowledge and Consciousness and is not limited by a material body, therefore attaining Bhagavan realization means entering the existence of Knowledge and Consciousness, or according to the bhakti dictionary, "entering his lila". Because this Consciousness transcends the limits of material intellect and not just the limits of material form, it is not sufficient for us to speculate about it, but we must fine tune our pure consciousness, just like we do when we develop a strong loving relationship with someone. Some call it telepathy, some call it "the language of the heart", but it is actually our most fundamental nature - loving harmonious consciousness.

The Bhagavata Purana (11.14.21) confirms in the teachings given by Krishna to Uddhava: bhaktiyāham ekaya grahyah śraddhāyatma priyah satam, bhaktiḥ punati man nistha sva pakan api sambhavat, "I can be attained through pure bhakti by a faithful devotee. I am the atman, dear to the good people (sat jana), and such bhakti in full dedication purifies anyone, even the savage dog eaters". This pure bhakti is gradually developed through jnana or cultivation of sattvic knowledge and karma or proper performance of one's duties (Bhagavata Purana 11.20.6), as Krishna has been explaining all along the text of Bhagavad gita.

Bhakti (devotion) is the supreme expression of yoga (6.47), but one cannot attain true bhakti without evolving to the level of brahma bhuta, and for this we need to cultivate jnana (knowledge) and vairagya (renunciation) while fulfilling our prescribed duties (karma). In the chapter on vijnana yoga, Krishna has clearly stated: babunam janmanam ante jnanavan mam prapadyate, vasudevah sarvam iti sa mahatma su durlabhab, "After many lifetimes, one who has knowledge attains me, realizing that God is everything. Such a great soul is very rare." (7.19 ). We should not take bhakti cheaply, because in that case we would just get a cheap imitation of the genuine article. Sometimes superficial and ignorant people equivocate on the idea of pure bhakti as free from jnana and karma (jnana karmady anavritam), imagining that a neophyte sentimentalist devotee can instantly attain the stage of genuine pure bhakti (mad bhaktim param) by artificially abandoning the cultivation of knowledge and the prescribed duties towards family and society.

Especially we should be wary about those who say that in order to attain pure devotion to Krishna we need to stop listening to intelligence, good sense and conscience (that are the voice of the antaryami paramatma) and even to neglect the instructions of genuine shastra such as the teachings of Krishna in Bhagavad gita.

Many prakerita sabajiyas ("materialistic simpletons") prefer to indulge in pinkish saccharin fantasies about the rasa lila and the childhood adventures of Krishna in Vrindavana rather than studying and understanding and following the instructions of Bhagavad gita, but contrary to their delusions of grandeur, their position is not as sublime as they think. They want to use Krishna for their own pleasure and entertainment rather than rendering a favorable service to the Supreme Good, so their devotion has very little value, and in fact according to one of the most famous authors of medieval bhakti literature it is even detrimental to society: sruti smriti puranadi pancharatra-vidhim vina, aikaintiki harer bhaktir utpatayaiva kalpate, "So-called exclusive bhakti to Hari (Vishnu or Krishna) that is not in accordance to the sruti, the smriti, the Puranas and the other Vedic scriptures, as well as with the science of the Pancharatra, is simply a fantasy that will create a lot of trouble in society" (Bhakti rasamrita sindhu 1.2.101, quoting from Brahma yamala Purana).

What trouble could that be? "Let one thousand flowers bloom", will say superficial religionists, "after all, these people are just doing their best to worship God, and Vishnu/ Krishna actually is the supreme Personality of Godhead (11.45, 11.46, 11.50)". Certainly we should never physically persecute anyone for their incorrect beliefs, but we have the duty to expose unfounded and dangerous arguments because we must protect the good and innocent people from confusion (4.8).

The problem we need to highlight consists in the idea of "exclusivity" (aikantika), a typically abrahamic concept that infiltrated India through the islamic invasions and was already widespread at the time when the Bhakti rasamrita sindhu was written. This "monotheistic" approach denies the value of the proper use of intelligence and conscience, and emphasizes absolute obedience to the "religious authorities" that claim to represent "the only true God", while all other forms and personalities of Godhead are considered inferior if not false or despicable - and their devotees are unjustly insulted, attacked and persecuted. This is a very serious deviation from the Vedic vision, the real intolerance that we should not tolerate, and it creates havoc in society because it prevents people from following the proper path and causes offenses to the shastra and to the Devas as well as to many good people and genuine acharyas (such as Adi Shankara). Besides, it deludes people into thinking they have already gone beyond the prescribed social duties and even dharma and vidya, when in fact they are living as noxious parasites of society and giving a bad example to others, against the precise instructions of Krishna (3.21, 3.22, 3.23, 3.24, 3.25, 3.26).

The path of devotion (bhakti) starts from the sincere cultivation of knowledge by approaching a genuine guru: tad viddhi pranipatena pariprasenena sevaya, upadeksyanti te jnanam jnaninas tattva darsinah, "You should learn this knowledge by approaching those who directly contemplate the Truth, asking them all possible questions and offering them service. Those who have the knowledge will initiate you into this science." (4.34). The stage of vidhi bhakti or sadhana bhakti is simply the sincere practice of yoga as described by Bhagavad gita and by Patanjali's famous Yoga sutras; one needs to start with yama and niyama, which consist in purifying one's existence from the gross attachments to bad qualities and behaviors. Then one should engage one's body (asana) in the service of atman/ brahman by performing the activities of one's prescribed duties in a spirit of devotional dedication of one's life energy to the Supreme (pranayama), and by learning to control the senses of perception and action (pratyahara). This will gradually help the sadhaka to control his/ her mind (dharana) and engage it in an increasingly efficient way (dhyana and samadhi). The Narada pancaratra confirms, speaking of five subsequent divisions of knowledge: 1. jnana, 2. yoga, 3. vairagya, 4. tapah and 5. bhakti, presented as a special function of vidya or transcendental knowledge.

The search for the knowledge of Brahman (brahma jnana) does not need to be pursued on the level of supreme bhakti because it has already been attained (2.52). Knowledge or realization must be sought as long as one does not have it, just like one goes to school to learn, but upon graduation he does not need to attend classes any more, because he is directly contemplating and applying the realized knowledge that now has become a part of his own nature. After attaining direct realization, it is not possible to return to ignorance, so when we say that we leave jnana behind, it does not mean that we really abandon knowledge.

In this verse, the word yavan ("as much as") indicates that the supreme Reality can be understood not completely but truly, without misconceptions and confusion, as opposed to the imaginative projections of the fantasy of ignorant and foolish people. Of course this knowledge or understanding (abhi jnana, "specific knowledge") includes the Personality of Godhead, as Krishna clearly mentions the personal pronoun three times in the verse (mam, "me", asmi, "I am", mam, "me"). Adi Shankara himself declared at the beginning of his commentary on Bhagavad gita that Narayana is beyond the avyakta or non manifested Brahman (narayanah parah avyaktat). A famous passage of Katha Upanishad (3.10-3.11) confirms: indriyebhyah para hy artha arthebhyas ca param namah, manasas tu para buddhir buddher atma mahan parah, mahatah param avyaktamavyaktat purusah parah, purushan na param kinchit sa kastha sa param gatih, "Beyond the sense organs are the objects of the senses. Beyond them is the mind. Beyond that, there is buddhi (intelligence). Beyond that, is the paramatman. Beyond the paramatman is the non-manifest Brahman. Beyond that is the Purusha. There is nothing beyond the Purusha: that is the goal, that is the supreme."

Interestingly, the Katha Upanishad continues to declare in the subsequent verses: "This Purusha is hidden in all beings, so he is not visible to material eyes, but he can be seen by those wise yogis who strive to focus their meditation. A yogi who has knowledge and a sharp intelligence should engage/ unite the words in the mind, the mind in the intellect, the intellect in the paramatman, and the paramatman in the supreme divine Reality. Arise! Awake! Seek that pure knowledge by following intelligent teachers who practice what they preach. The expert sages explain that the path is a risky one, as sharp as the edge of a knife, and it is not easy to walk or cross over. When one knows what is beyond the perception of sound, touch, sight, taste and smell, that eternal unchangeable Reality that has no beginning nor end, greater than the greatest, permanent and consistent, one becomes free from the hungry claws of death" (Katha Upanishad, 3.12, 3.13, 3.14, 3.15).

The last word in the verse, anantaram, is also very interesting. It conveys the meanings of "eternally, constantly, without end, without limits", while some commentators have translated it as "thereafter, instantly", which can easily confuse superficial and foolish people into falling for the prakrita sabaiya delusion. The actual meaning of the word is better explained by Jada Bharata to king Rahugana: jnanam visuddham paramartham ekam, anantaram tv abahir brahma satyam, pratyak prasantam bhagavac chabda samyam, yad vasudevam kavayo vadanti, "The experts explain that Vasudeva is that perfectly pure knowledge, the only supreme value, eternal and omnipresent (that has no outside), Brahman, Truth, that is directly realized, the perfect peace, also known by the name of Bhagavan" (Bhagavata Purana 5.12.11).

सर्वकर्मण्यपि सदा कुर्वानो मद्यपाश्रयः । मत्प्रसादादवाप्नोति शाश्वतं पदमव्ययम् ॥ १८-५६ ॥

sarvakarmāṇyapi sadā kurvāṇo madvyapāśrayaḥ | matprasādādavāpnoti śāśvataṁ padamavyayam || 18-56 |

sarva karmani: all activities; api: although; sada: always; kurvanah: performing; mad vyapasrayah: under my protection; mat prasadat: by my blessing; avapnoti: one achieves; śasvatam: eternal; padam: the position; avyayam: imperishable.

"While still performing all the activities of his/ her own prescribed duties, one achieves the eternal and imperishable position by my blessing and under my protection.

If by reading the previous verse someone had developed the idea that by engaging in some superficial sentimentalist acts of devotion one can consider himself over and above the prescribed duties of a sattvic society, here Krishna immediately disenchant him. Several times Krishna has clarified this point along the Bhagavad gita, and if some foolish ignorant people have used the pretext of renunciation and devotional life to subtract themselves from their actual responsibilities, it is not fair to blame Krishna. From the very beginning, when rebuking Arjuna for his idea of abandoning the battle to become a sannyasi, to the conclusion in this chapter, Krishna has unequivocally declared that a devotee and a self realized soul should continue to engage in his duties to support society and earn his own livelihood honestly by his hard work - in the very least, to give a good example to the general mass of people. Specifically, here Krishna says, sarva karmani ("all the prescribed activities") and sada ("always"), so there is no provision for cherry-picking the duties one whimsically likes to perform and the ones that seem to be unpleasant. Ascertaining one's sva dharma as per guna and karma (18.41) is necessary, but then one needs to sincerely engage in all the prescribed duties, without cutting corners or jumping back and forth from one position to the other to enjoy rights and dodging duties on the pretext of being a transcendental follower of "daivi varnashama". Actually all varnas and ashramas are divine (daivi), as they were established directly by Krishna (catur varnyam maya sristam guna karma vibhagasah, 4.13), and blatant disregard and disobedience to scriptural injunctions and Krishna's orders - all in the name of transcendence - can only add insult to the injury and bring the disastrous results we have seen practically happening again and again to so many people. There is no need to speculate about inventing "new methods" to solve the problems of ignorant people. Neglecting the instructions of the genuine scriptures is certainly a disaster in the making (16.23, 16.24, 17.5). So rather than saying that they are "above the varnas and ashramas", these fallen pretenders should recognize the simple fact that they have no qualifications and they are striving along as much as they can; there is no need to present oneself as a great sannyasi or brahmana in order to develop genuine bhakti and inspire others. It is better to remain humble than to become frauds and violate the last principle of dharma (truthfulness); "fake it till you make it" is a sure recipe for disaster, and the people preaching it should be exposed for what they are.

Of course sarva karmanam does not include prohibited actions or vikarma, that the yogi and devotee should have abandoned already from the very beginning of sadhana (7.28) by strictly observing the rules of yama and niyama. Yet, it is all too common to see people feigning devotion who precisely choose to continue in vikarma or prohibited activities, while neglecting the nitya karmani or prescribed activities on the pretext that they have "transcended ordinary duties", and how revealing is the fact that such issue is usually avoided in the discussions and publications of some religious organizations, while there should be an abundance of quotes by their founder acharyas, who were very vocal about this problem.

The expression śasvata pada avyaya ("the eternal and unchangeable position") can be elaborated in a number of meanings. Once one has attained the brahma bhuta (18.54) there is no chance to fall back (5.17, 8.21, 15.4, 15.6) because that evolution of consciousness permanently changes one's vision. People with a materialistic vision remain unable to understand the difference between Svarga (the heavenly planets) and Vaikuntha, therefore they imagine that Vaikuntha is a sort of heaven where one can sit with Vishnu rather than with the "demigods" who reside in the higher planetary systems, just like they imagine that Vishnu is another separate God that is simply more powerful than the other "gods".

It is no surprise then that such confused and ignorant people speculate that the jivatmans were once engaged in fully transcendental lila and service to Vishnu or Krishna in Goloka Vrindavana, and then due to the influence of ignorance and time they fell down into the material world as a punishment for their disobedience (this is the fundamental idea of the Garden of Eden narrated in the Bible). The surprise will rather be theirs when they find themselves not in Vaikuntha but taking birth in Bila Svarga, the lower planetary systems where the asuras live, and that correspond more precisely to the visualizations and projections they have cultivated so fondly in their "devotional meditations". The scriptures clearly say that in Bila Svarga, too, there is no need for the light of the sun or the moon (15.6) because of the radiance of the jewels decorating the inhabitants' heads (that could be mistaken for cinta mani spiritual stones), and the wonderful opulence of the place - gardens, palaces, agricultural villages, dairy farms etc - surpasses even the beauty of the higher Svarga planets.

The best course of action is to sincerely take full shelter in God (mat vyapasrayah) and only depend on what he sends (mat prasadat), making serious efforts to understand the science of Bhagavad gita and dropping all material identification and attachments and desires for selfish gratification, individual or collective.

चेतसा सर्वकर्मणि मयि संन्यस्य मत्परः । बुद्धियोगमुपाश्रित्य मच्चित्तः सततं भव ॥ १८-५७ ॥

cetasā sarvakarmāṇi mayi sannyasya matparaḥ | buddhiyogamupāśritya maccittah satataṁ bhava || 18-57 |

cetasa: by awareness; sarva karmani: all the activities; mayi: to me; sannyasya: renouncing; mat paraḥ: dedicated to me; buddhi yogam: in buddhi yoga; upasritya: taking shelter; mat cittah: in my consciousness; satatam: always; bhava: become.

"Renouncing all activities in your consciousness, dedicate yourself fully to me, taking shelter in buddhi yoga, and you will permanently become my consciousness."

No, it is not a translation mistake. The sentence "permanently become my consciousness" may not make sense to a person who has not attained the realization of Brahman and still believes s/he is a body and a mind. Yet, this is what Krishna is saying here: "become my consciousness". The word citta specifically means "consciousness", while the adjective form of the term is cetana ("conscious") also used as a noun meaning "mind" or "conscious being". In other passages to indicate a conscious being Krishna has used the expressions prajna, jnani, vit, darshi, that are also synonyms for "conscious person" or "one who knows".

The idea of "becoming divine consciousness" appears easier to understand when we realize that as individuals we already are consciousness (atman). When our true identity is clouded by material identification, we develop a material body, and when this cloud is dissipated by the warm light of knowledge, our original and true identity as consciousness shines brightly again. At a deeper devotional or rasika level, it makes perfect sense too: we will remember here that the word bhava also means "consciousness" as "ecstatic feeling in the relationship with Krishna", and that it is one's sthai bhava ("permanent feeling") that constitutes the siddha deha or siddha svarupa of the fully realized devotee. So at the level of Brahman, at the level of Paramatma and even at the most intimate level of Bhagavan, everything is pure consciousness - knowledge, feeling, perception.

Without attaining this level, one cannot come in direct contact with Bhagavan because the material body is a thick and clumsy covering that greatly limits our potential and activities as atman; however we can outgrow it by developing our consciousness/identity as a special siddha deha. The siddha deha is very real, in fact it is more real than the gross bodies that we can touch and see and smell with our material senses, but it is not restricted by time, space and duality, therefore it is not normally seen by material senses.

It is important to understand that such siddha deha or siddha svarupa is not "another body" that one takes after leaving the present material body - it is the inherent nature of the atman and is fully developed through the proper method, and it can already act perfectly while one still lives in the material body (jivan mukta). In some cases, the siddha deha can bypass the perception of material senses and connect directly with the perception of the atman in others (11.8, 11.48, 11.52, 11.53, 11.54), but such manifestation is not done without a valid purpose, and remains impossible to actually understand for unevolved people (9.11, 10.3, 15.10); yet it is the only form in which we can truly come in direct contact with Bhagavan and spiritual reality in general.

We can understand and realize these things through buddhi yoga, or the engagement of the higher functions of intelligence or intellect. The material mind and senses are not subtle enough, because they are encrusted by ahankara and mamata, while intelligence is made purely of sattva and therefore constitutes the bridge between the subtle dimension and the spiritual dimension, much like the prana constitutes the bridge between the gross physical body and the subtle body made of energy and mind. True, buddhi is listed among the eight elemental principles of the material world (7.4), but by definition it is consciousness and knowledge, and as such it can never be bogged down by tamas or ignorance, or distracted by rajas or greed. In fact, actual intelligence is the sharp sword that can cut through illusion (4.41, 5.25, 15.3).

This is also confirmed by the first word in the verse, cetasa ("consciously, with awareness") that is closely related to the expression mat citta in the second line of the verse. The reference to buddhi and cetasa automatically excludes adharma and vikarma from the vast range of activities (sarva karmani) that one can offer to God in pure devotional service (mat parah, "dedicated to me"), even with the idea of personally renouncing the enjoyment of their results (sannyasya, "renouncing while performing"). For example, Krishna simply asks for pure offerings such as a leaf, a flower, a fruit, and water, and the smriti also confirms that one can present the Deity with a vast range of pure vegetarian ingredients and preparations. There is not one single passage in the scriptures where God requires the offering of non-vegetarian or impure items; when such offerings are allowed, they are meant to facilitate the development of devotion in neophyte persons influenced by the lower gunas, and when performed in that way, they are supported by intelligence and consciousness as they can wean the individual away from ordinary butchery meat.

Renunciation to all activities must be done in one's consciousness (cetasa) by offering the fruits to the Supreme as the center of one's life (mat parah) and acting selflessly; on this level of renounced (detached) consciousness one can and actually should continue to perform all activities for the service of the Supreme. Of course this is a gradual process. In the beginning the sadhaka starts to worship God with a sentiment of devotion that is mixed with some personal desires (sa-kama) and is still clouded by material concepts (prakrita), therefore the position of such devotee is called kanistha ("immature"). In the intermediate stage (madhyama) the devotee purifies his/ her intelligence (buddhi) and cultivates knowledge (jnana) and detachment (vairagya), that bring the realization of the supreme Consciousness in an increasingly clear vision. Finally, at the highest level (uttama) the devotee takes full shelter (upasritya) in this supreme Consciousness and is not distracted by any separate interest (ananya) and fully concentrates on the supreme Consciousness only (aikantika). Again, these stages are present in all the forms of yoga, starting from the deliberate effort to engage in the search for the Supreme Consciousness and ending in samadhi or complete and constant immersion in that Supreme Consciousness (satatam).

मच्चित्तः सर्वदुर्गाणि मत्प्रसादात्तरिष्यसि । अथ चेत्त्वमहंकारान्न श्रोष्यसि विनङ्क्ष्यसि ॥ १८-५८ ॥

maccittah sarvadurgāṇi matprasādattariṣyasi | atha cettvamahaṅkāraṇna śroṣyasi vinakṣyasi || 18-58 ||

mat citta: in my consciousness; sarva durgani: all difficulties; mat prasadat: by my grace; tariṣyasi: you will overcome; atha: but; cet: if; tvam: you; ahankaran: because of egotism; na śroṣyasi: you will not listen; vinakṣyasi: you will be lost.

"In my consciousness you will overcome all difficulties by my grace. However, if you choose not to listen, because of egotism, you will be lost.

It is important to understand that this verse is not the threat of a punishment for a disobedience or lack of faith. It is a simple statement of a scientific truth about the natural laws of the universe: the more we develop our intelligence and consciousness, the better we will be able to overcome all difficulties, while by choosing ignorance because of foolish personal ego and pride against our conscience and the harmony of the universe we only become lost and suffer unnecessarily.

There is a supreme order in the universe (rita) by which the planets move in their proper orbits, the elements regularly fulfill their functions, and all beings work for the support and the progress of the entire universal community. Except for human beings, all creatures evolve in a predetermined way, according to the stringent laws of nature that dictate their reactions and behaviors; human beings too are carried around in the machinery of the cosmos (yantrarudhani mayaya, 18.61) but due to their particular intermediate position they can choose the direction of their movement and actions by leaning on one side rather than the other. These two sides are the daivi prakriti and the asuri prakriti (see chapter 16), that will pull the individual higher or lower respectively; these are also called para ("supreme") and apara ("not supreme"), or in an approximate English translation, "spiritual" and "material".

The definitions of spiritual versus material can be misleading for those who suffer from cultural prejudice, because abrahamic ideologies openly demonize material nature (this world, the bodies, etc) and therefore one could be tempted to condemn material nature and try to fight against it. This would be a spectacular mistake, inevitably doomed to failure, because material nature is the divine Shakti (daivi hy esa gunamayi mama maya, 7.14), and the individual jivatmans are utterly impotent against her. In fact, without the blessings of Mother Mahamaya, one will never be able to make any progress either materially or spiritually. When the jivatman chooses to take shelter in the daivi prakriti, he is not approaching a different personality that is opposed or rival to asuri prakriti; he is simply appealing to the divine "side" of the same supreme Goddess, and showing that he is ready to evolve and cooperate for the common good. On the other hand, those who want to be "tough" and show asuric qualities and characteristics will be met with the Goddess' fierce and terrifying side. It is important to understand here that the asuras are not the people who worship the fierce aspect (asaumya or ugra rupa) of the Goddess, but those who oppose the laws of the universe to enforce their own ego, and therefore become subject to the punishment given by the Goddess. Those who find this point difficult to understand because they are attracted by the "peaceful" Vishnu should remember that Vishnu too has his own ugra forms (Narasimha, for example), and asuras certainly do not worship such forms but enter in contact with them in a rather different way.

The name Durga literally means "fort, prison" (and by extension, "restriction, limitation, difficulty" as in this verse) and indeed Mother Durga is fully in charge of the fortress of this world and providing suitable holding cells for all those crazy, violent and dangerous criminals who refuse to listen, understand and cooperate with the rest of society. Chapter 16 has given a very detailed portrait of such people (16.4 to 16.24), comparing them to the people who have chosen to take shelter in the divine qualities and behaviors (16.1, 16.2, 16.3) that are based on mutual support and cooperation with the universal community. Because of the particular position of human birth, at any time one can decide to change direction and qualify for liberation; there is no prejudice or injustice in this system, just like there is no favoritism in the law of gravity. What may seem to be different standards of treatment are actually due to the fact that the favored individual has a better knowledge or consciousness of the general laws and principles, and uses intelligence to navigate difficulties: this is what is clearly expressed in this verse.

Krishna had already stated very clearly that he is not interested in the merits and demerits of the individual souls and does not want anything for himself (3.22, 5.15), but he gladly reciprocates (4.11, 4.14, 9.9, 9.29) with those who want to learn, evolve and unite with him. Krishna never gives orders to anyone, but simply asks us to listen (2.39, 7.1, 10.1, 13.4, 16.6, 17.2, 17.7, 18.4, 18.19, 18.29, 18.45) to his good advice; he explain facts and things with logic and reason, and then lets us decide what we want to do (18.63, 18.64).

God Consciousness (mat cittah) is not consciousness "about" God, but rather the conscious perception of the entire Reality as microcosm and macrocosm, inside us and outside us, and of the eternal and universal mechanisms that move it - the three material gunas (sattva, rajas, tamas) in the material dimension and the three spiritual gunas (sat, cit, ananda) in the spiritual dimension. Therefore this Consciousness is the position (pada) or abode (dhama) both in this material universe and in the spiritual dimension.

To develop and maintain this focus on the supreme Consciousness, we need to hear (or read) about it from the genuine scriptures and from those devotees who have already attained the level of direct realization: nasta prayesv abhadresu nityam bhagavata sevaya, bhagavaty uttama sloke bhaktir bhavati naisthiki, "All inauspicious things are destroyed by constantly serving the discourses on Bhagavan; in this way one becomes firmly situated in the dedication to Bhagavan, who is described by wonderful verses" (Bhagavata Purana, 1.2.18). The simple act of hearing or listening (sravana) is already considered a valid service and a meritorious action, and the engine of progress and evolution. It is important to understand here that service (seva) indicates regular association or practice in a favorable sentiment, just like we have seen in verse 6.20 of Bhagavad gita with reference to dedication to yoga (yoga sevaya).

It is interesting to notice that Krishna is saying "you will overcome all difficulties", not "you will not find any difficulties" or "all difficulties will disappear". Many unevolved people believe that religion is about praying God to give us free food and an easy life, without temptations or difficulties, and that all the consequences of our past deeds, our debts and trespasses, should be magically and repeatedly deleted any time we ask God to do so. This idea is delusional: we should all earn our food by honest work, face the difficulties meant to test us and stimulate our evolution, take our stand in support of dharma and the universal family, and bravely and honestly be ready to pay our debts and dues at the right time, and even take some responsibility for the other less mature siblings.

It is only small children who ask Father to solve all problems for them, in exchange for some praise and flattering. Grown up sons and daughters are competent to help Father and do some good useful work, and they are ready and willing to face the inevitable difficulties in the discharge of their duties. As Krishna has already stated (3.20, 3.21, 3.22, 3.23, 3.24) even perfectly liberated souls and even divine avataras give a good practical example in this matter, so that nobody can say they are above the need to face difficulties and hard work.

यदहंकारमाश्रित्य न योत्स्य इति मन्यसे । मिथ्यैष व्यवसायस्ते प्रकृतिस्त्वां नियोक्यति ॥ १८-५९ ॥

yadahankāramāśritya na yotsya iti manyase | mithyaiṣa vyavasāyaste prakṛtiṣtvāṁ niyokṣyati || 18-59 ||

yat: if; ahankaram: in egotism; asritya: taking shelter; na yotsya: you will not fight; iti manyase: thinking like this; mithya esah: all this is false; vyavasayah: with determination; te: your; prakṛtiḥ: nature; tvam: you; niyokṣyati: will compel to engage.

"If because of egotism you think, 'I will not fight', this will be a false decision, because your own nature will force you to become engaged.

The previous verse clearly mentioned ahankara (egotism as material identification with body, position and attachments) as the cause for delusion and dereliction of one's duty. This was also explained in verses from 18.5 to 18.9: one should never give up the dutiful activities of sacrifice (yajna), charity (dana) and austerity (tapah), but certainly one should give up the illusion of ahankara (kartaryan, 18.6). A person who is influenced by ignorance tends to do exactly the opposite of what should be done (16.7, 18.30, 18.31, 18.32), therefore instead of renouncing ahankara and sticking to their duties, foolish and ignorant people will renounce their duties and stick to ahankara. Apart from the obvious bad results on the general functioning of the universe, for which they will have to pay the consequences, these fools have taken their stand on very unstable ground, because their understanding is clouded by illusion (mohat, 18.7). If they refuse to perform their prescribed duties, greed and ignorance will engage them in more degrading activities, source of much greater future sufferings. Krishna has stated many times that the delusional incorrect vision of oneself is a product of ignorance (9.12, 14.17, 16.10, 16.16, 18.7, 18.9, 18.25, 18.35) and cannot bring good results, but we can directly verify the truth of such statement by observing the lives of people around us.

The tamasic and rajasic tendencies of the present degraded society are geared to indoctrinate people in the asuric direction, presenting the idea that hard work and study are for foolish nerds and social losers, while cool successful people do not do any real work but simply have fun all day spending money on unnecessary luxuries and industrial food products. Similarly, those who are sincerely interested in spiritual life and personal evolution in the ethical principles are presented as gullible, unreasonable, superstitious and fundamentalist fanatics, while cynical exploitation and selfishness, the unlimited endless pursuit of possessions and positions, and the ostentation of status symbols and arrogance are the road to happiness and success.

The naked reality is that such approach to life only brings sufferings and anxiety from beginning to end. People are forced to work very hard and long hours in jobs they hate to get the money to pay for things they don't need, to impress people they don't care for them. It's sharks eating sharks, and the baddest of all become bigger and bigger and take over the government to legalize their thieveries and criminal aggressions against the general people, and in the end everyone is expected to blindly worship real or imaginary characters that are nothing but asuras.

The bad but expensive food makes them sick, their medicines are engineered to increase their dependencies on pharmaceuticals and medical business, their nice vacations are ordeals from which they need to recover when they come back, their fancy shoes and clothing are very uncomfortable and their relationships are a disaster. All this because they did not want to accept the little healthy difficulties in the journey of personal evolution, the sincere dedication to their natural duty, and refuse to work in harmony with the rest of the universe and develop relationships based on care and true love.

Everybody is compelled to act in one way or another: na hi kascit kṣanam api jatu tisthaty akarma kṛit, karyate hy avasah karma sarvaḥ prakṛiti jair gunaiḥ, "Never, at any time, can a person remain without acting even for one moment, because he is forced to into action by all the gunas born from prakṛiti" (3.5). In fact, the activity itself is carried out by nature only: prakṛiteḥ kriyamanani gunaiḥ karmani sarvasah, ahankara vimudhatma kartaham iti manyate, "All activities are actually performed by the qualities of nature, but a foolish person who is confused by egotism thinks 'I am doing'." (3.27).

We need here to clarify that ahankara is not necessarily an excess of pride and arrogance due to overestimation of oneself. The delusional material identification called ahankara is also the cause for low self esteem or excessive humility. Therefore a self realized soul will never say "I am not able to do this", when life puts something difficult in front of him. Most of the times, it is just fear speaking these words, not intelligence or good sense, and if we actually engage in the action with full attention, a positive attitude and some detachment, we will find it was not so difficult after all, even when it was something we never dreamed of being capable of doing. When we sincerely and bravely perform our duty, we have nothing to lose. As Krishna told Arjuna in the beginning of his discourse (2.37), if we succeed we will be able to use the results of our success, and if we fail we will equally obtain blessings albeit in a different form - experience, realizations, purification.

The support of the universe is not one man's job, so even if we do our part properly, it is possible that externally our efforts will not appear to be successful, but we have been paving the way for the work of others who will build on our sacrifice and bring the entire enterprise to the final success. Our merit will not be lost.

The word mithya is particularly interesting. People confused by ignorance tend to mistake sat for asat, and vice versa, so at times we find some artificial sannyasi who preaches that this world is false, our duties are false, society is false, individuality is false, and everything is false, while only the particular path he is offering is the real truth. We should be very careful, because this is precisely what has been described in verse 18.22 as a position characteristic of tamas and in verse 16.8 as characteristic of the asuric mentality - whether it is proposed by advaitins, dvaitas, vaishnavas or anybody else - and is in violation of the instructions of the shastra, including the teachings of Bhagavad gita.

So we should remain determined (vyavasayah) and focused (vyavasayatmika buddhi, 2.41) in our service to dharma and vidya, following in the footsteps of so many great teachers, acharyas and even avatars who have invested time, energy and efforts in this work. When we take shelter in the daivi prakriti (9.13), we will certainly be fully engaged, and such engagement will give full satisfaction to the atman. The Bhagavata Purana (1.2.6) confirms: sa vai pumsam paro dharmo yato bhaktir adbhotsaje ahaituki apratibata yayatma suprasidati, "The supreme dharma for all human beings is loving dedication to the inconceivable Lord, and this bhakti can completely satisfy the soul when it is selfless and constant."

स्वभावजेन कौन्तेय निबद्धः स्वेन कर्मणा । कर्तुं नेच्छसि यन्मोहात्करिष्यस्यवशोपि तत् ॥ १८-६० ॥

svabhāvajena kaunteya nibaddhaḥ svena karmaṇā । kartuṁ necchasi yānmohātkariṣyasyaśopi tat ॥ 18-60 ॥

sva bhava jena: by that (activity) born from (your) specific nature; kaunteya: o son of Kunti; nibaddha: bound; svena: by your particular; karmaṇa: duties; kartuṁ: to perform; na icchasi: you do not wish to; yat: that which; mohat: because of illusion; kariṣyasi: you will perform; avasah: involuntarily; api: even; tat: that.

"O son of Kunti, you are bound by those particular activities that are created by your own nature. Even if you do not wish to perform such duty because of illusion, you will find yourself acting in that way instinctively.

As long as we are incarnated in this world, the elements of the body and mind will be functioning according to the laws of material nature - guna, karma, etc - and this is a strong bondage, like the shackles of a prisoner. The word nibaddha means "shackles, bondage, ties" but can also be used in a positive sense, as in family relationships or social ties, that determine our particular duties towards family and society according to our congenital qualities. This is confirmed by Brahma while talking to Priyavrata: yad vaci tantryam guna karma damabbhi, sudustarair vatsa vāyam sñojitah, sarve vahamo balim isvaraya prota nasiva dvi pade catus padah, "The words of Brahman (the shastra and the natural laws of the universe) bind us like a long rope consisting of guna and karma. This rope is extremely strong, and we are all bound by it to Isvara, just like a man drives cattle by pulling at the rope tied to their noses." (Bhagavata Purana 5.1.14).

Such a rope can be very dangerous when our attachment ties us to people who have chosen to neglect the true purpose of human life: na te vidum svartha gatim hi visnum, durasaya ye bahir artha maninah, andha yathandhair upaniyamanas te 'pisa tantryam uru damni baddbah, "Those who focus only on acquiring difficult goals in the external world are oblivious to their real purpose of life - the realization of Vishnu. They are like blind people following other blind people, and they are all bound by very strong ropes." (Bhagavata Purana 7.5.31).

As it normally happens when we are tightly bound by ropes and shackles, we develop skin irritation and an itchy feeling. Prahlada explains: yan matibunadi grihamedhi sukham hi tuccham, kanduyanena karayor iva dubkha dubkham, tripyanti neha kripana bahu dubkha bhajah, kandutivam manasijam visabeta dhirah, "That (life that is based on) couple relationship and everything that is connected to it, all types of family and society pleasures, are insignificant like the rubbing of hands to relieve an itching. One can never find satisfaction in this material world full of sufferings, but the kripana willingly follows all these sorrows as if they were the purpose of life. One who is able to tolerate this itching created by the mind is a sober person." (Bhagavata Purana 7.9.45).

If we learn how to use these ropes and shackles to our advantage rather than being hampered by them, we can attain a greater success; we can make the example of the famous martial art called capoeira, that was developed in the 16th century by the black slaves imported from west Africa to Brazil by the Portuguese invaders, to be employed in the sugar cane plantations there. The slave workers were shackled with chains at all times, so that they would not be able to walk around too freely, but they were allowed to do some singing and dancing in the night, also for the entertainment of their masters. So with the pretext of acrobatic dance movements on the rhythmic music they practiced many fighting moves, such as kicking and spinning, even utilizing the weight of the chains to their advantage, and in this way several of them were able to escape and take shelter in the jungle.

It is said that the word capoeira comes from the Tupi words ka'a ("jungle") and puer ("it was"), referring to these hiding places, where a new culture was created together with the local native tribes in revolutionary settlements called quilombos, attracting more fugitive slaves and teaching capoeira as a combat technique by which they successfully opposed the colonial regime and their military expeditions trying to eliminate the rebellion. We, too, can use the shackles of the material gunas with intelligence, deliberation and purpose, and ultimately earn our liberation from bondage. This is opposed to the helpless blundering of one who has no control on his movements (avasa, meaning "without deliberate choice, helplessly, without control"), and is completely confused (mohat, "out of illusion").

The present situation in which we were born, with the attending guna and karma, was created by samskaras or previous impressions due to our actions and choices in our previous lifetimes, and it can be modified considerably by applying the same medicine of good samskaras. Narada tells Vyasa: amayo yas ca bbutanam jayate yena suvrata, tad eva hy amayam draryam na punati cikitsitam, "The diseases of the living beings can be cured by the (proper) application of the very same thing that caused the disease in the first place" (Bhagavata Purana 1.5.33). We can understand from this statement that samskaras, gunas and karma can be used both ways, either for our progress and purification, for our degradation and bondage; the choice is ours (6.5, 6.6).

ईश्वरः सर्वभूतानां हृद्देशेऽर्जुन तिष्ठति ।

भ्रामयन्सर्वभूतानि यन्त्रारूढानि मायया ॥ १८-६१ ॥

īśvaraḥ sarvabhūtānāṃ hṛddeśe'ṛjuna tiṣṭhati | bhrāmayansarvabhūtāni yantrārūdhāni māyayā || 18-61 ||

isvarah: the Lord; sarva bhutanam: of all beings; hṛd dese: in the place of the heart; arjuna: o Arjuna; tiṣṭhati: resides; bbramayan: going around; sarva bhutani: all beings; yantra: on a machine; arudhani: placed; mayaya: under the power of illusion.

"O Arjuna, the Lord of all beings resides in the heart (of all beings), and all beings move around each in its own high position as parts of a machinery under the power of Maya.

The word yantra in this verse indicates the one single great mechanism that is the macrocosm, the Virata Rupa of the supreme Atman, as well as the body of the various living entities within the universe, in which the supreme Atman resides as well. All such forms are powered by Maya through the various elements listed by the Sankhya philosophy.

In previous chapters, Krishna has already stated: sarvasya caham bṛidī sannivisto mattab smritir jñanam apobanam ca, vedāis ca sarvair aham eva vedyo vedantaḥ kṛid veda vid eva caham, "I am situated in the heart of all/ everything, and from me come memory, knowledge and forgetfulness. I am the scope of the study of all the Vedas. I certainly am the creator of Vedanta, and the one who knows the Vedas." (15.15), tesam evanukampartham aham ajnanaḥ tam tamah, nasayamy atma bhavaḥ stho jñana dipena bhasvata, "Out of my kindness for them, I destroy the darkness of ignorance from within their hearts, by shining forth with the radiant lamp of knowledge" (10.11), and jyotisam āpi taj jyotisam param ucyate, jñeyam jñana gamyam bṛidī sarvasya viṣṭhitam, "He is described as the light in all radiant things, transcendental to darkness. He is established in the heart of everything, and he is to be known through the cultivation of knowledge." (13.18).

The same point was presented also in 13.28 and 13.29, and in verse 8.9, that declared that Isvara is also present within each atom (anor aniyam), echoing a similar verse in Katha Upanishad (1.2.20): anor aniyam mahato mahiyan atmasya jantor nibhito gubhayaḥ, tam akṛatubh pasyati vīta soko dhatubh prasadan mahiyanam atmanah, "Smaller than the atom and bigger than the entire cosmic manifestation (mahat), situated in the innermost heart of all living being, he is the witness that does not act, and by his blessing one becomes free from all worries: such are the glories of the Atman". And also in Svetasvatara Upanishad (6.11): eko deva sarva bhutesu gudbah, sarva vyāpi sarva bhūtantaratma karmadhyakṣaḥ sarva bhūtabhivasah sakṣi ceta kevalo nirgunas ca, "God is one, but he is in the heart of each living being. He is all-pervading, yet he is localized in the innermost being of all beings as the Atman. He is the witness of all actions, but above all actions, he is beyond duality and beyond the gunas".

The word isvara applies to Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan, and in fact even to the Atman: sariram yad avapnoti yac capy utkeramati isvarah grhitvaitani samyati yayur gandhan ivasayat, "The Lord who has entered a body and accepted all these (the mind and senses), then he goes out again, like air carries scents" (15.8). Remembering this verse is important because it protects us from the mistake of considering the living entities as mere puppets devoid of any free will. The Lord of all beings and all existences is not a distant tyrant with a pathological need to control his creatures as presented by some other ideologies; God is Consciousness itself, so the individual atman also directly participates of the identity of God.

This supreme realization is also clearly affirmed in the maha vakyas ("great statements") considered the essence of the Upanishads: sarvam khalv idam brahma, "all this is Brahman" (Chandogya Upanishad, 7.25.2, Nṛsiṃha uttara tāpani Upanishad, 7), prajñanam brahma, "Brahman is full consciousness/ knowledge" (Aitareya Upanishad, 3.3), as well as aham brahmasmi, "I am Brahman" (Bṛihad Aranyaka Upanishad 1.4.10), āyam atma brahma, "this Atman is Brahman" (Mandukya Upanishad 2), tat tvam asi, "you are that (Brahman)" (Chandogya Upanishad, 6.8.7) and so 'ham, "I am that (Brahman)" (Narada parivrajaka Upanishad, 6.4).

This sublime knowledge is found in Vedic tradition (Hinduism) only, and constitutes the highest level of the realization of yoga (yoga arudha, 6.3, 6.4), while the arurukṣa ("one who desires to attain the high level") is a beginner in the practice of yoga (6.3). We find this same definition (arudha) in this verse, connected to the word yantra, that literally means "machine, mechanism, device, vehicle". In the science of Tantra, a yantra is a geometric symbolic representation of the Deity, that works as a "vehicle" for the Deity's personal presence during the rituals, much like the elaborate vigrahas we normally see in public worship, but more suitable for private personal worship.

As we have seen in the chapters on Vibhuti yoga and Viśva rupa darśana yoga, this entire cosmic manifestation is a yantra, and so are the bodies of all living entities - they are vehicles and temples at the same time, as both the atman and the param atman reside in them and can be worshiped through proper service or sva dharma. Both types of vehicles are made of māya (mahamāya/ yogamāya), and therefore we can actually say that all activities are performed by Prakṛiti, just like the driver of a vehicle simply gives the directions and the vehicle itself does the work and travels around (bbramayan).

The use of the word arudhani in connection with the position of Isvara in all the beings (sarva bhutani) shows a natural superiority of atman/ brahman over the vehicle itself, and of the param atman on the jīva atman, as it is a "high" position. However, this superiority should not be cause for envy, because on the transcendental level there is no duality, as the natural, happy and healthy position of the cells in the body is to attune to the superior consciousness of the entire body and participate to it through favorable service.

तमेव शरणं गच्छ सर्वभावेन भारत ।

तत्प्रसादात्परां शान्तिं स्थानं प्राप्स्यसि शाश्वतम् ॥ १८-६२ ॥

tameva śaraṇaṁ gaccha sarvabhāvena bhārata । tatprasādātparāṁ śāntiṁ sthānaṁ prāpsyasi śāśvatam ॥ 18-62 ॥

tam: to him; eva: certainly; saranam gaccha: go and take shelter; sarva bhavena: in all the bbavas; bharata: o descendant of Bharata; tat prasadat: by his grace; param santim: the supreme peace; sthanam: position; prapsyasi: you will attain; sasvatam: eternal.

"O descendant of Bharata, you should approach and take shelter of him in all circumstances. By his grace you will attain the imperishable position of supreme peace."

Although one, Consciousness manifests in many individual amsas, or parts, that are called svamsas ("direct parts" as the Devas) and vibhinamsas ("separate parts") as the jiva atmans (13.17, 15.6). Krishna teaches us that atman and brahman are simultaneously and inconceivably identical and different, and that the supreme purpose of human life consists in uniting (yoga) the atman into the brahman, thus realizing their transcendental oneness.

We should not be confused by this, because if the idea is inconceivable through the material logic of mind and senses, it can be directly perceived (prakasa, darshana) through spiritual intelligence (visuddha buddhi) and the eyes of the scriptures (11.8, 13.35, 15.10). This is the reason why it is not possible to attain any realization without a careful preliminary study of the shastra (13.26, 15.20, 16.23, 17.24), and why only bhakti can open the last door to perfect realization (4.3, 7.17, 8.22, 9.14, 9.29, 9.34, 11.54, 11.55, 12.14, 12.20, 13.11, 13.19, 14.26, 18.54, 18.55, 18.65).

This is also hinted in this verse by the expression sarva bhavena ("with all bbavas", "in all bbavas"), where bhava means "existence, being, nature, body, birth, circumstance of life", and also "emotion, sentiment, loving relationship". The supreme union (yoga) between the atman and the brahman is therefore compared to the mystical moment of merging of the existence of two lovers, the thrill of ecstasy where the ego dissolves and is forgotten. It is the spandakarika, the sacred tremor, the throbbing of formless and all pervading happiness, existence and consciousness that is at the very nucleus of creation and dissolution, symbolized by the loving orgasmic union between Shiva and Shakti, between Krishna and Radha. In this ecstasy, all differences lose their meaning, and the two become one. This liberating experience, that radically changes the perception of existence, is deeply feared and hated by the asuras, who therefore strive to eliminate and prohibit true love and selflessness from their own lives and from the lives of the people under their dominion, and replace it with the ultimate and greatest manifestation of egotism - the cruel lust of possession and domination that we call rape.

To facilitate the evolutionary journey of the anu atmans, culminating in the ecstatic experience of atman/ brahman realization, the supreme Consciousness creates a distinction between the One and the Parts, emanating innumerable "separate parts" (vibhinamsas) and manifesting the cosmos to accommodate them, and even entering into this universe and within each body and each atom to enjoy the pleasure of the company of its parts. As we see exemplified in Arjuna's words about his own relationship with Krishna, this supreme Consciousness is always with us, walking with us, lying down, sitting, eating, joking and having fun, when we are alone or in the presence of others (11.41, 11.42). The Bhagavata Purana (11.11.6) says: suparnav etau sadrisau sakshayan yadricchayaitau krita-nidan ca vrikse, ekas tayoh khadati pippalannam anyo niranno 'pi balena bhuyan, "Two birds of similar nature and related by friendship have made a nest in a tree by their own choice; one is eating the food from the banyan tree, the other is not eating but he is more powerful."

The same image is found in Mundaka Upanishad (3.1.1): dva suparna sayuja sakshaya samanam vrikksam parisavajate, tayor anyah pippalam svadv atty anasnann anyo 'bhicakasiti, "Two birds are sitting on the same tree as friends; one bird is eating the fruits of the tree, and the other is simply observing, without eating."

This exact verse is repeated in Svetasvatara Upanishad (4.6), and another verse is added (4.7): samane vrikse puruso nimagno 'nisaya socati muhyamanah, justam yada pasyaty anyam isam asya mahimanam iti vita-sokah, "Although the two purushas are in the same tree, one is experiencing deep anxiety and confusion, but if he turns towards the Lord and becomes aware of his glories, immediately he becomes free from all worries."

It is not difficult to approach the Lord of all beings (isvara sarva bhutanam) and take shelter in him, as he also resides in the same body (8.4, 13.23, 13.32, 15.8, 16.18, 17.6) because of his friendship and love for the individual soul. This param atman ("supreme soul" and also "soul of the soul") is always ready to communicate with the individual soul and in fact his voice is known popularly as the "voice of conscience". The relationship of the individual soul with this supreme soul can be understood as similar to the relationship of the consciousness of a body cell compared to the consciousness of the owner of the entire body; at all times the body cell is supported by the entire body and the consciousness that sustains and directs it, through the DNA interface as well as through the constant exchange of nutrition. The nucleus of the cell is identical with the nucleus of the entire body, because it consists of genetic information - consciousness or knowledge.

We have seen that the Bhagavata Purana very clearly defines the Supreme as knowledge (tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti bhagavan iti sabdyate, 1.2.11), and this is also confirmed in the other seminal Vedic texts; for example Taittiriya Upanishad (2.1.1), elaborating on the origin of jivatmans, clearly says, satyam jnanam anantam brahma, "Brahman is the absolute Truth, the unlimited Knowledge".

Already in verse 13.23 Krishna had stated that this paramatman is present in the body as the consciousness that witnesses the jivatman and its actions; he gives advice and permission (anumanta), supports the jivatman and oversees and enjoys its activities (upadrastanumanta ca bharta bhokta mahesvarah, paramatmeti capy ukto debe 'smin purusah parah). Thus the limited consciousness depends on the unlimited consciousness for its activities and existence, and they are distinct and different in scope and level in the course of conditioned life. This is also confirmed in Vedānta sūtras: sarīras cōbhaye api hi bhedena enam adbhijate, "Both (the jīvatman and the paramatman) are present within the body, as distinct from each other" (Vedānta sūtra 1.2.20) and guhāṃ pravṛtstav atmanam hi tad darsanat, "Both (jīvatman and paramatman) have entered the cave (of the body), but the atman is distinct from that (supreme)" (Vedānta sūtra 1.2.113).

We have already mentioned that the jīvatman is an emanation of the Supreme, generated directly by God (mama eva amsa jīva loke, jīva bhūta sanatanah, 15.7). This is abundantly confirmed in the Upanishads: sad eva saumyēdam agra asid ekam evadvitīyam tad aikṣata babu syam prajāyeya, "In the beginning was the Supreme, who was one without a second. He thought: 'Let me become many. Let me become the progenitor of many'." (Chandogya Upanishad 6.2.1), so 'kamayata babu syam prajāyeya sa tapo 'tapyata tapas tapīva idam sarvām asrijat. yad idam kincana tat sristva tad evanupravisat. tad anupravisya sac ca tyaḥ cabbhavat, "He desired: 'I will become many, I will father a numerous progeny'. From his tapab, he created everything. Then he entered within the world he had created, and he became all that is manifest and all that is non manifest" (Taittiriya Upanishad 2.6.1), sa aikṣata lokan nu srija, "He thought: 'Now I shall create the people/ the worlds'." (Aitareya Upanishad 1.1.2), yato va imani bhūtani jayante, "From the Supreme these beings were born." (Taittiriya Upanishad 2.1.1), tad atmanam svayam akuruta, "He created (everything) from his own atman" (Taittiriya Upanishad 2.7.1), tasmad va etasmad atmana akasah sambhūtat, "From the Atman the akasha (space, first of the material elements) was manifested" (Taittiriya Upanishad 2.1.1).

We should not project our material limitations on God. We have seen that Isvara Bhagavan is the Father (9.17, 11.43, 14.5), but s/he is also the Mother (9.17, 14.3). This is clearly confirmed in the Upanishads: yad bhūta yonim paripasyanti dhirab, "The wise see that Brahman is the womb from which everything was born" (Mundaka Upanishad 1.1.6), kūrtaṃ isam puruṣam brahma yonim, "The Supreme Personality of Godhead is the original creator, the womb from which everything was born" (Mundaka Upanishad 3.1.6).

This is the key to true self realization: ya eko 'varṇo babudha sakti-yogad, varṇan anekan nibitartho dadhati, vi caiti cante visvam adau sa devah, sa no buddhya subhaya samyunaktau, "May the one, unrivaled Supreme Personality of Godhead, who for his own purpose created the many varieties of living entities by the agency of his potencies, who created everything in the beginning and into whom everything enters at the end, grant pure intelligence to us." (Svetasvatara Upanishad 4.1)

Everybody has a conscience, and if we listen carefully we can hear its clear voice and deep down, under all the layers of ego and mental accumulations, we know that our conscience is giving us excellent advice and that we should follow it for our own good. However, our conscience does not give orders or force us to do anything; we are always free to choose to disregard and neglect its voice and even forget its existence for any length of time: it is up to us.

God does not interfere and does not get offended if we do not follow his instructions, and whenever we are ready to listen, he will be there to guide us with the same unchanged affection and wisdom. Forced compliance has no real value because when a child is forced to obey, he cannot really learn and evolve; as soon as the prohibition is somehow slackened or can be escaped, he will inevitably try to engage in that very same activity that was once forbidden - and with a stronger and more violent desire, because repression can only aggravate the problem and make it more dangerous and perverted.

The foolish parents and guardians who follow the abrahamic approach of "not sparing the rod to teach a child for his own good" are creating repressed monsters that will some day vent their own festering frustrations on other innocent creatures, becoming fully fledged asuras like their elders before them, and losing all sense of intelligence and conscience under a toxic mountain of subconscious guilt and self-loathing, fear, conformism, hatred, anxiety, greed, obsessions and psychological diseases.

In the last centuries the same approach has been imposed for the relationship of the governments with the citizens, and we need to understand that it is directly derived from the example of the God of the Bible, that whimsically and unexpectedly strikes even his faithful worshipers when he is irritated by some small mistake or even some involuntary accident or just because he wants to do so - and don't ask questions or you will be treated as an offender.

On the other hand, we see that in non-abrahamic cultures and religions people are free to think, speak and live in the way they choose, although aggression is naturally considered a crime; the famous slogan of the Wiccan Rede (presented as "witch-craft" by the dominant abrahamic-based culture) is, "An' it harm none, do what you will" ("as long as it does no harm to anyone, do what you want to do") and it nicely summarizes the point.

The expression yatha icchasi tathā kuru ("then do whatever you wish to do") clearly shows the liberality of Krishna's advice and his patience and detachment as well, and it demonstrates the abyss of difference between original Hinduism and the abrahamic faiths. However, it is important to notice that Krishna does not say, "do as you please", because he wants to make sure that the jīva atman makes a responsible and sober choice, that is not simply based on the superficial and childish attraction of likes and dislikes, because growing up means becoming able to understand that what may seem unpleasant in the beginning could be nectar in the end, and the other way around (18.36, 18.37, 18.38, 18.39, 5.22, 16.23). The conditioned atman naturally seeks happiness, but he does not have clear ideas on how to find it, therefore Krishna wants to make sure that he properly understands the indications on how to reach true happiness.

It is true that all paths ultimately lead to God (mama vartmanuvartante manusyah partha sarvasah, 3.23) because each individual can develop gradually in his/ her own time and sweet will, going through the different experiences in a personalized order, but it is also true that some courses will lead us more directly to the destination, while by choosing other courses it may take much longer (16.20). However, the entire journey is supposed to be an evolutionary experience tailored according to our individual tastes and preferences, so God does not interfere, and leaves the travel arrangements to the agency of Nature in pursuance of the choices of the individual atman. Paramatma is the witness, and advisor and the facilitator only (upadrasta anumanta ca, 13.23); like a good parent and teacher, he gives instructions and not orders, as he prefers educating rather than dominating.

We have already mentioned several times that God never demands blind obedience or faith; those who believe and teach that religion consists in submitting to commandments, dogma and fatwas out of fear for God, are actually speaking in the name of something that is not God. While abrahamic ideologies and their derivatives (such as communism etc) demand that their members renounce the use of intelligence, common sense and ethical conscience in the name of faith, obedience and allegiance to the established authorities of the system they follow, Bhagavad gita and Vedic tradition encourage people to develop their God-given intelligence and purify it through the understanding of the eternal and universal ethical principles of dharma.

This is particularly indicated by the words vimsrjya ("pondering over, meditating") and asesena ("on the whole and specifically"). One should not act whimsically and irresponsibly, because each action will create consequences; ignorance of the laws of nature is no excuse. The lessons offered us by life and Mother Nature are not pointless - on the contrary, they are very carefully and lovingly engineered to help us learn and grow in the best possible way.

We have all experienced the fact that at first the teacher offers hints without speaking, to see if we are intelligent enough to understand the point by ourselves, then he speaks in a soft voice giving a short explanation, and then if we still do not understand the explanation becomes longer and harsher and the tone of voice becomes louder to express a sense of urgency and importance. We should not think that our lack of comprehension is hurting the teacher, or that the teacher hates us because he is showing anger when we do not care about our studies; a good teacher is worried about our good or bad results in the upcoming tests and is trying to spare us greater sufferings in the future. We should appreciate that, and remember it when we cry out and wonder why we failed at the exams, and blame God for our shortcomings.

Transcendental knowledge of liberation is called the supreme secret among secrets (guhyad guhyataram) but not because it is some incomprehensible mystery that we should accept unquestionably. The entire Bhagavad gita consists in a series of questions posed by Arjuna to clarify the doubts that anyone could have in the study of Vedic science, and in Krishna's elaborate answers from all possible angles; the word akhyatam, "I have explained", indicates the care and dedication that Krishna has invested in presenting the transcendental knowledge of Bhagavad gita, not just in these last verses or on this occasion on the battlefield of Kurukshetra, but many other times as he has already mentioned (4.1, 4.8).

On a deeper level, we should consider this verse meaning remembering that the word jnana includes all the modes of yoga presented in Bhagavad gita - Arjuna visada yoga, Sankhya yoga, Karma yoga, Jnana yoga, Sannyasa yoga, Dhyana yoga, Vijnana yoga, taraka brahma yoga, Raja guhya yoga, Vibhuti yoga, Visva rupa darsana yoga, Bhakti yoga, Prakeriti-purusha-viveka yoga, Guna traya vibhaga yoga, Purusottama yoga, Dainvasura sampada vibhaga yoga, Sraddha traya vibhaga yoga, and Moksha yoga. The word jnana also indicated Bhagavan himself, as we have already mentioned several times.

Therefore we should not be superficial and childish like those fools who dismiss jnana as a mere "impurity" in the practice of bhakti (jnana misra bhakti); this is also indicated by Krishna's instruction here: vimrisyatad asesena. This is confirmed in the Upanishads and also in Bhagavata Purana: vadanti tat tattva vides, tattvam yaj jnanam advayam, brahmeti paramatmeti, bhagavan iti sadyate, "Those who know the tattva declare that tattva is undivided Knowledge, variously called Brahman, Paramatma, and Bhagavan" (Bhagavata Purana 1.2.11), and satyam jnanam anantam brahma, "Brahman is the absolute Truth, the unlimited Knowledge" (Taittiriya Upanishad 2.1.1).

सर्वगुह्यतमं भूयः शृणु मे परमं वचः ।

इष्टोऽसि मे दृढमिति ततो वक्ष्यामि ते हितम् ॥ १८-६४ ॥

sarvaguhyatamaṁ bhūyaḥ śṛṇu me paramaṁ vacaḥ | iṣṭo'si me dṛḍhamiti tato vakṣyāmi te hitam || 18-64 ||

sarva guhya tamam: the most secret of all (knowledge); bhuyah: again; srnu: listen; me: from me; paramam vacah: the supreme instruction; istab asi: you are dear; me: to me; dridham: extremely; iti: thus; tatah: therefore; vakasyami: I am telling; te hitam: for your benefit.

"Again hear from me the greatest secret of all, the supreme instruction. You are very dear to me, and this is why I am speaking for your benefit.

In this verse, the word iti indicates that the instructions of Krishna in Bhagavad gita are drawing to the final conclusion. This means that the process of teaching regularly needs some test to verify what the student has been able to understand and learn; after explaining the subject from all possible angles, the teacher will sit back and let the student talk and make his choices (yatha icchasi tatha kuru).

Krishna is talking with Arjuna in a very confidential manner, because Arjuna is his friend and devotee (4.3, 10.1) and has surrendered to him as a disciple to the guru (2.7, 6.39). Bhagavan reciprocates the feelings and service of those who love him (tams tathaiva bhajamy aham, 4.11, ye bhajanti tu mam bhaktya mayi te tesu capy aham, 9.29). He will personally protect those who take shelter in him (9.31, 11.55), and he has a special affection for those who strive to qualify themselves by developing the divine characteristics and behaviors (12.14, 12.15, 12.16, 12.17, 12.19, 12.20). However, he still is the loving friend of all beings (subridam sarva bhutanam, 5.29).

Bhagavan never tires and never abandons us, even when our disastrous choices drag us into the lowest levels of degradation and stupidity, and even when our ignorance and arrogance force us to obstruct the progress of others. From time to time, the supreme Consciousness descends as avatara (4.1, 4.5, 4.8, 2.12) to re-establish the correct understanding of *dharm*a and vidya, because human beings often misuse their free will and tend to make a mess of things. Bhagavan does not hate anyone (9.29), and even when he is confronting the asuras and the duskritas ("the evil doers") to stop their destructive activities, he is still moved by affection and benevolence for them. The great Daksha recognized this truth after being shaken from his arrogant complacency: daksha uvaca, bhuyan anugraha abo bhavat krto me, dandas tvaya mayi bhrito yad api pralabdhab, "O Lord, you have done me a great favor by punishing me and thus destroying (my arrogance)" (Bhagavata Purana 4.7.13).

We should not think that because Bhagavan does not give orders and does not become offended when we neglect his instructions, we will not be punished when we make a bad mess of things. Already the laws of material nature normally take care of the proper retribution in the form of what we call "karmic reactions" or more correctly, "reactions to vikarma" or "reactions to ugra karma". The effect of the law of karma is the same on everyone, irrespective of their beliefs and allegiances; it is true that Bhagavan in the form of jnana (knowledge) immediately destroys the accumulated reactions of karma in his devotees, but the process is not a "free ticket out of jail" as some foolish people like to think.

In abrahamic ideologies, everyone is considered a sinner because of the simple fact of having taken birth (since birth is a demonic contamination for them, the "original sin"), and the only hope for purification and forgiveness is conversion, that is giving total and blind allegiance to God and his official representatives. This simple act of allegiance is believed to destroy all sins not only at the initial moment of conversion, but also along the entire life of the "faithful", every time he is blessed by the official representatives of God.

The most characteristic example is the "sacrament of confession" in the Catholic church, in which one confesses his/ her sins to a priest and is absolved of all responsibilities and faults, without having to pay any debts to the people s/he harmed. The main prayer of the Christians says, "forgive our sins" (Luke 11.2-4), as if by simply pledging allegiance to God and praying to him could liberate us from the karmic debts we incurred towards our fellow creatures: this is the perfect recipe for disaster, because it destroys all sense of responsibility and justice, and encourages evil doers to continue in their bad activities counting on God's repeated and regular blanket absolution and pardon by the blessing of the priests.

It is the most effective way to strengthen one's resolve to disregard the voice of one's conscience - "I made my peace with God, everything is OK now, and I can do it again in the same way any number of times".

Some ignorant and foolish people could be tempted to apply this approach to verse 18.66 that we are going to study soon: sarva dharman parityajya mam ekam saranam vraja, aham tvam sarva papebhyo moksayishyami ma sucah, "Leaving behind all differences in duties, take shelter in me alone. Do not worry, I will liberate you from all faults." Misunderstanding the meaning of "taking shelter" (2.7, 2.49, 4.10, 7.1, 7.14, 7.29, 9.13, 9.18, 9.32, 11.38, 14.2, 15.4, 18.57, 18.62, 18.66) and "surrendering" (3.30, 4.11, 5.10, 12.6), they conclude that simply by pledging allegiance to the sectarian worship of Krishna and by keeping in good terms with the "established religious authorities" they can afford to commit any crime or evil deed without the fear of being punished, and they will attain paradise at the end of this lifetime. Vedic knowledge does not encourage this foolish delusion, because it does not limit God to a material personality affected by duality as we see in abrahamic ideologies.

One should take shelter of God and surrender to God in the form of his instructions and consciousness, that are based on equal vision towards all beings, development of a divine personality and purification from all bad qualities and bad activities, beginning with the root of all evils, that is material identification and selfish attachment. Thus God liberates us from all faults because the more we become conscious of God, the more we abandon asuric qualities and develop divine qualities, to the point that we completely overcome the connection with the gross material body - not by demonizing it, but by outgrowing it.

True knowledge (jnana) destroys the accumulation of karmic reactions by burning them (4.19), therefore there must be a fire that consumes them, by reducing to ashes the very root of ignorance that is the ahankara-mamatva identification. Bodies will never survive this fire and in fact they are not meant to (2.11-13, 2.16, 2.18, 2.22, 2.23, 2.27, 2.28, 11.27-30), and only the atman is not touched by this destruction (2.23, 2.24), so the destruction of the body of an evil doer is not a loss under any circumstance - not even for him.

In the Vedic system, evil doers (atatayinah, "aggressors") must be immediately met with lethal force while they are engaged in the act of aggression itself. There is no place for reasonable discussion or negotiation, no place for lawyers' tricks to escape justice or to elicit sentimentalist compassion or demands to "respect the human rights" of the criminals, or space for bribing or sneaking one's way out without paying the price for evil deeds. At the very moment when a criminal engages in attacking a good innocent creature, he is forfeiting all his human rights because he is denying the same rights to his victim; the same thing applies for the so-called "religious freedom" by which we are asked to be tolerant towards the intolerant and recognize them the right to deny the same rights to others (including us). This utter idiocy has been created by the abrahamic ideologies only, because they claim for themselves all rights and no duties towards others. Karma is never a one-way street, and those who believe it is are going to pay dearly for that delusion.

After clarifying this, we can elaborate on the ethical principles of dharma that teach that a surrendered enemy should not be punished. The aggressor can and should be punished while he is still engaged in committing the crime, but if before being defeated he surrenders, we should abstain from killing him; removing his weapons and rendering him harmless will be sufficient for the protection of the prajās. If he tries again to attack innocent people or creatures, the criminal should be considered unrepentant and exiled out of the kingdom. This is exactly what the laws of nature do through the dynamics of karma, when it assigns a lower birth to a repeated offender, by denying him the opportunity of a human form of life (manusya janma).

There is a big difference between one's circumstantial position (created by the combined reactions of our previous actions and choices) and the ability to make new and hopefully better choices for our future. Such difference is called jati (birth), but contrarily to what ignorant and stupid casteists believe (on the basis of the racist prejudices reinforced by abrahamic influences), jati refers to the species of the body one has acquired and not to the particular family of birth. Vedic scriptures describe three kinds of jati: manusya jati ("birth as a human being") as opposed to pakṣi jati ("birth as a bird") and mṛiga jati ("birth as a mammal animal"). In this sense, jati is a genetic heritage that gives specific fundamental physical characteristics and abilities. But there are no such genetic differences among human beings in regard to religious duties and social occupations, and Vedic scriptures knew this very well.

मन्मना भव मद्भक्तो मद्याजी मां नमस्कुरु ।

मामेवैष्यसि सत्यं ते प्रतिजाने प्रियोऽसि मे ॥ १८-६५ ॥

manmanā bhava madbhakto madyājī māṁ namaskuru । māmevaiṣyasi satyaṁ te pratijāne priyo'asi me ॥ 18-65 ॥

mat manāḥ: think of me; bhava: become; mat bhaktah: my devotee; mat yaji: my worshiper; mam namaskuru: offer your respect to me; mam: to me; eva: certainly; esyasi: you will come; satyaṁ: in truth; te: to you; pratijane: as a promise; priyah: beloved; asi me: you are to me.

"Focus your mind on me, become my devotee, worship me and offer me respects, and you will certainly come to me. I am truly promising this to you, because you are very dear to me.

Krishna had already given the same instruction in the chapter of the Raja gya yoga ("the supreme secret"): man mana bhava mad bhakto mad yaji mam namaskuru, mam evaisyasi yuktaivam atmanam mat parayanah, "Always think of me, become my devotee and my worshiper. Offer me your respect and dedicate yourself to me. You will attain me because of this connection." (9.34). Also, we found a similar instruction in the chapter on Bhakti yoga: mayy avesya mano ye mam nitya yukta upasate, sraddhaya parayopetas te me yuktatama matah, "Those who are always keeping their mind in me and worship me with faith, always united with me, have attained the supreme level and I consider them as the most intimately united." (12.2). We need to understand this concept very clearly, because an artificial superimposition of alien abrahamic concepts will contaminate the intelligence of those who have a poor fund of knowledge and confuse their understanding, with potentially disastrous consequences.

As we have already explained, abrahamic ideologies (and their derivatives) present blind faith and allegiance (often mistaken for spiritual devotion) as the only required action for those who want to be considered religious people. This creates the delusional idea that "lip service" (i.e. prayer) is sufficient to qualify one for a higher position in religious and spiritual realization; when applied to the process of bhakti, this misunderstanding is compounded by the notion that śravaṇa kīrtana ("hearing and talking") are independent forms of devotional service in themselves and not simply initial stages of a larger process and limbs (āṅga) of a scientific method. Thus superficial people conclude that one just needs to make a show of religiosity in theory without substantiating it with one's actual beliefs and behaviors, but this idea is not confirmed by Bhagavad gita or any other genuine Vedic text or acharya. So for example we see people who consider themselves perfectly situated on the highest platform if they mechanically sit through periodical religious readings, and they expect that such exercise will be sufficient to automatically guarantee them everything they desire and ultimately liberation, too. Technically, this is compared to watering the good plant without bothering to clean out the weeds, and the result is often disappointing because the bad weeds end up consuming all the water and the good plants wither away and do not fructify at all.

It is true that the external modalities of one's worship (mad yaji mam namaskuru) can be adjusted according to the individual circumstances and possibilities (desa, kala, patra) and that we can even engage in many devotional activities also within our own mind, as manasa puja (mental meditation), when it is too difficult to perform them externally (17.19, 18.24, 6.37, 2.40). But we should be honest in our efforts (3.43, 4.12, 6.5, 6.17, 6.25, 6.36, 6.43, 12.11, 15.11); we should strive to engage all our senses in the service of the Supreme, as instructed by the great teachers of bhakti such as Narada Rishi: brīkeshha brīkikena sevānam bhaktir ucyate, "bhakti is defined as engaging one's senses in the service of the Lord of the senses" (Narada Pancaratra, quoted in Bhakti rasamrita sindhu, 1.1.12). Just engaging the sense of hearing is not enough; it is a crucial beginning step, but we need to use all our senses in God's service, and avoid engaging in activities that are unfavorable to such service.

Bhagavan is very liberal and accepts even very small offerings (9.26, 27) also in the simplest and most ordinary daily activities; he suggests a variety of approaches to the method (12.8, 12.9, 12.10, 12.11) to facilitate the choice of those who have attained different levels of realization. The practice of spiritual/ religious sādhana should be comfortable enough to be sustained over long periods of time (su sukham kartum anyayam, 9.2), therefore Krishna is not recommending that we should over-exert ourselves with excessive austerities based on egotism, especially when these are not prescribed by the śāstra or by the guru (asāstra vibhītam ghoram tapyante ye tapo janāḥ, dambhahankarā samyuktāḥ kama rāga bhānvitāḥ, 17.5).

On the contrary, one should make controlled efforts in performing one's duties (yukta cestasva karmasu, 6.17) and abandon the egotistic desire for over-performance (sarvarambha parityagi, 12.16, lobhab pravrittir arambhab karmanam asamah spriha, 14.12, sarvarambha parityagi gunatitah sa ucyate, 14.25).

Still one must make an effort to qualify oneself by developing the divine characteristics and behaviors (12.14, 12.15, 12.16, 12.17, 12.19, 12.20), by understanding the science of God (13.9, mad bhakta etad vijnaya mad bhavayopapadyate), and by working for the benefit of all beings.

Krishna has described the characteristics of a true devotee in many verses; we can quote here one that summarizes them nicely: mat karma krin ma paramo mad bhaktah sanga varjitah, nirvairah sarva bhutesu yab sa mam eti pandava, "My devotee is engaged in working for me and sees me as the supreme Reality. S/he has abandoned all association/ affiliation/ identification, and has no enmity towards any being. In this way, my devotee comes to me" (11.55). He has also given practical instructions (9.27): yat karosi yad asnasi yaj jubosi dadasi yat, yat tapasyasi kaunteya tat kurusva mad arpanam, "O Arjuna, whatever you do, whatever you eat, whatever you sacrifice, whatever you give, whatever you endure in the performance of your duties - do it for me."

We can get a more complete idea of the meaning of bhakti from the descriptions of the Bhagavata Purana, specifically in Prahlada's teachings about the nine limbs of devotional service: sravanam kirtanam visnub smaranam pada sevnam, arcanam vandanam dasyam sakhyam atma nivedanam, iti pumsarpita visnau bhaktis cen nava laksana, kriyeta bhagavaty addha tan manye dhitam uttamam, "Listening, speaking, remembering Vishnu, following his instructions, offering worship and respect, engaging in practical service, developing a personal relationship with God and dedicating oneself fully: thus a person who offers a devotional service to Vishnu according the ninefold method should engage in all of them. I believe this to be the highest instruction." (Bhagavata Purana 7.5.23-24).

सर्वधर्मान्परित्यज्य मामेकं शरणं ब्रज ।

अहं त्वां सर्वपापेभ्यो मोक्षयिष्यामि मा शुचः ॥ १८-६६ ॥

sarvadharmānparityajya māmekaṁ śaraṇaṁ vraja | ahaṁ tvāṁ sarvapāpebhyo mokṣayīṣyāmi mā śucaḥ || 18-66 ||

sarva dharman: all duties; parityajya: leaving behind; mam ekam: only to me; saranam vraja: come for shelter; aham: I; tvam: you; sarva papabhyah: from all faults; mokṣayisyami: I will liberate; ma sucaḥ: do not worry.

"Leaving behind all the differences in duties, take shelter in me only. I will liberate you from all faults, do not worry."

The expression sarva dharman is extremely interesting in this verse; as the word dharma is expressed in the plural form, it indicates a dualistic fragmentation of the universal and eternal principle that sustains the universe and the progress of all beings. Dharma is always one, although its principles (or "legs") can be listed as truthfulness, compassion, cleanliness, self-control, tolerance, personal progress, cooperation, and so on. This fundamental root that supports existence is identified with Krishna's teachings (2.40, 9.2, 9.3, 9.31, 11.18, 12.20, 18.70) and even with Bhagavan himself (14.2, 14.27) as confirmed also in Bhagavata Purana (2.4.19, 7.11.7, 11.15.18) and in the introductory verses of Vishnu sahasra nama (Mahabharata, Anusasana parva, chapter 149) as follows: brahmanyam sarva dharmajnam... esa me sarva dharmanam dharmadhikataṁ (sloka 14). Also, Krishna's specifically declared mission is to re-establish dharma whenever it is weakened (4.7, 4.8), therefore it is not possible that Krishna is instructing us here to abandon dharma as a fundamental value of life. Such a foolish and dangerous conclusion could be presented only by the hypocrite asuras who have not bothered to study (what to speak of practicing) the teachings of genuine shastra (16.17, 16.23, 17.6, 17.13) to understand the principles of dharma.

The "various *dharma*s" to which Krishna is referring here (sarva dharman) are the temporary and limited definitions of duty that are attached to the material gunas as described in the activities and qualities of the different varnas (brahmanas, kshatriyas, vaishyas, sudras), and that include the externals of the different religious practices of the various ashramas (brahmacharya, grihastha, vanaprastha, sannyasa). We had already seen this concept in verse 9.21, where Krishna mentioned the "three *dharma*s" (trayi dharman) as the ritual ceremonies prescribed for those who wish to attain the higher planetary systems (svarga lokan). And certainly we can apply the definition sarva dharman to the various sectarian approaches that oppose for example a vaishnava dharma to a shaiva dharma etc.

We should be careful not to make the equivalence papa = sin, because the abrahamic concept of sin is nothing but a disobedience to the order of God and his priests, something that is totally irrelevant in the Vedic system. We will try here to better define the terminology used in Vedic tradition for negative actions: papa is an act that directly or indirectly causes sufferings to others, while duskrita is a bad action in general, agha is a truly criminal action but agas is simply an irresponsible action. Droha is a malicious action against the principle of gratefulness, pataka is a degrading action that causes a downfall from the position we were supposed to hold in society, and dosha is a character fault or a bad quality (defect). Aparadha is a formal act of disrespect, drugdha is an action meant to cause harm, vipatti is the failure to fulfill some duty, and anrita is a lie.

It is important to notice that Krishna is not saying "I will relieve you from all the reactions/ results of your negative activities", but he says, "I will relieve you from all your negative activities", meaning that Krishna will guide his sincere devotee to give up all bad activities and become purified from all adharmic contamination - exactly as we had seen in verses 9.30-31. So those cunning rascals who were planning to dump their responsibilities cheaply and escape the reactions of their bad actions by making some protestation of having taken shelter in Krishna will have to check their maths again, because that is not going to happen.

This verse is indeed the most confidential instruction by Krishna, and the passage in Bhagavad gita that can be most easily misinterpreted by someone who has not carefully and properly understood all the other instructions given by Krishna in the previous chapters.

The prakṛita sabajyas are the materialistic simpletons who convince themselves (or let themselves be convinced by others) that it is sufficient to accept the external appearances of devotion and immediately they should be considered established on the highest transcendental level of bhakti. Therefore they become sentimentally attached to their own projection of God according to their material preferences, just like the admirers or fans of famous actors, singers or musicians, professional sports celebrities, and so on. Becoming a "fan" of Krishna is certainly better than choosing to worship some of those personalities, and even better than developing a strong material attachment for one's children or grand-children as we see sometimes in persons who consider family life as the highest possible value in life.

Krishna quickly became a very popular figure in these last 5000 years because he appears like a handsome, artistic and fun-loving young man, a charming, affectionate, clever and adventurous boy and a very sweet and vivacious cute baby. His idyllic pastimes with the little gopas and amorous dalliances with the beautiful gopis, his love and respect for his parents and elders, his protective care for the cows and calves all contribute to the aura of tenderness and innocence that attracts all minds. In fact, the very name krishna has been explained as meaning "all attractive", from the root karsati ("to attract").

Loving Krishna is therefore extremely easy, even on a sentimentalist level, and even asuras are generally not intimidated by his character. In fact, we see that many unscrupulous people have tried to take advantage of him in several ways, sometimes imitating him and pretending to be his reincarnation to attract gullible followers, or claiming to be his great sevakas and representatives, collecting wealth and prestige in his name for their own self aggrandizement. To impress the general public they often make a great show of emotional ecstasy or excitement, grand gestures and dramatic performances of devotional sentiments.

Simple-minded people who have little familiarity with the teachings of the shastra are usually unable to see the difference between a genuine avadhuta and a clever fraudster who is a skilled pretender, or even an ordinary person who suffers from mental imbalances, therefore they can easily be cheated and misled, thus wasting the valuable opportunity of human life. To save the poor unfortunate souls from the damage of ignorance and foolishness, Bhagavan manifests personally (svamsa avatara) or empowers realized souls (sakty avesha avataras) to spread the correct knowledge and understanding of dharma and vidya, and to offer shelter to sincere people. We can ascertain the real value of such preachers by measuring their precepts and example with those of guru, shastra and sadhus, and especially with the recommendations of antaryami paramatman.

Because the param atman is present in the heart of everybody and speaks with the voice of the conscience even to those who are totally illiterate, the lack of formal education is not a decisive obstacle in spiritual progress. The real problem is when a person has ulterior motives and the fraudulent presentation seems to offer better selfish advantages to the followers; the cheaters and the cheated are attracted to each other because they have a similar view of life.

So, please make sure that when you are "taking shelter in Krishna only", you are not connected to the wrong phone number. You have been warned.

इदं ते नातपस्काय नाभक्ताय कदाचन । न चाशुश्रूषवे वाच्यं न च मां योऽभ्यसूयति ॥ १८-६७ ॥

idam te nātapaskāya nābhaktāya kadācana । na cāśuśrūṣave vācyaṁ na ca mām yo'bhyasūyati ॥ 18-67 ॥

idam: this; te: you; na: not; atapaskāya: to a person who is not austere; na: not; abhaktāya: to a person who is not a devotee; kadācana: never; na: not; ca: and; susrusave: to someone who is not willing to listen; vacyam: to be instructed; na ca: and also not; mam: of me; yah: one who; abhyasūyati: is envious.

"This (secret) should never be disclosed to a person who has no devotion or austerity. It should not be spoken to a person who is not willing to listen or who is hostile against me.

The key words in this verse are bhaktā, tapaska, susrusava, indicating a person who has devotion to Bhagavan, is dedicated to austerity and is honestly willing to listen and understand: these are the fundamental qualifications to become a genuine student of Bhagavad gita. In this verse each of these words is preceded by the privative "a", a prefix that expresses negation and that has been inherited from Sanskrit by other languages such as ancient Greek and Latin.

The last word in the verse is abhyasūyati, "one who envies", "one who is actively hostile", and that automatically includes all those who approach the study of Hinduism to disprove it in favor of their own ideology - something that has regularly happened in the last several centuries in the academic establishments founded and directed by abrahamic ideologues.

Unfortunately this does not apply only to the foreigners, as some Indians like to believe, but it has been happening regularly in India because the current educational system (as well as the political, legal and burocratic systems) is still based on the same ideological lines introduced in colonial times by establishment agents such as Macaulay and Max Muller, who was hailed as the "go tirtha" ("Ox-ford") mula (Muller) acharya (teacher of Vedic knowledge)" by the political leaders of "orthodox Hinduism", and whose disgracefully racist theory of the "purity of the Aryan race" is still supported directly or indirectly by the very same casteist fools that claim to represent Vedic tradition today.

The word abhyasūya is the opposite of anasūya; to this effect we can remember verse 9.1: idam tu te guhyatamam pravakṣyamy anasūyave, jnanam vijñāna sambhita, yaj jnatva mokṣyase 'subhat, "I will explain you this supreme secret, because you are not envious. By knowing this theoretical and applied knowledge, you will be free from all inauspiciousness." Other commentators have explained the word abhyasūyati as "caviling, trying to find faults", but such interpretation can be dangerous because it is usually taken to be a one-way street only, to avoid uncomfortable questions about faulty translations and ideological applications.

Krishna has clearly shown in his dialog with Arjuna that he is not offended by objections (2.5, 2.6, 3.1, 4.4, 5.1, 6.33), and as a perfect teacher he has always supplied sufficient explanations and clarifications, to make sure that the subject was properly understood. We should be very wary of those who get easily offended when questioned and accuse others of being "envious" of the high position they have attained as gurus or acharyas, because most likely they are unable to give the proper answers and are trying to divert the attention of the questioners by changing the subject.

We have already found the word abhyasuya in the chapter describing the characteristics of the asuras: abankaram balam darpaṁ kamam krodham ca samsritam, mam atma para debesu pradisanto 'bhyasuyakah, "Taking shelter in abankara, physical strength, arrogance, lust and anger, they show envy and hatred against me, as I reside in their own bodies and in the bodies of others" (16.18). In the light of this verse we understand that the secret of Bhagavad gita will not be disclosed to anyone who is hostile and envious towards the Atman - who lives both in his body and in the bodies of others - especially because of their bodies, and on the basis of material bodily identification (abankara, balam). A person who is hostile and envious towards the Atman and the Paramatman can never be a devotee (bhakta) or dedicated to austerity (tapaska), or sincerely interested to learn the actual meaning of Krishna's instructions (susrusava); why then would someone like that try to study Bhagavad gita or other Vedic literature? Their motives must be wrong. Krishna clearly states here that the "objective" or "secular" academic study of the intimate texts of Bhagavad gita should not be accepted as valid; for this purpose it is better to utilize summary studies prepared and taught by genuinely qualified people - those who are truly devoted and austere. This prohibition does not have anything to do with the casteist and racist prejudices of some ignorant fools who claim to be traditional orthodox religious authorities on Hinduism, and believe that "foreigners" and "low caste people" should not even be allowed to study Sanskrit and in any case they would never be able to understand Vedic knowledge because they lack some special DNA structure. The problem is rather in the blind faith that most people have towards the mainstream academic system, from which they crave recognition and endorsement directly or indirectly. It is rare to find "traditional Hindus" who do not want to know what are your "academic qualifications" according to the mainstream establishment, so that they can judge your competence in discussing about shastra, while no importance is given to your actual realizations and practices in life. At the same time, even those who talk about Vedic literature on the basis of their "birth qualification" or "religious lineage" continue to rely on hostile colonial translations and dictionaries, and especially to use appallingly demeaning abrahamic definitions to describe their own tradition - for example, they say "idol" to refer to Deities or vigrahas, "mythology" to refer to the sacred stories or itihāsas and puranas, "seer" to refer to realized souls or rishis, "caste" to refer to the genuine system of varnas, and so on.

We can easily verify the seriousness of the problem if we consult a good dictionary to verify the actual meaning of these definitions. For example, "idol" means "false god, pretender, impostor, a form of appearance visible but lacking substance, a fallacy, a false conception", while "myth" means "an unfounded or false notion, a person or thing having only an imaginary or unverifiable existence". The word "cult" means "a religion regarded as unorthodox or spurious", while "orthodox" means "conforming to established doctrine especially in religion", which in the case of Vedic knowledge should refer to what is actually written in the shastra, and not to a mentality characterized by narrow-mindedness, backward mentality, and blind fanaticism based on gross material bodily identification and the falsely moralistic values absorbed from the toxic abrahamic influence. The arrogance of those who claim they have the right to use their own "special Indian meaning" of such English words clearly shows that they do not possess either bhakti or tapah, and therefore they should never be considered qualified even to discuss about Bhagavad gita, what to speak about teaching about it, or even claiming exclusive monopoly rights on its teaching.

Padma Purana recommends, asraddhadhane vimukhe 'py asrinvati yas copadesah, siva namaparadhab, "one who gives instructions to a person who has no faith and is hostile and unwilling to listen, will cause him to commit aparadha"; this does not apply only to the teaching of the secret of Bhagavad gita but also to all kinds of instructions. Before taking up responsibility for the material and spiritual progress of an individual, we should make sure that our advice and instructions will be received favorably, otherwise it is better to simply make general statements presenting an elementary level of knowledge that cannot be misinterpreted easily.

य इदं परमं गुह्यं मद्भक्तेष्वभिधास्यति ।

भक्तिं मयि परां कृत्वा मामेवैष्यत्यसंशयः ॥ १८-६८ ॥

ya idam paramam guhyam madbhaktesvabhidhāsyati | bhaktim mayi parāṁ kṛtvā mamevaiṣyatyasamśayah || 18-68 ||

yah: one who; idam: this; paramam guhyam: supreme secret; mat bhaktesu: to my devotees; abhidhāsyati: explains; bhaktim: devotion; mayi: to me; param: supreme; kṛtvā: doing; mam: me; eva: certainly; esyati: comes; asamśayah: without any doubt.

"One who explains this supreme secret to my devotees is performing the supreme devotional service and will certainly attain me. There is no doubt.

We find a very similar instruction in Kapila's conversation with his mother Devahuti: naitat khalayopadisen navinitaya karbhit, na stabdhaya na bhinnaya naina dharma dbrajaya ca, na lolupayopadisen na griharudha cetase nabhaktaya ca me jatu, na mad bhakta dvisam api, sraddhadhanaya bhaktaya vinitaya anasuyave, bhutesu kṛita maitraya susrusabbhiritaya ca, "This knowledge should not be offered to those who are envious, to the agnostic, to those who are proud of their position, to those who make a big show of religiosity, and to those who do not practice what they preach. It should not be taught to those who are greedy, too attached to the identification with family life, devoid of devotion, or hateful against my devotees. But it should be offered to those loving devotees who have faith and are sincerely desiring to understand, free from envy, friendly to all beings, and eager to render service." (Bhagavata Purana, 3.32.39-41).

Also Krishna offers the same advice to Uddhava at the end of their conversation: naitat traya dambhikaya nastikaya sathaya ca, asusrusor abbaktaya durvinitaya diyatam, etair dosair vihinaya brahmanyaya priyaya ca, sadhave sucaye brnyad bhakti syac chudra yositam, "You should not speak of these things with those who make a great show of religiosity, to those who do not accept the authority of Vedic knowledge, to pretenders or hypocrites, to those who are not interested in listening, to those who have no devotion or sincere desire to learn. One can speak of these things only to someone who has become free from bad qualities, is dedicated to spiritual realization (of Brahman), is gentle and well behaved, has a pure heart and a devotional attitude, and that also includes sudras and ordinary women" (Bhagavata Purana 11.29.30-31).

Someone trying to teach the supreme secret to the wrong people described in the previous verse (abbakta, atapaska, asusrusava, abhyasnyaka) is obviously acting for some selfish materialistic purpose, to get money or prestige, or with even more sinister intentions. We know that Max Mueller translated many Vedic texts and wrote a 50 volume encyclopedia about The Sacred Books of the East, but his intentions were openly hostile: "This edition of mine and the translation of the Veda will hereafter tell to a great extent... the fate of India, and on the growth of millions of souls in that country.... the only way of uprooting all that has sprung from it during the last 3000 years... and that is of a more degraded and savage character than the worship of Jupiter, Apollo or Minerva... It may have but served to prepare the way of Christ... India is much riper for Christianity than Rome or Greece were at the time of Saint Paul." Max Muller was particularly angry at those scholars who, instead of devoting themselves to this "evangelic mission", committed the mortal sin to sincerely appreciate Vedic knowledge: one who did that "should know that he can expect no money; nay, he should himself wish for no mercy, but invite the heaviest artillery... to condone Brahminical idolatry and to discountenance Christianity is to commit high treason against humanity and civilization." Mainstream academic indologists still follow the same orientation today, not only in the West but in India too, and have contaminated with the same mentality many religious institutions and organizations even within the Hindu fold. On the other hand, one who engages in sincere and constructive discussions with genuine bhaktas is inspired by the spiritual happiness that is created (bodhayantah parasparam kathayantas ca mam nityam tusyanti ca ramanti ca, "they find great pleasure and satisfaction by always discussing about me, to help each other to better understand me", 10.9). There can be no higher pleasure or satisfaction than this, because this happiness is permanent and does not depend on external circumstances (4.38, 5.13, 5.21, 5.23, 5.24, 6.21, 6.27, 6.28, 9.2, 14.27).

The word abhidhasyati ("who teaches") is particularly interesting here. It does not refer to the formal relationship between guru and sisya, but rather to an open discussion on the various meanings of Krishna's words. A closely related word, abhidhana, means "conversation", but also "explanations, definitions", and even "lexicography, dictionary"; it is connected to the words vritti and anuvritti, as we can see in this verse spoken by Suta at Naimisaranya: abo vayam janma bbrito 'dya hasma, vridhdhanuvrittyapi viloma jatah, danskulyam adhim vidbunoti sigbram, mahattamanam abhidhana yogah, "How wonderful that we have been raised today to such a position due to our service to great personalities, even though we were born in a lowly family without being blessed by the proper samskaras. The conversations that unite us with those who are great souls will very quickly remove all faults from our life." (Bhagavata Purana, 1.18.18).

The word vritti includes the meanings of "interpretation, alliteration, activity, process, occupation, function, mode of being, condition, respectful behavior, profession", while anuvritti means "commentary, repetition, remembrance, act of continuance, following, obedient spirit, propensity, tendency". This is how we can attain and practice genuine transcendental bhakti (bhaktim mayi param kirtva).

न च तस्मान्मनुष्येषु कश्चिन्मे प्रियकृत्तमः । भविता न च मे तस्मादन्यः प्रियतरो भुवि ॥ १८-६९ ॥

na ca tasmānmanuṣyeṣu kaścīnme priyakṛttamaḥ । bhavitā na ca me tasmādanyaḥ priyatara bhuvi ॥ 18-69 ॥

na: not; ca: and; tasmāt: than him/ her; manuṣyeṣu: among all human beings; kaścit: anyone; me: to me; priya kṛt tamah: dearer; bhavitā: will become; na: not; ca: and; me: to me; tasmāt: than him/ her; anyaḥ: other; priya tarah: dearer; bhuvi: in this world.

"Nobody among all human beings is dearer to me, and nobody else will ever be dearer to me in this world."

The previous verse (68) clearly stated that explaining the supreme transcendental secret of Yoga to sincere spiritually inclined people is the greatest devotional service. In fact it is such a sacred mission that Bhagavan himself directly descends in this world from time to time to perform the same function: paritrānaya sadbunam vinasaya ca dukṛitam, dharma samsthapanarthaya sambhavami yuge yuge, "I manifest myself yuga after yuga, to protect the good people, destroy the evil doers and to establish the knowledge of dharma" (4.8). This is also confirmed in Bhagavata Purana (4.22.16): vyaktam atmatatam atma bhagavan atma bhavanah, svanam anugrahayemam siddha rūpi caraty ajah, "In this way Bhagavan, the unborn, walks around in the form of a perfectly realized soul to enlighten those who are determined to attain spiritual realization".

The transmission of spiritual knowledge is the greatest gift and the most valuable proof of love and affection: sa evayam maya te 'dya yogah prokṛtah puratanah, bhakto 'si me sakha ceti rahasyam hy etad uttamam, "Today I am explaining to you the same knowledge of Yoga that was discussed in the ancient times; because you are my devotee and friend I give you this supreme secret" (4.3).

We have seen that Krishna has said that one should be equally impervious to insult and glorification, joys and sorrows (tulya priyapriyo dbiras tulya nindatma samstutib, 14.24), impartial and detached from both friends and enemies, honor and neglect (samah satrau ca mitre ca tatha manapamanayoh, 12.18, mana apamanayasya tulyas tulyo mitrari pakṣayoh, 14.25), and should see equally everyone, including benefactors, friends, enemies, neutral persons, mediators, envious persons or relatives (subrin mitrariy udasina madhyastha dvesya bandhusu, 6.9) and be friendly with all and not hostile towards anybody (advesta sarva bhutanam maitrah karuna eva ca, 12.13).

God also behaves according to these same parameters: nadatte kasyacit papam na caiva sukritam vibhuh, ajnanena avritam jnanam tena muhyanti jantavah, "The all powerful Lord does not consider the good or bad merits of anyone. Any difference is only due to the living entities themselves, who are confused as their knowledge is covered by ignorance." (5.15). Another verse added a slightly different angle: samo 'ham sarva bhutesu na me dvesyo 'sti na priyah, ye bhajanti tu mam bhaktya mayi te tesu capy aham, "I am equally disposed towards all living beings. I do not hate anyone, and I do not favor anyone. Yet, when someone offers me a sincere service in devotion, I also serve them with love and devotion." (9.29).

We also know that God regularly takes the side of the Devas against the Asuras whenever the proper management of the universe is threatened and they ask for his help. One could then wonder how this is possible, and whether it is not a contradiction; after all most people believe that religion can only be a sort of sectarian pact of covenant between God and his "chosen people", where such people obey orders and offer worship, and God protects them from bad things and answers their prayers granting them all good things. But this is not exactly a fact.

Sukadeva explained this to Parikshit: sa esa rajan api kala isita sattvam suranikam ivaidhayaty atah, tat pratyanyikan asuran sura priyo rajas tamaskan praminoty urusravah, "God as Time nourishes the many suras through sattva, therefore those who are hostile to the suras - the asuras - are destroyed" (7.1.12). How this happens, it is inconceivable for the living beings: na yasya sakhyam puruso 'vaiti sakhyuh sakha vasan samvasatah pure 'smin, guno yatha gunino vyakta dristes tasmai mahesaya namaskaromi, "The living being cannot understand the friendship of the friend who lives with him in the same body, just like qualities cannot understand those who possess such qualities or the sense objects cannot understand the senses that perceive them. I offer my respect to Isvara." (6.4.24). We know that the jiva atmans are simply projections of the param atman, his amsas and shaktis, so God remains largely inconceivable to us (adboksbaja).

Bhagavan is always the best friend of all creatures (4.11, 5.29, 9.18, 9.29), but human beings have a special position in his affection because they are mature enough to take up their share of responsibilities in the work of supporting the universe, but they are also small enough to remain sober and humble in such service. The key expression in this verse is manusyesu, "among human beings". As we have commented already in previous passages, the only real qualification to engage in spiritual life and yoga is manusa jati - having acquired a human form of life (athato brahma jijnasa, Vedanta sutra 1.1.1).

Paramatman resides in the hearts of all creatures and even within the hearts of atoms, but only human beings have the faculty to make the free choices to elevate themselves and attain liberation (moksha, 13.35, 16.5, 18.66, brahma bhuta, 6.27, 18.54). Those human beings who take a new birth on the higher planetary systems thanks to their religious merits also have the opportunity to elevate themselves to liberation, but in that position of sattvic happiness they can become too complacent (14.9) and this will strengthen their bondage to material identification, so they will have to return to the level of human life when their merits have been consumed (9.20, 9.21).

Especially in Kali yuga, taking birth as a human being is a great blessing, as confirmed for example in Bhagavata Purana (kevala ichanti sambhavam kalam khalu bhavisyanti, 11.5.38), because under the pressure of unfavorable circumstances people can more easily wake up from the delusional hope to find happiness in the sense gratification of the material world, that is actually only a burden (indriya artha maya sukhaya bharam udvabatah, 7.9.43). We should therefore appreciate this wonderful and rare opportunity of a human birth (durlabham manusam janma, Bhagavata Purana 7.6.1) and not waste it foolishly in the hope of getting a better birth in a next lifetime. Any level of human birth qualifies us to strive for perfection (9.32), so we should not even wait one minute longer: ayur harati vai pumsam, udyann astam ca yann asau, tasyarte yat ksano nita, uttama sloka vartaya, "Every sunrise and sunset take away a piece of the duration of life for a human being, which is lost without gain except for those who use time to understand God", (Bhagavata Purana 2.3.17).

अध्येष्यते च य इमं धर्म्यं संवादमावयोः ।

ज्ञानयज्ञेन तेनाहमिष्टः स्यामिति मे मतिः ॥ १८-७० ॥

adhyeṣyate ca ya imaṁ dharmyaṁ saṁvādamāvayoḥ | jñānayajñena tenāhamiṣṭaḥ syāmiti me matiḥ || 18-70 ||

adhyeṣyate: will study; ca: and; yab: one who; imam: this; dharmyam: on dharma; saṁvadam: conversation; avayob: our; jñana yajnena: by the sacrifice of knowledge; tena: by him/ her; aham: I am; istab: worshiped; syam: shall be; iti: thus; me: my; matih: opinion.

"One who studies this conversation of ours about dharma will be worshiping me through the celebration of knowledge. This is my opinion.

The equation dharma = yoga = jnana is very clear, so when Krishna says that he descends from time to time to re-establish dharma (dharma samsthapanartha, 4.8) when this is somehow lost (yogah nasta, 4.2), we should understand that he comes to explain the ancient science of yoga (yogah proktaḥ puratanah, 4.3). Without understanding this point, it is very difficult to make any progress.

Mainstream academics, still bogged into the abrahamic-based colonial indology, still believe that Hinduism "evolved in time" from a so-called Rigvedic period of primitive fire worship of war gods, when there was no concept of reincarnation, ethical vegetarianism, moksha, yoga etc. We can understand that they need to do so in order to get official recognition from the establishment mafia, but such position is a disgrace for those who claim to be Hindus and to have faith in Vedic knowledge and tradition.

The entirety of Vedic knowledge has always existed in its perfect and complete form, since the very beginning of creation - of each creation - because it is transmitted by the paramatman to the Rishis in their hearts (10.11, 15.15) as well as through the formal external teaching from guru to sisya. At the beginning of the chapter on Jnana yoga, Krishna clearly stated: *imam vivasvate yogam proktavan abam auyayam, vivasvan manave praba manur ikshvake 'bravit, "I explained this eternal science of Yoga to Vivasvan, and Vivasvan taught it to Manu, and Manu told it to Ikshvaku" (4.1). This is confirmed by both sruti and smriti, as we can see for example in the opening verse of the Bhagavata Purana: yato 'mvyad itaratas carthesv abhijnah svarat tene brahma brida ya adi kavaye, "by whom Brahman knowledge was revealed in the heart of the first scholar, directly and indirectly and in full consciousness" (Bhagavata Purana, 1.1.1).*

The genuine Vedic tradition teaches that at the beginning of this Kali yuga, Vyasa compiled a new edition of all Vedic scriptures, as clearly explained in the Bhagavata: catur botram karma suddham prajanam viksyā vaidikam vyadadbah yajna santatyai vedam ekam catur vidham; rig yajuh samartharvakhya, vedas catvara uddhritah, itihasa puranam ca, pancamo veda ucyate; tatrarg veda dharah pailah samago jaiminib karib, vaisampayana evaiko nishato yajusam uta; atharvangirasam asit sumantur daruno munib itihasa purananam pita ma romaharsanah; ta eta risayo vedam svam svam vasyann anekadha, sisyaib prasisyais tac chisyair, vedas te sakbino 'bhavan; "(Vyasa) divided the one Knowledge of the Vedic rituals in four compilations including the science of the four sacrificial fires and the purifying duties for the people in general. These four compilations are known as Rig Veda, Yajur Veda, Sama Veda and Atharva Veda, plus the Itihasa and Puranas, that are called the fifth Veda. Then he entrusted Paila Rishi to elaborate on the Rig Veda, Jaimini with the Sama Veda, and Vaisampayana with the Yajur Veda, Angirasa (Sumantu Muni) with the Atharva Veda, and Romaharsana (father of Suta) with the Itihasa and Puranas. All these Rishis transmitted their respective scriptures to their disciples and those to their own disciples, and in this way the Vedic literature has expanded." (Bhagavata Purana 1.4.19, 1.4.20, 1.4.21, 1.4.22, 1.4.23).

This is the proper method for studying Vedic knowledge (sva-adhyaya): we receive the original text and the compilation of commentaries by the previous acharyas, and then we transmit the original text with our own presentation in the best possible way according to desa, kala, patra and according to our personal realizations. Suta says: abam hi prsto 'ryamano bhavadbhir acaksa atmavagamo 'tra yavan, nabhab patanty atma samam patatrinas tatba samam visnu gatim vipascitah, "Having been requested by great aryas such as you, I will speak as far as my understanding can reach; just like (different) birds fly in the sky, knowledgeable people will speak about the supreme Personality of Godhead" (Bhagavata Purana, 1.18.23).

We remember that a few verses earlier, Suta had said: aho vayam janma bhruto 'dya hasma, vriddhanuvrittipyi viloma jatah, dauskulyam adhim vidhunoti sigbram, mahattamanam abhidbana yogah, "How wonderful that we have been raised today to such a position due to our service to great personalities, even though we were born in a lowly family without being blessed by the proper samskaras. The conversations that unite us with those who are great souls very quickly remove all faults from our life." (Bhagavata Purana, 1.18.18).

श्रद्धावाननसूयश्च शृणुयादपि यो नरः । सोऽपि मुक्तः शुभाँल्लोकान्प्राप्नुयात्पुण्यकर्मणाम् ॥ १८-७१ ॥

śraddhāvananasūyaśca śṛṇuyādapi yo naraḥ । so'pi muktaḥ śubhāṁllokānprāpnuyātpuṇyakarmaṇām ॥ 18-71 ॥

śraddha van: one who has faith; anasūyah: one who is not envious; ca: and; śrīṇuyat: will hear; api: certainly; yah: who; naraḥ: a human being; śab: s/he; api: also; muktaḥ: a liberated being; śubhan lokan: the auspicious planets; prāpnuyat: s/he attains; puṇya karmaṇam: of those who have performed virtuous deeds.

"Any human being who will listen (to this discussion) with faith, free from envy and hostility, will become liberated and attain the auspicious planets of those who have performed virtuous deeds.

In this verse the word mukta ("liberated") is particularly interesting. One who has attained liberation is free from material conditionings, from the need to take another birth in this world, and from the identification with the body and mind s/he is still wearing (jīvan mukta). This means that he is also free to remain in the world, or to descend again in this world - not as a prisoner but as a social worker, to assist Bhagavan's mission. These are the Devas who reside on the higher planets (śubhan lokan prāpnuyat puṇya karmaṇam) and the Mahajanas ("great personalities") and Ciranjivas ("long-lived") like Dhruva, Prahlada, Janaka, Bali, Sukadeva, Hanuman, Vyasa, Narada, the Kumaras, etc.

In the previous verse Krishna clearly stated that the jnana yajna, the sacred act of cultivating knowledge through the sincere study (adhyeṣya) of Bhagavad gita, is a genuine method of worship that really pleases God (ista syam). In fact, it is the best form of worship, as Krishna has said a few verses earlier (18.68). We should ask ourselves whether we really understood the meaning and purpose of worship, because people influenced by tamas and rajas can easily become confused on the subject, and even project their own mentality and motivations on God, surmising that God must think and act in the same way and logic like they do.

Tamasic and rajasic people only do something good for others when their ego is pampered enough by flattery and praise, when they see some selfish advantage for themselves (generally in exchange for the favor they give), or simply because they are forced to do so by some other force (magic spell etc). Krishna has already explained that sattvic consciousness is not touched by praise or insult, and performs the required good work without expecting anything in return. God is the supreme sattva (bareb sattva nidher, Bhagavata Purana 1.3.26), therefore we should understand that such qualities apply to Bhagavan even to a greater extent.

When we present various worship articles (upachara) to the Deity in the puja rituals, we are simply expressing our respect and affection and gratitude for God, because God does not need any material offering. There is nothing in all the three worlds that God needs or wants to obtain (lokesu kincana nanarapam avaptaryam 3.22) and in fact he is the provider of everything for everyone (yoga ksemam vahamy abam, 9.22) as also confirmed in the Upanishads (eko bahunam yo vidadhati kaman, Katha Upanishad 2.2.13). Bhagavan only accepts our offerings when, and because, they are presented with love (tad abam bhakty upabritam asnami prayatatmanah, 9.26), therefore we can understand that the best form of worship mentioned here by Krishna is characterized by the deepest love.

Love can only come from actually knowing the object of our love, deeply and intimately; people use the word "love" improperly to indicate a lustful physical attraction, an infatuation, or a perceived affinity of pleasure connected to the presence or contact with a sense object. The fact is that we cannot really love someone we do not know - this realization inevitably comes after some time, when the initial infatuation has weakened and we actually see the object of our sentimental interest for what s/he really is.

Genuine love is built on a deep understanding of the object of our affection, and this is the reason why studying Bhagavad gita is the best expression of bhakti, as it gradually increases our knowledge, understanding and appreciation for Bhagavan, and leads us through the realization of Brahman, Paramatma and Bhagavan to the solid level of transcendental existence (brahma bhuta, 18.54).

By regular association or contact with Bhagavan's teachings we can attain the highest destination, the same level of Bhagavan (8.21, 10.12, 11.38, 14.2, 18.56), what to speak of mere liberation or the higher planets of this universe where good people live (muktab subhal lokan prapnuyat punya-karmanam).

The required qualifications for studying Bhagavad gita have already been listed in verses 18.67 and 18.68 as well as in previous verses, so here they are simply summarized as anasuya and sraddhavan, respectively "one who is not hostile" and "one who has faith"; any human being (narah) who shows these qualities is therefore entitled to study and practice the most secret science of yoga and dharma. Again, we can clearly see that there are no restrictions of caste, race, nationality, gender, occupation etc, therefore it is clear that anyone who tries to stop or obstruct others from accessing this sublime study on some birth pretext is openly violating Krishna's instructions, and should be exposed and condemned. The worst situation for the planet and for human society is when demoniac people take up the positions of brahmanas and kshatriyas and control society for their own materialistic and demoniac purposes.

In the last few centuries, due to the degradation of Kali yuga (Bhagavata Purana 12.2.1) Vedic knowledge has become oppressed because of being imprisoned by the unqualified and evil descendents of brahmana families (vacam devam brahma kule ku-karmani, Bhagavata Purana 1.6.21). This weakness has been compounded by the toxic adharmic influences of invaders, who have found it very convenient for their exploitation and suppression plans, also unwittingly supplying an easy pretext for such unqualified brahmins to blame others (i.e. "foreign" invaders) for the rampant degradation and defilement of knowledge into what some people today call "orthodox Hinduism". What an irony, for an ideological system that is so deeply and fundamentally opposite to the actual version of the Vedic shastra.

कच्चिदेतच्छ्रुतं पार्थ त्वयैकाग्र्येण चेतसा ।

कच्चिदज्ञानसम्मोहः प्रनष्टस्ते धनञ्जय ॥ १८-७२ ॥

kaccidetacchrutam pārtha tvayaikāgreṇa cetasā । kaccidajñānasammohaḥ pranaṣtaste dhananjaya ॥ 18-72 ॥

kaccit: if; etat: this; srutam: (that you have) heard; partha: o son of Pritha; tvaya: by you; eka agreṇa: with full concentration; cetasa: of awareness; kaccit: if; ajñana: ignorance; sammohaḥ: confusion; pranaṣtaḥ: destroyed; te: of you; dhananjaya: o Dhananjaya.

"O Partha, have you listened to all this with full concentration of consciousness? O Dhananjaya, has your confusion of ignorance been destroyed?"

Krishna has kindly presented the teachings of Bhagavad gita under all possible angles and answered all the questions and doubts raised by Arjuna. By now the body language expressed by Arjuna must have changed considerably and he must have been showing a deep confidence in such teachings, demonstrating that his initial sadness and confusion had disappeared. But we should no rely only on intuition and subtle communication. Clear and explicit discussion between teacher and student is always essential, because it ensures that all possible blind spots or gray areas are clarified and the possibility of mistakes is radically reduced.

Some confused people, out of foolishness and ignorance, imagine and believe that guru and sisya do not need to communicate so much, and say that the disciple should just listen and read collectively with all the others and follow whatever order is given directly or indirectly through the "chain of command" of the institution. Questioning is streamlined and restricted, if not openly discouraged or prohibited.

There are even some "disciples" who have never directly spoken with their "guru", and of whom the "guru" barely remembers the name (what to speak of other essential things). Such "gurus" (from various denominations and groups) only make themselves available to collect money (fees, donations, guru daksṣinas etc) and worship (guru puja, vyasa puja, public/ impersonal preaching programs, festival and public events appearances etc). They rarely or never reply to letters or e-mails, what to speak of answering the phone. This means they do not want any personal responsibility for the progress of their disciples.

This is utter impersonalism, based on the incorrect assumption that everyone is the same, has the same qualifications (or lack thereof) and problems, potential and history, realizations and misconceptions, so everyone should simply "follow the system" - read the books of the "big acharya" (or those "authorized by the church/ organization") and blindly do whatever they are told. Even when students are tested for their comprehension, it is a standardized exam with pre-determined answers chosen by political and doctrinal considerations, because the examiners themselves lack sufficient personal realization.

Sometimes they even openly say so, stating they do not need to be personally qualified and realized because they are not acting on their own responsibility, but "in the name of the organization". Foolish people mistake this candid admission as a proof of "great humility", and short-circuit the logical process by concluding that because the teacher is claiming that he is in fact not qualified, he must be humble and sincere, which automatically means he is actually qualified - by the fact he is claiming not to be qualified and therefore unable to take any responsibility. Somewhere in this contortionist reasoning, simple minded people get lost and confused, but then they are told that they are contemplating the "great mystical mystery", and therefore they should be even more awed and intimidated by the sublime qualities of their teachers.

Where does this system come from? You guessed it. It comes from the abrahamic mentality, for which everyone is born a sinner (due to the famous "original sin" consisting in incarnation itself), and because there was no previous individual history (lifetimes before this), everyone (except those who have already been sufficiently indoctrinated in the "only true faith") is considered equally ignorant as all knowledge and realizations "other than the only true path" are considered non-valid or even heretical or blasphemous, and they must be destroyed without even looking at them - just like all books that are not "endorsed by the only true religion" must be burned without even reading them. Differences in conditions of birth (gender, race, social position etc) and the ensuing categorization are then ascribed to the unquestionable will of God; for example it is believed that women and people from other races have a lesser soul and were created for a subordinate position; since this bodily identification cannot be changed, all individuals in this category are considered unable to qualify on a higher level and therefore they are forbidden even to try to do so (and if they do try, they are insulted, punished, persecuted and ridiculed).

We can easily see how such ideas are heavily influenced by tamas, and how the only true solution is the dissemination of genuine knowledge and understanding, explained so beautifully by Krishna in Bhagavad gita. Ajnana ("ignorance" and sammoha ("confusion") always walk together, because the absence of knowledge creates confusing ideas, and pervasive confusion prevent us from acquiring proper knowledge and understanding.

The process of listening (śruti) is the solution. It must be attentive (ekagrena cetasa) and not simply mechanical, therefore we need to invest sufficient intelligence and good will. It must be done in the association of people who have already realized this knowledge (tattva darsis, 2.16, 4.34, 5.19) and not simply as an exchange of fabricated and uninformed opinions considered as equally valid. However, this listening should be active, characterized by questions and answers (pariprasnena, 4.34), and mutually explanatory (bodhayantah parasparam kathayantas, 10.9). It should be repeated under all possible angles until all doubts and misunderstandings are dispelled: as Krishna is showing here, the teacher should personally ask each student, and if something is still not perfectly clear, the teacher is ready to explain everything again. This is what Krishna is asking Arjuna here. We can rest assured that if Arjuna had expressed more questions or doubts, Krishna would have immediately continued the discussion, presenting the same teachings under yet another perspective and repeating the core concepts as he has done all along these past chapters.

Incidentally, we should also note that this continuing process of studying Bhagavad gita and Vedic scriptures in general is meant to be repeated at least 3 times, because these verses are filled with several layers of meanings, and each time we read them we can find new inspiration and insights.

नष्टो मोहः स्मृतिर्लब्धा त्वत्प्रसादान्मयाच्युत । स्थितोऽस्मि गतसन्देहः करिष्ये वचनं तव ॥ १८-७३ ॥

naṣṭo mohaḥ smṛtirlabdhā tvaṭprasādānmayācyuta । sthito'smi gatasandehaḥ kariṣye vacanam tava ।। 18-73 ।।

arjunah uvaca: Arjuna said; nastah: destroyed; mohah: confusion; smṛtiḥ: memory; labdha: regained; tvaṭ prasadat: by your grace; maya: my; acyuta: o Acyuta; sthitah: firmly established; asmi: I am; gata: gone; sandehah: doubts; kariṣye: I will do; vacanam: instructions; tava: your.

Arjuna said: "O Acyuta, by your blessing my confusion has been destroyed and I have regained my memory. I am firmly established and the doubts have gone. I will follow your instructions."

The study of vidya and dharma is not an artificial imposition on the mind, but rather it is the process of washing off misconceptions, confusion, illusions and ignorance (all under the category of tamas) so that the original memory and consciousness of the soul can shine brightly. This is why the study of the scriptures is called svadhyaya - it is actually the cultivation of the knowledge of the self, as the self is atman/ brahman, pure consciousness that includes all existence. However, we should not conclude that we can regain this awareness of the universal knowledge without the study of the shastra and without the careful guidance of the guru, because the conditioned soul is covered by several layers of material contamination, and these materials project very deep shadows, that can be mistakenly considered real.

The meditation prescribed by the method of yoga is a very scientific process, meant to train our awareness to contemplate the true nature of atman/ brahman and not the whimsical projections of the mind. The technique called "the witness meditation" consists in becoming detached from all the various thoughts, impressions, memories, sensory stimulations and desires that are normally cluttering the mind and flow through the consciousness. Ultimately, by neglecting them, all these movements will lose power and gradually dissolve, leaving only the pure consciousness of the atman.

Confused and misguided people could imagine that when these movements of the mind (citta vṛttis) are extinguished, the result is some kind of void, and/ or that "meditation on the self" means that we should become aware of our material personality, its qualities and defects etc. But these are all mere projections of the mind, temporary and illusory identifications that do not need to be cultivated and pursued. At a superficial level we can and should be aware of the qualities of our character, just like we are aware of other external and relative circumstances, such as the time and place, the character and qualities of the people around us, the movements of objects and bodies, and so on. But all these things are only circumstantial, and must be considered on a relative level, not mistaken as actual realities of our true self.

From the very beginning of Bhagavad gita, we have learned that the atman/ brahman is eternally unchangeable (avikara, 2.25), therefore the true meditation on the self must be firm (sthitā prajña) and undisturbed like the flame of a lamp where there is no wind (nirvata). This would be impossible if we were focusing on material qualities and activities, that by their own very nature must have a beginning and an end. Genuine svadhyaya or "contemplation on the self" must therefore apply only to the atman/ brahman and eventually to the development of the siddha deha or siddha svarupa, just like Patanjali explains in the very beginning of his Yoga sutras (1.2-4): yogas citta vritti nirodhab, tada drastuh sva rupa avasthanam, vritti sarupyam itiratra, "Yoga is the dissolution of the waves of the mind, by which one's true form is revealed, because the waves of the mind are attributed identifications".

The confusion (moha) mentioned by this verse is the root of all ignorance, consisting in the identification with the material body and mind, creating a mistaken sense of doership and attachments (abankara and mamatva). When this confusion is dispelled, the perception of one's real self comes clearly as a memory reflected by the param atman: sarvasya caham bhrdi sannivisto mattah smritir jnanam apohanam ca, vedais ca sarvair abam eva vedyo vedanta krid veda vid eva caham, "I am situated in the heart of all/ everything, and from me come memory, knowledge and forgetfulness. I am the scope of the study of all the Vedas. I certainly am the creator of Vedanta, and the one who knows the Vedas." (5.15).

In that verse, Krishna clearly stated that in order to know him (atman/ brahman), one needs to study all the Vedas and the Vedanta. In these genuine original scriptures, the realizations of the great Rishis and tattva darshis are presented with great attention and care, with examples and discussions that are specifically meant to help us understand the subject and avoid misunderstandings and misconceptions that create doubts because of dissonance with the voice of the param atman.

After attaining the genuine level of self realization (atman/ brahman), one becomes truly able to engage in devotional service to the Supreme, as we had already seen in verse 18.54: brahma bhutah prasannatma na socati na kanksati, samah sarvesu bhutesu mad bhaktim labhate param, "One who is established on the state of Brahman is satisfied in the self, he does not lament or hanker after anything, is equally disposed towards all beings and attains transcendental devotion to me."

sanjayah uvaca: Sanjaya said; iti: thus; aham: I; vasudevasya: of the son of Vasudeva; pārthasya: of the son of Pritha; ca: and; mahātmanah: the great soul; sañvadam: the conversation; imam: this; asrausam: that I have heard; adbhutam: wonderful; roma harsanam: making my hair stand on end.

Sanjaya said: "Thus I have heard this conversation between Vasudeva and Arjuna, the great soul. It is so wonderful that my hair are standing on end.

The text of Bhagavad gita began with the old Dhritarastra, regent to the throne, asking his assistant Sanjaya about the events unfolding at Kurukshetra: dhritarastra uvaca, dharma ksetre kuru ksetre samaveta yuyutsavah, mamakah pandavas caiva kim akurvata sanjaya, Dhritarastra said: "O Sanjaya, what did my sons and Pandu's sons do, after they assembled in the sacred place of Dharma, the battlefield of Kurukshetra, ready to fight?" (1.1). Sanjaya had continued to describe the introductory events (1.24, 1.47, 2.1, 2.9) and also witnessed the manifestation of the Virata Rupa and the Vishnu form (11.9, 11.35, 11.50). Now that the central conversation between Krishna and Arjuna is closed, we find Sanjaya rejoicing with the wonderful revelations that he heard, and expressing his gratitude to his spiritual guide, Veda Vyasa, by whose kindness he had obtained such a blessing, as he will say in the next verse.

We find here several interesting words, the first of which is vasudeva, that contains two different and complementary meanings. On the ordinary level, Vasudeva (with a long first "a") is a patronymic name of Krishna, as "son of Vasudeva" (with a short first "a"). In this regard, we may remember that Krishna's father, Vasudeva, was the brother of Kunti, the mother of Arjuna and the other Pandavas, and that Pritha is another name of Kunti. Therefore by using the two names Vasudeva and Partha, Sanjaya is highlighting the strong family connection between Krishna and Arjuna, who are cousins in the first degree, as well as intimate friends. On a deeper symbolic level, the name Vasudeva is a name of Vishnu meaning "the omnipresent", and refers to the all-pervading quality of the Brahman-Paramatma-Bhagavan consciousness. In relation to this meaning, the name Pritha or Prithivi (meaning "the vast") can be interpreted as referring to Mother Earth, and therefore Arjuna comes to represent all the narah, the human beings who live on this planet, as "children of Mother Earth". Based on this particular interpretation, it is very interesting to notice the attribute of mahātmanah (maha atmanah, "the great atman") that is referred to Arjuna, indicating that Arjuna - while being a child of the Supreme Mother - is not merely a jiva atman but is actually shiva tattva, the manifestation of the param atman in this material universe as the param guru for all living beings.

The Bhagavata Purana (4.1.59, 10.69.16, 10.89.59) clearly states that Krishna and Arjuna are Nara and Narayana Rishis, the two great spiritual teachers to whom homage is paid before starting to study the scriptures (1.2.4, 5.19.11, 8.16.34, 10.86.35, 11.5.29-30, and the entire chapter 8 of canto 12). They appeared as the twin sons of Dharma and Murti, daughter of Daksha (1.3.9, 11.4.6) and according to Bhagavata Purana (12.4.41) they taught all the Puranas to Narada, who in turn transmitted them to Vyasa.

Indirectly, Sanjaya is warning Dhritarastra that Krishna and Arjuna are no ordinary persons, because their conversation is so extraordinary that a sincere soul will be thrilled to hear and remember it again and again. Therefore, Dhritarastra should understand that his evil son Duryodhana is grossly underestimating the Pandavas and Krishna, and he is making a big mistake in waging such an unjust war against them - he will certainly be defeated, because wherever Krishna and Arjuna are, there will always be victory.

The description of hair standing on end was also found in the first chapter (1.29) describing Arjuna's deep anguish in seeing all those who had come to the battle ready to give up their lives: sidanti mama gatrani mukham ca parisusyati, repathus ca sarire me roma barsas ca jayate, "I feel my limbs losing their strength and my mouth drying up. My body is trembling and my hair is standing on end". This symptom, also called hair-rising or horripilation (or goose pimples in case the skin has less hairs), is due to a strong emotion that moves the pranas in the body and is accompanied by irregular breathing (temporarily suspended, slowed down, or fastened considerably).

Many positive or negative emotions can have such an effect, both on the material and spiritual level, and in fact this is known as one of the main symptoms of spiritual ecstasy. Others are loss of external consciousness (fainting), tears, tremors, faltering of the voice, contraction of the muscles, widening of eyes and mouth and nostrils, hot or cold perspiration, reddening of the skin, and so on.

"By the grace of Vyasa I could hear this supreme transcendental secret of yoga directly from the very words spoken by Krishna, the Lord of yoga.

Sanjaya is certainly a sincere soul, because Veda Vyasa has given him the power to hear the teachings of Krishna; we know from other passages of the Mahabharata that he tried several times to encourage Dhritarastra to rethink his position and correct his son. The wise Vidura had done the same thing until the day he was openly insulted by his nephew Duryodhana. It is not said plainly, but we can easily imagine that Vyasa, who was the father of Vidura (and Pandu and Dhritarastra) and a great spiritual personality with a very clear vision of dharma, must have had deep and meaningful conversations with Sanjaya on the occasion of his visits to Hastinapura, and had instructed him to keep a watchful eye on the family. In such case, he had certainly given him the instruments to be able to perform this task, too.

In our commentaries to chapter 1 we elaborated on Sanjaya's position as a combination of secretary, advisor, charioteer and messenger; in the Vedic system of government a mantri (a word used today with the meaning of "minister") is the trusted supporter, close associate and personal assistant of a kshatriya of the royal order. The position of mantri could be filled either by a brahmana or a sudra, with specific functions based on the guna and karma of the individual. A brahmana mantri would be mostly an advisor, and carry messages of great importance when the receiver could also use some good advice materially or spiritually, or further explanations of the meaning of the message itself. A sudra mantri would deliver ordinary messages or simple orders and take care of the personal needs of the king, driving his chariot, guarding his weapons etc. In both cases, it was a position of great importance for a man the king could fully trust with his own life, therefore it required a very good intelligence and complete loyalty. In this verse and the previous verse the teachings of Krishna to Arjuna are described as etat guhyam and imam samvadam; etat and imam are respectively the feminine and the masculine form of the same pronoun meaning "this", and some commentators have highlighted this fact to show how Krishna's teachings are perfectly balanced and inclusive.

Other commentators have seen Sanjaya's expression of gratitude towards Vyasa as an indication of the supreme importance of the officially recognized lineage in the transmission of knowledge or guru parampara, but this is not the original Vedic system. Here Sanjaya only remembers Vyasa, and not an entire lineage of gurus from which Vyasa is supposed to have received his authority. We should understand that Vyasa is the original guru - a point well expressed by the traditional celebration of Vyasa puja in which Veda Vyasa is honored as the supreme guru of all gurus, and not as a mere representative or a link in a chain of disciplic succession. Of course, when this tradition is distorted and exploited, the Vyasa puja concept dumps Vyasa entirely and only keeps a vyasa asana, "the seat/ position of Vyasa", worshiping anyone who is occupying it, legitimately or illegitimately, and calling him "the supreme universal guru". Even the day of the celebration is moved to accommodate the date of birth of such individual, so that the entire exercise becomes a sort of glorified birthday party, with a big cake and presents and no spiritual enlightenment at all.

As we see in this verse and in all other passages of the genuine shastra, each disciple is fully entitled to have a direct personal relationship with his/ her own guru, whether this guru is present in a material body or not - a relationship on which nobody else has any right to interfere. The relationship between guru and sisya is the most deeply personal relationship that can ever exist, and under no circumstance it should be transformed into a collective institutional allegiance or a tradeable property or commodity. Unfortunately, some people have come to believe that the transmission of spiritual realization can be done by proxy or inheritance by some sort of official authority solely based on the merits and qualifications of one's predecessor(s).

This delusional concept exaggerates the importance of the "spiritual lineage" to a point that was never meant in the Vedic system, and is rather typical of the abrahamic ideologies, where the priests do not need to be particularly qualified personally, but must be obeyed and worshiped absolutely because they present themselves as the sole representatives of God through the historical founder of their particular sect. Such trickery is called "bait and switch" because it attracts followers by presenting a deified figure of the founder (messiah, prophet, acharya etc) as the perfect teacher that everyone should follow, inflating the personal charisma of his figure with stories, quotes and information that cannot be verified because this founder has now disappeared and cannot be contacted in the ordinary way. Then, when the gullible follower is converted (and cannot leave, under pain of persecution or even death), the priests hang away the founder's portrait and take his position, to give orders and accept worship in his name, and if anyone objects to their nonsense, he is accused of blaspheming the saintly founder and his entire family/ lineage and God himself.

For the same reason and with the same motivations, some commentators have mistranslated several passages of the shastra, for example verse 4.34 of Bhagavad gita (presented by them as the most important verse of the entire text), where they used the singular instead of the actual plural form, to give the impression that a sincere spiritual seeker must restrict his/ her choice to only one specific guru that is presented as the "authorized" exclusive or sole representative of Krishna. The actual facts are quite different. In that verse, Krishna speaks of "those who directly contemplate the truth" (tattva darsinah), and the diksha they offer (upadekshanti) is knowledge (jnana), not a social recognition of indictment and allegiance to a particular sect that presents itself as the unquestionable carrier of the absolute truth. Basically, the genuine reading of that verse destroys the pretense of those people who (albeit admittedly not qualified themselves as tattva darshis) claim to be the officially authorized guardians of a particular lineage where the founder acharya was a tattva darshi, so that anyone who wants to be admitted into the "chosen people" can only receive initiation through them.

This is the evidence of how in Kali yuga people have a strong tendency to take or retain only the worst from all groups and reject whatever good things were found anywhere. In this way, someone who is dissatisfied with an old system approaches a new system and absorbs from it those concepts, beliefs, attitudes and practices that seem attractive or compatible with his previous mentality; without understanding what was wrong in the old system and what may be wrong in the new one, a foolish ignorant person merely collects garbage and spoils everything.

The idea of a non-qualified person giving diksha to the new generations in the name of his own material descent from some qualified ancestor in ancient times was typically found in the deluded casteist brahmins plagued by a strong prejudice of bodily identification. Because this serious misconception had greatly weakened the effectiveness of the Hindu tradition, some great religious reformers detached themselves from the label of Hinduism, and re-packaged Bhagavad gita to be more appealing for westerners (especially the Anglo-Saxon Protestant Christians in USA, in those times considered the leading model of civilization and development).

There were advantages in the strategy: elimination of the birth prejudice and privilege, development of unity and community spirit, emphasis on sincere work and service, direct study of the scriptures, and so on. However, because of a lack of genuine realization in the followers, the original idea became lost and the externals gained importance to the point of duplicating the churchist mentality and all its defects. Now that the Christian influence has been broken by a widespread evolution of consciousness in knowledge, and people are genuinely interested in the original Vedic system, the foolish inheritors of the great Hindu reformers remain attached to the package and have lost the actual valuable contents it was supposed to carry and preserve.

राजन्संस्मृत्य संस्मृत्य संवादमिममद्भुतम् । केशवाऽर्जुनयोः पुण्यं हृष्यामि च मुहुर्मुहुः ॥ १८-७६ ॥

rajansamsmṛtya samsmṛtya samvādamimamadbhutam | keśavārjunayoh punyam hr̥ṣyāmi ca muhurmuḥuḥ || 18-76 ||

rajan: o king; samsmṛtya samsmṛtya: by remembering again and again; samvadam: the conversation; imam: this; adbhutam: wonderful; kesava arjunayoh: of Kesava and Arjuna; punyam: meritorious; hr̥ṣyāmi: I feel a great happiness; ca: and; muḥur muḥuḥ: again and again.

"O king, every time I think of this extraordinary and sacred conversation between Kesava and Arjuna, I feel a great happiness.

Dhritarastra is not really the legitimate king, because he was born blind and therefore he would not able to keep a careful watch over the kingdom and engage in battle for its protection. This was the reason why his younger brother Pandu was enthroned, and his sons the Pandavas were the legitimate heirs; Dhritarastra was only supposed to take care of the administration with the help of Bhishma and Vidura until the Pandavas became of age and could take up the job.

However, Sanjaya has sincere affection for the old regent and he calls him "king" to give him pleasure and a sense of self worth. It is important to notice that Sanjaya's respect and affect for the old man did not impair his proper understanding of the actual facts or give way to adulation and compassionate lies, because he is clearly telling Dhritarastra that Krishna and Arjuna are extraordinary personalities and they are going to win the battle against Dhritarastra's son, Duryodhana.

Sentimentalist people believe that if you love and respect someone, especially elderly people, you should not displease them with hard truths, because that can be seen as a sign of disloyalty. Such a delusional idea is extremely dangerous and can be compared to the foolish choice of a sentimentalist physician who reassures the patient about his good health when in fact the patient is dying. What is the benefit? The purpose of human life is to overcome ignorance and attain liberation from material conditionings and identifications.

If we fail in this task, our human life has been wasted and has no more value than the life of any animal; this awareness is naturally part of our original and inherent consciousness, therefore denying it or preventing someone from attaining it is certainly not a proof of love. If your elderly relatives need some encouragement to wake up to the reality of life and engage in spiritual progress, you should also be ready to give them some good instructions, albeit very respectfully and kindly. In Vedic tradition, the definition of vridhba ("elder") does not refer to the age of the body but to the accumulation of knowledge and wisdom (jñana vridhba); if someone correctly follows the Vedic system, the years will be dedicated to acquiring more knowledge and wisdom, but some people only become senile by age.

Some commentators have translated samvada as "message" or even "gospel" (since the Greek word evangelos means "good news" or "good message"), but this can confuse the minds of people. The word samvada is a combination of sam ("with", "together") and vada ("speech"), therefore it means "conversation", and can only be stretched to mean "news" when one person is giving information to another and they discuss about it.

The expression mubub mubub ("again and again") indicates that the teachings of Krishna should be remembered at every moment, constantly, or at least they should be studied several times. The standard method to study Vedic scriptures requires at least 3 readings of each text, from the beginning to the end; the verses should be studied both singularly and in context, separately and together, until the clear meaning of the entire discussion becomes manifest. It is also a good practice to memorize important verses, by repeating each line 10 times and then repeating the entire verse 10 times.

The word punya refers to the merit gained by performing a good action, and indicates that by studying Krishna's teachings one already acquires virtuous merits, such as the good effects one obtains from performing yajnas, tapas and dana. Krishna has already said that he considers the sincere study of Bhagavad gita as fully fledged worship offered to him, and this verse confirms that it constitutes a genuine religious practice in itself. The accumulation of such punya, or virtuous merits, creates a positive movement in our life and rises us to a better next birth, to the heavenly planets, and to liberation from material conditioning: all this is due to the power of knowledge, that burns all ignorance and bad karma (4.19, 4.37).

The word brishyami ("I rejoice") indicates that transcendental knowledge and realization are the real source of happiness. Intelligent people do not seek happiness in material pleasures, that depend on the contact of the senses with the material objects and therefore are temporary (5.22); such an unstable situation produces a constant movement (rajas) and the movement causes emotions, especially greed, fear and anxiety; only when these emotions are calmed down there can be peace, and without peace there can be no happiness (2.66, 4.40). We should not think that spiritual life and transcendental consciousness are devoid of pleasure and happiness - in fact, the atman/ brahman is the actual source of pure happiness, that is free from all conditionings and therefore is perfect and eternal, as confirmed by the Bhagavata Purana (abaituki apratibhata yayatma suprasidati, 1.2.6).

Krishna had already stated that yoga is a happy path (9.2) and true happiness is found in freedom from conditionings and in the supreme consciousness of atman/ brahman (4.38, 5.13, 5.21, 5.23, 5.24, 6.21, 6.27, 6.28, 14.27). The transcendental existence is defined as sat ("existence"), cit ("consciousness") and ananda ("happiness"). Here Sanjaya confirms that by listening sincerely to the conversation between Krishna and Arjuna, one can easily attain this transcendental existence of eternity and consciousness, that is the ultimate purpose of human life.

तच्च संस्मृत्य संस्मृत्य रूपमत्यद्भुतं हरेः । विस्मयो मे महान् राजन्हृष्यामि च पुनः पुनः ॥ १८-७७ ॥

tacca saṁsmṛtya saṁsmṛtya rūpamatyadbhutaṁ hareḥ | vismayo me mahān rājanhr̥ṣyāmi ca punaḥ punaḥ || 18-77 ||

tat: that; ca: and; samsmṛtya samsmṛtya: remembering again and again; rūpam: the form; ati adbhitam: very wonderful; hareḥ: of Hari; vismayah: amazement; me: my; mahan: great; rajan: king; brishyami: I am filled with joy; ca: and; punah punah: again and again.

"O great king, constantly thinking of the wonderful form of Hari, I am feeling waves of joy and amazement, again and again."

The previous verse said, samsmṛtya samsmṛtya ("remembering again and again") and brishyami ca mubur mubub ("I rejoice again and again"), and this verse repeats, samsmṛtya samsmṛtya and brishyami ca punah punah. Such repetition is not a literary defect, but it expresses the great importance and wonder of Krishna's teachings; the previous verse mentioned adbhitam ("amazing") and this verse echoes ati adbhitam ("very amazing"). This overwhelming emotion is the ecstasy of wonder (vismaya) that rises from transcendental consciousness and realization.

We mentioned the spandakarika as the throbbing of orgasmic happiness in the union between the atman and the brahman, between shakti and shaktiman, but here the ecstasy rises from the realization of the intrinsic and inherent unity of atman and brahman. There can be only union, because they are one and the same, although they dance with each other in the rasa lila that consists in tasting the feelings (rasas) of the supreme awareness: raso vai sah, rasam hi evayam labdhva anandi bhavati, "He is taste, and one who attains this taste becomes happy", (Taittiriya Upanishad, 2.7.1).

This eternal dance is the form of Hari (rupam hareb), because form is prakriti and shakti; it is Mother who gives the body and everything that is related to the body, both on the spiritual and on the material level (4.9, 7.25, 9.10, 13.20, 13.22, 13.27, 14.4, 18.61). It is only through the agency of the Mother, that the atman takes birth from the brahman and again unites with brahman; devotion is Bhakti Devi, spiritual pleasure is Hladini Shakti, and knowledge is Sri Vidya. In her aspect as Mahamaya, the Mother acts in the material world and manifests the material bodies, while in her aspect of Yogamaya she acts in the spiritual world and manifests the spiritual bodies. The transcendental gunas (qualities, powers, energies) of sat (existence of the relationship of the Supreme with his parts), cit (knowledge and awareness) and ananda (happiness and spiritual pleasure) are respectively bhakti, vidya and hladini shakti.

Yogamaya is the "magic of union" that manifests all the spiritual forms, activities, attributes, and so on. Without Yogamaya, Vishnu would have no form, as Yogamaya is form itself as Bhumarupa ("she whose form is all existing things") and Linga Bhairavi ("the formless form of Time"). Yogamaya manifests both the material forms and the spiritual forms, as confirmed in the Devi mahatmya of the Markandeya Purana: sarva svarupe sarvese sarva sakti samanvite, "you exist as the form of all, ruler of all, possessing all powers" (11.24) and visnub sarira grabhanam abam isana eva ca karita aste, "you have caused all of us to take a form - including Vishnu, Shiva and me (Brahma)" (1.84).

Another significant correspondence in these two last verses connects the form of Hari with both Kesava and Arjuna. We know that Hari is worshiped mainly as the Vishnu aspect of the composite form of Hari-Hara, also represented in the previous verse by Krishna and Arjuna, who are Narayana and Nara, Vishnu and Shiva. Together with the Adi Shakti, Yogamaya, they constitute the Triad also known as Jagannatha Purushottama, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, that protects the entire universe.

यत्र योगेश्वरः कृष्णो यत्र पार्थो धनुर्धरः । तत्र श्रीर्विजयो भूतिर्ध्रुवा नीतिर्मतिर्मम ॥ १८-७८ ॥

yatra yogeśvaraḥ kṛṣṇo yatra pārtho dhanurdharaḥ | tatra śrīrvijayo bhūtirdhruvā nītimatirmama || 18-78 ||

yatra: where; yoga isvarah: the Lord of yoga; kṛṣṇah: Krishna; yatra: where; parthab: the son of Pritha; dhanur dharah: who carries the bow; tatra: there; śrī: prosperity; vijayah: victory; bhūti: glory; dhruva: certain/ permanent; nīti: morality; matih: opinion; mama: my.

"Wherever is Krishna, the Lord of yoga, and Arjuna the great archer, there will be prosperity, victory, glory, determination, and morality. This is my opinion.

This closing verse in the text of Bhagavad gita is a blessing and a phala sruti, a declaration of the merits of association with Krishna and Arjuna through the reading and the remembering of their conversation.

This was already mentioned in verse 18.71: śraddhavan anasuyas ca srinuyat api yo narah, so 'pi muktab subhal lokan prapnuyat punya karmanam, "Any human being who will listen to this discussion with faith, free from envy and hostility, will become liberated and attain the auspicious planets of those who have performed virtuous deeds."

According to Vedic tradition, sacred texts are accompanied by some verses stating that their study and recitation will bring virtuous merits, and all material and spiritual success. One should not take this as some kind of magic spell that we can use to obtain the selfish benefits we desire, but rather as the purificatory effect of transcendental knowledge that will raise us from the lower gunas to sattva and then to visuddha sattva. So, the more we invest our sincere attention and intelligence in the study of Bhagavad gita, the more we will receive its beneficial effects. A mechanical recitation will only bring limited results, while true engagement in the path of yoga described by Krishna will give the greatest benefits: vedesu yajnesu tapahsu caiva danesu yat punya phalam pradistam, atyeti tat sarvam idam viditva yogi param sthanam upaiti cadyam, "A yogi obtains greater benefits than those acquired by the prescribed virtuous acts (punya) such as reciting the Vedas, performing yajnas, engaging in austerities and distributing charity. Knowing all this, a yogi attains the supreme and original position." (8.28).

The name yogesvara indicating Krishna here has also appeared in the chapter of the universal form, mentioned both by Arjuna and Sanjaya: manyase yadi tac chakyam maya drastum iti prabho, yogesvara tato me tvam darsayatmanam avyayam, "O Lord, supreme master of yoga, if you think that I am capable of seeing it, then please let me have the direct vision of your imperishable self" (11.4) and sanjaya uvaca, evam ukta tato rajan maha yogesvaro harib, darsayam asa parthaya paramam rupam aisvaram, Sanjaya said, "O king, saying these words Hari, the great Lord of yoga, showed the supreme majestic form to Arjuna" (11.9).

We can therefore understand that the deepest meaning of yoga is the acintya bheda abheda tattva of the simultaneous oneness and distinction of the Purusha and the Prakriti, of the Para and the Apara, by which the yogis become able to see Purushottama in everything (4.35, 5.7, 5.18, 5.19, 6.29, 6.30, 6.31, 6.32, 7.7, 7.10, 7.19, 8.22, 9.4, 9.5, 9.6, 10.3, 10.15, 10.16, 10.20, 10.39, 11.7, 11.11, 11.13, 11.15, 11.16, 11.20, 11.23, 11.40, 13.14, 13.15, 13.16, 13.17, 13.18, 13.28, 13.29, 13.31, 13.34, 15.13, 15.15, 15.19, 18.20, 18.46, 18.61, 18.62). These are the Rishis, "those who see", whose consciousness is always united in the supreme Consciousness, that is the entirety of Existence (advaya vastu).

It is very interesting to note that next to Krishna who is yogesvara, Arjuna is mentioned with the names of partha ("son of Pritha") and dhanur dhara ("the carrier of the bow"), to remind us that the entire Bhagavad gita was spoken with the purpose of encouraging Arjuna to engage in the dharma yuddha ("ethical battle") to protect the Earth. Contrarily to what many people think, Krishna's teachings are not meant to convince us to leave the world and our duties to the universal community in the name of some vague renunciation and spirituality. This is clearly demonstrated by the fact that at the end of the conversation, Arjuna says that he is now ready to engage in the battle, and he is certainly grasping his famous bow Gandiva, that he had dropped in the beginning of the text (1.30). We are also called to do the same. In this sacred duty, we should remember the Supreme to whom we are offering our sacrifice, as well as the Shakti that engages us in this service. This is why wherever there is the bhoktri (the object of love) and the bhakta (the one who loves), there must be bhakti (love).

This supreme Goddess, the Adi Para Shakti, is also known as Mahalakshmi; her names are many and all auspicious. Sri means "opulence, beauty, prosperity, blessing", and in this form the Mother Goddess accompanies the names of all good people, male or female, as we can see from the Indian tradition, and especially in the title of sri yukta ("joined with Sri") that is referred to married men, who have integrated their life and energy with the feminine power and are therefore qualified (adhikari) to perform the sacred rituals. The name Vijaya ("victory") is also characteristically associated to Lakshmi, especially in the form of the Mother Goddess worshiped by kings and protectors of the land and her prajas.

The word bhuti literally means "power", especially in the sense of "expanding, prosperity, growth, development, evolution"; it is closely related to the word vibhuti, to which chapter 10 was entitled. We remember that when Arjuna asked Krishna for specific instructions on meditation (10.17), Krishna told him to meditate on his vibhuti (10.19), described in chapters 10 and 11. This instruction is also directed to us, and we should follow it. If we sincerely follow this instruction in a determined and constant way (dhrva), we will always be situated on the highest level of morality (niti) because our behavior towards all beings will be the service full of love and devotion that we render to the Supreme. This consciousness includes all the other forms of dharma: yavan artha udapane sarvatah samplutodake, tavan sarvesu vedesu brahmanasya vijanatah, "Whatever value is found in a pond is also found, for all purposes, also in a large lake, and similarly whatever is contained in all the Vedas can be found in a person who has realized the knowledge of Brahman" (2.46). The fact that niti is united with dhrva indicates that such morality is not merely a matter of social etiquette or a temporary or relative position, but it is eternal.

This is the opinion of Sanjaya, and also the opinion of the great Rishis and Acharyas.
